a reliable gentleman who was at the time in the city of Mexico, stated that one of the papers telegraphed Senator Fall asking his categorical expression on the subject; that is, intervention, etc. We cabled to the Universal a column of printed matter, which was read into the record yesterday, rather noncommittal in character, but which was taken to indicate a purpose of intervention. The following day the papers voiced their astonishment that on the eve of a foreign invasion the press and people should be so indifferent. On the same day the supreme court called up all the amparos of the oil companies for urgent action and the court agreed to give them a hearing the following day. Congress met in secret session and appointed a commission to meet a similar commission from the American Congress at the border for the purpose of going over the matters of difference between the two Governments in the hope of consolidating them. The following day the minister of the treasury (Luis Cabrera to whom you referred) wrote a letter to the supreme court and the Mexican Congress. In this letter he said there was no occasion for taking such action and requested them to suspend all such actions awaiting instructions from the President.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am sorry that I have received last night from a source which I know to be very reliable, but which it would not be safe to disclose, two documents, one entitled "Anti-El Paligro" (signed by Alberto Rabez Domingues) and the other a document unsigned and inclosed in the same envelope addressed to the Congress of the United States of North America and the people of that country.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not ask you to say who, but do you know where this last document addressed to the people of this country and to the Congress of the United States emanated?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know the source from which it was forwarded to this country. It was mailed in an envelope in the United States but there was an inclosure which enabled me to identify the immediate source of the documents.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that from a reliable source?

Mr. WILLIAMS. A source in which I have every confidence. Whether these documents have been published I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. The Domingues document was published in the City of Mexico in Spanish. That is a Spanish copy you have there?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is a Spanish copy; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been published in the papers; therefore it has been given publicity.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The other document is in the nature of a protest against certain things. I will hand it to the chairman for whatever it may be worth, if the chairman so desires.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you. I will have them translated. These will not be placed in the record at this particular time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They may serve some useful purpose in the investigation.

The CHAIRMAN. They will be received for the use of the committee, and the committee may direct that they be placed in the record later.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Did you see this clipping from our Public Ledger?

The CHAIRMAN. The Public Ledger of September 8, with reference to the work of this committee?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; with reference to the work of this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. It is very complimentary and the committee appreciates it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Also a reference to the character of the propaganda carried on in reference to American rights.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee, of course, is aware that it is being criticized in some of the papers in this country and is grateful to others for their commendation of its work so far.

Mr. WILLIAMS. "That the Carranza agents are being shown up in their true light is one of the best things that has come out in Washington for some time."

The CHAIRMAN. The purpose of this committee is, of course, merely to give the facts to the people of the United States, and it will not be deterred in that purpose by any criticism, and it will be encouraged, of course, by fair commendation.

I am informed by one of the representatives of the press who is present that these two Spanish documents which have been handed to the chairman by the witness who has just been testifying have been read to certain members of the press. I would request that the members of the press do not publish any of the contents, or what purports to be the contents of these papers, until a little later. The chairman has not had time to read them.

The committee will be in recess, subject to the call of the chair. For the next week, and possibly a little longer, the sessions of the committee may not be regular because of the necessity that members of the committee should at almost all times hold themselves in readiness to proceed to the Senate floor. We hope to have a meeting of the committee about Tuesday with other witnesses present, but will notify the press and others Monday morning in the event the committee is not called for that day, and at that time will be able to definitely fix a date when the committee will be called. At present we hope to have a meeting on Tuesday, at any rate.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to the call of the chairman, at 11.20 o'clock a. m., in room 201, Senate Office Building, Senator Frank B. Brandegee presiding, during the temporary absence of Chairman Fall.

Present: Senators Fall (chairman) and Brandegee.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Is Mr. Lill here?

TESTIMONY OF THOMAS RUSSELL LILL.

(The witness was duly sworn by Senator Brandegee.)

Senator BRANDEGEE. What is your full name?

Mr. LILL. Thomas Russell Lill.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Your residence?

Mr. LILL. New York. My business is in New York. I live in East Orange, N. J.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Where do you vote?

Mr. LILL. East Orange.

Senator BRANDEGEE. What is your occupation?

Mr. LILL. Certified public accountant.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Have you been subpoenaed here before this committee?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. And do you know the subject concerning which you are to testify? I did not subpoena you, and I do not know what you want to say.

Mr. LILL. I do not think the subpoena said.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Do you appear voluntarily?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I suppose Senator Fall wrote you or requested you to appear?

Mr. LILL. Well, they sent me a subpoena, and I had previous to that communicated through Maj. Jackson.

Senator BRANDEGEE. About what subjects do you want to testify, Mr. Lill?

Mr. LILL. Well, I thought I might be of some service to the committee if I gave a short description of what work I have been doing down there, rather tending to show the progress which the Mexican Government had made toward law and order since May, 1917, to quite a recent date.

Senator BRANDEGEE. How much time have you spent in Mexico since the date you mentioned—May, 1917?

Mr. LILL. May, 1917? It is over a year and a half, or a year and seven or eight months.

Senator BRANDEGEE. And had you been there before that?

Mr. LILL. No, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. So that, I assume, you are only able to testify as to the commercial and financial matters in Mexico since the period you went there; or had you had any familiarity with the subject before you went there?

Mr. LILL. No; I had not before I went there, in the progress of the work there I made studies or had studies made under my direction.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Well, as a public accountant, or a certified public accountant, I believe you called it, are you required to be authorized by the State to be a certified public accountant?

Mr. LILL. Yes; by the State of New Jersey.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Now, you were employed, I assume, by some companies to make investigations?

Mr. LILL. No, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Or, for what purpose did you familiarize yourself with these conditions in Mexico?

Mr. LILL. I held a position down there of chief accountant and acting director of President Carranza's financial and administrative reorganization commission.

Senator BRANDEGEE. You were employed by them?

Mr. LILL. I was employed by the Mexican Government.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Very well. Now proceed to give us as good an idea as you can of the governmental finances and of the general commercial conditions of the country. You can state it in your own way.

Mr. LILL. Thank you. It might be interesting to relate how the work started down there. I went down as chief assistant to Henry Bruere, of New York, former city chamberlain of New York City.

Mr. Bruere took quite an active part, I think, in the conferences over the Pershing expedition at Buffalo, I think they were, and became acquainted with Mr. Cabrera and Mr. Pani. As a result of that Mr. Bruere was invited to go to Mexico City to make a study of the government, and I went with him, owing probably to my knowledge of Spanish.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Invited by whom was he?

Mr. LILL. By Mr. Luis Cabrera and Mr. Pani.

Senator BRANDEGEE. What office did Mr. Cabrera hold at that time?

Mr. LILL. Mr. Cabrera was secretary of hacienda at that time, and Mr. Pani was secretary of commerce, labor, and industry.

We left New York in—or perhaps I had better state before going down, I understand the matter was discussed with President Wilson by Mr. Bruere, and the undertaking was thoroughly approved. Mr. Bruere also had conferences or discussed the matter with Secretary Lane, I think, and Ambassador Fletcher and others up here, and the matter was thoroughly understood and approved. The condition also imposed was that the matter should be approved by President Carranza.

We left here about the middle of May, 1917, and reached Mexico City along about the 25th, I think, and were installed in the national palace about halfway between Carranza's office and Cabrera's office.

We began making studies first of the secretary of the treasury's office. After that we got into commerce and labor.

As a result of these preliminary studies we recommended that the Mexican Government should reorganize the fiscal system, establish a purchasing agent and various other minor reforms.

Mr. Bruere had to leave along about the end of July or August 1, and I remained there until May of the following year.

A month or so later at our suggestion Mr. Cabrera organized this commission, which consisted of Mr. Cabrera as president, Mr. Pani, secretary of commerce and labor, as vice president, Manuel Rodriguez Gutierrez.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Was there any name given to this commission?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. What was it known by?

Mr. LILL. Well, it was known in Spanish as the commission de reorganizacion administrativa y financiera.

Senator BRANDEGEE. And what would be the English translation of that?

Mr. LILL. The administrative and financial organization commission.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Did it have any official status except as advisory to the Government of Mexico?

Mr. LILL. No; its organization was not provided for by law, but it was a very powerful unit because four or five members of it were members of President Carranzas cabinet.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Well, was it officially recognized by Carranza?

Mr. LILL. Oh, yes, sir. Yes; we have a number of conferences with him and our reports were given to Mr. Carranza for approval.

Senator BRANDEGEE. By whom were you paid?

Mr. LILL. I was paid by the Mexican Government.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Were the recommendations of this commission in printed form, and do they exist now in a permanent form, in a pamphlet or otherwise?

Mr. LILL. Some of the reports were printed, and a great many others were not. They were in typewritten form.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Do you mean they were verbal reports?

Mr. LILL. No; typewritten.

Senator BRANDEGEE. And handed to the Mexican officials in typewritten form?

Mr. LILL. Yes; discussed with the members of the commission, and we had repeated conferences over them, amended them, and finally adopted them—or, they were approved by the commission and they were taken up by the officials.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Very well; proceed.

Mr. LILL. The commission was organized, I think in September, 1917. The proposal of the commission, or the recommendation of the commission for the establishment of a purchasing agent and the establishment of a controller general independent of the treasurer, such as has been suggested here in the American Government, was taken up with the Congress by Mr. Cabrera and approved by Congress in December, 1917.

As soon as it appeared that Congress was going to approve these bills I began to work on the laws providing for the organization and defining the powers and duties, and had those ready about the time Congress approved the creation of the department and took them up and had them signed by Mr. Carranza about the middle of January, 1918.

It has frequently been said that the Carranza government was anti-American, and I would like to give here the men we had down there at one time and another. We were very much handicapped with the mass of work and so we secured the services of Francis Oakey as certified public accountant, who had installed the system at Panama and also had been chief accountant in President Taft's administration here.

Then it early appeared that we had to take up the question of currency and taxation and we secured the services of Prof. E. W. Kemmerer, of Princeton University, who had done similar work in the Philippines and whom I knew, also Prof. H. E. Chandler, associate professor of economics, I think, in Columbia University.

Mr. Chandler made a study of taxation. He was obliged to return to the United States and we later secured the services of Dr. Arthur Young, associate professor of economics at Princeton, who made studies of the taxation in the Federal districts and an attempt to define the sources of taxation as between the Federal, State, and municipal units.

Then we had Mr. Samuel Wilson, of the American city bureau on commerce and industry.

We had Mr. Gleason on the purchasing, and a Mr. Munroe on purchasing, so that during all this time, practically for a year, we had from 5 to 10 Americans working right in the national palace in Mexico City.

Mr. LILL. Could I put this in?

Senator BRANDEGEE. What is that?

Mr. LILL. This is Mr. Kemmerer's report.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Well, leave it with the committee on file and if there is anything in it we want to put in the record we will have it done.

Mr. LILL. Mr. Kemmerer's report on the currency was the basis for a later revision of the currency system down there.

The silver went up so high as to practically send all Mexican currency to the melting pot and we had to reduce the silver content of the coins.

These two reports by Mr. Chandler, a preliminary survey of the Mexican revenue problem and an analysis of the income-tax project, which the officials of Mexico had been considering at that time following the adoption of an income tax in the United States.

Dr. Young prepared this report dealing with the finances of the Federal district, recommending among other things our American system of taxing land, and I believe that that is being—that a great many changes are being made down there in the tax system based upon these reports.

The law relating to the controller and the address of Mr. Carranza in English, which was translated by the commission at Mr. Cabrera's request, for distribution.

Senator BRANDEGEE. The address of Mr. Carranza on what occasion and before whom?

Mr. LILL. Before congress, his congressional message.

Senator BRANDEGEE. And what year was that?

Mr. LILL. That was in 1917.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Excuse me. Was that in relation to your report?

Mr. LILL. No, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. You had not made your report at that time?

Mr. LILL. No; we had not done any work at the time that report had been made.

Senator BRANDEGEE. You had not done any work at what time?

Mr. LILL. At the time that message had been delivered. I think that was at the beginning of congress, in April, 1917.

Senator BRANDEGEE. What topics does that touch on—all Mexican questions?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir; it takes up a great many Mexican questions and it is remarkable to me for the last paragraph, which possibly might be inserted in the record.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Suppose you read that if you want to call particular attention to it. If you do not happen upon that now, suppose you defer that and let the stenographer leave a blank space or make a note to insert it there when you locate it?

(Extract from President Carranza's message to congress May 2, 1917.)

A revolution that is not prompted by a necessity, the antisatisfaction of which does not admit extension of time and which does not aspire to vitalize of morality and justice, is merely a crime against the existence of a people.

The first requisite for the existence of a state is order. Order can not prevail where there is no law, or where the law is violated constantly and with impunity. It is law which determines the relations among the members of a nation and serves as the intervening medium between these members. Law fixes the sphere of free action to be exercised by individuals and the limits within which public authority must act so that social functions may not encounter obstacles in their multiple and legitimate manifestations. In a state where a man feels himself strong, simply because he is armed and believes himself able to impose his will over others, where there is no respect for life, liberty, or property of the other members of the social body, there can be neither rights nor morality, which are the main elements of order. Within a state where any representative of authority considers himself capacitated to act as he elects without a brake to control his bursts of anger, without a sentiment impelling him to realize that there are others who deserve respect—and it is precisely for the purpose of compelling the stubborn to respect others and inspire ideas of right to the obstinate and refractory that public authority is necessary—in such a state, I repeat, can exist only anarchy, which is the disordered tyranny of the many; or despotism, which is the tyranny of only one.

Mr. LILL. I would like now to proceed with some of these effects of these various recommendations of ours.

The office of controller general—or, all the accounting of the Government of Mexico, was under the secretary of the treasury, similar to our Government in the United States, which practically means that the secretary of the treasury receives, spends, and audits his own accounts.

After considerable study it seemed to us the best thing to do would be to take the accounting out from under the secretary of the treasury and make it an independent office.

As I stated, we began organizing along about February of 1918, and we installed a complete new system in the customhouses, the subtreasuries, in the internal-revenue offices, and the subtreasury in Mexico City.

After the system began working, along about April and May, I received telegraphic reports—or the controller received telegraphic reports and daily reports from the collecting officers and disbursing officers all over the Republic. And I want to call your attention to that fact because of the fact it has been stated so repeatedly that the territory was not under Mr. Carranza's control.

From March, April, May, and June, of 1918, we received daily telegraphic reports from every collecting officer in the Republic with the exception, of course, of those offices in Lower California that could not be reached so easily by telegraph. The Government funds in Mexico were collected by officers appointed by Carranza and were disbursed upon orders from the central treasury or were transferred from one office to another or were remitted to Mexico City.

During all of that time I speak of there was only one office that I know of that we did not get reports from or was not in operation; that was up in Moreles, I think, but I am not sure. That was discontinued for the lack of law and order or because it did not pay expenses. It is rather difficult to say how the territory was not under Carranza's control when we were administering the finances and collecting revenues in practically every city in Mexico.

Shortly after we began the organization of this office it appeared that another reform was necessary in order to secure economy in the finances and blue prints were drawn up of a monthly budget and an allotment system. Those were submitted to President Carranza and he approved them for immediate use.

The budget for Mexico in Diaz's time, the last years of Diaz's régime, averaged from 100,000,000 to 110,000,000 pesos a year. The budget at this time, or for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1918, amounted to 177,000,000 pesos exclusive of any charges for the public debt. About that time Congress changed the fiscal year to the calendar year, and the new budget has been prepared amounting to 178,000,000 pesos. That, of course, did not include any charges for the public debt, nor did it include 21,000,000 pesos which were set up for the department of munitions.

Senator BRANDEGER. When you speak of the budget, do you mean the amount proposed to be collected as necessary or the amount that actually was collected in taxes?

Mr. LILL. No, sir; the budget I speak of is the estimated expenditures of the Government.

Senator BRANDEGER. When you say it was 178,000,000 pesos at that time, was that amount actually collected?

Mr. LILL. Well, I was just coming to that, Senator.

Senator BRANDEGER. All right.

Mr. LILL. That was the estimated expenditures of the Government. At that time the revenues of the Government did not equal that sum nor do they equal that sum yet, and it was therefore imperative—

Senator BRANDEGER. How near did it come to equaling the sum?

Mr. LILL. Well, the revenues at that time, I think, were approximately 11,000,000 pesos a month or 132,000,000 pesos a year.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Then they were 50,000,000 shy, were they not?

Mr. LILL. They were about 60,000,000 shy, about 5,000,000 pesos a month deficit. As I say, it early became apparent there that some means had to be taken to bring the expenditures within the revenues. This monthly budget, therefore, was adopted, based upon the congressional budget. Each head of a department was required to submit an estimate to President Carranza asking for the money that he needed to run his department for the succeeding month and specifying with more or less detail in that request what he wanted to do with the money. These requests were tabulated until sometime after conference we could see that the proposed expenditures were within the actual revenues and then they were approved, and that budget was set up in the department of control and we had a very real and effective control. When a department head drew checks or drew money up to the amount that he had been allowed, he stopped getting money.

The effect of this procedure was to reduce the budget from a monthly basis of 16,500,000 pesos to approximately 10,500,000 pesos a month, which was somewhere within the revenues.

Senator BRANDEGEE. What was a peso worth then in American money, gold?

Mr. LILL. You mean taking the rate of exchange into consideration or the actual contents?

Senator BRANDEGEE. The intrinsic contents?

Mr. LILL. I think the Mexican gold coin is two-tenths of 1 per cent less than the American.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I mean, how much was a Mexican peso worth in American gold?

Mr. LILL. Fifty cents; that is, intrinsically worth that much.

Senator BRANDEGEE. That is what I mean. How much was it considering the rate of exchange?

Mr. LILL. Well, it varied from—it varied until——

Senator BRANDEGEE. Did it fluctuate——

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE (continuing). Rapidly and frequently?

Mr. LILL. Well, it fluctuated very frequently. The fluctuations were not very great, but there was a steady rise in the Mexican peso, or a steady decrease in the value of American currency, whichever way you look at it; that is, corresponding more or less with the rise in the price of silver.

Senator BRANDEGEE. For instance, do you happen to remember what was the value of the peso when you went to Mexico and what was its value after you had been there a year and a half?

Mr. LILL. Well, the value of the peso——

Senator BRANDEGEE. We can find out if you do not happen to remember it, of course. It is a matter of record.

Mr. LILL. There are so many different ways of figuring that thing down there. The peso was worth about 52 cents American at the time I went there and it ranged up to 58 cents, as I remember it.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Were those the extreme limits of the range?

Mr. LILL. I think it went to 59 or 60 at one time.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Well, about from 52 to 60?

Mr. LILL. Yes. Now, that decrease in the American money or increase in the Mexican money did not depend exclusively on the increased price of silver, because the increased price of silver made the Mexican coins so valuable they were smuggled out of the country, which created a great shortage of currency in Mexico and this premium I speak of was due as much to the shortage of currency as to the increased price of silver.

Senator BRANDEGEE. What were the other principal causes for this variation other than the increased cost of silver or the price of silver?

Mr. LILL. There were none that I know of, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I thought you said that was the principal cause but there were others.

Mr. LILL. Well, the price of silver and the shortage in the currency.

Senator BRANDEGEE. What was the increased cost of silver due to other than the decreased production of the mines—the war situation?

Mr. LILL. The war situation. Silver went up, as you remember, from I think 60 until the time we made our first currency investigation, when it was $1.08.

Senator BRANDEGEE. There was a large increase all over the world?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir. Silver at $1.08 made the Mexican peso worth more as bullion than it was as currency and it practically all went out of existence.

I ought to state probably that the Carranza revolutionary government had issued large quantities of paper currency which depreciated very rapidly up to about November, 1916, I think, when it was not received any longer by the merchants. That situation placed the Mexican Government on a purely metallic currency basis. They had no paper currency and no means of getting anything and what currency they had they had to coin.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Was there a corresponding decrease in the price of commodities when this increase in the value of currency occurred?

Mr. LILL. Well, there was a tremendous—of course, a tremendous increase in the price of commodities when charged in the paper currency, because the paper currency depreciated, and I fancy it took a thousand pesos to buy an article worth 1 peso at the time.

Senator BRANDEGEE. But did the price of currency and the price of commodities rise at the same time there in Mexico?

Mr. LILL. Well, I do not know how to express that exactly, Senator, but with the adoption of the paper currency the commodities were raised in price as expressed in that paper currency to offset the depreciation.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I understood you to say there was no paper currency in circulation.

Mr. LILL. I thought you were speaking of that time. Afterwards, when the metallic currency came in, I think there was—I do not think the price of merchandise in Mexico was increased as a result of that currency reform.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I had supposed the cheaper currency generally made higher prices and the dearer currency made lower prices.

Mr. LILL. Well, that currency in Mexico was not cheap, Senator, and it was hard to get.

Senator BRANDEGER. I know, and being very high I should have thought prices would have been low. That is, I should think the more money the peso was worth the more it would buy in the market of commodities.

Mr. LILL. You are not speaking of the paper currency, are you, but the metallic?

Senator BRANDEGER. I am speaking of the peso. You say bullion was the only thing in circulation there for awhile.

Mr. LILL. Yes.

Senator BRANDEGER. Well, they bought and sold at that time, and the commodities must have had some ratio of relation to the price of the peso or bullion. If you do not know about that, I will not question you about it.

Mr. LILL. It is slightly out of my field. It is a question of economics.

Senator BRANDEGER. Just proceed as you want to.

Mr. LILL. But the price of commodities was considerably higher than it is in the United States, and that was due largely to the embargo placed by the United States on the exportation of articles to Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. What articles were embargoed?

Mr. LILL. I believe practically all foodstuffs were only shipped by permission, and the war trade act restricted traders in Mexico from importing stuff if they were not known to the department.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mean the blacklist? What other restriction was there upon the traders in Mexico?

Pardon me for interrupting you at this time, Senator.

Senator BRANDEGER. I have no further line of questions to ask.

The CHAIRMAN. It is right there that I want to find out what foodstuffs were embargoed and what traders in Mexico were refused permission to buy stuff?

Mr. LILL. Of course, the people on the blacklist could not get goods and there seemed to be a general—it was generally stated down there that it was very difficult indeed to get goods from the United States even if you were an American citizen, owing to the shortage of those goods in the United States.

Senator BRANDEGER. It was not an embargo, was it? It was difficult to get goods here, too, was it not?

Mr. LILL. I do not think I used that word correctly. There was no embargo. That was not the thing I meant.

The CHAIRMAN. Shipments of sugar were restricted, as they were to other countries; shipments of flour in some respects were restricted, as they were to other countries.

Mr. LILL. Corn, ham, and fats.

Well, the adoption of this monthly budget, as I stated, reduced the expenditures of the Government from about 16,500,000 pesos to approximately 10,500,000 pesos a month.

These economies were secured very largely through Mr. Carranza himself. I had a number of conferences with him and he took a great deal of interest in the budget as printed, and was constantly at work with his blue pencil trying to reduce expenditures and, incidentally, to eliminate dishonest officials and trying to get honest ones. An instance I saw there was when he was studying the budget of the department of communications and saw 30 or 40 engineers there, and he said, "Are we doing any construction work now?" They said, "No; we haven't any money for it." "Well, we don't need engineers, do we?" They said, "No," and Mr. Carranza drew his pencil around these engineers. That is only an instance of the way Mr. Carranza was operating down there on this spending situation.

At the same time, or along about two or three months later, we organized the department of purchases, which centralized all the purchasing of the Mexican Government in one man or one bureau. Previous to that time practically all purchases had been made by the different bureaus or offices in the Government, and I think there were probably 500 purchasing agents scattered through the offices. That bureau is also now running. The department of munitions was another bureau which was not created at our suggestion, but was an outgrowth of our suggestion to consolidate all the purchasing of the Government in one department. Mr. Carranza thought it would be better to have the military supplies separate from the civil.

I do not know how much of this is of interest, Senator. I would be glad to have any leading questions about anything you want to know.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, you are testifying as to the natural condition of Mexico, as I understand, and your familiarity with it. There will be some questions likely that will suggest themselves to me later and probably as you go along. Just go ahead and make any further statement that you have to make, and then when you conclude with what you think is necessary I will ask you some questions.

Mr. LILL. My last time down there I made quite a complete study of the debt situation down there, and that report is in the press now and will be out in two or three days.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, if you could give us a synopsis of it from what you have there, as shortly as possible, I would be glad to have that now. I do not mean necessarily to itemize it.

Mr. LILL. Well, the debt statement, or the national debt of Mexico, is divided as between the prerevolution period and the post-revolution period. I consider that the prerevolution period ended with June 30, 1911, which was shortly after Limantour and Diaz resigned from office. At that time the Mexican debt was approximately 425,000,000 pesos.

From June 30, 1911, to the end of December, 1918, there was issued by Huerta about 190,000,000 pesos. Now, in that portion of the debt which was issued by the Huerta government a very small proportion of that was issued to pay debts incurred by the Madero administration.

Large quantities of the balance of that—well, the information is very lax regarding where it went to. We know part of it was used to purchase the Mexican National Packing Co., and I think something like 80,000,000 pesos was given to John DeKay to purchase arms abroad. I believe that Mr. DeKay purchased a ship load of arms and kept them waiting in Spain at the outbreak of the European war, and I understand resold them to Belgium, so Mexico never got the arms and is out that much money.

There are various other circumstances connected with the issue of these bonds which makes it very hard to determine whether the present administration should assume payment of those bonds or not. It will have, probably, to be a subject of arbitration.

Up to December—

The CHAIRMAN. Why should there be any question about it if they were regularly issued? Were these bonds regularly issued or not?

Mr. LILL. I can not tell, Senator. The information regarding those is not obtainable from any source—from government sources. The records for two years down there were practically destroyed or not kept.

The CHAIRMAN. The bonds were issued under authority of the Madero congress, were they not?

Mr. LILL. I think the authority was granted by the Madero congress, but they were not issued until after Madero was killed.

The CHAIRMAN. Has any money been obtained upon the bonds, the actual bonds?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir; 6,000,000 pounds were sold to the British banks.

The CHAIRMAN. By whom?

Mr. LILL. By the Mexican Government—Huerta.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there any money obtained by the Madero government on the strength of this bond issue?

Mr. LILL. I think not, sir, because the Madero government owed about 42,000,000 pesos and the proceeds of these £6,000,000 which Huerta secured—that was sold at about 90, and he secured something like 50,000,000 pesos after the discount, and 40,000,000 of the 50,000,000 pesos he received were used to pay off the 42,000,000 indebtedness of the Huerta administration.

That seemed to me was a clean-cut transaction.

The CHAIRMAN. He obtained those funds from a deposit of the bonds originally to secure a loan in New York, did he?

Mr. LILL. I think not; I think that was floated in Europe.

The CHAIRMAN. But prior to the flotation in Belgium, France, Great Britain, and the United States, in which J. P. Morgan & Co. took part, there were some of the first issue of these bonds deposited with certain bankers in New York for a loan, were there not?

Mr. LILL. I think prior to that issue, Senator, there was a $20,000,000 loan made by the Madero government, made in New York, which was repaid by the proceeds of these £6,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I referred to, and the loan was from Speyer & Co., was it not?

Mr. LILL. I am not sure about that; that is a loan that is out of existence. I have it among my papers somewhere.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; in anticipation of the sale of these bonds, and they were trying to place the bonds prior to the actual issue of the bonds, and obtained a loan, as I understand, which loan was repaid by Huerta after the placing of these bonds by the syndicate, was it not?

Mr. LILL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. I have all the advertising literature sent out in the attempt to place the bonds.

Mr. LILL. That particular bond issue was secured by a mortgage or pledge of all the remaining customs in Mexico. The existing pledge amounted, as you probably know, to 62 per cent of the customs, and this particular issue was guaranteed by a pledge of the remaining 38 per cent of the customs.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the question in my mind is this: You said that this last bond issue would probably have to be arbitrated because there is a dispute as to where the funds went, and what De Kay did with portions of the money, etc. Would the fact that the Government, through its agents, disposed of bonds, and the agents did not account for the proceeds, or in some way the proceeds did not reach the Government, invalidate the bonds or justify the Government in—

Mr. LILL. No; I would not say so, but if there was any fraud attached to the issue it would seem to me the question might probably be raised, and the circumstances surrounding the issue of these bonds before judgment was passed as to whether payments should be made.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, there might be proper grounds for repudiation of any debt. We have some examples of that to-day, and I am frank to say that in our own country we have some historical examples of the repudiation of State debts.

Mr. LILL. The question was raised about repudiation in connection with the negotiations with the bankers and the Mexican Government distinctly declines to repudiate anything. Now, repudiation contemplates or means that where a man has the means to pay his debts and declines to pay them he repudiates them. The failure to pay a debt when a man has not the means to pay it is not repudiation in any sense of the word.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, certainly not; but I understood you to refer to probable repudiation, or, in other words, that the legality of the debt was questioned, not the question of their having the money to pay it but of their willingness to pay it.

Mr. LILL. Oh, I question that from what evidence I get of it, and it would not be fair to ask Mexico to pay that entire bond issue, which amounts to £20,000,000, without some investigation to see whether she is liable and whether she should pay it. Part of it I do not think there is any question about. There is another part of it I think there is a very real question about.

The CHAIRMAN. She has passed through the same experience before.

Mr. LILL. Yes; and she has had to pay, and various methods have been used to make her pay since 1823.

The CHAIRMAN. You were speaking of the indebtedness.

Mr. LILL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And you say that it was 425,000,000 pesos approximately when Diaz went out and that Huerta added about 190,000,000 pesos?

Mr. LILL. Yes. And there are 58,000,000 pesos which the present Carranza Government borrowed from the banks of issue, and approximately 25,000,000 pesos more which are due to employees of the Mexican Government for failure to get salaries. That is, only part salaries are being paid in the Government at the present time and the difference between their salary and what they get is to be paid them in bonds.

The CHAIRMAN. Right there, what proportion are they getting?

Mr. LILL. I think they are getting 75 per cent. They were getting 75 per cent when I was down there.

The CHAIRMAN. How is that being paid?

Mr. LILL. In gold and silver. There is no other way of paying it. I think for a month or two there the percentage was decreased to 50 per cent to tide over a stringency, but it later was increased again.

That same thing, Senator, has been done—well, Diaz started it when he went into office. That is the first thing he did, was to take that means to economize in the government service.

The total obligations of the Mexican Government on December 18, 1918, were 695,000,000 pesos.

The CHAIRMAN. I have seen that calculation made before, but I notice that Luis Cabrera apparently raised the limit very recently. He is the minister of hacienda, is he not?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I notice he has recently fixed it in round numbers, as late as August 24, at one billion.

Mr. LILL. One million pesos?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. LILL. Well, I do not know his exact wording there, Senator, but on this debt that I speak of of 695,000,000 pesos there is 170,000,000 pesos of interest due, which makes a total apparent liability, I will say, of 865,000,000 pesos or practically 866,000,000 pesos. Now, in the—

The CHAIRMAN. Well, there is this 25 per cent held back on salaries that is supposed to be accounted for. Have you got that in the statement?

Mr. LILL. I have got that in this statement; yes, sir; everything that I could find.

Now, the Mexican railway (sic) has guaranteed a certain issue of bonds of the national railways, I think amounting to something like $50,000,000. It is obligated to pay that, but that is not due and will not be due for a number of years yet, so I do not know whether Mr. Cabrera includes that in his statement or not.

The CHAIRMAN. Who has guaranteed that?

Mr. LILL. The Mexican Government, and probably Mr. Cabrera includes in there money needed to pay claims, which is not included, of course, in any statement of her debt.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, this guarantee of the Mexican Government of the railroad indebtedness, if you classify the railroad as an asset, whether the fifty millions is due or to become due later, it is a liability.

Mr. LILL. Well, I did not want to confuse the issue in my reports.

The CHAIRMAN. Not at all, but we were trying to arrive at how Mr. Cabrera calculated the total indebtedness.

Mr. LILL. Yes. Now, in considering the debt problem of Mexico, it seemed to me, and I have so stated in this report, that is in the press—I am very sorry I have not a copy here, but I did not have time to get it—it seems to me the first thing we should do, or any level-headed business man would do in studying the debt of Mexico would be to ascertain what Mexico could pay in debt service. If her revenues in the future are 180,000,000 pesos a month she will undoubtedly need 100,000,000 pesos for the current operations, which would leave about 80,000,000 pesos for debt service. By debt service I mean interest on the debt and amortization payments. With 80,000,000 a year practically it means that Mexico could assume a debt of something like 550,000,000 pesos.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean additional debt?

Mr. LILL. No, sir; I mean total debt. That is the safe maximum of debt for the Republic of Mexico under her present financial situation after banditry has been suppressed. I can not say, of course, that my theories have been accepted very generally.

The CHAIRMAN. That your theories have not been accepted where?

Mr. LILL. By the Mexican Government or by anyone else that I have discussed it with.

The CHAIRMAN. Which do you mean, now, your theory that Mexico could assume and pay a debt of 550,000,000—that theory has not been accepted?

Mr. LILL. No; my theory that the debt of Mexico should not exceed 550,000,000 pesos, or that she can not pay more than that.

The CHAIRMAN. You say that has not generally been accepted?

Mr. LILL. I am only speaking for myself now. I am not giving the Mexican Government's views at all, but it seems it is just plain business that if she can not pay any more than that that is all she can stand.

The CHAIRMAN. Sure.

Mr. LILL. The only question is whether revenues in Mexico can be increased.

The CHAIRMAN. Pardon me.

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Before we get away from the subject of the debt you have been discussing, you speak of the debt of 425,000,000 left by Diaz. What was the classification of that debt? How was it known? What was it called?

Mr. LILL. Well, that was called in Mexico the interior and exterior debt.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; the internal and external debt, as we know it generally?

Mr. LILL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What were the proportions of that debt, if you recall?

Mr. LILL. I have that right here, I think. The exterior debt, excluding the 6 per cent loan of 1918, would be about 200,000,000 pesos—guaranteed debt. But in discussing that, Mr. Senator, it is exceedingly difficult to define what is an interior and exterior debt.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, it is not hard to understand in view of the fact that the exterior debt is the debt for the payment of which the duties you speak of here were pledged. The import and export duties were not pledged for the internal debt at all.

Mr. LILL. Well, in discussing this matter with bankers they take various views of external debt. As one gentleman insisted, it was all debt which was expressed in foreign currency, and the interior debt was all debt which was expressed in Mexican currency.

The CHAIRMAN. But the external debt of Mexico was all funded two or three different times, finally funded in 1899, was it not?

Mr. LILL. That is the old English debt; that is the final conclusion of the old British debt. It was partly refunded in 1910 by Limantour.

The CHAIRMAN. But in the refunding the contracts were made with this 62 per cent of the duties to be applied to that debt; then for the 190,000,000 which you speak of the balance of the duties were pledged, and that is for the external debt, not for the internal debt at all.

Mr. LILL. No; there are no duties pledged on the—that is the point I was coming up to when I said it was very difficult to decide what was an exterior and interior debt. You take the so-called interior debts of Vera Cruz, the State of Tamaulipas.

The CHAIRMAN. I am not speaking of the State debts. I am speaking of the national debts.

Mr. LILL. But those are all assumed by the national government and the national government is responsible for them and they are all guaranteed by a portion of the customs.

Now the internal debt which is not guaranteed is that 5 per cent municipal loan of 1905 of the City of Mexico and the debt of 1904 of 74,000,000 pesos.

Now a lot of these interior debts that were expressed in Mexican currency were actually sold on the London market and are held abroad.

The CHAIRMAN. It makes no difference whether sold abroad or where sold. There were certain revenues pledged to the external debt and then the internal debt was to be paid from other sources entirely. Of course, if the Mexican congress from time to time, or the Mexican Government, had an excess over the sinking fund and interest on the external debt they could apply the balance to the internal debt, but after the last issue of 190,000,000 they could not apply it at all until the entire foreign debt or external debt was paid off.

Mr. LILL. Permit me to state, Senator, the classification I gave is not the classification generally in use, because the external debt, according to Mexican classification, always includes this municipal loan of 1899, sold in London, and the 4 per cent gold loan in 1904 which was sold in New York.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. LILL. Now those two debts are not secured in any way by the customs.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I am speaking of. That is what the Mexicans always call part of their internal debt.

Mr. LILL. I beg pardon, they include both those as external debts—exterior. Their definition of exterior does not mean the debt is secured by a pledge of the customs.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, from 35 years of actual experience with them in buying their bonds and using their bonds I had a different idea.

Mr. LILL. Well, I am merely giving you the conclusion which has appeared in the memorials of the secretary of hacienda and publications by the Mexican Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly. Doubtless on paper you are possibly very much more nearly correct than myself. Now, how much money did Diaz leave in the Treasury of Mexico?

Mr. LILL. I believe about 72,000,000 pesos. I think that is the figure shown on the balance sheet on June 30, 1911.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, in the debt of Mexico you are not including any of the repudiated currency?

Mr. LILL. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That is just wiped out and gone.

Mr. LILL. No; that is possibly part of Mr. Cabrera's statement, there.

The CHAIRMAN. No; it could not be, because we know about a billion and a half to be wiped out, but we do not know how much more.

Mr. LILL. Well, permit me to explain the situation. The old currency issued by Villa and Dieguez, and others of Carranza's generals, was all brought in and consolidated at the time the Vera Cruz currency was issued.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, let us see whether it was. There is some of the first currency issued redeemable for provisionals. I have one $20 bill and one $10 bill here. Now here is a $5 bill and a $20 bill and a $100 bill of this issue. Here is a $1 bill and a $10 bill and a $5 bill and a $20 bill of another issue.

Mr. LILL. This issue is by Gen. Villa.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. You said that was exchangeable for other moneys.

Mr. LILL. It was up to a certain time; I think up to the time Mr. Villa and President Carranza were together. There were general laws passed which provided that all currency was to be redeemed before a certain period, if not redeemed they were to be made void.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a $10 bill and a $5 bill of the Sonora currency.

Mr. LILL. This is a State currency note, is it not?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; but it is all for the revolution. Now here are some of the provisionals, and it is only this issue of money that was provided for redemption under the Carranza decree. These are what are known as the Carranza provisionals. I have a $20 bill and a $5 bill. Now that money is redeemable, or was redeemable up to a certain date. It is now no good.

Mr. LILL. Well, a discussion of this thing; Senator, without the actual facts is liable not to get us anywhere. I have all the laws from the time Mr. Carranza was First Chief up to the present time relating to currency. I do not know whether they are covered by Prof. Kemmerer in his book or not. He has a separate book on that.

The CHAIRMAN. When you say the laws you mean you have the orders of Gen. Carranza as First Chief?

Mr. LILL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You have no law with reference to the currency?

Mr. LILL. Well, he was the only authority at the time. I do not conceive of any law—

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the constitution of 1857 was in effect and so were all the laws of the Republic except as he set them aside by decree or order.

Mr. LILL. I do not see that the constitution of 1857 prohibited Mr. Carranza from issuing paper currency. If it did he did not observe it.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course he did not.

Mr. LILL. But this paper currency was issued by practically all the generals when they started the revolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; that is true.

Mr. LILL. After the revolution got going they tried to centralize that function and they issued an order or passed a law, whichever is the proper term, providing that all these issues were to be redeemed in one currency. Now, that was all brought to a head in the Vera Cruz currency. Then there was so much falsification of that currency they provided for the new currency which they called the infalsificables.

The CHAIRMAN. Noncounterfeitable money.

Mr. LILL. Noncounterfeitable money, which was printed by the American Bank Note Co. Now, there was some time given—there is a question whether sufficient time was given—after the issue of this new currency for the holders of the old currency to redeem their notes, but at any rate, according to the orders issued, all this old currency is out of existence.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; they repudiated everything except the non-counterfeitable money with the exception of Monclova paper 5,000,000 pesos, constitutionalist paper 25,000,000 pesos, paper of the provisional government 42,625,000 pesos.

Paper of the provisional government of Vera Cruz, 599,329,221 pesos, or a total of 671,954,221 pesos. Now, that is all they agreed to exchange or to take up with the noncounterfeitable money.

Mr. LILL. 600,000,000?

The CHAIRMAN. 671,954,221 pesos.

Mr. LILL. I can not give you any—well, if that is all they agreed to redeem is there any more they said they would not?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; all this paper you have there, with the exception of one $10 bill and one $5 bill was repudiated. That was never taken up at all; never agreed to be taken up.

Mr. LILL. There is a very good reason, I should say, for that. If these generals, without authority—generals were operating in their own territory and issuing paper currency without authority, I do not see how any central authority could recognize that.

The CHAIRMAN. I am stating the facts. I am not arguing the question whether they could do it. And this Chao currency, the Sonora State currency, was issued when Mr. Carranza went over to Sonora and established his so-called government in that State of Sonora. And the Chao currency was issued by Manuel Chao, acting governor of the State of Chihuahua. This money you have here is the only money that was provided to be taken up, this State of Chihuahua money, this Sonora money, and this Manuel Chao currency.

Mr. LILL. The Chao currency to which you refer was issued by Francisco Villa.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. LILL. I hope it is not the opinion of this committee that the Carranza government should redeem Villa currency. I believe that the currency issued by Villa prior to his break with Carranza was recognized by Carranza, but no currency issued by Villa after that time was recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all right. We can establish that by actual proof.

Mr. LILL. In looking into the financial situation I had to go into this thing, and I have my working papers somewhere showing the actual amount of paper currency taken in and burned, and I can give you much information, if you desire it.

The CHAIRMAN. I think I have all that here. However, if I find I have not later I would be very glad to have you clear the matter up, because there are a great many thousands of Americans and other business men, as well as Mexicans, who would be very glad to know that there was ever any effort made to take up any of this currency.

I can say to you that all of this currency that I have handed you came to me through an American bank.

Mr. LILL. Well, there was a lot of that currency which was not redeemed which was not presented by the people because when the decree came out authorizing the issuance, or the giving out of new money for the old money, lots of people did not think the new money was any better than the old and did not take advantage of it.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not think that applied to American bankers and Mexican bankers over the Republic, do you?

Mr. LILL. I should not be surprised if it applied to all of them.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a fortunate thing if that is true.

Mr. LILL. But, Senator, American bankers probably did not hold this money at the time those decrees were issued.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; they did. I showed you the memorandum, this memorandum made by the bank: "Carranza first issue redeemable by provisionals." This was given me by the bank in Nogales, not 50 yards from the house of Pani, the ambassador. This, Carranza issued at Vera Cruz, the legal tender; was the part they did not turn in, and that is all they could turn in.

Mr. LILL. The only question in my mind is did the banks hold this over the period stated by the decree or did these bills come into the bank from their depositors after the period for their redemption had expired?

The CHAIRMAN. I will ask you where you got your information, Mr. Lill, with reference to the redemption of this currency?

Mr. LILL. As I stated, I went into the redemption department of the Treasury and I made an investigation to determine the liability of the Mexican Government for issued currency.

The CHAIRMAN. Understand me, I have no doubt in the world—I understand you are a responsible accountant and I have no doubt in the world you reached an honest conclusion, but your conclusions are limited by the information you had. I am simply asking for my information, what information you had, and where you got it?

Mr. LILL. The more questions of that kind you ask the better I will be pleased, Senator.

I first tried to set out a balance sheet of the Mexican Government, and in order to do that I had to know the assets and liabilities. One thing that struck me first was currency and it took considerable time to get the information, and I based my judgment upon the record of decrees showing when these different currencies were redeemable and when they became void, but I haven't got my papers here, but it is my recollection they were all taken up into that Vera Cruz issue which was later converted into the infalsificables. I think, as near as I can find out, there was about 750,000,000 pesos of that currency issued.

A very large part of that has been redeemed, and has been burned.

The CHAIRMAN. I have the exact amount here which has been burned.

Mr. LILL. You mean burned by the Government?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. LILL. I think it is estimated by the Government that President Carranza in his message mentioned 850,000,000 pesos, but it is my judgment there were not more than 800,000,000 out at June 30, 1917. Since that time the Government has been redeeming that currency by requiring a payment of part taxes in paper currency. This currency is being redeemed at the rate of about 60,000,000 pesos a year. It was only worth 20 centavos, or 10 cents American.

The CHAIRMAN. There were 41,868,778 exchanged for gold at 10 per cent; 4,040,956 exchanged directly in infalsificables at 10 per cent; 65,985,174 lost by the public; 560,064,818 immediately exchanged, or a total of 671,954,921 infalsificables. This memorandum from which I am reading is, to my mind, from perfectly satisfactory sources and, I think, corresponds fairly closely—

Mr. LILL. I do not know where your source is, Senator. I can only give you my source.

The CHAIRMAN. We are not very far apart. But what I was asking, Mr. Lill, was simply as to the source of your information, which is, I understand, from the Carranza decrees in reference to the different currencies.

Mr. LILL. You might say the daily cash transactions of the Mexican treasury covering over a period of a year or two. I do not think there are over 150,000,000 outstanding now.

The CHAIRMAN. No; I doubt whether there is that much.

Mr. LILL. Nobody knows.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all the pesos they agreed to redeem?

Mr. LILL. There is any quantity of the other that, as I understand, they have agreed to redeem up to a certain time, and upon failure to present them were declared void.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; there is no question about the correctness of your information except that mine goes a little bit further. There were various of these generals who at one time or another were with Carranza and then would quit him and then again would go back with him, and whenever one of them quit him it was customary to declare that the money was not any good that was outstanding. Those who finally were with him at the time you mention—for instance, at that particular time there was Gen. Villarreal and others. Villarreal was his governor of the State of Coahuila, but the Villarreal money was not Monclova money.

Mr. LILL. It was not redeemed.

The CHAIRMAN. No; neither was the original Bank of Torreon money ever redeemed, nor the Bank of Sonora, although it was taken and used; also the Banco Minero in Chihuahua.

Mr. LILL. You mean the bank notes?

The CHAIRMAN. Taken and used and made legal tender, and then repudiated. The banks have been trying to get it secured. That is the reason I was asking you for the sources of your information, because if you had investigated outside—of course, however, it was not your business to do so—

Mr. LILL. I did, Senator. I was in constant conference with Muirhead, of the Canadian Bank, and others. I discussed this thing with them quite often.

The CHAIRMAN. Those were the City of Mexico banks?

Mr. LILL. I know the business of some of those banks outside.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what the banking system of Mexico was, Mr. Lill, prior to the revolution?

Mr. LILL. The banking system?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. LILL. I think I have an idea; yes, sir; I think I know it.

The CHAIRMAN. All the banks, the State banks, throughout the entire Republic, or practically all of them, had a form, a combination, you might call it, working through the Banco Central, and the other issues were handled in that way through that bank.

Mr. LILL. By whom?

The CHAIRMAN. By the Banco Central, backed by the Mexican Government.

Mr. LILL. A kind of cooperative effort?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir. For instance, at one time just shortly prior to the revolution, the henequen crop was saved by the Bank of Yucatan coming to their assistance. That scheme was ruled out by Limantour and Enrique Creel, and prior to that time these bank notes did not circulate in any other State. The Bank of Sonora notes were not good in the State of Chihuahua. The Banco Minero did not; and both of those banks were as strong as any bank, almost, that we have in the United States, banks of five to ten million dollars capital. Still their notes did not circulate outside of the particular State until the formation of this banking system under the Banco Central, City of Mexico. The Bank of London, in Mexico City, and other banks in the City of Mexico, were not, except as they might handle business and capital with the other banks, members of this particular banking system, which extended into every State of the Republic.

Mr. LILL. They did not have to be, Senator, because notes of the Bank of London and of the national bank were accepted in all parts of the Republic under their charter. These other banks did not have this privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand that, but the Bank of Sonora notes and the Banco Minero in Chihuahua and in Hermosillo were accepted, or any of their branch bank notes were accepted, on the Bank of London. The practice was, as to their own notes, that if there was a discount it was only that necessary to cover transmission.

Mr. LILL. You are familiar, of course, with the increase in the authority to issue bank notes?

The CHAIRMAN. Since when do you mean?

Mr. LILL. From Huerta's time.

The CHAIRMAN. I will admit that I paid very little attention to presidential decrees as affecting banks or Government finances.

Mr. LILL. The national banks were allowed to issue two for one, I believe—2 pesos for every dollar of deposits and capital. I am speaking from recollection now. I would have to verify that from my report.

The CHAIRMAN. When did Mexico go on a gold basis?

Mr. LILL. Well, I should say it went on a gold basis in 1905, with the reorganization of the currency, although Kemmerer takes some exception to that, due to some provision in the law. I think it is purely technical.

The CHAIRMAN. The effort of the Carranza government has been not to put Mexico on a gold basis, but to actually take up this outstanding currency on some immediate basis and to provide then a metallic reserve for the protection of outstanding currency.

Mr. LILL. When we got there, Senator, there was no paper currency in circulation. All this currency that you speak of was hoarded and there was no market for it, and it was not passing. To protect that outstanding currency depended entirely upon the ability of Mexico to secure funds for it. Our part there was to provide Mexico with a new currency system, and we suggested a paper currency with an adequate gold reserve to be maintained, which could not be adopted, because Mexico could not get the gold or could not put the gold aside to provide the reserve.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did the effort continue to convert the paper into metallic money while you were there?

Mr. LILL. I do not believe there was any effort made to do that, Senator. The paper currency practically disappeared in November, 1916, and they started on a metallic basis. I do not know of any currency being redeemed from that time on.

The CHAIRMAN. From 1916?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How are these infalsificables redeemed?

Mr. LILL. They are redeemed in this way: Every dollar of taxation by certain prescribed taxes require 1 peso of infalsificable currency in addition, a surtax.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the rate of exchange under Circular 185?

Mr. LILL. I do not recollect that particular circular, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. I have it here; 32 infalsificables for 1 peso of gold.

Mr. LILL. Thirty-two pesos, you mean?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir. And then under Circular 142, 150 infalsificables to each peso gold in payment of taxes and wages.

That was followed by another decree of March 29, 1917, with reference to infalsificables; do you know what the effect of that decree was?

Mr. LILL. What was that decree? Have you got that decree here?

The CHAIRMAN. No; I have not.

Mr. LILL. I think probably that decree was issued merely for the purpose of providing a basis for exchange operations with the banks as to debts expressed in the old currency. I am not sure, though.

The CHAIRMAN. No; it was to the effect—I have not the decree here—of placing an additional tax of 1 peso infalsificable for each peso gold on import duties so as to get in the infalsificables. Where there was a peso gold import duty, then they adopted a decree that you had to pay an additional peso of infalsificable so as to get the infalsificables in. That was also on the production of petroleum.

Mr. LILL. Internal taxation, too, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. You spoke of the administration's collection of customs and your getting constant notices as to the collections, etc. Did you get reports from the ports of Nogales and Agua Prieta?

Mr. LILL. It is my recollection that we did. That situation was handled by Roberto Pesquera, who was agent for the Mexican Government on the American side, and as I understood it he collected the money from that section of the field deposited in American banks and transmitted it down in another way. It is my recollection, sir, that we had telegraphic reports from every office in the Mexican Republic.

The CHAIRMAN. I was wondering how closely you checked up the reports with actual receipts.

Mr. LILL. You mean by that, making a field audit?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; or making any other kind of an audit. When you got reports of collections for a certain month, did you check that report up with the actual receipts which were forwarded to the City of Mexico?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir; they were all checked up in the audit section.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have anything to do with that?

Mr. LILL. We organized it.

The CHAIRMAN. I mean, personally. Did you check it with the telegraphic reports as to the receipts?

Mr. LILL. With the telegraphic reports?

The CHAIRMAN. Well, any report.

Mr. LILL. The telegraphic report was merely for information to allow the Executive to administer the affairs of the country. We had every officer render a monthly report with all supporting vouchers, which received quite a thorough audit in the central office.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you pass among those vouchers the amounts retained by the military authorities of the State, for instance, of Sonora, for military expenses? How was that accounted for?

Mr. LILL. At one time I believe you referred to the extraordinary expenses each general was provided with at a certain time. Those were passed upon along about May or June, or possibly after that, when Mr. Carranza got after that and practically cut that thing out. I know we cut out those extraordinary expenses of that character in Vera Cruz from eight hundred thousand a month, or something like that, to five or six thousand. That was a very great evil.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; it was a very great evil; but the question is, Did you find it was a necessary evil or one that could be remedied?

Mr. LILL. It apparently has been remedied by the President now, Senator, by cutting it out; reducing it.

The CHAIRMAN. You are speaking of Vera Cruz, but I was inquiring as to the Northern States with which I happen to be more directly personally familiar than I have been for years with the Southern States. Take Cantu, for instance. How much money did Cantu ever turn over to the Carranza Government?

Mr. LILL. Where was he governor? He was governor, was he not—

The CHAIRMAN. Governor of Lower California, and is now.

Mr. LILL. I do not know whether he ever turned any money over. My recollection is that the receipts of Lower California were hardly sufficient to pay expenses.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not remember about the State of Sonora? That is one of the largest States.

Mr. LILL. We do not get any report from the States. We merely get reports of the Federal officers. The State is just as separate from the Government as our States here are.

The CHAIRMAN. I know that, Mr. Lill. I have been fairly familiar with the Mexican Government and State governments—I was going to say as familiar, almost, as I am with the United States. But I am speaking of the customhouses in the States. I imagine the customhouses on the border of the United States, Nogales and Agua Prieta, opposite Douglas, are the two large customhouses in Arizona, and I happen to know something about how they are run and how the expense is being paid, and I was inquiring of you if you had checked up as to the amount of the customs actually collected and the amount which the National Government got out of it.

Mr. LILL. I do not do that personally, and I do not know. I presume that was done in the auditing office. That would be covered by the audit. But if there was any discrepancy, and I believe there were a great many discrepancies, it would not be, as far as I could determine, in the account itself or in the form of transaction; that is, if a man was going to embezzle any money he would not render any account current to the Government or put in false vouchers. It was all worked in another way—by personal payments to officials for allowing stuff to go through without the proper vouchers.

The CHAIRMAN. I did not mean for a moment that there was any embezzlement on the part of the governor of Sonora, for example. There are certain State revenues to support the State government, and the national revenues are not supposed to go to the support of the State governments. I was wanting to know to whom the national revenues went, of the State of Sonora, collected through the customs house, or the 20 per cent on land tax and supertax, on other States taxes, placed by the Federal Government, including, for instance, a mining tax, which is altogether a national tax.

Mr. LILL. I can not answer that definitely, because all those taxes are collected. They come in and are reported to the central treasury. Two million pesos may be ordered remitted to Mexico City and a million pesos might have been remitted to some other place, or two million disbursed among various objects. It is almost impossible to tell that.

The CHAIRMAN. Why did you come to the conclusion that Mexico can only afford a debt of 550,000,000 pesos when, under a debt of 425,000,000 pesos, Diaz left 78,000,000 pesos in the treasury and had the country on a par basis in so far as its securities were concerned?

Mr. LILL. That 78,000,000 pesos, of course, Senator, was not the savings of any one year. That was the accumulation of probably eight years, seven or eight years, as I recall. The reason why I said that is that in Diaz's time the national budget included the Federal districts—about 16,000,000 pesos, I think—and the expenses of the various Territories and a number of other things. The new budget does not include those. The laws now provide that the Federal District and the Territories shall be self-supporting, so that in any comparison of the two budgets you have either got to eliminate the Federal District from the Diaz budget or add a corresponding amount to the Carranza budget and eliminate the Federal Districts in those expenses, which would average about 90,000,000 pesos a year, of which practically 25,000,000 pesos were for payment of the debt. That would leave 65,000,000 pesos, approximately, for the current operations of the Government exclusive of the debt.

Prices have risen in Mexico, like everywhere else. Salaries should have risen. You can not run a Government to-day for the same amount that you ran it in 1910. You have got to have pretty close to double that amount to run Mexico to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon what do you found that statement, Mr. Lill?

Mr. LILL. Partly from the cost of living, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How are you basing that—on the cost of living in Mexico, in Mexico City, or the cost of living in the Republic of Mexico generally, among the great mass of the people, or are you basing that upon the comparative cost of living in the United States?

Mr. LILL. No; from the cost of living in Mexico, from what I get from employees.

The CHAIRMAN. In the Republic of Mexico?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What means did you take to ascertain those figures?

Mr. LILL. For instance, it frequently happened that in certain territories application would be made for an allowance to cover an increased cost, and in quite a number of States or districts we had to make employees an additional allowance over their pay to offset the increased cost of living. They can not live on their pay. Mexico to-day is a much dearer place to live than the United States, and the salaries have not gone up. I think it is perfectly safe to say that the increased cost of everything will increase the cost of operation of Mexico. In addition to that Mexico never did do what she should have done in the way of education. So that her educational program, in addition to the increased cost of government—I do not see how she can possibly get it under one hundred to a hundred and ten million pesos for current operations—

The CHAIRMAN. Right there, what do you mean by her educational program? You mean some report that has been made to the Carranza government with reference to an educational program or do you mean some decree or some act of Congress?

Mr. LILL. No, sir; I merely referred to the evident fact that Mexico had not done very much educational work and that she should undertake a broad educational program as one of the functions of government.

The CHAIRMAN. Either under the Diaz administration or under this administration what has been the educational program in Mexico?

Mr. LILL. I can not give you much information on that. It is a matter I know very little about.

The CHAIRMAN. You know what the educational program of this country is. The National Government does not support public schools, does it?

Mr. LILL. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Does it in Mexico?

Mr. LILL. I think it is beginning to to a certain extent, and where the educational facilities are in the States some action must be taken. It seems to me.

The CHAIRMAN. I am only asking you as to whether—

Mr. LILL. I do not know very much about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The budget for 1918 was 21,000,000 pesos, was it not?

Mr. LILL. That is, by the Federal Government, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. LILL. No, sir; I think that the educational department of the Government is what they call the department of university. They had 2,270,000.

The CHAIRMAN. What was it in 1917?

Mr. LILL. I have not the budget. It was about the same. I do not know, because the first budget after the revolution was prepared in July, 1917, but was about the same, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. You are positive there is no educational budget further than that university budget there?

Mr. LILL. None outside of the payments which might have been made by the central government to the federal district for schools for some of the States to support school work.

The CHAIRMAN. That is exactly what I am talking about. I was asking you about the educational system of Mexico; and under the educational system of Mexico the National Government did provide for the schools in the federal districts and in the territories and left the States to provide for their own schools?

Mr. LILL. Not this year, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. You may have cut that out. I am speaking of what the practice has been.

Mr. LILL. Yes; you are correct. The practice prior to the constitution of 1917 was that the Federal Government paid for educational purposes in the federal districts and territories. After that it did not.

The CHAIRMAN. Has there been a law passed to carry out the provisions of the constitution of 1917?

Mr. LILL. I do not believe so, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What does this recent strike of the school-teachers in the federal districts mean—do you know?

Mr. LILL. They had a number of strikes down there. The strikes were generally due to the fact that the employees could not get the salaries. The federal district was made autonomous by this constitution and was supposed to get its own revenues. They provided quite an elaborate structure of government, which was entirely too expensive and they did not have much left for the teachers. It frequently happened there, even as to my own employees, that they had had to wait. I have waited myself—not being different from my employees. The teachers would have to go along for two or three or four months without possibly any salary at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were they supposed to get their salaries?

Mr. LILL. From the Federal district.

The CHAIRMAN. What character of government did they have in the Federal district?

Mr. LILL. A commission form, I think—three commissioners.

The CHAIRMAN. And they were supposed to raise their own revenue by their own taxation and support themselves, including their schools?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir. A bill has recently been introduced in the Congress putting it back under the Federal Government, but it has aroused a good deal of opposition in the Congress.

Might I get back to that maximum debt, Senator?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; go ahead.

Mr. LILL. I am only speaking now of the maximum debt which could be assumed by Mexico at the present time. It is reasonable to suppose that in 10 years the Mexican revenues will increase if she adopts a broad policy of immigration and increases her population from 15,000,000 to 30,000,000 in the next 10 years. The chances are that her revenues will be amply sufficient to take care of any liability which she may have; but for the present reconstruction of Mexico or the present reorganization, she can not possibly pay over twenty-five to thirty million pesos a year right now. Future payment depends to a certain extent upon rehabilitating her banks, getting money, restoring her railways and probably establishing a new Federal bank which she wishes to do.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether Mexico has anything to show for her 425,000,000 pesos indebtedness in the way of national improvements of property?

Mr. LILL. I worked that out, Senator, in this report, and I asked at the time I should be notified that I be given sufficient time to get my papers, and I did not have time enough.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like very much to have that.

Mr. LILL. I worked that out, and I think the railways got over 200,000,000 pesos. There is only about 80,000,000 pesos out of that total of 400,000,000 pesos which appears to have been spent in current expense of operation. The majority of it was spent for public works.

The CHAIRMAN. When you went down there with this commission to work out your budget system, to advise the Government generally and to perform the services which you have been performing, what was the idea? You are an American. I will ask you who composed the commission with whom you went down there?

Mr. LILL. We were asked to go down there individually first, by Mr. Cabrera and Mr. Pani. After we got down there on our suggestion they organized a commission. I was very curious to know, and I found that in Mr. Pani's department he had heard of President Taft's economy commission and had sent up and got reports from that commission and he tried the same thing down in Mexico. In fact, he had taken some of these Taft reports and had worked out reformatations along the line of standardization of files and correspondence, himself. But so far as I can find, the idea was not new.

The CHAIRMAN. Who composed this commission?

Mr. LILL. Luis Cabrera, who was then the secretary of the treasury; Rafael Nieto, assistant secretary of the treasury; Alberto J. Pani, secretary of commerce, labor, and industry, who is now ambassador to France; Manuel Rodriguez Gutierrez, secretary of public works; Mr. Bruere, and myself. The names are on that folder.

The CHAIRMAN. I noticed Mr. Cabrera's name as a member of the commission, but I did not notice yours.

Mr. LILL. What folder is that? At that time I was not a member, but I was afterwards. I was alternate for Mr. Bruere. Whoever happened to be on the job acted as a member, but it was not advisable to make the Americans too prominent in that connection. I have not stated I was a member. I said I was an accountant and acting director.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Bruere is a member. Luis Cabrera, Alberto J. Pani, Rafael Nieto, Manuel Rodriguez Gutierrez, Henry Bruere, and Alberto Hajar y Haro was secretary.

What did you have in mind? Was there any thought of attempting to assist Mexico in funding her debt or in financing Mexico in any way when this commission was formed through loans or advances from the outside?

Mr. LILL. No, sir; not the slightest. It was not until along about eight months afterwards that we talked it over and decided, or came to the conclusion, that effective financial assistance was the basis for any real reorganization of Mexico. But at that time we had no such idea.

The CHAIRMAN. At the time you did come to such a conclusion, what efforts, if any, did the commission make to carry out the plan?

Mr. LILL. The commission made none at all.

The CHAIRMAN. What efforts were made by the Mexican Government, acting upon the advice of the commission, if any?

Mr. LILL. The commission was allowed to disband in June, 1918. No effort had been made up to that time—that is, concerted effort—to secure any funds. After that time I went down to Mexico again in October, and I discussed the matter with President Carranza, and as a result of that he sent his secretary of finance, then Mr. Nieto, up for a conference with the bankers.

The CHAIRMAN. What bankers?

Mr. LILL. The International Bankers Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. In New York?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir; of which J. P. Morgan is chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Were the negotiations with Mr. Nieto successful?

Mr. LILL. I would rather not make any statements about the negotiations. They may be a confidential matter, sir. I do not think he obtained any funds, and, personally, I do not think his mission was by any means a failure.

The CHAIRMAN. The basis upon which this proposition or suggestion or attempt to finance Mexico was made was founded on the figures you have given us here, that Mexico would be able to maintain an indebtedness of 550,000,000 pesos?

Mr. LILL. The basis of the negotiations was given by Mr. Nieto.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that formed upon your report?

Mr. LILL. I have no idea. I am not sure that the basis which he outlined is the basis which I have discussed. I am not seeking to give you any information as to anything of that kind. I am trying to give you my conclusions after my study of the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. In arriving at your conclusions as to the amount of indebtedness which Mexico could assume and discharge—that is, 550,000,000 pesos—were those figures based on a peace status or on a war status?

Mr. LILL. That is a conclusion based upon a peace status.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you provide for a military budget in that 550,000,000 pesos?

Mr. LILL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the amount of it?

Mr. LILL. I think about 60,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Per annum?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How many men did you figure that would support in the army?

Mr. LILL. I did not figure that out. I did not try to form any conclusions along that line. I merely took the amount of money and tried to arrive at some conclusion as to what they would require after peace was established.

The CHAIRMAN. You must have had information from some one who did assume to know, before you could arrive at any conclusion as to the amount necessary in a military budget. You must have had some information—or did you just do that arbitrarily and set aside 60,000,000 pesos?

Mr. LILL. You might describe my first effort as arbitrary, but after that I will not say it is mine. I am giving you the information which is what I understood to be the general feeling among such officers as I discussed it with after going into the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the Diaz budget?

Mr. LILL. For the army? I do not believe I have it here. It is in the report that I did not bring with me this morning. The proportion is a great deal smaller. But at that time I understand the States maintained the rurales and never had maintained a military establishment. At the present time that entire establishment, if I am not mistaken, has been taken over by the Federal Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The rurales were a national force. The States maintained State troops, the State police and the gendarmes.

Mr. LILL. The States paid the rurales, did they not? The States contributed to the Federal treasury, I believe, enough to pay for their rural forces?

The CHAIRMAN. No; except in the form that they contributed to the Federal treasury in other matters, by a superimposed tax on the State land tax, and matters of that kind. The rurales were a Federal police force. The States had a national guard that corresponds to our national guard here, and the national army was entirely distinct.

I wish you would get that report for the committee. This matter, of course, is somewhat interesting, and this committee can only meet rather irregularly at this time on account of the exigencies in the Senate. It will be necessary for me now to call a halt in the present hearing. I will not arrange for a hearing to-morrow definitely. We will take an adjournment now subject to the call of the Chair.

If you can conveniently get that report and have it over here some day this week, and let us know when you are here, I would like to have it; and I would like to make some further inquiries of you along the line that you have already testified.

Mr. LILL. Very well, sir. I think I can get that report without much trouble.

The CHAIRMAN. We will give you all the time you need to get up anything that you wish.

In addition to the reports which you have furnished, if you have any others which are typewritten, copies of which you can furnish the committee, we will be very glad to have them.

Mr. LILL. I wish I could, Senator, but it seems to me that the only reports which I am at liberty to give are those that I have in print. They are public property.

The CHAIRMAN. That is up to you, of course. I will not be insistent upon it. The subject which we are discussing is one of very material interest to all of us who are interested at all in Mexico.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1916.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met pursuant to the call of the chairman at 10.30 o'clock a. m., in room 128 Senate Office Building, Senator Albert B. Fall presiding.

Present: Senators Fall (chairman) and Brandegee.

Present also: Maj. Dan M. Jackson.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

TESTIMONY OF THOMAS RUSSELL LILL—Resumed.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Lill, when the committee adjourned the last time and you were on the stand, you stated that you had certain reports and data in your office in New York which you would obtain and bring here when you continued your evidence. Have you those reports to which you had reference at that time, with you now?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, sir; we will be glad to hear from you. Just go ahead this morning.

Mr. LILL. Your last question, Mr. Senator, was as to whether I had any information regarding what was done with these loans in Mexico; what productive works had been gotten out of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I believe that was it. That was the Diaz loan, outstanding bonded indebtedness.

Mr. LILL. Well, I will just read this paragraph.

Data is not available to show the disposition of the proceeds of the various Government loans. Fernando Gonzalez Roa in his book El Problema Ferrocarrilero published in 1915, states that up to June 30, 1902, the Government had paid out in subsidies to railroads the amount of pesos 144,891,748.92. As the 4 per cent loan of 1904 amounting to pesos 80,000,000 was issued after the date referred to by him and was issued for the payment of notes given as subsidies to railroads and for public works, it is probable that this amount should be added to the total stated by Roa. It is reasonably certain that the 8 per cent loan of 1885 was used to consolidate the floating debt.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, those two last loans, 174,000,000 and 80,000,000 would be 255,000,000 pesos or approximately $80,000,000. That was, you say, for railroad subsidies?

Mr. LILL. Yes. [Reading.]

It is reasonably certain that the 8 per cent loan of 1885 was used to consolidate the floating debt. What portion of the 5 per cent interior loan of 1894 was used to pay floating indebtedness and what portion was used for public works is not known.

From these various statements we may arrive at an approximation as to the disposition of the larger part of the bonds issued, as follows: That is up to the time of the Diaz—up to 1910:

For consolidation of the floating debt.....	$54,930,093.82
Debts assumed by the Government.....	33,688,000.00
For the construction of railways.....	244,891,743.82
And the balance, which I was not able to segregate.....	89,900,000.00

Making a total of about..... 422,678,825.00

I carried that on to the next step to see what effect these large expenditures had upon national revenues——

The CHAIRMAN. Before you get to that, let us see for a moment. You say the accurate data was not to be obtained there, and the statements you have just made are from some book. Why were not the accurate data to be obtained?

Mr. LILL. I beg pardon?

The CHAIRMAN. Why was not the accurate data with reference to this indebtedness or the expenditures obtainable?

Mr. LILL. Well, the accounts are very poorly kept from 1885 up, and it was not until probably the last two or three years of Limantour's régime they began keeping better accounts.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have your attention drawn to the national improvements in the way of drainage of the Valley of Mexico?

Mr. LILL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know how much that cost?

Mr. LILL. I do not know; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know who did the work?

Mr. LILL. I think Pearson did the work. I am quite sure he did.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you speak of railroad subventions amounting to approximately $24,000,000. Did that include the Yucatan Railroad?

Mr. LILL. No; that did not include that. That was paid—well, it included the Yucatan Railway, but it was not in the form of subsidies. The bond issue was issued direct to the contractor for the construction of the road. When I speak of subsidies, they followed our American plan of giving the contractor so much a mile.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, they did with some roads?

Mr. LILL. Yes; some roads.

The CHAIRMAN. Others they did not?

Mr. LILL. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about the public buildings in Mexico, such as the uncompleted National Theater in the city of Mexico?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir; I believe that stands about 14,000,000 pesos at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that covered into this indebtedness? That is, was it included in the bonded indebtedness?

Mr. LILL. I can not answer that definitely, because, as I recollect the budgets, they paid that out of their current revenues, or incurred floating liabilities and then issued bonds later to take up the floating debt, and that floating debt usually included quite a number of things.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, you found the data with reference to it in the records so that you could understand it?

Mr. LILL. Well, I made no notation of it. It is in the budget.

The CHAIRMAN. What about the street paving in Mexico City and other cities of Mexico? Do you know anything about that?

Mr. LILL. That is not in the federal Government accounts at all. That was paid by the federal district of Mexico City and other cities.

The CHAIRMAN. It constituted public improvements, however. Was it included in the internal bonded indebtedness?

Mr. LILL. I do not know, sir; there is quite a large debt there of the federal district which is included in the foreign debt.

The CHAIRMAN. You spoke the other day of some of the internal indebtedness having undoubtedly been covered into the external indebtedness, external or foreign bonds, and I was wanting to know whether the records show the conversion of any part of this, and, if so, what it was for and why it should be converted into what they call foreign bonds.

Mr. LILL. I would not say the debt was converted from an interior debt to a foreign debt except as the floating indebtedness existing was paid off by the proceeds of bond issues secured wherever they could get it. That federal district bond issue certainly was placed in England.

The CHAIRMAN. You say that the records for the last two or three years prior to the Diaz resignation were not well kept, the financial records. Do you know whether or not they had expert accountants there prior to that time? Do you know who made the arrangements for the funding of the debts in 1884 and 1889 and 1894?

Mr. LILL. I think Mr. Limantour did that—not in 1884. He was not there then. But he completed the largest financial transaction there, the refunding of the consolidation of the debt into that loan of 1899 and the refunding of that, or half of it, in 1910.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, Mr. Limantour also completed the negotiations for placing Mexico on a gold basis, did he not?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir; he did that. That was in 1905.

The CHAIRMAN. Was not Mr. Limantour recognized generally all over the world as an exceedingly able financier?

Mr. LILL. I think he is, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That was his reputation in France and Russia and all over the world, was it not?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir; and I was up to see Gov. Gen. Forbes just a short time ago and he knew Limantour very well and he expressed that same opinion. I would like to add, though, sir, that I do not think Mr. Limantour is a more able man than Mr. Cabrera.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I am glad to have your opinion. Mr. Limantour was in close association, at least in the matter of advice and consultation, with the principal American financiers, was he not, while he was secretary of hacienda?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir; but there is a very interesting chapter in there which covers Mr. Limantour's negotiations. He came up to New York on his way to Europe for the purpose of beginning negotiations for the refunding of that loan—of the 1899 loan. He was met there by the representatives of all the large banking houses in the United States, who made propositions to him for the refunding of the debt. In Mr. Limantour's report he states that he could only take these matters under consideration, because it would be foolish to consolidate the Mexican debt in the United States or to exchange European creditors who were thoroughly familiar with Mexican conditions for new creditors who were not. And he pointed out that we frequently had very great fluctuations in currency and the exchange rate varied a great deal. Due to all these considerations he placed the loan in Europe.

The CHAIRMAN. When did Mexico go on a gold basis—in 1905?

Mr. LILL. In 1905.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know who Mr. Limantour's assistants were at that time, or who was his principal assistant on that mission for placing Mexico on a gold basis?

Mr. LILL. I am sorry I can not give you the names now. I have it in a report but I did not bring it down with me. I think it was three Mexicans.

The CHAIRMAN. I asked you the other day if you knew anything about the formation and the plan of the formation of the Banco Central in Mexico. Do you know whether or not any Americans were interested in that or assisted in it?

Mr. LILL. I do not know, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any more information now with reference to the plan on which the Banco Central operated than you had when you were here before?

Mr. LILL. I have not had time to look it up. I made a report on the banking situation—wrote it—it is not completed, by no means a complete study, but the Banco Central was substantially as you had outlined it.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, sir, go ahead with your statement.

Mr. LILL. Well, it seems that the papers the other day, Mr. Senator, stated that the Mexican debt was approximately $1,000,000,000. Mr. Cabrera sent me a cable in which he took exception to that and said that the latest information was contained in the President's last address to Congress in which he expressed the opinion that the Mexican debt would probably be in the neighborhood of 1,000,000,000 pesos, which would mean $500,000,000. That, I think, fully covers the debt from my investigations also. But there is a big difference between $500,000,000 and $1,000,000,000.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Does that include all unpaid interest?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir; includes damages—claims for damages.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Who estimates those?

Mr. LILL. I presume the president estimated it in his last message.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Carranza?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir; I do not know what the claims amount to which have been presented, but I doubt whether they will go over $25,000,000.

Senator BRANDEGEE. What claims?

Mr. LILL. Claims of foreign residents.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Against Mexico?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. That is estimated by Carranza?

Mr. LILL. He did not estimate that. I am simply going on claims presented on past revolutions. They never have gone up as high as that.

The CHAIRMAN. $25,000,000, did you say?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Not pesos?

Mr. LILL. Dollars.

Senator BRANDEGEE. By prior revolutions do you include all those that took place since 1910?

Mr. LILL. No; I mean back from about 1855.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Up to what time?

Mr. LILL. Up to 1910. That would cover—the largest consolidation would be about between 1884 and 1890 under Diaz when he settled all the claims of foreigners against his government.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Do you know whether Carranza made any estimate of claims for damages of any kind against Mexico since 1910?

Mr. LILL. No, sir; I do not believe he has. They organized a commission down there, a claims commission, to which all people having claims against the government could present their claims. This was purely a national commission and the claims of foreigners have not been presented to that commission, as I understand it.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Well, do you know whether it was the intention of those who appointed the commission that it should only have jurisdiction of domestic claims, Mexican domestic claims, against their own government?

Mr. LILL. No, sir; it was the intention to take jurisdiction of claims from everybody.

Senator BRANDEGEE. And you do not think any foreigners have handed in their claims against Mexico to that commission?

Mr. LILL. With very few exceptions they have filed their claims with the State departments of their respective governments.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Do you know what amounts of claims against Mexico have been filed with any other government?

Mr. LILL. I do not.

Senator BRANDEGEE. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mean to say that there were any outstanding claims of individuals or governments for damages in Mexico at the time Diaz went out?

Mr. LILL. When he came in, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. But when you were speaking of the $25,000,000 in claims here, what claims did you mean that Mr. Carranza might have taken into consideration?

Mr. LILL. The claims against the present Mexican Government for damages caused by the last revolution.

The CHAIRMAN. You answered Senator Brandegees and you have me mixed on the question. You say there have been no claims presented to, or considered by, this commission, claims arising under the revolution of 1910, and then you speak of the claims that originated under the Diaz administration. Now what do you mean by that statement? What is the amount of those claims? That has all been funded, has it not?

Mr. LILL. That has all been settled.

The CHAIRMAN. As a matter of fact, has there been a claim against the Mexican Government of any kind of which you have knowledge, for personal damages since 1884?

Mr. LILL. Since 1884?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir; a great many claims, and I think they were settled by an international arbitration commission, if I am not mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. At any rate, those claims now are all out of the way.

Mr. LILL. All out of the way.

The CHAIRMAN. They are represented in this funded indebtedness. Now, Senator Brandegee asked you, as I understand, if this estimate of approximately 1,000,000,000 pesos included claims for damages. I remind you now that we were talking about pesos the other day all the way through and not dollars.

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you estimated the debt at 671,000,000 pesos, and I called your attention to the fact that the estimate made by Mr. Carranza amounted to much more than that, and you ran it up yourself, as I recall it, to about 900,000,000 pesos, and now Mr. Cabrera tells you that, as pointed out by Mr. Carranza, it was approximately 1,000,000,000 pesos. None of us were talking about dollars at that time.

You were estimating what indebtedness Mexico could carry at 550,000,000 pesos, not dollars. So the same condition exists as you testified to before; that is, you said Mexico could assume and carry along an indebtedness of 550,000,000 pesos. You first estimated the indebtedness at 671,000,000 pesos, represented by bonds, etc., as the entire amount which you could give us here in detail, but upon having your attention called to Mr. Cabrera's statement and the President's statement which I have before me, we approximated it at something like 970,000,000 pesos. You claimed, however, in the 671,000,000 pesos that by virtue of the fact there was some irregularity in the placing of 190,000,000 pesos of indebtedness under the Madero and Huerta administrations—I believe you confined it to the Huerta administration—that a part of that might be repudiated or gotten rid of in some way, might not be a just debt, apparently your testimony tending to show that the actual amount of indebtedness which you found there, reducing it by whatever amount was found not to have been justly obtained or accounted for, would approximate the amount you claim Mexico can carry as a going concern, 550,000,000 pesos. Now, first, why should Mr. Cabrera wire you that the reports in the newspapers were wrong, as you say he has? Why should he do that?

Mr. LILL. I think the papers stated that the Mexican debt was approximately $1,000,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. But Mr. Cabrera attempts to make the distinction between the $1,000,000,000 and the 1,000,000,000 pesos that we had approximately arrived at here in your testimony.

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir. May I straighten up that $25,000,000 of claims?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I wish you would.

Mr. LILL. My statement of the debt which I prepared, as I would for any corporation, and which I think is correct, represents the principal of a debt and accrued interest up to December 31 of 1918, of 865,000,000 pesos. That includes the Huerta debt—the full amount of the Huerta debt, which probably will have to be arbitrated or investigated.

The difference between 865,000,000 and 1,000,000,000 is due to the interest, probably the interest on the debt from January 1 of this year to June 30 of this year, together with claims and various other things which is a pure guess on the part of the administration down there.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, why should it be a guess? You say that the accounts prior to two or three years before 1910 were irregularly kept and you seem to think that it was harder to get at the accounts back of 1910 than it has been for you to arrive at some conclusion since then. Have the accounts been better kept since 1910 than they were prior to 1907?

Mr. LILL. No; I said, Mr. Senator, that the accounts for the last two or three or four years of Limantour's administration were better kept than they had been before that time.

The CHAIRMAN. From 1910, from the end of Limantour's administration, up to the present time how have they been kept?

Mr. LILL. Well, with the Madero revolution the records were fairly well kept up to June 30, 1912, or possibly 1913. The organization was kept intact. From—

The CHAIRMAN. Right there. Did you find any account of the repayment to the Madero family of something approximating 700,000 pesos out of the treasury?

Mr. LILL. I did not investigate it, Mr. Senator. It was impossible.

The CHAIRMAN. Why was it impossible?

Mr. LILL. That was prior to the date you fixed, and you understand, sir, that I was not down there to investigate things of that nature.

The CHAIRMAN. I was talking about the way the accounts are kept now, and how could you arrive at it? How could you tell anything about it without investigating?

Mr. LILL. When I speak of the records—you asked me what was certain money spent for. Now, the record of what the money has been spent for is a very different proposition from the record of the amount of cash which was received or spent and the debt. Now, it is very often that you get a complete record of what a man owes or what a company owes with a corresponding lack of information of what that money was used for.

The CHAIRMAN. Undoubtedly; but I am trying to arrive at the condition of the accounts you investigated. You had accounts before you which were presented to you, and upon which you arrived at the judgment which you have expressed in your reports.

Mr. LILL. I used the annual reports of the Treasury—the annual budget from 1870 up.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. LILL. As the basis for a good deal of this work. Now, the record regarding the amount of the indebtedness up to, say, June 30, 1911, is complete. The information which I have given you regarding the Huerta debt does not exist on the Government books. I obtained that wholly from the banks.

The CHAIRMAN. What banks?

Mr. LILL. From the Banco Nacional.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was at the head of that bank? Who was managing the business in Mexico?

Mr. LILL. I can not recall his name now. I know him quite well. The CHAIRMAN. Did you get it prior to the taking over of the bank by the Carranza government or subsequently?

Mr. LILL. Subsequently.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, you got it from the books which you found there which were taken over by the Carranza officials?

Mr. LILL. No, sir; the bank had been taken over, you might say, in spirit, not physically, because the employees were all down there and the same organization was conducting the bank, although much reduced.

Now, information of that kind it was very difficult to get, because these gentlemen did not know whether the Government desired that information to be known.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, now, this Huerta debt of which you speak, that debt was regularly authorized by the Mexican Government, was it not?

Mr. LILL. That debt, I think, was authorized by the Madero congress.

The CHAIRMAN. At what date?

Mr. LILL. The first Huerta loan was 1918.

The CHAIRMAN. You are speaking of the loan. I am speaking of the authority for the loan. They can not issue bonds down there any more than they can here without some authority. Now, you say that was authorized by the congress. Do you mean the authority was given by the congress for the creation of the debt, or the first loan was obtained under the authority of congress?

Mr. LILL. Authorization was given by congress, as I understand it, for the debt.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what date that was?

Mr. LILL. No, sir; I do not know. I have such a large quantity of working papers that I could not bring them all down.

The CHAIRMAN. And that was the debt that was secured by the remaining percentage, approximately 86 per cent, of the import and export debt?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir; that debt was taken 5 per cent by the Banco Nacional, 45 per cent by the French bankers, 19 per cent by German, 19 per cent by English, and 11 per cent by J. P. Morgan and Kuhn-Loeb.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the date—

Mr. LILL. One minute, sir. That was $6,000,000 when that was taken out. That is the only portion of that loan which was sold for cash.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you trace the bonds at all?

Mr. LILL. Which bonds?

The CHAIRMAN. You say possibly some of this debt which totaled approximately 790,000,000 pesos, might not be a legal debt, and the balance of it might be a legal debt. Now you speak of $6,000,000 of it, which would be approximately $25,000,000—50,000,000 pesos—that this was the portion of it which was disposed of under this percentage system which you just read.

Mr. LILL. That was $6,000,000 which was sold to the bankers at about 90. It realized about 50,000,000 pesos, but 42,000,000 of that was used to clean up the debt of the Madero administration. That

I think there is no question about. Regarding the disposition of the other bonds—

The CHAIRMAN. Pardon me for a moment. That debt of the Madero administration was secured through a loan based upon those bonds as collateral for the loan prior to the placing of the bonds, was it not?

Mr. LILL. I think not. I think the loan was made in New York and was repaid out of the proceeds of this bond issue. I do not think the bonds were issued at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. LILL. Now, regarding the disposition of the balance of those bonds, I have a detailed statement from the manager of the Banco Nacional. You see the Banco Nacional handled the entire bond issue. The bond issue was turned over to them and they issued it upon orders of the government, and the disposition which I just gave to you—or perhaps I have not—I did not have it at that time. Six million pounds was sold abroad; there was £7,000,000 deposited with the national banks in Mexico as collateral for the Huerta loan; there is £1,361,000 that was deposited as a guarantee of the railway interest. I think that is held in New York. And £3,000,000 was given to John W. DeKay, who was the president of the Mexican National Packing Co.

Now, this 7,000,000 of bonds given to the national banks by Huerta—that was when the first attack was made upon the banks—they were required to hold those bonds as part of their cash reserve and to accept these bonds in payment of the loans of bank notes.

The CHAIRMAN. Where are those bonds?

Mr. LILL. The bonds are now held by the national banks of Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. LILL. That is the 7,000,000 pounds which they secured are now held by them, I think, without any diminishment.

Would you like to hear the second loan of 1914 of Mr. Huerta? That was authorized for 20,000,000 pesos, I think; 11,500,000 pesos of that was also deposited in New York for the guarantee of railway interest and 9,000,000 pesos was used to take up the Carbajal bonds.

The CHAIRMAN. Now get back to this $25,000,000 of claims for damages which you estimated in answer to the question of Senator Brandegee. Do you mean to say you suppose in the estimate of President Carranza of approximately 1,000,000,000 pesos as the debt of Mexico that he may have estimated approximately $25,000,000 of damage claims?

Mr. LILL. May I correct that, Senator? I have no information whatever as to what Mr. Carranza estimated. I can only say from Mr. Cabrera's telegram that this 1,000,000,000 pesos includes, I think, an estimate for damages. The $25,000,000 estimate which I gave was merely based upon the past history of Mexico. After every revolution there were claims presented.

The CHAIRMAN. There had not been a revolution in Mexico, though, up until 1910 from 1887, had there? We recognized Diaz in 1878. Diaz's revolution was in 1876. This Government recognized him after he, in accordance with our demands, restored peace and order and quiet along our border, and there has not been a revolution since that time.

Mr. LILL. No, sir; Diaz went out of office in 1880, did he not, and Gonzalez succeeded him?

Mr. LILL. Then he came back in 1884.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct. However, the entire era from 1877 or 1878, when this Government recognized Diaz, until 1910 is known as the "Diaz era," because, while Gonzalez was president for four years of that time, it was considered as part of the Diaz administration; that is, historians, and foreigners generally, in speaking of it speak of it as the Diaz administration.

Mr. LILL. There was a threat of revolution against Gonzalez at that time, which Diaz did not consent to.

The CHAIRMAN. No; he did not consent to it. That is the reason it is known as the Diaz administration.

Senator BRANDEGEE. What revolutions were there during the time these claims of which you speak originated, if there was no revolution during Diaz's administration for which any claims were handed in? When did these claims for damages originate?

Mr. LILL. Well, Mexico secured its independence in 1822 or 1828, I think. From that time on up to 1877 there was a revolution about once a year or once every two years and there were claims presented constantly during that period and were being settled.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Are those the claims for damages for which you say somebody has made a possible estimate of $25,000,000?

Mr. LILL. No, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. What revolutions—

Mr. LILL. The claims which may be made against the Mexican Government now for damages suffered during this last revolution.

Senator BRANDEGEE. What period of time do you think that covers?

Mr. LILL. That would take up from 1910 to date.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Who is it that has estimated that approximately $25,000,000?

Mr. LILL. I do.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Oh, it is your estimate?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Upon what is it based?

Mr. LILL. As I say, Senator, it is based on the previous history of the country. Every time there is a revolution they have to get together and settle the claims, and I think $25,000,000 is more—twice, in fact, over any previous amount ever presented.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Well, is it based at all upon damages or of what the damages consisted, or what the parties who sustained the damages are going to claim or prove?

Mr. LILL. It is to a certain extent. In discussing damages the Mexican Government is only liable for damages which—according to international law, damages suffered by residents of States from these bandit chiefs like Villa, Pelaez, Zapata, and Diaz, I do not think can come in as damages. I believe our own Supreme Court has ruled that where a business man goes into a foreign country to do business he does so in the expectation of larger returns on his capital. He takes the risk in going there of loss as well as the chance of larger gain. So that I do not think under international law Mexico is liable for damages caused by these various bandit chiefs. She is liable for damages on account of anything which has happened or has been caused by the present Mexican Government, and I will say the Diaz government—I mean the Madero government, and probably also the Huerta government, although Huerta was not recognized by the United States and there is a shadow of a claim there for eliminating damages caused by Huerta.

Now, when you eliminate those features of it the claims against the present Carranza Government will not be as large as people think they are. And I have discussed that with a great many business men down there, notably Conway, I think it is, who represents the bondholders of the Mexican National Railways. That is the company in Mexico which owns the power, the street railways—a very large concern having a capital of $60,000,000. I discussed that matter with him several times and he said he was disposed to take his losses if he could begin business and forget them. And that seems to be the sentiment of every other man in Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is that who wanted to take his losses and begin business again? Pardon me. I was diverted.

Mr. LILL. Mr. Conway.

The CHAIRMAN. Representing whom?

Mr. LILL. The Mexican Railways.

The CHAIRMAN. The Mexican Railways?

Mr. LILL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, who are the Mexican Railways?

Mr. LILL. That is that Canadian corporation. I think Miss Laut, who testified, said that it was a Pearson concern. That is the first I had heard of that. But they own the street railways of Mexico, the light and power companies and street railways in various other parts of the country. I think they are capitalized at about $60,000,000.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Did you attempt to make any list or inventory of claims, or to ascertain who were liable to file claims as a basis for this estimate?

Mr. LILL. No, sir; it is impossible to make any compilation of that kind.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Then what value do you think attaches to your estimate made upon that basis?

Mr. LILL. Well, I do not know that it is particularly up to me to define my value. I am giving you the best information I have and it is up to you to place your own value upon it.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Of course, it is up to me to attach what credibility I have a mind to to your testimony.

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. But you are saying the debt of Mexico as you estimate it is so much, and in order to know whether to consider that an accurate estimate I want the basis. One item of $25,000,000 you say is your estimate of claims that will be handed in. When I ask you upon what your estimate is based, you say it is based on your theory of international law, that all the damages done by the various bandit chiefs over a period of years are not legitimate claims against the Government of Mexico, and that other claimants you think will waive and not press their claims.

Mr. LILL. The basis for my judgment, however, as I stated, was the study of the claims presented against the Mexican Government since 1828.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Do you think that is a reliable estimate? I mean to say that your estimate of claims that will be presented against the Mexican Government by other governments and their nationals will be adjudicated in the same way that the past claims were or that they can be estimated by an analogy to the amounts of the past claims?

Mr. LILL. Well, I should say, Senator, that if you made a study of revolutions and the effect of revolutions, that after having seen a number of these settlements for claims you could make a pretty fair estimate of what was going to happen.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Well, you could make an estimate that you might think was fair, but do you think it would be a reliable estimate for anybody to base a financial operation on?

Mr. LILL. Oh, no; no, indeed, sir. I was speaking wholly of an estimate, and I would like to make that very clear. In dealing with the debt I am dealing with actual facts, but not in that matter; that is an estimate.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Your estimate is a fact. A guess may be a fact, although it is a guess. But what I want to know is the reliability of it.

Mr. LILL. Before any financial aid was extended to Mexico the first step toward that aid would be to determine what the amount of those claims were held by the various countries of the world. That is a preliminary step before any financial reorganization of Mexico can be attempted.

Senator BRANDEGEE. The reason I asked these questions at this point is because this committee is directed to ascertain the amount of damages, and that amount is supposed to be the amount in money that is going to be claimed. Have you taken any pains to ascertain what the claims of the nationals of the United States are liable to be against Mexico?

Mr. LILL. No, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. You did not consider that an element worthy to be taken into consideration in making your estimates?

Mr. LILL. You understand I was working about 14 hours a day for over a year, doing constructive work in Mexico. I was not particularly interested in that phase of the matter, because I know that Ambassador Fletcher has all that information.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Do you know whether he coincides with your estimate of the amount of American claims?

Mr. LILL. I have no knowledge, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Then you, yourself, do not claim any importance should be attached to that estimate of $25,000,000 of claims?

Mr. LILL. As a basis for—

Senator BRANDEGEE. As a basis for anything, except as a basis for a guess?

Mr. LILL. Except what I think the amount would come to. But I was somewhat interested in these negotiations with the bankers. I started them with Carranza. And certainly as a preliminary to any financial operation or action, the total amount of these claims should be known.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I should think they should be. I should think it would be quite important.

Mr. LILL. But our conversation developed upon what this excess of 180,000,000 estimated by Mr. Carranza might be, and I was giving you my thought on the matter.

Senator BRANDEGER. I know. One element of it was the estimate of claims.

Mr. LILL. Yes.

Senator BRANDEGER. Have you ever heard of any company in this country making any estimate of claim it was intending to present against the Mexican Government for damages sustained?

Mr. LILL. No, sir. I do not recall of any. I know quite a number of the largest mining men there, and I do not know—I never have heard—that they were going to bring any claims.

Senator BRANDEGER. Did you ever ask any of them if they intended to?

Mr. LILL. Yes; I asked two or three; but they did not know, themselves. They did not think it worth while to present a claim until they knew what the future held in store.

Senator BRANDEGER. Well, probably waiting to see if there was going to be anybody to present a claim to. But did any of them tell you that they did not intend to present any claims?

Mr. LILL. No.

Senator BRANDEGER. If I should tell you I have information that a certain American company has a claim for $50,000,000 against the Mexican Government, and say that they can prove it, would that alter your estimate at all?

Mr. LILL. Why, it would alter it considerably. But a claim is not by any means what the Mexican Government has got to pay, you know. In the last international arbitration of which we had charge, I think the claims amounted to 90 per cent over what were finally substantiated.

Senator BRANDEGER. I am saying, if an American company claims they can prove damages of $50,000,000. I am not saying whether they will get 10 cents on the dollar.

Mr. LILL. I do not think there is any company in Mexico can substantiate a claim of $50,000,000.

Senator BRANDEGER. That is not what I asked you. I asked you if you knew of any American company—I am not interested in the Mexican claims against their own government; it is the claims of American corporations and business men for damages sustained by Americans that I am interested in.

Mr. LILL. I included that in my answer. That is, I do not believe there is any Mexican company that can substantiate a claim for $50,000,000.

Senator BRANDEGER. Is that belief based upon any evidence?

Mr. LILL. No, sir.

Senator BRANDEGER. Have you taken any pains to ascertain what notices have been filed with our State Department as to claims down there by American business concerns?

Mr. LILL. That matter is not a matter which I would go into, Senator. It seems to me it is a matter for the State Department.

Senator BRANDEGER. You might say yes or no, whether or not you had taken any pains to ascertain what claims had been filed with the State Department.

Mr. LILL. If you ask me whether I have taken any pains to investigate it would infer I was derelict in my work if I did not.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I did not infer anything.

Mr. LILL. Well, the record would infer it.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I asked you if you had taken any pains to ascertain from the State Department what claims had been presented by American business concerns.

Mr. LILL. No, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. What was the amount you referred to as the Huerta debt?

Mr. LILL. Shall I proceed?

Senator BRANDEGEE. Yes; I was waiting for you.

Mr. LILL. The Huerta debt consists of 6 per cent treasury bonds of 1918 amounting to 166,000,000 pesos, and the 6 per cent treasury bonds of 1914 amounting to 21,000,000 pesos against which there are 60,000,000 pesos accrued interest.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Well, during what period of time was that debt incurred?

Mr. LILL. The large debt was incurred in 1918; the next one was incurred in 1914.

Senator BRANDEGEE. The Huerta debt you mean was strictly limited to the time when Huerta was in power?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Pardon me just a moment.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Huerta debt of which he speaks, this first debt, was authorized during the Madero administration. Madero borrowed money in New York. He has testified that 42,000,000 pesos was repaid out of the final sale which was made by Huerta, of these Huerta bonds to cover the Madero debt in New York, so it is generally known as the Madero-Huerta debt.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Do you agree with that explanation?

Mr. LILL. I do not think I can, because the debt is known all through Mexico and is termed by everybody the "Huerta debt," the "debt of the usurper."

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. Do you agree with the statement I have made that you have testified that these bonds were issued by the Madero Congress?

Mr. LILL. The 6 per cent bonds of 1918 were authorized by the Madero Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. And that 6,000,000 pounds were offered and sold?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. By Morgan here and by French and other bankers?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And that of the proceeds of this sale a portion approximating 42,000,000 pesos was applied on the payment of the Madero debt.

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir; that is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the statement I made.

Mr. LILL. But hitching it up as Madero-Huerta debt, the point that I am seeking to make here is that that part of the debt I think is legitimate, but as to the 100,000,000 pesos which was issued by Huerta afterwards, a large part of that was tinged with fraud and the Mexican Government does not repudiate that in any way, but it wants to make an investigation to determine what part of it it should pay, and I certainly would be in favor of that investigation.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Is there not a question about other portions of the Mexican debt being tinged with fraud?

Mr. LILL. Not in that sense, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. What sense do you mean?

Mr. LILL. Well, fraud may have occurred in the issues of debt prior to 1910, but it has nothing to do with what Mexico has to pay at the present time. Since 1910 I do not know of any fraud except in connection with those two loans.

Senator BRANDEGEE. All these questions as to the validity of the bond issues to secure debts and whether they were issued fraudulently or whether they are binding upon the Government are not questions so much of expert accounting, are they, as they are questions of law?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Questions of law?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. And have you taken reliable legal advice to base your opinion as to whether there was fraud in connection with any of these issues or not?

Mr. LILL. I have not charged fraud, Senator. I simply say from my investigation it appears that there was fraud, and my recommendation is that there should be an investigation to determine it before a decision.

Senator BRANDEGEE. You say you do not charge fraud but you say a large portion of it is tinged with fraud and you suspect fraud, but you do not consider you have the evidence to prove it or that it is your duty to prove it, is that right?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Why are these different portions of debt estimated sometimes in pesos, sometimes in dollars, and sometimes in pounds?

Mr. LILL. Well, the French debt is stated that way. The earlier debt was—

Senator BRANDEGEE. Is it carried that way on the Mexican books?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. So that this 6,000,000 pounds would be 60,000,000 pesos in round numbers, would it not?

Mr. LILL. In round numbers.

Senator BRANDEGEE. How large a force of—

Mr. LILL. That illustrates the difficulty we had in the debt, the different ratios at which this all had to be computed.

Senator BRANDEGEE. As shown by the blue print to which you have just pointed?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. How large a force of assistants, expert accountants, and examiners did you have with you in Mexico?

Mr. LILL. I had—

Senator BRANDEGEE. I do not mean to be exact.

Mr. LILL. Well, Prof. Kemmerer, of Princeton, on currency; Prof. Chandler, of Columbia, on finance; Prof. Young, of Princeton, on taxation; Mr. Monroe on purchasing; Mr. Oakey on accounting;

Mr. Gleason on munitions. I had those 6 Americans and about 44 Mexican engineers and accountants.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Did you have any American accountants and bookkeepers and examiners?

Mr. LILL. No, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. You have spoken about relying to a certain extent on the annual reports of the Mexican officials or the Government. Did your corps of examiners and bookkeepers and accountants look at the original sources of the information?

Mr. LILL. No, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Or the books in the departments of the Government?

Mr. LILL. No, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Or did you largely rely on the annual reports?

Mr. LILL. I took the annual reports for what I term the historical part of this report on the debt. I sent my men right down to the treasury books, the record of bonds and coupons, to get the information regarding the debt.

Senator BRANDEGEE. If there was a large sum of money, I believe Senator Fall said $700,000, or something like that, as having been paid to the Madero family, do you know whether that was shown on the original Government books as having been paid to that family?

Mr. LILL. Why, I presume it would appear in some way. Whether it would appear as extraordinary expenses or—

Senator BRANDEGEE. I do not mean to ask whether the books would indicate the purpose for which it was paid, but do you know whether it is a fact the Government's account of expenditures indicates that that or any other sum was paid to the Madero family?

Mr. LILL. I do not, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Do you know whether any of your accountants know?

Mr. LILL. I do not, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. You personally did not examine any of the Government books, did you?

Mr. LILL. I examined a great many original Government records, Mr. Senator, but not for the purpose of tracing these matters.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Simply for the purpose of correcting errors in their methods and financial system?

Mr. LILL. Well, the principal purpose of our going down there was to reorganize the currency and help put Mexico on her feet. The big problem of Mexico was the fact they were spending a great deal more money than they had coming in. We instituted this budget and, as I explained the other day, we cut the expenditures from 16,500,000 a month to 10,500,000 a month.

The big thing in Mexico was to try to get them to live within their income. The things which we had to do to make that effective were the organization of the controller general under the president, similar to that recommended by Senator McCormick for the United States, and the cleaning up and systematizing of customs and sub-treasuries—the internal revenue offices and sub-treasuries.

That is a very big job. That was our main job there, to make Mexico live in the future and not to dig into the past.

Senator BRANDEGER. I understood that; that is what I supposed, because you were employed, you and your corps of experts, by the Mexican Government.

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

Senator BRANDEGER. To inspect, and to suggest forms for their financial affairs with a view to trying to make receipts equal expenditures, I assume.

You were not then engaged in taking up any frauds that had been perpetuated upon the Government, or tracing where those funds went, legitimately, were you?

Mr. LILL. Prior to June 1, 1917; no, sir. After that time I had a pretty good analysis of the cash.

Senator BRANDEGER. Were your instructions from the Mexican Government to try to unearth any frauds that might have been perpetuated?

Mr. LILL. No, sir.

Senator BRANDEGER. Did you make any report upon that?

Mr. LILL. No, sir.

Senator BRANDEGER. Have you any figures upon that?

Mr. LILL. Upon fraud?

Senator BRANDEGER. Yes.

Mr. LILL. No, sir.

Senator BRANDEGER. You say that some of the Huerta money that was tendered was fraudulent?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

Senator BRANDEGER. How much?

Mr. LILL. That 3,000,000 pounds issued to John W. DeKay.

Senator BRANDEGER. Did you report that fact to the Mexican Government?

Mr. LILL. No, sir.

Senator BRANDEGER. No suspicions about it?

Mr. LILL. I did not embody it in any report.

Senator BRANDEGER. In any annual report?

Mr. LILL. Except this one which I read, to be published within a very short time—

Senator BRANDEGER. Did you discuss it with any Mexican Government official?

Mr. LILL. I have discussed it—

Senator BRANDEGER. With whom?

Mr. LILL. Mr. Cabrera, Mr. Rodriguez, and Alberto Pani.

Senator BRANDEGER. What is that book [indicating]? I do not care to see it; I wanted it to go into the record.

Mr. LILL. It is "The History and Present State of the Public Debt of Mexico," by Thomas R. Lill. This is my original report.

Senator BRANDEGER. To the Mexican Government?

Mr. LILL. No, sir; this is the report which we are issuing.

Senator BRANDEGER. Issuing to whom?

Mr. LILL. To the public, for the information of banks and bankers.

Senator BRANDEGER. To the public in this country or in Mexico?

Mr. LILL. To the public in this country and in Mexico.

Senator BRANDEGER. In issuing it to the bankers of the United States, who employs you?

Mr. LILL. I was employed by the Mexican Government up to May or June, 1918. From October to the end of December, 1918,

I was engaged by the American Metal Co. to go down and do some professional work for them, and it was in connection with that work that I started this report.

The CHAIRMAN. In connection with which work?

Mr. LILL. In connection with my work for the American Metal Co. I then spent two or three months longer, the early part of this year, on this work, and that work is charged against the Mexican Government direct.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Are you in anybody's employ with reference to these financial matters?

Mr. LILL. No, sir. I am now consulting accountant for the United States Government, and my only connection with Mexican matters is that I originated the financial discussion, proposed the plan of reorganization with Mr. Carranza, and that was followed by Mr. Nieto coming up to see Mr. Morgan. Nieto was the secretary of finance. To that extent I am interested, but I am not in the Mexican pay or anybody else's pay, except as it happens in the United States Government at the present time. I have no interest whatever in this testimony, except as an American citizen. It was never intimated to me in any way that I should testify, never even suggested to me. I do not believe it was even thought of by any Mexican.

Senator BRANDEGEE. You appeared here at your own request, did you or were you summoned?

Mr. LILL. I wrote a letter; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us straighten that out now. Dr. Inman testified in answer to a question by the chairman that he had heard of one man who had requested to appear before this committee and who had not been accorded the privilege, and he mentioned your name as that of the gentleman who had requested to appear before the committee and who had not heard from the committee or been accorded the privilege of being heard. Dr. Inman was mistaken in that, was he not?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir. I wrote a letter to the subcommittee of the House which was investigating Mexican affairs requesting permission to appear, but was not heard. That had no reference to this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. As soon as Dr. Inman's testimony was given to this committee you were notified that the committee would hear you at any time you desired, and you came over and consulted with me and then wrote a letter to this committee requesting that you might give this testimony?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir. You were getting such a lot of misinformation, Senator, that I did not think it would do any harm to give you a little real information.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I have here a letter dated September 15, 1919, signed by Thomas R. Lill, on the stationery of Searle & Nicholson, certified public accountants, 52 Broadway, New York. It is addressed "Chairman, Subcommittee on Mexican Affairs, Committee on Foreign Relations, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C." The concluding paragraph is as follows:

If you desire me to testify, I request that you give me sufficient notice so that I may procure my papers from New York.

(The letter referred to was marked "Lill Exhibit No. 1," and is as follows:)

SEARLE & NICHOLSON,
New York, September 15, 1918.

CHAIRMAN SUBCOMMITTEE ON MEXICAN AFFAIRS,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to request that I be permitted to appear before your committee for the purpose of testifying to the progress made by the Carranza Government in establishing law and order since it assumed office in May, 1917.

My information was gained while acting as chief accountant and acting director of President Carranza's financial and administrative reorganization commission from May 1917, to June 1918, and during a visit to Mexico covering the period from October, 1918, to January, 1919, for the purpose of discussing certain matters with the Mexican Government.

The commission consisted of the following Mexican members:

Luis Cabrera, chairman.

Alberto Pani, secretary of commerce, labor, and industry.

Manuel Rodriguez y Gutierrez, secretary of communications and public works.

Rafael Nieto, acting secretary of the treasury.

The commission employed about 40 specialists, engineers, accountants, and clerks, and, in addition to reorganizing the business methods of the Government to bring them up to date, made studies of banks and banking, currency, taxation, railroads, commerce, petroleum, etc.

If you desire me to testify, I request that you give me sufficient notice so that I may procure my papers from New York.

Very truly yours,

(Signed) THOMAS R. LILL.

Address: Raleigh Hotel, Washington, D. C.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a letter that you wrote after you had seen me and told me that Dr. Inman was mistaken; that you had not written to this committee but had written to the House committee?

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In this letter, in the first paragraph, you say:

I have the honor to request that I be permitted to appear before your committee for the purpose of testifying to the progress made by the Carranza government in establishing law and order since it assumed office in May, 1917.

Mr. LILL. Yes sir. I want to add there, to be clearly understood, that I did not appear at the request of the Government, nor by suggestion or in any way was it intended or asked of me that I should appear here for the Mexican Government. I do it merely as an American citizen, because I think that if we understood Mexican matters better we would get along better.

Does that finish your questions, Senator, I would like to---

The CHAIRMAN. Before you leave---

Senator BRANDEGEE. You would like to what?

Mr. LILL. Make a general statement regarding the Mexican problem, if I may.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I have finished.

The CHAIRMAN. Before you get away from this question of the damages: You say you talked with lawyers about the responsibility of the Mexican Government for payments of damages. Do you know whether the Mexican Government, Mr. Carranza, has by decree or promise made to foreign countries, obligated himself in any way with reference to Mexican damages?

Mr. LILL. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Naturally, if you are trying to form a guess or make a guess of the amount of damages that might be claimed by nationals of other countries, it seems to me that you would have investigated as to whether any promises had been made by Carranza.

Mr. LILL. I can only say, Senator, that I had such a tremendous amount of work that I could not go into these details, which would lead me into the office of the secretary of state of the Mexican Government with which I did not have much business.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to call your attention, then, for your information, because it may be of interest to you, to the fact that from the city of Monclova, headquarters of the first chief of the Constitutionalist forces on the 10th day of May, 1918, prior to Mr. Carranza's recognition by this Government, either de facto or de jure recognition, that Mr. Carranza did make to this Government and to other governments a pledge as to the payment of damages. Did you not have your attention called to that?

Mr. LILL. I had not, but it was never any other idea of mine but what the Mexican Government would settle all legitimate damages presented.

The CHAIRMAN. You have spoken of damages under international law; and some international lawyers do not agree with you as to the responsibility of the Mexican Government for the damages being limited to the cases to which you have referred.

Mr. LILL. You are a lawyer and I am not.

The CHAIRMAN. Aside from that, the Carranza Government has issued at least four different decrees with reference to its responsibility for damages and how claims should be presented, etc., and it looks as though your attention would have been called by some Mexican to these promises or obligations with reference to the amount of damages and the character of damages which the Government proposes to liquidate.

Mr. LILL. The character of the damages had not been settled. The claims commission was not organized until the latter part of 1918.

The CHAIRMAN. Right here, now, for your information, I propose to read into the record a portion, at least, of this decree of 1918:

Venustiano Carranza, first chief of the constitutionalist forces, and so forth:

ARTICLE 1. The right of all nationals and foreigners to claim payment for damages suffered during the revolution of 1910 or during the period embraced between the 21st of November, 1910, and May 31, 1911, is hereby recognized.

ART. 2. An equal right is also recognized on the part of nationals and foreigners to claim for damages which they suffered during the present struggle, or from and after the 19th day of February of the present year until the restoration of the constitutional order.

ART. 3. The same right on the part of foreigners to claim payment for damages suffered by revolutionary forces or groups during the period embraced between the 31st of May, 1911, and the 18th day of February of the current year, is recognized.

That last clause limits the right of claim to foreigners and not to nationals; but there is an absolute pledge of responsibility for claims for damages without any restrictions at all in this decree, which was in force at the time this Government recognized Carranza and requested the other governments of the world to allow this Government to handle Mexican matters.

Mr. LILL. I had that decree. I had forgotten it. Does that first paragraph read that they acknowledge—

The CHAIRMAN (reading):

The right of all nationals and foreigners to claim payment for damages suffered during the revolution of 1910 or during the period embraced between the 21st of November, 1910, and May 31, 1911, is hereby recognized.

Mr. LILL. Yes, sir; but how does the right to make a claim obligate anybody to—

The CHAIRMAN. I will show you in a moment. [Continuing reading:]

An equal right is also recognized on the part of nationals and foreigners to claim for damages which they suffered during the present struggle, or from any time after the 19th day of February, of the present year—until the restoration of the constitutional order.

That is, 1913—

Whatever that may be.

On the 24th of December, 1917, in the creation of a commission, there was an undertaking to limit the responsibility for damages. And that is the matter to which you have reference, the first being damages caused by the revolutionary forces recognized by the Government established after the triumph of the revolution; second, damages caused by the government forces in the campaign against the rebels, and, third, damages caused by forces of the so-called federal army until its dissolution.

There is a vast deal of difference between the two pledges or promises. Carranza was recognized on one of them after we had secured the acquiescence of the foreign countries in our action in Mexico, and after his recognition he then issued his decree upon which you are basing international law.

Mr. LILL. No; I do not base it upon that, Senator. I base it by a very close study of international law, I can say, for about four years, in my services to the United States Government, where I had a good deal to do with construction of law; and to be perfectly frank with you, I got most of my data regarding international relationships from conversations with Ambassador Fletcher. I do not say it is correct. In this report that I have here I have a section—

The CHAIRMAN. I may say to you now, before we go past that proposition, that I think that Ambassador Fletcher never had his attention called to the Carranza decree of 1913 until very recently.

Mr. LILL. With all due respect, Senator—you are a lawyer, I understand, are you not?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. LILL. How does the right, as acknowledged, of foreigners to present claims obligate the Mexican Government to pay claims? I do not understand that.

The CHAIRMAN. Because the Mexican Government pledged it, sir.

Mr. LILL. Pledged itself to pay those claims?

The CHAIRMAN. As to how they would be presented and adjudicated. [Reading from article 4:]

As soon as the first chief of the Constitutionalist forces shall arrive at the Capital of the Republic, and in accordance with the plan of Guadalupe, assumes the executive power, he will name a commission of Mexican citizens who shall be charged with the receipt, examination and liquidation of the claim for damages suffered during the periods fixed in articles 1 and 2 of this decree.

Art. 5. At the same time that the said commission is named, as provided in the preceding article, the first Chief of the Constitutionalist forces, in accord with the diplomatic representative of, or commissioner especially designated by, the Governments of foreigners who have suffered damage, will proceed to name a mixed commission composed of an equal number of Mexicans and foreigners, the latter of the same nationality as to the claimants, in order that they may receive, examine and liquidate the claims presented in accordance with the provisions of the three first articles of this decree.

Art. 6. The form, time, terms, and conditions under which the claims for damages are presented are to be paid, also the organization, functions, and other necessary regulations of organization and form, shall be fixed by opportune legislation.

Now, the Government is undertaking to do away with this—

Mr. LILL. I do not think so.

The CHAIRMAN. I know so.

Mr. LILL. Let me ask you with reference to that first decree. That statement is pretty broad that they make there. Would you ask the Mexican Government or any other Government to pay claims arising in Mexico for which it was not responsible?

The CHAIRMAN. For which who were not responsible?

Mr. LILL. The Mexican Government.

The CHAIRMAN. What Mexican Government?

Mr. LILL. The Madero, Huerta, or Carranza Governments.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. I would ask, when Mr. Carranza was seeking recognition of this Government, seeking aid and assistance in the overthrow of Huerta, making a pledge as to what he would do in the event he was successful, and having secured, too, the assistance of this Government under a certain pledge—I would simply ask him to keep his pledge.

Mr. LILL. I would not go so far as to hold that Mr. Carranza or the present Carranza Government under that pledge should pay all the claims for damages occurring by reason of Villa's activities.

The CHAIRMAN. I am not expressing any opinion. I suppose I ought to say now that Mr. Villa had as much as anyone to do with putting Mr. Carranza in the position in which he now is.

Mr. LILL. I acknowledge that he played a large part in it.

The CHAIRMAN. But so long as he was willing to serve with Mr. Carranza—I do not care to be drawn into the history of this thing—but so long as he stayed with Mr. Carranza, which he did up to the time that Obregon, in command of the army of the north and Villa in command of the army of the northwest, wrote a joint letter to Mr. Carranza demanding of him to carry out the pledge in the plan of Guadalupe—up to that time Mr. Villa was certainly more instrumental in placing Mr. Carranza in the position in which he now is, than anyone else. We will not discuss the question, pro or con, as to why Mr. Villa quit Mr. Carranza; but Mr. Villa claims that he quit him because Mr. Carranza did not follow the pledge which he made in this very decree which I have just read to you, as to what he would do following the plan of Guadalupe. And that is a matter that I do not care to go into at this time. I will go into it later.

So far as the damages are concerned, that is a matter for consideration hereafter, and I am not expressing my opinion at this time. I have a very firm opinion as to what damages Mexico will be compelled to pay by the unanimous verdict of the world, but that I do not care to express at this time.

What we were asking you was, as to the basis you had for making your guess that the claims would approximate something like $25,000,000, and that is what caused this discussion. I do not care to go into it any further at this time.

Mr. LILL. May I add, Senator, that in all my discussions with the ministers of Mr. Carranza and with President Carranza himself, I have never received any other intimation but what Mexico would pay all legitimate damages arising in that country.

The CHAIRMAN. As I say, I do not care to go into any controversy or into any discussion of the Calvo doctrine, if you know what it is. I do not think that it will prevail in the matter of the settlement of Mexican claims. It has never been acknowledged by this country yet.

Mr. LILL. The Calvo doctrine?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir. It was absolutely rejected at the Hague tribunal.

Mr. LILL. If you have no further questions, may I add this?

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead. I will have some further questions after you get through.

Mr. LILL. It seems to me, Senator, that one thing, certainly, ought to come out of this investigation, or should be made apparent, anyway, and that is that it would be to the best interests of the United States to get back of Mexico in a friendly spirit for the purpose of aiding it in its reconstruction plans. At the present time or for the past two or three years, all this constant agitation for intervention is antagonizing the Mexican people against the American people, to our disadvantage. The German, English, and French are not playing that game at all. The biggest prize in the world to-day probably in Mexico, but the question as to who is to assist it in its economic reconstruction is a big one. Who is going to step in with assistance at the right time? Are we going to allow England, Germany, France, or possibly Norway, to do this work which we ought to do or which we should do for our own advantage?

I think that any financing of the Mexican debts will depend a great deal upon the attitude of the United States Government in making a statement of policy to the American bankers as to how far they will go in protecting investments in Mexico or abroad.

We are speaking of a debt and of claims and of things of that nature, constantly, you might say, hounding Mexico to get busy and pay up, when it is a physical impossibility to pay up at this time—

The CHAIRMAN. Just right there: What basis have you for that statement? Who is hounding Mexico to get busy and pay up?

Mr. LILL. Is not this constant intervention talk an effort along those lines?

The CHAIRMAN. I am asking you, and I am not answering.

Mr. LILL. I can not give any further facts than that.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the Government of the United States demanded that Mexico get busy and pay up?

Mr. LILL. Not that I know of.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the French Government or the English Government or the German Government?

Mr. LILL. Not that I know of.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, then, who has?

Mr. LILL. I do not know whether anyone has except the bondholders.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know that the bondholders have?

Mr. LILL. I presume they have negotiated a number of times or taken the matter up with the Government—

The CHAIRMAN. With what government?

Mr. LILL. The Mexican Government. I am quite sure the matter has been taken up with the state departments of all foreign governments.

The CHAIRMAN. I have asked you whether or not—

Mr. LILL. I do not know, Senator; I am not in the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. You spoke of the constant hounding of Mexico to pay up. That is all right as a general statement, Mr. Lill, but what is the foundation for it? Suppose that the foreign bondholders have made representations to this Government and to Mexico. If this Government has not made the representations itself to Mexico in demanding payment for the bondholders or otherwise, who is hounding Mexico for payment?

Mr. LILL. It seemed to me that this term properly describes the constant agitation in the United States for intervention. I have read it in the newspapers. That agitation is based upon or points to a number of things. You have just referred to one company having a claim of $50,000,000 in Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Brandegee asked you if you had had any intimation that one American company had any such claim.

Mr. LILL. It seems as I read the papers that continual pressure exists through this intervention talk. The point I wish to make is that if we could cease this and get behind Mexico in a friendly spirit probably all the things that we would like to see accomplished down there would be accomplished.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, if we just stopped the newspaper talk about Mexico you think it would be better?

Mr. LILL. The newspaper talk—I do not ask that it be stopped by presidential decree, but if we undertake to help Mexico in its reconstruction policies in a friendly spirit, the newspapers would probably reflect the same spirit. If intervention is decided on I do not believe we could bring peace out of Mexico or restore order very much faster than Mr. Carranza is doing now.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, well, that may be true. You have said that Germany, Great Britain, and France have not been antagonizing Mexico or have not been insisting upon Mexico doing anything to restore order, etc., and that they have got an advantage of us down there, that they are not antagonizing Mexico, etc. Do you know any reason why they have not been insistent upon the restoration of order in Mexico?

Mr. LILL. I imagine it is because of the attitude of the United States Government on that matter.

The CHAIRMAN. In what respect?

Mr. LILL. I imagine that it is due to an arrangement or an agreement between these countries that the United States will look after the interests of these foreign countries if they do not go into Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. And if the United States were pressing Mexico for a settlement or for the restoration of order and peace, it would be not only representing its own citizens and their desires, but, under your understanding which you have just expressed, it would also be representing the natives of other countries and citizens and the countries themselves, would it not?

Mr. LILL. I would say that it was a very clever method that aroused all the antagonism of the Mexicans against us and they reap the benefit.

The CHAIRMAN. You think that is the case, do you not?

Mr. LILL. I only imagine it, Senator. I have no information on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Possibly I may be able to assist you a little there.

The President, in his message to Congress on August 27, 1918, says, among other things:

We are expected by the powers of the world to act as Mexico's nearest friend.

I am happy to say that several of the great governments of the world have given this Government their generous moral support in urging upon the provisional authorities at the City of Mexico the acceptance of our proffered good offices in the spirit in which they were made.

All the world expects us in such circumstances to act as Mexico's nearest friend and intimate adviser.

This consent of mankind to what we are attempting, this attitude of the great nations of the world toward what we may attempt in dealing with this distressed people at our doors, should make us feel the more solemnly bound to go to the utmost length of patience and forbearance in this painful and anxious business.

On October 29, a telegram was sent out from this city, the same year, 1918, specially to the New York Times, emanating, as was claimed, from the Department of State, as follows:

A new and probably more definite Mexican policy is to be initiated by the United States, and pending the disclosure of this program Great Britain, Germany, and France have given assurances that they will take no action.

That a request had been made to the powers to await a proposal regarding Mexico from this Government and that already these three European nations had acceded to the request, was announced late to-day by Secretary Bryan. It is understood that practically every civilized nation had been notified of the purpose of the United States.

There are various other indications of the same character. If it be true that the other nations have acquiesced in the handling of this matter by the United States, and Mr. Carranza has any power in Mexico by the action of the United States, that is, through recognition, first, as de facto and next, possibly, a de jure recognition, then it is up to the United States to make representations to Mexico with reference to the desires and demands of other nations as well as of our own, is it not?

Mr. LILL. I do not see any objection to that. My only criticism is of the fact that the representations regarding order, if any have been made, or regarding debt—I include that—are not possible of compliance in Mexico at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not know whether they are or not. You are, however, criticising the actions of the citizens of the United States in antagonizing Mexico while citizens of other countries and the other countries themselves are not doing it. If we are agitating these matters of the settlement of claims and the restoration of law and order down there, we are simply performing a duty which we were obligated to perform by other nations, are we not?

Mr. LILL. What kind of a duty? A duty because some public officer has entered into agreements of that kind, or a duty which we owe to those other nations?

The CHAIRMAN. Possibly I should not have asked you that question. However, we will let the facts as they stand of record, and as you have acquiesced in them, speak for themselves, that it appears that this Government secured the acquiescence of at least three foreign governments, Great Britain, France, and Germany, late in 1913, in the handling of Mexican affairs by the Government of the United States; that following that, in pursuance of its new policy, Huerta was ousted, Carranza was recognized, and that Carranza is now the President of Mexico, and Mexico is not paying her debt, nor is Mexico paying damages to foreigners for injuries, so far as we know. Whose duty is it; what nation's duty is it to press for the payment of those claims?

Mr. LILL. If we have any agreement with these countries to press their claims it certainly is our duty to press them; but I do not understand, in your statement there relating to this agreement regarding the recognition of Huerta, why all these foreign governments recognized Huerta when the United States did not, particularly as they were making a loan of $3,000,000—

The CHAIRMAN. The recognition by those foreign nations of Huerta had come prior to August, 1913, Mr. Lill.

Mr. LILL. I do not know, of course, whether they—

The CHAIRMAN. The message which I have read to you is dated August 27, 1913, and the telegram with reference to Mr. Bryan's statement is of October 29, 1913.

Go ahead with your statement. I stopped you there because of the statement you were making that agitation here was antagonizing the people of Mexico against the United States, and as you said Great Britain, France, and other countries were not doing it. That was the purpose of my questions. You may proceed now.

Mr. LILL. I believe they have made representations. I have seen notices to that effect; but, on the other hand, threatening intervention all the time as a corrective for the evils—

The CHAIRMAN. Is this Government threatening intervention?

Mr. LILL. I do not think so. I think Mr. Wilson has gone to the other extreme.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well, then. This Government is not threatening intervention any more than France or Great Britain or any other country.

Mr. LILL. You, yourself, Senator have made quite a number of speeches in the last six or seven years.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, let me say, once and for all, that neither you nor anyone else can point to a speech that I have ever made in the Senate or on the stump, or any place in the United States, with reference to Mexico or intervention in Mexico, except that I have demanded that if it were necessary to protect American citizens in Mexico by the armed forces of the United States, it was our duty to do so. You better look at the speeches, possibly, that I have made, and see whether I have not confined myself to that.

Mr. LILL. I ran across two or three copies the other day, but I did not read them as closely as I should. I am very glad to hear that, Senator. I think, as far as that goes, you are echoing the sentiment of a great many others.

The CHAIRMAN. Some of the witnesses appeared to be misinformed as to my attitude in reference to Mexico.

Mr. LILL. Shall I go on, Senator?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. LILL. The point I am trying to make is that here is a great big country to the south of us which has tremendous possibilities along commercial lines, and if our Government can adopt a policy toward investments in foreign countries it would enable our bankers to get behind Mexico; that would be greatly to the advantage of the American business man.

Regarding claims, debts, and things of that kind, let me say that I went out as a soldier in the Spanish-American War. I was for two and three-quarters years actively engaged in a campaign against the Filipinos. I went into the civil government under Gov. Taft and was there for seven years longer. I chased bandits myself, many and many a time, in the Philippines; and it took us about four years with three to four hundred millions of dollars to clean up the bandit situation. We went in there in 1898, and in 1905, when I was district auditor, I remember distinctly having a bandit caught about 100 miles from my main office. There was a thousand pesos offered for his head. They cut off his head and sent it down to the capitol and I was required to pass the voucher upon that bandit's head. I did not know the bandit, but I passed the voucher anyhow. That was in 1906 when we had been there for eight years.

At the time Mr. Carranza started his revolution he only had his fiat currency, and the normal revenues of the country under his jurisdiction. With the beginning of the organized government in May, 1917, and the restoration of order, the revenues began to come in fairly regularly. His revenues for the year ending June 30, 1918, I think it is, or December, amounted to about 180,000,000 pesos, or $65,000,000. If we had had the same problem in the Philippines we never could have done what we did there.

Mexico needs two or three more years to suppress bandits. She needs an army to do so. She needs every cent she can get to support her army. It is impossible for her to begin paying any of her debts at this time.

You said the other day that Mexico was tremendously rich. Everybody knows it is. It is a favorite statement of the Mexicans down there to refer to the national richness of the country which would pay everything; but that is like having a thousand dollars in a bank in Wall Street in 1907 when you could not get carfare to pay your way down town. It is going to take a very strong effort to get that richness out of the soil in Mexico—

The CHAIRMAN. Who gets it out? Who has ever gotten it out of the soil?

Mr. LILL. To a very large extent, foreigners. Mexico wants foreigners. I have discussed it with members of the cabinet, and Mexico would like very much to increase her population 15,000,000 people in the next 15 years. If she can increase her population to that extent she will have money enough to pay all her current operating expenses and do a great many things which she can not do now.

But the point I want to emphasize is this, Senator: That I was there for years in intimate contact with those men and never did I hear a single expression by anyone which would display an intention of not paying her debts as soon as she possibly could, and paying all damages, in an international court, possibly, under recognized rules of international law assessed against her.

I would like to point out in that connection, Senator, that to a certain extent we are really responsible for that thing down there, through our colleges. The Government is practically a young man's Government, and in every department of the Government I ran against American college graduates. Virginia Carranza, Carranza's daughter, was educated here. Julia Carranza also. Col. Alberto Salinas, in charge of aviation, is an American-college graduate. Gen. Gustavo Salinas is an American-college graduate, as is also Martinez Carranza and Gen. Enriquez, who was after Villa.

The CHAIRMAN. Who?

Mr. LILL. Ignacio Enriquez, who was made governor of Chihuahua.

The CHAIRMAN. How was he made governor of Chihuahua?

Mr. LILL. He was appointed to a vacancy, I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. By whom?

Mr. LILL. Gen. Carranza. He had some trouble with Murguia—I do not understand how it came out—but Enriquez had the right idea. He wanted to know if I could not help him get five or six American bloodhounds to trace Villa.

The CHAIRMAN. You think that was the right idea?

Mr. LILL. There are 2,000 hacendados that grew up with Enriquez. Enriquez is a tall six-footer, full-blooded Mexican. He speaks English perfectly. Just the moment he got to Chihuahua, there would be 2,000 that would drop their shovels and follow him in order to get Villa.

The CHAIRMAN. Why did he not do it?

Mr. LILL. He got into a row with Murguia and came back, and I do not know whether he is up there now or not. Probably you have later information.

Cardenas brothers, in the department of state, are college graduates. Bonillos is a Boston Tech man. Galleio, school of ethnology, Columbia. Echererria, who is an engineer, is now in the United States. Osuna, the governor of Tamaulipas, is a Columbia man. The Government is full of American college graduates.

The CHAIRMAN. I can give you an interesting fact that has possibly never struck you, confirming that.

Mr. LILL. When Carranza started his revolution, practically all these college men went with him. I think it is true that it is a young man's movement down there. The Mexicans themselves are not antagonistic to Americans, that I ever saw. They want foreigners in that country, but where we are not in sympathy with them is in their attempt to regulate their affairs in Mexico so that they will have some control over them.

The greatest curse of Mexico for years has been the fact that foreigners go there and retain their own nationality. They have nothing whatever to do with Mexican affairs. They do not become a part of the country. They take practically every cent out that they make. The United States is just the reverse. It has been pointed out to me time after time, "Foreigners come here and settle in our country and do not become a part of our nation." That is a great big thing that Mexico is trying to overcome——

The CHAIRMAN. Hold on there, just a moment. Do you know how many American railroad men there were in Mexico at the outbreak of this revolution?

Mr. LILL. In 1913 or 1910?

The CHAIRMAN. 1910.

Mr. LILL. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. My reason for asking you that is because you are making a broad statement. Go ahead.

Mr. LILL. I gather your thought that at that time the railroads were operated by Americans to a large extent and they were replaced by Mexicans later on.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, and that, although the Americans owned their homes in Mexico, and that, at the outbreak of this revolution 3,000 Americans in northern States of Mexico in a few localities owned their own homes and were operating there under Mexican laws. The fact that they were not Mexican citizens was because the Mexican Government had invited them in there, extending the privilege of retaining American citizenship and still developing property, even within the prohibited zone.

Mr. LILL. That is true, but——

The CHAIRMAN. There were twelve hundred and fifty-odd children driven out—American children—700 of whom were born in Mexico.

Mr. LILL. At what time?

The CHAIRMAN. In the early part of the revolution—1910.

Mr. LILL. As I recollect it, they were notified by our State Department to get out.

The CHAIRMAN. They were driven out at the muzzle of a gun.

Mr. LILL. Was that under the Madero revolution?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. LILL. I do not think we ought to take an isolated instance like that as an indication of the attitude of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. No; but you are speaking now, just as I have heard other people speak, of the Americans going down there to make a dollar and then getting out of the country. I am calling your attention actually to people who are Americans and who have gone down there and got homes and have built up the country; built irrigation propositions, by practically their own independent efforts, and have lost all they had—driven out, and have actually lost all they had. I am not speaking of corporations.

Mr. LILL. Yes; but I can not see that. These same Americans went down there during 26 years prior to the revolution and lived there in peace and comfort and made money. The fact that they were expelled during a revolution would not entirely wrest from my mind the fact that for 26 years they had lived down there peaceably.

The CHAIRMAN. I did not suppose it would. That was suggested as simply an answer to your general broad statement as to Americans going there for the exploitation of Mexico, making money and getting away. You compared that with the conditions existing here in this country. I can show you that identical conditions existed around Tampico, Vera Cruz, and from Yucatan to the north, where Americans had gone in there, by far, Mr. Lill, a larger number of Americans who were there in 1910 and who are not there now, but who were individual Americans or little cooperative colonies, not representing any corporations exploiting Mexico, but who had gone in there at the invitation of the Mexican Government, with certain privileges extended to them in that invitation, exactly a similar invitation as that which they have been extending to foreigners of whom you are talking, trying to build up their 15,000,000 of population.

I am simply trying to get you to specify and am calling your attention to specific instances, because you are making exactly the same character of broad statement that we have been hearing ever since the revolution broke out in 1910.

It is for those people that I have spoken in every speech I have made in the United States Senate, because they lost everything in the world they had, including their lives.

Mr. LILL. I have, as far as possible, confined myself to details and facts, I think, you will acknowledge, up to this time. I requested permission to make a very small general statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly, and I am simply asking you about the specific matters regarding which you may be familiar.

Mr. LILL. I would like to impress upon you, sir, however, that that thing is a very real and vital matter to us as a Nation; and if we can get behind Mexico at the present time and help her reorganize her finances, railways, and banks, it is going to be tremendously to our advantage; and it is the only way in which we can help her. You can not possibly help Mexico by demanding that she pay her debt for damages or reorganize this or that, because she has not the money and she will not have the money until the bandit situation is cleaned up. That is all I have to say, Senator, unless you have some further questions.

The CHAIRMAN. I now regret a little that I referred to myself personally a few moments ago, in answer to your suggestion that I might, myself, have been wanting intervention in Mexico. I stated to you that my public speeches would disclose the fact as to what character of intervention I had advocated in Mexico at any time; and, having made reference to my own position, and to the fact that I had introduced a resolution of March 10, 1916, for your information I am going to now read into the record the resolution, and the only one, which I have ever introduced with reference to any class of intervention in Mexico, so that you may understand my ideas with reference to it. This resolution was introduced when the Pershing expedition was in Mexico, when the people of the United States were clamoring for action following the Columbus massacre, which occurred in my State. The purpose of the resolution, I think, will be disclosed by reading it, and I may say if you do not understand it after I read it, that the purpose of it was to limit positively and absolutely the action of the American Government in Mexico. Intervention was already a fact. Fourteen thousand troops were supposed to be in Mexico—Mr. Carranza says in contravention of his demands and wishes. For the purpose of limiting the character of the intervention—that expedition being there and intervention being an accomplished fact—I offered this resolution:

To authorize the President to take the necessary measures for the protection of American citizens and property in Mexico.

Whereas for three years a condition of anarchy has prevailed on and near our borders and particularly within the Republic of Mexico; and Whereas this Government has exercised the utmost patience and its best efforts through persuasion and representation to assist in restoring order in that unhappy country, and has seen its citizens traveling and doing business in Mexico murdered and outraged and their property destroyed, in violation of their legal rights under the comity of nations and customary and positive international law; and

Whereas this Government has had its flag dishonored and insulted in Mexico, and no reparation made or redress offered; and

Whereas the clear rights of American citizens have been abridged and denied in Mexico, and this Government can not consent to any further abridgement of the rights of American citizens in any respect; and

Whereas this Government is contending for nothing less high and sacred than the rights of humanity, which every government honors itself in respecting, and which no government is justified in resigning on behalf of those under its care and authority: Therefore be it—

I do not know whether there is anything in the preamble that will appear familiar to you, Mr. Lill, or not. I may say to you that this preamble is drawn from the messages of the President of the United States, either with reference to Germany or with reference to Mexico. The words are his, not mine.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to use the land and naval forces of the United States, and call into service five hundred thousand volunteers:

First. For the purpose of protecting the lives and property of Americans in Mexico, and as a necessary preliminary to such purpose the opening and maintenance of all rail and other lines of communication between the City of Mexico and the seaports of Mexico, as well as with the American border;

Second. For assisting in the prompt establishment of a constitutional government in Mexico and lending same sufficient support to enable the Mexicans themselves to organize and maintain adequate military force with which to disarm all bandits and murderers and restore order and peace.

Sec. 2. That we declare our purpose to be as above set forth, and not to be the acquisition or annexation of territory, the overthrow of laws, customs, or constitution, the making of war upon the Mexican people, or interference with Mexicans in the Government of their country; and we declare our further purpose to be the withdrawal of all our armed forces from Mexican territory immediately upon the accomplishment of the objects herein set forth, and to these ends we invite the cooperation of the Mexican people.

That is the only official action that I have ever even suggested should be taken, with reference to any character of intervention in Mexico; and this resolution was for the purpose of limiting the character of the occupation of any part of Mexican territory, or the character of intervention in Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. You made up this report in connection with your work for the American Metal Co.?

Mr. LILL. I started it in connection with that.

The CHAIRMAN. Who are the American Metal Co.?

Mr. LILL. That is a point I am very glad you brought up. I did not want to forget that. The American Metal Co. is a company—well, I don't know much about it, except that the alien property custodian appointed three or four members of the board of directors to represent 49 per cent of the capital stock held by Germans.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was the head of it?

Mr. LILL. I do not know, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was the American commissioner with whom you first went down to Mexico?

Mr. LILL. Henry Bruère. He is vice-president of the American Metal.

The CHAIRMAN. Was the American Metal Co. ever blacklisted in Mexico by this Government?

Mr. LILL. I think not, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It was blacklisted in Australia, a British possession, was it not?

Mr. LILL. I do not know. I know very little about the American Metal Co. I would much prefer that you would call Mr. Bruère on that. I could only say that during our first visit down there Mr. Bruère was on a leave of absence practically from the company, and I was not paid by Mr. Bruère; I was paid by the Mexican Government, and I was never retained by the American Metal Co. for any business until October, 1918. I went with the manager of the American Metal Co. in Mexico a number of times to see the British representative, and I think once or twice to see the Ambassador on very minor details.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you speak German?

Mr. LILL. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The American Metal Co. was a subsidiary corporation of the German Metallbank and Metallurgische Gesellschaft, of Frankfurt, was it not?

Mr. LILL. I do not know, Mr. Fall. I think it was, but I know very little about the American Metal Co. I knew that it was considered to be a German company when I went to Mexico. Before I go any further, Senator, I want to state that I was born in Chicago, Ill. My people—

The CHAIRMAN. I want to say, before you proceed, that no member of this committee has the slightest or remotest idea of—

Mr. LILL. I appreciate that, but I would like to put it in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly, but I wanted to disavow any reflection upon you.

Mr. LILL. My people were born in England. My father came over to the United States when he was 7 years old. As far back as 1780 that I know of we were English. I enlisted in the American Army in 1899, and served 2½ years and served 7 years after that in the Philippine Government. I wanted to go to France in this war. I made application to go, but it was represented to me from the State Department, I think, that I could render more effective service to the United States Government by going to Mexico on this work than by going to France.

Now, to get back to the American Metal Co. I never met any member of the company until I conferred with Mr. Bruère about this Mexican work. I met Mr. Loeb, I think. He expressed himself as very greatly interested in the matter and said he would like to see us do something.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that Mr. Loeb of the American Smelting & Refining Co.?

Mr. LILL. No; it is Mr. Loeb of the American Metal Co. I was down there, as I said, a year and a half altogether. I know Mr. Chamberlain, consul general, quite well. During the time that I was in Mexico City I conferred with Ambassador Fletcher at least twice a week to keep him advised as to our progress. You will remember I stated that President Wilson had approved our project before we went down, in a conference with Mr. Bruére.

The CHAIRMAN. That was Mr. Bruére of the American Metal Co.?

Mr. LILL. Formerly city chamberlain of New York and vice president of the American Metal. I know that Mr. Chamberlain insisted that all German employes of the company be removed from the service in Mexico, and that was complied with; that is, as far as I know. I was not interested in the American Metal, but I was very much interested to know what might arise out of it, and I was on the watch. I am glad to say—which statement is confirmed by Mr. Palmer in his last article in the Saturday Evening Post—that the American Metal Co. rendered very effective service to the United States Government in the war with Germany. During the time I occupied this position in Mexico I only had two requests.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you referring to Mr. Palmer's statement regarding the American Metal Co. in the United States?

Mr. LILL. In the United States, sir. I had two requests, the only two which I had. One was asking me if I could do something to stop the sale of liquor on the property on one of their mines, and the other request was merely to ask permission to pay the taxes in Mexico City, as they always had done, instead of sending the money up to Chihuahua. At that particular time they put a law into effect that the taxes had to be paid where the property was located, and the decree was gotten out so late there was not time enough to send the money out. Those were the only two things I ever did for the American Metal Co. in Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Except to start this report at their request?

Mr. LILL. Well, I went down to make an examination of the books of one of the subsidiary companies, but it was understood that I was to write a report, which was requested by Mr. Cabrera, of the work of the commission. It seemed to me when I got there that the most important matter confronting Mexico was its public debt, and the thing of biggest interest which would come up in the future was its debt; so I turned my attention upon this report.

The CHAIRMAN. In your explanation of the fact that you were not employed by the Mexican Government, answering Senator Brandegee, you spoke of this report of yours here, stating that you started in to do the work on this report for the American Metal Co. of the United States, of which Mr. Bruére was the vice president and a member of this commission, with whom you went down there first. Is that correct?

Mr. LILL. Well, there is a slight misstatement there, Senator, as to these reports. I went down and held the position of acting director and chief accountant and a member of the commission.

The CHAIRMAN. I am speaking of this report which you identified in answer to Senator Brandegee's question.

Mr. LILL. The "History and Present State of the Public Debt," I started that while in the pay of the American Metal Co.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, that is the only reason I am asking you about the American Metal Co.

Mr. LILL. But it was a side issue, Senator. I was engaged to do other work, and I completed it along in February or March of this year, which the Mexican Government will pay for.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you know it to be a fact that the American Metal Co. in Mexico was not blacklisted by the United States?

Mr. LILL. I do not know whether it was or not for a few days and then canceled. I conferred with Mr. Fletcher and Mr. Chamberlain constantly, and there was never any intimation that they were blacklisted or that there was any reason at all for not discussing matters with them if I chose.

The CHAIRMAN. I have here a photostatic copy of the report of the German mother company, giving a list of its companies. I notice in this list, which is in German, the American Metal Co. (Ltd.), New York; the Minerale y Metales Co. of Mexico; and the Australian Metal Co. (Ltd.), of London and Melbourne, etc., the American Metal Co. of New York being one of the subsidiaries. You say it was not blacklisted and you have made the statement here that it had been complimented by the Alien Property Custodian of the United States—that same company.

Mr. LILL. Well, I would not say complimented. He merely stated, I believe, in his last article that the American Metal Co. had rendered rather effective service to the United States Government.

The CHAIRMAN. And I asked you if you know whether it had been blacklisted in Australia.

Mr. LILL. I do not know, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You never had your attention called to a statement by Premier Hughes, of Australia, which appeared in the New York Times under date of December 29, 1918? He spoke of the great firm of Mertons as an agent of the enemy, and in the course of his remarks he says:

In America they pushed out another tentacle; there was a company called the American Metal Co. It was a company in which out of 70,000 called-up shares 54,000, or 49 per cent, were held by the Metallgesellschaft at Frankfurt, 27 per cent by Mertons of this place—

That is, of Australia, whom he claims were enemy Germans—and the remaining 18 per cent were held mostly by hyphenated Germans, a few being held by bona fide Americans, who were put right in the front of the shop window to deceive the credulous. * * * In Australia we turned them out and we interned their directors.

Mr. LILL. The Australian company, I believe, was the Mertons Co., from what you said. Whatever action was taken in Australia—

The CHAIRMAN. No; it was taken against the Metallgesellschaft. Mertons were their agents, just as Mertons held a part of the stock of the American Metal Co. here, the balance of it being held directly in Germany. The Australian Metal Co. (Ltd.), of London and Melbourne, was the name of the company. It was represented there in Australia by the Mertons, whom Premier Hughes said held a large part of the stock of the American Metal Co. in the United States, and 90 per cent of which, as you have stated, and which he corroborates, was held directly in Germany.

Mr. LILL. Well, the fact that Australia took certain action against the Australian company I could not take as a reason why similar action should have been taken here. I know that Mr. Bruere was in consultation with the State Department week after week. There was not a detail of that company's business that was not known by the American Government, and all its action taken by its officers was with the knowledge of the Government.

The Alien Property Custodian appointed three or four directors, very prominent men, and I know from my personal knowledge that Mr. Chamberlain, the consul general in Mexico City, was very active in ridding the company of German employees. The manager of the Compania Minerales was a Mr. Dieffenbach. While a German name, Mr. Dieffenbach was born in Newark. I think he is of the third or fourth generation and he is as good an American as anybody. The assistant manager was Mr. Gadd, an Englishman. That is all I know of the American Metal Co., except to go on record as saying that all the time I was there in a position to be of great assistance to the company I was never requested to do so. Not for the record, but in an executive session, I could go into details with you in regard to matters transacted with the Mexican Government and the American Government, through me, which would probably meet with your approval.

The CHAIRMAN. How is that, sir?

Mr. LILL. I say matters which I can not go into for the record, but I would go into with you in executive session, regarding the matters between the two governments in which I was active and in which Mr. Bruère was active.

The CHAIRMAN. The United States Federal Trade Commission made a report on Mr. Bruère, did it not?

Mr. LILL. Not Mr. Bruère; it was a report on what they call profiteering, which included various officials of the American Metal Co. I was present all one morning at the Federal Trade Commission when this was discussed.

The CHAIRMAN. That report shows—of course, I do not vouch for the truth of it—that Mr. Bruère participated in what the commission calls the "melon cutting" in the business of 1917 of the American Metal Co., which they call a German-owned company, to the extent of $82,810.

Mr. LILL. He is not the only official of the American Metal Co. mentioned, is he? Are there not others?

The CHAIRMAN. Not in that paragraph and I have only extracts from the report. There is a statement to the effect that Mr. Bruère participated to the extent of $82,810. I am simply interested in the portion of the report referring to the company as being German owned, and to Mr. Bruère's activities in connection with that. I refer particularly to the following:

Untill last April, when Mr. Bruère obtained a license to meet with the enemy upon neutral soil abroad and negotiate for the purchase of "control," the Alien Property Custodian held only 49 per cent of the German-owned American Metal Company Limited.

Do you know whether during the time that you were there work was stopped on any of the American Metal Co.'s properties in Mexico?

Mr. LILL. I do not know, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know where they are situated in Mexico?

Mr. LILL. Yes; I think in Mapimi, just outside Monterey.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, generally, they are all over Mexico; you spoke of paying taxes for their Chihuahua owned properties.

Mr. LILL. Yes. I do not think they suffered very much down there by reason of having their work stopped, and I encountered some criticism down there against the company by reason of the fact that they had purchased properties during the insurrection or during all the time this trouble was going on, while other companies had shut down. From what I could see down there the buying of these properties, or any profit which they may have made in that way, was because of the fact that they were practically the only people down there who understood the situation and had enough sand to back it up and take a chance. I think it is true that one or two of the men connected with the company knew Carranza when he was a boy.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you leave Mexico?

Mr. LILL. I left Mexico about December 26 or 27, 1918.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you happen to leave that country?

Mr. LILL. I had concluded my work.

The CHAIRMAN. Was the Mexican press taking any interest in your work there?

Mr. LILL. Very little, sir. I think the reason why I had considerable success was in subordinating the American personnel of the commission and putting all these things up through the department so that the men themselves could get credit for it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the "Excelsior" in Mexico an important paper?

Mr. LILL. It was at the time I was there.

The CHAIRMAN. Has your accounting system been retained in Mexico?

Mr. LILL. I can not tell that. I am in touch with some of my former employees and it has been changed in some minor ways, I understand, but not to its advantage.

The CHAIRMAN. I notice an extract here in the original Spanish from the Excelsior of June 21, 1919. I have the original, and a clipping from the paper and a translation of it. The translation is to the effect that by order of the comptroller's department, the modern accounting system which was installed by American experts will be abandoned, and the old system again used. It is stated that many of the old Government employees have been unable to learn the new accounting system. On the same date it appears that there was an editorial comment to the same effect in the Excelsior.

Mr. LILL. Well, of course, Senator, you place so little reliance upon newspaper reports that you will appreciate what that is worth.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the reason I asked you whether your work was being carried on or whether it had been abandoned.

Mr. LILL. As you know, the papers in Mexico City all back certain people.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom is the Excelsior backing?

Mr. LILL. I presume it is back of Pancho Gonzales, the controller, but about that time I had a letter stating that there had been a series of articles running in opposition to the controller, which also tended to confirm that in a way, saying that the controller had become a slave of routine. I think they ran it about 10 days and criticized the controller very severely for not carrying out our recommendations, or loosening up on some of them.

The CHAIRMAN. You have been away from there a year since June?

Mr. LILL. Since January of this year.

The CHAIRMAN. I say, you have been away from there since June of this year?

Mr. LILL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. I have extracts from El Universal and Excelsior, showing various matters of interest in connection with the Mexican financial situation, the counterfeiting of stamps, etc.; Mr. Cabrera, for instance, passing upon embezzlements in the month of March, as reported in "Excelsior" of July 15, 1919, stated: "Infractions of the federal stamp law run into the thousands. During the past week, Luis Cabrera, with the assistance of many clerks, passed upon 60,000 of these cases. The stamp laws are regarded as defective in many ways and it is probable that new regulations will be up in'o effect to prevent the federal government from being defrauded by persons who do not affix the proper amount of stamps provided by law."

There are a great many of the clippings to which I will not call your attention, because they are nearly all of very recent date. I have had them gathered for the purpose of showing the present situation, but as they are subsequent to the date of your leaving Mexico City, I will not direct your attention to them.

Mr. LILL. Well, I sincerely hope that a newspaper paragraph will not be taken as evidence—

The CHAIRMAN. It will be taken as evidence, I think, generally, Mr. Lill, as much as general statements of one who does not know the facts will be taken as a foundation for the ascertainment of facts. For instance, I was questioning you a while ago as to the basis for certain general statements. I have no doubt, of course, that the general conclusions which you may draw, and state here represent your convictions, but they do not constitute proof. There is a great difference between evidence and proof, as you know. You may be entirely sincere in making a general statement, and if your attention is called to specific facts you might ascertain from those facts, if they were established to your satisfaction, that your conclusions were erroneous. Now, the newspaper articles will be treated in exactly the same way. They are evidence; they are not proof. If they are corroborated by other evidence they may go to establish proof.

Mr. LILL. On that basis, Senator, it seems rather unjust to put that paragraph in the record. It is not proof, or even evidence.

The CHAIRMAN. It is evidence just as much as your general statements are evidence. It is not proof.

Mr. LILL. This is not the only government I have worked for. I have done a great many government jobs, and I set out with a hundred per cent ideal and I generally succeed in getting possibly 60 per cent, and after I leave I am satisfied if they retain 20 or 25 per cent. That is about the way it works out in Government work.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I want to get a little more than 50 per cent, if I possibly can, on an average, in this hearing. You asked me a while ago if I am a lawyer. I have been engaged in the practice of law for some years, and I have made it a point in the trial of my cases, just as I have made it a point in all the speeches I have made with reference to Mexico, to base them upon facts which I could prove. My conclusions might be erroneous, but the facts which I have given with reference to Mexico I defy anyone to controvert. I have been talking about Mexican affairs more or less for seven or eight years, and I defy a contradiction of any fact which I have stated with reference to Mexico. My conclusions may not agree with the conclusions of many people, yourself as well as others, and they are also subject to criticism, but when I attempt to give a fact I give a fact which I have investigated and checked up to the very best of my ability before I ever give it publicity.

Mr. LILL. Of course, the statements which I have given you regarding the debt, I presume, are considered as statements of fact?

The CHAIRMAN. In so far as they go, I have no doubt they are statements of fact, and I have no desire to reflect upon anything that you have stated even as a conclusion, or even to intimate that I do not think you are perfectly and entirely sincere. Nor do I suppose that the statement made by Mr. Cabrera with regard to his activities as published in the Excelsior in Mexico City would go uncontradicted if it were not true.

Mr. LILL. There are all kinds of statements down there made all the time. They are not contradicted because they are not important.

The CHAIRMAN. But you have been sitting right here testifying to your conclusions, based upon newspaper statements, made in the United States, to the effect that the citizens of the United States are demanding intervention, and still your information was derived from newspaper stories. In one instance you give credit, and in the other, when Mexican newspapers are cited, you think they should not be given any consideration.

Mr. LILL. Well, what particular purpose is served? Is it the intention or indication that my entire testimony is to be disregarded because the Excelsior made a statement?

The CHAIRMAN. Not at all.

Mr. LILL. That is what effect it has on getting into the record.

The CHAIRMAN. What?

Mr. LILL. An irresponsible paragraph of a Mexican newspaper going into the record. What difference does that make regarding my testimony? I came before you, Senator, as an American citizen giving you the very best information I have. Now I have given it to you.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly, and we accept it. I asked you when you left Mexico City. You stated when you left there. I also asked you if your system is still in force and effect in Mexico. As I understand you, you have said that in so far as you know it is partly in effect, or has been possibly partly changed.

I then read your statement from a paper which you say is one of the large papers of Mexico City, to the effect that "by order of the comptroller's department, the modern accounting system which was installed in the federal government by American experts, will be abandoned, and the old system again used. It is stated that many of the old government employees have been unable to learn the new accounting system." There is no reflection whatever upon you.

This was in June of this year, and I asked you whether your system is in effect now, and you, apparently, did not know. There is no conflict between this statement here and the evidence you have given. Of course, there is no reflection upon the weight of your evidence given here. You say you are not in the employ of the Mexican Government; you left there sometime in January or February of this year, I believe, and it is stated by the Mexican press in June that the system that had been installed down there by the American experts is being, or has been abandoned. What conflict is there between that and your testimony?

Mr. LILL. Well, I very seriously doubt whether the statement in the newspaper is true. From what information I get from men who were formerly my subordinates, I am quite sure there were some changes. I recommended some changes myself. As to whether the system has been abandoned, I doubt it very seriously.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, that is a perfectly proper statement for you to make, and the former statement you made when you inquired the purpose of putting this in the record, and intimated that it was to controvert your evidence, was an entirely improper statement. It was not warranted by anything done here, or put in evidence. The statement you are now making is a perfectly proper one. You have been granted all the latitude that you asked, and you have been allowed to make any kind of statement you wished. The only question that has been raised as to any of your statements has been in connection with matters upon which you based your conclusions. I am not attempting to discredit any witnesses coming before this committee.

Mr. LILL. It would not be the first time that a system I have installed had not been carried out in all its details the way I have planned it.

(Thereupon, at 1.30 o'clock p. m., the committee adjourned subject to the call of the chairman.)

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to the call of the chairman, at 12 o'clock noon, in room 128, Senate Office Building, Senator Albert B. Fall presiding.

Present: Senators Fall (chairman) and Smith.

Present also: F. J. Kearful, counsel.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

TESTIMONY OF H. T. OLIVER.

(The witness was duly sworn by the chairman.)

Mr. KEARFUL. State your name, Mr. Oliver.

Mr. OLIVER. H. T. Oliver.

Mr. KEARFUL. Your place of residence?

Mr. OLIVER. Mexico City and New York.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your profession?

Mr. OLIVER. I am an engineer; graduate of Sheffield Scientific School, Yale University.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your present occupation?

Mr. OLIVER. President of the Oliver American Trading Co., engaged in mineral export and import business and transportation to and from the United States and points in Mexico, handling explosives and agricultural implements and general merchandise.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you acquainted with Maj. R. B. Sutton?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is his business?

Mr. OLIVER. He is the president of the American Gun Co.

Mr. KEARFUL. What, if any, arrangements have you and Mr. Sutton recently made to furnish arms and ammunition to the Carranza Government?

Mr. OLIVER. My company has made a contract with the American Gun Co. to purchase 5,000 Mausers for delivery to the Constitutional Government of Mexico under license, of course, from the American Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of license?

Mr. OLIVER. It is a War Trade Board license which was granted September 16 to the Mexican Government for 15,000 guns and 15,000,000 rounds of ammunition.

Senator SMITH. What is the American Gun Co.? Where is it located?

Mr. OLIVER. It has its main office, or one office, at 149 Broadway, New York City.

Senator SMITH. Where is its manufactory? Are they mere dealers in guns or manufacturers of guns?

Mr. OLIVER. I am not at all acquainted with them excepting they have stated they are assemblers and general dealers.

Mr. KEARFUL. When was this permit granted?

Mr. OLIVER. September 16 this year.

Mr. KEARFUL. Has any change been made since then with reference to the control of exports of munitions to Mexico?

Mr. OLIVER. There has been no official change that I have heard of; but in reference to this license I am informed that the State Department has asked the American Gun Co. not to make this shipment to us. In other words, to hold it up temporarily.

Mr. KEARFUL. From whom do you get that information?

Mr. OLIVER. From Mr. R. B. Sutton in a letter to me dated October 14, I think it is.

Mr. KEARFUL. What further, if any, information have you with reference to the matter of that shipment being taken up with the State Department at that time?

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Sutton has told me personally, and has also corroborated this by a letter, that he has had the matter up with the State Department, Mr. Lansing, on October 9, and that as a result of the interview Mr. Lansing asked him to hold up the shipment temporarily pending decision from higher authority.

Mr. KEARFUL. Does Mr. Sutton in that letter give the details of the conference that he had in the State Department?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you read that from the letter, please?

The CHAIRMAN. Are you going to put the letter in the record? If not, I want the stenographer to take it down as you read it; or would you just as soon file it?

Mr. OLIVER. I have no objection at all, as far as I am concerned, to having the whole letter placed in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. Just read the letter, then.

Mr. OLIVER (reading):

OCTOBER 14, 1910.

OLIVER AMERICAN TRADING Co.,
Eagle Pass, Tex.

DEAR MR. OLIVER: Owing to the injury to my hand, the consequent inability to write, and the lack of a stenographer out in the country, I was unable to write Saturday or Sunday.

You will find herewith the permit for the merchandise in question.

I can not express my chagrin over the delay and obstacles that have been temporarily put in the way of making the shipment as promised on our part.

Some months back, when your company entered into negotiations with us in regard to the shipment of guns to Mexico, I personally went to Washington and took the matter up with the State Department in regard to securing a permit.

At that time, to be exact, the first week in February, 1910, I talked with Mr. Frank Polk, the Acting Secretary of State, and Mr. Bonz Long, the Chief of the Bureau of Mexican Affairs. I was at that time informed that if the goods shipped were for the recognized Government of Mexico, if I could show an official order from his excellency, President Carranza, and if our company was protected against loss by the deposit of the purchase price in the United States, that under those conditions the shipment would be favorably considered.

All further negotiations between us have been on the above-mentioned basis—we were acting in good faith that our Government would certainly support and consider the Government in Mexico that they had acknowledged, recognized, and previously permitted to obtain goods of such class.

You on your part were most certainly within your rights in the negotiations you carried on with the Carranza government, and no one can for one minute question your good faith or loyalty both to the United States and your clients, the recognized Government of Mexico.

In the month of September just past I was again in Washington to arrange with the Export Division of the War Trade Board for the shipment of rifles to Carranza, it being our understanding and belief that these rifles were most necessary to enable President Carranza to equip his forces so that he could better protect and safeguard the lives and interests of American citizens and property holders in Mexico.

(I had also just previous to this been discussing with Mr. Denegre, the Mexican consul in New York City, the possibility of our obtaining a permit for the Mexican Government to ship from New York to Vera Cruz certain 7-mm. ammunition that they had purchased several years ago and had in storage here.)

After my return to New York we formally entered into a contract with your company for the sale and delivery of 5,000 rifles, and received from your New York manager part payment in advance on the first lot of 1,000.

On September 30, 1919, the entire control, issuance of permits for export, etc., into Mexico passed into the hands of the Secretary of State.

On Tuesday, October 8, I went to Washington for a conference with the Secretary of State, Mr. Lansing, in regard to our making the shipment. That meeting was at 10 o'clock Wednesday morning, October 9, and to which I was accompanied by a United States Senator and a Member of the House of Representatives. Mr. Lansing received us very graciously, but said he desired to have present our American ambassador to Mexico, which said ambassador, Mr. Fletcher, entered from an adjoining room. The policy of the State Department, it appears at the present time, is to refer all matters and action in regard to Mexico to Mr. Fletcher. It being assured that having more or less recently returned from Mexico he should be thoroughly conversant with the situation there and he is kept sojourning in Washington for that valuable reason.

Mr. Fletcher flatly refused to recommend or sanction the shipment of any munitions, rifles, etc., to Carranza. The matter was then argued pro and con for over a half an hour, Mr. Lansing finally deciding that the matter must be held up temporarily pending decision from higher authority. Then I explained at length how there was now ready for shipment 800 guns. That so much had been paid in advance; the expense and outlay that both you and our company had been put to. That, further, there had been definitely arranged through Gen. Barragan, President Carranza's chief of staff, for an escort to be at the border to receive these goods and safeguard their delivery to the capital. That having gone so far, the bad impression that such failure to deliver would create and the loss entailed. Further, that Piedras Negras as a point of entry was positively and securely held by Carranza, that there could not probably be an accident in the delivery of the guns so that they would fall into the hands of bandits, and also I pointed out the successful operation of trains by your company.

In all of this argument I was most ably supported by the gentlemen who accompanied me, and where Mr. Lansing might have permitted the shipment of 800 guns now pending action on the part of the order, Mr. Fletcher effectually stopped the shipment of even this small lot by ridiculing the ability of the Carranza forces to protect the shipment and stating that these guns were more apt to be used against Americans than in safeguarding the lives and interests of Americans now in Mexico; Mr. Fletcher's talk certainly killed all chances of immediate shipment.

I then asked Mr. Lansing if we were definitely prohibited from making the shipment and carrying out our contract, and if we should refund the payment made, tear up the contract, return the order and charge the matter up to profit and loss. Mr. Lansing answered me directly and positively "No," that while we were not permitted to make the shipment immediately as contemplated, that action was merely temporary and that in a short while we would be permitted to make the shipment and delivery across border as now arranged.

Believe me, Mr. Oliver. I do appreciate your embarrassment and position in the matter and most certainly we will not let the matter stop and rest where it is, nor will we let you suffer from any lack of effort on our part.

While it is not for me to make any prognostications as to political conditions in Washington, it is my belief that the department is merely waiting for a definite statement and decision in regard to these matters from our esteemed President, and I have every hope that the work will be resumed in a very short time and, as the Secretary states, the delay is temporary.

We will keep you advised by telegraph.

Sincerely, yours,

This was sent to me at Eagle Pass because I had intended to leave New York for Eagle Pass, and then I was called back on company business, du Pont business.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was signed by R. B. Sutton?

Mr. OLIVER. Signed by Mr. R. B. Sutton.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember who the United States Senator and Member of the House of Representatives who accompanied Mr. Sutton were?

Mr. OLIVER. I do not. I never asked Mr. Sutton.

Mr. KEARFUL. He speaks of your embarrassment and position in the matter. What embarrassment do you suffer?

Mr. OLIVER. Well, it has placed me in a very embarrassing position because I have informed the Carranza government that we had this license, that we had 800 guns ready to ship, or we would be ready to ship in just a few days as soon as they were packed, and then I had to inform the Carranza government that I am compelled to hold up the shipments.

Mr. KEARFUL. What reason can you give to the Carranza government for that?

Mr. OLIVER. The only reason that I can give the Carranza government is what is contained in this letter, that our Government, or our State Department, has asked us to hold up this shipment, although acknowledging the fact that we had this license issued in good order.

Mr. KEARFUL. Since this letter was written on October 14, do you know what further efforts have been made to induce the State Department to permit the shipment?

Mr. OLIVER. I do not know what further efforts have been made, but I know that Mr. Sutton has been working very hard to endeavor to obtain permission to go ahead with the shipments, at least a part of them.

Mr. KEARFUL. How lately have you spoken to Mr. Sutton about it?

Mr. OLIVER. Just yesterday.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did he say with regard to the success of his efforts?

Mr. OLIVER. He said that there seemed to be no hope of immediate action.

Mr. KEARFUL. And he places the responsibility for that upon statements made by Mr. Fletcher?

Mr. OLIVER. He puts it very frankly right up to Mr. Fletcher. The point is that it is a very—

Mr. KEARFUL. Just a moment. You are doing business in Mexico at the present time?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, sir; we are operating trains there weekly, continuously, several places throughout the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. Does your apprehended embarrassment result from the effect it may have upon your business if you are not permitted to keep your contract with Carranza?

Mr. OLIVER. It will certainly reflect very seriously on my good faith and the good faith of our organization, and while I am sure that I can convince the Carranza government that we have done everything in our power to deliver the guns, yet I am embarrassed by the fact that I can not deliver them.

Mr. KEARFUL. What effect would that have upon the feeling of the Mexican Government toward the American Government or toward Americans?

Mr. OLIVER. It will not help any friendly relations. That is my opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all you now have to testify to, is it, Mr. Oliver, at the present moment?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well, sir.

(Whereupon the committee adjourned, subject to the call of the chairman.)

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
New York, N. Y.

(The following testimony was taken at New York City, November 1, 1919, in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq.:)

STATEMENT OF MR. WILLIAM BAIN MITCHELL.

(The witness was duly sworn by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., duly authorized thereto by order of the subcommittee.)

Mr. KEARFUL. State your full name.

Mr. MITCHELL. William Bain Mitchell.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your occupation?

Mr. MITCHELL. Banker.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long have you lived in Mexico?

Mr. MITCHELL. Twenty-one years.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was your business there?

Mr. MITCHELL. Banker; connected with the Banco de Londres y Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was your position with that bank?

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you want dates?

Mr. KEARFUL. No; what was your position at the bank?

Mr. MITCHELL. The reason I ask that is because from 1896 to 1898 I was junior; 1898 to 1902 accountant in a branch in Lerdo; 1902 to 1908 manager of branch in Torreon; 1908 to 1917 general manager in the head office at Mexico City.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the unit of value in the Mexican monetary system?

Mr. MITCHELL. The Mexican peso, gold or silver.

Mr. KEARFUL. Prior to 1905?

Mr. MITCHELL. It was fixed in 1905 by the recommendation of the monetary commission to the Government at 50 cents United States currency at the time that what is termed the gold basis was brought into Mexico. Although the basis of 50 cents United States currency or, to put it in easy language, 2 to 1 (2 pesos to $1 American), was fixed the rate of exchange was really 49.80, which practically was current.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long was that rate of exchange maintained?

Mr. MITCHELL. From the installation in 1905 this rate, with slight variations, kept up until March, 1913.

Mr. KEARFUL. Just following the fall of Madero.

Mr. MITCHELL. The break occurring immediately after the fall of the Madero government.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did it recover subsequently?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; it recovered before September, 1913.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did it finally break without recovery?

Mr. MITCHELL. It broke with no show of recovery in August, 1914.

Mr. KEARFUL. What event occurred at that time?

Mr. MITCHELL. This was brought about by the entrance of the Carranza troops headed by Gen. Obregon, who brought in paper money with him, said paper money having no reserve or legal foundation.

Mr. KEARFUL. What paper money existed up to that time in Mexican finances?

Mr. MITCHELL. The only paper money was the bills or currency of legally established banks operating under charters granted by a duly installed Congress and Senate of the Republic of Mexico or those operating under the banking laws of Mexico which were brought in in the time of Gen. Porfirio Diaz through the advice of his able finance minister, Mr. Limantour.

Mr. KEARFUL. How were those bank notes secured?

Mr. MITCHELL. These bank notes were secured by having reserves in gold or silver.

Mr. KEARFUL. At what rates?

Mr. MITCHELL. $1 in gold and silver to $2, with the exception of two banks.

Mr. KEARFUL. Which two?

Mr. MITCHELL. The Banco Nacional de Mexico and the Banco Nuevo Leon, which had a special charter to issue in the ratio of 3 to 1.

Mr. KEARFUL. When was that ratio of 2 to 1 changed?

Mr. MITCHELL. March 30, 1914.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the cause of it?

Mr. MITCHELL. At the time that President Huerta required money to help him, as he said, to get funds for the purpose of stamping out the Carranza revolution, and after he had called various meetings of the different bankers in Mexico City, who pointed out to him the fact that if they should advance to him the sums of money he required the credit of the banks and the country would be spoiled, as it was impossible for them to let him have the amounts he demanded seeing that they, owing to the revolution, had been unable to collect the large sums due unto them, were unable to issue more currency. And after consulting with his minister of finance and his cabinet he informed the banks that if they would let him have the amount which he asked for, namely, ₱50,000,000, he would bring in a law—which he did—allowing those banks which could only issue in the ratio of 2 to 1 to issue in the ratio of 3 to 1.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the quota required from the Banco de Londres, of which you were manager?

Mr. MITCHELL. The full quota of the Banco de Londres was ₱11,500,000, the first ₱3,500,000 having been given as a temporary loan, the second ₧8,000,000 being demanded at the time the proposition outlined above was brought out, and even, although the Banco de Londres protested against this high ratio, the board of directors were finally convinced, or obliged, to accept same.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was the Mexican minister of finance at that time?

Mr. MITCHELL. De la Lama.

Mr. KEARFUL. What occurred when you protested against the quota that was assigned to your bank?

Mr. MITCHELL. When the deponent went to the office of Mr. de la Lama, accompanied by his counsellor at law and pointed out to said Mr. de la Lama, the minister of finance, that it was impossible for the Bank of London to take up such a heavy quota, which was all out of proportion to the amounts allocated to other banks, he was informed that both he and his counsel were under arrest, and that he could not be released until he should call a quorum of the board of directors of his bank to the office where he was being held prisoner to discuss the matter. He got all facilities of telephoning and was able to get the necessary quorum of the board of directors, and after long discussion the board of directors acceded to the desire of the minister of finance or, it might be better said, to the desire of the Government then in power.

Mr. KEARFUL. When that was done you were released, I suppose?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; as soon as the board of directors verbally consented to this the deponent and his counsel were allowed to leave in liberty and go to their homes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What benefits, if any, did Huerta and his officials receive from this deal personally, if you know?

Mr. MITCHELL. Although a part of the money which was borrowed from the banks in this arbitrary manner may have been used in paying troops and governmental expenses the deponent is positive that a great part of the money was received by members of the cabinet of Gen. Huerta and by the military officers under him. Soon after the money was lent and some time before the fall of President Huerta the deponent had the opportunity to see that packages of bank notes which had been delivered to the treasury of the Government were returned to the bank of which he was manager with the purpose of buying drafts on Europe in favor of different members of the government of President Huerta. Deponent, however, must admit that in no case did he see a draft bought in favor of Huerta.

Mr. KEARFUL. Generally speaking, how do those operations which you have last mentioned compare with the operations of the Carranza officials subsequently in regard to personal benefits, without going into a description, which we will come to later—were they more or less?

Mr. MITCHELL. I had more opportunity to see and know any operations in which the men around Carranza, the actual President of Mexico, remitted large sums of money to other countries, more especially to the United States, even although they used special agents to endeavor to cover up their operations.

Mr. KEARFUL. In a general way, were those operations larger or smaller than those of the Huerta officials?

Mr. MITCHELL. Much larger.

Mr. KEARFUL. How do they compare?

Mr. MITCHELL. In comparison the operations of the Huerta officials, which all came at the finish of the Huerta régime, are small compared to those of the Carranza régime, because those of the Carranza régime began their operations immediately after their entry into power.

Mr. KEARFUL. And have they continued it ever since?

Mr. MITCHELL. Until the time deponent left Mexico in 1917 they were being continued, and during a visit he made in June, 1918, he had the opportunity of seeing that they had not terminated.

Mr. KEARFUL. Now, with reference to the revolutionary paper money that was brought in by Gen. Obregon, are you familiar with the different issues of that kind of money by the revolutionary chiefs?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Can you enumerate the different issues by the Carranza revolutionary army?

Mr. MITCHELL. I can enumerate the different issues that were made in Mexico City as well as issues that have been made in the north and which were brought in as legal tender or, as they say in Spanish, de curso forzoso.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the various issues called that were issued under the authority of Carranza?

Mr. MITCHELL. Before his arrival in Mexico City he had issued different paper and on arrival of his troops in Mexico City they brought two issues with them, one being the issue of Monclova and bills of Chihuahua, the first being denominated by the populace as sabana (or sheets), and the other being dos caras (or two faces).

Mr. KEARFUL. Then what other issues followed those two?

Mr. MITCHELL. In September, 1914, Carranza decreed an interior debt of 130,000,000 pesos and issued paper currency to this denomination, said currency being called Vera Cruz bills.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were those Vera Cruz bills designed to take up any of the previous issues?

Mr. MITCHELL. They were supposedly designed or issued with this object and decrees were published exacting that possessors of the other two currencies mentioned should present their holdings of same to the national treasury so that they might be taken up and canceled. But the holders of said paper were greatly surprised when, on presenting same, which they had received in good faith, and in many cases had been obliged to receive at the point of a gun, they were called falsifications and were destroyed in their presence, the holders receiving nothing in compensation but abuse.

Mr. KEARFUL. What subsequent issue of paper money was issued by Carranza?

Mr. MITCHELL. The 1st of June, 1916, the next issue was made called infalsificables.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the operation in connection with the issuance of those bills, in connection with the taking up of the Vera Cruz issue?

Mr. MITCHELL. The decrees referring to the issue of this class of paper informed the holders of the Vera Cruz money that they had to present same to the national treasury and receive 1 peso infalsificable for every 10 pesos of the Vera Cruz bills which they held, but when presenting the Vera Cruz money in any large quantity they received certificates stating that they would receive payment at the ratio mentioned at stated periods for three years, said periodical payments being made due June 30 and the end of December of each year.

The infalsificable money was issued with a value of 20 cents national gold (Mexican gold), equivalent to 10 cents United States currency.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long was that ratio maintained?

Mr. MITCHELL. This ratio was maintained for about three weeks, during which time the industries and mining companies who required this paper to enable them to pay their laborers had to go to the national treasury and purchase the paper at this price, paying for same with Mexican gold coins in the proportion mentioned or with direct drafts on the United States at the proportion mentioned above, the treasury department, however, being very careful that they only accepted drafts of banks or companies of first-class standing, otherwise certified checks.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know the amount of this issue of infalsificables? To offer you a suggestion, Mr. Middleton in his recent book entitled "Industrial Mexico" states that it was nearly 540,000,000 pesos.

Mr. MITCHELL. I was going to jump to 750,000,000. It was supposed to be decreed 500,000,000, but those who were in Mexico City are satisfied that there was about 750,000,000, and the only way they could get any check would be to find the amount that the American Bank Note Co. printed.

Mr. KEARFUL. They were all printed by the American Bank Note Co. of New York?

Mr. MITCHELL. Even although this is difficult, in view of the fact that the bills of 2 pesos and 1 peso were printed in Mexico and the American Bank Note Co. only having printed the bills of 5 pesos or other higher denominations.

Mr. KEARFUL. To what point did the value of this issue fall?

Mr. MITCHELL. The lowest point I can remember is 2½ cents United States currency.

Mr. KEARFUL. For 1 peso?

Mr. MITCHELL. For 1 peso. But while it was still used as a medium of foreign exchange, it became so depreciated that even the workmen employed by the Carranza government, on finding that they could not utilize it to buy a cup of coffee, took all their week's earnings and piled same in a heap and burned it near to the President's palace.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then do I understand you that this issue of bills called infalsificables became practically worthless?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is it. Nobody would have them. And for this reason they had to bring in the decree bringing in gold and silver, the Government first of all having demanded that all taxes, customs duties, and everything should be paid in gold and silver.

Mr. KEARFUL. In addition to these issues that you have mentioned were there any other issues by the various generals operating under Carranza?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; there were.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was any provision made for taking those up in any manner?

Mr. MITCHELL. None at all. The issues of different generals, among which there was an issue called issue of Jalisco by Obregon, were never really recognized by the Carranza government, and the only specimens that the deponent saw were held as curiosities.

In addition to the issues of paper money in Mexico City, as all kinds of small change in silver or copper disappeared, the Carranza government was obliged to issue cardboards called cartones.

Mr. KEARFUL. Representing fractional currency?

Mr. MITCHELL. Representing fractional currency from 5 to 50 cent pieces—5, 10, 20, 25, 50.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know the aggregate amount of those issues?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; nobody ever knew.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then, as I understand you, practically all of the issues of paper money by Carranza and his generals, and afterwards by the Carranza government, were all repudiated and became absolutely valueless?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; with the exception of the infalsificable.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, that issue finally became worthless, did it not?

Mr. MITCHELL. It became worthless to the public holding it, but the government, in a spirit of generosity and with the object of withdrawing same from the public, as they stated in the newspapers, promulgated a law obliging taxpayers and customs payers to give 1 peso infalsificable along with 1 peso of Mexican gold on the sums they were paying. They did not, however, reduce in the least the amount of the taxes they had placed as being payable in gold and silver. On the contrary, they seemed to have increased same with the object of withdrawing more of this issue.

Mr. KEARFUL. Upon what class of the people of Mexico did the burden of this repudiation of currency fall?

Mr. MITCHELL. The working classes.

Mr. KEARFUL. How about the small merchants? Did it fall more heavily on them than on the large operators?

Mr. MITCHELL. The minute I say the working class, that is the great part of the population of the country. The small merchant also was heavily oppressed, because he, receiving this paper in good faith in payment for his merchandise, had to accumulate a certain amount before he could purchase exchange to send to get more merchandise, and when the currency was repudiated he was caught with that money, finding his stock depleted and unable to replace it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did people have to accept this money? This acceptance was enforced as legal tender for all debts, was it not?

Mr. MITCHELL. The acceptance of this money was enforced as legal tender by decrees or laws, and anyone refusing to receive same in payment of debts, even although they could prove that they had given actual gold or silver in the ratio mentioned at the commencement of this deposition, they had to accept the different currencies or suffer the consequence of going to jail and being heavily fined.

Mr. KEARFUL. And the fines that were levied, were they payable in the same currency?

Mr. MITCHELL. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. They had to be paid in gold or silver?

Mr. MITCHELL. All fines that the deponent knows about were demanded in gold or silver, the officials of the Carranza government in charge of imposing those fines and collecting same laughingly remarking that in collecting fines they required "real money."

Mr. KEARFUL. Was your bank forced to take this money?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; heavily.

Mr. KEARFUL. What resistance did you make to it and what occurred when you resisted?

Mr. MITCHELL. The officers of the bank with which I was connected in many cases refused to receive the paper money mentioned and, therefore, had to suffer fines, and on one occasion, in June, 1916, the whole of the board of directors and the principal management of the bank were put in the penitentiary and kept there for five days.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you acquainted with a German bank in Mexico City at that time?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the name of that bank?

Mr. MITCHELL. Sud Americanische Bank.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that a branch of a banking establishment in Berlin?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; the Sud Americanische.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did this bank enjoy any privileges that were withheld from the other banks in these transactions?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; this bank in a great many cases was utilized by the finance department of the Carranza government for the purpose of buying back at a lower rate of exchange, from 2½ to 4 cents, the issue of infalsificables which had been made at the ration of 10 cents American currency in July, 1916. They were also utilized in a transaction to endeavor to get arms and munitions from Chile when the United States Government refused to allow the arms to enter Mexico, and it is a matter of record that with this objection at one time they had $300,000 of United States currency deposited with them.

Mr. KEARFUL. What became of the reserves of gold and silver that were held by the banks of issue?

Mr. MITCHELL. After the Carranza government decreed, September, 1916, that the charters of the banks of issue were nullified and that a committee from the government would enter said banks with the idea of liquidating same and preserving the gold and silver to pay off the obligations of the banks, orders were given these government committees to deliver the funds to the national treasury where said reserves were utilized in paying troops and other governmental expenses, this being commonly or vulgarly called looting.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is known as the looting of the banks in Mexico?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did this committee undertake to make collections of the assets of these banks?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; to be able to liquidate the banks they had to collect the assets of said banks, which consisted in amounts due to the various institutions by their debtors for short-time or long-time loans and as the funds were received from the debtors of the banks the same were taken to the treasury of the nation and utilized for the purposes mentioned above. In fact, the deponent knows that in a great many cases during this liquidation and to permit a liquidating committee to get the cash quicker, even the furniture of various banks was sold to the highest bidder, and to his knowledge in a great many cases the highest bidders were employees of the Government and the money thus obtained was used for the purposes mentioned above.

Mr. KEARFUL. These collections were also made in foreign countries, were they not, or attempted to be made?

Mr. MITCHELL. They have not been attempted so far.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have they attempted it here in New York?

Mr. MITCHELL. An attempt has been made in New York since October or November, 1917.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there a lawsuit now pending in regard to that?

Mr. MITCHELL. There is a lawsuit pending in the courts of New York City for the funds of the Bank of London and Mexico, which were deposited with the Bank of British North America, which was amalgamated with the Bank of Montreal in 1918; but so far, in spite of the representative of the Mexican Government having put an attachment on said funds, he has not got a court decision.

Mr. KEARFUL. What would be the attitude of this Government and the courts of this Government if the Mexican officials should be permitted to recover the assets of the Bank of London in Mexico City?

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not a competent international lawyer to take up this point, but judging things by common sense and by a sense of equity I consider that if the courts of the United States permit such a thing other nations whose subjects are owners of the shares of banks in Mexico would have a good right to claim on the Government of the United States or on the courts of the same that the amounts which they had allowed to be delivered over in this manner should be returned to the legal owners, namely, the shareholders of the banks thus despoiled.

Mr. KEARFUL. Would you regard such action on the part of the courts of this Nation as making those courts party to the looting of the banks?

Mr. MITCHELL. As stated before, from common sense and a sense of equity I should say so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was the Mexican minister of finance at the time of the looting of the banks?

Mr. MITCHELL. The minister of finance was Mr. Luis Cabrera, who at various times was absent either with troops or with Mr. Carranza to other points of the Republic or on missions for the Carranza Government, such as the one which he made to the Argentine Republic to the celebrated convention which was held there during the summer of 1918.

Mr. KEARFUL. And who acted in his absence?

Mr. MITCHELL. During his absence Mr. Rafael Nieto, subsecretary of finance, held the title acting minister of finance.

Mr. KEARFUL. At the time of these occurrences did you have any conversation with Luis Cabrera about the injustice of it?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. State what he said.

Mr. MITCHELL. In May, 1917, I had a conversation with Mr. Cabrera in the presence of Mr. Nieto and pointed out the fact that the orders of his department were absolutely against the letter of the laws signed by Mr. Carranza in regard to conserving the reserves of gold and silver in the banks for the benefit of the creditors, and he cynically replied that "Necessity knows no law and we need the money."

Mr. KEARFUL. Has anything ever been paid by the Carranza Government out of these reserves and moneys collected to the creditors of the banks or its depositors?

Mr. MITCHELL. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. Or its stockholders?

Mr. MITCHELL. Nothing has been paid by them.

Mr. KEARFUL. What has become of the money?

Mr. MITCHELL. As I stated before, it was used to pay troops and other governmental expenses.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know whether all of it was used for that purpose?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; I am certain that it was not, because in a great many cases I know that the soldiers had not been paid for months, even at the time the Government was taking enormous amounts out of the vaults of the different banks daily. It was also known that the city policemen were not paid at this time, and I many times have had to take pity on city policemen and give them a meal. School teachers were not paid by it, and by information deponent had from employees even the finance minister's department were often from 15 to 30 days behind in the pay.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you have any reason to believe that the officials of the Government and the generals and other military officers personally benefited from this money?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; and not only am I sure that the generals and other subordinate military officers enjoyed part of this money, but my information, which can be verified from the State Department, is that Mrs. Carranza, the wife of the President, crossed the frontier at Laredo, Tex., with nine cases of gold and silver in October, 1916.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who in Washington can verify this information?

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior, who was president of the delegation which treated with the Mexican delegation in Atlantic City and other points in the fall of 1916, has this information, and I understand that he even got that information by telegraph from the inspector of customs in Laredo while he was treating with the Mexican delegates.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there any other means of checking up that information that you know of?

Mr. MITCHELL. As the deponent during his business career in Mexico had to keep in close touch with officials of the Mexican Government, who were many times owing him favors, he got the first intimation of these cases arriving in New Laredo, on the Mexican side, and made it his special business while passing through Laredo in December, 1916, to investigate to find out whether the information which the Mexican officials had given him (semiofficially) was correct, and was thus able to find out to whom the American officials had reported.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you heard of the project of the present Mexican Government to establish a single bank of issue with metallic reserves?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; I read of the project.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you consider the condition upon which the success of that project depends?

Mr. MITCHELL. The only condition upon which that project can succeed is that some foreign institution, more especially one in the United States, where the project has been presented on two or three occasions, should furnish the gold and silver to back the project. So far the Mexican Government has been unable to secure the help of any such foreign institution, and for this reason the bank is not in operation.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the feeling of New York bankers in regard to lending money to the Carranza Government?

Mr. MITCHELL. In conversations which I have had with various bankers in this city they object and refuse point-blank to lend money to a "bunch of bandits." Another reason why they naturally would not care to give money, which in most all cases has been intrusted to them by the American public, is because up to date they have had no protection nor do they feel that even although they should care to give money to help this struggling nation of Mexico their generosity would have to be upheld in Washington.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of protection is it that they would demand before lending money to any Mexican Government at this time?

Mr. MITCHELL. The deponent considers that any group of financiers who were willing to help the Mexican Nation in reconstruction by lending them money would demand primarily that their Government would back them up in asking for a just recompense for the money they should invest, and, secondly, that the financial operations of the Mexican Government to which they would lend this money should be handled by a body of reputable and capable men.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you mean by that last expression: reputable and capable men?

Mr. MITCHELL. Personally I believe that the handling of funds given to a nation like this should be controlled by foreigners and that any financial group that should agree to advance funds to the Mexican Government would be within their rights in dictating terms that the income and expenditures should pass them, as I believe that if such procedure was established in Mexico as has been done in other countries in which the United States and other nations have intervened there would be no need for any military intervention if the government in the country mentioned knew that their only chance of safety to be allowed to work out their own salvation would be to accept this kind of intervention instead of military intervention.

(Thereupon, at 6 o'clock p. m., on the 1st day of November, 1919, an adjournment was taken until Tuesday, November 4, 1919, at 10 o'clock a. m.) 7

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
New York City.

(The following testimony was taken at New York City, November 4, 1919, by Francis J. Kearful, in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate:)

STATEMENT OF MR. WILLIAM BAIN MITCHELL—Continued.

Mr. KEARFUL. Referring to your last statement on Saturday, assuming that a financial arrangement such as you mentioned should be made with the Carranza Government and afterwards, and perhaps because of it, Carranza should be overthrown by some other chief or group of military leaders who should repudiate the arrangement, what recourse would the financial men have in that event?

Mr. MITCHELL. The recourse the financial men would have in that event would be to get the protection from the Government they would naturally have arranged before they put their money into that country.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean protection from their own Government?

Mr. MITCHELL. Their own Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. What direction would that protection take, in your opinion?

Mr. MITCHELL. If the new group of revolutionists would not listen to reason, as I am certain they would if they knew any nation that was backing up the financial group meant to force recognition of the arrangement which had been made by an established Government, recognized by the United States, then the nation from which said financiers come would have to, if necessary, back up the claim as is usually done, with arms.

Although this would apparently be armed intervention it would not in anywise mean acquisition of territory but only giving protection to vested interests, which every civilized nation does when its subjects in good faith have advanced money with the object of reconstructing a country which has been in chaos for a good many years.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you any knowledge of a class of Mexicans who would be in favor of such an arrangement and of such more or less peaceful intervention?

Mr. MITCHELL. In conversations I have had with a great many Mexicans who look to the good of their country they have all expressed the opinion that this would be one of the best methods of settling the trouble and allowing them to again get back to work to develop their country, which has been impossible for about seven years.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there any feeling among them that this would be the only salvation for Mexico?

Mr. MITCHELL. A great many Mexicans with whom I have talked softly admit that they are afraid that if something is not done in the way I suggest, finally armed intervention will come in Mexico, and said armed intervention will remain for a number of years.

Mr. KEARFUL. What class of Mexicans do you refer to as entertaining those views?

Mr. MITCHELL. Educated Mexicans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Military men?

Mr. MITCHELL. In some cases, yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the general view of the military men with respect to the pacifying of Mexico or the desirability of pacifying Mexico?

Mr. MITCHELL. Which military men do you mean?

Mr. KEARFUL. I mean the supporters of Carranza.

Mr. MITCHELL. My personal opinion is that the majority of military men that have supported Carranza and are still supporting him do not wish the state of turmoil to cease, because if such happened a great part of their income would stop, as is known and has even been pointed out in the newspapers that back up or are in favor of Mr. Carranza.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean the Mexican newspapers?

Mr. MITCHELL. I mean the Mexican newspapers that back up and favor him.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you heard any expressions from such military men to that effect?

Mr. MITCHELL. Traveling in a Pullman car from Mexico City to Laredo, Tex., I heard two military men express this opinion, one of said military men being on his way to Tampico.

Mr. KEARFUL. In a statement made and signed by you on July 22, 1919, and placed in the record of the hearing before the Committee on Rules of the House of Representatives you stated in reference to this point that you would "like to give the committee some instances of thievery and graft on the part of Carranza's generals and other government officials that have come within my personal knowledge to support this statement." Can you now give some instances of such thievery and graft?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. Gen. Murguia, who was and still is one of the generals commanding in the north, had or took possession of all the trains in the district where he was operating, and when any of the farmers in the district where he was operating wished to move their crop to any of the towns or cities where they could realize on same they had to apply to him for empty cars, which he supplied to them at so much per car, he afterwards collecting the freight rate or applying a freight rate which he considered suitable. And it is a well-known fact that neither this freight rate nor the premium for the car was ever turned into the railroad treasury.

It is also well known that Gen. Dieguez, who was for a time governor in Jalisco and is now operating in the north, was asked for protection by a rancher in whose district he was operating and Gen. Dieguez replied that it was impossible for him to protect this man's crops, but he would buy the crops at a figure about one-third of the value. The rancher at first refused to accept such an offer, pointing out that it meant ruin for him, but on finding that his crops were being lifted by armed men during the night, which armed men he knew were of Diegues's troops, he accepted the offer and Gen. Dieguez had the crops lifted in a very short time by his soldiers and taken away and realized on at very high prices.

There are many more instances of this kind, as I am certain other men who are giving evidence have brought to the notice of the investigating committee.

Gen. Obregon got the privilege from Carranza to be the only exporter of garbanzo (chick pea) from the west coast. The garbanzo crop is a staple article of food in Spain and Cuba and exported to those countries from Mexico. The result of this was that he was able to buy up the crops from the growers at ridiculously low prices, seeing that they were unable to export it, nor could they realize on same in any great extent in the country, the result being that with this privilege or concession he was supposed to have made from a million to a million and a half profit within the last 18 months.

Gen. Pablo Gonzales, associated with other military men, rented from the Comision de Bienes Intervenidos (The Commission for properties of Opponents of the Government taken over and held by the Government) the properties belonging to the Compania Agricola de Xico, said company practically belonging to a wealthy Spaniard by the name of Inigo Noriega, who was a refugee in the United States for a great many years, whose only fault was that he was a great friend of Porfirio Diaz and of many of the leading politicians and judges during the Diaz régime, the supposed rental being 30,000 pesos. The properties referred to usually were able to raise from 80,000 to 100,000 hectolitros of corn (a hectolitro being equivalent to 2.8 bushels). Said crop in normal times would be sold at 10 pesos or $5 United States currency per hectolitro.

One of the men who was associated with Gen. Gonzales told the deponent that he thought Gen. Gonzales and his associates would make half a million dollars profit, more especially as the price of corn, owing to scarcity in the Republic of Mexico, had increased to an abnormal figures, even although hundreds of carloads of said cereal were bought in the United States and taken in to help to supply the needs of the working public in Mexico, as the working classes in said country practically live on the bread made from corn.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know John Lind?

Mr. MITCHELL. I met Mr. Lind when he was in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. He was the personal representative of President Wilson who was sent there to investigate conditions during the Huerta régime.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. In a pamphlet published by Mr. Lind in December, 1914, on page 22, he makes this statement with reference to the improved prospects of Mexico under Carranza: "The indications are promising. The discipline and restraint shown by the victorious constitutional armies and their chiefs were most creditable and encouraging." When was it that the "victorious constitutional armies" entered Mexico City?

Mr. MITCHELL. The first of the Carranza troops entered Mexico City on the 14th day of August, 1914, headed by Gen. Alvaro Obregon, and Mr. Carranza followed into the city a week later.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you there at that time?

Mr. MITCHELL. I was.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have occasion to observe the "discipline and restraint shown by the victorious constitutionalist armies and their chiefs," and what have you to say in regard to the statement that it was "most creditable and encouraging"?

Mr. MITCHELL. As I was present in Mexico City at that time I have to contradict Mr. John Lind in his statement, because practically on the day that the victorious troops entered, the generals in charge of same commenced to occupy dwellings of private individuals, in many cases ordering men to leave so that they could take possession.

This statement I make can be borne out by the report that Mr. Paul Fuller, who was also sent down by Mr. Wilson, made, because he was present in the house of some old Mexican friends when some of the Carranza troops came and ordered those friends out of their own house at midnight.

Gen. Obregon himself occupied the house of Mrs. Braniff, one of the most stately and luxurious houses on the principal avenue of Mexico City, namely, Paseo de la Reforma.

Mr. KEARFUL. Gen. Obregon was in command of the first detachment that entered the city?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What became of the contents of the houses that were occupied by these military officers?

Mr. MITCHELL. In a great many cases the contents of those houses were destroyed or carted away by the military men occupying the houses. The wines which the owners of the houses had in their cellars were consumed in nightly orgies, and in some cases which I had the opportunity to observe expensive wines were offered in the streets by soldiers at one peso a bottle of champagne. I had that offered me twice at Café Bach by a man on horseback when I was accompanied by friends.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you any idea how many houses were thus occupied and looted?

Mr. MITCHELL. About a dozen houses.

Mr. KEARFUL. About a dozen.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; among this number being those of Creel, Casatus (two ex-ambassadors to the United States in the Diaz régime), Garcia Requena, both of the houses of the Limantours, the ex-minister of finance under Diaz, and the house of the widow of his brother Julio Limantour, the house of de la Torre, son-in-law of the ex-President Porfirio Diaz, the house of Rincon Gallardo, the chief of Rurales under Porfirio Diaz, who was also with Huerta, and other houses the names of which deponent does not remember.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you recall the house of Pedro Lascrain, Minister of Foreign Relations in the Madero cabinet?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; I remember the house, and that it was occupied by Mrs. Sara P. de Madero, who was ordered out by Gen. Carranza. I do not know who occupied the house after that; but it was later returned to Lascurain, and I understand is not occupied at the present time.

Mr. KEARFUL. What about the taking of automobiles and horses at that time by the military officers?

Mr. MITCHELL. In addition to occupying the houses the military officers, not only generals, but even captains, commandeered automobiles and horses belonging to private individuals, not only of Mexicans but also of foreigners, the deponent having had his automobile commandeered twice, but was able to recover it.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say "commandeered." Does that mean in the majority of cases that they paid for them or accounted for them?

Mr. MITCHELL. They did not pay for them or account for them; nor should I really apply the word "commandeered," because that is only used in legitimate warfare.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then they simply took them.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is a polite way of saying they stole them. The horses of a great many British subjects were stolen and they made complaint to the Chargé d'Affaires in charge of the British Legation, who used every effort to have said horses returned, and even although he got written orders from Carranza to have said horses returned, the military officers who were holding said horses refused pointblank to deliver them, and in many cases used very derogatory language towards their chief for having issued such an order.

Mr. KEARFUL. In a book entitled "Intervention in Mexico," recently published by Samuel Guy Inman, on page 79 it is said:

Encouraging progress has been made. The forward-looking young men who are engaged in rebuilding the nation along modern lines, although often mistaken in judgment, are working with enthusiasm and devotion to solve Mexico's problems.

What information have you with reference to the correctness of that statement, and what is your opinion about it?

Mr. MITCHELL. Personally, I have not seen anything done for the reconstruction of the country. Until the time I left it in September, 1917, and during a visit of five weeks, made by me in June and July of 1918, I did not see any reconstruction, and I think Mr. Inman has been led away to make such a statement by reading the theories which a great many Mexicans outline in the Mexican newspapers; but theories are quite different from actions.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your opinion as to what the young men of the military régime that supports Carranza are looking forward to? He called them "forward-looking young men."

Mr. MITCHELL. In conversations which I have had with a few of the younger element in the military class, who practically were students at college when they were induced to join the revolution, I have found a few of them who entered the revolution with the belief that their country would be improved, but after a few years in the service of Carranza they found that their Utopian dreams could not be brought into play.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Inman also says in his book, on page 170: "I have never been able to understand how some people have maintained that Carranza was plotting a rebellion against Madero, for there was certainly no evidence of it in those days. He retained his loyalty to his chief up until the death of the latter."

What, if anything, do you know about the matter of Carranza plotting a rebellion against Madero?

Mr. MITCHELL. Toward the end of January, 1913, the deponent had to visit the office of the Finance Minister of Mexico during the régime of Madero, said Finance Minister, being Ernesto Madero, uncle of the president, and said Finance Minister told the deponent that Carranza, who was at that time governor of the State of Coahuila, had been requested to account for large sums of money which he had received with the object of establishing state troops, but had not, however, got the troops, although the money had been spent, and on an urgent demand for an accounting being sent to him, he had sent a telegram, which the Finance Minister had just received, threatening to go out in revolt if they insisted on such an accounting, and the Finance Minister, Ernesto Madero, said: "We will have to put this man out of office and see that he is punished if he does not return the money," which apparently he had misspent. The Felix Diaz uprising saved Mr. Carranza in this case, as said uprising started on the 9th day of February, 1913; less than two weeks after the interview mentioned.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any conversation with the Minister of Fomento in Huerta's cabinet with respect to Carranza after the accession of Huerta?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you please state what occurred at that time, giving the name of the Minister of Fomento?

Mr. MITCHELL. One evening while the deponent was at home entertaining some friends, about 10 o'clock at night, a rush message was brought to him from the office of the bank informing him that Carranza had started a revolution in Saltillo, and had made a prisoner of the agent of the bank in said city, said agent having been able to get a telegram through before the wires were cut to inform the bank that Carranza demanded $50,000 from the bank as ransom. Deponent immediately went out to look for some of the ministers of Huerta's cabinet and was fortunate enough to find Robles Gil, Minister of Fomento, and on showing the telegram which he had to said cabinet minister the latter endeavored to get into communication with President Huerta, but was unable to catch him by telephone. However, he was able to talk with Alberto Garcia Granados, Minister of Gobernacion (Minister of the Interior), and the latter expressed his surprise that such a thing could have happened in view of the fact that he had received a message of loyalty to the Huerta Government from Carranza.

Mr. KEARFUL. In Governor Lind's pamphlet before referred to on page 25 he makes the following statement:

"You have heard a great deal about the hostility of the Mexicans against everything American. I found no such hostility except amongst the class who support Huerta."

What have you to say from your observation as to the correctness of this statement about the only hostility which existed being amongst the class who supported Huerta? How about Huerta himself?

Mr. MITCHELL. Beginning with Huerta himself I may state that in various conferences at which I was present Huerta expressed himself as very sorry that he was not recognized by the United States Government, and often stated that if he had such a recognition through which he would be able to ask the United States to stop the supply of arms to the Carranza revolutionists he would be able to stamp out the revolution. He, therefore, recognized that the United States was the Nation that he required to be friendly to him. Many of his adherents also expressed themselves that it was a great pity that they should not have this recognition, as they recognized the fact that it would be well for two neighboring countries to live in amity.

Mr. KEARFUL. In the case of Huerta and his supporters did they show a hostile or a friendly attitude toward Americans?

Mr. MITCHELL. Until the landing of the troops in Vera Cruz on the 21st day of April, 1914, they showed friendship in every way, but on this event happening they considered this an aggression, and the result was that Americans did not have a very nice time, so much so that hundreds had to leave the city on special trains under the protection of flags of other nations. Propaganda also started in all the Mexican newspapers against Americans and everything American, some of the articles in said newspapers being scurrilous.

Mr. KEARFUL. In Mr. Inman's book on page 147 he gives as an instance of hostility to Americans "the general order which Huerta gave at the time of our taking Vera Cruz to have all Americans in Mexico arrested. Many outstanding Americans, including our consular officers, were thrown into jail and kept there until released by Carranza authorities."

Is that a true statement or not?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is an absolutely false statement and the falsity of the same can be proved by the records in Washington, as the deponent never heard of any of the American consular officers being thrown into jail, unless it happened in some remote part of the Republic from which news was not received for months and in some cases years.

Mr. KEARFUL. At the time of the taking of Vera Cruz you remember that there was a good deal of excitement and rioters marching in the streets of Mexico City?

Mr. MITCHELL. There was, and attacks on some American stores.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember whether or not Huerta, even under the provocation of the taking of Vera Cruz, took any steps to protect Americans in Mexico City from riotous mobs?

Mr. MITCHELL. I can not say that Huerta personally took the steps, but the governor of the federal district whom Huerta had forced into this position did take steps, and it is a well-known fact that during an attack on an American drug store the governor of the federal district went personally in his automobile, accompanied by one of his aids, and faced the riotous mob with his pistol in his hand, threatening that if any of them should take a step farther in the attack on this American store he would shoot. This action practically stamped out the rioting which had been going on for two or three days.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know of any Americans who were arrested and kept in jail at that time by the Huerta authorities?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; I do not know of any American in Mexico City who was arrested for being an American. Some may have been arrested for committing a breach of the peace, as has happened occasionally not only with Americans but with citizens of other countries.

Mr. KEARFUL. There was no general order then for the arrest of any Americans as such?

Mr. MITCHELL. I heard of none. The only time I knew of a great many Americans being arrested was after Carranza came in and gave them "article 33."

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you mean by giving them "article 33"?

Mr. MITCHELL. In the constitution of Mexico there is an article 33, which allows the President of said Republic to expel pernicious foreigners without any legal trial. The foreigners thus have no chance to defend themselves.

Mr. KEARFUL. This expulsion of foreigners under article 33 was not purely discretionary with the President under the constitution of 1857, was it? It was put solely at his discretion by the constitution of 1917?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. But under the constitution of 1857 they were supposed to have the right to resort to legal proceedings?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; but as the Carranza Government declared themselves preconstitutionalists they nullified this and used the terms of the 1917 constitution before it was established.

Mr. KEARFUL. One of the reasons given by Mr. Inman in his book for the hostility that does exist among some Mexicans toward Americans is that the Mexican people have been exploited by foreign capital, especially American capital, for their own benefit and to the detriment of the Mexican people. What can you say about the fact as to whether foreign capital, and especially American capital, has been a detriment or a benefit to Mexico and the Mexican people?

Mr. MITCHELL. I would have to deliberately contradict the statement Mr. Inman makes, because it is a well-known fact, and you will find Mexican workmen in mines and other industries which are operated by foreign capital, that they prefer to work for the foreigner, because they are better treated and get better pay than they get from their own people.

Mr. KEARFUL. Does this apply especially to mines?

Mr. MITCHELL. This not only applies to mines but industries and ranches, and also to the servants in the different households.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that true of Americans as well as other foreigners?

Mr. MITCHELL. Is it true of Americans as well as of other foreigners? So much so that the Mexicans who employed servants often would complain that the Americans paid the servants far too much money and gave them too much liberty.

Mr. KEARFUL. What about the general benefit or detriment to the whole country through the operations of foreign capital in Mexico?

Mr. MITCHELL. The presidents previous to Carranza recognized that their country could never be built up unless they could get foreign capital, and for this reason they were extending all kinds of hospitality to investors in Mexico, and concessions, but the said concessions were never monopolies, as has been believed by a great many people in the United States. The need of foreign capital is even recognized by Carranza, who has applied for same on two or three occasions, and has been refused same so far because he wishes to get the capital to fritter away as he has done all the other money that has come into his and his government's hands, without taking any step to pay even the interest on the amounts already invested in said country, their exterior debt, the railroads, etc.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the condition of the credit of Mexico in reference to its foreign securities during the latter days of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. MITCHELL. The credit of Mexico was considered about the highest of any Latin-American country, so much so that bonds of the exterior debt were selling in the stock exchanges of London and Paris at a premium of about 5 to 6 per cent.

Mr. KEARFUL. What interest did the bonds draw?

Mr. MITCHELL. The bonds referred to were 5 per cent, and in 1910, before the Madero revolution commenced, Mr. Limantour, who was then finance minister, was in Europe arranging a conversion of said debt to 4 per cent only, and had been successful in arranging for part of this, the financiers in said countries apparently recognizing the credit of the country as so good that they could lower the rate of interest.

Mr. KEARFUL. What amount of cash was left in the Mexican treasury when Porfirio Diaz fell?

Mr. MITCHELL. According to the statement published in the Diario Oficial (the government official daily), Mr. Ernesto Madero, the minister of finance for the Madero government, received from Mr. Limantour, the outgoing minister for the Diaz government, 63,000,000 pesos, and I have no doubt but that a copy of said official paper could be got showing this statement.

Mr. KEARFUL. During the Madero administration was any further Mexican loan secured?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; there was a sum of twenty millions received and the congress of the Madero government had voted for a further loan of £20,000,000 or 200,000,000 pesos, but said amount had not been got at the time the Madero government fell, and Huerta, with the authorization given by the congress mentioned, made arrangements and was able to float the first £6,000,000 through a group of French bankers who came to Mexico City specially with this object, said group having an option on the other £14,000,000 for a certain period.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the security for this loan?

Mr. MITCHELL. The security for this loan was 38 per cent of the customs-house receipts, the other 62 per cent already being pledged for the loans which had been got during the Diaz and other administrations.

Mr. KEARFUL. How much, if any, money was left in the treasury by the Madero administration?

Mr. MITCHELL. Two or three hundred thousand pesos, as stated also in the official newspapers.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were there any extensive public works in progress at the time of the fall of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; there was the legislative palace and the national theater.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the conditions of those buildings?

Mr. MITCHELL. The legislative palace had been so far constructed that all the steel work had been set up, and the national theater had been so far built of marble that all that was wanted was roofing, ornamentation, etc., and even the work had gone so far ahead that a celebrated curtain was bought at Tiffany's, New York, and installed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was anything further done toward the completion of these works after the accession of Madero?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; during the Madero Government a further sum was voted to go on with the work and same was continued for a certain length of time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were these works completed?

Mr. MITCHELL. They have never been completed and I understand that lately an order was given to take even the steel girders, beams, etc., away from the legislative palace so that they might be sold before they had been worn away by rust or oxidation.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have any extensive public works in Mexico been prosecuted since the time of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. MITCHELL. Practically none.

Mr. KEARFUL. What about the public works that were constructed during the time of Diaz?

Mr. MITCHELL. There were schools, colleges, asylums for insane and for the poor, custom-house buildings, port works, and the big drainage canal through the Valley of Mexico which takes away the flood waters and the sewage from the City of Mexico, a good sewage system having been installed also between 1896 and 1899 by a French firm of contractors. In addition, during the Diaz régime most of the railroads were built.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then, as I understand you, nothing of that kind has been prosecuted since the time of Diaz?

Mr. MITCHELL. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what about the condition of the railroads?

Mr. MITCHELL. In what way?

Mr. KEARFUL. About their being kept up or allowed to deteriorate?

Mr. MITCHELL. The railroads all over the Republic of Mexico have deteriorated. So much so that part of the Central Railroad, which was lifted during the revolution, has never been replaced. Bridges also were destroyed, and although temporary ones have been set up to allow traffic, mostly of military trains, to pass, nothing substantial has been built. The rolling stock also has deteriorated and requires renewal, as can be seen by the article written by Mr. Middleton.

Mr. KEARFUL. In Governor Lind's book, before referred to, on page 28, he makes a prediction—this was in December, 1914—he says: "I predict that Mexico will take iron and steel products alone during the ensuing calendar year for more than $1,000,000." Has that prediction been realized? He was referring to the rehabilitation of the railroads.

Mr. MITCHELL. No; it has not been realized for more reasons than one, the principal reason being that the country has not been sufficiently subdued to allow of the rebuilding of railroads, nor has the Carranza Government ever had the funds to dedicate even one-fourth of this amount to such work, the funds which they have been able to acquire, by fair means or foul, having gone for the governmental expenses to which I referred previously.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Inman in his book on page 136 gives another source of prejudice against Americans to be "the number of Americans who are living in Mexico because they could not live in the United States. We have had a great many Americans who could not explain why they were in Mexico." Do you think that is a fair characterization of Americans generally who have been doing business in Mexico?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; I do not, because the majority of the Americans that you find, not only in the City of Mexico but also all over the Republic of Mexico, are men who were enticed to go to that country to hold better positions than they were holding in their own country, and in a great many cases those Americans who entered the country referred to went as pioneers with the object of establishing American trade, and in a great many cases with the object of educating the people of Mexico. Apparently Mr. Inman got fooled by the joke that the men used to have around the clubs when "kidding" an acquaintance by asking him "what was your name on the other side of the Rio Grande?"

Mr. KEARFUL. How does the character of the Americans doing business in Mexico as you knew them compare with that of Americans in the United States? Are they as good or better, or worse?

Mr. MITCHELL. Among a great many Americans that I met in Mexico I found a great many well educated, energetic business men who would have done as well in business, and perhaps better, in the United States where they would have had real practical workmen, but they preferred in a great many cases to stay on in Mexico to finish the task which they had commenced, namely, to endeavor to show that they could educate Mexican workmen to the stage that they could be as thoroughly depended on as the workmen of the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. As to the character of these Americans, how does that compare with the character of Americans in this country?

Mr. MITCHELL. It compares favorably, because even although a few untrustworthy Americans were to be found, the majority of the Americans should not be classified with such, because in all countries you will always find a few ne'er-do-wells, and a ne'er-do-well is usually a floater. In fact, I think you will find a larger proportion of the ne'er-do-wells here in the United States than you will find in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Referring again to the fact that the Secretary of the Interior, Franklin K. Lane, had telegraphic information that certain cases of gold and silver had been passed over the border by Mrs. Carranza, did you hear Secretary Lane make any comments about that and related transactions subsequently in Washington?

Mr. MITCHELL. I heard him state that he brought the fact up to Mr. Cabrera in the conferences which were being held between the delegations of the two nations and that Mr. Cabrera was very much hurt at such an insinuation. He was even so much hurt that he had to request the conference to break up for 24 hours so that he could recover his equilibrium.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where did this statement by Secretary Lane occur?

Mr. MITCHELL. In his office.

Mr. KEARFUL. How are the main enterprises of Mexico established and conducted—mining, railroading, mercantile establishments, manufactories, etc.? Are they in the hands of foreigners or Mexicans as a rule?

Mr. MITCHELL. The majority of them are in the hands of foreigners.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there any large establishment that is owned and controlled by Mexicans?

Mr. MITCHELL. Near Mexico City, yes; there is a shoe factory in Tacubaya which is controlled by Mr. Zetina.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of any other large establishment of any kind?

Mr. MITCHELL. Very few. There are no large industries around Mexico City entirely controlled by Mexicans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Throughout the Republic of Mexico does that same thing hold good, with the exception of haciendas, so far as you know?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; the same holds good practically throughout the Republic.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the principal business street of Mexico City?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is now Avenue Francisco I. Madero.

Mr. KEARFUL. Formerly San Francisco Avenue?

Mr. MITCHELL. Formerly San Francisco Avenue.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there any large substantial business establishment throughout that entire street that is managed entirely by Mexicans?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; there is not.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have here reports by the board of directors of the Banco de Londres y Mexico in Spanish. Do you have any objection to leaving that with the committee?

Mr. MITCHELL. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. Or to the insertion in the record of any portions of it?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; and I will endeavor to get a copy of this in English, as translations were made, of which translations I received a number of copies and distributed them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there any other fact in connection with this investigation that has not been brought out which you think would be of interest to the committee that you would like to state?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; I think I have pretty well covered most of the points.

Mr. KEARFUL. I will suggest that there might be something in reference to German influence upon the Carranza Government.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think I covered this point before the committee in Washington.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was the Rules Committee of the House?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have no objection, then, to the testimony you gave there being used by the present investigating committee?

Mr. MITCHELL. None at all.

(The testimony referred to is here printed in full, as follows:)

STATEMENT OF MR. WILLIAM B. MITCHELL, OF NEW YORK CITY, BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON RULES, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, TUESDAY, JULY 22, 1919.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you resided in Mexico?

Mr. MITCHELL. Twenty-one years.

The CHAIRMAN. What part of Mexico?

Mr. MITCHELL. Mexico City, Laredo, Torreon, and Durango.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your citizenship, Mr. Mitchell?

Mr. MITCHELL. British, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you acquainted with the attitude of the Mexican people and the Government toward the Americans?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir; I saw enough of it through the different revolutions.

The CHAIRMAN. You lived there through—

Mr. MITCHELL. I lived there seven years during the revolutions.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you leave Mexico?

Mr. MITCHELL. In September, 1917, and since then I have been back, in July, 1918.

The CHAIRMAN. Tell the committee the attitude of the Mexican people and the Mexican authorities toward the Americans in Mexico City.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you wish me to go back as far as the old President, sir—President Diaz's time—and commence from then?

The CHAIRMAN. From Diaz's time, and then on down.

Mr. MITCHELL. During the Diaz administration the Americans were always looked well on, so much so that a great many of the political opponents of President Diaz said that he favored the Americans too much. After he was upset the Madero régime treated them very well also. Everything went right until the 21st day of April, 1914, when the United States troops landed in Vera Cruz to stop a shipment of arms—which was never stopped—and also to insist on the honoring of the flag, which has never been given. At that time I saw the American flag torn down and trailed in the gutter. No American could go about with his flag on him. Special trains were taken out with Americans under the British flag. That is well known to the State Department. Four hundred and fifty Americans were taken out on one train. Things calmed down again until after the present Carranza government came in. From the time they came in they were anti-American, and I do not know whether it was for any special reason; but they took the American uniform to put on their type of soldier, because I heard this young gentleman saying that the Carranza officer had on an American uniform. The Mexican Army started to wear a uniform exactly like the American uniform. This was installed by Villa when he was fighting for Carranza, and I think he bought the first uniforms from the United States.

Mr. SNELL. You think, then, Mr. Mitchell, that the leader of this bandit crowd that the young man spoke of was a regular Mexican army officer in a regular uniform?

Mr. MITCHELL. A Carranzista.

Mr. SNELL. But appeared like a United States uniform?

Mr. MITCHELL. Absolutely. All the men in Mexico can tell you that when you go about and see the back of the uniform you would say, "There is an American soldier," until you look at the dirty face in it, and then you know it is not.

From the time Carranza came in it seemed to me that although he had obtained the support and recognition of the United States, instead of being grateful for such support and recognition he thought that the Americans were weak and he commenced in insult them. The records in your own newspapers and Mexican newspapers will show the insults he threw at the United States. After the United States went into the war it is a well-known fact that the Carranza people were pro-German; they catered to them. I saw it time and time again; I was there. In fact, I was present in the streets of Mexico when Ambassador Fletcher passed through to the installation of Mr. Carranza as President. Mr. Fletcher was insulted in the streets by a bunch there of the proletariat who hissed him. Along came the German minister and he got applauded. The same thing happened at the Chamber of Deputies. I was there. The reception that Mr. Fletcher got is well known in the State Department. He was practically insulted, and I would say even hissed by the deputies. The other man got a different reception. I have been told on very good authority that a great many of the military officers working with Carranza, and even some members of his cabinet, received compensation from the German propaganda to keep up this seething anti-American feeling.

Mr. SNELL. Was it in a paper, that agitation?

Mr. MITCHELL. The agitation went on continually in two papers in Mexico, the Democrata and the Pueblo.

Mr. SNELL. Were both of those papers supporters of the Government?

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand they received so much a month from the treasury department, and if they did not receive it in cash they got paper which in a great many cases was imported from the United States.

Mr. SNELL. Is the Pueblo the official paper of the Government, do you know?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; I would call it semiofficial; they were both semiofficial.

Mr. SNELL. They are both semiofficial?

Mr. MITCHELL. They are both semiofficial; yes, sir.

Mr. SNELL. But you do not know whether either one of them was owned by the Government or not?

Mr. MITCHELL. They were not owned by the Government but by some officers of the Government, as happens down there. Each one gets his own paper, or two or three of them club together and they get it.

Mr. SNELL. But were they recognized as the official spokesmen for the Government?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. That is what I mean; they were recognized as the official spokesmen for the Government?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. What is your experience of the general treatment of American citizens down there in Mexico for the last three or four years?

Mr. MITCHELL. Since 1914 the treatment of Americans has been treatment that should have been repudiated a long time ago. I have seen them get insulted deliberately in the street, especially American women, and this was very often done by armed men.

Mr. SNELL. In the city of Mexico?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir; and neither Americans nor others could carry guns. By arbitrary decree Mr. Carranza demanded everybody to give up their arms and ammunition.

Mr. SNELL. Were the Americans treated with as much respect as citizens of the other Governments, say the French, Spanish, or British?

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not think so, sir, with one or two exceptions. You know there are always exceptions to the rule, but as a generality the American was not. There was that continual stirring up against them.

Mr. SNELL. How does the number of Americans in Mexico at the present time compare with the number of foreigners from other nations? Can you tell me anything about that—whether there are more Americans there than anybody else?

Mr. MITCHELL. No, sir; the Spaniard is the biggest colonist in that country.

Mr. SNELL. How does the number of French and English compare?

Mr. MITCHELL. There are much more French than Americans.

Mr. SNELL. How are the English?

Mr. MITCHELL. The English are always the smallest colony.

Mr. SNELL. The smallest?

Mr. MITCHELL. Always; even in any time.

Mr. RODENBERG. How about the Germans?

Mr. MITCHELL. The Germans were not tabled to get out of the country during the war. They were all well watched, and therefore they stayed. There is a big German colony, but the German colony was increased after the United States went into the war, because there seemed to be immigration of Germans into Mexico. We could see new German faces every day in the street.

The CHAIRMAN. How were they treated?

Mr. MITCHELL. Very well, indeed. In fact, it used to be remarked among the allied nations that the taxation applied by the Carranza government did not touch the Germans much. They were in the hardware and drug business; and if you will look over the tax lists applied you will find there were very few taxes applied to them, but they were applied practically to the industries of other nations. That is the thing that was remarked. In fact, one day, in a discussion with two diplomats down there I pointed out that fact to them, and they took up the tax lists and noticed it.

The CHAIRMAN. How were the German women treated on the street, as compared to American women?

Mr. MITCHELL. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. They were treated well?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. POU. How long have you been away from Mexico, Mr. Mitchell?

Mr. MITCHELL. Since September, 1917, with the exception of one month last year—1918.

Mr. POU. Are you going back to Mexico?

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope to one day, sir.

Mr. POU. Were you engaged in business down there?

Mr. MITCHELL. I was manager of the Bank of London and Mexico, which was put out of business by being looted by the Carranza government. If you wish to touch on that point—about the banking situation—I would be glad to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. No; I do not care to go into that.

Mr. RIORDAN. Where did this word "gringo" originate, that they apply to Americans?

Mr. MITCHELL. That did not originate in Mexico, sir; that originated in another South American country at the time that the American soldiers had gone down there, and at that time they used to sing a song, "Green grow the rushes," and from that came the word "gringo." That is how that really originated. Others tell you that it came from the time that the Americans went into Mexico, and they all dressed in green coats, and the Mexican would say, "green coat."

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, as I recall, there were a great many Chinamen killed in Mexico?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESS. What was the occasion of that?

Mr. MITCHELL. The Chinamen were killed during the Madero régime in Torreón.

Mr. FESS. How many?

Mr. MITCHELL. Three hundred and three in one day. That is when Madero, a brother of the ex-president, took that city. There always had been a feeling among the Mexicans against the Chinamen because the Chinamen worked for as little salary, or sometimes less than the Mexican, and they took that opportunity to let that out.

Mr. RODENBERG. Do you think the feeling against Americans was strengthened by their belief that the Americans, as a nation, or as a people, were afraid or failed to assert their rights?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir. Twice they went into the country and then withdrew without accomplishing what they went in for, which made the Mexican people, especially the military element, say, "We could lick them any time we cared."

Mr. RODENBERG. They had a contempt for the American?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. RODENBERG. And it caused the anti-American feeling to grow?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; that contributed very much to it.

Mr. SNELL. You think the general feeling among the Mexicans is that they could lick America if they started out?

Mr. MITCHELL. Not to-day.

Mr. SNELL. It was at that time?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. RIORDAN. How are the Japanese treated down there in comparison to Americans?

Mr. MITCHELL. The Japanese have always been well treated there because, although he is another man who works, he works in an inferior position, such as gardener. In fact, the best gardeners down there are Japanese. Then, very often they were used as guards. At certain times when armed guards were required the Japanese were the only ones who would undertake to stand by their guns. At one time I had 14 of them and when shooting started in the street they were right there.

Mr. FESS. Are we to understand that in your judgment the bitter feeling against America was not prior to the landing at Vera Cruz?

Mr. MITCHELL. No, not bitter. There was always a kind of undertone, but during the Diaz régime, as I told you, he was criticized by his compatriots and his political opponents because he favored Americans too much. But he was farseeing. The Americans were the only people who would go in and build railroads, with the exception of one railroad which had been built from Vera Cruz to Mexico City. The Americans were enterprising men, pioneers, and they were building up that country, and therefore I think Americans should be well looked after. All the men who went in there proved that they were pioneers, and built up this country and built railroads.

Mr. FESS. And the bitterness that now exists—

Mr. MITCHELL. Has been fomented from those different times.

Mr. FESS. Is the bitterness lessening in Mexico as the days go by?

Mr. MITCHELL. As I saw it last year, just a year ago, it was not. In fact, I do not mind telling you that a great many educated Mexicans, intelligent Mexicans, feel sore at the Americans because they have not cleaned up the country. They say, "We will never get anything until some strong power comes in here and does it." They say, "At one time we had 60 years of revolution, and we will not stop, but will break the record."

Mr. FESS. In your judgment, how much of an army would it take to clean up the country?

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not think it would take a big army at all, sir. With a suitable army of men, and you could get the Mexicans themselves with the sure pay, they do not get to-day an assured daily pay, with an American in charge of them, they would have the finest regular soldiery, or you might say rural guard, that could ever be got up, what they call the rurales there.

Mr. RODENBERG. In your judgment, at the present time in the country that is controlled by the Carranza government, are American lives and American property secure?

Mr. MITCHELL. No, sir; not if they want it.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all, Mr. Mitchell, thank you.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Rodenberg asked you if, in your opinion, American lives and American property were secure under the Carranza government to-day, and I understand you to answer no. Do you mean that that is the fault of the Carranza government affirmatively, or does the Carranza government itself attack American life and American property.

Mr. MITCHELL. No; it is the military, the riffraff of the soldier element they have there, practically got up from the lowest dregs. They do not respect not only American lives but the lives of others, if they think they can get anything by stealing. Down in the Tampico district where the oil wells are time and time again it is a well-known fact that they were attacked by the Carranza soldiers, even without the approval of their officers, at least supposedly so, and they are the ones who have killed more foreigners than the supposed bandits have done. Any American will tell you that it has always been when the Carranza group has come around there.

Mr. GARRETT. What I am anxious to get was your viewpoint as to whether or not the Carranza government itself—

Mr. MITCHELL. I consider it guilty in this way: I have never known of a case where the culprits have been brought to punishment, so you might say there was a tacit agreement that they could do that. If they made two or three examples of those men, getting them and punishing them, and not all the time saying it was the bandits that did it, it might be stopped.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you willing also that the statement which was inserted by Representative Gould as having been signed by you—

Mr. MITCHELL. You can also use that.

(The statement referred to is here printed in full, as follows:)

Q. What proportion of Mexican territory is controlled by Carranza?

A. Forty to forty-five per cent of the territory, containing about that percentage of the total population of the Republic. Of the population contained in this territory, less than 10 per cent is favorable or loyal to the Carranza cause.

Of the 15,000,000 population of Mexico, between 20,000 and 25,000 cast votes at the last election, according to official figures printed in Government organs in Mexico City in May or June of 1917. These figures were published as the result of the insistence of certain members of the chamber of deputies. These deputies were members of the Obstructionista Party, which organized against Carranza immediately after the convention of the new Congress.

Q. How many distinct revolutionary movements are there?

A. Of the forces under arms in Mexico not loyal to the Carranza government, about 75 per cent, or 9 of the 12 rebel groups, as they are called, are revolutionary in character from varying motives. These nine groups have recently reached a measure of common ground or understanding upon which their opposition to the Carranza government is based. The meetings at which this understanding was reached were held in New York City in October, 1918, delegates from the different factions being present.

Q. What are the causes of these revolts? What are the rebels trying to accomplish?

A. The causes of these revolts are sometimes economic and sometimes personal, several of the leaders of the revolting groups being actuated largely by resentment from treatment received from their former chief, Carranza, while serving with him against the Huerta government. Those who have joined in the agreements reached in October, 1918, are committed to a return to the only legal Mexican constitution, that of 1857, and the protection of foreign interests, partially through the repeal of anti-foreign decrees issued by Carranza, but mainly through a strict adherence to international obligations.

Q. What measure is Carranza taking to pacify the country?

A. Personally, he may wish to pacify the country, but his followers do not wish this, inasmuch as a lot of their incomes are now derived from the large bloated pay rolls of their army and these incomes would disappear.

I should like to give the committee some instances of thievery and graft on the part of the Carranza generals and other government officials which have come within my personal knowledge to support this statement.

Q. How large is the Carranza army?

A. The pay roll shows it is a little over 100,000; actually, the average number of troops under arms would be between 30,000 and 35,000.

Q. How does this compare with the Diaz army?

A. It is about 25 per cent higher than what the real Diaz army was.

Q. How much is the Carranza army costing?

A. From the published statements from the financial department, the Carranza army has been costing at the rate of 10,000,000 pesos a month, equivalent to $5,000,000 in United States currency, or $60,000,000 per year.

Q. How much did Diaz spend on his army?

A. Diaz spent about one-fourth of this.

Q. When do you think the country will be at peace?

A. Not until some power establishes a suzerainty for a limited period of time, because I have heard well-read Mexicans pass the remark that if they started a revolution again, whereas at one time they had a revolution for 60 years, this time they were going to break the record if they were left alone. I heard one of the Carranza generals pass that remark.

Q. Are the people in the Carranza territory happy and prosperous?

A. No; they are not. This is one of the reasons why crops have not been planted, because the planters found that in every case when they planted crops some of the Carranza military element would come and take them or put their horses to feed on the newly grown crops.

Q. Is it true that the main cause of the Carranza revolution was the agrarian problem, or the demand for the subdivision of large estates?

A. Madero started the agrarian movement, but when he died it was recognized that it was an Utopian dream. Every revolutionist in Mexico usually brings up this question. With the idea of giving protection to those that might get little holdings of land in Coahuila, it was resolved to establish State troops in Coahuila, of which Carranza was governor in 1912, during the Madero administration, and Carranza received about a million and a half pesos (or about $750,000 in United States currency) for the purpose of equipping such a troop, which he never established, however, and when asked for an accounting of the money received he threatened to rebel against the Madero government. His revolt, however, was upset by the revolution against Madero in February, 1913. The fact of this threat was conveyed to me by the minister of finance in the Madero government, who has just received a telegram from Carranza, which telegram he showed to me in his office with the remark, "When we ask this man for an accounting he threatens us, but we will take care of him." This movement was upset through the rebellion of Felix Diaz against Madero, which revolution was put down after about 10 days' fighting in the streets of Mexico City, the emissaries of Felix Diaz having offered the presidency to Huerta if he would join them and help to have Madero arrested in the palace, which was done by Blanquet, who was fighting against the Felix Diaz revolution. Carranza, by telegram promised to uphold the Huerta-Diaz combination, the same telegram being in the hands of Garcia Granados, who was minister of the interior in the Huerta cabinet.

The members of the Huerta government were surprised one Saturday evening when a telegram was received from an agent of the bank of which I was manager announcing the fact that Carranza had risen in revolt and taken this agent prisoner, demanding the sum of $50,000 from the bank to assist him in his revolution. I had to hunt up members of the Huerta cabinet to show them this wire, and Garcia Granados, who had the wire of loyalty, would not believe me, remarking that "I received this wire of loyalty five days ago." Garcia Granados was shot by Carranza troops after they occupied the city of Mexico. This action was against the constitution of 1857, which Carranza was supposed to be upholding, because there is a clause in said constitution which forbids the shooting of young men under 19 and old men over 60. Garcia Granados was 70. To allow this shooting, and many others that happened, Carranza declared a preconstitutional period, which preconstitutional period existed until the Carranza supporters drew up the spurious constitution of 1917.

Q. Where and by what means have large estates been divided under the Carranza régime?

A. To my personal knowledge, none of the large estates have been divided, although a great many of the Carranza generals have acquired same or are occupying same.

Q. Is the Carranza government anti-American?

A. It has been since its installation. Proof was given of this on the first two occasions that Mr. Fletcher, American ambassador, called on the chamber of deputies, where he was practically hissed by the Carranza deputies, as is known to the State Department. In addition, on the occasion of the installation of Carranza as President of Mexico, which took place on the 1st day of May, 1917, groups of the proletariat, who apparently had been recompensed, hissed him as he passed from his automobile, while Von Eckhart, the German minister, was applauded by the same parties.

Q. Is it true that Carranza has attempted to form a Latin-American union to combat American influence? Did he address Central and South American countries on this subject and send emissaries for this purpose? Did he not make speeches on this subject and mention it in an address to the Mexican Congress?

A. On various occasions, in the Mexican papers which were considered official organs of the Government, remarks made by Carranza in interviews given to the reporters of said papers showed that he wished to have such an organization established, and, in fact, the Universal stated on one occasion that the Carranza Government would receive the representative of the Argentine Government to take up the matter with him. Said representative of the Argentine Government arrived in Mexico a short while afterward and was greatly feted, as he was supposed to be the harbinger of this new scheme to which Carranza was only too willing to contribute.

It is also a well-known fact in the State Department that Luis Cabrera, the present minister of finance in the Carranza cabinet, made a special journey to the Argentine to a conference held in Buenos Aires, which was reported to be anti-American and very much pro-German. Before going to the Argentine Cabrera was in Washington, and I understand it is on record that the reception he received here was cool, the object of his mission to the Argentine being known in Washington.

Q. Did Carranza, in his message to Congress last year, while the United States was at war, severely criticize this Government and display a most unfriendly attitude?

A. He has always shown himself against the Allies; in fact, he proposed to stop the shipment of any kind of produce from Mexico to any belligerent, knowing that this would be against the Allies only, and especially against those allies who were using petroleum for their vessels, saying that a large number of said supplies came from Mexico.

Q. Why were Carranza and his generals pro-German?

A. It is a well-known fact that a great many of Carranza's generals and civilian officials were being paid by German propaganda. I understand this was the cause of the United States stopping money on its way to Mexico.

Q. Do you consider that the Carranza Government was neutral?

A. No; I do not. They were pro-German, for the reason that I have told. In a great many cases they were paid to be pro-German and anti-American, receiving this payment through the German propaganda, which was very strong in Mexico.

Q. Is it true that the Carranza Government protected and subsidized the German press in Mexico during the war?

A. On the contrary, the Germans were the ones that paid to have the Mexican press publish the lies which were published during the war, so much so that they arranged to get paper out of the United States when the factories in Mexico were shut down.

Q. Did the Carranza Government subsidize El Democrata, which is a pro-German organ?

A. Yes, it did.

Q. Is it true that the Germans were in control of the Mexican wireless stations during the war?

A. In Mexico City they were. In fact, after the United States entered the war, two of the principal German operators came over from Sayville to Mexico City and took charge of the plant and built it much higher, with a view to increasing its radius. The Carranza Government denied this when questioned by representatives of the Allied powers, and the Italian minister, who had gone to talk to some of these men in German, proved this by talking by telephone in the office of one of the Carranza cabinet members, calling up one of these men and speaking German to him, he having used this artifice because the Carranza cabinet minister had denied there was any such man there. Very soon after this the Italian minister left the country, and it was generally supposed that he was requested to do so by Carranza.

Q. Did Mexico permit the transmission of messages by wireless and other means to Germany during the war?

A. It is a well-known fact to business people in Mexico City that wires were being passed through Mexico to belligerents and to the few countries which were pro-German, or showed themselves to be pro-German. It is also a well-known fact that after the United States entered the war many more Germans were to be seen in the streets of Mexico than had been before that, as there seemed to be an immigration into Mexico, supposedly because they had been promised protection. It was also understood that several of the Carranza plenipotentiaries consented to carry pro-German messages and on one occasion one of the said plenipotentiaries, by name Isaac Fabela, lost his baggage in Habana, Cuba. It was generally known in Mexico that when said baggage was found and returned to him the messages he was carrying had been copied. This incident of lost baggage brought on the breaking off of relations between Mexico and Cuba for a time.

Q. Did Mexico refuse to recognize or comply with American commercial regulations during the war?

A. Mexico refused to recognize the blacklist of the United States or any other country, and gave as an argument that they were neutral, and in one of his speeches Carranza said that he was protesting, or going to protest, against such restrictions in trade with his country.

Q. Is it true that Carranza and his officials and military leaders were closely associated, personally and financially, with the German diplomatic representatives and German citizens during the war?

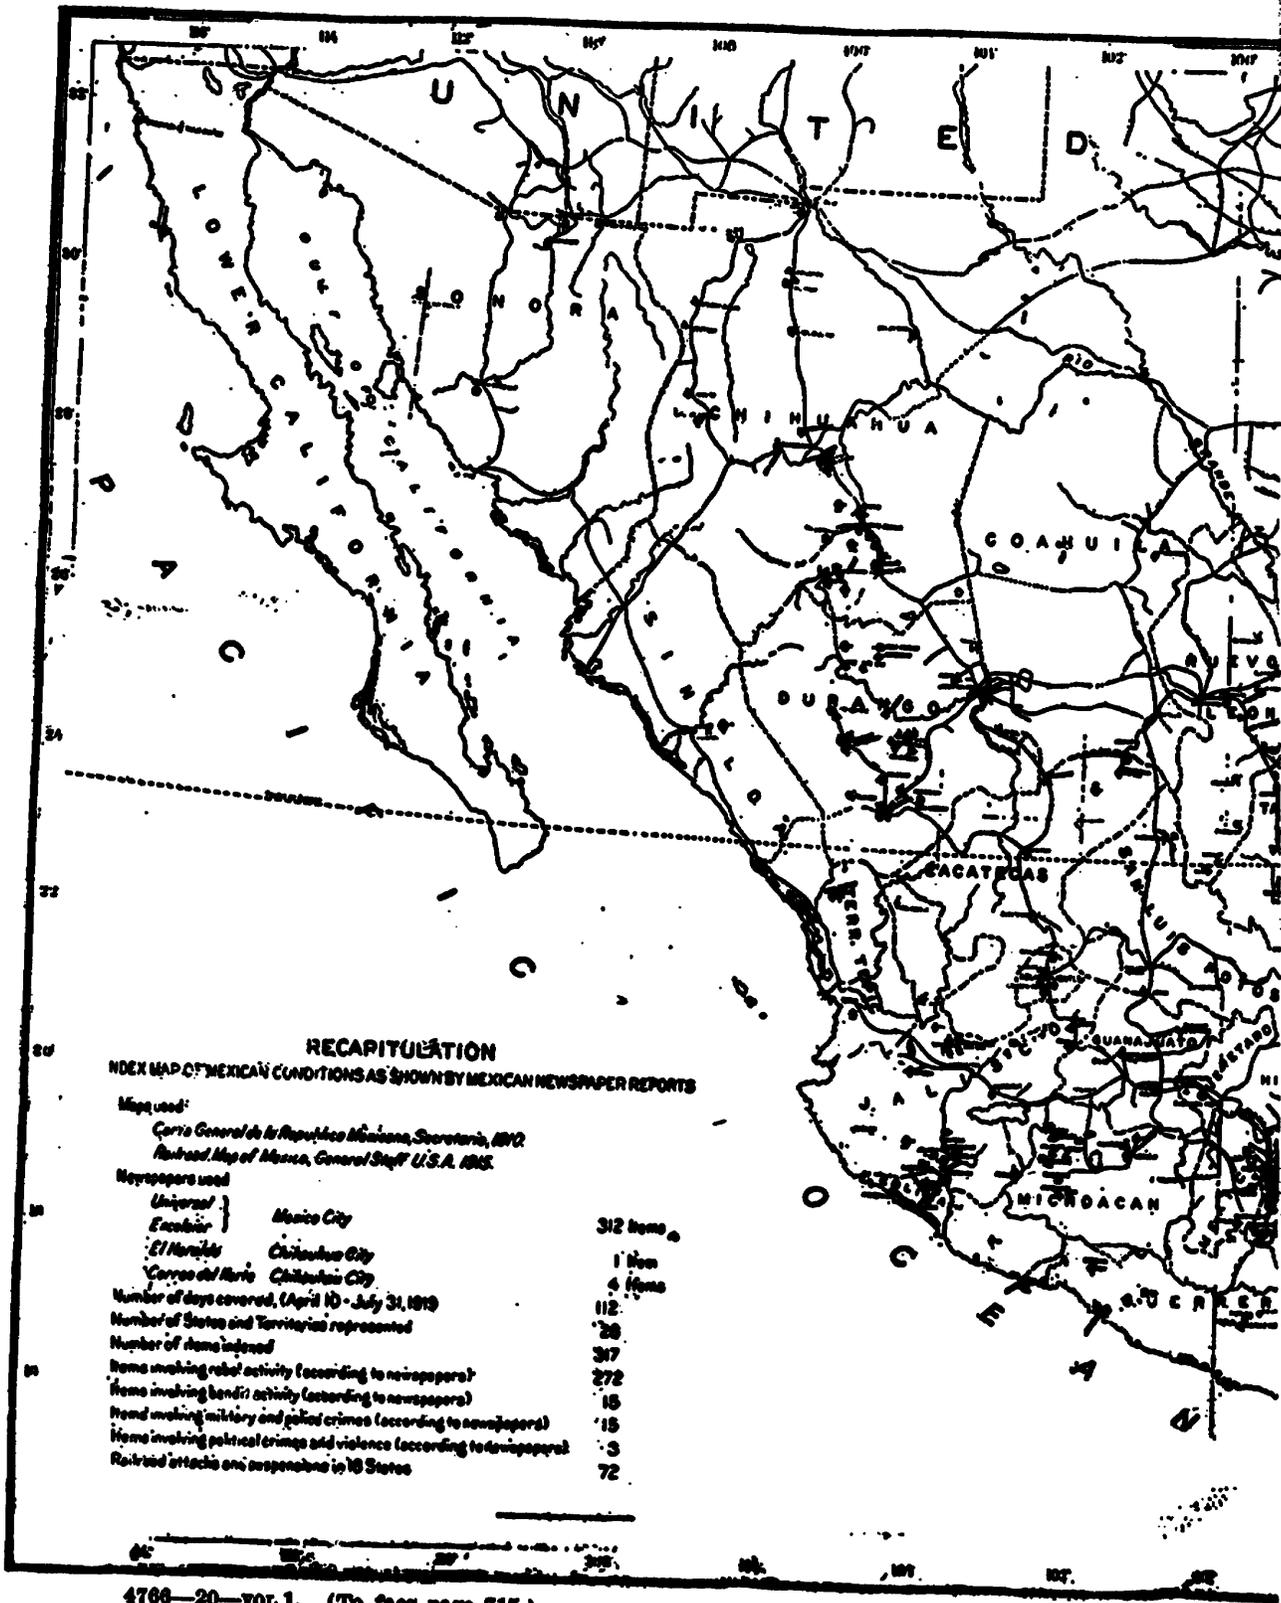

A. The Carranza Government was very closely associated with the German minister, Von Eckhart; in a great many financial operations which they did, such as trying to make an artificial rate of exchange on the paper money which they had issued, the German bank was the agency originally used. In addition, when a great many taxes were declared, many allied merchants remarked that the taxes did not apply to the industries which the Germans had. For instance, the German merchants in Mexico usually dedicated themselves to hardware and drugs, and few of the taxes touched their line of business.

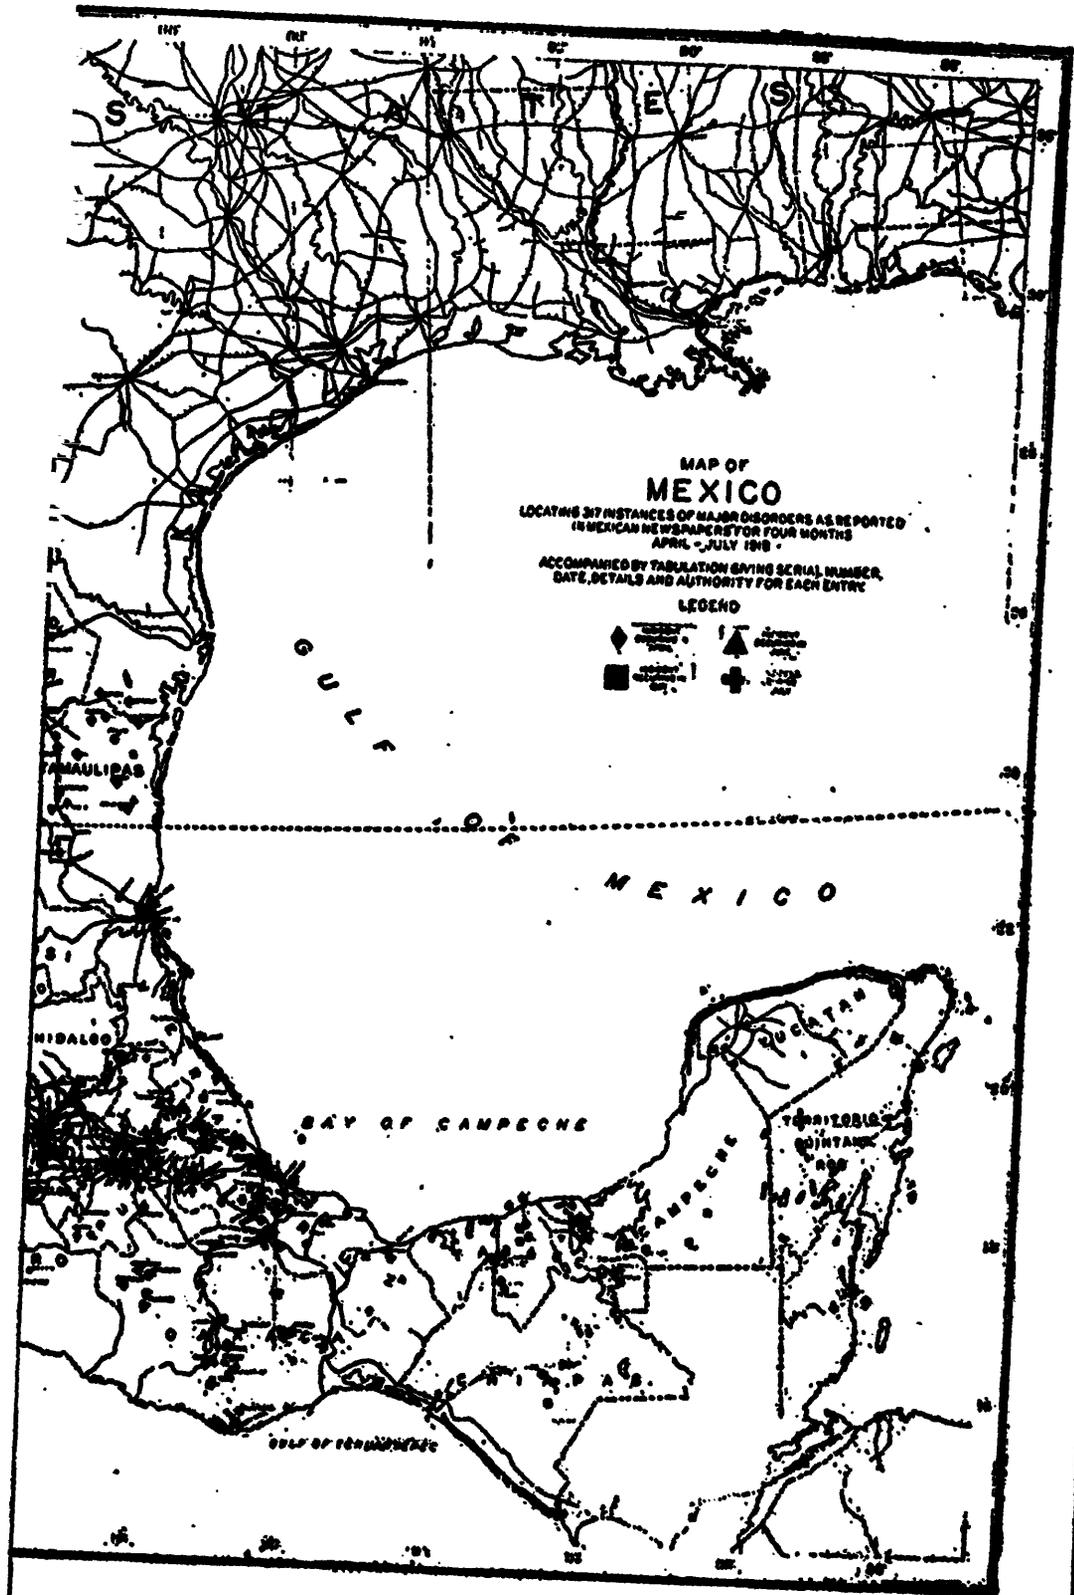

W. B. MITCHELL.

July 22, 1919.

Mr. KEARFUL. Finally I want to ask you, Mr. Mitchell, what is your citizenship?

Mr. MITCHELL. I am a citizen of Great Britain.
(Thereupon the hearing was concluded.)

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The committee was called to order at 10.45 o'clock a. m. by the chairman, who, being immediately thereafter called to the Senate, directed Mr. Francis J. Kearful to conduct the hearing.

STATEMENT OF MR. JOSEPH P. ANNIN.

(The witness was duly sworn by Mr. Kearful.)

Mr. KEARFUL. State your name and address.

Mr. ANNIN. Joseph T. Annin, 817 Fifteenth Street, Washington, D. C.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your present occupation?

Mr. ANNIN. I am the Washington representative of the National Association for the Protection of American Rights in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have here a map of Mexico, which you have presented to the committee. Will you state who made the map?

Mr. ANNIN. The map was made under my personal direction by a draftsman employed for that purpose.

Mr. KEARFUL. What does the map purport to represent?

Mr. ANNIN. The map purports to represent what four Mexican newspapers indicated as to the state of political disorder in Mexico for the months of April, May, June and July of 1919.

Mr. KEARFUL. Those papers as mentioned on the map appear to be Universal, Excelsior, El Herald, and Correo del Norte, the last two being of Chihuahua city and the first two of Mexico City. Are those all of the newspapers that were published in Mexico during that period?

Mr. ANNIN. No, sir; not by any manner of means. Those papers are the ones that were the most readily accessible to us for this purpose and, in view of the impracticability of getting the back files of the other large dailies published in Mexico, we decided to base the map on those papers. It should be borne in mind that of 317 distinct items represented by symbols on the map, 312 of them were taken from the two papers in Mexico City which you have just named, namely, Universal and Excelsior.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are aware, of course, that there are important newspapers published at Monterey, Tampico, Merida, and other places.

Mr. ANNIN. Yes, sir. In compiling this map I did not ask the translations to be made expressly for that purpose. I simply took translations which had already been made in our New York office of all items of interest in such Mexican newspapers as we had there, and from those sorted out translations representing four classes of disorders, namely, disorders due to rebel activity; disorders due to organized bandit activity; disorders involving violence imposed by Government military forces upon civilians or police and municipal authorities; and, fourth, items involving political crimes of violence, such as assassination by Government forces, civil or military, of people representing political factions opposed to the Government. That last does not include, of course, factions in revolt against the Government, which are designated as rebels.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of disorders, if any, were omitted in this scheme?

Mr. ANNIN. All disorders not expressly described on the recapitulation, which, of course, would include ordinary police crimes such as robbery, murder, burglary, criminal assault, and crimes of that nature.

Mr. KEARFUL. How are the disorders that you mentioned as being illustrated on the map designated?

Mr. ANNIN. We took a separate symbol for each month, as the legend on the map shows; a diamond for an incident occurring in April; a square for an incident occurring in May; a triangle for an incident occurring in June, and a cross for an incident occurring in July. Those were placed on the map in red and, as closely as possible, were located where the incident referred to occurred. In cases where an accurate location was not practicable the symbol has been put in as nearly to the scene of the disorder as possible and "Apx.," meaning approximate, put in alongside of the symbol.

I might state that in listing the disorders, or the entries on the map, we have compiled a tabulation, which I will insert if the committee wishes, and which shows in the following order what each symbol represents, the symbols being numbered serially by States so that the tabulation contains these columns: First, the number on the map; second, the approximate date of the incident referred to; third, the city or locality in which the incident occurred; fourth, the character of the incident according to the item from the Mexican newspaper from which the entry was made; fifth, the responsibility for the outrage as indicated by the newspaper; sixth, the name of the newspaper; and, seventh, the date of publication of the item.

Mr. KEARFUL. It will be printed in the record.

(The tabulation referred to is here printed in full, as follows:)

In the interest of brevity the column fixing responsibility shows the first letter of one of the four groups, "R" indicating rebel activity, "B" indicating bandit activity, "M" indicating crimes by Carranza soldiers or police against civilians, and "P" indicating the political crime; all of which is explained in a footnote marked by an asterisk on the tabulation.

The fact that this map is based on reports in the Mexican newspapers is especially significant in view of the fact that the Carranza authorities about the 1st of June arrested and deported to the disturbed district of Chihuahua a group of newspaper editors whose publications had displeased the government by printing accounts of various disturbances and disorders.

Mr. KEARFUL. Referring again to the map, in the case of a continuing incident of outrage or disorder, extending over a period of several days, did you place a symbol for each separate day, or one symbol for the entire incident?

Mr. ANNIN. In a case of that kind one symbol would cover the entire incident. I can show you an instance of that kind, if you wish.

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes; proceed.

Mr. ANNIN. In the case of the railroad between Ciudad Juarez and Mexico City, particularly that part between Torreon in Coahuila and the city of Chihuahua, the railroad line was the scene of continuous disorders and interruption of traffic virtually throughout this entire period. Where the newspaper comments on the fact that traffic had been interrupted again for a period of 20 days, one entry has been made.

Mr. KEARFUL. One symbol would cover that?

Mr. ANNIN. Yes. While I can not be absolutely positive that there are no duplications or no overlapping, I do know that a great many doubtful incidents were thrown out through fear of duplication. In making the map I leaned backward in order to give the benefit of the doubt to the side of law and order.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you consider the map as made up with those symbols a fair indication of the disorders published in the newspapers referred to and of the kind of disorders mentioned?

Mr. ANNIN. I consider it absolutely fair in so far as our information goes, but I know that a great deal of the disorder which occurred in Mexico in that period is not represented on the map, because incidents were not mentioned in the papers we had at hand and because we confined ourselves exclusively in making the map to such incidents as were shown in those papers.

Mr. KEARFUL. You had information of other disorders and outrages of the same kind from reports of private persons and other sources?

Mr. ANNIN. Oh, yes, sir; but while we did not discredit those, we did not put them on the map, because this purports to and does represent only such incidents as were shown in the Mexican press and only in that small part of the Mexican press that was available to me at the time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there any State in the Republic of Mexico, as shown by the map, according to those newspapers, which did not contain the scene of such disorders?

Mr. ANNIN. There is one State—Lower California—from which we had no reports of any nature at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. What, if any, political subdivisions on the map are there in which no such occurrences are noted from the information available?

Mr. ANNIN. The territory of Quintana Roo and Lower California.

Mr. KEARFUL. With reference to the railroads, what was the condition during that period as indicated by the symbols from the information mentioned?

Mr. ANNIN. The recapitulation on the map, which is appended to the tabulation which has been inserted, shows that in 18 States in that period there were 72 attacks on railroads and suspensions of traffic. Following the railroads on the map, it will be seen that with the exception of the railroad lines running from the City of Mexico to Nuevo Laredo, in Tamaulipas, no railroad has been immune from attack. The lines running from the City of Veracruz, Mexico's principal port of entry, have been subject to so many attacks that it would have been impossible, even with the restrictions imposed as to duplicating, to make all entries where they belonged on the railroad.

The principal line, and the only line, during that period where an attempt was made to maintain traffic from Veracruz to Mexico City—the line running from Veracruz to Cordoba, San Marcos, Apizaco, and Mexico City—was safer than any of the other two lines running out of Veracruz; but in spite of that it was lined with garrisoned blockhouses throughout the entire course, 1 kilometer apart; there were on that line approximately one dozen attacks shown. That was the railroad that all travelers landing at Veracruz and going to Mexico City were forced to use.

I may say that in that period I had occasion to take that trip, and that is why I can speak of the blockhouses, their garrisons, and the general condition of traffic from my own knowledge.

An interesting side light on the map in connection with the recent abduction of William O. Jenkins from the city of Puebla is that the map shows in the State of Puebla 34 disorders of the character indexed, and of these at least one-half were in the city of Puebla or the immediate vicinity, despite the fact that the city of Puebla is the second largest city in the Republic of Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that all, Mr. Annin?

Mr. ANNIN. I do not think of anything else in connection with the map that is not shown by the map itself, which I leave with the committee, or by the tabulation which has been inserted in the record.

Mr. KEARFUL. The map will be placed on file and, if possible, will be produced in the record at the beginning of this hearing. The committee is very much obliged to you.

(Thereupon, at 11 o'clock a. m., the committee adjourned subject to the call of the chairman.)

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1918.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., November 18, 1919, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the Subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

TESTIMONY OF MR. WALTER FLAVIUS McCaleb.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. McCaleb, you have been subpoenaed to come before the committee to give it the benefit of your knowledge about the banking and financial situation in Mexico. The members of the committee being unavoidably absent, have authorized me, as counsel, to proceed with the examination. Please state your full name and address.

Mr. McCALEB. Walter Flavius McCaleb, 261 Broadway, New York City.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your profession?

Mr. McCALEB. That is difficult to answer. I suspect I have a small claim to being a writer and possibly a banker.

Mr. KEARFUL. What experience have you had in the banking business?

Mr. McCALEB. I have had about 10 years' practical banking experience. I have been a lecturer on money and banking in Columbia University. I served as vice chairman, active, of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas. I have published, as editor, an English edition of René Stourm's Le Budget, which is the last word on budgetary history of the European nations. I have written on various economic topics, particularly banking. A number of my articles have appeared in the leading magazines devoted to special fields.

Mr. KEARFUL. What has been the extent of your actual experience in Mexico?

Mr. McCALEB. I have made special investigations in Mexican finances, both public and private. I have in press a History of Present and Past Banking in Mexico and have finished a first draft of a History of the Public Finances of Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you been a student of Mexican history? If so, to what extent?

Mr. McCALEB. I have. As a student in college I explored the Bexar archives and later spent considerable time searching through the Archivo General of Mexico. Also I have written a history of the Mexican War of 1848, which will appear some time during the coming year.

Mr. KEARFUL. For how long a period have you lived in Mexico?

Mr. McCaleb. I have known Mexico more or less intimately all my life. I have made several trips through the country. In the summer of 1898 I rode possibly a thousand miles on bicycle through the central part of the Republic. I lived in the City of Mexico for more than six months. During my various visits to Mexico I spent some weeks in Chihuahua and Aguascalientes, Queretaro, Leon, Monterrey, Monclova, and the capital itself.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you well acquainted with the Spanish language?

Mr. McCaleb. I am. I have spoken it since a child.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you able to converse freely in Spanish with the natives of Mexico upon any subject?

Mr. McCaleb. I am.

Mr. KEARFUL. What special investigation have you recently made in Mexico with reference to the history of banking and finances of that country?

Mr. McCaleb. I have searched through the official publications of the Mexican Government dealing with these two large branches. I have also spent some weeks in the capital, where I came in touch with Mexican Government officials, and on the basis of these researches I have prepared the two books mentioned above.

Mr. KEARFUL. When was this investigation made in connection with the officials of the Government?

Mr. McCaleb. My stay in the capital was in the early summer of 1918. At that time I met a number of Government officials and was afforded access to what materials they had available on the subject of banks and budget. I have continued my researches since that time in the compilation of the two books mentioned.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you had communications with high officials of the Mexican Government since you left there?

Mr. McCaleb. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And in reference to the same subjects?

Mr. McCaleb. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you able to give a history of the origin and progress of the banks from the earliest times in Mexico up to the present?

Mr. McCaleb. I think I am.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you begin by stating the situation of the country with respect to banking before the establishment of any actual banks and state the time?

Mr. McCaleb. When the Mexicans had gained their independence from Spain they naturally fell heir to such economic machinery as had been developed under the colonial régime. As concerned finances, this machinery was crude enough. There were no banking institutions in the modern sense of the term. There were practically no credit institutions of any sort, if exception may be made of the Monte de Piedad. There were in the country, however, two classes that advanced in small quotas credits of a sort. These were the merchants and the rescador. The merchants made their credit advances to the hac endado, or farmer. The rescador made his to the miner. This latter was in a sense a broker who received the silver output, disposed of it, repaid himself his advances, and turned over the residue to the miner.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please describe the function of the Monte de Piedad at the time of the Mexican independence.

Mr. McCaleb. The Monte de Piedad was a charitable institution, founded by Terreros, who at one time was a poor miner in the Republic. He amassed a great fortune, returned to Spain, became a noble, and set aside 300,000 pesos as the capital for the Monte de Piedad, which opened its doors in 1775. This institution at the outset loaned its funds without assessing an interest charge. On the repayment of loans the beneficiary usually left a gratuity which was presumed to cover the cost of operations. Later on this institution found it necessary to levy a charge on all loans and became in a sense merely a pawnbroking establishment.

As I have stated, these were practically the only classes of credit institutions which prevailed in Mexico prior to 1864, the date of the establishment of the Banco de Londres, Mexico y Sud America.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you proceed now to describe briefly the banking institutions established from that time up to the time of the accession of Porfirio Diaz in 1876?

Mr. McCaleb. With the exception of the Banco de Londres, only one other small banking institution opened in Mexico prior to the accession of Diaz. That was the Banco Santa Eulalia, in Chihuahua.

Mr. KEARFUL. This Banco de Londres was a branch of parent bank in London, was it not?

Mr. McCaleb. Yes; it was. There was another branch of this same institution in Lima, Peru.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who were the founders of this Santa Eulalia Bank?

Mr. McCaleb. MacManus was the founder. It was at first a private bank.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the nationality of the founders?

Mr. McCaleb. I understand MacManus was an American citizen. The name has been well known for years in Chihuahua history.

Mr. KEARFUL. And who were his associates in the business?

Mr. McCaleb. I can not say. I know that he had very considerable dealings with Americans doing business across the frontiers of Texas to Chihuahua.

Mr. KEARFUL. Under what laws did these two banks operate?

Mr. McCaleb. The Banco de Londres operated under no special law. It came into the country and was protocolized through a judicial act. The other bank was, as stated, for several years a private institution. Later it became a State institution properly authorized to do business by the legislature of Chihuahua.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you proceed now with a brief history of the banks that were instituted from the time of the accession of Diaz in 1876 to the time of his second accession in 1884?

Mr. McCaleb. With the accession of Diaz and the comparative restoration of order in 1876 there began a development of banking interests which bore early fruit.

In 1879 the Monte de Piedad was granted the right to issue notes on a basis of ₧2 to ₧1 of metallic reserve. This institution at once became substantially a bank.

Prior to the retirement of Diaz in 1880, in his farewell statement he made reference to the great progress made by the Monte de Piedad and suggested a plan for a national bank. His suggestion was early followed by the actual granting of a charter, in 1881, to the Banco Nacional Mexicano; and the following year a charter was granted to the Banco Mercantil, Agrícola é Hipotecario. Important arrangements were made with these two banks on the part of the Government. Certain credits were allowed the Government annually, which served as a sort of reserve against emergencies, and were, it may be stated, availed of to the fullest extent.

Also in 1882 a charter was granted to the Banco Hipotecario Mexicano. This was a mortgage bank, and the first in the Republic.

At the end of 1882 there were in operation the mortgage bank just mentioned, and five banks of emission, to wit, Banco de Londres, Banco Nacional Mexicano, Banco Mercantil, Banco Mexicano, and the Banco Minero, the last two having been founded in the years, respectively, 1878 and 1882, under the authority of the State of Chihuahua. There existed in Chihuahua still the Banco Santa Eulalia, which also had been and was a note-issuing institution, although under private management. In 1883, however, it also took on legislative warrant. We have thus displayed the phenomena of State banks and Federal banks developing in two groups, one in the far north and the later in the capital of the country.

While this banking development was taking place there was a large economic awakening throughout the country. As a matter of fact, there had been so rapid an advance that when the period of depression which swept the world in the early eighties reached Mexico certain symptoms of panic developed there also. In the spring of 1884 several incidents of importance occurred, to wit, the suspension of specie payment by the Monte de Piedad and the consolidation of the Banco Nacional Mexicano and the Banco Mercantil. These two institutions took the title of Banco Nacional de México, and the capital was now fixed at ₧20,000,000, 40 per cent paid.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the reason for the suspension of the Monte de Piedad?

Mr. McCaleb. Failure to maintain proper reserves against demand deposits and against note circulation. In short, this bank was not required under its charter to maintain reserves against deposits. When panicky times came, a run on the bank by depositors and note holders alike quickly exhausted its metallic reserves.

Mr. KEARFUL. The second accession of Diaz was in December, 1884, I believe?

Mr. McCaleb. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was the President from the period of 1880 to 1884?

Mr. McCaleb. Manuel Gonzalez.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the influence of Porfirio Diaz during that administration?

Mr. McCaleb. The influence of Diaz as a member of the cabinet, has been regarded as the dominant factor in the Gonzalez administration.

Mr. KEARFUL. Can you state the total amount of assets of the banks in operation at the end of the Gonzalez administration in 1884.

Mr. McCaleb. The total assets of the banks at the end of the Gonzalez period approximated ₧40,000,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the security, apart from the Monte de Piedad, against the emission of notes by these banks?

Mr. McCaleb. These banks, under their charters, were permitted to issue ₱3 in notes against ₱1 of metallic reserves.

Mr. Kearful. Will you now make a brief statement of the progress of banking from December, 1884, the second accession of Diaz, to May, 1892, when Limantour came in as head of the treasury department?

Mr. McCaleb. With Diaz there came in Dublán as minister of hacienda (treasury). He was an active, capable man, and there at once ensued, under the stimulus of great economic development throughout the country, a period of intensive banking activities.

Mr. Kearful. To what sort of enterprise was this economic development due?

Mr. McCaleb. To foreign investors. These investments were directed largely toward railway building, the development of mines, agriculture, and industries, and also very considerable sums were invested in the capitals of banks.

Mr. Kearful. Have you a statement from official sources showing the total banking assets about the time of the entry of Limantour?

Mr. McCaleb. The statement of June 30, 1892, I have, which shows the total of banking assets as ₱94,462,197. This is of interest for the reason that it marks a definite period in the banking development of the country. No additional special charters were granted by the Federal Government from this date until the enactment of the general banking law of March 19, 1897.

Mr. Kearful. As marking another period approximating that date, have you a statement from official sources showing the total banking assets at the close of the year on June 30, 1896?

Mr. McCaleb. Yes. This is a date of interest for the reason that it shows a material development in the existing banks in the Republic over this period of four years. The totals are 122,606,410 pesos.

Mr. Kearful. Will you proceed now to describe briefly the essential features of the general banking law of March 19, 1897, and the various kinds of banks organized under that law?

Mr. McCaleb. The general banking act provided for three distinct types of banks, namely, (1) banks of emission (Banco de Emision), (2) mortgage banks (Banco Hipotecario), and (3) auxiliary banks (Refaccionario).

The first type of institution was designed to take care of the commercial business of the country, extending short-time loans to merchants, manufacturers, etc., and, in a sense, is comparable to the national banks of the United States.

The second type was planned to provide long-time loans based on real estate security.

The refaccion, or auxiliary, bank was expected to serve as an auxiliary, bridging the gap between the two other systems, providing reasonably short-time credits to merchant and farmer and miner.

Mr. Kearful. Which one or more of these classes of banks had authority to issue notes?

Mr. McCaleb. The first class.

Mr. Kearful. Upon what conditions?

Mr. McCaleb. Upon the condition that they maintained a metallic reserve of 50 per cent—that is to say, they could issue ₧2 of notes against ₧1 of precious metal in vault.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that true of all the banks of emission at that time?

Mr. McCaleb. It was under the general act. The Banco Nacional and the Banco Nuevo Leon, which still enjoyed their original concessions in this respect, could issue ₧3 of notes to ₧1 of metallic reserves.

It may be added that these two latter institutions never availed themselves of the limits allowed.

The mortgage banks were permitted to issue bonds on real estate securities, but these never gained wide currency in the Republic.

Mr. KEARFUL. These bonds were never legal tender, were they?

Mr. McCaleb. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. What reforms of this original banking law were instituted, and when?

Mr. McCaleb. In 1905 a reform was initiated by Minister Limantour, dealing mainly with the segregation of the deposit accounts and the requirement of reserves against demand deposits. In 1908 a more important reform was initiated, which further affected the deposit accounts of the banks generally, compelling their segregation into demand and time deposits.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was the particular virtue in this requirement of segregating the different kind of deposits?

Mr. McCaleb. It enabled the examiners and the minister of Hacienda to check up more closely the actual status of the bank, particularly on the score of reserves.

Mr. KEARFUL. The failure to segregate such accounts and to maintain metallic reserves against demand deposits was the reason for the suspension of the Monte de Piedad in 1884, was it not?

Mr. McCaleb. Yes; the failure to maintain adequate reserves.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were these reforms you were about to mention?

Mr. McCaleb. One dealt with loans to directors and corporations and the other with the character of paper which these banks had been taking on. Some of them had been guilty of violating the regulations by absorbing too much long-time paper, which was a violation of the spirit and even the text of the law itself.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what about loans to directors?

Mr. McCaleb. Loans to directors were to be much more rigidly scrutinized and were to be limited in volume.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there something about capital requirements, also?

Mr. McCaleb. Yes. An important amendment to the law required that in the future all banks of emission should have a minimum of ₧1,000,000 of capital rather than ₧500,000, as the general law prescribed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you a statement from official sources with reference to the total resources of the banks in Mexico at the time of this last reform you have mentioned?

Mr. McCaleb. Yes. The general assets totaled ₧761,000,000 in round numbers, and the capital and surplus had risen to ₧224,000,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. In 1905, at the time of the institution of the gold standard, what organization was established in connection with that law?

Mr. McCALEB. The Comision de Cambios y Moneda was established to equalize the exchanges, to maintain a parity as between gold and silver and as related to foreign exchanges in general.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the basis of exchange that was maintained with reference to Mexican pesos and American dollars?

Mr. McCALEB. The Mexican peso, under the law of 1905, was bi-metallic. The gold peso weighed 75 centigrammes and was equivalent to 49.88 United States gold. The silver peso weighed 25 grams. This was the equivalent of the gold peso and correspondingly bore the same ratio as the gold peso to our dollar.

Mr. KEARFUL. In case of fluctuations in value between silver and gold, how was the parity maintained through the medium of this commission?

Mr. McCALEB. The commission was capitalized at ₱10,000,000. With this fund it was active in the markets. If there appeared a plethora of credits on foreign points in the markets it would buy, and in the event of excessive demand for foreign exchange it would sell. In this way it was able to maintain over a period of 15 years or more a practically steady market for the Mexican peso.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is substantially ₱2 for $1?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes; substantially ₱2 for $1.

Mr. KEARFUL. You gave the total resources of the banks in 1908. Have you a statement with reference to the growth of the auxiliary banks in the previous 10 years?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes. During that period these banks had increased their capital from ₱6,000,000 to ₱47,800,000, and their total assets had grown to ₱128,325,032.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you proceed with a description of the organization and purpose of what was known as the Caja de Prestamos?

Mr. McCALEB. For many years Diaz and Limantour had realized the great need for a system of banks to aid the small farmer. They had striven on occasion to develop such a system. The problem had even been studied by several commissions duly appointed. In 1908, however, quite against their own plans, a single institution was organized by congressional warrant for purposes of making loans to farmers. This institution was called Caja de Prestamos para Obras de Irrigacion y Fomento. It was capitalized at ₱10,000,000, which was subscribed by some of the large banks of the country, although latterly this stock was largely unloaded abroad. It was also provided that the Government of Mexico should guarantee as to principal and interest all issues of bonds which might be floated by the said Caja de Prestamos.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there any limit to the amount of bonds that might be interested?

Mr. McCALEB. As I recall it, there was no limit. As a matter of fact ₱50,000,000 of gold 4½ per cent bonds were issued and sold abroad.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the operations of this institution with special reference to the carrying out of the purposes for which it was organized?

Mr. McCALEB. The actual operations of the Caja de Prestamos were very disappointing. The purpose of Diaz and Limantour had been wholly defeated in that the Caja did not resort to making small loans to needy farmers throughout the Republic, but promptly loaned its funds in large volume to a comparatively few borrowers.

Mr. KEARFUL. Including the entire amount of ₱50,000,000 derived from the sale of the bonds?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes. The records show that 96 individuals borrowed from the Caja a total of ₱53,540,000. The largest single loan was made to an agricultural and colonizing company in a total of ₱5,283,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you the name of that company?

Mr. McCALEB. I had.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know the individuals who control that company?

Mr. McCALEB. I have not the names of these men, but they are easily available.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you have any knowledge of the probability of realizing upon the securities for these loans?

Mr. McCALEB. I have not, beyond what some of my friends, who are bankers in Mexico, have told me. I find that they are divided in opinion as to the ultimate realizations from these advances.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you any knowledge as to the class of persons to whom these loans were made?

Mr. McCALEB. I have no special knowledge beyond the fact that my informants in Mexico City have said that they were made to the friends of the directing officials of the Caja de Prestamos, some of them high in the official circles of the Cientificos.

Mr. KEARFUL. I forgot to ask you about the Banco Central, organized in 1898. Will you give a statement affecting that bank?

Mr. McCALEB. Soon after the enactment of the general banking law in 1897 it was discovered that a serious element had been neglected in the development of the machinery. While provision had been made for the organization of so-called State banks, no arrangement had been made for a unification of the system, and almost at once the bank notes issued by some of the State banking institutions in the remote ends of the Republic were circulating at a discount in certain of the markets of the country. In order to correct this serious defect in the banking organism, a central bank was proposed, to be located in Mexico City. Its chief purposes were two: First, to act as agent in the redemption at par of all notes issued by State banks; secondly, to serve as reserve agent effecting certain discounts on occasion for the State banks. Indeed, the State banks were very vitally interested in the Banco Central, since of its ten millions of capital the State banks were to absorb such quota as to leave them in control of that institution.

The Banco Central Refaccionario was, therefore, to the State banking system presumably what a Federal reserve bank is to a special district in the United States—a clearing agency and a reserve agency. The Banco Central, however, was very defective in its organism for the reason that there were no reserve requirements placed on the member banks. They kept such balances with the Banco Central as they pleased, and were very often borrowers of that institution. This had been definitely provided for and was accordingly not a healthy situation, since the Banco Central did not carry in its provisions the great and fundamental powers of the Federal reserve banks of the United States, to wit, the ability to expand and contract their credit requirements as the occasion demands. The Banco Central was, therefore, an extremely defective institution; the more the surprise since Limantour was truly a clear-headed banker. Doubtless had he been permitted to continue his work these shortcomings would have been remedied.

Mr. KEARFUL. What statement have you with reference to the resources and assets of the various banks in Mexico, approximating the time of the outbreak of the Madero revolution in 1910?

Mr. McCALEB. I have with me tables showing résumés of conditions on June 30, 1909. Tables are extant, however, covering the next two or three years.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the condition shown by the tables you have?

Mr. McCALEB. For 1909?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. McCALEB. The total assets of the banks of issue on June 30, 1909, were ₱736,191,398. The capital amounted to ₱118,800,000. There were notes in circulation totaling ₱92,221,477. There were demand deposits of ₱71,910,424.

For the auxiliary banks at the same date, there was exhibited a capital of ₱47,800,000, the total assets reaching ₱128,375,032.

For the mortgage banks under the same date, we find a capital of ₱10,000,000; total resources of ₱51,934,102.

Mr. KEARFUL. At the time of the outbreak of the Madero revolution in 1910, have you any information with reference to the indebtedness of the Madero family to the banks?

Mr. McCALEB. I have a statement made to me by a banker who sat in on a conference attended by the various creditors of the Madero family. I may not give his name, but I have reason to believe the statement to the effect that the Madero family owed the banks of Mexico approximately ₱8,000,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. From the time of the fall of Porfirio Diaz to the fall of President Madero, please briefly state the condition with reference to the progress of the banks. Just in a brief way, first, without giving the figures.

Mr. McCALEB. From the fall of Diaz through the Madero administration there were changes, to be sure, in the banking situation down there. They were not vital, one way or the other. The banks gained to some extent in assets, but were affected to some extent by the disquiet of the country at large.

Mr. KEARFUL. How were the banks affected after the fall of Madero in February of 1913 up to the time of the abdication of Huerta in July, 1914?

Mr. McCALEB. This was a vital period; but, first of all, the banks were directly affected by the revolution which tended to upset all economic arrangements. Business uncertainties developed, but the banks found themselves with increased deposits and slacker demand. They ceased paying interest on deposits, which exemplified the general relaxation. The difficulties of the government, however, were soon to be visited upon the banks.

Mr. KEARFUL. Just state what the difficulties of the government were and how the banks were made to respond.

Mr. McCaleb. Huerta, who had succeeded Madero, soon became embarrassed financially and called upon the banks to come to his assistance. He proposed to the banks that if they would advance him certain moneys he would modify the law requiring one peso in metallic against two pesos of notes to be extended to cover three pesos of notes. In this way he brought the banks to take over bonds, which were a portion of the 20,000,000-pound issue authorized by the Madero Congress in 1912. Huerta was in this way able to finance himself for a time, putting in circulation approximately ₧45,000,000, in round numbers, of bank notes. He turned over to the banks ₧48,498,180 of government bonds.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was this ratio of three to one availed of by the banks at that time fully?

Mr. McCaleb. It was not.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did this operation affect the operation of the banks, if at all?

Mr. McCaleb. It did not vitally affect the operations of the banks. The decree of Huerta extending the limits fixed for circulation of notes was not in itself fatal to the banking institutions of the country. Much more important was the effect on the public at large.

Mr. KEARFUL. Go ahead and state what that was.

Mr. McCaleb. The demoralizations which were spreading ever wider of revolution were sending slowly a panic through the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. At this time the revolution of Carranza had been started and was growing in the North?

Mr. McCaleb. That is true; and on account of the dispensations of Huerta with respect to the banks and his declaring in a decree that the tostón, or 50-centavo piece, together with the bank notes of the country, should be legal tender for a year, disturbances were set in motion which were nearly fatal to business in general and to the equilibrium of the country.

On the other hand, the revolutionary disturbances in the North were playing their part in the disintegrating movements of the times. So far as banks were concerned, they were alarmed at the early reports which came in of Carranza's levying on all institutions in the occupied territory.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was Carranza's attitude toward the banks as registered by his acts from the beginning of his revolution?

Mr. McCaleb. In his circular dated December 6, 1913, he levied tribute on the banks in the State of Coahuila. Circular 8, dated February 18, 1914, set out that he had taken over in Nogales the branches of the Banco Nacional and Sonora. In Hermosillo he took over the Banco de Sonora and the branches of the Banco Nacional, Minero, and an agency of the Banco Occidental. Debtors to these institutions were ordered to suspend payments until these banks could be liquidated.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was done by Carranza and his forces with reference to banks at the time and subsequent to his entry into the capital in August, 1914?

Mr. McCaleb. As Carranza had advanced, in all cases, under severe penalties, banking institutions were forced to receive in payment of their bills receivable the fiat currency or the fiat paper currency of Carranza. When he reached the capital of Mexico, in August, 1914, he carried with him bundles of fiat paper which was immediately put in circulation, and incidentally it may be said that all metallic coins of every description dropped out of sight.

Mr. KEARFUL. And the bank notes issued by the banks of emission—what happened to them?

Mr. McCALEB. They also disappeared, and I might add, showing further his disposition toward banks, on September 29, shortly after he entered the capital, Carranza ordered special inquiries to be made into the conditions of the banks throughout the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the result of those inquiries?

Mr. McCALEB. During the winter and early in the spring a number of reports by his examiners were made showing the conditions of those institutions to be well within the limits of the law—not as modified by the Huerta decrees but as determined by the general act itself.

Mr. KEARFUL. You refer to an act passed long previously?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes; in 1897. As far as I have examined those statements I found that they measure up to the terms laid down.

Mr. KEARFUL. In the law?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the effect of the enforcement of this fiat money upon the banks of the country?

Mr. McCALEB. Being forced to receive in payment this fiat currency worked serious losses to the banks. This fiat paper fell in time to such a low price in the markets that it could be bought for insignificant sums. Debtors to banks naturally availed themselves of the opportunity to purchase this paper and paid their obligations to the banks. To illustrate, the Banco Nacional suffered losses of approximately ₱30,000,000 through transactions of this character; but it was able to recoup ₱7,000,000 of this loss through liquidating deposits with this fiat currency and through the purchase of its own notes with this cheap paper. In short, the Banco Nacional stood loser in the sum of ₱23,000,000, in round figures. If the other banks of the country suffered in similar measure, it may be estimated that the banks lost, in round numbers, probably ₱50,000,000. Indeed, this may be far under the losses actually to be traced to fiat currency operations.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you now give a brief statement of the taking over of the banks and the appropriation of their metallic reserves by the Carranza government?

Mr. McCALEB. Over the summer of 1916 Carranza slowly saw the failure of his infalsifiable currency schemes, which will be referred to later, and his financial situation was desperate. Finally, his fiat currency completely failed; the public would no longer accept it at any price whatsoever, and at once barter held sway and slowly silver and gold began to come out of hiding, and the country was again on a hard metal basis.

But the Government had no hard money, and taxes were slow to provide ways and means. On September 15 Carranza decreed that the charters of the banks of emission were abrogated.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that September 15, 1916?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes, sir; and interveners for the Government were at once put in possession of these institutions.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was done with the metallic reserves of the banks?

Mr. McCALEB. The metallic reserves were immediately appropriated by the Government as their needs commanded.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you a statement based upon official information as to the total amount of the metallic reserves that were so appropriated?

Mr. McCALEB. I have. Up to September 30, 1918, the Carranza government had borrowed from the banks ₱58,162,933.95.

Mr. KEARFUL. This amount was all taken in gold and silver, was it not?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And in the process of liquidation what became of the money collected by the interveners of the Government?

Mr. McCALEB. As funds have been collected the statements supplied me by the Carranza officials will show that they have been diverted to Government uses. For example, two statements supplied me, as of February 28, 1918, and September 30, 1918, show that the Government has received from these banks as between these dates ₱3,350,716.95.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you, in the progress of your investigation in Mexico City, receive any statement from officials of the treasury department of the Government justifying their acts in reference to the liquidation of the banks and the borrowing of metallic reserves?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. By whom was that statement made?

Mr. McCALEB. By Señor J. G. Camacho.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was his position?

Mr. McCALEB. Chief of the department of banks.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was the minister of the department of the treasury?

Mr. McCALEB. The acting minister was Rafael Nieto, and the statement, I may add, supplied me by Camacho was authorized by Nieto.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you a correct translation of that statement in English?

Mr. McCALEB. I have.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you produce it for the record, please?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes.

(Witness produced a paper which he handed to Mr. Kearful.)

Mr. KEARFUL. The statement referred to will be inserted in the record at this point.

(The statement referred to is here printed in full, as follows:)

The notes contained in the chapter entitled "Banking" of the work, What is the Revolution? (Que es la Revolucion), written by Señor Don Antonio Manero—and which notes I believe will be considered reliable—display with great clearness the fundamental defects of the organization of the institutions of credit in the Mexican Republic, which defects may be synthesized thus: Privileges illegally granted, bad management, and very bad investments.

In fact, both the General Law of Institutions of Credit in force during the régime of Gen. Diaz and the concession contracts of the banks of issue were promulgated and granted in flagrant violation of our constitution of 1857, which provided definitely that no private concern shall enjoy privileges.

The banks in all their business operations were exempt from the payment of federal, local, and municipal taxes, and in order to foreclose their debtors they were not obliged to go to the courts of the Republic, but could accomplish that without the intervention of the judicial authorities.

All law must be considered as unconstitutional—even though it may have been decreed by the legislative houses of the union—when it exceeds the powers and prescriptions defined by the Constitution [Carta Fundamental].

The Huerta Government—denied needed resources by foreign countries through the decisive influence of nonrecognition by the United States—found it necessary to have recourse to the natural resources of the country and obtained from the banks a loan of about ₧40,000,000; through granting to them the right of raising the ratio of issue from two-to-one to three-to-one, without increasing the reserve. It declared bank notes, their own issues, legal tender throughout the Republic, which initiated the depreciation of the fiduciary paper.

The revolution, triumphant and carrying into practice its principles of justice, and cognizant besides of the fact that upon the banks was founded the power of the conservative classes which had directly supported the Government of Gen. Diaz, and which had overthrown the constitutional administration of Señor Madero, and elevated Huerta by the coup d'état of February—there was issued a series of laws tending to modify the banking organization in the Republic and to establish it upon the basis of justice, in order that it might fill its true mission in the life of the people.

Under date of September 29, 1915, it was ordered that the banks should adjust their circulation according to article 16 of the General Law of Institutions of Credit.

None of the banks could comply with the provisions of the above-mentioned regulation, and as the decree by the Huerta Government was illegal—on account of that administration having come into being, not by the will of the people, but through crime and force—the failure of the banks to adjust themselves to what the laws provided would have warranted the Government in declaring the confiscation of their concessions.

On analyzing the problem more deeply, it is to be seen that such concessions were subjected to defects in their origin, as stated before; and such was the foundation of the decree of September 15, 1916, by which the General Law of Institutions of Credit was declared abrogated and the concessions of the banks of issue declared null and void.

On formulating such regulation, consideration was given that the notes in circulation in the hands of the public should be guaranteed in some way, as well as the deposits which the public had confided to the institutions of credit.

These two conditions demanded the intervention of the public authorities in the banks of issue, so that those two matters should have attention in such manner that the interests of the public should not be prejudiced.

It seems unnecessary to emphasize the fact that the bad situation of the banks does not arise in any manner from the revolutionary movement or from the laws decreed by the latter, for such a state of affairs originated in the régime of Gen. Diaz, from causes which may be ascertained and to which I have previously referred.

The decree of December 14, 1916, having been promulgated, the Government intervened in the banks, and its concern with the institutions of credit has not been other than to procure by all possible means the conservation of the interests of the public performing all those operations which looked to the evading of a crisis and to facilitating the liquidation of the banks referred to. Such work has been very difficult, for, owing to their previous bad management, their portfolios are stuffed with unrealizable securities which have depreciated and which in reality do not represent even 30 per cent of the values at which they are carried on the books.

The bankers maintain that they saw themselves forced to accept great quantities of fiat paper in payment of their loans; but they do not admit that they were the direct cause of the depreciation of the issues put out by the Government, nor do they refer to the great quantities of their own notes bought with the other issues at truly ridiculous prices, as well as the many deposits which they liquidated at par in the same currency.

The legal regulations, upon which are based the acts of the Government, are included in the collection of decrees which I inclose with this short memorandum. Before concluding, I will permit myself to add that it is a matter already extensively debated and practically decided that the system of plurality of banks of issue is less efficient than one centralizing the matter of emissions.

Such an error in our banking system was recognized by Limantour himself, its founder, and in 1908 he tried to correct it by the issuance of a modificatory law of the General Law of Institutions of Credit, aiming to bring about the transformation of the banks of issue into refaccionario banks, and looking toward the end that the Banco Nacional should be the only bank of issue in the country. Such result could not be realized.

As the present Government of Señor Carranza is sure of the justice and honesty of its proceedings, all the data will be furnished to you that you may judge pertinent or necessary for the publication of your work.

Necessity is the supreme law; for the public affairs of the nation the Government saw itself under the necessity of disposing of part of the metallic reserves of the banks of issue; but such sums will be paid over by the Government without loss to the institutions of credit.

This sum amounts to $49,812,217.16, as you may see for yourself by the consolidated general balance which is supplied you.

Said quota as supplied by the banks are considered in their balances as cash on hand, now that the nation is responsible for them.

Mr. KEARFUL. In the beginning of this statement the author refers to a book entitled, "What is the Revolution?" by Antonio Manero, which he considers reliable. Who, if you know, was Antonio Manero?

Mr. McCALEB. He was formerly an employee of the Banco Nacional.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was his record as to reliability?

Mr. McCALEB. Bad, according to my understanding; and certainly he is not a student or economist.

Mr. KEARFUL. In the second paragraph of the statement the author asserts that the charters of the banks of issue were in flagrant violation of the constitution of 1857, which provided that no private concern shall enjoy privileges; and, further on, he justifies the act of the Government in annulling the bank charters and the general banking law on the ground that those charters and the law were unconstitutional.

What, if any, information have you with reference to statements made by Rafael Nieto, the acting minister of the department of the treasury, with reference to that point?

Mr. McCALEB. In an interview, reported in El Pueblo as of May 3, 1918, Nieto said:

In effect, of the 26 banks of emission and auxiliary in the Republic 20 must be declared in bankruptcy, since their assets will not cover by wide margins their liabilities, even though the Government should pay immediately and in full its obligations to them. Three of the remaining banks are not in a bad condition, but their capital is so small that they can be of little support in the organization of a new system of credit. The other three banks, although they may be able to cover their liabilities, taking into account what the Government owes them have lost nevertheless almost wholly their capital.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what respect do you regard that statement as being inconsistent with the position taken in the written statement made to you?

Mr. McCALEB. The statement to me declares that these banks were hopelessly insolvent and that they were operating in violation of the Constitution, which offered sufficient excuse for their being thrown into liquidation.

According to Señor Nieto's statement, at least six of them did not deserve to be thrown into liquidation unless this act had been taken under warrant of law and their unconstitutionality proven.

Mr. KEARFUL. What, if any, recent statement by President Carranza appears to be in conflict with the proposition that those banks were operating in violation of the Constitution of 1857?

Mr. McCaleb. In the President's message to Congress, this year, he stated, with respect to banks:

As yet the law has not been passed to which the final liquidation of the banks of emission and the auxiliary banks shall be subjected. Consequently the legal state in which these institutions find themselves is the same that prevailed a year ago.

Mr. Kearful. In this same message President Carranza refers to the fact that negotiations have been carried on looking toward permitting the banks of emission, whose financial condition appears satisfactory, to have such facilities as they may need to liquidate themselves or, he continues:

They may continue to operate as institutions of issue.

Is it not apparent to you that a proposition to negotiate in order that the banks of emission may continue to operate as institutions of issue is inconsistent with the proposition made to you that as institutions of issue they were operating contrary to the Constitution?

Mr. McCaleb. Yes; it strikes me as an inconsistency.

Mr. Kearful. He further said in his message that—

"The result of these negotiations is on the whole favorable to the public interest and to trade, and the conditions will permit sound banks to again begin their operations.

Is it possible to reconcile the proposition of permitting such of the banks as were sound to again begin their operations if their operations since their inception had been contrary to the Constitution?

Mr. McCaleb. It does not seem logical to me.

Mr. Kearful. In another paragraph of the statement made to you, which has been referred to, the author said:

The banks maintain that they saw themselves forced to accept great quantities of fiat paper in payment of their loans, but they do not admit that they were the direct cause of the depreciation of the issues put out by the Government.

Do you think it is correct that the banks were the direct cause of the depreciation of the issues put out by the Government?

Mr. McCaleb. I do not. I think it wholly incorrect.

Mr. Kearful. What was the direct cause of the depreciation?

Mr. McCaleb. There were several causes, and they are perfectly understood. There are certain laws which affect the circulation of fiat paper currency which are well known and understood. No country has succeeded in keeping a fiat currency in circulation without having to provide for definite metallic redemptions; and the Carranza Government having issued wholly a fiat currency, with no metallic reserves, and in interminable volume, could not have expected any other result than that eventually it would be so much worthless paper.

Mr. Kearful. Would it not then be correct to say that the Carranza Government which has taken that course was the direct cause of the depreciation, rather than the banks?

Mr. McCaleb. In my opinion that is quite correct.

Mr. Kearful. Is it not true that the banks were victims of this operation?

Mr. McCaleb. They were undoubtedly victims of circumstance, and suffered losses accordingly.

Mr. KEARFUL. The statement made to you by Camacho and Nieto goes on to insinuate that the banks benefited through the depreciation of those issues of fiat money because of—the great quantities of their own notes bought with the other issues at ridiculous prices as well as the deposits which they liquidated at par in the same currency.

What can you say with reference to the correctness of that statement?

Mr. McCaleb. As stated above in my testimony, the records, so far as I have been able to uncover them, appear to disprove this insinuation. In short, the banks suffered very material loss through the fiat currency operations.

Mr. KEARFUL. You did state that the banks of issue were able to recoup by being able to buy in their own notes at a discount, and also to liquidate a part of their deposits in this depreciated currency. Did the advantages of these two classes of operations equalize the losses which the banks suffered by reason of having forced upon them the depreciated currency?

Mr. McCaleb. Not according to my information.

Mr. KEARFUL. For instance, you stated that according to your information the Banco Nacional had suffered loss to the extent of 30,000,000 pesos, and that it had been able to recoup through purchases of its own notes and liquidation of deposits in depreciated currency to the extent of about 7,000,000 pesos.

Mr. McCaleb. Yes; that is true. It would be necessary, I may say, to see the balance sheets of these institutions before any final tabulation can be made as to final results.

Mr. KEARFUL. The statement made to you refers also to the inefficiency of a system of plurality of banks of issue and contemplates the establishment of a single bank of emission. What can you say, if anything, with reference to the progress of the project of establishing a single bank of emission in Mexico by the Carranza Government?

Mr. McCaleb. The constitution of 1917 provides for a Banco Unico, which shall be a bank of emission. Arrangements were made for the inauguration of this bank last spring a year ago. The notes had been printed, but nothing further has been done, for the reason that the Government has not been able to mobilize metallic reserves sufficient to enable it to open its doors.

Mr. KEARFUL. What difficulties has the Government encountered, if you know, with reference to the establishment of an adequate metallic reserve for such a bank? Has the Government made any attempt to borrow the money?

Mr. McCaleb. I understand the Government has made two or three serious efforts, not only in the United States but abroad, to borrow funds, some of which I understand were to have been dedicated to the purpose of financing the Banco Unico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Lill, in testimony previously given before the committee, makes the statement that the yearly income of the Mexican Government at the present time is about 130,000,000 pesos. Why is it that a sufficient portion of that income could not be utilized to establish a metallic reserve for such a bank or arrange for the flotation of loans to secure such metallic reserve?

Mr. McCaleb. If any such sum as 130,000,000 pesos per annum is raised in Mexico at the present time through taxation, or what not, the Mexican Government admittedly confesses it is insufficient to pay current accounts; much less can it hope to set aside any portion of its revenues for the purpose of creating metallic reserve for its Banco Unico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you mean by current accounts?

Mr. McCALEB. Its current expenses, the payment of its soldiers, its schoolteachers, the payment even of the employees of the hacienda. When I was in Mexico in May, 1918, on one day, especially, I remember there was a great furor in the national palace, and I discovered that the employees of the hacienda were clamoring for a portion of their salaries.

Mr. KEARFUL. Does not the Mexican Government also confess inability to pay any of the interest on its indebtedness?

Mr. McCALEB. It does.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you informed as to whether the Carranza Government has ever paid any interest on any of its indebtedness or any of the depositors of the banks or the creditors of the banks from which it has taken the money, or anything to the stockholders of those banks?

Mr. McCALEB. So far as my knowledge extends, the Carranza Government has paid nothing on its outstanding funded obligations; except, I think, I may qualify this by saying that according to report it has made three small payments to the bondholders who converted their Veracruz currencies under the special decree calling for their retirement. They were very insignificant.

Mr. KEARFUL. Can you state the amounts paid?

Mr. McCALEB. The total for the three payments amounts to less than 8,000,000 pesos.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you any idea that the Carranza Government would be able in any way to secure a sufficient metallic reserve for the establishment of the bank mentioned?

Mr. McCALEB. I do not think so. As further evidence of this apparent discouragement on the part of the ruling régime in Mexico, the project for the Banco Unico and the project for a general banking system covering institutions of credit have been recently withdrawn from the Congress.

Mr. KEARFUL. The statement made to you by Camacho and Nieto refers also to the fact that there existed a large amount of unrealizable securities in the possession of the banks which had very largely depreciated. What have you to say with reference to the responsibility in general for the depreciation of the securities of banks?

Mr. McCALEB. It is not surprising that the banks should find themselves loaded up with slow and neglected paper, due to revolutionary conditions.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think, then, on the whole, that the revolutionary conditions were more responsible than bad management for this condition?

Mr. McCALEB. I do.

Mr. KEARFUL. What might have been bad management in the view of the revolution would have been perfectly good business if the country had remained in a state of order; is not that true?

Mr. McCALEB. I think it is. It seems to me that such a proposition is self-sustaining, that it is perfectly conceivable that a chattel mortgage on a herd of cattle made under normal conditions was what might have been considered a good loan. Under revolutionary conditions this security completely disappears. Result: A bad loan, or a loan, at all events, requiring attention and husbanding under normal conditions.

Mr. KEARFUL. If disorder continues, the security for a loan of that kind absolutely disappears, does it not?

Mr. McCALEB. It is very likely to; and the moral and other responsibilities of the maker may be lost entirely.

Mr. KEARFUL. What you have stated in reference to a chattel mortgage on a herd of cattle is generally true, is it not, with reference to all chattel mortgages and also personal indorsements?

Mr. McCALEB. That is measurably true. Also it might be added that when loans are secured by deposit of stocks and bonds, these stocks and bonds may through revolution be terribly affected through the destructive processes.

Mr. KEARFUL. If, for instance, a manufacturing establishment that had issued stocks and bonds was looted and destroyed, such stocks and bonds would become practically worthless except in so far as there might be liability for such destruction. Is not that true?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes; as I conceive it, it is true.

Mr. KEARFUL. In the face of such a destruction, leaving perhaps a doubtful claim only to be resorted to, certainly nothing could be realized or presently realized upon such stocks or bonds; is not that true?

Mr. McCALEB. That is quite true, until reconstruction processes have set in.

Mr. KEARFUL. In a situation of that kind it would be impossible for banks holding such securities to realize upon them for the purpose of maintaining their reserves; is not that correct?

Mr. McCALEB. As I understand it, that is true.

(Whereupon, at 5.25 o'clock p. m., an adjournment was taken until to-morrow, Wednesday, November 25, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.)

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., November 25, 1919, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the Subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate:

TESTIMONY OF MR. WALTER FLAVIUS McCALEB—Continued.

Mr. KEARFUL. At the last session you referred to President Carranza's statement that negotiations were in progress looking to the resumption of operations by some of the banks whose charters had been revoked on the ground that they had been operating under charters and laws contrary to the Constitution. Have you any further information with reference to the resumption of operations by any of those banks?

Mr. McCALEB. I understand that the Banco Nacional has been permitted to resume exchange operations, which probably presages a more liberal attitude on the part of the Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. And such operations are conducted by the Government officials in charge of the bank, are they not?

Mr. McCALEB. That is ultimately true. The Government interveners must O. K. all transactions.

Mr. KEARFUL. The profits derived from such operations are appropriated by the Government, the same as other assets of the bank, as they come into the hands of the officials?

Mr. McCALEB. If past experience can be accepted as affording criteria for judgment, then I should say that would be the result of all operations undertaken by banking institutions, so long as they remain in the hands of the Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do not understand, do you, that this bank is permitted to purchase its notes, which are at a large discount in the market?

Mr. McCALEB. The bank has not been permitted to undertake independent operations in any direction. As for purchasing its notes in the open market, first of all, it has had no funds wherewith to make such purchase. As indicated in an earlier answer, according to the statements issued by the Government, it is shown that as rapidly as moneys are accumulated, through whatever device on the part of the bank, they are absorbed by the Carranza Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. I should like to have you make a comparison of the condition of banks at the time of the fall of Huerta and at the present time, beginning with the shrinkage of assets.

Mr. McCaleb. The total of assets for banks of issue as of June 30, 1914, reached ₱731,546,377. The total assets admitted as of September 30, 1918, were ₱396,414,070.

Mr. KEARFUL. Admitted by whom and in what manner?

Mr. McCaleb. Admitted by the present Government in a statement prepared by the department of banks and sent to me by Señor Camacho, the chief of that department. I ought to explain, however, that the totals of two banking institutions are not included in the statement, which would make a difference of a few million pesos.

Mr. KEARFUL. What two banks are those referred to?

Mr. McCaleb. The Banco Minero, of Chihuahua, and the Banco de Sonora. The latter bank has made no statements to the Mexican Government for a number of years, for the reason that it managed to escape over the border into Arizona with its metallic assets and with its portfolios, and since that time it has been doing business under an Arizona charter. As for the Banco Minero, no report is indicated from it in the two specially prepared statements given to me by the department of banking in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. How do you account for that?

Mr. McCaleb. Perhaps it may be explained through the isolation of the parent bank. I know no fully satisfactory reason for this state of affairs.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the total of the assets of these two banks according to the last statement available?

Mr. McCaleb. According to the detailed statement published as of June 30, 1914, the Banco Minero had assets of ₱24,997,483.96. This total, of course, would be subject to the same shrinkage as the others; that is, it would be reduced about half, if the assets of this institution have dwindled as have the assets of those banks which are reported by the Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are speaking as of June 30, 1914?

Mr. McCaleb. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And not referring to the shrinkage as of the present time?

Mr. McCaleb. No; I am referring to the shrinkage as between the dates June 30, 1914, and November, 1919.

The Banco de Sonora had assets in June, 1914, of ₱13,299,887.11. Of course, as to this bank the Mexican Government has no knowledge, hence no statement is made of its assets as of the present time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Proceed with the comparison with reference to the capital and surplus of the various banks.

Mr. McCaleb. In June, 1914, the capital of the banks of issue totaled ₱115,525,000. The surplus amounted to ₱44,127,188.24.

The total capital and surplus of the banks of issue, the auxiliary banks and the mortgage banks amounted to ₱205,194,287.

As compared with this, the capital admitted as of September 30, 1918, of the banks of issue is ₱109,205,000. The surplus funds amount to ₱38,992,409.

The statement of September 30, 1918, shows notes in circulation totaling ₱123,728,820.50.

There is before the Government the problem of rendering account to the depositors, to the stockholders and to the noteholders of a definite stewardship. That the Government has assumed a direct liability to these three classes of people there can scarcely be a doubt.

It has taken over the banking institutions ostensibly with a warrant of law. After three years in which liquidations have proceeded to some extent, the Government is brought to the point of making the pronouncement that at least some of the banking institutions may resume their functions.

Mr. KEARFUL. Speaking of the resumption of operations, does that mean that the Government is prepared to restore the metallic reserves and make good the assets that have been collected and appropriated?

Mr. McCaleb. I think as a matter of fact at the moment it would be impossible for the Government to restore the moneys which it took from the vaults of the banks; nor do I think it possible for these institutions to resume their full functioning until these reserves have been restored; and besides, certain moratoria would need for a time to be maintained with respect to deposits, redemption of notes, etc.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you heard of any proposition by the Government to restore the reserves for the purpose of enabling the banks to proceed?

Mr. McCaleb. Nothing definite. There has been some talk among officials about permitting the banks to resume business, but the Government has been helpless in the matter of restoring to the banks the reserves which they took away with the explanation that they were appropriated in order to guarantee the redemption of the notes in circulation.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it not true that the current expenses of the Government far exceed its total revenues from all sources?

Mr. McCaleb. It is true in my opinion.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it not also true that the Mexican Government has made several attempts to borrow money for banking purposes and has been unable to do so?

Mr. McCaleb. That is my understanding, and I think I have somewhere stated that under present conditions it would be impossible in my opinion for the Mexican Government to borrow money from any legitimate banking source.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you please proceed with a statement, if you are able to do so, in reference to the probable amount of liability of the Mexican Government to the banks, their shareholders, noteholders, and depositors.

Mr. McCaleb. The position I take with respect to the losses engendered through Government intervention in the realm of banks must deal in the main with generalities, so far as losses are concerned. I think that both in morals and in law if it can be shown that the Mexican Government unlawfully took over the banking institutions of the country, depleted the metallic reserves, and held these institutions for three years or more in complete subjugation to the will of the Government, that the Government must perforce have assumed a liability to noteholder first of all, to depositor, and lastly to stockholder. To the latter undoubtedly will be due an accounting for his capital invested as well as for dividends covering the intervened years, and also an accounting for the destruction wrought in the going values of these institutions. Just what these totals may work into no one can say. That depends on the assets remaining in the banks and with what degree of intelligence they are liquidated.

But certainly, in all good faith, the Government must see that the noteholders are paid at par, that the deposits are liquidated at par, and that the shareholders shall be fully reimbursed.

The notes outstanding in the last statement available as of September 30, 1918, totaled ₱123,728,000; deposits, ₱41,000,000; capital and surplus, ₱148,025,000.

Besides these data the capital of the auxiliary banks amounts to a total of ₱28,200,000, surplus of ₱700,000, deposits of ₱19,000,000, bonds outstanding as of June 30, 1914, ₱7,000,000. If we allow for the going values of these institutions, that figure, based on previous earnings, can be conservatively estimated at ₱50,000,000.

This would give a grand total of assumed liabilities of ₱438,900,000.

As an offset to this amount the Mexican Government would have the assets of the banks, which it has estimated officially to be worth not in excess of 30 per cent of their face values. If the Mexican estimate is correct and the total assets of the institutions can be liquidated for not more than ₱188,400,000, the Government stands to lose through its interference with the banks approximately ₱225,000,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of a statement made by President Carranza with reference to the amount of outstanding bank notes and the amount at which they might be taken up?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes; he referred to this in his message to Congress of September, 1918, giving a total of the outstanding bank notes, which at that time approximated ₱126,000,000. He remarked that these could be bought in the market for approximately ₱25,000,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you made a study of the budgetary operations of Mexico from the earliest times?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes; I have.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you an authoritative statement with reference to the financial conditions of Mexico under Spanish rule?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes; I have.

Mr. KEARFUL. What does that statement show with reference to receipts and expenditures?

Mr. McCALEB. That statement shows that the net revenues of Mexico for an average year amounted to ₱8,855,402; that there were exported ₱3,011,664; leaving to cover the costs for the operations of the Government of Mexico ₱5,843,738.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were the expenses of the Government more or less than the amount designated for that purpose?

Mr. McCALEB. The experience of the Colonial Government over many years showed that the revenue collected had been ample to cover the costs of the administration, and, besides, a substantial quota was exported.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the condition of revenue and governmental expense, beginning with the revolution of Hidalgo in 1810?

Mr. McCALEB. For several years following 1810 there was the utmost confusion throughout the country. The budgetary statements are fragmentary. In 1819 the country was almost pacified and there was nearly a return to the earlier conditions. However, things turned for the worse, culminating in 1821 in the achievement of the independence of the country.

In 1822, however, we find the Mexican Government struggling with its budget. That year they reported revenues at ₱9,328,740, with expenditures of ₱18,455,377.

Mr. KEARFUL. From that time forth when was the first year in which the revenues exceeded the expenses of the Government?

Mr. McCALEB. In answer to that question I may say that the budgetary equilibriums were not restored in Mexico until 1895.

There was a point I wish to call your attention to in connection with the budget for 1822. There was entered in the expenditures, covering the war and Navy for that year, a total of ₱9,430,790, an item almost double the costs covering the whole of the administration of Mexico under the Spanish régime. And I may answer that during the subsequent years down to the time of Porfirio Diaz the appropriations in this division of the budget were excessively large as compared with the total of expenditures.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there ever a time from 1822 to the time of Porfirio Diaz when the revenues of the country were sufficient to meet its current expenses?

Mr. McCALEB. Probably not, if one excludes from the sources the extraordinary elements, such as anticipated taxes and enforced loans.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what year did the budget show a net balance in favor of the Government for the first time after 1822?

Mr. McCALEB. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895.

Mr. KEARFUL. For how long did that condition continue?

Mr. McCALEB. That condition continued down to June 30, 1913.

Mr. KEARFUL. You might give the figures for June 30, 1895.

Mr. McCALEB. The budget totals for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895 were on the revenue side ₱43,945,699, and on the expenditure side ₱41,372,265, leaving a net credit balance of ₱3,706,387.

Mr. KEARFUL. Now, give the totals for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

Mr. McCALEB. On the revenue side we have ₱109,257,500; on the expenditure side we have ₱109,245,944.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the totals shown for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914?

Mr. McCALEB. In the revenue account we have ₱129,607,000; expenditures amounted to ₱141,156,332.

Mr. KEARFUL. What has been the budgetary condition since that date?

Mr. McCALEB. For the next year ended June 30, 1915, we have totals given from fairly responsible sources of ₱145,957,000 on the revenue side as against expenditures of ₱152,204,898, and from that date forward there are not available, so far as I know, any trustworthy figures covering budgetary operations.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you make an effort to ascertain those figures when you were making your investigation in Mexico in 1918?

Mr. McCALEB. I did. I exerted myself to the utmost to discover any figures upon which reliance could be placed, but my efforts were unavailing.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did the officials of the department of the treasury tell you with respect to those figures?

Mr. McCALEB. The officials explained to me, with apologies always, that the data had not been assembled. Senor Nieto, acting head of hacienda, called in a number of his under officers and gave them instructions to find for me and give me all possible assistance in the matter of my search for budgetary data, and I regret to report that beyond banking statements and certain tax statements I gained no information which would at all enable me to construct a budgetary statement for any particular year.

Mr. KEARFUL. What information have you from official messages of President Carranza with reference to budgetary operations?

Mr. McCALEB. In his message to Congress of September, 1918, the President stated that the estimates covering expenditures for the year 1918 reached a total of ₱187,135,871.41, but that this total would have to be increased to ₱199,000,000 approximately, on account of the creation of new departments, and on account of expenditures incurred through the establishment of military factories, but he says that based on specific expenditures during the period ending July 31 he figured that the total expenditures of the country would not exceed ₱155,000,000 for the year ending December 31.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did he say, if anything, with reference to revenues?

Mr. McCALEB. On the score of revenues he said that he was glad to inform Congress that they had reached a point of covering the absolute necessities. He itemizes the sources of his revenues under customs dues over a period running from the 1st of September, 1917, to the 31st of May, 1918, as follows:

Dues on imports.....	₱22,600,000
Dues on exports.....	7,800,000
Other items.....	3,000,000
Total	33,400,000

Under stamp taxes, covering the same period above indicated, he itemizes returns as follows:

On petroleum.....	₱5,900,000
On metals.....	7,500,000
Other items.....	45,300,000
Total	58,700,000

He also carries in his revenue account:

From consulates.....	₱3,200,000
From mails.....	3,999,999
From the telegraph.....	2,000,000
From national and intervened properties.....	1,600,000
From divers sources.....	690,000
Grand total of	102,590,000

This covered a period of nine months.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the total of the three items of "other and divers" sources?

Mr. McCALEB. ₱48,990,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there any information from which you can state what those "other sources" were?

Mr. McCALEB. I have no information. I should indeed like to see an analysis, particularly of the "otros conceptos" listed under the general heading of "stamp taxes" of ₱45,300,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are there any items of revenue known to you which are not otherwise enumerated in this schedule?

Mr. McCaleb. I can not say. I do not know how far his headings "otros conceptos" may serve as blanket entries covering all manner of odds and ends of revenues. So far as I can see, from my knowledge of budgetary systems, there is no reason why we should not have had more details with respect to these large entries. Certainly there must be some very important sources of revenue covered in such headings, inasmuch as their totals carry 50 per cent of the total revenues.

Mr. Kearful. What sources of possible revenues could there be other than those specifically enumerated which could amount to any such sum?

Mr. McCaleb. I can not well conceive what these hidden sources may be. Probably, for instance, there is included the sums "borrowed" from banking institutions and probably profits on the operations of the mint, and perhaps even profits from the sale of properties which have been taken over.

Mr. Kearful. Does it not in your opinion also cover the receipts from the operation of railroads and express companies?

Mr. McCaleb. Yes; I should say that doubtless it does cover such items as revenues acquired through the operation of the railroads and the street-car systems, the express companies, and another item of importance probably here included is that of the predial tax or Federal contribution levied by the States.

Mr. Kearful. Have you calculated the amount for one year based on the figures given for the 9 months?

Mr. McCaleb. Yes; based on the 9 months' experience the total for a year would reach ₱136,786,656 as against the estimated expenditures of ₱155,000,000.

Mr. Kearful. Have you a subsequent statement made by President Carranza in the present year?

Mr. McCaleb. Yes; in his message to Congress in September of this year he set out a budgetary statement. He shows receipts to total for 10 months ₱135,301,000. This is broken up under a number of heads. The import dues, for instance, are given at 27,600,000; the export dues at 6,450,000, showing a loss over the preceding year; the port dues are placed at 1,644,000. Stamp taxes on oils are figured at 13,100,000; on metals at 11,900,000. Ordinary stamp taxes foot up 11,550,000; the Federal contribution tax, 27,100,000; "other sources," 72,178,000; from consulates, 5,000,000; mail and telegraph, approximately 7,400,000; nationalized properties, 730,000, from divers sources, 649,000; all of which yields a total for 10 months of ₱135,301,000.

Carranza estimates total receipts for the year of ₱162,000,000. On the score of expenditures he figured they would total ₱199,000,000 for the year ending December 31. Details, however, he would not enter upon.

Mr. Kearful. Is there any indication in either of President Carranza's statements that any provision was made for the payment of any debts or the interest on debts?

Mr. McCaleb. No effort has been made to pay the charges on the public debt or on the debts in general of the country, so far as foreign holdings are concerned. And on the score of giving attention to the Mexican bonded debt, I was told by Senor Neito, when plied with the question as to when Mexico would resume interest payments on these foreign-held securities, that Mexico was going to wait to see what other nations did with respect to their bonded debts.

(Thereupon, at 12.30 o'clock p. m., a recess was taken until 1.15 o'clock p. m.)

AFTER RECESS.

At 1.15 o'clock p. m. the committee reassembled pursuant to the taking of recess.

Mr. KEARFUL. Coming now to the funded debt of Mexico, will you describe the different forms of this debt?

Mr. McCALEB. The funded debt of Mexico may be grouped under the following heads:

1. External, or gold debt.
2. Internal, or silver debt.
3. Guaranteed debt under State obligations.
4. Guaranteed debt under railway obligations.
5. Guaranteed municipal debts.
6. Guaranteed caja de prestamos.

Mr. KEARFUL. There has been some confusion as to what constitutes the external debt and the internal debt of Mexico. Will you define exactly what constitutes the external debt?

Mr. McCALEB. In point of time the external debt was the first bonded debt contracted by Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the point of distinction between the external and the internal debts?

Mr. McCALEB. The main point of distinction lies in the fact that the external debt is a gold debt; that is to say, the external debt in the main has been created abroad and has been based on the gold standards of the European countries. The Mexican peso has been distinctly set down in its equivalent in foreign moneys based on gold standards. These foreign bonds as a rule on their face contain a table setting out these equivalents in the coinage of the leading countries, such as pound, mark, franc, and peso.

Mr. KEARFUL. Now, the internal debt.

Mr. McCALEB. The internal debt, which was first funded in 1850—that is to say, provision was made for the funding of the internal debt in 1850—is based on the Mexican silver peso. The actual funding operation extended over several years. Under present conditions of fluctuating silver values some difficulties may develop in the future, particularly if in the face of these bonds the silver peso is referred to as of a definite weight and fineness.

Mr. KEARFUL. What events have you in mind as resulting in such difficulties?

Mr. McCALEB. I am referring specifically to the demonitizations of the silver peso which have occurred recently, the silver content having been reduced on two several occasions.

Mr. KEARFUL. To what extent has it been reduced?

Mr. McCALEB. It has been reduced by more than 50 per cent in order to maintain a parity between the actual silver contained in the peso in relation to the gold peso. This condition has been brought about by the abnormal price ruling in the markets of the world for silver.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you state briefly the origin and growth of the external debt from the beginning to the time of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. McCaleb. When the Mexican Government was organized in 1821 deficits began to run in the budgetary accounts. The necessary revenues could not be raised through taxation, hence forced loans were resorted to, and in 1824 a loan of $16,000,000 was negotiated in London. That was the first external debt created by Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What security was given for the payment of this debt?

Mr. McCaleb. The whole of the revenues of the country were assigned.

Mr. KEARFUL. Assigned means that they were pledged?

Mr. McCaleb. Were pledged as a security for the payment of the debt.

Mr. KEARFUL. What other securities were subsequently given for the payment of debts and existing at the incoming of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. McCaleb. Practically all the revenues of the country were pledged to secure indebtedness of one character or another. Almost the whole of the internal taxes were pledged, even the mints of the country were mortgaged. It may be said that only the fragments of the sources of revenue were left to the administration. It must be remembered, however, that very few administrations indeed during the whole course of Mexican history had paid any attention to the obligations of the Mexican Government in the matter of these assignments of revenues, whether of internal or customs dues. When funds were accumulated, as they were in some instances, if the need arose they were appropriated by the faction which happened to be in power.

Mr. KEARFUL. When was the first time in the history of the Mexican Government that customs receipts actually were set aside and used to meet the obligations of the external debt?

Mr. McCaleb. Not until the time of Diaz.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the amount of the external debt at the time of the incoming of Diaz?

Mr. McCaleb. In 1880 Diaz appointed a committee charged with working out a plan for the consolidation of this debt, and in June of that year this committee estimated it to be 191,385,781 pesos, of which total 46,431,996 pesos was accrued interest.

Mr. KEARFUL. Had any interest ever been paid upon any of this debt from the time of the first one in 1824 up to that time?

Mr. McCaleb. From time to time over all this period there were readjustments of this external debt. Comparatively small attention was paid, as a matter of fact, to foreign obligations. This, it must be said by way of mitigation, had been largely the result of the chaotic state in which the country found itself. That is to say, it was rent with factional controversies and civil commotions. It is not here possible for me to give you the amount of interest that was actually paid on the foreign debt over this period. It can be said, however, that it amounts to a small sum. Probably the largest single item in that account came out of the indemnity paid by the United States to Mexico at the conclusion of the Mexican War. A portion of these funds was transferred to English creditors, but in order to secure these funds they submitted to a heavy scaling of their indebtedness plus a reduction in the rate of interest.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean by "indemnity" the amount voluntarily paid by the United States to Mexico in consideration of the territory that was taken as a result of the war?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What information have you with reference to the remission of interest or the scaling down of the external debt at any time?

Mr. McCALEB. I have a lot of information on these various bonding operations which mainly were concerned with the funding of interest or the refunding of the bond issues themselves. On a number of occasions the holders of these foreign bonds scaled their accounts heavily in the belief that they were putting them in better condition through securing assignments of customs dues or through the promise of receiving a small cash payment.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did something of that kind occur as a result of the payment by the United States to Mexico of the purchase price of territory?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes; that was one case I had in mind. At that time the London bankers scaled their debt more than £3,000,000, or $15,000,000 in round figures. They also reduced the rate of interest on the outstanding indebtedness to 3 per cent, and received as compensation an assignment of 25 per cent of the customs dues, plus $2,500,000 of the moneys which the United States Government had obligated itself to pay to the Mexican Government. Payno, one of the distinguished Mexican financiers, who was for many years connected with the Hacienda, estimates that this transaction alone worked out for Mexico a saving of more than ₡25,789,970. The annual carrying charge on the budget was reduced by the operation from ₡3,337,853 to ₡1,674,146.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there a similar scaling operation that occurred previously?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes; and some afterwards.

Subsequently, in 1886, the English debt was converted and there was a great saving to Mexico in the operation. It may be added that on several occasions over the 60 years following independence readjustments were made and always, I think, in favor of Mexico. Of course, on the other side of the account is the claim that Mexico in these earlier transactions had met with hard bargains. As a matter of fact, the bulk of the foreign indebtedness of Mexico had grown out of the two first loans made and from time to time the fundings of interest.

Mr. KEARFUL. Can you give an example of one of those hard bargains which occurred in the time of Benito Juarez?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes; in 1865 a loan was negotiated in New York for ₡2,925,450. The commission on this loan was ₡1,000,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the situation of Juarez at that time?

Mr. McCALEB. Rather perilous, and a loan could have been made to him only by one who was willing to take a gambler's chance, since it was not impossible that he might have been entirely defeated and driven from the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. In which event it might be anticipated that the loan would be entirely repudiated?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Would you consider the situation as somewhat comparable to the present one in case Carranza should succeed in making a foreign loan?

Mr. McCALEB. There are certain points in common, and yet the cases are somewhat dissimilar. At the time Juarez, through his agent, negotiated his loan he had been practically driven out of Mexico and was hanging onto the northern fringe of Chihuahua, and Maximilian had been established as Emperor in the capital.

In the case of Carranza I think a loan negotiated by him would be held to be legitimate, since he is the de facto if not the de jure President of that Republic.

Mr. KEARFUL. However, it seems that there may be this point of similarity, that the lender would consider that he was taking a gambler's chance in regard to the fulfillment of the obligations of a loan made by the present Government, is that right?

Mr. McCALEB. That is quite right as I interpret it. The fact is that Juarez did the best he could under the circumstances to make good his foreign obligations. His Congress passed a law setting in abeyance for two years the application of the customs dues on the foreign debt, thus endeavoring to give color of law to his operations, whereas while the customs dues are now assigned as a whole to meet the obligations of Mexico, no effort has been made to consolidate these dues as they deserve to be in trust, nor is attempt made to give color of legal status to the case.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the first time in the history of the Mexican Government that the obligations of the Government were punctually met?

Mr. McCALEB. Under Porfirio Diaz.

Mr. KEARFUL. At what time of his career?

Mr. McCALEB. Beginning in his second administration.

Mr. KEARFUL. Throughout the Diaz administration, as I understand you, the pledges that had been given to secure the Mexican debt were honestly set aside and used to meet those obligations. Is that true?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes, that is true; although there were delays and delinquencies prior to 1895.

Mr. KEARFUL. Beginning with that year were the interest charges and other obligations of the Mexican debt punctually paid?

Mr. McCALEB. They were punctually paid from 1895, but I think from 1886 onward, with possibly some exceptions, the carrying charges were paid on the external debt. I have not at hand a complete memorandum on this point. Certainly after 1895 without exception, all payments were punctually met.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was effected under the Diaz régime with respect to eliminating the pledges of internal revenues?

Mr. McCALEB. When Diaz came into power the second time he found a most unfortunate situation.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was in 1880?

Mr. McCALEB. In 1884. He found practically the whole of the revenues of the country impounded in one way or another. His earliest efforts, were, therefore, dedicated to freeing the revenues of the country from creditors, and in this he was quite successful.

Mr. KEARFUL. About what time was he successful in accomplishing that?

Mr. McCaleb. That was in his second administration.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was anything effected by him with reference to the reduction of the amount of customs receipts that had been pledged?

Mr. McCaleb. At the moment my recollection serves me ill. I think in his readjustment of the debt in 1886 he secured the release of a considerable portion of the customs dues assigned to secure the English obligations.

Mr. KEARFUL. In the refunding operation of 1899, I believe it was, what was the percentage of the customs receipts that were pledged to secure the entire funded external debt?

Mr. McCaleb. Dublan, Minister of Hacienda, in a statement of October, 1885, recites that at that date no part of the country yielded the treasury more than 12.63 per cent of the sums collected, and in most cases only 5.1 per cent. In other words, all except those percentages was assigned to secure the public debt.

The flotation of 1899 consolidated the exterior issues of 1888, 1890, and 1893 and was put out on a basis of 96 to 97½ at an interest rate of 5 per cent. I have not at hand the data with respect to the percentage of customs dues assigned to take care of this indebtedness.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you the data in that respect relating to the subsequent refunding operation of 1910? Please describe, if you can, that operation.

Mr. McCaleb. The refunding operation of 1910 contemplated the retirement of the 1899 issue of bonds. The sale was actually made at a basis of 98 of $111,000,000 of bonds bearing only 4 per cent interest, which was a remarkable illustration of the advanced standing Mexican bonds had taken in the markets of the world.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you any information as to the quotation of those bonds on the markets?

Mr. McCaleb. I have no definite dates and quotations at hand, but in the main they circulated at premiums in the European markets.

To return to your question as to customs assignments, I want to say that 62 per cent of the customs dues were assigned to secure the issues of 1899 and 1910.

Mr. KEARFUL. From 1895 throughout the rule of Porfirio Diaz, what is your information in reference to punctuality of the Government in meeting its obligations arising from the external debt?

Mr. McCaleb. No Government could have been more punctual according to the records.

Mr. KEARFUL. When was the last payment of interest upon Mexico's external debt?

Mr. McCaleb. On the consolidated loan of 1899 the last interest was paid July 1, 1914. Other payments were made in April and June, but none after July 1.

Mr. KEARFUL. Had all obligations of the Mexican Government been met up to that time?

Mr. McCaleb. They had been.

Mr. KEARFUL. Running through the period of Madero's presidency and the time of Huerta, who abdicated in July, 1914?

Mr. McCaleb. Huerta did the best he could to meet punctually his foreign obligations, but failed in the end.

Mr. KEARFUL. At the time of the abdication of Porfirio Diaz, what amount of money was turned over to his successor?

Mr. McCaleb. ₱64,671,595.

Mr. Kearful. And at that time, as I understand, the credit of the Mexican Government was excellent, and for some years previously its bonds had been selling at a premium in the markets of the world?

Mr. McCaleb. Yes, sir; that is true.

Mr. Kearful. What amount of money was turned over to Huerta as the successor to Madero?

Mr. McCaleb. The treasury condition had gone from bad to worse under Madero. He had borrowed ₱40,000,000 in New York. His congress had provided for a loan of £20,000,000 prior to his going out. The treasury was practically bankrupt when Huerta came into authority.

Mr. Kearful. What further loans did Huerta negotiate?

Mr. McCaleb. Huerta took up where Madero left off and conducted a negotiation in Europe on the score of the £20,000,000 loan which had been authorized by the Madero Congress. He made a contract with a European syndicate and sold an issue of these bonds in a total of £6,000,000. With this money he retired to ₱40,000,000 owing in New York.

Mr. Kearful. Borrowed by Madero?

Mr. McCaleb. Borrowed by Madero; and he paid the interest on a number of the Mexican debts.

Mr. Kearful. What rate of interest did the £6,000,000 bear?

Mr. McCaleb. Six per cent; a 10-year issue.

Mr. Kearful. Upon what basis were they sold?

Mr. McCaleb. My recollection is they were sold on the basis of 90, and the bonds carried an assignment of 38 per cent of the customs dues.

Mr. Kearful. Which, added to the 62 per cent previously pledged under the Diaz Government, comprised the total of the customs dues of the country.

Mr. McCaleb. That is true.

Mr. Kearful. What amount, if any, was turned over by Huerta when he abdicated?

Mr. McCaleb. I can not say.

Mr. Kearful. Have you any information as to whether the amount was considerable or insignificant?

Mr. McCaleb. I am inclined to think that the amount was inconsiderable.

Mr. Kearful. What further obligations were incurred by Huerta's successor, Carbajal?

Mr. McCaleb. Prior to Carbajal's incumbency provision had been made for an internal bond issue of ₱60,000,000.

Mr. Kearful. Provision was made by the Madero Congress?

Mr. McCaleb. No; by the Huerta Congress for a ₱60,000,000 internal issue. Carbajal took 10,000,000 of those bonds and placed them in the hands of the Comision de Cambios y Moneda and issued against these ten millions of bonds certificates which circulated as currency. In all, about seven millions were issued by him.

Mr. Kearful. What is the total amount of the external debt of Mexico at this time?

Mr. McCaleb. The total amount of the external debt of Mexico is approximately ₱828,000,000, including interest. If anything, this statement is under, on account of the fact that the interest charge has been in some cases estimated, but with the firm belief that the same is under rather than over.

The items of this total are shown by the following table:

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the total amount of the internal debt?

Mr. McCALEB. The internal debt approximates ₱235,500,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. The last item in this table is bonds to employees ₱27,000,000. What is the basis of that item?

Mr. McCALEB. The Government has not been able to pay its employees in full and from time to time makes up the deficit by giving them quotas of bonds. Carranza in his message of September 1, 1918, gave the total as approximating ₱27,000,000. Of course, this has been augmented during the present year but just how much we have no means of knowing.

Mr. KEARFUL. Does Carranza recognize the obligation of the Carbajal issue or the Huerta issue?

Mr. McCALEB. Carranza has not officially recognized the Huerta issue. On the contrary, Cabrera is reported as rejecting it. Carranza did recognize the Carbajal issue to the extent that he himself issued certificates under the arrangement which Carbajal had employed. Furthermore, Carranza recognized the Carbajal issue by including it in his decree calling for the redemption or retirement of the currency issues of the country prior to the inauguration of his infalsificable currency plan.

Mr. KEARFUL. Including in that the Carbajal issue?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What then do you figure the grand total of the Mexican obligations as represented by the unquestionable funded debt?

Mr. McCALEB. At ₱1,063,503,400, principal and interest.

Mr. KEARFUL. You estimated the liability of the Mexican Government on account of its banking operations at approximately ₱225,000,000?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. This, then, would make a grand total according to your figures of what?

Mr. McCALEB. Of ₱1,288,503,400.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Lill in his testimony stated that from his study of the Mexican financial situation the Mexican Government would not be able to carry a larger amount of indebtedness than ₱550,000,000. What is your opinion about that?

Mr. McCALEB. My opinion is that Mexico under normal conditions could pay carrying charges on several times that sum.

Mr. KEARFUL. Approximately about what do you consider Mexico would be able to carry under normal conditions? I mean by normal conditions, conditions of permanent peace and order.

Mr. McCALEB. I think Mexico, once her industries were restored, her agriculture developed, and her mines fully operated, could pay charges on a very large sum. Such a thing as a definite limit being fixed is not possible, inasmuch as ability to pay depends entirely on industrial and general progress. Mexico's ability to pay, therefore, would be developed along a sliding scale, bearing a more or less definite ratio to the wealth and general progress and well-being of the country. I want to say that, in my opinion, Mexico in 10 years' time could pay the carrying charges on a sum much larger than her present indebtedness.

Mr. KEARFUL. Would the material progress of Mexico depend, in your opinion, upon the certainty of peace and order being permanently established?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes; in my opinion that is indispensable; and the ability of Mexico to pay would depend on her financial rehabilitation first of all.

Mr. KEARFUL. As I understand you, practically no obligations of the Mexican Government were paid during the entire period of about 60 years from the inception of the Mexican Government in 1821 to the time of Porfirio Diaz, and that practically no obligations of the Mexican Government have been paid since the success of the Carranza revolution in the summer of 1914; is that true?

Mr. McCALEB. That is substantially true. I think ₱10,000,000 would cover the shipments of funds abroad during the first 60 years of Mexican independence, exclusive of the two and one-half millions paid by the United States Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. And since July, 1914, nothing has been paid, as I understand it, except about ₱3,000,000 paid by the Carranza Government in discharge of its own obligation assumed in the taking up of some portions of its fiat money.

Mr. McCALEB. I think that is correct.

Mr. KEARFUL. That payment was not made to any foreign creditor or upon any of the funded obligations of the Government?

Mr. McCALEB. No; it was paid to local holders of certificates.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have no knowledge as to who those local holders were, have you?

Mr. McCALEB. No; I have not.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do not know whether they were officers of the Carranza Government or not?

Mr. McCALEB. I have no means of ascertaining.

Mr. KEARFUL. Coming now to the currency issues of the Mexican Government, what was the unit of value in the beginning?

Mr. McCALEB. The Mexican gold peso and the silver peso. Mexico is presumed to be on a bimetallic basis.

Mr. KEARFUL. What change was made in that system, and when?

Mr. McCALEB. When Carranza started his revolution in the north he early began the issue of a fiat paper currency which was known as the Monclova issue, limited to ₡5,000,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. The date of that decree was April 26, 1913?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And it was stated in article 9 that as soon as order should be established laws would be promulgated looking to the redemption of those bills?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes; that is true.

Mr. KEARFUL. And by article 4 all the inhabitants of the Republic were obliged to receive those notes as legal tender at their face value in all characters of operations, civil and commercial.

Mr. McCALEB. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What subsequent issues of the same kind were made?

Mr. McCALEB. There was a decree issued a little later increasing the Monclova issue by ₡20,000,000, but it was modified.

Mr. KEARFUL. The decree of November 28, 1913?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what subsequent additional issues were there by decree?

Mr. McCALEB. There were so many of these decrees following one after the other that it is difficult to find one's way through the maze of them. Substantially, the Monclova issue was limited to ₡5,000,000. That was followed by what is known as the issue of the Ejército constitucionalista (constitutionalist army) of ₡25,000,000. The third issue was known as the gobierno provisional (provisional government). This issue was divided into two series; the first was put in circulation prior to and during Carranza's occupation of the capital, and is known as the Mexico City issue, carrying a total of ₡42,625,000; the second series of this issue was known as the Vera Cruz issue. This total reached ₡599,329,321, according to Government authorities.

Mr. KEARFUL. What provision was subsequently made for taking up those issues?

Mr. McCALEB. In the fall of 1915 the Carranza régime realized the need of funding its earlier issues of currency. They developed a plan whereby they would issue an infalsificable (uncounterfeit-able) issue, the circulation of which they proposed to guarantee by proper metallic reserves.

Mr. KEARFUL. At what ratio?

Mr. McCALEB. Presumably 100 per cent ratio. There were during this period, however, many issues of currency, so called. There were probably as many as 200 different series of fiat paper currency put in circulation in Mexico. Some of these, including those of Villa and the convention and practically all issues of generals, were declared null and void without any consideration.

Mr. KEARFUL. Including Carrancista generals?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes; including Carrancista generals.

Mr. KEARFUL. The Villa issues were partly put out while Villa was an adherent of Carranza?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes; but that did not save any of the Villa issues.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please proceed to describe the method of funding such issues as were funded and the actual operation.

Mr. McCALEB. In the spring of 1916 the infalsificable issue was made ready for flotation. It was prescribed that all notes of the Vera Cruz and provisional government issues should be presented to the treasury for legalization. If they were found to be properly issued they were then made convertible into the infalsificable currency on the basis of ₱10 to ₱1 of infalsificables. Since the infalsificable was put into circulation on the basis of 20 centavos per peso the Vera Cruz pesos came to be worth 2 centavos, or 1 cent in United States currency per peso. But after the Government had made this arrangement it changed its mind and instead of issuing in exchange infalsificables for its provisional currency it converted a portion of this provisional currency into a species of bond issue, to which reference has been made earlier in this testimony, one-fifth of the total funded being payable per annum, three payments having thus far been made in a total of something less than ₱3,000,000.

The infalsificable notes came into circulation in May, 1916. For a time they were supported in the market by the Government. They were redeemed at the price of 20 centavos per peso, the operation being handled by the Comisión Monetaria, which had been organized by the Government to succeed the Comisión de Cambios y Moneda. It was but a matter of time, however, until the infalsificable, being constantly issued in larger volume, found itself in a slipping market.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long a time?

Mr. McCALEB. After approximately six weeks. The Government made an effort to support the market through bringing into its confidence certain of the private banks and branches of foreign banks. The Government supplied these institutions with New York credits or with actual coin and they were instructed to redeem infalsificable notes at definite figures, but even this support of the market could not avail against the constantly increasing flood of demand, which arose through the ever increasing output of infalsificable notes. The market sank lower and lower until toward the end of the summer—

Mr. KEARFUL. About how long a time?

Mr. McCALEB. After about three months the situation appeared to be hopeless. The Government simply had not kept its promise of providing the necessary metallic reserves to keep the infalsificables in circulation. It must have been known by the administration that it would be impossible to keep fiat paper afloat if it were not properly supported by metallic reserves. In September it was evident that the end had been reached and the Government began to look about for ways and means of saving itself.

The country began, even before the infalsificable currency had been wholly depreciated, to effect certain exchanges on a metal basis. In October this was openly done and in November the infalsificables quite ceased to circulate.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was its value at that time?

Mr. McCALEB. Its value at that time was about $1\frac{1}{2}$ centavos on the peso.

Mr. KEARFUL. What then became the money of the country?

Mr. McCALEB. The country got back on a metallic basis.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did the Government refuse to accept the fiat-money in the payment of customs dues and other taxes?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes; the Government had prior to its final extinction refused to accept it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it possible to buy anything in the markets with it?

Mr. McCALEB. The time came when it was so much worthless paper.

Mr. KEARFUL. What effect did this have upon the business and inhabitants of the country?

Mr. McCALEB. Business during the whole of the fiat currency régime had been much confused and naturally the wide fluctuations of the infalsificables tended still further to upset all commercial and other operations.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you any data showing the total amount of the infalsificables that were issued?

Mr. McCALEB. I have, but I am not satisfied with it. The officials in Mexico City proved to me that they could not themselves discover exactly what the total issues were. The Government has admitted an issue of ₱540,000,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you any reason to believe that it was more than that sum?

Mr. McCALEB. Such opinion would be based entirely upon the evidence of friends who lived through the infalsificable period. Some of them think that the issue was much higher.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you able to find anyone who had data upon which a definite estimate could be made?

Mr. McCALEB. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. About what amount was it estimated to be by those who had lived through the period?

Mr. McCALEB. Some of them thought that the issue ran as high as ₱600,000,000 or ₱700,000,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you a table showing the depreciation of the issues of fiat money from the beginning of 1913 to the end of 1916, month by month?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes. The table is as follows:

Month.	1913	1914	1915	1916	Month.	1913	1914	1915	1916
January.....	99	74	28	9	July.....	90	62	10	10
February.....	94	69	26	8	August.....	79	53	13	7
March.....	97	63	22	5	September.....	73	40	13	5
April.....	96	58	18	7	October.....	72	40	14	3
May.....	94	66	17	20	November.....	71	39	14	1)
June.....	94	65	17	12	December.....	71	37	12

Mr. McCaleb. I think that table is more or less accurate; at all events it was supplied to me by a very competent banker in the capital of Mexico.

Mr. Kearful. The last column under 1916, beginning with May, shows the inception of the infalsificable and its gradual decline from 20 centavos in May, 1916, to 1½ centavos in November, 1916, and practically nothing in December of that year; is that right?

Mr. McCaleb. Yes, sir; it ceased to be quoted.

Mr. Kearful. On whom did the burden of this issue and depreciation of fiat currency most heavily fall?

Mr. McCaleb. On the small individuals who were caught with these notes at the end.

Mr. Kearful. Practically the poorer classes?

Mr. McCaleb. I should say the poorer classes. They doubtless carried the bulk of it.

Mr. Kearful. Am I to understand from your testimony that substantially all the issues of fiat money by the Carranza government and by his various generals and other Government officials have been repudiated?

Mr. McCaleb. Yes; almost without exception.

Mr. Kearful. Is there any distinction to be drawn between the taking of a man's property or the exaction of his labor without compensation and that of paying for such property or labor in paper money which is subsequently repudiated?

Mr. McCaleb. That is a fine moral question. It seems to me to carry its own answer.

Mr. Kearful. Well, you do not see any distinction, do you?

Mr. McCaleb. If I must answer in a word, I should say, no. The matter of issuing floods of fiat paper currency and taking goods for those paper currencies which later are repudiated by the Government, or practically repudiated by the Government, is, if I understand it, only another name for the operation known as forced loan or confiscation of goods. I have heard that the Carranzistas boast of having financed the revolution for three years on an expenditure of approximately ₡5,000,000.

Mr. Kearful. A forced loan, however, is made with the supposition, at least, that it will be repaid at some time; is not that the idea?

Mr. McCaleb. That is true, and yet the record of Mexican history on the score of forced loans is by no means conclusive in that respect.

It may be of interest to you to know that during the whole course of Mexican history there have been exacted forced loans, great portions of which were never repaid. To illustrate, up to June 30, 1869, there had appeared in the Mexican budgets ₡360,000,000 of extraordinary resources, mostly forced loans.

Mr. Kearful. Does that apply to the period of the rule of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. McCaleb. To the early years, even of the rule of Porfirio Diaz. I can not say, however, whether the loans exacted under the régime of Diaz were repaid or not. I am inclined to think they were.

Mr. Kearful. What claim is made by the present Mexican officials that they have not repudiated these infalsificables, but that they have been accepted in payment of taxes?

Mr. McCaleb. It is true that they are required as an additional payment, as a sort of surtax, in equal quotas, and in this manner it is stated as the hope of the administration that eventually the whole infalsificable issue will have been retired. As a matter of fact, no reduction is made in the tax charge levied. In a word, no credit is allowed on the tax payment by virtue of this infalsificable charge.

Mr. Kearful. What is it claimed is done with the infalsificables obtained in that manner?

Mr. McCaleb. They are supposed to be accumulated in the treasury and there destroyed.

Mr. Kearful. Have you any reason to believe that they are not destroyed but are reissued.

Mr. McCaleb. There is a universal law which operates in all such cases. If more than ₱400,000,000 of infalsificables have been destroyed, as is claimed by the Government, and there were issued originally only ₱540,000,000, there should have remained three years ago only ₱140,000,000 of infalsificables in circulation. These infalsificables have been bought constantly ever since and still the market price for infalsificables holds to a fair degree of steadiness. That would seem to vitiate the operation of the natural law which works in all such cases. If the volume is constantly diminished there should be an enhanced value for the infalsificable.

Mr. Kearful. What has been the constant value during this period?

Mr. McCaleb. The value, I think, has ranged around 10 centavos.

Mr. Kearful. Have you any information as to the amount of infalsificables purchased monthly by any single industry in Mexico for the purpose of paying this surtax?

Mr. McCaleb. We know that the petroleum companies are purchasing more than ₱1,000,000 of infalsificables per month. Other institutions are purchasing in similar quota.

Mr. Kearful. If the ordinary taxes should amount to ₱100,000,000 per year that would retire a similar amount of infalsificables.

Mr. McCaleb. Not all taxes carry the surtax or infalsificable.

Mr. Kearful. Have you any information as to the amount of taxes collected per year which carry this surtax?

Mr. McCaleb. I am sorry, but I have no totals.

Mr. Kearful. What class of taxes carry this surtax?

Mr. McCaleb. I understand that customs dues, both import and export, and possibly some other characters, such as port dues.

Mr. Kearful. Coming now to the investments of foreign capital in Mexico, have you a statement from Mexican officials on that subject? If so, state the total amounts given as invested by foreigners as against the amount invested by Mexicans.

Mr. McCaleb. According to a Mexican table published in the Anuario Estadístico for the fiscal year 1906-7 certain tables were given. The gross capital invested in corporations throughout the country was ₱1,370,205,579 by foreigners, against so-called Mexican capital of ₱590,818,718.

Mr. Kearful. Why do you say "so called"?

Mr. McCaleb. For the reason that many of the corporations classified by the Mexicans as Mexican were essentially foreign, since foreigners had subscribed the capital.

Mr. Kearful. Have you a similar statement as to 1910?

Mr. McCALEB. I have a statement for 1910 from the Noticia del Movimiento de Sociedades Mineras y Mercantiles published in Mexico City in 1911, which shows investments of foreign capital in Mexico in 1910 reached a total of ₡2,009,994,253 as against Mexican capital of ₡812,787,778. And of the foreign capital that credited to the United States for the year 1910 amounted to ₡1,199,192,620.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was capital of corporations and was subject to the same criticism in reference to the Mexican figures, that you made with respect to the previous statement; is that so?

Mr. McCALEB. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you an authoritative statement with reference to the investment of French capital in Mexico prior to the year 1911?

Mr. McCALEB. I have. I have a statement from a French expert, which goes into great detail, showing the capitals invested in actual companies. This total in 1911 was figured at 2,284,715,722 francs. Of this total 501,628,100 francs were invested in the stocks of banks, including the Banco Nacional with an investment of 265,500,000 francs.

Mr. KEARFUL. What information have you as to whether the estimate given includes all investments of French capital in Mexico?

Mr. McCALEB. I have the authority of one of the best-known European financial journals, L'Economiste Européen for the year 1914, in which it is stated that the items of French investments in Mexico are far from complete, since many French investments have been made in such fashion that they elude pursuit.

Mr. KEARFUL. To what extent?

Mr. McCALEB. To the extent of 100,000,000 francs.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you an authoritative statement with reference to the investment of English capital in Mexico?

Mr. McCALEB. I have a statement, given out, presumably, by the British Embassy in Washington. The grand total of English investments is placed at £230,422,500.

Mr. KEARFUL. It has often been stated, and sometimes from high official sources, that foreign capitalists, especially American capitalists, in Mexico were not entitled to consideration because they had been engaged in exploiting the Mexican people to their own selfish ends and to the detriment of Mexico. What is your opinion, based upon your observation, as to whether the investment of foreign capital in Mexico has been for the benefit or injury of the Mexican people?

Mr. McCALEB. In my opinion, but for the introduction of foreign capital into Mexico it would have been still but a primitive State in all essentials. It would have had no railroads, no industrial development to any extent, and the Mexican people would have remained in a more or less backward or undeveloped condition. The capitals which have gone into Mexico have, of course, gone in there with a view to making returns to their owners, but that they have gone in deliberately to exploit the people is no more true than it is that capital everywhere goes in with a deliberate view to exploiting peoples.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it your opinion that that same thing might with the same reason be said of the development of our own Western country?

Mr. McCaleb. I think the rule will hold good. If bonuses were given railroads in Mexico in order to further their construction, the same may be said of nearly every State in the Union of the United States. We gave extravagant bonuses in the Western States to further the building of railroads.

Mr. Kearful. You are aware that the Government of the United States has granted large credits and great empires of public lands for the purpose of securing the building of railroads across the western territory?

Mr. McCaleb. That is true, and even at a very recent date we have advanced large sums of money to build railroads in Alaska, I understand, which is evidence of the fact that the Mexican experience had in it nothing novel. It was merely a carrying over into that country of the devices in the main which had applied in the development of our western territories. The Rio Grande was not wide enough to stop the American investor. In my opinion, as American investors went forward in Mexico, there was universally attendant upon that advance better living conditions, better pay, and on the whole a happier people. I say this having lived for years on the frontier and having known Mexico more or less intimately as it has unfolded during the past 30 years.

Mr. Kearful. Mr. Lill states, on page 408 of his testimony, previously given before the committee, that he estimates the amount for which the Mexican Government will be held responsible on account of claims for destruction of life and property at $25,000,000, and he bases that opinion on previous experiences in Mexico in settling revolutionary claims. What would you say about the deductions which might be made on the basis of $25,000,000 for the settlement of previous revolutionary claims?

Mr. McCaleb. I think the sum fixed an absurdly low one for the reason that when the settlements were earlier made for damages there was comparatively little foreign capital invested in Mexico. Nearly the whole of foreign capital investments in Mexico have been made during the past 30 years. The totals to-day are many fold what they were when the last claims for damages were adjusted.

Mr. Kearful. And the devastation of property under the Carranza régime and revolution have been a great deal more, many times more, have they not, than under any previous revolution?

Mr. McCaleb. I can not say what degree of relationship the Carranza depredations bear to earlier depredations, but they have been severe enough.

Mr. Kearful. Is there anything further that you think has not been fully covered, that would be of interest to the committee?

Mr. McCaleb. I think of nothing else at the moment.

(Thereupon, at 3.40 o'clock p. m., the hearing adjourned subject to call.)

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., December 6, 1919, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the Subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

STATEMENT OF MR. WILLIAM FRANK BUCKLEY.

(The witness was duly sworn by Mr. Kearful.)

Mr. KEARFUL. You have stated your name. What is your present address?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mexico City.

Mr. KEARFUL. Your present address in this country?

Mr. BUCKLEY. My present address in this country is Bronxville, N. Y.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your birthplace?

Mr. BUCKLEY. San Diego, Tex.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your profession?

Mr. BUCKLEY. I used to be an attorney.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what business are you now engaged?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Real estate and oil leases.

Mr. KEARFUL. In Mexico?

Mr. BUCKLEY. In Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long have you been acquainted with Mexico?

Mr. BUCKLEY. I have lived in Mexico since 1908.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you thoroughly familiar with the Spanish language?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you able to talk with the natives of Mexico freely upon any subject?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you made a study of Mexican conditions during the time that you were in Mexico and during the last few months in this country?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Yes; I have.

Mr. KEARFUL. What have been your facilities for gathering information with respect to the conditions in Mexico?

Mr. BUCKLEY. I have been associated socially and in a professional way with a number of Mexicans of prominence. I was counsel for the Mexican delegation to the Niagara conference, and in connection with this conference and subsequent events that have transpired in Mexico I have maintained my association with these gentlemen.

In July of this year, with the idea of gathering facts with regard to the Mexican situation that might be susceptible of proof, I induced seven or eight friends, all Americans, who have lived in Mexico for a number of years and who are intimately acquainted with the situation in that country, to work with me in this connection, with the result that during the last four months we have gotten together a mass of material on every phase of the Mexican situation, which is at the disposal of the committee whenever the committee desires to have it presented. We have had a great many prospective witnesses interviewed and will be glad, whenever the committee desires, to present detailed information through competent witnesses of economic conditions in Mexico, including the railroad situation, the Henequen and Yucatan situation, the mining and oil situation; information with regard to the activities of the Carranza government, its methods; outrages on American citizens and the destruction and confiscation of American property, in which connection we have the names and addresses of many witnesses that are willing to appear before the committee, those residing in the States being willing to appear in public session, whereas those residing in Mexico, in their majority, insisting on executive session because of fear of reprisals by the Carranza government.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where is the headquarters of your organization?

Mr. BUCKLEY. The Murray Hill Hotel in New York.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you any connection with the Association for the Protection of American Rights in Mexico?

Mr. BUCKLEY. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you any connection with the oil companies operating in Mexico? Are they contributing in any way toward your organization?

Mr. BUCKLEY. No oil company or any other corporation is contributing in any way to this organization. The only oil company I am connected with is a small company owning some leases and a terminal property in Mexico. The total investment of this company does not exceed a few hundred thousand dollars and it is not a member of the oil association.

Mr. KEARFUL. The committee has heretofore had testimony showing in a fragmentary way various incidents which go to make up a picture of Mexican conditions. I understand that you have made such a study of Mexico as to be able to give a more or less complete picture of the situation from the time of the overthrow of the Madero government up to the present time. Such a complete statement would naturally be divisible into various heads. Will you proceed in your own way to make a statement of the conditions covering the entire period mentioned beginning with the overthrow of the Madero government?

Mr. BUCKLEY. To understand the Mexican situation it must be understood in the beginning that the present is more or less the normal condition of Mexico; the era of peace during the Diaz régime from 1876 to 1910 was an abnormal period in the history of that country. All revolutions in Mexico work along conventional lines and the present series of revolutions are in no material sense dif-

There is a distinction between the Madero revolution and the Carranza revolution; the former had for its object the establishment in Mexico of a democratic form of government; the latter had as its object social, and not political, reforms—the principal reforms being the destruction of private property and the expulsion from the country of the Americans. The former revolution was dominated by Mexicans of the old Liberal type and included in its ranks some of the finest men in Mexico. These men were soon disillusioned, quit the revolution, and were succeeded by radicals of an inferior social type who directed the Carranza revolution and now control the Carranza government. The only political reforms that the leaders of the Carranza revolution sought were for the purpose of vesting political power in themselves, and not in the Mexican people. Control of the political machinery would enable them, first, to enrich themselves by graft, and second, to force through their social reforms.

When Madero was President, Carranza was governor of the State of Coahuila. Carranza, as well as other governors, received from the Federal Government an allowance of a large sum of money each month for the support of the State constabulary to put down local revolutions. Limantour had left 63,000,000 pesos in the Mexican treasury, and this was one of the favorite methods used by the groups surrounding Madero to loot the treasury. Of course, troops were not maintained in the several States, or, at least, not more troops than were necessary to cover appearances, and the Governor of the State divided up his monthly allowance with the grafters in Mexico City.

It is stated that because of a disagreement between Carranza and the group surrounding President Madero, Carranza's monthly allowance was cut off and this led to friction between Carranza and Madero and to the formulation of plans by the former to revolt against his chief. It is generally understood that Carranza invited Alberto Garcia Granados, a noted Liberal in Mexico, who formed a part of Madero's cabinet, to join him in his revolt. Garcia Granados had become dissatisfied with Madero, and Carranza thought that he would be friendly to such a suggestion. It is stated that Garcia Granados declined to join in the revolt. After Carranza entered Mexico City Garcia Granados was executed.

Madero was overthrown before Carranza's alleged plans matured. Huerta, the successor of Madero, conducted negotiations with Carranza for some time looking toward recognition of his government by Carranza, but the latter finally broke off negotiations and revolted.

When Madero was killed the agents of Carranza advised him of the bad impression that this outrage had produced in the United States, whereupon Carranza realized his opportunity and proclaimed loudly, especially where Americans could hear, that his purpose in revolting was to avenge the shameful murder of his beloved chief. Carranza's agents in the United States played this up with great effect on the American people.

The Mexican point of view with regard to this assassination has never been understood by the Americans. The Mexican people were not as a rule shocked by the assassination of Madero; you seldom hear reference in Mexico to this crime. As a rule Mexicans who favored Huerta maintained that if Huerta did kill Madero it was good politics; the followers of Madero, while protesting that they were sorry their chief had been killed, admitted that they could understand the attitude of the opposition as constituting good politics.

Mr. KEARFUL. What have you to say with reference to the attitude of Mexicans towards Huerta?

Mr. BUCKLEY. The mass of the Mexican people have no preferences in politics, for they know nothing about politics. The middle-class and upper-class Mexicans favored Huerta, principally because they were anxious for peace and order and because they had been satiated with the advanced political doctrines announced by Madero and satiated with the shameless graft that surrounded his administration.

Carranza propaganda in the United States, very ably assisted by the American Government, succeeded in instilling into the public mind certain erroneous impressions that have been the basis of American public opinion, where there has been any public opinion, for the last six or seven years.

The Carrancista press explained that there were three classes of people in Mexico—the lower classes, representing what Mr. Wilson has termed "the submerged 80 per cent," the middle class, comprising probably 10 per cent, and the upper class. It is stated that the middle and lower classes were trying to wrest political power from the Científicos, a so-called party composing the upper classes, that it was alleged had governed Mexico for their own exclusive benefit and the benefit of foreign capital during the Diaz régime.

The peace and order established by the Diaz Government, and maintained for 35 years, enabled the middle class to form. There was no such thing as a middle class in Mexico before the Diaz régime, and the people of the middle class were the strongest advocates of the Diaz régime, for without peace and order it could not subsist.

The "submerged 80 per cent" has no political ambition; does not know how to read or write; lives from hand to mouth, and has no political ideas or preferences; all it wants is to be let alone and be allowed to live in peace and receive those material necessities that are indispensable for the maintenance of life. This class has never received any consideration or protection in Mexico except during the régime of Porfirio Diaz.

I do not contend that this is all that the 80 per cent of the population is entitled to, but I do contend, and history shows, that material benefits must come first and that a people does not concern itself with the niceties of government or universal suffrage until after it is provided with bread and clothes.

The educated Mexican, the type that governed Mexico for 35 years, and gave it the only decent Government that it ever had—the Mexican whom the American Government has driven out of that country—did not sympathize with Huerta and was not a partisan of Huerta's. To him Huerta was the lesser of several evils; he preferred Huerta to either Carranza or Villa, and subsequent events have demonstrated the wisdom of his choice. The cultivated Mexican, however, would never have chosen Huerta for president of his own free will.

Mr. KEARFUL. We have often heard the term "Cientificos" and it has been many times stated that the Cientificos consisted of a party of political grafters who surrounded Porfirio Diaz and with whom he was in full accord for the purpose of exploiting and oppressing the Mexican people. Will you please elucidate that matter and give a description of and state who the Cientificos were and what they did?

Mr. BUCKLEY. The Cientificos were not grafters. As a matter of fact, they did not constitute a party in Mexico, as is erroneously believed to be the case in the United States, but consisted of nine Mexican Liberals who tried to force upon Porfirio Diaz a Liberal régime. The story of the Cientificos is as follows:

In 1892 a national convention was held in Mexico City for the nomination of a candidate for President. This convention was dominated by a group of young and cultured men, nearly all Congressmen. Gen. Diaz was proclaimed the candidate of the convention and this group of young men prepared a manifesto to the Nation which served as a platform of the convention. In this manifesto certain principles were advocated which had for their purpose committing Gen. Diaz to a program of reform, two principles being mentioned in particular—first, life tenure of the judges of the Supreme Court for the purpose of assuring the independence of the administration of justice, and, second, the creation of the office of Vice President to minimize the chances of revolution in the event of the death of Gen. Diaz.

Gen. Diaz viewed with suspicion the activities of this independent group, and his unconditional adherents in the Chamber of Deputies derisively gave them the name of "Cientificos." This name was coined in connection with the discussion of a bill prepared by this group in which Francisco Bulnes, one of the group, in answer to an objection by a member of the House, stated that this bill had been prepared after much study and after a scientific investigation of the matter had been made, to which a member retorted that the group then were "Cientificos." This word translated into English does not mean a scientist; it means a man learned in any branch of knowledge.

The Cientificos constituted a minority of the Congress and their adversaries, who were popularly called the Jacobins, were in the majority. The Jacobins were always submissive to Gen. Diaz, whereas the Cientificos, although friends of the President, endeavored to force upon him a policy of political reform giving a larger measure of control to the people, which Diaz refused to accept. The Cientificos presented a bill in Congress providing for life tenure of Federal judges, which was passed in the lower House, but was defeated in the Senate by order of Gen. Diaz. (This necessary reform was revived by the independent Senators in 1912, under the Government of the so-called apostle of liberty, Madero, but was defeated through the influence of the latter.)

In 1893 President Diaz appointed as minister of finance the scientific Jose I. Limantour, the great financier, who raised the finances of Mexico and the credit of the nation to a high place among the great powers of the world. Limantour abandoned his political activity to accept this position, and the rest of the Cientificos, in order not to embarrass him, because of their inability to cope with Gen. Diaz, desisted somewhat from their activities thereafter.

When Ramon Corral became vice president in 1904, although he endeavored not to indulge in activities that would arouse the suspicion of Gen. Diaz, he favored the Cientificos, because he sympathized with their ideas of reform and recognized their talent, and this led the enemies of Corral to also attack the Cientificos.

The so-called Cientifico Group was composed of but a few persons, who always refused to form a political party. The Cientificos were as follows:

Jose I. Limantour. The great minister of finance, under whose direction Mexico's public credit was founded. He enjoyed a world-wide reputation and is to-day consulted by financial institutions in France and England. He was born a millionaire and in public and private life was a model of honesty.

Rosendo Pineda. A lawyer of great talent and a noted orator; he was most persistent in advocating the political reforms opposed by Gen. Diaz. He was the only one of the Cientificos who in the last seven years of the Government of Diaz dared to oppose his indications, and upon several occasions opposed him in the chamber of deputies. He was never a man of wealth and died in absolute poverty.

Justo Sierra. He was among the most notable orators and litterateurs produced by Mexico. He was minister of instruction from 1902 to 1911 and founded the National University. He lived and died in poverty.

Joaquin D. Casaus. An attorney of American and British interests who became wealthy. He was an orator and litterateur and at one time served as ambassador to Washington.

Pablo Macedo. A lawyer who became distinguished in his youth and amassed a fortune before becoming one of the Cientificos; he represented many English and American business enterprises and was well known abroad; an honest and highly educated man; the author of the project that Limantour approved for the establishment of the gold system in Mexico. He never held any other public office outside of being a Congressman and director of the School of Jurisprudence.

Francisco Bulnes. Probably the most finished orator that Latin America has produced, the author of many splendid works on the political history of Mexico and a man of great and varied learning. He has never been a man of means and is now living in exile in Cuba.

Miguel Macedo. One of the most distinguished lawyers in Mexico, who is still living in Mexico City and enjoys a reputation for great intelligence and integrity. He was a national senator for one year and subsecretary of the department of Gobernacion (Interior) during the last five years of the administration of Gen. Diaz. He has a modest fortune, which he has accumulated in 40 years through intelligent and constant labor.

Emilio Pimintel. A member of Congress; a lawyer of good reputation and of recognized probity of character; Governor of the State of Oaxaca during the last eight years of Diaz's administration. A man of moderate wealth.

Roberto Nuñez. A lawyer, who occupied many public offices, and after 1893 was subsecretary of the department of finance; always regarded as an honest man. Died in Paris, leaving a small fortune.

The Mexican public never referred to anybody outside of these men as Cientificos. Mr. Bryan and other American politicians have always thought that the Cientificos constituted a national party. As is seen from the above statement, only three of these men were wealthy and only one of them made his money after he had become a Cientifico. Gen. Diaz was always suspicious of their ideas, and never yielded to their influence.

The Mexican revolutionaries, to give them a pretext to persecute the men in Mexico who were distinguished for their talent, or for their wealth, called all those whom they wished to victimize "Cientificos." The American Government, accepting this version, has popularized in the United States the alleged crimes of the Cientificos and has given the name of Cientifico to all those men in Mexico who were, in fact, useful to Mexico, and stood in the way of designs of the revolutionaries.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you now proceed to give a statement with reference to the relations of Huerta toward the American Government and the attitude of the American Government toward Huerta?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Soon after his election, President Wilson introduced an innovation in the diplomatic policy of the American Government. This Government was represented in Mexico City by an honorable man, who had served his country well—Mr. Henry Lane Wilson—who soon discovered that his Government neither consulted him nor confided in him. Mr. Henry Lane Wilson was the representative of the American Government, but President Wilson preferred to conduct foreign negotiations through his own personal representatives. The State Department was eliminated at once from the field of diplomatic relations with Mexico, and, since the accession of Mr. Wilson to office, has not had anything to do with the formulation of our Mexican policy, and very little to do with the carrying out of this policy. Because of his policy of insisting that the rights of Americans in Mexico be respected, and because he showed resentment in not being taken into the confidence of his own Government, Ambassador Wilson was recalled from Mexico. All manner of scurrilous rumors with regard to this gentleman, among them allegations to the effect that he was responsible for the murder of Madero and had actually connived at this murder, were carefully spread in the United States by Carranza propagandists and by the representatives of the President, among whom Mr. John Lind distinguished himself; rumors which the American Government knew to be untrue and which it could have suppressed by merely denying them. The State Department went so far in conniving at the persecution of this gentleman as to permit an unscrupulous American from Mexico City by the name of Robert H. Murray, the correspondent in that city of the New York World and an interested propagandist of the Carranza government, to secure information from the confidential files of the State Department for the purpose of producing evidence in garbled form against the ex-ambassador.

We will be glad to submit, whenever the committee desires, details with regard to the dismissal of Ambassador Wilson and the conduct of the American Government and its representatives.

Huerta was recognized by most of the first-class powers, but the American Government did nothing. Except for vague statements along general lines that might be regarded as being applicable to Mexico, there was no indication of the President's policy. It will be interesting in this connection, as an indication of the attitude of the high-class Mexican not only towards Huerta but towards the American Government, to state that at this juncture a group of Mexican statesmen in Mexico City, realizing the extreme gravity of the situation and the type of men we had to reckon with in Huerta and President Wilson, discussed the situation with the object of avoiding difficulties. These gentlemen were sufficiently versed in Mexican history, and sufficiently aware of the dependent condition of Mexico with regard to the United States, to appreciate that without the recognition of the American Government Huerta could not remain in power; they felt that the exercise by Mr. Wilson of the great power which the office of President of United States conferred on him to destroy Huerta would be arbitrary and unscrupulous but, nevertheless, they realized what the results would be.

They consequently decided to send an emissary to see Mr. Wilson and ascertain if he was determined not to recognize Huerta's government, and if this were his intention, they instructed their emissary to tell Mr. Wilson that they themselves would soon eliminate Huerta from the Presidency; that they would not permit his vanity to stand in the way of Mexico's welfare. The emissary was instructed to beg of Mr. Wilson that he should not openly oppose Huerta, as this would have the effect of consolidating Mexican public opinion behind him along nationalistic lines; that he permit the Mexican people themselves to eliminate Huerta from the Presidency and thus avoid a disagreeable situation, one which, as a matter of fact, was precipitated by Mr. Wilson's public refusal to recognize Huerta before this emissary could reach Washington, and was aggravated further by his dispatching of Mr. John Lind to Mexico. Mr. Wilson's public announcement, of course, had just the opposite effect in Mexico to what Mr. Wilson thought it would have; it strengthened Mexican sentiment for Huerta and gave him the support of the Mexican people in his personal conflict with President Wilson. Huerta could have been eliminated by the use of some tact.

It was at this juncture that the famous Lind mission was conceived and carried out. John Lind, a Swedish-American from Minnesota, who had never been in Mexico, knew nothing of Mexican affairs or of Mexican character and had no knowledge of the Spanish language, was chosen for a most delicate mission to Mexico City. Could there be anything as different in temperament as a Swede and a Latin-American? Mr. Lind was chosen, so Washington informed the American people, because he knew nothing about Mexico and, consequently, was not prejudiced. Lind proceeded to Mexico City, the details of his trip and mission being given the greatest newspaper publicity, and presented to Huerta, the president of an independent country, the astounding proposition that he eliminate himself from the Government of Mexico by calling a new election in which the Mexican people should freely exercise their choice and select another President. The people might not, however, select Huerta, so Lind informed him, not because he might not be the choice of the Mexican people, but because he was not the choice of Mr. Wilson. This proposal was actually given to the press by the American Government. It will not be necessary here to humiliate ourselves by recalling Huerta's answer to Lind. This was the first step of American intervention in Mexico. The President of the United States told Huerta, and through him the Mexican people, that he would not permit Huerta to be the President of Mexico; it was but a step further to insist that he would permit nobody but a certain person to be President, and Mr. Wilson soon arrived at this step—during the Niagara conference he took the position that he would allow no one to be President of Mexico but Carranza.

There is a very interesting phase in the negotiations between President Wilson and Huerta that has generally been overlooked. Mr. Wilson proclaimed in speeches and interviews that the person of Huerta did not itself matter so much, but that Huerta represented a class—the hated Cientificos—who had oppressed the “submerged 80 per cent” and that Mr. Wilson's interest in the matter, in fact, what he insisted upon, was that a look-in on their Government be given to the “submerged 80 per cent” and that they be permitted to establish a Government of their own choice; that the rebel leaders, Carranza and Villa, were the genuine popular leaders of this class and that a government must be established by them. As a matter of fact, when to the surprise of the American Government Huerta did not obey its order to retire, this administration, which in its relations with Mexico has never seemed to count in advance on the consequences of the failure of Mexico to comply with its many ultimatums, found itself in a delicate predicament. Mr. Lind was, therefore, authorized to compromise with Huerta, and with the class he represented, by agreeing that if Huerta would call an election in the territory controlled by him, and would not stand as a candidate, the American Government would not only recognize the President elected, but would endeavor to see to it that he obtained money; in other words, the President through Mr. Lind said to Huerta: If you will save my pride by leaving office, I will permit you and the class you represent (the Cientificos) to select your successor. Mr. Wilson's protestations of concern for the welfare of the “submerged 80 per cent” seemed to be rather conventional in view of this incident. Mr. Lind's exact words in this second note of August 25, 1913, were as follows:

The President authorizes me to submit to the consideration of the de facto Government of Mexico the following proposition:

1. That the elections convoked for October 26, 1913, be carried into effect in accordance with the constitution and laws of Mexico.
2. That President Huerta, in the manner indicated in the beginning by the President [Mr. Wilson] give the assurance referred to in paragraph C of the first instructions [that is, that Huerta should not be a candidate].

The President further authorizes me to say that if the government de facto acts immediately and in conformity with the indications mentioned, then the President will assure the American bankers and their associates that the Government of the United States would view with pleasure the contracting of an immediate loan in sufficient amount to cover the necessities of the moment of the de facto Government of Mexico.

The hope is sincerely entertained that the Government of your Excellency will consider it in keeping with the best and highest interest of Mexico to accept immediately these propositions, which are submitted with the same spirit and the same objects as the first ones, but in this more restricted form, with the object that the Government of Mexico may act with regard to them, without the necessity of the cooperation or aid in the present circumstances of any factor foreign to the situation, [That is, without consulting the rebels Carranza and Villa, who in the opinion of the American Government, were representing the "submerged 80 per cent."]

In the President's interview that appeared in the Saturday Evening Post in its issue of May 23, 1914, a short while after the occupation of Vera Cruz, he stated:

It is a curious thing that every demand for the establishment of order in Mexico takes into consideration, not order for the benefit of the people of Mexico, the great mass of the population, but order for the benefit of the old-time régime, for the aristocrats, for the vested interests, for the men who were responsible for this very condition of disorder. No one asks for order because order will help the mass of the people to get a portion of their rights and their land; but all demand it so that the great owners of property, the overlords, the hidalgos, the men who have exploited that rich country for their own selfish purposes, shall be able to continue their processes undisturbed by the protests of the people from whom their wealth and power have been obtained.

It was these very people with whom the President now offered to compromise through Huerta.

The dispatching of the Lind mission was indeed an innovation in diplomacy, both because of its personnel and the nature of the undertaking. The President seemed highly pleased with the comportment of Mr. Lind, since in his address to Congress on August 27, 1913, he stated that—

Mr. Lind executed his delicate and difficult mission with singular tact, firmness, and good judgment.

When Huerta refused to accept the dictation of President Wilson, he became stronger than ever with the Mexican people. Mr. Lind, who ever since his trip to Mexico has been an active Carranza propagandist and an ardent opponent of armed intervention, returned to Vera Cruz after his humiliation by Huerta and recommended immediate armed intervention; presumably to avenge Mr. Lind; he advised his American friends in Mexico City to leave the country as intervention was imminent. Mr. Lind remained in Vera Cruz for a number of months where, under the protection afforded him by Huerta's Government, he conspired with the revolutionaries for the overthrow of that government, and actually entered into negotiations with a colonel in the Huerta army to overthrow his chief and let the Zapatista army into Mexico City. He was aided in these negotiations by Mr. H. L. Hall, a discredited American who lived in Mexico and one of the personal representatives of the President. All the details of that arrangement will be given to the committee if it desires.

It may be of interest in passing to refer to an incident indicating the esteem in which Americans in Mexico held Mr. Hall, who, as I have just stated, was one of the many personal representatives of the President. Mr. Hall was kidnapped by the Zapatistas near Cuernavaca, where he had lived for a number of years, and when the Zapatistas sent in a demand for a ransom of thirty pesos, Mr. Hall's neighbors refused to pay it.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you conceive to have been the attitude of the American Government toward Americans in Mexico during this period?

Mr. BUCKLEY. The American Government never consulted Americans in Mexico and has always regarded them as unscrupulous adventurers who had left their own country and were in some way or other in league with the Cientificos for the purpose of exploiting the Mexican peon. I can not explain the reason for this fantastic theory, but this was the theory. Americans in Mexico City, a colony consisting of between 5,000 and 10,000 persons, realizing that their Government was about to make a decision in its Mexican policy that would be of far reaching importance, and feeling that their Government would be glad to avail itself of the opportunity of listening to the advice of Americans in Mexico, sent a committee of seven Americans to Washington to call on the Secretary of State and the President. Any European government would undoubtedly have been glad of the opportunity to consult its citizens of the type that composed this delegation to Washington and probably every American administration prior to the present one would have sought such advice. After a trip of 2,000 miles this delegation was permitted to see Mr. Bryan for a period of 10 minutes, during which time Mr. Bryan spoke 8 minutes; and was permitted to see Mr. Wilson for 20 minutes, during which their spokesman delivered an address which Mr. Wilson respectfully listened to but with a far-off expression in his eyes. Neither Mr. Wilson nor Mr. Bryan wanted to hear anything from Americans in Mexico or from Americans in this country who knew anything about the Mexican situation, and they ever after formed an effective quarantine against reliable information coming from unprejudiced and honest sources.

There were many incidents where American citizens, who had as their only concern the prestige and honor of their own country, were snubbed and insulted by officials of the American Government. One or two will be sufficient as illustrations. A delegation of citizens of El Paso, headed by Mr. Turney, a prominent lawyer, came all the way to Washington to beseech Mr. Bryan to intercede with the Mexican rebels to provide means whereby the American men, women and children stranded in Chihuahua could be brought to the border. Mr. Bryan did not receive this delegation in his office, but walked out into the waiting room and insulted them, telling them that they were not concerned with American women and children, but were thinking about their own property.

A Congressman from Texas, thinking that because of his knowledge of Mexican character his advice might be valuable, casually remarked to the President at a reception at the White House that he would like to come over some day and talk about the Mexican situation with him, whereupon the President told him very sharply that when he wanted to hear from him about the Mexican situation he would send for him. The President's attitude was so offensive that the Congressman in question never afterwards felt at liberty to call at the White House.

Every honest American who came to Washington from Mexico for the purpose of telling the American Government the truth was insulted, whereas dishonest and discredited Americans who had no regard for the good name of their country and who would stoop to come to Washington and tell the Government what the Government wanted to hear, and what these Americans knew to be untrue, were always received courteously and in a number of cases were rewarded with appointments as personal representatives of the President to Mexico.

In this connection it is worthy of note that during all these troublesome times, when over 100 prominent and cultured Mexican expatriates have resided in New York, there is not a single instance where any of them was called into consultation by the President on matters relating to their country, and concerning which they would certainly be regarded as an authority by unprejudiced people.

Mr. KEARFUL. We have heard a great deal about what is known as the Tampico flag incident and the subsequent occupation of Vera Cruz by the American forces, and there have been many conflicting and confusing statements made in regard to those incidents. Are you prepared to give a true story of what occurred at that time?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Yes. I was in Tampico up to a few days before the occurrence of the so-called Tampico incident and have many friends and acquaintances there and facilities for acquiring correct information. I was in Vera Cruz the day before that city was occupied by American forces, and returned to Vera Cruz on Mr. O'Shaughnessy's train a few days after the capture of Vera Cruz when this gentleman was given his passport by Huerta. I remained at Vera Cruz for several weeks, where I was tendered the position of Administrator of Justice in the American government, established there by Admiral Fletcher, a position which I declined, and had opportunity through association with the American officials in Vera Cruz to ascertain the truth with regard to the landing of the marines and the incidents that led up to the same.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you proceed in your own way to tell the story of the Tampico flag incident and the consequent occupation of Vera Cruz?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. Wilson's attempt to eliminate Huerta by using the persuasive powers of Lind, and by employing his favorite method of appealing directly to the people of the country over the heads of its ruler occurred in August, 1913. Mr. Lind, who had familiarized himself with the entire Mexican situation by reading the Encyclopedia Britannica, which he afterwards plagiarized in a statement he made on Mexico, and by making a trip from Vera Cruz to Mexico City and back again and then associating with revolutionary spies at Vera Cruz, reported to the President what the President wanted to hear; that is, that the Mexican people were overwhelmingly opposed to Huerta and would very soon drive him out of power. The situation between the two countries became very tense, and the Huerta Government seemed to become stronger instead of weaker; Americans in rebel sections of the country were being mistreated and killed, and there was much general dissatisfaction in the United States with the situation in Mexico. To hurry the triumph of the Carranza revolution, Mr. Wilson raised the embargo on arms and ammunition on the 3d day of February, 1914, without having first recognized the belligerency of the so-called Constitutionalist revolutionary government—a most extraordinary step. In his message to Congress of August 27, 1913, Mr. Wilson assured that body that Huerta would soon be eliminated by popular action of the Mexican people. On the contrary, the situation continued to lag and Huerta continued in power, much to the annoyance of the American Government. Finally, in March, 1914, the Tampico incident occurred, which gave Mr. Wilson the pretext for which he had long been waiting. A launch carrying marines from one of the American gunboats entered a prohibited zone within the range of firing at Tampico (the town was then being attacked by rebels), and the marines were arrested by a Huerta officer, acting under general orders, taken to military headquarters and there released without having been incarcerated, and, before any demand was made, the Huerta commander expressed his regrets to Admiral Mayo, in command of the American squadron.

Full details of this matter will be given later; but, suffice it to say, first, that the American flag was not insulted, and, second, that an apology was made before it was called for. This, however, was not sufficient, as the American Government was looking for a pretext for trouble with Huerta, in order to force him from a position where he was causing this Government much embarrassment.

We might for a moment pause here, in order to judge properly the extreme means that were taken by the American Government in this matter of the so-called insult to the American flag, and consider the sensitiveness of our Government in taking offense here compared with its attitude where the Carranza Government has repeatedly insulted our flag.

For instance, when the American refugees were taken out of Tampico on tankers in June, 1916, at a time when relations with Mexico were strained, a launch from one of the American gunboats carrying armed marines was delegated to escort the two tankers to prevent sniping by the Carranza soldiers, whereupon these soldiers fired on the American launch. When Capt. W. Pitt Scott, the splendid commander of the American gunboat Marietta, on his own initiative, called on the commander of the Carranza garrison to disavow the action of his soldiers the commander replied that he would not only not disavow this action, but that the soldiers were acting under his express orders. The American Government ignored this insult to the flag by the Carranza Government.

Not having been able to arouse the spirit of the American Government by this insult, Gen. Emiliano Nafarrate, the commander of the Carranza garrison at Tampico, then proceeded to write a series of insulting notes to Capt. Scott, one nearly every day for a week or so; in these notes he insulted the captain and the American Government, and expressed his opinion that the Americans were a treacherous race of cowards, that the American Government was playing false with the Mexican Government and was only waiting for an opportunity to conquer Mexico. Such conduct on the part of a Carranza official, one would think, might be construed as an insult to the American Government. I am informed that Capt. Scott reported the first insulting letter to Washington, but that upon receiving no acknowledgment from his Government he filed the rest of the letters away in a scrapbook as they came in.

On June 19, 1916, Carranza soldiers fired upon American naval officers and marines from the gunboat Annapolis at Mazatlan on the west coast of Mexico. I quote from Commander Kavanaugh's report as quoted in the New York Herald of the 23d of that month:

The Government issued manifesto that officers were not to land, and guard was placed on dock. I sent ashore Ensign Kessing to parley with the Mexicans and ask them to send for the acting American consul or for one of the Mexican officials so as to arrange for American citizens coming off to the ship. I sent Paymaster Mowat with the party as interpreter, no trouble being anticipated, as Mexicans had not molested earlier boats.

I ordered boat officer to keep clear of landing, so that his boat could not be rushed, and I forbade him entering the town, the plan being that the boat was to lie well clear of the dock, and the officers therein to confer with party on shore. By my orders arms were carried concealed in the boat, and boat officers had positive orders to keep them hidden, and not use them unless fired upon, in which case he was to return the fire. The boat was a motor sailing launch, with a crew of three men.

Coxswain of the boat reports that after brief parley, Mowat, interpreter, informed Kessing that the Mexican said it would be all right for them to land. They did so, and were immediately seized. Kessing ordered boat to return to ship and report what had happened. When Mexicans saw boat start off they motioned it to return. Coxswain told them to wait a minute and kept heading for ship.

When the boat was about 100 feet clear from the dock, Mexican custom official, in uniform, fired his revolver at the boat, bullet striking near it. Five or six shots were immediately fired at the boat by Mexican soldiers.

Needless to say, Carranza was not required to salute the flag. So far as we know he was not required to make any apology or explanation of any kind.

The New York Herald bureau in Washington had the following to say about this incident in the same number of the New York Herald:

That the recent international incident at Mazatlan in which two United States naval officers were arrested and an American seaman was gravely wounded was almost a duplicate of the incident at Tampico which led to the celebrated demand for a salute from Huerta was shown in a report received at the Navy Department to-day from Commander A. G. Kavanaugh, commanding the gunboat Annapolis. Mr. Daniels, Secretary of the Navy, was questioned to-day as to whether a salute from Carranza would be demanded in this case. Mr. Daniels replied with the statement that the situation was so delicate a one that speculation as to action to be taken should be avoided by good Americans. He said, however, that Admiral Cameron McR. Winslow, commander in chief of the Pacific Fleet, had no authority to demand a salute in this case, and also that Rear Admiral Henry T. Mayo had no authority to demand it at Tampico, though President Wilson supported that demand with battleships. Mr. Daniels added that the Tampico incident was different in that then the purpose was to force Huerta out of Mexico and that was accomplished.

In 1916 the Carranza authorities organized and executed many raids into Texas, the proofs of which are in the State Department. Many of these raids were in charge of the bandit De la Rosa. It was alleged at the time that Gen. Nafarrate, the aforesaid Carranza commander in Tampico, was in connivance with De la Rosa, an allegation which was ridiculed in Washington. As a matter of fact, a Mr. Rogers, a cousin of Postmaster General Albert Bursleson, was sent to investigate the border troubles by the Department of Justice, and in the early part of 1916 he saw the bandit De la Rosa in Tampico at the Imperial Hotel being entertained by Gen. Nafarrate, and so reported to the Department of Justice. Gen. Nafarrate at that time organized a military expedition against Texas, and I went down to the station in Tampico and saw this expedition leave that place, with arms and ammunition in a train provided by the Mexican Government. There was never any secret about this matter.

The above are a few incidents of insults of the American flag by the Carranza authorities, all without provoking armed, or any other kind, of intervention.

As a reprisal for the alleged insult to the American flag by the Huerta authorities in Tampico, the American marines were landed in Vera Cruz. It is interesting in this connection to note that, instead of taking the entire city of Vera Cruz, the capture of which could easily have been effected, the American forces took the customhouse and the post office and there waited for several hours while the Huerta garrison in Vera Cruz and the population of Vera Cruz were given an opportunity to arm themselves and attack the Americans. The reason for this was as follows: Lind had reported to the American Government that the people of Vera Cruz would welcome the landing of marines as an act of friendship, since their purpose would be to eliminate Huerta; that it would be merely necessary to capture the customhouse and the post office. Admiral Fletcher, in command of the American battle fleet in Vera Cruz, realized how ridiculous were the representations of Lind, as did also the capable American consul in Vera Cruz, Mr. William A. Canada, and worked out a plan for the occupation of the entire city, which he submitted to the American Government, and which Admiral Fletcher believed could have been effected without the loss of a man. The American Government paid no attention to Admiral Fletcher, but followed Lind's advice and ordered the capture of the customhouse and the post office on the theory that this would meet with the approval of the people of Vera Cruz and it would not be necessary to take the city. The result of this bungling was that over 20 American bluejackets and marines were killed. Mr. Lind, I understand, is still proud of his participation in this affair.

I do not imagine that the families of the boys that were killed in this affair felt compensated for this piece of gross negligence and criminal ignorance by the graciousness of the President in coming to New York and delivering an oration over the biers of the men who were killed, where he took advantage of the occasion to deliver a eulogy on himself. The President stated in part:

War, gentlemen, is only a sort of dramatic representation, a sort of dramatic symbol of a thousand forms of duty. I never went into battle, I never was under fire, but I fancy that there are some things just as hard to do as to go under fire. I fancy that it is just as hard to do your duty when men are sneering at you as when they are shooting at you. When they shoot at you they can only take your natural life; when they sneer at you they can wound your heart, and men who are brave enough, steadfast enough, steady in their principles enough, to go about their duty with regard to their fellowmen, no matter whether there are hisses or cheers, men who can do what Rudyard Kipling in one of his poems wrote: "Meet with triumph and disaster and treat those two imposters just the same," are men for a nation to be proud of. Morally speaking, disaster and triumph are imposters. The cheers of the moment are not what a man ought to think about, but the verdict of his conscience and the conscience of mankind.

Mr. Wilson was very evidently referring to himself.

Several versions have been given of just why Vera Cruz was taken. In the address just referred to Mr. Wilson stated:

We have gone down to Mexico to serve mankind if we can find out the way. We do not want to fight the Mexicans. We want to serve the Mexicans if we can because we know how we would like to be free and how we would like to be served if there were friends by ready to serve us.

In his message to Congress, delivered on April 20, 1914, the day before Vera Cruz was taken, Mr. Wilson stated:

I therefore come to ask your approval that I should use the armed forces of the United States in such ways, and to such an extent, as may be necessary to obtain from Gen. Huerta and his adherents the fullest recognition of the rights and dignity of the United States.

In the resolution that Congress passed on April 22, the day after Vera Cruz was taken, it is stated that:

The President is justified in the employment of the armed forces of the United States to enforce his demand for unequivocal amends for certain affronts and indignities committed against the United States.

From this message and the resolution it would appear that Vera Cruz was captured to seek amends for an insult to our flag.

Admiral Badger stated in his message, dated April 21, 1914, to the Mexican commander at Vera Cruz, Gen. Maas:

The United States naval force seized the custom house this morning for the purpose of preventing certain munitions of war from being landed in Vera Cruz. The object of this act has been accomplished and the steamer Ypiranga is now anchored in the harbor over which the Admiral has control, and the munitions are in his hands.

Here it appears that Vera Cruz was taken for the purpose of depriving Huerta of arms and ammunition.

In Secretary Franklin K. Lane's statement that appeared in the press during the last Presidential campaign he told the truth. The Secretary said that Vera Cruz had been taken to show Huerta that when the American Government told him he had to get out, it meant business. The truth was out at last.

Parenthetically it is very interesting to recall that if the taking of Vera Cruz was to prevent arms and ammunition from reaching Huerta, and in which purpose 20 American lives were sacrificed, that the Ypiranga, a few days later, went down to the harbor of Coatzacoalcos, a short distance south of Vera Cruz, and there, with 50 or 60 American battleships, gunboats, cruisers, and torpedo boats, in charge of several admirals, patrolling the surrounding waters, landed its arms and ammunition, which a few days later reached Huerta's hands. Carl Heynen, the representative in Mexico of the Hamburg-American Steamship Line which owned the Ypiranga, called on the chief of port at Vera Cruz, Capt. Stickney, an unusually obtuse naval officer, and tried to get him to order him, Heynen, or even ask him, not to permit his boat to land the arms and ammunition in question, as Heynen was anxious for an excuse not to obey Huerta's orders, but this brilliant commander practically ordered Heynen out of his office.

Mr. KEARFUL. We have often heard about the incident of a large number of Americans who were besieged at the hotels in Tampico, and confusing and contradictory statements have been made with reference to the abandonment of the Americans at that place by the commander of the American fleet. Will you please state the truth about that matter if you are able to do so.

Mr. BUCKLEY. This incident in the minds of Americans in Mexico bore the same importance as the landing of the Americans in Vera Cruz, because of its sinister implications. The facts of this case are as follows:

Small American gunboats had been kept in the river at Tampico a few hundred feet from the customhouse, from which marines could have been landed in 10 minutes, for at least two years, and at the time of the taking of Vera Cruz these small gunboats, together with several American battleships which were in the Gulf of Mexico within 3 or 4 miles from the mouth of the Panuco River, were under the command of Admiral H. T. Mayo. It must be borne in mind in this connection that Tampico is about 6 miles from the mouth of the river. During the afternoon or the night of April 20 (Vera Cruz was captured at 11 o'clock in the morning of the 21st) Admiral Mayo received orders to leave the harbor and go out into the gulf; at 10.30 the next morning Admiral Mayo obeyed orders and left Tampico.

The American Government knew, when orders were issued to Admiral Mayo to leave Tampico, that Vera Cruz was going to be taken, and Admiral Mayo knew this before he left the harbor at 10.30 on the morning of the 21st; nevertheless, neither Admiral Mayo nor the American Government made any arrangements whatsoever for the protection of American citizens in Tampico. As I said before, Vera Cruz was captured at 11 o'clock. At 1 o'clock a notice to this effect was posted on the doors of the municipal building in Tampico. By 5 o'clock that afternoon a mob of thousands of Mexicans had surrounded hundreds of American men, women, and children who had taken refuge in the Southern and Victoria Hotels in Tampico and threatened to kill them. Without hearing a word from either the American Government or Admiral Mayo, the captain of the German gunboat Dresden, which was in the river near the custom house, came to the rescue of the besieged Americans and ordered the Mexican authorities in Tampico to disperse the mob within fifteen minutes. This was done, and then the German captain arranged to take the Americans on the German and English gunboats lying near the customhouse, and on two or three other boats lying in the river under the protection of English and German guns, and the embarkation of the Americans under the protection of English and German guns was begun between 9 and 10 o'clock that night—the night of April 21st—and was concluded before 2 o'clock in the morning.

A week or so later, when a committee of American citizens from Tampico called on Secretary of the Navy Josephus Daniels to ask him why American gunboats had been maintained in Tampico for two years or more and then had abandoned the American citizens the first time their protection was needed, Secretary Daniels first stated that the gunboats were in the Gulf of Mexico, just outside of Tampico, where they could give full protection to Americans. He was informed that Tampico was situated 6 miles from the mouth of the river and that, consequently, the gunboats were anchored in the Gulf 8 or 10 miles from Tampico, from which place they could give no protection to American citizens. To this Secretary Daniels made the astounding reply that he had been under the impression that Tampico was situated on the Gulf. Secretary Daniels then stated that arrangements had been made with the British and Germans for the protection of the American citizens of Tampico before the American gunboats were withdrawn, but unfortunately for Secretary Daniels, the spokesman of the committee had been present at the last meeting between Admiral Mayo and the American consul at Tampico and knew that Daniels' statement was not true, and told him so. Daniels then coolly retracted his statement.

During the last presidential campaign Admiral Mayo made a statement, at the instance of the Democratic National Committee, which appeared in the New York Times on October 9, 1916, not quite 30 days before the election. The New York Times' story is as follows:

Admiral H. T. Mayo's own story of the so-called "Tampico incident," regarding which it has been charged by Republicans that American citizens were deserted in Mexico and their property destroyed, was made public yesterday through the Democratic National Committee in the form of an interview with Admiral Mayo by George Creel, a writer. Mr. Creel also interviewed Admiral Fletcher on what happened at Vera Cruz. Admiral Mayo was in command of the American naval forces at Tampico, and the entire "incident" centered around him.

"It is misrepresentation," he said, "to say that American citizens in Tampico were deserted in an hour of imminent danger. It is distorting facts to say that Americans, robbed of the protection of their own flag, were forced to seek refuge under the colors of a foreign power. It is not true that the Tampico affair was marked by gross bungling. The fact that close to 3,000 Americans were taken out of the city, without loss of life or destruction of property, is a result that ought to speak for itself. I have no interest in parties or political controversies, but I have a very deep interest in the honor of the United States, the pride of the American Navy. It is this honor and this pride that I am glad to defend against aspersion and misrepresentation."

The interview with Admiral Mayo was obtained on the deck of the Yankton, in Hampton Roads. Secretary of the Navy Josephus Daniels gave the admiral permission to talk to the interviewer as the result of widespread insistence that the "one man who knew" should be allowed to give all the facts in the case.

CONDITIONS NORMAL ON APRIL 20.

The admiral said, in his story of the affair:

"On April 14 Federal reinforcements had arrived, and the whole situation had improved to such a degree that I brought all the refugees in from the battleships and landed them in Tampico again. The rebels abandoned their attack on the city and withdrew, business was resumed, and conditions appeared perfectly normal. On April 20, in the evening, I received a wireless from Admiral Fletcher, stating that Secretary Daniels had ordered me to Vera Cruz, with all my ships except the Des Moines, which was to remain at Tampico."

"Then at the time Secretary Daniels issued the order, on April 20, he had every reason to believe that affairs at Tampico were normal, and that they had been normal since April 14?" Admiral Mayo was asked.

"That is the case, if by normal you mean what had existed for quite a while," he replied.

"The charge has been made, and is now being made repeatedly that both you and Consul Miller sent bitter protests to Secretary Daniels, and that he ignored them. Is this true?" was the next question.

"It is absolutely untrue," he said. "I have since learned that it was not until Admiral Fletcher filed his report in May that the Navy Department ever knew that a protest had been made. It was my judgment that I should remain at Tampico. I put this judgment up to Admiral Fletcher, my ranking officer, and he approved. Radio communication was difficult, however, and as his answer had not arrived by 7 o'clock on the morning of April 21, I arranged to start down the river.

"Just before passing out of the jetties, about 10.30 a. m., I received a wireless from Admiral Fletcher approving my recommendation and telling me to retain the Connecticut, Dolphin, Des Moines, Cyclops, and Solace to look out for American and foreign lives until other provision was made; also giving me my first information that he had been ordered to seize the customhouse at Vera Cruz. I sent word back that I was outside and would remain outside for further orders or developments. I was about 6 miles from Tampico.

COOPERATED WITH BRITISH SHIP.

"I received so many alarming reports during the night of the 21st and 22d that I decided to go up the river on the morning of the 22d and bring out the Americans. Early on the morning of April 22 I sent a message to Capt. Doughty of the British cruiser Hermitone, telling him of my intent, and asking him to inform Gen. Zaragoza that I was coming in for the sole purpose of taking out American citizens.

"Capt. Doughty at once made a request that my plan should be changed. He pointed out that it was not only Americans who were concerned, but also English, German, French, and Spanish. He did not doubt my ability to handle the Tampico situation, but he did fear for the safety of all foreigners in the city and in the interior. One shot from my guns, one clash between my men and the Federal forces, and a fire would be lighted that would spread far faster than any relief expedition could hope to follow. What he suggested was that I should remain outside and permit him to collect all Americans quietly and slowly and then send them out to me.

"For three days the work of rescue went on. We took out about 3,000 Americans, dividing up among the ships as best we could. I chartered one steamer, and also had sent me two transports, the Hancock and the Dixie, and two Ward Line steamers. I sent about 2,100 American to Galveston in these vessels and the Connecticut and some collers and destroyers. Also later sent a large number to New Orleans."

"Were any lives lost, Admiral Mayo?"

"Not a single life."

"Any property destroyed?"

"None, except losses incident to the rebel attack. Surely such results ought to constitute a sufficient answer to misrepresentations and aspersions. No bloodshed; no destruction. It would have been easy for me to have smashed Tampico into bits with my guns. Not only did I have the battleship Connecticut, the Des Moines, and the Dolphin, but early on the morning of the 22d three divisions of destroyers from Admiral Badgers fleet came up."

This statement is not true; I have already stated the facts. The admiral states:

"It is misrepresentation to say that American citizens in Tampico were deserted in an hour of imminent danger." The admiral himself admits that his boats left the Tampico Harbor at 10.30 on the morning of the 21st, and that Vera Cruz was taken at about 11 o'clock the same day, and that he knew when he left the Tampico Harbor that Vera Cruz was going to be taken. The fact that there was danger is proved by the formation of a mob within a few hours after Admiral Mayo left the harbor. The admiral states that his boats were within 6 miles of Tampico, and, the inference would be, near enough to protect Americans. This is misleading. In the first place, I do not think the boats could have been closer than 8 miles to Tampico, and certainly they were not close enough, since they were out in the Gulf of Mexico, to render any assistance to Americans. It must be recalled that these boats had been in the Tampico Harbor, and the American gunboats had been there for over two years, within a few hundred feet of the customhouse, where, as I stated before, marines could have been landed in 10 minutes. There could, consequently, be but one interpretation placed on their removal, and that was the interpretation placed upon it by the mob in Tampico, that all protection to Americans had been withdrawn. The admiral stated that "the fact that close to 3,000 Americans were taken out of the city, without loss of life or destruction of property, is a result that ought to speak for itself." He neglects a very important fact, and that is that all of these 3,000 Americans were taken out of Tampico by the Germans and English and transported down the river 6 miles to its mouth and out into the Gulf to the American battleships under the gallant command of Admiral Mayo. To the question, "Then, at the time Secretary Daniels issued the order on April 20, he had every reason to believe that affairs in Tampico were normal, and that they had been normal since April 14?" Admiral Mayo replied: "That is the case, if by normal you mean what had existed for quite a while."

The fact is, and Admiral Mayo knew it, that Daniels knew on April 20 that Vera Cruz would be taken, and that Daniels ordered the boats out of Tampico, not to aid in the capture of Vera Cruz—there were plenty of boats in Vera Cruz for this purpose—but because he felt, in his ignorance, that the presence of gunboats in Tampico might inflame the people against Americans, whereas the withdrawal had just the opposite effect of what was intended.

The Admiral then states:

I received so many alarming reports during the nights of the 21st and 22d that I decided to go up the river on the morning of the 22d and bring out the Americans. Early on the morning of April 22 I sent a message to Capt. Doughty, of the British cruiser Hermione, telling him of my intent and asking him to inform Gen. Zaragoza that I was coming in for the sole purpose of taking out American citizens. Capt. Doughty at once made a request that my plans be changed; * * *, he feared for the safety of all foreigners in the city and in the interior; * * * one shot from my guns * * * and a fire would be lighted that would spread far faster than any relief expedition could hope to follow. What he suggested was that I should remain outside and permit him to collect the Americans, quietly and slowly, and then send them to me.

This communication from Admiral Mayo to Capt. Doughty was on the morning of the 22d. The Americans had been rescued the night before, removed from Tampico to the boats in the river, and were all safe under the protection of British and German guns. What Admiral Mayo's idea could have been in returning into the river after Americans were safe he does not explain.

As a matter of fact on the morning of the 22d, when breakfast was served to American refugees on the Hermione the same Capt. Doughty stated to the Americans that he did not have enough dishes or food to serve them all they might want to eat; that he was under no obligation to protect them; that it was the duty of their own Government to protect them, and that since their Government had failed them he had taken charge of them from purely humanitarian motives.

Admiral Mayo continues:

For three days the work of rescue went on. We took out about 3,000 Americans, dividing up among the ships as best we could * * *.

Were any lives lost, Admiral Mayo?

Not a single life.

Any property destroyed?

None, except losses incident to the rebel attack. Surely such results ought to constitute sufficient answer to misrepresentations and aspersions.

Again an attempt to mislead. It took three days to transfer American refugees from English and German boats to American boats, but this was done from 6 to 10 miles from Tampico, out in the Gulf where it was difficult to transfer because of the heavy seas. In stating that no American lives were lost, Admiral Mayo must have referred to the splendid seamanship of American sailors in not dropping American women and children into the Gulf when they were transferred from English and German boats to American boats.

We have here the extraordinary spectacle of an admiral in the United States Navy making a statement which he knew to be untrue for the purpose of subserving the political ends of the party then in power. It was not a surprise to the Americans in Tampico that an admiral who would desert his post of duty at such a time should also make this statement.

Mr. KEARFUL. What opportunities have you had to secure personal information with reference to what occurred at the Niagara conference, which was a conference between representatives of the American Government and of Huerta?

Mr. BUCKLEY. I was in Vera Cruz in May, 1914, when the three delegates of the Huerta government to the Niagara conference, Lic. Emilio Rabasa, Lic. Luis Elguero, and Lic. Agustin Rodriguez, passed through Vera Cruz on their way to Niagara Falls to attend this conference. These gentlemen asked me to accompany them as counsel, which I did, and we went from Vera Cruz to Habana by steamer, from there to Key West by steamer, and from there to Washington by train. During this time I had the opportunity of ascertaining the ideas and the purpose of the delegates in question. From Washington the Mexican delegation went to New York and a day or so later proceeded to Niagara Falls.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you in close touch with the members of the Mexican delegation from the time of your first connection to the close of the conference?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have occasion to confer with American officials on the part of the Mexican delegates at this time?

Mr. BUCKLEY. I remained in Washington throughout the conference, except for the last week, and was constantly in touch with the officials of the American Government, principally Mr. William Jennings Bryan, Secretary of State, during this entire time as representative of the Mexican delegation.

Mr. KEARFUL. The committee would like to have from you a complete statement, in your own way, of the purposes, proceedings, and result of the Niagara conference.

Mr. BUCKLEY. A few days after the taking of Vera Cruz the Huerta government received an invitation from Argentina, Brazil, and Chile to participate in a conference with the representatives of the American Government under the auspices of those countries for the purpose of solving the questions that had arisen between the United States and Mexico. A member of Huerta's cabinet, without the knowledge of Huerta, called in secret meeting a group of Mexican statesmen who had taken no part in the Huerta government and informed them that the time had come when they must take an active part in the affairs of their country, regardless of their own preferences, if they would save Mexico from conquest by American troops. It can readily be seen that Mexicans who had not been connected with the Huerta government did not at that time care to become involved with a government that, since the occupation of Vera Cruz by American troops and the backing of the Carranza revolution by the United States, was doomed to last but a few weeks longer. These men foresaw what the consequences of such association might be. Nevertheless these gentlemen agreed with Huerta's minister, and upon the statement by this minister that if they would select a delegation to the conference he would insist that Huerta appoint it, they at once selected probably the three ablest Mexicans in Mexico, Lic. Emilo Rabasa, Lic. Luis Elguero, and Lic. Agustin Rodrigues, all lawyers of note, two of whom, I understand, had never held public office. Huerta appointed these gentlemen.

When the Mexican people saw these three patriotic men leave the country for the purpose of conferring with the American Government, they breathed a sigh of relief, for they felt sure that no mean spirit of partisan advantage would be permitted to stand in the way of an honorable settlement of the difficulties between the United States and Mexico. These delegates represented what was best in Mexico, and the United States could not then or now produce abler men than those comprising the Mexican delegation. No government could have had a better opportunity to learn something about another country than the American Government had in its association with these three gentlemen, and the opportunity of the American Government to reach an understanding with what was best in Mexico was one that few Governments would have overlooked.

It was natural to assume, since the object of the taking of Vera Cruz, as set out in the President's message to Congress and in the resolution passed by this body, was for the purpose of compelling Huerta to make amends for his alleged insults to the American flag, that negotiations would be limited to a discussion of this matter. The Mexican delegation came fully prepared to make such amends as the strong American Government might demand, provided they were consistent with the independence of Mexico. They soon suspected that instead the internal affairs of Mexico would be taken up at this conference, and in their impotence to resist this encroachment on the sovereignty of Mexico they reconciled themselves to discuss these matters.

Before arriving in the United States the Mexican delegation learned that the ministers of Argentina, Brazil, and Chile had invited Carranza to send representatives to the conference that was to adjust differences between Mexico and the United States, and had advised Carranza that since his representatives and Huerta's representatives must appear in the same conference, it was only reasonable and just that hostilities should be suspended pending the termination of the same. To this invitation Carranza replied that he would send delegates to treat of the differences between the United States and Mexico—that is, the differences between the United States and Huerta—but that he would not agree to suspend hostilities, and that he would not deal with Huerta. Under the circumstances there was, of course, no object in his sending representatives, and the mediators immediately advised him that since he refused to suspend hostilities they felt compelled to withdraw their invitation to him to participate in the conference.

This invitation to Carranza was in itself sufficient indication that the internal affairs of Mexico were to be discussed and that negotiations were not to be limited to the flag incident, and this impression was confirmed upon the arrival of the Mexican delegates in Washington. The mediators, in a conference they had with the Mexican delegates on the afternoon the latter arrived in Washington, advised these gentlemen that the American Government would insist upon taking up the internal affairs of Mexico and would insist that Huerta be eliminated; that if the Mexican delegation would only agree to this, they would have no trouble with the American Government, everything would be satisfactorily arranged, and the American Government would agree that a government be established in Mexico satisfactory to all parties.

If you will recall the situation in May, 1914, just after Vera Cruz was taken by the American troops, you will remember that the general impression prevailed in the United States that a conflict had arisen between the American Government and Huerta, and there was general insistence that the prestige and pride of the American Government required that Huerta be eliminated from power, even though it be necessary to occupy Mexico for that purpose, and that the press was demanding that Funston's troops be sent on up from Vera Cruz to Mexico City. The predicament of the American Government was most embarrassing, since it had decided to take Vera Cruz on the theory that it would thereby gain the gratitude of the Mexican people, who would immediately overthrow Huerta, but found instead that as a result of criminal ignorance over 20 Americans and hundreds of Mexicans had been killed, and that the Mexican people had rallied around Huerta. The American Government had misjudged the situation; it did not want to go through with its undertaking to eliminate Huerta, since this involved the military occupation of a large part of Mexico; and it did not want to recede in the face of American public opinion, which opinion was not interested in the motives that impelled the American Government to make the decision that Huerta should be eliminated, but whose pride and vanity were aroused when this decision was made, and who insisted that the American Government go through with its project. The American Government eagerly seized at the opportunity for a conference in order to gain time. When the Mexican delegation arrived in the United States the entire press was speculating as to whether Huerta would consent to resign, the general impression being that he would stay in Mexico and die at his post.

This will impress upon you the importance at that time of Huerta's resignation, the intense anxiety that the American Government felt, and its extreme desire to secure this resignation and thus relieve itself of embarrassment. Foreseeing that Huerta's resignation would be required, and that there would be an impasse unless this were forthcoming, the Mexican delegates insisted, as a prerequisite to their acceptance of the mission, that Huerta agree to resign, and the latter did so before the delegation left Mexico City. The Mexican delegation realized the importance of coming to an agreement with the United States as soon as possible, but at the same time understood the importance of coming to a definite understanding as to what was to follow this resignation.

The Mexican delegation, at their first informal conference in Washington with the mediators, did not commit themselves to Huerta's elimination, although they heard with satisfaction that if this were accomplished a neutral government satisfactory to all factions would be established in Mexico.

The next day the Mexican delegation went to New York, and spent a day or so there before leaving for Niagara Falls. A prominent Democratic Senator called on one of these gentlemen—they were under the impression that he had come from Washington to see them—and told them that if they would only induce Huerta to resign their troubles would be at an end, and that the American Government would see to it that a neutral government satisfactory to all factions would be established in Mexico.

Although the Mexican delegation had no doubt that what the mediators said was authoritative, as also what the United States Senator said, nevertheless they asked me to remain in Washington, and to see the President, either directly or indirectly, the day after they left Washington and inform him officially that Huerta would resign, and that in submitting this offer it was the understanding of the Mexican delegation that a neutral government should be established in Mexico. I called on Dr. D. F. Houston, Secretary of Agriculture, whom I had known for some years, and explained the situation to him and stated the attitude of the Huerta delegation, and informed him of the assurance of the A B C mediators given to the Huerta delegation. Dr. Houston was very much pleased, and stated that, even without the voluntary resignation of Huerta, Mr. Wilson would insist that neither Carranza nor Villa nor any of their active adherents be President of Mexico, under the theory that he had expounded as the basis of his Latin-American policy that he would recognize no man who had risen to office through force, which would eliminate the leaders of the revolution; that, as a matter of fact, these leaders were not seeking power and were unselfish in their efforts to relieve Mexico of a tyrant. This was on Sunday, and Dr. Houston promised to call on the President the next day and advise him of this message from the Mexican delegation. I heard nothing further from Dr. Houston, and advised the Huerta delegation that they could proceed with all confidence.

The Mexican delegation, in order to be sure of their ground, consulted Huerta by telegraph asking him to confirm his offer to resign and advising him that a neutral government would be established. Huerta immediately replied, confirming his authorization to them. The Mexican delegation, in all good faith, officially advised the American delegation and the mediators, at the first full session of the conference, that they were authorized to state that Gen. Huerta had agreed to resign and eliminate himself from the situation.

You can readily see that after Huerta's promise to resign had been published he lost his hold on the Mexican people, as they considered that he had surrendered in his fight with the President of the United States. After this news was published, what prestige Huerta had in Mexico was gone, and there was no way for him to recover it. Thereafter the Mexican delegation was at the mercy of the American Government.

It was natural that since the American Government insisted that the internal affairs of Mexico be settled at this conference, it should also insist, in fact compel, Carranza to participate in the conference. It was expected that the American Government, because of its sponsoring of the revolution, could induce these men through moral pressure, to send a delegation, and all knew that it could compel them to participate by exercising the material pressure at its command. The Mexican delegation, after perfunctorily offering to make amends to the United States in return for the immediate evacuation of Vera Cruz, a request which was refused, asked that an armistice be arranged between the contending parties in Mexico, involving a suspension of hostilities, and that Carranza be asked to send delegates to the conference. The American Government offered to exert its influence to the end that the Carranza revolutionary junta in Washington agree to both of these propositions, and I have no doubt that the Government did use its best offices to accomplish these purposes; but the Carrancistas refused to suspend hostilities.

The Mexican delegation then asked that inasmuch as the Carrancistas would not appear in the conference, they be eliminated from consideration; the American delegation refused to accede to this, and proceeded in the discussions that followed themselves to represent the claims of the Carranza faction. The Mexican delegation then asked that since the American delegation was representing the cause of the Carranza faction, and the latter would receive the benefit of any advantageous arrangements, it agree that the Carranza faction would abide by the results of the conference; this reasonable request was also refused by the American delegation.

Early in the conference the American delegates agreed to waive an indemnity and to waive an apology as a result of the alleged insult to the American flag, which eliminated the international aspect of the conference, and proceedings from then on dealt exclusively with the establishment of a provisional government in Mexico, which was to call elections in order that the Mexican people might be given the opportunity to designate their permanent government. It was agreed that a commission composed of a president, who should be neutral, two Huerta adherents, and two Carranza adherents, should continue the provisional government.

The Mexican delegates to the conference and the mediators were anxious to come to an agreement as soon as possible and conclude their labors. The American delegates delayed matters from one day to another without satisfactory explanation. This was undoubtedly due to the fact that the American delegates soon learned that they had absolutely no authority and were compelled to consult the American Government on each matter as it came up, and to the fact that the American Government could not agree to anything until it had consulted the Carranza revolutionary junta.

It must be remembered that the embargo on the shipment of arms and ammunition to Mexico had been raised some time before, with the result that Carranza and Villa were getting all the arms they needed, but that Huerta was getting none. As a result of the possession of these means of warfare, and as a result of the loss of prestige that came to Huerta after he agreed to resign, the revolution was making great progress. The Mexican delegation had insisted from the very beginning that if the American Government could not induce Carranza to suspend hostilities, it certainly could, to show its good faith, place an embargo on arms and ammunition, pending the conclusion of the conference between the Huerta delegates and Carranza revolutionary junta, represented by the American Government. The American Government, finally, about the 1st of June, agreed to place an embargo on arms and ammunition.

Three or four days after this new embargo was declared, the Ward Line steamer Antilla sailed from New York for Tampico with a large supply of arms and ammunition to the Carranza forces. The Mexican delegates immediately wired me, and within a few hours after the boat sailed I called on Mr. Bryan, feeling confident that there had been some mistake.

I reminded Mr. Bryan of the embargo which had been declared a few days before and asked him how it was that the boat had been permitted to leave the United States, to which Mr. Bryan replied that he understood that the order had not reached New York until an hour or so after the boat left. My recollection now is that the order was issued on Thursday and the boat left on Tuesday. I asked Mr. Bryan how he accounted for this delay, to which Mr. Bryan replied that he really could not account for it. He said that he of course could call in the chief of the proper section of the State Department and ask him, but that this would look as if he were criticizing this chief, and of course he could not do that; or that he might call in the "press boys" and ask them how this had happened, but that it would not look exactly right for him to go outside of his department for information, and that he didn't care to do this. Mr. Bryan, however, seemed to be entirely satisfied to remain in ignorance as to why this order had been delayed four days or so in arriving at New York; the matter did not seem to bother him at all, and it did not seem to occur to him that he of all men ought to know just what had happened.

I then asked Mr. Bryan to have the boat recalled, as it was only a few hours out from New York; Mr. Bryan declined to do this. I asked him then to order the boat to unload the arms and ammunition in Habana, where it touched before reaching Vera Cruz; Mr. Bryan declined to do this. I then asked him to order the captain of the boat not to unload the arms and ammunition in Tampico, but Mr. Bryan declined to do this. In other words, he insisted on breaking faith with the Mexican delegation.

Huerta immediately issued orders to his gunboats not to permit the Antilla to enter the port of Tampico, whereupon the American Government announced that the American squadron at Tampico would prevent the Mexican gunboats from interfering with the Antilla. The right of the American Government under international law to prevent Huerta from stopping a boat carrying arms and ammunition to the revolutionary faction is, of course, conceded by no one. This determination of the American Government also, of course, constituted another act of intervention in the internal affairs of Mexico. In addition, it is a stain on the honor of the United States.

In connection with the embargo on arms and ammunition, and the promise of the American Government to the Mexican delegation and to the mediators not to permit American arms and ammunition to reach Carranza, I will state that Mr. Lind, personal representative of the President and active Carranza revolutionary agent, was then in Washington, extremely busy as a messenger between the Carranza revolutionary junta and the State Department; he was carrying orders from the revolutionary junta to the department. Mr. Lind stated generally that while no more Antilla incidents would occur, the revolutionaries had arranged to get all the arms and ammunition they wanted; that this would be accomplished by having ships take out their papers to Habana and then go to Tampico; and that the American Government had consented to the evasion. I immediately called on Mr. Bryan and asked him if this were true, and he stated that it was. Mr. Bryan stated that these ships would take out papers to Habana, and that the American Government would have no official knowledge that they were going to Tampico; that if, after they got out in the Gulf, they diverted their course the American Government would have nothing to do with it, or, as Mr. Bryan insisted, the American Government would have no "official knowledge." Mr. Bryan seemed to draw a very marked distinction between himself as Mr. Bryan and himself as Secretary of State. No further confirmation of the bad faith of the American Government was needed.

Mr. Lind's and Mr. Bryan's words were made good. On June 6 a million cartridges were shipped on the steamship Sunshine from Galveston to Tampico. Thereafter the schooners Sunshine, Grampus, and Susan made six trips from Galveston to Tampico, each time carrying shipments of war materials to the Carranza revolutionaries; all these boats, according to the speech of Representative Rogers, previously referred to, were consigned to Habana, but "by stress of weather they were blown to Tampico."

An incident that occurred in the above conference with Mr. Bryan will indicate the type of mind that the Mexican delegation and the mediators had to deal with. Mr. Bryan stated, leaving aside for a moment the engagement of the American Government, that there was no reason why Carranza should not receive arms and ammunition since Huerta had received them through the Ypiranga, the boat which, you will remember, was the occasion of the landing at Vera Cruz according to Admiral Badger, and which unloaded its arms and ammunition a few days later at Coatzacoalcos, a short distance south of Vera Cruz. I reminded Mr. Bryan that Huerta felt no gratitude to the American Government for getting these munitions, as it was a case of bad management by the American Government. Mr. Bryan then stated that when Admiral Fletcher reported to the Government that these arms were being unloaded at Coatzacoalcos the American Government thought there was a mistake and consequently did nothing until it was too late, as he had received assurances from the German ambassador to the effect that the Hamburg American Line would not deliver this cargo to Huerta; Mr. Bryan then thought a minute, and said that "No; he would not be positive that the German ambassador had given this assurance." He then thought another minute and said that he was quite sure now that the German ambassador had not given such assurance.

After the American and Mexican delegations had agreed that there would be a neutral government as outlined above, it was arranged with the Mexican delegation that they should name several neutrals who would be considered by the American Government in the selection of one to be President of the new commission. The Mexican delegation and the American delegation discussed this matter for several days, and I discussed it several times with Mr. Bryan. The American Government did not seem to be able to make a choice, and something seemed to be the matter. Finally I had a conference with Mr. Bryan on June 6, in which the situation was defined. I quote from the translation of a letter I wrote to one of the Mexican delegates on June 7:

I passed the entire day yesterday in conference with Mr. Garrison [Secretary of War] and Mr. Long, Chief of the Department of Latin-American Affairs in the State Department; in the afternoon I saw Mr. Bryan for a moment, and last night I was with this gentleman from 9 until after 11.

The officials of the State Department, including Mr. Bryan, seemed to be very much preoccupied yesterday, but last night Mr. Bryan was again his normal self, due no doubt to his conference with the President.

Mr. Bryan, with admirable frankness, advised me of the attitude of the administration, in view of which you may deduce the result of the conference.

The Government [American Government] considers that Huerta can not remain in power many days longer [Mr. Bryan states]; that everybody knew this when the conferences were initiated, and that since the authority of Huerta was doomed to disappear, and since Carranza was to enter into authority, the principal object of the conferences was and is now to carry out the inevitable without the shedding of blood and to transfer the Government of Mexico from the hands of Huerta to those of Carranza by peaceful means. That if Carranza were placed under the necessity of conquering the capital he might not be able to contain his people in their desire to commit revenge; that a durable peace could not come as a result of compromise [this was an exact repetition of what Cabrera had told me a day or two before]; that he thought the attitude of the Mexican delegation was arbitrary in insisting that Carranza should consent to an armistice, although he personally had tried to persuade him to accept this condition; that the influence of Washington with the rebels was exaggerated, but that even if it did have sufficient influence the government would not exercise it for the reason that what the Mexican delegation asks is that the American Government aid in perpetuating in Mexico, not Huerta but Huerta's régime; that no effort of the Mexican delegation can induce the American Government to break with the Carrancista régime, which this Government considers has the support of the Mexican people and which will form the government which is destined to pacify the country, and with which the American Government must treat; that the government of Huerta had taken every pretext to insult the Government of the United States, and that when the proposition was made to Huerta through Lind that he consent to an armistice he had replied with insults, and that in view of his attitude he could not expect from Washington an attitude hostile to the rebels.

I reminded Mr. Bryan that we had been dealing now for some time on the selection of a neutral for provisional President and that his attitude constituted a decided change, to which he agreed. I then reminded him that the Mexican delegation had participated in the conference and had induced Huerta to agree to resign on the representation and promise of the American Government that it would agree to a neutral as provisional President; at this Mr. Bryan became very much annoyed and stated:

When you can't keep a promise you can't keep it, and that is all there is to it; I don't want to hear any more about it.

I then asked Mr. Bryan if the American Government would consent to the appointment as provisional President of a constitutionalist who had not taken up arms—that is, a civilian constitutionalist—that if he would consent to this it would help to save the pride of the Mexican delegation and would also show that the American Government was consistent in the doctrine it had laid down that it would not recognize in Latin-America any man who arose to power through force. Mr. Bryan thought over this for a long time, and then finally told me frankly that the American Government would agree on nobody for provisional President but Carranza. I finally asked him, then, if the American Government would be consistent in the policy it had announced with regard to Huerta and would agree that since Carranza was to be provisional President he must not be a candidate for permanent President, and that the American Government would not recognize him as such. Mr. Bryan said, "No; Carranza must be provisional President and permanent President." This ended the conference.

Since the American delegation to the Niagara conference had agreed that of the commission of five the President would be a neutral, their position was most embarrassing. A few days after I saw Mr. Bryan and reported the result of the conference to the Mexican delegation, the American delegation weakly proposed that this neutral Provisional President be Gen. Angeles or Gen. Natera, two revolutionary generals. This was so absurd that the Mexican delegates advised the mediators that they would not continue this cynical discussion.

At about that time Villa decided to revolt against Carranza, and Carranza, fearing that he would lose out all around, sent word to the mediators that he would participate in the conference but that he would first have to consult his subordinates, with which maneuver he gained a little time. The mediators, anxious to end this humiliating conference, announced that since all international difficulties had been satisfactorily adjusted, it would be best to adjourn the conference and have the Huerta delegates and the Carranza delegates agree on a neutral government, independent of outside dictation. A few days later, when Carranza had adjusted his difficulties with Villa, he refused to participate in the conference.

In this whole connection it is interesting to speculate on American prestige in Latin America.

Mr. KEARFUL. The committee is interested in having a true picture of the Carranza revolution from its inception to the time of his entry into Mexico City. Are you able to draw such a picture?

Mr. BUCKLEY. The Carranza revolution, in spite of the encouragement it had received from the American Government, including the permission to introduce arms and munitions, had not progressed as rapidly as its friends had expected. The Mexican people soon perceived the purposes of the revolution and did not sympathize with it. At an early stage of the revolution, when Carranza was in Hermosillo, Sonora, controlling a small portion of territory, he gave an interview to Mr. Hamilton Fyfe, a correspondent representing a large English newspaper, which shocked everybody who read it, and which confirmed abroad the impression that the Mexican people had already gained of the purpose and nature of this new revolution for the redemption of Mexico. This interview is as follows:

"Have you any definite plans for land reform and other reforms?" I inquired.

He thought a moment. Then he replied: "The first necessity is the fair and free election of a President. The election which is proposed now will be a farce. In the disturbed state of our country it is impossible to hold a proper election. Large numbers of voters will not know anything about it. We Constitutionalists refuse to recognize any President who may be returned at the fraudulent election. We shall execute anybody who does recognize him."

"I beg your pardon," I said. "Would you kindly repeat your last statement?"

I thought I must have misunderstood it.

"We shall," the general said calmly and as if he were making a perfectly natural remark, "execute anyone who recognizes a President unconstitutionally elected and directly or indirectly guilty of participation in the murder of Madero."

Carranza's revolution never at any time had popular support. Carranza propagandists in the United States ask, if this is true, why the Carranza revolution prospered and why Carranza has not been overthrown. If a Government depends for its existence in Mexico on popular support, these propagandists might answer why it was Diaz remained in office for 35 years. The truth is that it does not matter what a great majority of the Mexican people think; the mass of the people have not the ability to think clearly, and have not the knowledge on which to base convictions, or the public spirit to act on them. As a matter of fact, the Carranza revolution succeeded and the Carranza Government has remained in power, in the first place, because it has been backed by the American Government and, in the second place, because it has utilized the bandits of the country, who have the virility to make subject the entire Mexican population of 15,000,000, with the very valuable support, we must not forget, of the American Government.

The irresponsibility of the mass of the people in Mexico is incomprehensible to the average American. Where a city like Mexico City, with a population comprising 100,000 men, all Catholics, will permit a man like Obregon, and the 3,000 ruffians who comprised his army of occupation, to starve the city and take over 150 priests, march them through the streets of the city to jail, and then load them in box cars and cattle cars and ship them out of the city, without making any resistance outside of a feeble manifestation, such a people have not the public spirit to establish a government based on their own will.

I will not go into details of the Carranza revolution, and shall refer only to certain instances that will explain its nature. Even the peon schoolboy in Mexico knew that Carranza's revolution was a revolution sponsored by the United States and that the American Government had placed Carranza in power. Both because Carranza and his followers are the type of Mexican that make the hatred of the American a religion, and also undoubtedly because of their sensitiveness to the reproach of their own people that they were the puppets of the American Government, the Carrancistas devote a great part of their energy to mistreating the Americans and robbing them of their property.

It had been thought up to the time of the Niagara conference that the American Government was more or less directing the policy and guiding the steps of the revolution. As a matter of fact, a fact easily ascertainable by those who are interested, the Mexican revolutionary junta in Washington was directing the Mexican policy of the American Government. During the course of the Niagara conference Mr. Bryan repeatedly gave me phonographic repetitions of statements that Mr. Cabrera and Mr. Vasconcelos had made to me earlier in the day. Mr. Bryan delayed many of his decisions during the course of the conference so as to ascertain what the revolutionary junta would advise or, rather, direct. The group of Americans whom I referred to during the first part of my testimony will within the next few weeks furnish to the committee detailed information showing the relations between the American Government and its representatives and the revolutionaries. At this time I will refer to only a few of the more important details.

I had a conversation in 1914 with Luis Cabrera, in which Mr. Cabrera very frankly told me that the menace of the Americans in Mexico must be removed and that the only way to do this was to drive him out of the country and take his property. At a banquet given in Vera Cruz in the latter part of 1915 to Gen. Carranza, which was attended by the consuls of foreign countries, Cabrera dilated on the aims of the revolution and stated that the constitutionalists were going to confiscate American property and take over the American oil wells; and, turning pointedly to Mr. Canada, the American consul, he told him to report this to his President. Cabrera's tone was so offensive that the Cuban consul started to leave the meeting, but was restrained by Mr. Canada, who, being the American consul, had become accustomed to insults from the Carranza authorities.

During the conversation above referred to as having taken place in Washington I told Mr. Cabrera that the American Government would not permit the Carranza government to drive the Americans out of Mexico and confiscate their property, as Mr. Cabrera stated the Mexican Government was going to do, whereupon Mr. Cabrera smiled and told me that he was surprised at the ignorance of the average American on public matters. He explained to me that Mr. Wilson was what he was pleased to term an advanced liberal, a great Democrat, whose concern was for the welfare of the people of the world and was not limited to the narrow bounds of the United States. Mr. Cabrera considered Mr. Wilson to be the same kind of a Democrat as he, Mr. Cabrera, was. He said that Mr. Wilson was opposed to capital in Mexico and everywhere else in the world, no matter to whom the capital belonged, and that in expelling the American from Mexico the constitutionalists would receive the sympathy of the American Government. The Carranza authorities have proceeded confidently on this theory and have never had the least fear of compulsion from the American Government and have regarded all protests from the American Government as being insincere and merely perfunctory.

It would be tedious to refer to the conduct or words of the officials of the American Government to confirm this opinion of the Constitutionalists, and I will merely refer to an incident that occurred in Tampico in 1916. The Mexican employees of the refinery of the Pierce Oil Corporation had engaged in a strike, promoted by the Carranza authorities, and proceeded to take possession of the refinery. When the American superintendent, Mr. Warren, demanded that the authorities give him possession of his company's property, they paid no attention to him, and when the American Consul made similar demands the authorities did not even reply to his notes. The superintendent of the refinery went to the American consulate, and on finding there the commander of the American gunboats in the harbor, demanded of him that he and the property of his company be given protection, and stated that he was entitled to protection under the rules of international law. The commander in question is a red-blooded American, who undoubtedly did not sympathize with the policy of his Government, but who possessed sufficient discernment to understand this policy perfectly. The naval commander informed Mr. Warren that, of course, he was entitled to protection under the rules of international law, but that he, the Captain, represented a government which had repudiated international law; that the American squadron was there not to enforce international law, but to carry out the policy of the American Government, and that under this policy Americans abroad were not entitled to any protection whatever; and regardless of his own opinions in the matter, he had no discretion, since his responsibility was to his Government, and he must, therefore, decline to give Mr. Warren or his property or any other American protection of any kind.

Mr. KEARFUL. From what source do you get the information as to the conversation you have just related?

Mr. BUCKLEY. I was standing in the Consulate when it happened, and I heard part of it and the Captain of the gunboat recounted this conversation to me just after it occurred.

(Whereupon at 12:30 o'clock p. m. a recess was taken until 1.30 o'clock p. m.)

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have mentioned Mr. John Lind, a personal representative of President Wilson who was sent to Mexico to eliminate President Huerta. In December, 1914, Mr. Lind published a booklet on page 22 of which he refers to the improved prospects of Mexico under Carranza and says: "The indications are promising. The discipline and restraint shown by the victorious Constitutional armies and their chiefs were most creditable and encouraging." When was it that the victorious Constitutional armies under Mr. Carranza entered Mexico City?

Mr. BUCKLEY. In August, 1914.

Mr. KEARFUL. I was present in Mexico City in August, 1914, and I know you were. Will you give a description of what occurred there upon the entry into Mexico City of the victorious Constitutional armies of Carranza, with special reference to whether they displayed discipline and restraint, and as to whether what they did was creditable and encouraging.

Mr. BUCKLEY. The Carranza army, upon its entry into Mexico City, did not show the restraint that Mr. Lind speaks about in the booklet you have just quoted. The armies committed all manner of excesses and the officers distributed among themselves the finest dwellings in Mexico City, where they held orgies for several months and which they eventually looted. They sold furniture to pawnshops and libraries to book dealers and wine to the different restaurants in the city. It is notorious that what Mr. Lind states is not true, and his statement is merely the statement of a Carranza propagandist.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was in command of the advance forces that entered Mexico City at that time?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Gen. Alvaro Obregon.

Mr. KEARFUL. What class of people were his forces composed of?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Almost entirely of Yaqui Indians.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember the house that Obregon himself occupied?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Yes; my recollection is that it was the Braniff home on the Paseo de la Reforma.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have mentioned Joaquin D. Casasus as one of the so-called Cientificos and at one time an ambassador to the United States. Do you remember that his house was occupied by one of the Carrancista generals and subsequently looted?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Yes; it was occupied by Gen. Lucio Blanco. Although my impression is that it was looted by another Constitutionalist officer after Blanco left it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember the circumstances of a certain American official, a close personal and political friend of Secretary Bryan, who occupied apartments in the Casasus home during the time of its occupancy by Gen. Blanco?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember the official position that he held?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Yes; my recollection is that he was collector of customs at Brownsville.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please proceed with your statement.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Notwithstanding the assurances of Mr. Bryan and Mr. Lind that Villa was absolutely loyal to Carranza, the former did what nearly every revolutionary chief in the history of Mexico has done; he revolted against his civilian superior Carranza. Through the intervention of the American Government, which in its dealings with Mexico has persisted in ignoring the lessons of Mexican history, a convention was arranged between the Villa party and the Carranza party at Aguascalientes. Since this city was then in the territory of Villa, he did just what Carranza would have done if it had been in his territory—surrounded the convention hall with troops and compelled the convention to name as President his own appointee Eulalio Gutierrez, whereupon Carranza repudiated the action of the convention. Of course, the convention was opened, as all Mexican conventions are, with great ceremony, and in this particular case a Mexican flag was desecrated by being kissed by each of the delegates as a pledge to abide by the decision of the convention. Later the flag was stolen by one of the delegates.

The entire Republic of Mexico was then given over to a state of anarchy; Mexico City was taken and retaken time and again within a year by Villistas, Zapatistas, and Carrancistas. Homes in Mexico City were looted and occupied by the different generals, the Carrancistas distinguishing themselves in their barbarous conduct; churches were robbed, prominent Mexicans and foreigners were kidnapped, horses belonging to the diplomatic corps were stolen, several diplomats were driven out of the country, and a general reign of terror continued. The American Government was all the time assuring the American people that conditions in Mexico were rapidly approaching one of peace, and was cooperating with the different revolutionary factions in keeping the truth from the American people. There was little train communication, and it took several weeks for a letter to reach the United States. Representatives of 17 nationalities in Mexico City organized a national committee which unofficially took charge of foreigners and their affairs in Mexico City. This committee made desperate efforts to convey the truth of the situation to the American people and to the outside world, but was unable to cope with the opposition of the American Government.

American newspapers will not print a record of what has happened two or three weeks previously, and it was impossible to keep them advised each day of happenings in Mexico. A rigid censorship was imposed in Mexico City, and any newspaper men who were discovered sending out news unfavorable to the faction in charge was immediately 33d; that is, expelled from the country. Americans for a while sent mail through the American diplomatic pouch, but when the American Government discovered that news of conditions in Mexico was being sent to the American people in this way, it forbade the further use of this diplomatic conduct.

The international committee and the American subcommittee wired full reports of conditions to the American Government, and in vain begged this Government to publish their statements and appeals to the American people. The President replied that he must decline to do this for fear that the Carranza authorities might make reprisals on the foreigners sending these reports—rather unusual solicitude for their safety.

Of all the leaders who had charge of Mexico City, Gen. Alvaro Obregon distinguished himself as the worst. It is not out of place to remind the committee that Gen. Obregon is now a candidate for President and is actually posing in the United States as being pro-American. Obregon is regarded as the most bitter anti-American chief in the revolution. During the war, when it seemed that Germany was going to be successful, Obregon wrote a book on his record as a military leader, which was designed to serve as a basis for his appeal for the Presidency, and it was taken from the mails by the American authorities on its way to an American city to be printed. Obregon in this book referred to the disdainful manner in which he had treated Paul Fuller and other representatives of the American Government. He stated that on occasions he refused to meet them, and always told them that Mexico was a free and independent country and would not tolerate any intervention on the part of the American Government; that he approved the attitude of his chief, Carranza, in his endeavors to form a union among Latin-American countries to oppose the designs of the Colossus of the North, etc. When Germany was defeated, Obregon modified his book somewhat and eliminated most of the anti-American passages. Obregon is of the opinion, however, that there is no limit to the gullibility of the American people and expects the support of our Government in his aspiration for the Presidency. He and Pablo Gonzalez, the other prominent candidate for the Presidency, are endeavoring now to compel foreign firms in Mexico, those which have not yet been run out of the country by themselves and their associates, to contribute the greater part of the funds necessary for their campaign expenses. Of course, when such solicitations are made, funds must be advanced or reprisals will be visited.

Obregon took charge of Mexico City and committed every outrage that his ingenuity could suggest. There were at that time no trains to the north and only at rare intervals a train to Vera Cruz. The plight of 500,000 inhabitants can easily be imagined. Obregon decided to punish Mexico City for reasons that no civilized man could understand. He threw a cordon of troops around the city and would permit the introduction of only a limited amount of food; vegetables he allowed to enter only at certain hours of the day, he cut off train communications with Toluca, and at times with Puebla; his Yaqui Indians killed peaceful citizens in the suburbs of Mexico City, with the same motives that the Germans had in killing innocent people in Belgium—to terrorize the community; the electric lights were turned off after a certain hour each evening, and water was allowed to enter the city only at certain hours during the day; all the controllers were taken off the street cars and shipped to Vera Cruz with the result that the street car system of Mexico City was paralyzed and residents in suburbs had to walk from 3 to 10 miles. These controllers could not be used at Vera Cruz, and the only purpose in taking them was to punish the people of Mexico City.

Obregon had entered Mexico City flying the black flag of anarchy. He made a compact with the I. W. W. whereby the latter were to join in the fight against Villa and be rewarded by owning the Republic. Obregon made speeches and issued proclamations, all of which will be presented later to the committee, calling upon the rabble of Mexico City to loot the city and telling them that if they did he would do nothing to protect property. It was very difficult for him to get the rabble started, so he sent his troops to lead them in looting a prominent church in the very center of the city, the Church of Santa Brigida, and also the adjoining parochial school. After the soldiers had started the looting the rabble went in and took even the tapestry off the walls and also took out the flooring. Some Americans and Mexicans became so indignant at the sight that they seized clubs and dispersed the mob. When Obregon heard of this he dispatched troops to the church, not to punish the mob for looting but to protect it against those who had interfered with the looting. The soldiers pursued the small group of American and Mexicans to the American Club, where the latter barricaded the doors and protected themselves against Obregon's soldiers until the Brazilian Minister could arrive at the club and persuade the soldiers to desist. Obregon then delivered the church and parochial school to the I. W. W. to be used as their headquarters.

In casting about for a means of looting the city Obregon imposed a tax of 20,000,000 pesos on business men, for the purpose, so he humorously alleged, of alleviating the condition of the poor. When Mexican business men tried to question him about the distribution of this money and suggested that the same be made under the supervision of a committee appointed by themselves, he had over 100 of these men arrested and placed in the penitentiary. When the foreigners, under the leadership of the Americans, refused to pay this tax Obregon compelled them to close their houses of business, which were kept closed for several days, to the great suffering of the Mexican people.

Foreigners subscribed to a fund to be used by themselves in alleviating the condition of the poor, a condition induced by Obregon and his soldiers, and sent agents to Toluca and other places in the neighborhood of Mexico City to purchase large quantities of corn and wheat, which, however, they were not able to bring to Mexico City for the relief of the starving population in which Obregon had taken such an interest, because the revolutionary chiefs demanded the payment of graft before they would permit the use of trains for the transportation of foodstuffs. The international committee wired to Mr. Bryan, asking him to use his influence with his friends, the military chiefs, to permit the passage of foodstuffs, but to no avail.

Mr. KEARFUL. I want to ask you about the international committee. Who composed it?

Mr. BUCKLEY. It was composed of the representatives of 17 nationalities residing in Mexico City, most colonies sending one representative, and several colonies, such as the American, English, French, German, and Spanish, having two representatives on this committee.

Mr. KEARFUL. The representatives being elected by the respective colonies?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. I want to ask you further, were you present, and did you personally observe the occurrences that you have just been describing?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Yes; I was also a member of the international committee, chosen by the American Colony.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please proceed with your statement.

Mr. BUCKLEY. As if Obregon was not satisfied to starve the population of Mexico City, he decided to outrage their religious sentiments, and arrested over 150 priests, marched them through Mexico City, and imprisoned them for a day or two. When the populace started to demonstrate against such outrageous treatment, he had his troops fire into them, killing several people and stopping the public manifestation. Obregon then took these unfortunate priests, put them in box cars and cattle cars and shipped them down to Vera Cruz.

The opinion that the American Government formed of Obregon and Carranza is shown by the note which it had Silliman deliver to Carranza in Vera Cruz at that time and which it transmitted to Obregon through the Brazilian Minister in Mexico City. The note is as follows:

We have been anxious and perplexed over the statements in dispatches from Mexico City regarding the situation there, and have concluded that the best course at present is for you immediately to see Gen. Carranza and present to him a most earnest and emphatic note in the following sense:

The Government of the United States has noted with increasing concern the reports of Gen. Obregon's utterances to the residents of Mexico City. The Government believes they tend to incite the populace to commit outrages in which innocent foreigners within Mexican territory, particularly in the City of Mexico, may be involved. This Government is particularly impressed with Gen. Obregon's suggestions that he would refuse to protect not only Mexicans but foreigners in case of violence, and that his present manifesto is a forerunner of others more disastrous in effect. In this condition of affairs the Government of the United States is informed that the City of Mexico may soon be evacuated by the Constitutionalist forces, leaving the populace without protection against whatever faction may choose to occupy it, thus shirking the responsibility which may happen as a result of the instigation to lawlessness before and after the evacuation of the city.

The Government of the United States is led to believe that a deplorable situation has been willfully brought about by Constitutionalist leaders and forces upon a populace submissive to their incredible demands, and to punish the city on account of refusal to comply with them. When a factional leader preys upon a starving city to compel obedience to his decrees by inciting out-lawry, and at the same time uses means to prevent the city from being supplied with food, a situation is created which it is impossible for the United States to contemplate longer with patience. Conditions have become intolerable and can no longer be endured.

The Government of the United States therefore desires Gen. Obregon and Gen. Carranza to know that it has, after mature consideration, determined that if, as a result of the situation for which they are responsible, Americans will suffer by reason of the conduct of the Constitutionalist forces in the City of Mexico, or because they fail to provide means of protection to life and property, will hold Gen. Obregon and Gen. Carranza personally responsible therefor. Having reached this determination with the greatest consideration, the Government of the United States will take such measures as are expedient to bring to account those who are personally responsible for what may occur.

The reply of Carranza is of academic interest in that it has some typical examples of bombastic misrepresentation and falsehood, in which Carranza has so cynically engaged in his correspondence with the American Government. I will quote only a few excerpts from this reply:

Although the terms in which this note is worded would afford me cause for not answering it, it is my wish, notwithstanding, that my silence be not construed as a justification of the charges contained in the same. I have tried to put aside for the moment references which are made to my personal responsibility and, looking only for the good of my country and for the benefit of the cause which the Mexican people has entrusted to me, I thought it my duty to answer it at once.

Reserving the privilege of answering more fully and in detail through the customary diplomatic channels the note referred to lately, I take this opportunity to state, in an earnest and emphatic way, that Gen. Obregon has never intended to incite the hungry populace of the City of Mexico to commit outrages of any character. He has not prevented in any way the entrance of food supplies in Mexico City, but on the contrary he has facilitated such importation. He has not created willfully the distressing conditions which prevail at present in the City of Mexico, but he has done everything in his power to alleviate them. Such situation is the consequence, painful but unavoidable, of the state of war in which we are and which for the first time has really reached the City of Mexico, but it has been aggravated by the conduct of the merchants, who openly, defiantly, and with concert of action closed their commercial establishments in the moments of greatest public distress as a protest against the humanitarian relief tax that Gen. Obregon imposed.

In the face of the charges expressed by the international committee in their complaint to the State Department, I point you to the fact that Gen. Obregon has been in possession of the City of Mexico since the 28th of January until today, without mobs, assassinations, lootings, or any other of the outrages which are apt to occur and which frequently do in times of war. During all this time large amounts of food supplies have been taken into Mexico City, and large quantities of supplies have been distributed among the distressed people, and, besides, other important measures have been taken looking to further relief, which I will mention in detail at the proper time.

It was only three days ago that the State Department at Washington directed the attention of the American residents in the City of Mexico to your former advice that they should retire from the country until the condition should be settled. It is my most earnest wish that the other foreign residents will follow a line of conduct similar to the one suggested by you to the American residents, for the adoption of such a course would be the wisest measure that can be taken to avoid the consequences so much feared.

Obregon was in Mexico City in February and a part of March, 1915. The above reply of the Carranza Government to the American Government is dated March 9, 1915. In view of Carranza's assurances contained in the above note to the effect that the people in Mexico City had not suffered from lack of food, and that everything was being done to feed these people, it is interesting to refer to a report made by representatives of the American Red Cross just three months later, on June 7, in which they quote Carranza as stating that—

The latest military successes have palpably made certain the triumph of our cause. For this reason I have decided to permit the free exportation of food to the City of Mexico.

The report of the Red Cross representatives in Vera Cruz is as follows:

First Chief Carranza gave out the other day that he would "permit food supplies to go to Mexico City" in view of the "great victories gained recently by the Constitutionalist Army."

This was a virtual confession that the first chief had not been permitting food to reach Mexico City theretofore, but would do so now in a spirit of magnanimity, because some success had come to his armies. The leading editorial in El Democrata, a Constitutionalist organ of Vera Cruz, lavishly praised First Chief Carranza for his "great heart" in showing the "magnanimity of a conqueror," and permitting the exportation of food to the starving people of the most important city of Mexico.

The editorial called attention to the alleged fact that the people of the City of Mexico were all enemies of the Constitutionalist cause, because they were happy when Gen. Alvaro Obregon (who did his best to starve them) withdrew with his forces, but said that the noble-hearted first chief, in spite of this enmity to his cause, would let the people have food if anyone cared to send it to them. It must be understood that the Constitutionalist were not bothering themselves to relieve the distress by sending any food to the starving women and children, but that they would no longer put obstacles in the way of anyone else sending it.

First Chief Carranza, the man who declared that he is fighting for the liberty of the people, who is always on the side of the poor and the oppressed, sent his permission to his confidential agent in Washington, apparently to give to the State Department, or to the Red Cross Society. The exact wording of the message from the first chief was as follows:

"The latest military successes have palpably made certain the triumph of our cause. For this reason I have decided to permit the free exportation of food to the City of Mexico."

While the Mexican people were starving the Carranza officials were looting the country and exporting hides, corn and beans, as well as furniture and everything else of value. That the American Government was cognizant of this, and of the bad impression that the attitude of the Carranza authorities would produce on the outside world, is shown by the note transmitted by the State Department to Mr. Silliman on June 18, 1915, from which I quote the following:

In your conversation with Gen. Carranza mention that while the Buford was unloading 60,000 pounds of corn and beans consigned to the consulate for charitable distribution to relieve famine conditions, and while meat, corn, and other provisions were becoming scarce in Vera Cruz, the Ward Line steamer Mexico loaded roughly 100,000 pounds of beans for export to New York. Such events, presumably with the sanction of the Carranza government, have had wide circulation in the United States as well as similar acts by Federal authorities in the north, and are producing an extremely bad impression as to the motives of leaders who allow such practices, when it is well known that the food supply of Mexico is at the famine point, and that the President of the United States has been in the necessity of appealing to the American people for assistance to satisfy the starving in Mexico.

On July 23, 1915, the American Government sent another note to the Carranza government, through Mr. Silliman, in which it is shown that the American Government was fully informed of conditions in Mexico, the note also being important because it admits the responsibility of the United States to the rest of the world for conditions in Mexico. There have been charges that Mr. Bryan, while Secretary of State, made definite assurances to European Governments to the effect that if they would permit the American Government to handle the Mexican situation in its own way this Government would be responsible to the European Governments for all damages their nationals might suffer. It is said that for this reason European Governments have not been so vitally concerned with the Mexican situation, because of their faith in their ability to collect the damages from the American Government. Among other things, this note contains the following statement:

This Government feels that the critical time has come when the choice which is now made by the constitutionalist leaders will practically determine the success or failure of the Government they mean to set up and the reforms that they hope to effect. We venture to say this because of our earnest sympathy with the main purposes of the constitutionalists and our desire to be of permanent service to them in bringing Mexico out of her troubles. We have been forced by circumstances into a position in which we must practically speak for the rest of the world. It is evident that the United States is the only first-class power that can be expected to take the initiative in recognizing the new government. It will in effect act as the representative of the other powers of the world in this matter, and will unquestionably be held responsible by them for the consequences.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you proceed now to relate the incidents leading up to the recognition of Carranza by this Government as head of the de facto government of Mexico, including the proceedings of what is known as the Pan American Conference?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Conditions in Mexico had become so intolerable that even the American Government had to take official notice of them. The patience of this Government seemed to be exhausted with the continuation of anarchy in Mexico and with the contemptuous treatment it had received from the revolutionary chiefs it had placed in power.

On the 2d day of June, 1915, Mr. Wilson issued his famous appeal, in which he called upon the chiefs of the three factions to adjust their differences, with the threat of supporting those who agreed to compromise, or, possibly, of intervening.

Villa and Zapata immediately agreed to arbitrate their differences, but Carranza defied the American Government, whereupon the American Government recognized Carranza.

When Carranza refused to submit his differences to arbitration and insisted that Mexico was a free and sovereign Republic and that he would not permit foreign dictation, Mr. Wilson pursued his customary policy of appealing directly to Carranza's subordinates and sent messages to all of them. These subordinates referred him back to Carranza.

The American Government was apparently greatly incensed at the action of Carranza, and gave every indication that it had finished with him and would withdraw its support, for it ceased its policy of prohibiting the news with regard to Mexico from reaching the American newspapers, and for a period of several months the American press contained long and authoritative accounts of outrages in Mexico, showing the inability of the Carranza government to establish peace, and the incapacity and corruption of the leaders. This was continued until Carranza was recognized, whereupon the American Government immediately shut down on the truth being given out to the newspapers. An interesting incident in this respect occurred in connection with the Red Cross Society. The Red Cross had solicited funds for use in Mexico, and was distributing food among the starving people, when Carranza decided that his Latin pride would not permit him to allow this to continue—his Latin pride did not seem to interfere with his permitting his officials to loot the Republic. The Red Cross office in Washington had been giving out the reports of conditions in Mexico to the American press, and continued to do so after the recognition of Carranza, notwithstanding the fact that the executive branch of the Government had decided that the truth about conditions should no longer be given to the American people. Mr. Tumulty soon phoned the director of the Red Cross and reprimanded her for this conduct and told her to stop it.

The Pan-American conference is interesting now, principally because it indicates the shifty attitude of the American Government with regard to Mexico and the absence of a policy of any kind.

Preparations were being made for the election, and the Democratic National Committee insisted that something be done about Mexico, that it be not permitted to continue in a state of anarchy until the presidential election of 1916. With the idea of placing the responsibility on Latin-America, the ministers in Washington of Argentine, Brazil, Chile, Bolivia, Uruguay, and Guatemala, were called into this conference.

The American Government then went through the form, at the first meeting of the conference in New York, of giving to the bright Latin Americans the benefit of the American Government's superior knowledge of conditions in Mexico. As I have stated before, the Latin Americans were, of course, entirely conversant with conditions in Mexico, some of whom had lived there, and for the very obvious reasons that have already been explained, did not sympathize with the attitude of the American Government in supporting bandits in Mexico and thus establishing a precedent for later promoting revolutions in their own countries and overthrowing the very governments which they represented. After a hundred years of experience, all of South and Central America is ruled by the class that ruled in Mexico in the time of Diaz—the so-called "Cientificos." One can imagine the sympathy that these gentlemen had with the attitude of the American Government in overthrowing in Mexico the very type of government that they represented in South and Central America.

At the time the American Government called the Pan American conference it had the intention of backing Francisco Villa, and shaped its plans accordingly. With the idea of giving to the Latin American diplomats the benefit of the superior knowledge of the American Government of conditions in Mexico, it decided to send to the first session of the Pan American Conference one of the many personal representatives of the President. The last personal representative of the President to visit Mexico was Duval West, of San Antonio, Tex., who had only recently returned from Mexico, and who had traveled all over the country and had met all the revolutionary leaders, and it was but logical that the American Government should have given to their Latin American associates the benefit of their latest advices and have sent Mr. West to report to those gentlemen. There was, however, a great obstacle to having Mr. West do this, because this gentleman had returned and told the truth about conditions in Mexico and reported that all the factions were composed of bandits. The American Government, therefore, instead of sending West to the conference, selected Mr. Paul Fuller, of New York, who had been to Mexico a year before as a special representative and who had come back, as was usual with most personal representatives, a confirmed adherent of one of the factions—in this case the Villa faction.

Mr. Fuller appeared before this conference and astounded the Latin Americans by explaining to them that Villa was a splendid leader with high ideals; he told them that Villa had a well-disciplined army of thousands of men, although everyone of the Latin-American delegates knew that Villa had been driven to the very frontier of the United States and had taken refuge in Juarez. Mr. Fuller proved that Villa was a leader of high ideals by producing the Villa revolutionary program, which he himself had translated. There could, of course, be no more conclusive proof than this!

The Pan American conference was then adjourned for a few days for the ostensible purpose of enabling the Latin Americans to fully digest Mr. Fuller's report; as a matter of fact, the conference was adjourned for the purpose of giving the American Government time to complete arrangements to back Villa. Villa had just a few days before, not fully realizing apparently that the American Government was contemplating recognizing him, gathered together the merchants in Chihuahua and robbed them. Gen. Scott, Chief of Staff of the American Army, was rushed to El Paso for a conference with Villa. I do not know what happened at the conference, although we have Villa's version for a part of it, but the fact remains that immediately after the conference Villa rushed back to Chihuahua, returned the loot to the merchants and, to show his indignation, had several of his followers executed, presumably for having robbed the merchants under his orders. This produced a fine impression upon the uninitiated.

The Latin-American delegates to the Pan American conference were, of course, not among the uninitiated. All these shrewd gentlemen knew just exactly what the American Government was doing and followed all of its steps and the steps of its devious confidential agents with great interest.

In this connection it is interesting to note that for reasons that it is difficult to understand the American Government had always been extremely fond of Villa, and he was decidedly their pet. Gen.

Scott found great pleasure in having his picture taken with Villa; he seemed to be flattered by the association. When the committee of Tampico oilmen conferred with the President shortly after the taking of Vera Cruz, the President was gracious enough to tell them something about conditions in Mexico and assured them that "Villa is the safest man in Mexico to tie to."

During the progress of the Niagara conference, Mr. Bryan asked me, upon my suggesting that Villa would undoubtedly revolt against Carranza, where I had received my information, to which I replied that I had received it from a perusal of Mexican history, which shows no instance of a Mexican chief winning a revolution and handing the fruits over to a civilian. Mr. Bryan smiled with the assurance of a man who possesses inside information and told me that he knew that Villa was loyal to Carranza because Villa himself had assured him of the fact. This, of course, was final. Mr. Bryan also stated that Villa was an idealist and that reports to the contrary were all manufactured by the Cientificos and Wall Street. He said that, of course, Villa had committed some outrages, but those had occurred early in his career; that the American Government, realizing his possibilities, had sent Gen. Scott to confer with him, who advised him that under the rules of civilized warfare it was not considered proper to kill prisoners, and when he showed Villa a book containing the rules of warfare Villa evinced such an interest in this discovery that he asked Scott for the book. Villa did not know before, apparently, that it was wrong to commit murder; since that moment he had become a changed man. A few years later the American Government apparently discovered that Villa had reverted to his original occupation of being a bandit.

An attorney from Washington appeared in New York a few days after the first session of the Pan American conference and asked for a meeting with two Mexican gentlemen who had been driven out of Mexico and who belonged to that class which the American Government insisted had been exploiting the Mexican people for years. The attorney in question represented himself to be on a mission from Mr. Lansing. The Mexicans wished to satisfy themselves that this was the case and asked me to investigate the matter, as I was in New York at the time. I telephoned a man in Washington and asked him to call on an official of the State Department and ascertain whether the gentleman in question was really representing Mr. Lansing, to which he replied that he was. The conference then took place and this representative proposed to the so-called Cientificos that they combine with Villa and receive the backing of the American Government, which they indignantly refused to do on the ground that they would not associate with bandits.

A few days later Mr. McCombs, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, called on the same two gentlemen and suggested the possibility of their party receiving the backing of the American Government in view of the fact that Carranza refused to participate in the conference and that Villa and Zapata were too weak to justify the backing of the American Government. Mr. McCombs stated that he would have to return to Washington for a consultation with regard to details, and a few days later he and another member of the Democratic National Committee, whose name I do not care to mention, and Senator J. Hamilton Lewis, returned to New York to confer with the two Mexican leaders. They stated that they were authorized by the President of the United States to conclude a deal. The Mexicans at this conference suggested that this was a very grave matter and since they did not have a perfect command of English and had little experience in dealing with Americans, and that I represent them in the negotiations. Whereupon the three Americans named one of their own number as their representative.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you desire the committee to understand that the three men who appeared in New York assumed to represent the President of the United States in these negotiations?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Yes. I do not know whether they really represented the President, but I do know that they stated that they represented the President. On carrying on negotiations for a day or two the representative and I failed to reach a definite agreement.

The Latin-American diplomats, for reasons that I have already mentioned, were almost without exception opposed to the recognition of Carranza. After finding that it would be impossible to make a satisfactory arrangement with other factions, the American Government decided to recognize Carranza and called the final meeting of the conference.

When the Latin-American representatives went to the final meeting they went there knowing that they would be called upon to recognize Carranza and also went there with the feeling which had been derived from reports that had been very assiduously circulated, that if they did not recognize Carranza the alternative would be armed intervention by the United States. While the Latin Americans did not want Carranza, they, of course, did not want armed intervention, especially armed intervention coming as a result of a Latin American Conference. When the representatives of the American Government proposed the recognition of Carranza they reluctantly consented.

The Latin-American representatives in this case showed the weakness that men of their race usually show in a crisis. There is every reason to believe that the American Government did not intend to intervene at that time. As a matter of fact, by agreeing to the recognition of Carranza the Latin-American delegates agreed to a policy that led inevitably to intervention; they agreed, against their own judgment, to recognize as President of Mexico a man who was doomed to failure, and the result of the failure promised to be armed intervention. Whatever the Mexican people may hold against the American Government as being responsible for their plight and their suffering—and there is no doubt that the American Government is largely responsible—the Latin-American countries represented in this conference shared the responsibility, and history will convict them of failing at a critical stage in the development of Latin-American relations in courage to take the resolution prompted by their best judgment. If the Latin-American representatives had declined to recognize Carranza, the American Government would not have dared to do so, especially after having convoked the Latin-American conference.

True to the policy of the American Government with regard to Mexico, inspired dispatches from Washington appeared in the press the next morning to the effect that Latin America had achieved a great diplomatic triumph and had forced the United States to recognize Carranza. This false report was, of course, given out for the purpose of laying a predicate for placing the responsibility on Latin America in the event that Carranza should fail.

Mr. KEARFUL. I think the next epoch in the progress of events is that which culminated in what is known as the conference of the American-Mexican commission, and leading up to that the committee would like to have you touch upon the incidents of the Columbus raid, the Pershing expedition, and the proceedings and result of the conference of the American-Mexican commission.

Mr. BUCKLEY. I do not recall the details of the Columbus raid, except that it was a raid by Villa troops on an American town, in which several Americans lost their lives. I do know the version of Villa's followers as to the cause of this raid, which might be interesting to the committee.

Those followers have always claimed that, when Gen. Scott, the friend of Villa, met him the last time at El Paso he solemnly promised, in his capacity as representative of the American Government, that this Government would never recognize Carranza. Villa reported this to his agency in New York at the time of the Pan-American conference. His followers claim that Villa raided Columbus in revenge for this alleged deception by the American Government.

I do not recall the details of the Pershing expedition, except that it accomplished nothing. In order to consider the differences that existed between the two Governments and to determine the bases on which the expedition would be withdrawn, the American-Mexican Commission met, composed of Luis Cabrera and Alberto Pani, representing Mexico, Mr. Franklin K. Lane, Mr. John Mott, and Judge George Gray, of Delaware, representing the United States.

The net result of this conference was that, after negotiating for weeks, an agreement was entered into which was summarily set aside by Carranza. The conference is remembered by Americans in Mexico because of the impression given out that Mr. Lane and his associates from that time on would handle the Mexican situation; that the President had turned it entirely over to them. I know that Mr. Lane at least took this view very seriously. After the conference had broken up Mr. Lane issued a strong statement to the press, in which he showed plainly that he considered that the final decision in Mexican matters had been turned over to himself and his associates. Mr. Lane plainly stated that the Pershing expedition would not be withdrawn until Carranza came to his terms; that the American people were a pacific people, but, thank God, were not pacifists. A few days after this brave declaration of American policy was issued by Mr. Franklin K. Lane, Mr. Wilson, summarily and apparently without even consulting Mr. Lane, withdrew the troops from Mexico.

This conflict, like all other conflicts between the American Government and Carranza, resulted in a victory for the latter.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have several times referred to a large number of personal representatives of President Wilson who at various times operated in Mexico. Are you prepared to make a statement in general respecting those representatives and also with respect to the several representatives in particular?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Yes. Having discarded the methods usually employed in international matters, the President sent a swarm of personal representatives into Mexico, and the State Department, imitating this policy, also sent a number of special representatives. At times several representatives would be dealing with the same faction, all claiming to represent the real views of the State Department. Often the representatives of Carranza would also be selected to represent the American Government in its dealings with Carranza.

Representatives were sent to each faction—the Villa faction, the Zapata faction, and the Carranza faction—and they became itinerant diplomats, traveling through the country with the chiefs of the various factions. These gentlemen, almost without exception, became ardent admirers and advocates of the cause of the particular faction to which they were accredited, and instead of representing the American Government and people they represented the factions in question to the American Government. Their one concern was for the advancement of the particular group in question, and they seemed never to be concerned with the prestige of the American people and the welfare of Americans in Mexico. They never hesitated to advise Americans who appealed to them for help that under the new order of things they were not entitled to any help, that they had no business in Mexico, had been ordered to leave repeatedly, and that their presence in Mexico merely served to hinder the Mexican revolutionaries in carrying out their program for the betterment of the Mexican peon and the establishment of a democratic government.

The majority of these gentlemen became the paid representatives of different factions on their return to the United States, and detailed evidence will be presented to the committee of the financial connections of a number of them with the different factions, if desired. The majority of these special representatives seem to have had strong business inclinations.

The most distinguished of these representatives undoubtedly was Mr. John Lind, who has already been referred to as having been selected because of his ignorance of Mexican affairs. Mr. Lind still gives evidence of being as ignorant of Mexican affairs as he was on the day of his appointment. During the Niagara conference I had a talk with Mr. Lind and found that this gentleman divided Mexico into two classes, the Mexican from the north and the Mexican from the south; just where the dividing fell he did not specify. The Mexican from the north, he said, had been influenced by American ideas and ideals, had become democratic in his instincts and aspirations, was courageous, honest and trustworthy, and American; the Mexican from the south, on the contrary, was still affected by what Mr. Lind was pleased to term European traditions; he was backward, revengeful, monarchical in his tastes, and was altogether bad. This revolution, so Mr. Lind stated, was really a civil war between the north and the south, in which we, the American people, must see to it that the north won out.

Mr. Lind was obsessed with three ideas: A most sensitive regard for his own dignity as representative of the President of the United States; the theory just stated that people from the northern part of Mexico were superior to those from the southern part; and an intense hatred of the Catholic Church. His hatred for Huerta became a personal feeling; it was impossible for him to mention Huerta's name without indulging in profanity. Huerta had outwitted and humiliated him, and Lind could not forget it. He had gone to Mexico on a most ridiculous mission, a demand for the abdication of the President of a supposedly sovereign Republic, a mission which no man with any experience in world affairs would ever have undertaken, and had consequently become the laughingstock of both Mexicans and Americans. Lind seemed to blame Huerta for this situation, instead of blaming himself or his chief. I stated before that in his humiliation he was quite willing that the Army and Navy of the United States be used to avenge him. He has been opposed to armed intervention ever since, when it has been suggested that the Army and the Navy of the United States be used to protect American citizens in Mexico.

Mr. Lind is typical of that provincial American, who, in need of civilization himself, wants to civilize the rest of the world. He believed in forcing American ideas on Mexicans whether they wanted them or not and for some reason, incomprehensible to the American in Mexico, selected Carranza as his instrument.

In private conversation Mr. Lind attributed all the ills of Mexico to the influence of the Catholic Church, and argued that this institution in Mexico must be destroyed. In a conversation with Mr. O'Shaughnessy, on a remark of the latter that he had just received a report to the effect that several Catholic priests had been killed, Mr. Lind stated that this was good news, that the more Catholic priests they killed in Mexico the better it would suit him, and the more pleased the President would be. In Washington, in a conversation that took place during the Pan-American conference, when it was reported that the United States would not recognize Carranza, Mr. Lind exclaimed to the chairman of the International committee of Mexico City, "My God, poor Mexico will fall back into the clutches of the Catholic Church!"

Mr. Lind has been an active propagandist for the Carrancistas since his return from Mexico. I will be glad to give the committee further details if it desires.

The Rev. John R. Silliman, after years of faithful effort in Mexico, became a missionary and dairyman in Saltillo. He had sold milk to Carranza, the governor of the State, and the relation of dairyman and governor persisted throughout the time that Silliman represented the President before Carranza. Just what qualified Mr. Silliman to represent the President in Mexico has been a mystery to Americans who knew Silliman.

He was always a pathetic figure. His very walk was apologetic. While engaged in social intercourse he seemed to fear that Carranza would appear on the scene and rebuke him. When Americans appealed to him for protection and redress he would explain to them that while he sympathized with them he could not mention such matters to Carranza because Carranza would send an adverse report to the President about him and he might lose his job.

Even Mr. David Lawrence, another personal representative of the President, who has since been a very active propagandist for the Carrancistas, was shocked at Silliman's ineptitude. In a report to the State Department, sent in 1915 from Vera Cruz, Mr. Lawrence stated that:

The situation here with respect to representation of the United States Government is indescribably aggravating. Our influence is virtually zero. We do not even get our protests or messages before Carranza. Silliman privately told me the situation seemed hopeless. * * * Carranza told me in conversation that Canada was an enemy of his cause, sending bad reports to the Department of State, and that Silliman was all right. Investigation among authoritative and well-informed persons shows Canada has told the truth. Carranza has not granted audience to Silliman in nearly three weeks. Yesterday when Silliman had appointment with Carranza, latter instead went parading with his troops, leaving word that foreign secretary was authorized to take up anything Silliman had. Foreign secretary [Aguilar] is inexperienced boy. Even your most urgent representations are handled in this indirect and fruitless way.

Carranza has taken advantage of his old friendship with Silliman to turn him down repeatedly, and Silliman is not the forceful kind of personality who would insist on an audience in the name of his Government. * * * Silliman has worked faithfully and loyally, but tells me privately he is discouraged and believes our recent strong notes and Latin-American appeals have caused strained relations. * * * He told me the point had been reached where threats of force and strong notes only aggravate Carranza, and that he is not afraid of us, because he is confident we do not dare to intervene. In this connection I offer the following plan for your consideration. First, that new representative be sent here, fully conversant with Government point of view, so that Carranza will understand that this representative is fully supported by the Government at every stage. * * * Irrespective of what our future policy is to be, the situation here would seem to demand that some one be selected who will talk earnestly, forcefully, and insistently to Carranza, and who will not hesitate to inform Carranza whenever occasion arises that his refusal to receive the representative of the United States bearing urgent communications would be considered indication of a desire not to remain on friendly terms with the United States. Canada has gotten results by this method and is respected by Carranza, but is not persona grata now.

Incidentally, you will note in the above telegram, especially where Mr. Lawrence states that Mr. Canada had reported the truth about Carranza to the State Department, that Mr. Lawrence's impression of Carranza was not so very favorable. A few days later, following a banquet to Carranza that he attended, this gentleman had a change of heart, which change has persisted to the present day.

Silliman became so subservient to Carranza that he referred to the Carranza cause as "our cause" and to the Carrancistas as "we."

A ludicrous situation was brought about in a conversation that Silliman had with Mr. Cornelio Gertz, the German consul in Vera Cruz, which was covered in a dispatch to the New York Herald in the fall of 1915, which is in part as follows:

According to passengers arriving here [Galveston], all Vera Cruz is grinning over the story of a recent interview between Mr. Gertz, the German consul, and John R. Silliman, representative of the American State Department near First Chief Carranza. The story was told by Mr. Gertz himself as a good joke on Mr. Silliman, but there are a good many Americans in Vera Cruz who see more cause for sadness than laughter in Mr. Silliman's alleged partiality to the pronoun "we" under such conditions.

The story, as told by Mr. Gertz, is that he called upon Mr. Silliman the other day and asked whether there was any news and whether there was any change in the situation.

"Oh, things are looking very much brighter," said Mr. Silliman; "conditions are improving rapidly. We have taken Leon, we have defeated Villa, and we will soon occupy the City of Mexico."

Mr. Gertz bounced out of his chair, stared hard at Mr. Silliman in utter amazement, and exclaimed explosively:

"Why, Mr. Silliman, why didn't you tell me that before? I had no idea of such things happening. You should have told me about it so that I could send it to my Government."

Mr. Gertz, of course, thought that in using the pronoun "we" Mr. Silliman was referring to the Americans, instead of which he was referring to the Carrancistas.

The Rev. William Bayard Hale and the Rev. Henry Allen Tupper, two more special representatives of the President, may be referred to briefly. Later, if the committee desires, further information will be furnished. It appears that when the former returned to the States Germany outbid Carranza in securing his services; and, so far as the latter is concerned, it has already been proved in the testimony of Mr. Doheny that he received a check for over $4,000 from the Carranza authorities. We shall present some interesting evidence at a future time, but it will suffice now to say that the Rev. Henry Allen Tupper offered to mention a prominent Mexican favorably in a magazine article for a consideration of $1,000 when exchange was 5 to 1. Dr. Tupper developed great business capacity while in Mexico.

Mr. Paul Fuller was an ardent Villista after his return to the United States.

Mr. Carothers, an American of little prominence in Mexico, was appointed by the President as personal representative to Villa, and has since then been an ardent Villista.

Mr. H. L. Hall was another discredited American living in Mexico and was appointed a special representative to Zapata. He is now and has been for several years a Zapatista propagandist.

Mr. Duval West, of San Antonio, Tex., came back and reported the truth about conditions in Mexico and his services were soon dispensed with by the American Government.

The policy of using the paid representatives of the Carranza revolutionary junta to represent the American Government also aroused the indignation of Americans in Mexico. Unscrupulous Americans who were betraying the interests of their own people for money were being daily consulted and employed by the American Government.

Judge Charles A. Douglas, the representative in Washington of the Carranza Government, told me some time ago that during his stay in Vera Cruz during the time that Carranza had his revolutionary Government there Silliman always showed him Mr. Bryan's notes before taking them to Carranza; that on one occasion he actually saved the United States from a foreign war; that Mr. Bryan had sent a note to Silliman for delivery to Carranza which, because of Mr. Bryan's ignorance of Mexican sensibilities, would have immediately provoked war and that when Mr. Silliman, in the regular course of his duties apparently, showed this note to Douglas the latter told him immediately not to present it until after he, Douglas, had consulted with Bryan. Judge Douglas stated that after he had explained matters to Mr. Bryan the latter instructed Silliman not to present the note and that later Mr. Bryan personally thanked him for his thoughtful interposition. Mr. Bryan's great confidence in Judge Douglas is exemplified in an official letter of introduction which he gave Judge Douglas to the American consul at Vera Cruz, Mr. William A. Canada, on February 16, 1916, a photograph of which letter I am leaving with the committee, and a copy of which is as follows:

MY DEAR MR. CANADA: This will introduce to you Judge Charles A. Douglass, of this city, the local attorney for the Carranza representative in this city. He is visiting Gen. Carranza and I am glad to make you acquainted with him. If, while he is there, we have any matters to take up with Gen. Carranza he will be willing, as he is anxious, to assist in smoothing out difficulties. I commend him to your confidence and courtesy.

After the Brazilian minister, who had been placed in charge of American affairs on the departure of Mr. O'Shaughnessy, was practically expelled from Mexico by the Carrancistas, the lives of the Americans in Mexico—two or three thousand—and the billion dollars of American property, were left in charge of first one clerk and then another for a period of over a year, at the most crucial time in the relations of the two Governments and when American lives and property were most in need of protection. These clerks were young men, all from 22 to 30 years of age, who were not trained diplomats, had no experience in diplomatic affairs and had not the slightest conception of the meaning of international law. These inexperienced clerks were called upon to measure their wits with brilliant radicals like Luis Cabrera. It is no wonder that the Mexican revolutionaries put through their scheme for the confiscation of American property and the elimination of American citizens from Mexico, when during the course of the constitutional convention lasting for several months, in which these anti-American provisions were being discussed, the interests of the United States were so represented. The American Ambassador, Mr. Fletcher, was held in Washington for over a year at this critical period, and was finally hurried to Mexico with a protest against the passage of the constitution, with the result that the convention hurried up its final vote on the instrument and adopted it within a few days after Mr. Fletcher's arrival.

MR. KEARFUL. You have heretofore made a statement with reference to Carranza's revolutionary program. What have you to say with reference to the fulfillment of that program?

MR. BUCKLEY. Everybody knows, of course, that the Carranza Government is a military depotism. It would be a waste of your time to submit the proofs of this. I will merely refer to a few incidents.

In the first place, in the proclamation issued by Carranza ordering elections for Congress and President in 1916, he excluded from the right to vote all citizens who were not revolutionaries.

Section 4 of article 8 of the call provided that those could vote "who were citizens or residents of the respective State at the time of the uprising of Huerta against Madero, provided that they later demonstrated, with positive acts, their adhesion to the constitutional cause"—that is, by taking up arms.

State elections have been a farce, and invariably Carranza has placed in power his own choice for governor.

In the State of Tamaulipas Gen. Luis Caballero was overwhelmingly elected over Gen. Lopez de Lara, the choice of Carranza, whereupon Carranza declared the elections void with the result that Caballero rebelled and was driven out of the State and Carranza appointed a military governor.

In Tabasco the elections were held four or five months ago, the opposing candidates being Gen. Green and Gen. Luis F. Dominguez.

Green is said to have had the support of the former governor, Gen. Carlos A. Vidal. Assassinations, riots, and political persecutions resulted from the election. The State had, and probably has now, two governors and two legislatures. Gen. Bertani, chief of the Federal forces of the State, was compelled to disarm troops thought to favor one or the other of the contending parties.

In San Luis Potosi elections for governor were held on July 6 of this year. The opposing parties were Rafael Nieto, former subsecretary of the treasury under Carranza, and Ingeniero Severino Martinez. The campaign was bitter and full of clashes between the partisans. Gen. Juan Barragan, chief of staff of Carranza and acting governor of the State, supported Martinez. Wholesale frauds at the polls were charged by both sides. Federal troops are alleged to have taken charge of the polls in some parts of the State. Nieto declared that his life was in danger and went from place to place accompanied by an armed escort. The Martinez legislature declared Martinez to be elected governor, and the Nieto legislature declared Nieto to be elected governor. For a time there were two legislatures, but the Nieto legislature was arrested and that gave Martinez a clear field. Nieto, however, still claims to be governor.

In Nuevo Leon State elections were held last June. Juan Manuel Garcia, a progressive civilian, was elected. He received many times the number of votes of his nearest opponent. The candidates opposing Garcia were Gen. Mariano Gonzalez, Gen. José Santos, and Gen. Pablo A. de la Garza. Gen. Barragan, the same chief of staff of the President, proceeded to Monterrey with troops and had Gen. Santos declared elected.

In Nayarit in the early summer the State legislature, with the assistance of the military commander of the State, ousted the governor. The Federal Senate, in a resolution passed October 23, 1919, attempted to reinstate the governor, José S. Godivez. Now the State legislature declares that it does not intend to recognize this decision of the Senate.

In many cases opponents have been executed after the writ of amparo, a measure corresponding to our writ of habeas corpus, had been ignored by the military authorities. It will be recalled that I stated that it was reported that during the administration of Madero, Carranza had appealed to a member of Madero's cabinet, Alberto Garcia Granados, to join him in a revolution, which the latter declined to do. As soon as the Carranza forces reached Mexico City troops were rushed out to search and loot Granados's home. Garcia Granados was a high-class Liberal, who had opposed Diaz for many years and who had been repeatedly imprisoned by the latter but who was never involved in any revolts. Granados was tried by a court-martial, which absolved him; nevertheless the military commander of Mexico City, Gen. Pablo Gonzalez, arbitrarily set aside the verdict of the court-martial and Garcia Granados was executed at once.

In April of this year Gen. Francisco de P. Alvarez was captured by the Carrancistas, tried for treason and condemned to death by the military judge. Alvarez asked for amparo, and the federal judge at Vera Cruz ordered the provisional suspension of execution pending investigation and definite decision by the judge. This would have been sufficient to stay execution under Mexican law, but Alvarez's attorney appealed also to the supreme court at Mexico City, which repeated the orders given by the local judge and communicated the same directly to the council of war, to the local judge, and also to the President of the Republic. Notwithstanding this, Gen. Alvarez was executed. Shortly after an election of supreme court judges was held and the justices, Victoriano Piemental, Manuel Cruz, Santiago Martinez, Agapito Colunga, and Agustin del Valle, who, in the Alvarez case and in many other cases had assumed an independent position, were not reelected. The new court obeys implicitly the orders of Gen. Carranza.

During the first part of October of this year the police found a store of arms and ammunition in Tacuba, a suburb of Mexico City, with the result that an ex-federal general, Leopoldo Diaz Cevallos, was arrested and delivered to Gen. Pablo Gonzalez and taken to a small town near Cuautla in the State of Morelos, where he was executed one night without trial. Within the last few days the judge at Tacuba has decided that Gen. Diaz Cevallos and other supposed accomplices were innocent.

According to "La Prensa," of Antonio, Tex., the federal judge at Juarez decided to suspend the execution of Gen. Angeles. As a matter of Mexican law a federal judge has no discretion in such matters and must always grant a temporary stay of execution when applied for pending examination of the evidence.

The same paper states that the supreme court in Mexico City also ordered suspension of the execution which, however, was delayed and did not reach the military court until after the execution. Fourteen hours intervened between the decision of the court and the execution of Gen. Angeles, more than sufficient time for a telegram to have reached Chihuahua.

In the address that Carranza's minister of justice, Rogue Estrada, made to the judges of the supreme court of the federal district of Mexico on October 5, 1915, he advised them to carry out the revolutionary program and discard all law. Among other things, he said:

The revolution, become government, places in your hands its greatest aspiration, justice, and this justice, such as it undoubtedly should become in these times, is disowning the decisions and annulling the judicial acts of Huerta and the convention. You will say to me the articles are to be found in a concentrated form in a book called the law, but I say to you that we are repudiating everything done up to this time, wherefore there are neither laws nor decrees that dispose that which shall be done.

It is necessary to be filled with a spirit entirely revolutionary in order that the administration of justice may respond to the aspiration of the revolution become government.

I hope from the magistrates composing the Supreme Court of Justice that with good judgment and strict justice they will know how to give their decisions, interpreting clearly the ideals and plans of the revolution become government.

Mr. KEARFUL. What in your opinion has been the effect of our Mexican policy on the people of South and Central America?

Mr. BUCKLEY. The attitude of Latin America toward our Mexican policy has been referred to in the discussion of the Niagara and Pan American conferences. As stated before in this connection, the American Government has disregarded the history of the last 100 years, which shows that up to the present time Latin-American countries may only be ruled successfully by their educated classes, and that the mass of the people are not yet prepared to exercise the attributes of democracy. The American Government has insisted on upsetting the natural status in Mexico, and by so doing, with the implication of similar conduct in other Latin American countries, has alarmed those governments. The following are some of the effects of our Mexican policy in Latin American countries:

First. It constitutes evidence of our intention, so they think, of a reversal of our duties and obligations under international law and indicates our intention of interfering in the local affairs of those countries.

Second. The substitution of Pan Americanism for the Monroe doctrine. It has heretofore been the practice of the American Government to make its decisions alone and unaided with regard to its relations with Latin American countries. Everybody understands, except possibly the Hon. John Barrett, the loquacious director of the Pan-American Union, that there is a community of interest in Latin America opposed to the United States, and that no Latin American diplomat could be relied upon to be impartial in differences arising between the United States and Mexico.

This new departure in policy was forecast in the action of the American Government in entrusting American affairs in Mexico to the Brazilian minister after Mr. O'Shaughnessy was given his passports by the Huerta Government. Although Mr. O'Shaughnessy had left American affairs in charge of the British minister, because of a certain recognized community of interest and ideals between the Americans and the British, the American Government directed that the Brazilian minister take charge of American affairs, thinking, no doubt, that this was an admirable diplomatic stroke. While the Brazilian minister was most solicitous in his regard for the rights of Americans, and all Americans in Mexico remember him with gratitude, nevertheless it was impossible for him to deal with Americans without developing friction, for the very simple reason that there is a fundamental difference in character between the Latin American and the American that can never be reconciled—a difference in their ideas of government which should be recognized and reckoned with in any intelligent policy.

policy of my administration toward Mexico was at every point based upon this principle—that the internal settlement of the affairs of Mexico was none of our business; that we had no right to interfere with or to dictate to Mexico in any particular with regard to her own affairs,” is so cynical in its utter disregard of the facts as to cast discredit on what is said in the rest of the address, nevertheless this address is taken seriously by those who desire to profit by it.

After stating that “Some of us, if I may say so privately, look back with regret upon some of the more ancient relations that we have had with Mexico long before our generation; and America, if I may so express it, would now feel ashamed to take advantage of a neighbor,” the President goes on to say:

Some time ago, as you probably all know, I proposed a sort of Pan American agreement. I had perceived that one of the difficulties of our relationship with Latin America was this. The famous Monroe doctrine was adopted without your consent, without the consent of any of the Central or South American States. If I may express it in terms that we so often use in this country, we said, “We are going to be your big brother, whether you want us to be or not.” We did not ask whether it was agreeable to you that we should be your big brother. We said we were going to be. Now, that was all very well so far as protecting you from aggression from the other side of the water was concerned, but there was nothing in it that protected you from aggression from us; and I have repeatedly seen the uneasy feeling on the part of representatives of the States of Central and South America that our self-appointed protection might be for our own benefit and for our own interest and not for the interest of our neighbors. So, said I, “Very well, let us make an arrangement by which we will give bond. Let us have a common guaranty, that all of us will sign, of political independence and territorial integrity. Let us agree that if any one of us, the United States included, violates the political independence or the territorial integrity of any of the others, all the others will jump on her.” I pointed out to some of the gentlemen who were less inclined to enter into this arrangement than others that that was in effect giving bond on the part of the United States that we would enter into an arrangement by which you would be protected from us.

That Carranza was quick to perceive the point is evident by what he stated in his message to the Mexican Congress on September 1, of this year:

As the question of the acceptance of the Monroe doctrine was taken up at the Paris peace conference, the Government of Mexico found it advisable publicly to declare and officially to inform friendly Governments that Mexico had not and would not recognize that doctrine, because, without the consent of all the peoples of America, it established a criterion and a situation about which they have not been consulted; and therefore that doctrine attacks the sovereignty and independence of Mexico and would establish an enforced tutelage over all the nations of America.

It will be noted that in referring to the “consent of all the peoples of America,” Carranza uses almost identically the same language as President Wilson.

Third. The encouragement of legislation in Latin America against American investments and the adoption of the so-called “Carranza doctrine.” This doctrine, which maintains that a foreigner may not invoke the diplomatic intervention of his own Government, forms the basis of the Carranza foreign policy, and was the basis of his treatment of the foreigner both in executive decrees while he was still a revolutionary chief and in the constitution itself. In the latter instrument it is provided that, before a foreigner may acquire real estate, oil, or mineral rights, he shall specifically renounce the right to appeal to his own Government, and that a mere exercise of this right shall result in the forfeiture of his property to the Mexican Government.

The message to the Mexican Congress just quoted also stated that:

This Government, for its part, has not made nor will it make any effort to enter this international society (league of nations) because it is not based, either in its organization or its functioning, upon the complete equality of all nations and all races, the Mexican Government having proclaimed as a prime principle of its international policy that all nations of the globe should have equal rights and obligations, as well as that no individual within the State may invoke privileged position or protection because of his status as a foreigner or for any other reason.

In other words, the Carranza doctrine maintains that Mexico, or any other Latin American country, may confiscate the property of an American without his right to appeal to his Government; that is, may confiscate with impunity. The very enunciation of such a doctrine is inspired by the intention to confiscate.

Carranza has been very active in his efforts to form a Latin-American union opposed to the United States, and has advocated the same in public addresses and through his diplomatic representatives and many special emissaries in South and Central America. To further his purpose Carranza has gone to the extent of giving aid to the revolutions in Honduras and Guatemala—at a time when his own Government was not fully established—with the object of overthrowing the Governments of these countries, which he regarded as being friendly to the United States, and, consequently, as constituting an obstacle to the carrying out of his policy. He went so far as to equip a military expedition in Mexico and dispatch it to Guatemala for the overthrow of that Government.

His Government has sent broadcast throughout Latin-American countries that portion of the constitution imposing restrictions on foreigners and copies of his proposed laws for carrying into effect the confiscation of American oil properties. The result has been that several Latin-American countries, notably Colombia, have followed Carranza's advice and example, in view of the impunity with which his program has been carried out, and have adopted similar legislation against Americans.

Fourth. Probably the most lasting effect of our relations with Mexico and Latin America is the creation of distrust of the honesty of our Government. The splendid insight into our Mexican policy afforded to Latin Americans in the Niagara and the Pan-American conferences, where the American Government violated its pledged word, deceived its own people, and tried to deceive the Latin-American diplomats, would hardly have a very beneficial effect on our Latin-American relations.

A Latin American publicist has agreed to appear before the committee and give an authoritative statement regarding the attitude of Latin Americans toward the Mexican policy of the American Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. What have you found to be the effect of our Mexican policy on Carranza himself?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Carranza and his followers distrust and hate the American Government and the American people.

The intervention of the American Government in the internal affairs of Mexico started with the dispatch of Lind to Mexico, in August, 1913, and has continued to the present time. The American Government has insisted that that unfortunate country be ruled by bandits; it placed the bandits in power by destroying Huerta, and it has maintained them in power ever since. To do this, it has been compelled to tolerate the expulsion of the educated classes from Mexico; the practical starvation of the Mexican people for the last seven years; an attack on religion; the confiscation of foreign property, and the murder of hundreds of foreigners, mostly Americans. To hide the results of its policy from the American people, it has not scrupled to use all the powers of a strong government.

Our Mexican policy is disapproved of by the educated classes in Mexico; the common people hate and distrust the United States as a tyrant that has forced the Carrancistas on them; Americans and all other foreigners in Mexico have always opposed this policy; Latin American countries oppose it, and there is nothing to indicate that it is approved by any European government. One would think, then, that surely the Carrancistas must be our friends; as a matter of fact, they are the most bitter enemies of the American Government and people.

It would be without purpose to examine the President's addresses and papers, where he has insisted at one time that the American Government was intervening, and at other times, notably, in the Indianapolis speech, when conditions in Mexico were very bad, that the Government was not intervening.

In the interview published in the Saturday Evening Post on May 23, 1914, the President said:

The settlement of the agrarian question by constitutional means—such as that followed in New Zealand, for example—will be insisted on.

The question arises in one's mind, By what authority can the President insist on the solution of this question? The President goes on to say:

Every phase of the Mexican situation is based on the condition that those in de facto control of the Government must be relieved of that control before Mexico can realize her manifest destiny.

Later the President states:

Then came the incident at Tampico. Rear Admiral Mayo, resenting the insult to the flag, issued his demand for an apology, and the President and his Cabinet stepped in behind the admiral.

Really it was the psychological moment, if that phrase is not too trite to be used. There was no great disaster like the sinking of the Maine, and there was an adequate reason for our action in this culminating insult to a series of insults to our country and our flag.

The psychological moment—that is, the excuse, to intervene!

In a communication to Mr. O'Shaughnessy sent by Mr. Bryan on the 13th of November, 1913, after the Lind mission had failed, and when the American Government had ceased quarreling with Huerta, Mr. Bryan instructed Mr. O'Shaughnessy to communicate "the following to Gen. Huerta immediately, as the conditions on which negotiations will be resumed: First, the explicit agreement of Gen. Huerta: (1) That the Congress called for to-morrow shall not assemble; and (2) that Gen. Huerta will absolutely eliminate himself from the situation immediately upon the constitution of an ad interim government acceptable to the United States." What is this if not intervention?

In a report submitted by Mr. O'Shaughnessy to the Department of State in February, 1914, Mr. O'Shaughnessy states that, in a conversation that he had just had with Huerta, the latter—did not criticize the rebels of the north, but said they would never, in the event of their triumph, be able to establish a government in Mexico, and that one of their first acts, if they ever did triumph, would be to turn upon the United States, whom they are now praising.

This was indeed prophetic.

Evidence of the feeling of the Mexican people as to the responsibility of the United States is contained in a dispatch dated Mexico City, June 30, 1915, by the Brazilian minister, at a time when the Zapatistas were in control of Mexico City and this city was being attacked by the Carrancistas. Referring to conditions, the Brazilian minister said:

The prospects for foreigners and noncombatants are therefore dreadful; to begin with, there is no more corn and great scarcity of all other staple articles in town, which has already caused great suffering among all classes and popular disturbances even against this legation, as it was falsely reported that we had plenty of food in deposit. The movement was readily suppressed by the authorities, but I am sorry to be obliged to say that the general animosity against the United States Government is growing very much because everybody blames the United States for the present state of things; first, for having apparently satisfied themselves so far as they are concerned, with a purely negative answer from Carranza, when two of the other factions were disposed to enter into negotiations; and secondly, for not having impressed upon him the absolute necessity of arranging for an armistice in the course of which the United States should have used its good offices for the conclusion of peaceful settlement. This being the case, and following the insistent advice of several friends, American and Mexican, including that of high officers of the commission, and also on account of anonymous letters containing tremendous threats, was obliged to increase our American guard to 8 men; I will increase to 12, as before, if necessary.

To be just, I desire to emphasize the good will of the authorities [Zapatistas] to prevent any disagreeable incidents, but do not know how far they will be able to afford the necessary protection, as I am informed that if the Carrancistas should gain ground toward the occupation of the city, the legations and foreigners, especially Americans, will run great risk from the outrages of the mob and soldiery who, perhaps, will not be controlled during the disorder that will precede the evacuation, as, I repeat, the bad feeling goes to the absurd point of believing that the Carrancistas come this time under the auspices of the United States. I beg pardon if in my desire to be loyal and give you the exact and truthful account of the situation and of the general feeling here, I have shown the unhappy faculty of being too frank and disagreeable.

Carranza began early in his insults to the United States. Shortly after his revolution started, when he had but a small amount of territory at his command, and very precarious hold on power, he refused to discuss matters with the President's personal representative, the Rev. William Bayard Hale, on the ground that Hale must present credentials from the American Government, which he hoped would constitute recognition. After he had been driven out of Mexico City the first time and had taken refuge in the lighthouse in Vera Cruz, in reply to a warning from Secretary Bryan that in the fighting at Naco, Sonora, in which American citizens in Arizona were being killed, the American Government might find it necessary to use force, adding "that the employment of force would not be an aggression, but a defense; that the invasion of the territory of Mexico would not be intended to be an interference with its sovereignty nor an intervention with your strife," Carranza had the effrontery to state:

I hasten to call the attention of the Department of State to the fact that any use whatever of force which the Government of the United States might attempt to make on Mexican territory, although with the object of protecting the lives of Americans, would have to be considered by this Government as an act of hostility and as an attack against the sovereignty of Mexico, independently of the pacific or well-disposed intentions that might cover the employment of force. * * *

I should like to find words sufficiently courteous and friendly and at the same time sufficiently expressive to state to you that the Department of State does not appreciate to the fullest extent the seriousness which the use of force on Mexican territory by Americans would entail, and hence I appeal to the good friendship of the American people toward the Mexican people, earnestly insisting that the Department of State strive that under no circumstances should acts of force be employed against us.

In other words, if the American Government were to protect its own citizens in its own country from death by Carranza bandits he, Carranza, might find himself in the painful necessity of actually making war on this country.

The vacillating policy of the American Government is well exemplified by its policy in placing embargoes on arms and ammunition and then removing them, to the exasperation even of the Carranza Government.

The following data is based on a speech made in the House of Representatives by Congressman Rogers on July 29, 1916:

In the President's address to Congress held August 27, 1913, he says, "For the rest, I deem it my duty to exercise the authority conferred upon me by the law of March 14, 1912, to see to it that neither side to the struggle now going on in Mexico receives any assistance from this side of the border. I shall follow the best practice of nations in the matter of neutrality by forbidding the exportation of arms or munitions of war of any kind from the United States to any part of the Republic of Mexico, a policy suggested by several interesting precedents, and certainly dictated by manifest considerations of practical expediency. We can not in the circumstances be the partisans of either party to the contest that now distracts Mexico, or constitute ourselves the virtual umpire between them."

On February 3, 1914, President Wilson revoked the Taft proclamation of March 14, 1912, in order to enable the rebels to receive munitions of war, and "thereby constituted himself a virtual umpire between the factions."

On April 24, 1914, the President again placed an embargo on the shipment of arms and ammunition to Mexico.

On May 16, 1914, the embargo was raised in so far as to permit shipments by sea. This was for the purpose of shipping arms and ammunition to the rebels, who by that time had possession of the port of Tampico.

On June 4, 1914, Mr. Bryan stated to the newspapers that the mediators had an understanding with the United States that, pending their efforts at Niagara Falls, the United States would permit no arms to be shipped into Mexico either across the border or by water from American ports. We have seen in connection with the Niagara conference how ill the American Government fulfilled this understanding.

On June 2 the steamship Antilla left New York for Tampico containing some 3,000,000 cartridges.

On June 6 another million cartridges were shipped on the steamship Sunshine from Galveston to Tampico.

On June 10 the United States again imposed an absolute embargo by sea and land.

Thereafter, however, the schooners Sunshine, Grampus, and Susan made six trips from Galveston to Tampico, each time carrying heavy shipments of war materials. All were consigned to Habana, but "by stress of weather they were blown into Tampico."

On September 10, 1914, the embargo was lifted.

On October 20, 1915, the embargo was again declared, which, however, was not made applicable to Carranza, who was recognized on October 19.

On March 12, 1916, all permits held along the border for exporting explosive into Mexico were canceled.

Since this time permits for the exportation of arms and ammunition have been given and declined so many times that it makes one dizzy even to go into the matter.

The effect of the policy of the American Government on the revolutionists in Mexico is illustrated in a speech made by Soto y Gama, the intellectual head of the Zapatista movement, at a secret session of the convention held in Mexico City on June 5, 1915, during which one of Mr. Wilson's many ultimatums was discussed. Soto y Gama stated:

We should not get scared at this ridiculous and childish note, which, like all that Wilson does, is nothing but words, words, words. I do not pretend to be a fortune teller or prophet in international politics, but at this time, when the whole world is shaking, in which the perfidy of the English in its ambition to dominate the seas are uniting as many as possible to obtain their ambition, in the most formidable war that human eyes have witnessed, the United States must be on guard, because sooner or later they will be dragged into war with Japan.

For this reason, Wilson, even should he so desire, will never intervene in Mexico * * *

I do hope the Yanquis will intervene in Mexico. It would spell their ruin; it would be the undoing of the conglomeration of adventures called the United States. They would lose the Philippines, the Panama Canal, Hawaiian Islands, Puerto Rico, and possibly San Francisco, Los Angeles, and Florida. * * *

On studying the matter carefully we will see that the United States can not come to Mexico, as before their disorganized troops had landed in Orizaba, San Francisco, Calif., the defenses of the Panama Canal, and their shining Babylon which they called New York would be swept by the deadly fire of the Japanese, English, and French navies.

Let us teach Wilson a lesson by not paying any attention to the matter for the time being. We are tired of humbly obeying the instructions of the White House. Let us not imitate Diaz, Mariscal, Madero, Calero, and Lascruain. We should allow several days to pass before answering the American note. Then Mr. Wilson will see how much attention we pay to his rash notes.

However, it is not necessary to present collateral evidence to substantiate the opinion which the Carrancistas held and hold of the American Government and the American President, for we have their opinion in their own words in the interview published by Gregory Mason in the Outlook in 1916.

In answer to the question, "Do you approve of President Wilson's policy in Mexico, and, if not, what do you consider have been its principal mistakes?" Gen. Pablo Gonzales replied: "I do not approve Wilson's policy in general for a reason which is fundamental with me as I believe it is with every honest man, namely, Wilson's policy is not clear; it is not frank; it is not clean. I can not reconcile the Pershing expedition with the bombastic and oft-repeated declarations of President Wilson of his respect and sympathy for Mexico. I wish that President Wilson would be our friend and give proof of his friendship with deeds, or that he would be our enemy and declare open war on us. But he ought not to exasperate us with his policy of double-dealing, overwhelming us on the one hand with honeyed words and protestations of sympathy, and on the other hand protecting our enemies and obstructing the consolidation of our Government. What I have just said points out the greatest error in Mr. Wilson's policy, and, I will repeat, indicates his lack of clearness and frankness."

In answer to the correspondent's question as to what could be expected from the election of Hughes, Gen. Gonzales stated: "I can say that in case the imperialistic reputation of the Republican Party should be confirmed I should prefer frank aggression from Mr. Hughes to the doubtful friendship of Mr. Wilson."

Gen. Alvaro Obregon stated that: "The greatest failing of President Wilson is that his acts so seldom coincide with his words. Wilson makes too many declarations which have no facts behind them; you need not examine his Mexican policy for a substantiation of this; just look at the record of his dealings with Germany."

Gen. Candido Aguilar, minister of foreign relations, stated: "The Mexican people are grateful to President Wilson for understanding as President Taft did not, that the revolution in Mexico is a genuine social movement. They are grateful to Wilson for his intelligence and his courage in refusing to recognize Huerta. But they feel that Wilson's policy has at times been marked by vacillation and double dealing, or at least, that his words and his deeds have not always been reconcilable with each other. What Mexico wants from the American President, whatever his name may be, is a policy that is firm, frank, consistent, and constructive. Mexico would even prefer open and honest hostility to false friendship."

"Wilson's policy has made Mexico feel like a man at whom is pointed a loaded and cocked pistol and who is kept in this uncomfortable and uncertain position for a long and nerve-racking period. If the trigger is to be pulled the man would prefer to have it done at once, so that the worst would be over quickly. But naturally, he would prefer to have his enemy put away the gun and become an honest friend."

President Venustiano Carranza, after praising President Wilson for not recognizing Huerta, went on to say:

"But lately, we have had to complain of very serious interference in our affairs by your Government. We consider the invasion of our country by the forces of Gen. Pershing very wrong and very unfair. We would not have complained much if the American Army had made a quick dash across the border and then withdrawn. But maintaining the expedition in Mexico, like a thorn in our side, is very unjust and has hurt our Government."

"We can not make such acts of your President accord with his words of sympathy for us. It is this inconsistent policy from your Government which is responsible for the disfavor in which Americans find themselves held in Mexico to-day. It seems to us that your President has not kept faith with Mexico."

"Can the remarks of Gen. Gonzales in criticism of President Wilson be considered as official?" the First Chief was asked.

"No," was the reply, "Gen. Gonzales's remarks were very interesting, but he spoke only for himself. Nevertheless we would prefer a firm, frank, consistent policy from the United States to such a policy as Wilson's. But, as I have said before, we are grateful to Wilson for understanding that this is a social revolution, and for the sympathy which he expressed in his stand against Huerta. And we believe that your republican Presidents are sometimes inclined to be too overbearing toward weaker nations. On the other hand, their foreign policies usually have the virtue of consistency. What we would like from the next American President, whatever his name may be, is a Mexican policy which will combine sympathy with firmness and consistency."

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you prepared to make a statement with reference to the Carranza constitution of 1917? If so, proceed.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Yes, sir. The vital elements in the constitution are its effect on real property and its effect on foreigners.

Property in Mexico had the security that it enjoyed in the United States, France, and England; it enjoyed this security in Mexico in practice until 1910 and in theory until 1917.

Since the constitution of 1857 provided for its amendment by an affirmative vote of two-thirds of Congress and a majority of the State legislatures, which could not have been effected without the consent of the people, and since the revolutionary leaders did not have the sympathy of the Mexican people, they decided to write a new constitution without reference to the constitution of 1857.

The constitution of 1857 referred briefly to property in Article 27, as follows:

Private property shall not be taken without the consent of the owner, except for reasons of public utility, indemnification having been previously made; the law shall determine the authority to make the expropriation and the conditions under which it shall be carried out * * *.

It was necessary that the revolutionary leaders write a constitution which would not only provide for the confiscation of property, but would provide for it in such a way as to make their intention plain, and render the process brief and effective. This was admirably accomplished.

Article 27 of the new constitution of 1917 is a treatise which entirely changed the basis of property in Mexico. It provides at the beginning:

The property of land and waters comprised within the limits of the national territory corresponds originally to the nation, which has had and now has the right to transmit the same to individuals, thus constituting private property. * * * The nation shall have the right at all times to impose on private property the modifications (modalidades) dictated by public interest, as also to regulate the use of the natural elements susceptible of appropriation in order to make an equitable division of the public resources and provide for their conservation.

The constitution then proceeds to establish three bases on which private property might be destroyed by the executive and legislative authorities:

1. "To this end"—to impose modifications on private property, dictated by public interest—the necessary measures shall be enacted (1) for the subdivision of large landed properties; (2) for the development of small properties; (3) for the creation of new centers of agricultural population * * *; (4) for the encouragement of agriculture; (5) for preventing the destruction of natural resources; and (6) to prevent damage to property to the prejudice of society.

2. Although the above provision would be sufficient to destroy the security of private property, another is incorporated which is even more effective, if possible. Article 27 further provides that private property "may not be expropriated except for reasons of public utility and by payment of its price," and then renders ineffective the guaranties implied in the two component elements of this clause—public utility and indemnification. The subsequent provisions with regard to public utility are that "the legislatures of the Federation and of the States, in their respective jurisdictions, shall determine the cases in which the occupation of private property is a public utility, and in accordance with said laws the administrative authorities shall make a corresponding declaration," and that the indemnification shall consist of the value at which the property is rendered for purposes of taxation, plus 10 per cent. The latter is usually between 5 and 15 per cent of the real value of the property. In other words, the State legislature may enact a law providing for expropriation under any pretext or for any reason that it sees fit, and this is final; there can be no possible appeal.

3. As if the two provisions above mentioned were not sufficient, it is further stipulated that the congress of the union and the legislatures of the States are empowered to enact laws for the division of large properties, in which shall be fixed the maximum amount of land that one person or corporation may own and the manner of the expropriation and sale of all land in excess of this area.

Provision is then made authorizing the executive and legislative authorities to carry into effect the above clauses, depriving victims of the protection of the Federal courts under the writ of amparo, and providing for payment of property in 20 annual installments without security other than worthless state bonds.

After providing the reasons that would justify confiscation the constitution then proceeds to declare void and voidable certain classes of existing titles:

1. Towns, settlements and communities may be given adjoining land, and confiscation made by military authorities for this purpose under the revolutionary decree of January 6, 1915, are approved.

2. It declares null and void all "acts, dispositions, resolutions, and operations connected with the subdivision of land and which may have deprived ranches, towns, congregations, tribes, and other corporations still existing of land since the law of June 25, 1856." This provision of the Constitution affects the title of millions of acres of land, and it will be noticed that all such titles are declared null whether acquired in good or bad faith or with or without consideration.

3. The Executive is then empowered to declare void all contracts and concessions since 1876, having for their object the alienation of real property, including oil and mineral rights, by the Federal Government. No trial is provided for; there can be no appeal; the decision of the Executive is final. In other words, property rights are destroyed in Mexico.

On April 30, 1918, the British Government protested to the Mexican Government against the confiscation of the oil properties of British subjects provided for in the Constitution; and in its reply of August 12 of the same year the Government stated the new theory of property in Mexico in the following words:

If the provisions of the decree are openly made against the laws and in violation of contracts previously made, according to the concept of his British Majesty, such could not rationally constitute an obstacle to the free development of Mexican property; and this development can demand, as has happened, certain changes of legislation beneficial to the country. This is evident when it is considered that the modern concept of property is that it is a social function bound closely to the prosperity of the State.

This "modern concept of property" as "a social function" has found expression in Carranza's Mexico and Trotski's Russia.

The confiscation of oil properties is also provided for in the constitution of 1917.

The other interesting effect of the new constitution relates to foreigners. The expulsion of the Americans in Mexico has always been known to the initiated as one of the prime objects of the revolution; we say Americans, although the constitution provides the same treatment for all foreigners, because the framers of the constitution really had the American in mind. Carranza has never deviated from his program in this respect in the slightest degree, and he regards himself as a patriotic Mexican who is stemming the tide of American influence in Mexico which he is convinced will eventually absorb his country.

At the beginning of the revolution foreigners in Mexico enjoyed all of the rights that Mexicans do. Article 33 of the constitution of 1857 stipulated that "foreigners have the right to the guaranties provided in section 1, title 1, of the present constitution" [the right to life and liberty], and article 30 of the "ley de extranjeria" [law regarding foreigners], which was issued under authority of this article and as supplemental thereto, provides that "foreigners enjoy in this Republic civil rights that Mexicans possess."

In consequence, since 1857 the foreigner has enjoyed all the rights in Mexico of a Mexican citizen, with the exception of the right of participating in the political activities of the country, and has been subject to the same obligations as the Mexican, with the exception of those duties derived from political rights, such as military service.

Article 27 of the new constitution provides that the right to acquire the property of the lands and waters of the nation shall be regulated by the following prescriptions:

Only Mexicans by birth or naturalization and Mexican corporations have the right to acquire the property of lands and waters and their accessions, or to obtain concessions for the exploitation of mines, waters, or combustible minerals in the Republic of Mexico. The State may concede the same right to foreigners provided they agree before the Department of Foreign Affairs to be regarded as Mexicans with respect to said property and not to invoke, in consequence, the protection of their Government with regard to the same, under the penalty in the event that they should not comply with such undertaking, of forfeiture to the nation of the property which they may have acquired by virtue thereof.

The waiver referred to, which is based on the Carranza doctrine, is as follows:

The purchaser shall always be regarded as a Mexican; he shall always subject himself to the laws of Mexico and he shall not enjoy other rights or other privileges than those corresponding to Mexicans. He may not, in consequence, ask or solicit diplomatic intervention in the interpretation of this contract nor the intervention of foreign diplomatic agents in matters relating to the same, the Mexican tribunals being the only ones having jurisdiction to resolve the differences that may arise in this respect.

In order that Americans might not evade this provision and acquire real estate by organizing corporations, the same article, under another section, provides that "Commercial stock companies may not acquire, possess, or administer rural properties." In addition, foreigners are absolutely prohibited from acquiring real estate within 62 miles of the border or within 31 miles of the coast.

In addition, article 33 of the new constitution confers on the President of Mexico the "exclusive right to compel any foreigner whose presence he may deem undesirable to abandon national territory immediately, and without the necessity of previous trial." This provision of the constitution adopted by the Government recognized by the United States has enabled Carranza to expel from Mexico not only Americans whose property it was desired to confiscate but Americans who reported the truth about conditions in Mexico to the press, or even in confidential communications to their own Government.

In addition to confiscating the church property not already in the hands of the Government, the constitution provides in article 130 that "In order to exercise in Mexico the ministry of any denomination, it is necessary to be a Mexican by birth." In other words, no foreign priest or missionary may legally remain in that country.

This article further provides that "Ministers may not in public reunions or private gatherings * * * make criticism of the fundamental laws of the country, of the authorities, or of the Government in general." The purpose of this article is obvious, and this, with the articles previously quoted forbidding ministers of foreign birth to exercise their office in Mexico, has had a very salutary effect, from Carranza's standpoint, of converting into missionaries for the Carranza government many foreign ministers in that country and of incorporating those ministers in the Carranza propaganda service in return for Carranza's permission to violate the laws of the land by remaining in Mexico. The result has been that a swarm of preachers have been overrunning the United States perjuring their souls by indulging in Carranza propaganda. It never occurred to any of them to admit to the American public that they were not only violating the laws of the benighted Government they defended by being in Mexico at all but that they would have further violated its fundamental law if they had told the truth about that Government.

The Carranza leaders took every precaution in order that there might be no obstacle to putting through the program outlined in the constitution. Although the constitution provided for the life tenure of the judges of the supreme court, it was stipulated that this provision should not go into effect until after 1923, and by this means Carranza has been enabled to count on a subservient supreme court.

Thus has Carranza accomplished three of the great bolshevist objects of the revolution—the abolition of private property, the crippling of the church, and the expulsion of the foreigner. In connection with the charge of the existence of bolshevism in Mexico it is interesting to learn the opinion of Luis Cabrera, minister of finance and the intellectual head and director of the Carranza government. The Dictamen, of Vera Cruz, quotes Cabrera in its issue of the 3d of last August, in answer to a question as to whether there was danger that the bolshevist doctrines might spread into Mexico. The article published is as follows:

Cabrera said that it is not possible for these doctrines to find in Mexico ample field for their development or that they should constitute here the same danger as in Europe and other countries, because conditions here are very different.

He added that he could state that the good part of bolshevism was incorporated in the constitution of 1917, in some of the articles that were given birth by the revolutionary movement * * *; consequently, concluded Mr. Cabrera, bolshevism is not a novelty in Mexico nor is there fear, nor is there any reason for fearing, its acceptance here.

There could be no higher authority in this matter than Mr. Cabrera, and no one who knows Mexico is inclined to disagree with him.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you familiar with the vicissitudes of the oil companies in their dealings with the Carranza authorities under the confiscatory clauses of the constitution and confiscatory decrees issued by Carranza?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you please proceed to state it in detail?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Oil property in Mexico has, of course, been confiscated; this is a fact concerning which there can be no argument. The steps that led to confiscation and the attitude of the oil companies are very interesting, because they afford a splendid insight into methods used by the Carranza authorities and the attitude that should be assumed by the Government toward the business interests in Mexico. The question is also extremely interesting, because of the recent publicity given to the oil interests and the attack on them by the Carranza government and its propagandists in the United States, notably L. J. de Bekker, Samuel Guy Inman, Arthur Thomson, and Robert H. Murray, provokers of intervention.

I practiced law in Tampico from 1911 to 1913 and represented nearly every American company in the field at that time as well as several European companies, and because of this connection and subsequent interest in oil leases there I have kept closely in touch with the situation.

There is no question that the oil companies are right in their contention—there is no question that their properties were legitimately acquired, that they have been confiscated, and that they are entitled to the protection of the American Government. On the other hand, there is no question that these companies, through a weak and vacillating policy very similar to that followed by the American Government in handling the general Mexican situation, have in a large measure brought on the present condition. I am of the opinion that they are as responsible for this particular situation as is the American Government; the oil companies are entitled to protection in their just rights, but like all other citizens they should stand on their rights and render more easy the efforts of their Government to protect them. If the heads of the oil companies in the United States had had a better understanding of the Mexican situation, and if those companies had been represented in Tampico by competent managers, indeed, if there had been one man of real ability among such managers, the oil properties would never have been confiscated.

I would like to say in this connection that the Mexican situation has been made too much of an oil question and has been confused too much with oil. Oil companies have suffered and are entitled to relief, but their suffering has been nothing as compared to that of the American of small means. The latter American has seldom been mentioned in connection with the Mexican situation. Thousands of good Americans went to Mexico on their own initiative, invested all their savings, and were then robbed and driven out of the country. These men have not been heard from; they have not the means to come to Washington or to reach the ear of the American people. They find themselves broken, back in a country in which they have lost their connections, without sufficient funds to enable them to finance propaganda, and what is worse, not even able to count on the sympathy of their own Government which abandoned them and betrayed them in Mexico and has lost no opportunity to malign them to the American people. These are the men who need sympathy and help. We shall present to the committee, if the committee desires, over 100 such men who are now living in different parts of the United States and also witnesses to the killing of 15 Americans, 12 of whom were killed by Carranza soldiers.

In this connection it should be noted that whereas 80 or 90 per cent of the Americans living in Mexico have been driven out of that country, the oil companies and other corporations that were there 10 years ago are still there and doing business; they have suffered, of course, but they have managed to stay on. When an American in Mexico is attacked by the authorities, in the absence of the protection to which he is entitled from his own Government, if he is to stay there he must fight or bribe. The American with $5,000 of property all in Mexico, and no resources in the United States—and this type of American constituted 80 per cent of those in Mexico—could not bribe and it has been hard for him to fight alone; some have fought and are still there. The great majority have lost their small property and were left no course but to abandon the country.

The oil company, able to fight, has not had the courage to do so, and has fallen back on the one alternative—bribery. There is not one of the foreign oil companies doing business in Mexico which has not from one to one hundred Carrancistas on its pay roll. In adopting this contemptible policy, the oil companies have not only contributed to their present plight, but they have failed to seize that leadership in the fight for American rights in Mexico to which they were urged by circumstances, and in so failing they have done incalculable harm to the American of small means and to the American people and American prestige.

For the purpose of inducing foreign capital to develop oil possibilities in Mexico and to spend large sums of money in finding and developing this hidden wealth, a law was passed by the Federal Congress on June 6, 1887, which provided that petroleum mining in all its ramifications, the hydrocarbon products derived therefrom, the capital invested, and the profits, the same as metal mining claims and coal mines, would be exempted from all Federal taxation except the stamp tax, also from State or municipal taxation of any kind whatsoever.

Nothing could be more plain in its meaning and intention than this law. The faith of the Mexican Government was pledged to exempt from taxation the foreign capital that was induced to engage in the hazardous business of developing the oil resources of Mexico, which Mexican capital, because of its timidity, would not develop.

The first encroachment on the rights of the oil companies came in a decree of the State government of Vera Cruz in 1912, during the presidency of Madero, which constituted a half-hearted attempt to begin the imposition of a tax on oil. This decree levied a license tax on companies producing oil, which at the time were limited to the Mexican Petroleum Co. and the Compania Mexicana de Petroleo, "El Aguila"—the Cowdray Co. Although this tax was a license tax, it was termed a "stamp tax" merely for the purpose of evading the law of 1887. The tax was levied on the companies producing oil. At that time the majority of the companies, including the Texas Co., the Gulf Refining Co., the Penn-Mex Fuel Co., the Royal Dutch Co., and many others, while already in the field, had not procured oil, and the Mexican authorities consequently thought that these companies would not join in opposing the decree.

At that time I represented most of the above nonproducing companies. These companies through my intervention agreed to join the Aguila and the Mexican Petroleum Co. in their fight, inasmuch as they regarded their interests as being identical, and I went to Jalapa, the capital of the State of Vera Cruz, as their representative in company with the representatives of the Aguila and Mexican Petroleum, to confer with the governor of the State. Before leaving Tampico I secured an agreement from the representatives of the two producing companies in question to the effect that we would stand on the principle that oil was exempt from taxation and would not compromise the matter on any other basis, for the reason that to compromise would constitute a waiver of the provisions of the law of 1887 and imply a recognition on our part of the right of the Mexican Government to tax oil. The members of the supreme court attended the session and gave as their opinion that the State of Vera Cruz had the right to levy this tax, first, because it was an independent State under the constitution and could not be bound by Federal legislation; and, second, that even if it were so bound the tax was a stamp tax which, under the provisions of the law, could be levied on oil companies. Both of these grounds were untenable because, first, regardless of the form of government, States in Mexico are not now and never have been independent, and besides, mining legislation and oil legislation are within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government; and second, because only the Federal Government levies stamp taxes, and because the law of 1887 in referring to a stamp tax referred merely to the well-known stamp tax existing at that time on bills of lading, receipts, checks, and other commercial instruments.

Notwithstanding the fallacy involved in the defense of this law, and notwithstanding the grave results that would follow the recognition of the right of the Government to tax the oil industry, the representatives of the Aguila and Mexican Petroleum Co., men of small vision who were intent on achieving a temporary victory and receiving the unmerited applause of their principals, compromised with the State authorities and agreed to pay a tax amounting to one-third or one-quarter of the amount specified in the decree; and thus the troubles of the oil companies began.

It is needless to say that a month or so later, without reference to the agreement made by the State with these companies, and in view of the recognition by the companies of the right of the State to tax oil, oil taxes were raised, new taxes were imposed, and taxes have been going up ever since. At the present time taxes on oil imposed by the Mexican Government are confiscatory and amount to from 30 to 45 per cent of the value of the oil at the well.

The oil companies long ago accepted the theory of the American Government to the effect that American property in Mexico is not entitled to protection; their whole attitude has been one of apology. Apparently they have been of the opinion that they did not have the sympathy of the American people, and they have been loath to stand on their rights.

In 1914, during the Niagara conference, I proposed to the companies that they immediately approach the representatives of the Carranza revolution and endeavor to secure an agreement protecting their rights; that if they failed to secure this agreement they approach the American Government openly and try to prevent this Government from recognizing the so-called Carranza Government; and that if they failed in this they measure their forces with those of the Carranza Government, and their own Government, if necessary, and endeavor openly to induce the American bankers not to finance the new Government; that in their first conference with the Carranza authorities they frankly advise these authorities just what their program would be in the event they did not obtain relief. The Carranza revolutionary junta would have understood such reasoning and would have acceded to their request. This program, however, was far too direct and too fundamentally sound to appeal to the oil companies and they turned it down.

Hardly had the Carranza revolutionaries taken Tampico when they began to issue all manner of military decrees taxing and vexing oil companies. The Federal authorities, the State authorities, and the municipal authorities all imposed taxes of all kinds. A company was not permitted to drill until after it had secured a permit and paid the necessary graft; an American could not take a lease or transfer it without securing a permit from the governor and paying the necessary graft.

The local commander at Tampico, an ignorant peon by the name of Emiliano Nafarrate, had the nerve to announce that he would issue a decree providing, first, that employers should pay their employees, regardless of the contracts that existed between them, in accordance with a scale of wages fixed by this commander, and that Carranza paper money, worth at that time about 2 or 3 cents on the peso, should circulate at an arbitrary value of 10 cents American money on the peso. In preparation for the promulgation of this decree, Nafarrate summoned the managers of the oil companies to meet a committee of laborers at his office. The American consul, Mr. Claude T. Dawson, an intelligent and patriotic American, implored the managers to ignore the summons of Nafarrate and not to recognize his outrageous claim to the right to arbitrarily regulate wages and other contractual relations. In spite of the appeal of the representative of their own Government, the weak managers submissively appeared at the meeting and accepted the wage scale that Nafarrate handed them.

When Nafarrate, after securing the submission of all of the oil companies representing assets of hundreds of millions of dollars, tried to impose this tax on the independent Americans in Tampico whose property did not exceed in value a few hundred thousand dollars, men who had gone to Mexico on their own initiative and for whom no corporation in the United States had purchased a round-trip ticket, these men stood on their rights and defied the military authority, held a meeting, and then formulated a petition to the President of the United States, which they sent by messenger to Laredo with instructions to wire it to the President and to the news bureaus; they also sent a copy of this petition through the American consul to Gen. Nafarrate. Nothing indicates more clearly than this petition just what the situation was at that time, and if you will permit, I will read it in full:

TAMPICO, TAMAULIPAS, May 22, 1916.

HON. WOODROW WILSON,

*President of the United States of America,
Washington, D. C.:*

The undersigned American citizens, residing in Tampico, in mass meeting assembled respectfully submit the following to your consideration:

That it has become practically impossible for an American to do business of any nature in this section of the country because of restrictions placed by authorities that we believe to be directed primarily against American citizens.

For a year a series of decrees have made their appearance which have been progressive in that they are consistently becoming more anti-American. We believe that the authorities had not the remotest idea when they first began to issue such decrees that they would be able to enforce them, but that when nothing was done by our Government to secure their repeal these edicts have been made more stringent each day, until now our property is threatened with confiscation, and in some cases has been actually confiscated, and our own personal liberty is menaced.

A military decree was issued some months ago providing that lands might not be leased in the State of Vera Cruz for oil purposes without the consent of the State government, and this decree has been changed until now no foreigner is permitted to acquire leases, real estate, or assignment of leases from a native.

In this State an American may not acquire real estate nor may he lease land from a Mexican, nor will he even be permitted to lease a house or apartment for over one year without a special permit.

The military government of this State has instructed the stamp office not to issue certificates of transfer where one American sells to another, and the governor refuses to certify to the signature of the notary in any contract or other instrument in which an American appears. The effect of this procedure is to prevent Americans from transferring their property to other foreigners.

A decree was issued a few days ago by the local military authorities providing that labor should be paid and merchandise should be sold on a basis of Mexican gold, the consideration to be paid in Mexican paper money at an arbitrary value fixed by the Government regardless of the commercial value of this paper money as regulated by supply and demand.

Night before last an American citizen was arrested because he refused that afternoon to pay a wage greatly in excess of that agreed upon between himself and his laborers. He was arrested on a verbal order and detained in prison for three hours.

In a conference held with the military authorities yesterday in the presence of the American consul the authorities made the following statements:

(1) That the American had been arrested because he had failed to pay a wage fixed by a decree that had not been published, and which was not known to be in existence.

(2) That the military authorities are supreme in all matters affecting wages and other contractual relations, and that such authorities may arbitrarily fix any wage that they see fit.

(3) That the American in question would be compelled to pay his men for the previous week the wages provided for in the decree above referred to as having been formulated by the authorities but not yet published.

(4) That if Americans did not consent in the future to pay such wages they would be compelled to close their places of business, even though they might be able to enter into an agreement with laborers at a lesser wage.

(5) That the military authorities might arbitrarily imprison Americans for violation of this decree and that the person arresting them would not be under the obligation of presenting an order of arrest to the man detained.

(6) That the alternative for Americans who did not recognize the validity of the decree in question would be to leave Mexico.

The authorities decided that the American arrested would have to pay the wages of his employee from the 15th instant in accordance with the schedule fixed in the decree referred to, although he was not advised of the existence of such decree until yesterday, the 21st; this morning the military authorities sent him an amended order requiring him to pay the wages as fixed by the decree from the 1st of this month, notwithstanding that the employee had already accepted all wages from the 1st to 13th.

The Americans think that the time has come when they should be advised definitely of the attitude of their Government with respect to the decrees referred to above and similar legislation. The principle involved is too obvious to merit discussion. The question is whether the property of Americans may be directly or indirectly confiscated by decree and whether Americans arbitrarily may be imprisoned by the military authorities.

We refuse to discuss with the authorities collateral matters that are designed to obscure the principle at issue; we will merely state to our Government that now, as in the past history of Mexico, the American is the employer that pays the highest wage—consideration of the scale of wages obtaining here, as compared with that in the interior of Mexico where no Americans remain, as well as an investigation of the wages paid by the present Government, and the method it employed recently to break the strike on the Government-controlled railways would be interesting, but are not pertinent to the matter under consideration.

All of the above decrees violate Mexican law and are in contravention of the rights of Americans guaranteed by treaty between Mexico and the United States. We desire to know if the American Government will permit the above decrees, or any of them, to remain in force where the rights of Americans are involved. An understanding with the authorities as to the future would not be sufficient; the decrees already in existence must be repealed where they affect Americans.

We also respectfully state that the military authorities are mistaken in their assertion that the only alternative to submitting to this decree—that is, to confiscation and arbitrary imprisonment—is for the Americans to leave the country. Another alternative is to remain in Mexico and receive from our Government the protection to which we are entitled.

We beg to advise the American Government that we will not obey the decree that seeks to regulate contractual relations where Americans are involved, and that we will not obey the provisions of the decree in which an arbitrary value is fixed on the paper peso. To do so would be equivalent to abandoning our property.

We submit to our Government that we believe that we are in this country not by the grace or favor of the Mexican authorities but because we have the right to be here, and we further submit that we are profoundly convinced that the authorities are anti-American in sentiment and purpose. We firmly believe it is their object to drive Americans out of Mexico.

We conceive it to be our right as American citizens to meet and consider our grievances and communicate with our Government, and we are sending to the American consul a copy of this communication with the request that he transmit the same to the military authorities in this city.

Eighty-four signatures omitted.

This petition is notable because of the fact that it expressed clearly the rights of Americans and expressed a willingness to fight for these rights regardless of the attitude of our Government. It is also notable, because the oil companies without exception refused to adhere to this declaration of Americanism; not a single manager, not a single representative of the hundreds of millions of dollars invested in oil, signed this petition.

Nothing could be more American than this petition; the oil managers would not only not sign it, but they endeavored to prevent the petitioners from using public halls in Tampico to hold their meetings; they were so alarmed at this anarchistic declaration of American rights that some of them went so far as to send word to Gen. Nafarrate that they did not sympathize with the attitude of these turbulent Americans.

When Gen. Nafarrate saw that he had a fight on his hands, that he was up against a group of Americans who understood their rights and did not stand back for their Government to take the initiative, he did what a Carrancista in such circumstances always does, and what the Carranza authorities would have done long ago with respect to the oil industry if this industry had been represented by men with the intelligence to understand their rights and the courage to fight for them—he gave in and exempted the independent Americans in Tampico from the operation of the decree. He did this in the presence of the American consul, but told the consul explicitly that since the oil companies had agreed to his preposterous dictation he would hold them to their agreement.

It is interesting, in connection with the attitude of the oil companies, to note the opinion of Mr. George Agnew Chamberlain, who has just resigned the position of Consul General of the United States in Mexico, expressed in his book Not All the King's Horses. Mr. Chamberlain states:

Take the oil interests; all they had to do was to print the clause of the constitution which stated that petroleum rights were purchasable, and throw in for good measure proof that they did not hold one square foot of ground by gift or concession. If they had stood pat on just that, said it and said it again and not another word, there never would have been an argument.

Carranza forecast the trend of oil legislation in one of his first decrees in which he ordered the suspension of all oil operations in the oil field of whatever nature until such time as he might give the companies express permission to continue. In his preamble to this decree he states:

It is necessary to prevent the continuation of unauthorized exploitation which would bring greater complications that would embarrass still more the already difficult work of revising the validity of existing exploitation and making uniform the juridical condition of oil property, which would be a constant menace in producing conflicts of an international character, owing to the nationality of some of the organizations, who, though they failed to comply with the just obligations which they owed the country from which they took great wealth, they could appeal with ease to the protection of foreign Governments.

You will note that this decree, as well as others that follow, took the legislation of the oil industry back into the Federal Government, but said nothing about the exemption of taxation provided for in the Federal law of 1887, and which was not recognized by the State of Vera Cruz on the ground that oil legislation was a local State matter that could not be controlled by the Federal Government. Now that the Federal Government had taken over oil legislation again, the exemption provided for in the law of 1887 was, of course, binding on this Government. However, the oil companies had admitted the right of the Government to tax oil for so many years that even the managers had forgotten that they were entitled to exemption, and I do not recall any instance in which this right was again urged. At about this time Pastor Rouaix, the minister of Fomento, who had charge of oil legislation, visited Tampico for the express purpose, as he stated quite frankly and quite generally in private conversation, of devising a plausible means of confiscating oil properties. The oil managers, true to their policy, lavishly entertained Mr. Rouaix and gave him a banquet the night before he left Tampico.

The Government decided to dredge the Panuco River and arbitrarily, and without any justification whatever, imposed a tax on the oil companies for this purpose which it distributed among the different companies in proportion to the Government's opinion of their ability to pay. The companies all protested vigorously, but did nothing else, and of course paid the tax. An instructive incident occurred in this connection. One of the companies, after its tanker had been loaded and dispatched by the port authorities, and was consequently not any longer legally within the jurisdiction of the Mexican authorities, refused to pay the dredge tax, whereupon the authorities detained the boat. The manager frantically appealed to the American consul, who, being a keen man, saw his opportunity, inasmuch as the boat had been cleared, and conferred with the captain of the American gunboat in the harbor, who agreed forthwith and without consulting Washington (this would have been disastrous), to take the tanker forcibly from the Mexican authorities and escort it down to the mouth of the river. When the consul told the manager in question that the gunboat was ready to proceed on this mission, the manager weakened, stated that this was too much responsibility for him to take, and rushed over and paid the tax before the American authorities could possibly give him the protection which he so earnestly solicited.

As stated above, the oil companies have never seemed to be sure of their rights, although there has never been any question of the legitimacy of those rights. Their approaches to the State Department have always been with an air of apology as if they did not have, as American citizens, the same right to appeal to their State Department for the protection that the department was in law bound to give them, as they had to approach a court with a legitimate petition in law.

When the Carranza government, perceiving not only the weakness of our Government but the weakness of the oil companies, attempted to go through with their scheme of confiscation, a scheme which these very authorities did not think two years before they could put into effect, the oil companies selected Messrs. Garfield and Rhodes, men apparently inexperienced in worldly affairs, and certainly extremely ignorant of Mexican conditions and Mexican character, to represent them in their endeavor to persuade the Carranza authorities to set aside the confiscatory provisions of the constitution. These gentlemen were selected, not because of their competency in such matters, for they were notoriously and pitifully incompetent, but because Mr. Garfield was a brother of the Fuel Administrator, and the oil companies hoped that they might thus succeed in influencing the Fuel Administrator to report to the Navy Department and the State Department that Tampico oil was indispensable to the prosecution of the European war and thus secure relief.

All through their negotiations the oil companies have been intent on securing the services of a brother or a cousin or a relative of somebody; their policy has been similar to that pursued by the American Government in asking Latin Americans to intercede with the Carranza authorities.

Messrs. Garfield and Rhodes carried out very splendidly the traditional policy of the oil companies and engaged in several months of argument with the Carranza officials, incurred their intellectual contempt, and finally entered into an agreement in which they admitted the principle of nationalization, that is, admitted that all the oil properties belonged to the Government and that the oil companies would in the future operate what had up to that day been their own wells and hold what up to that day had been their own properties, under special license by means of the payment of a rental and royalty to the new owner, the Mexican Government; but they induced the Carranza government to reduce the rental from 4 pesos to 3 pesos per hectare. Satisfied with this brilliant victory, they returned to the States, and what is worse and more humiliating, the highest executive officials of the oil companies in the States, men who had been dealing with Mexico and their properties in Mexico for several years, considered this matter for several weeks and engaged in heated debate among themselves before they decided not to accept and ratify the agreement entered into provisionally by Garfield and Rhodes with the Mexican authorities.

The Mexican authorities proceeded then to put into effect their so-called scheme of nationalization and issued a decree ordering the oil companies to "manifest," that is, to submit a complete statement of their properties, including certified copies of title deeds, leases, inscriptions of registration, geological reports, maps, etc., and fixed a certain period during which this must be done. Instead of meeting this issue boldly and telling the Carranza authorities that they would not make such manifestations, the oil companies sent a swarm of attorneys to Mexico City to argue again with the authorities and beg them from time to time to extend the period during which they must present these manifestations, which in itself indicated an intention to comply with the orders of the Government. In the meantime their attorneys were standing in the halls of the State Department, hat in hand, asking the State Department to take the initiative in a fight in which the oil companies themselves should have taken the initiative, and asking the advice of officials in the State Department, who in their handling of the Mexican situation for the last seven years had proved their incompetency and from whom no American in Mexico who has been able to stand on his own feet wants any advice. Incredible as it may seem, the oil companies without exception proceeded to prepare all this data and must have spent in the aggregate over $100,000 in compiling it, and awaited assurances of the States Department in advance that the State Department would protect them in their rights before deciding not to submit their manifestations, and this decision was not made until the afternoon of the last day of grace, and then, as I have stated, not until after the State Department had taken the initiative and promised to save the oil companies from all risk. Could there possibly be an example of greater incompetency and inefficiency than this?

Mr. KEARFUL. What, in your opinion, could the oil companies better have done than that which they did?

Mr. BUCKLEY. The solution of the troubles of the oil companies, like the handling of the entire Mexican situation, has always been a very simple one; it has been filled with complications by the manner of its handling from this end. If the oil companies, instead of sending numerous delegations to Mexico City to argue with the Carranza authorities, had told the Carranza authorities just what they were going to do, they would have secured relief. If they had frankly told Carranza that they would not permit him to steal their properties; that if he proceeded to do so they would appeal to their Government for relief; and that if their Government did not give them the protection to which they were entitled, they would measure their forces with Carranza and secure their own relief, Carranza would never have gone through with this scheme, and if he had tried to go through with it the oil companies would have won out in the fight.

Mr. KEARFUL. How could they have won the fight?

Mr. BUCKLEY. The oil companies, after receiving no relief from Carranza, instead of sending a multitude of representatives over to Washington to talk to clerks in the State Department, should have told the State Department just what they had already told Carranza, and if they failed to receive relief here they should have financed a revolution to take over and permanently administer the oil fields, which they could have done for an expenditure of $200,000 a month, whereas they are to-day paying Carranza over $1,000,000 a month.

Mr. KEARFUL. But such proceeding would have been a violation of law, would it not?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Yes; of course it would; but so would have been the confiscation of their properties by the Carranza Government, and the withholding of protection by the American Government to which these companies were entitled.

During the war, when the representatives of the oil companies were finally given a hearing by the President, who designated Mr. Josephus Daniels to hear their case, and they were asked pointedly just what they wanted and why they wanted it, they did not dare to rest their case on their fundamental right to protection under international law, but weakly stated that they wanted protection in order that oil might be available for the American Navy in the prosecution of the war, and were prompted not by self-interest, but by patriotism. They were promptly, and very properly, told that the American Government was quite willing to assume this risk and that the oil companies could go ahead on the same basis as before.

At a meeting of the oil companies that I attended in New York last December, when it was decided to send a committee to Washington to see Mr. Polk, of the State Department, and ask for the protection which was their right, a discussion was indulged in for three quarters of an hour in the selection of the committee in their endeavor to send three Americans who might appeal to Mr. Polk; it appeared that Mr. Polk was very temperamental, and liked some people and didn't like others; his ex-law partner was solicitously consulted in the matter of Mr. Polk's likes and dislikes, and finally a committee was selected, not because its personnel was approved by its principals, but because it was calculated that the gentlemen constituting this committee would not ruffle the delicate sensibilities of this official in the State Department.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you think would be the attitude of the oil companies toward the Mexican problem as a whole, affecting as it does many thousands of other Americans, if they could get the protection they desire and secure a modification of the confiscatory clauses of the constitution of 1917?

Mr. BUCKLEY. In spite of the protestations of the oil companies to the contrary, I believe that they would all, with the exception of one man, quit the fight, which, because of peculiar circumstances, they have been involuntarily waging for the rights of Americans in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who is the man to whom you refer?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. Edward L. Doheny.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you know about the practice of the oil companies in paying tribute to Manuel Pelaez?

Mr. BUCKLEY. The oil companies are paying a monthly tribute to Pelaez, but the charges made against them to the effect that they are deliberately financing Pelaez are untrue. They are paying Pelaez, not because they want to, but because Pelaez compels them to. Pelaez has given them protection, the protection that they could not get from the constituted government, but nevertheless, they are so shortsighted that he has had to force them to give him the money to support his troops; the only thing that has stood in the way of the actual confiscation of the oil fields is the fact that Pelaez has had possession of those fields for the greater part of the time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you personally acquainted with Pelaez?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Yes; I know him well.

Mr. KEARFUL. What character of man is he?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Pelaez is a splendid type of Mexican. He and his two brothers are men of independent means, were born and reared in the territory now constituting the oil fields; they have always been leaders in that section and law-abiding citizens. They took little part in politics, and were ready to submit, and did submit, to the new régime upon the flight of Huerta, but the Carrancistas were not content with this submission; the Pelaez brothers had property and stock and money and the Carrancistas proceeded to take over their stock and hold them up for forced loans. After depriving them of all the money they had, the Carrancistas kept demanding more, and finally Manuel Pelaez had the alternative of leaving the country or revolting, and he preferred the latter.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the attitude of Pelaez toward Americans?

Mr. BUCKLEY. The evidence of everybody in that country, the evidence of the oil companies, the reports of the American consuls and special investigators of the American Government, all show that Pelaez has been uniformly friendly toward Americans. The State Department is in possession of a mass of evidence to this effect. Ninety per cent of the robberies and murders of Americans that have been committed in the oil fields have occurred in the territory controlled by Carrancistas, and most of them have been perpetrated by Carrancistas. Pelaez has given Americans and their properties, and Mexicans and their property, every protection. During the war, when Carranza was pro-German and was trying to drive Pelaez out of the fields with arms and ammunition obtained in the United States with the consent of the American Government, Pelaez was pro-ally, was protecting the oil fields for the Americans and the Allies and was driving out of these fields all German spies that were reported to him by either the oil companies or the American consuls.

Mr. KEARFUL. How is Pelaez regarded by the Mexican people in that locality?

Mr. BUCKLEY. He is looked upon by the Mexican people in that portion of the country as their only hope, the man who has saved them from the confiscation of their properties. The fact that he has remained there for four years, with scarcely any resources and no arms or ammunition outside of what he could capture or buy from the Carrancistas is evidence of the support of the people.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your opinion as to the remedy that should be applied to the Mexican problem? Are you in favor of armed intervention by this country?

Mr. BUCKLEY. No; I am not. The present condition of Mexico does not mean that Mexico is not capable of self-government; it simply means that the bandits are not able to govern Mexico satisfactorily. There is a difference between self-government and a democratic form of government; Mexico is capable of the former, although not fitted for the latter. The Government of Mexico for 35 years during the régime of Diaz was beneficial to her people and entirely satisfactory to the rest of the world; during this period Mexico complied with her national and international obligations.

It is true that most Americans from Mexico now advocate armed intervention; they have come to this view as the result of many years of suffering, and because of conditions which promise to last indefinitely, and because of their feeling that for some reason the decent Mexican people will never again be allowed to rule their own country. No American in Mexico wanted intervention ten years ago; any American who has been in Mexico that long would prefer the Government that existed then to armed intervention. Many Americans have reached the point of advocating armed intervention because they have devoted little thought to Mexican history, or are not acquainted with the cultured Mexican and do not understand his point of view and do not understand or have forgotten the capabilities of the high-class Mexican. Our Government has not produced men greater than Limantour, Mariscal, or the Macedos, and there are many such Mexicans to-day, most of them, unfortunately, in exile. I believe that those Mexicans, with the proper aid, could form a satisfactory Government. Armed intervention is, of course, an alternative to the present state of anarchy, but it is not the only alternative, and, in my opinion, is not the best alternative. When the American Government intervened in the local affairs of Mexico it laid the foundation for armed intervention for two reasons: First, because one government can not control the internal affairs of another people and dictate to them without resorting eventually to the use of armed force—peaceful intervention can not last indefinitely; and, in the second place, because when the American Government selected men of the type of Villa and Carranza to be the rulers of Mexico it chose men who could not permanently rule that country to the satisfaction of the Mexican people and foreign Governments; it chose a class that was doomed in advance to failure and failure pointed inevitably toward armed intervention. In the history of our relations with Mexico the policy of our present administration will be looked upon as an interventionist policy.

I firmly believe that the solution of the Mexican problem lies either in the positive backing of any one of a number of able Mexicans who would make good presidents of that country, or in the negative policy of withdrawing recognition from Carranza, and permitting the decent people in that country to form their own government without hindrance on our part. There is no question in my mind but that this latter method would be successful; if, however, we were not sure of its success it would be best to try it before attempting armed intervention. The educated Mexican, the great mass of the Mexican people, have not been given any opportunity in the last seven years. Our powerful Government has made an alliance with men who have oppressed that people and defied all foreign Governments and has been true to this alliance. Now that Carranza has failed, the fear of Americans in Mexico is that our Government will back some other Mexican of the same type; a Government that in the face of all the evidence first backed Villa, then flirted with Zapata, and finally chose Carranza is in danger, is apt, if left to its own devices, to make another unsatisfactory choice.

Mr. KEARFUL. Why is it that the better class of the Mexican people have not formed an efficient government?

Mr. BUCKLEY. In the first place, because in their majority they have been expelled from that country with the tacit consent of the American Government; because their properties have been confiscated with the tacit consent of the American Government; because a number of them have been killed, also with the tacit consent of the American Government—for we must conclude that where a Government maintains its recognition of another government that has expelled and outrages its best citizens, this Government consents to that conduct. How could this class of Mexicans, even if they were provided with resources, successfully overthrow the present Government in Mexico when the United States insists that no one in Mexico but Carranza shall have arms and ammunition, and when it holds over them the menace of nonrecognition, without which no Government in Mexico can last?

The effects of armed intervention on the United States and on its future relations with Mexico would, in my opinion, be bad. After the American troops had left Mexico the United States and Americans would be hated by the very people in Mexico who are now clamoring for intervention, and, in their despair, there is no doubt that the majority of people in Mexico want armed intervention. They would forget all the good that the American Government might do and only remember the inevitable wrongs and clashes. It would be a difficult situation for Americans for 10 or 15 years after the American troops left. There is no place where we are disliked more heartily than in Cuba, and intervention in Mexico would have the same result, especially as all Mexicans would realize that we intervened to correct conditions that we had a large part in creating.

The ultimate aim of armed intervention would certainly not be the annexation of any Mexican territory or the formation of a permanent military protectorate over that country. The ultimate end, I assume, would be to turn Mexico's Government over to the Mexicans; and when this is done, whether it be within 1 year or 50 years, that Government will be left in the hands of the very people whom we have driven out of Mexico—the only people who ever gave Mexico a decent government. If it is to be done after armed intervention, it would be better to do it now. It would take a little longer for the Mexican to pacify his own country, but it would be a more secure pacification when it came, and the result would be more permanent.

Mr. KEARFUL. We often hear of the necessity to shape American policy in order to meet the sentiment of Latin-America, and that a strong policy with respect to Mexico would have a deleterious effect upon our prestige in Latin-America. What is your opinion about that?

Mr. BUCKLEY. I think we should settle this matter with Mexico without reference to Latin America or to what Latin Americans or anybody else thinks; I think we should settle it in the right way without reference to anybody else. I have always thought that this talk about our Latin American relations that we hear so much about among the officials of the American Government is founded in their provincial ignorance of such matters. Conferences like the Pan American Conference and the Niagara Conference and our many other conferences do us no good in Latin America—Latin America respects us more when we attend to our own business and do not call Latin Americans in for consultation. Our relations with Mexico are our own business and nobody's else. The use of a firm hand in dealing with Mexico would only strengthen the respect of Latin America for us; I don't mean armed intervention, for, as I stated before, I do not think this is necessary, nor have I in mind just the present situation; but what I mean is that under ordinary circumstances we should insist that every American, no matter how insignificant he may be and even though he be in the most remote part of Mexico, has the right to the protection of his Government and that where he is discriminated against or denied the protection of the law, the American Government would be justified in using its entire Army and Navy to give him protection, and that nothing would have a more salutary effect on our Latin American relations than the use of our Army and Navy where this use is justified. It would instil a wholesome respect in people who would commit the same abuses that have been committed in Mexico if they could do so with impunity. Nothing would have raised our prestige so in Latin America as the dispatching of an army across the border the first time an American was touched and the execution of all those who had injured him. If this had been done seven years ago, in fact, if it had been threatened, Americans would have had no trouble either in Mexico or in the rest of Latin America. As it is, our prestige in Latin America was never so low as it is to-day.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you desire that your testimony be considered by the committee in executive session, or are you willing that it may be printed as a part of the public hearings?

Mr. BUCKLEY. I am perfectly willing that my testimony should be printed and published; I would not give testimony for consideration only in executive session.

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

REPORT OF SENATOR ALBERT B. FALL TO THE SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS, EXAMINING INTO MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

Printed for the use of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PARTIAL AND AD INTERIM REPORT.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 9, 1919.

On November 16, 1919, the chairman of your subcommittee proceeded to the border for the purpose of transacting official business in connection with your investigation and preparing for hearings to be held by the subcommittee in the border States after December 1.

While en route to Three Rivers, N. Mex., where I stopped one day to attend to personal affairs, I received at Chicago, and Kansas City, and immediately upon leaving the train at Three Rivers, telegrams from other members of the committee, and at least one other Senator insisting that my presence was, or would be, necessary in Washington, and urging that I should return to this city as soon after November 20, as possible.

I had Capt. Hanson and other investigators arrange to meet me at El Paso, Tex., on November 21, that I might, before returning to Washington, receive reports from them supplementing other information in the possession of the Department of State, and also in the possession of your committee, and bearing directly upon important and critical matters concerning your investigation.

As you are aware, your committee and the Department of State have been cooperating in Mexican matters, and particularly in your investigation thereof, especially since the date of November 14, 1919. Such cooperation has been of the most frank, cordial and pleasant nature. Under the direction of the Secretary of State, the United States ambassador to Mexico, Mr. Fletcher, and the minister to Cuba, Mr. Boaz Long, both of whom have been in this city for some time past, have been in almost constant touch with your committee, advising and cooperating with us.

Before leaving this city on November 16, I notified the Department of State of my purpose in leaving here, and of my movements generally.

Among the telegrams to which reference has been made, as calling me back to Washington, were the following:

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 20, 1919.

HON. ALBERT B. FALL,
*United States Senator,
Three Rivers, N. Mex.*

We have conferred with Fletcher. In view of new developments we agree that you should return here as soon as possible after the wedding and not proceed with hearing or other committee work at present. Please answer.

FRANK B. BRANDEGEE.
CHARLES S. THOMAS.
MARCUS A. SMITH.

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 24 1919.

HON. A. B. FALL,
*United States Senator,
Paso Del Norte Hotel, El Paso, Tex.*

Have conferred with Fletcher. Absolutely necessary you should be here at opening of Congress. Am satisfied nothing can be done until you arrive.

FRANK B. BRANDEGEE.

Prior to the receipt of the telegram of November 24, I wired my secretary, Mr. Safford, to confer directly with Ambassador Fletcher, showing him my telegram. In answer, my secretary telegraphed me, referring to Mr. Fletcher:

* * * Believes there will be day or so delay in reaching decision. Deems it inadvisable issue statement from El Paso. Believes if given out here much more effective and dignified, "if not by administration, then by Congress, if thought best. Believes you should be here at opening of session.

Confirming this telegram, my secretary wrote me as follows:

With regard to your return, he thought you should be here when Congress convenes. In this connection he referred to the investigations of the subcommittee and said that he hardly thought it necessary for them to be continued, "as we have sufficient evidence or data on hand."

I hurriedly closed up matters temporarily with our investigators and left El Paso, coming directly to Washington, where I arrived at 4.30 in the afternoon of December 1, 1919. I was met at the Union Station by a messenger from the Secretary of State and also by Mr. Boaz Long, representing the Department of State, and requested to proceed in Mr. Long's motor to the residence of the Secretary of State, Mr. Lansing, without delaying either at my office or my hotel.

I had a very pleasant and interesting consultation with Mr. Lansing, discussing the Jenkins case and discussing in detail the matters hereinafter set out in the memorandum presented to the President of the United States. While no definite, specific conclusion was reached at this conference as to the details of immediate, specific action, the steps thought necessary by both the Secretary and myself to be taken concerning the various very important matters of dispute with Mexico were very thoroughly discussed and, I am happy to say, with no difference of opinion.

It was understood that possibly one or more resolutions concerning Mexico might be introduced in the Senate by Senators other than members of your subcommittee, unless the committee itself, or some member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, introduced some resolution with reference to Mexico.

It was decided that the Secretary of State should name a representative from his department to represent him in close and continuous contact with myself, as representing the Senate, through the chairmanship of the Subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations dealing with Mexican affairs.

On the next morning a message by telephone from the Secretary of State, notified my office that Ambassador Fletcher had been designated by the Secretary to represent his department and to consult with, and be in continuous touch with your subcommittee and its chairman. I at once telephoned to Ambassador Fletcher, asking him to come to my office in the Senate Office Building immediately, which he did. Upon his arrival there, I handed him for his consideration draft of two proposed concurrent resolutions to be offered by myself and, after consultation, we agreed upon the resolution to be so offered, which is in words and figures as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the action taken by the Department of State in reference to the pending controversy between this Government and the Government of Mexico should be approved; and, further, that the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to withdraw from Venustiano Carranza the recognition heretofore accorded him by the United States as President of the Republic of Mexico and to sever all diplomatic relations now existing between this Government and the pretended Government of Carranza.

In company with Ambassador Fletcher I proceeded immediately to the Senate Chamber, while the ambassador proceeded to the Diplomatic Gallery thereof. I offered the resolution, and the same was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The committee being called together for the consideration of the resolution, Ambassador Fletcher appeared before it and announced that, at the request of the Secretary of State, he desired to say that the latter would prefer that the resolution be separated and the first portion, endorsing his action in the pending controversy, be adopted immediately, and that action upon the remaining portion be deferred.

The Secretary of State himself came before the Committee on Foreign Relations after the recess and repeated this request and made a somewhat extended statement, during which it developed that the President of the United States had not been informed by the Secretary, directly, at least, concerning Mexican affairs since the return of the President to Washington from his western tour and since his illness.

Thereupon the Committee on Foreign Relations, upon motion, named Senators Hitchcock and Fall to wait upon the President concerning the proposed resolution, and to inform him of the reasons actuating myself in offering the resolution for action by the Congress.

An appointment was made for the following day, when Senators Hitchcock and Fall waited upon the President, and the latter Senator made a verbal statement, referring to various documents and other evidence, and touching upon various phases of Mexican matters, and of certain disputes between this country and Mexico relating thereto.

The President requested Senator Fall, if possible, to prepare for him at once, a written statement or memorandum, covering the matters reported upon verbally by Senator Fall to him.

Returning to my office I immediately dictated such statement and sent it by special messenger to the White House. This was upon the afternoon of Friday, December 5, 1919. On the following morning Mr. Tumulty, Secretary to the President, over the telephone notified me that he had delivered the memorandum to the President the night before, that is to say, Friday, the 5th.

Shortly after noon on Monday, the 8th of December, I received from the President a communication, which is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington.

8 December, 1919.

MY DEAR SIR: Thank you very much for your kind promptness in complying with my request that you send me a copy of the memorandum report of the subcommittee on Mexican affairs of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I shall examine it with the greatest interest and care. What you told me of the investigation, on Friday last, prepares me to find in it matter of the greatest importance.

You ask an indication of my desire with regard to the pending resolution to which you and Senator Hitchcock called my attention on Friday, and I am glad to reply with the utmost frankness that I should be gravely concerned to see any such resolution pass the Congress. It would constitute a reversal of our constitutional practice which might lead to very grave confusion in regard to the guidance of our foreign affairs. I am confident that I am supported by every competent constitutional authority in the statement that the initiative in directing the relations of our Government with foreign governments is assigned by the Constitution to the Executive, and to the Executive, only. Only one of the two Houses of Congress is associated with the President by the Constitution in an advisory capacity, and the advice of the Senate is provided for only when sought by the Executive in regard to explicit agreements with foreign governments and the appointment of the diplomatic representatives who are to speak for this Government at foreign capitals. The only safe course, I am confident, is to adhere to the prescribed method of the Constitution. We might go very far afield if we departed from it.

I am very much obliged to you for having given me this opportunity to express this opinion.

Very truly yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

HON. ALBERT B. FALL,
United States Senate.

Shortly thereafter I gave publicity to a statement concerning this matter, in which statement was included a verbatim copy of the memorandum sent to the President, and to which his foregoing letter refers.

The statement and the memorandum are as follows:

STATEMENT.

The President's letter deals exclusively with the propriety of passing the resolution recommending the withdrawal of the recognition of the Carranza Government, and his comments relate directly and only to that proposition. It is surprising that at this time it should be stated that the suggestion of the Senate that such recognition should be withdrawn should constitute a reversal of our constitutional practice. From the beginning of the Government the Senate has felt free and has exercised its privilege over and over again to make any suggestions in respect to all phases of foreign relations. There is nothing in the Constitution that requires that the initiative with respect to foreign relations shall be limited to the Executive. Of course, he may, and properly, because of his extraordinary relation to foreign affairs, in ordinary cases be the source of negotiation. The President's general statement that only one branch of the Congress, namely, the Senate, has any relation to foreign affairs, and the Senate only when its advice is sought by the Executive, is contradicted by a hundred precedents. Indeed, the precedents have gone so far that in a number of cases the advice has been the advice of negotiation, and even as solemn engagements as treaties have been made not only upon the suggestion of the Senate but in the exact terms that the Senate has suggested. A discussion by Senator Lodge, published in Scribner's some years ago, and more recently by the late Senator Bacon of Georgia, has been supposed generally to have put at rest the question that the Senate may only advise when its advice is sought.

By this resolution the Senate did not attempt to withdraw recognition or break off relations, but the concurrent resolution contained a suggestion or request to the President that he do so. Such suggestion is entirely in harmony with precedent.

The President states in the first paragraph of his letter that he shall "examine it (my written memorandum furnished him Friday night) with the greatest interest and care. What you told me of the investigation on Friday last prepares me to find in it matter of the greatest importance."

It would appear that the President has not as yet examined this written memorandum, and, of course, under the circumstances, I will again request the committee to postpone action upon the resolution, or upon any phase of the Mexican matter until he has had time to give the subject his consideration.

The resolution was introduced by myself after consultation with numbers of my colleagues and others because of the fact that we considered it of the greatest importance that the matter should immediately be presented to the attention of the President, and because we were reliably informed that the matters referred to in the statement made by myself to the President and to some extent reincorporated in the written memorandum, had not been called to his attention at all, or by any one.

The memorandum presented to the President on Friday evening was as follows:

MEMORANDUM.

In pursuing the investigation concerning appeals to the laboring element in the United States to prevent intervention in Mexico it became evident that many doubtless very sincere persons were entirely ignorant of Mexican matters in general, and particularly of the subjects which they were attempting to discuss.

During such investigation the committee ascertained that the Carranza Government itself was also conducting propaganda of like character, and in many instances the organizations referred to were being used by the Carranza Government for such purposes.

In following up this line the committee at an early date became convinced that the Carranza Government, through its consuls general in this country, was in more or less close contact with the more extreme radical elements in the United States, and was using propaganda with such elements.

The committee had its attention called to a letter from Consul General R. P. de Negri to a member of the Mexican Senate of Mexico City, dated New York, October 23, 1919, and published in Spanish in a Mexico City daily paper of November 6, 1919, in which the consul general calls attention to the fact that he is in touch with radicals and others in the United States favoring the nationalization of all property, and congratulates the Mexican Senator upon the ground that Mexico had set an example in such nationalization, and that he, de Negri, in 1917, had made up his mind to engage in propaganda favorable to us (Mexico) by having our constitution printed in English, etc., etc.

There was obtained from a Mexican consulate in Texas a pamphlet entitled, "The Conspiracy Against Mexico," by one Arthur Thomson. In this pamphlet, among other things, comparison is made between the Mexican constitution and the Soviet Government in Russia, and the charge is made that the American Government has placed every obstacle in the way through protest, etc., of the Mexican Carranza Government carrying out the provisions of the Mexican Constitution, and nationalizing all forms of property. Strong criticism is directed at President Wilson for his actions in this regard, and attention is called to certain speeches made by the President as being naturally contradictory in their terms with reference to Mexico, and the general tenor of the document is to hold President Wilson responsible for interference with the Carranza Government in Mexican affairs.

Even stronger criticism is directed at Secretary Lane, the charge being that he, while a member of the American-Mexican Joint Commission, was attempting to browbeat the Mexicans into yielding the guarantees demanded by the Rockefellers, the Guggenheims, the Dodges, and the Dohenys." By causing a letter upon private stationery to be written to the Mexican Embassy stating that the writer understood that this pamphlet was being distributed by the embassy and expressing a desire that a copy might be mailed to a private address in the city of Washington, an immediate response was had by the receipt in a plain envelope of a copy of such document.

The committee caused a letter to be written to the author of the pamphlet, directed from a Southwestern town, in which the writer, under a German name, requested copies of the pamphlet and suggested that through certain influences which he might wield the Mexican Government might be persuaded to purchase and circulate the Thomson pamphlet. An immediate reply was received from the author, stating, among other things, that the consul general of Mexico at San Francisco had already purchased for distribution 5,000 copies of such pamphlet, and that they were being distributed in the United States and other countries, and also stating that should the consul general be able to obtain from his Government further funds for such purposes, an increased number of such pamphlets would be so distributed.

The committee obtained possession of a copy in Spanish of what Mr. Carranza calls his "Bluebook," embracing some 400 printed pages, in which at various places attention is called to the oppressive policy of the United States Government toward Mexico, and stress is laid upon the fact that President Carranza has resisted every such encroachment, and in every instance from the first proposed Niagara conference down to and including the American protests as to nationalization of lands and other properties, that Carranza has been successful by refusing absolutely to yield in any respect to the demands of this Government.

Attention of the committee was called to conditions along the border in Arizona and in southern Texas, and in the opinion of the committee such conditions were rapidly taking on the same character which had been assumed in our relations with Mexico prior and subsequent to October, 1915. As will be recalled, early in the year of 1915 there was issued at Monterrey, Mexico, and a little place known as San Diego, Tex., by certain Mexicans, what was known as the "Plan of San Diego." It was declared that on the 20th of February, 1915, there should arise a revolution against the Government and the country of the United States of North America; that the independence and segregation of Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, Colorado, and upper California should be proclaimed, as the Republic of Mexico had been robbed of such States; it was proclaimed that no prisoners should be held, whether civilians or soldiers, and that North Americans over 16 years of age should be put to death; that the Indians of Arizona and other States in the named zone should be invited to join and be given guaranties that the lands which had been taken away from them should be returned, etc.; that the States above, after being declared an independent Republic, should later request annexation to Mexico without reference to what form of government the latter country might have at the time; that independence should be obtained for the negroes, and that they, the negroes, should be aided in obtaining six States of the American Union, which States border upon those mentioned as to be annexed to Mexico, etc.

Of course, this plan soon became known to the authorities of Texas, if not to the authorities of the United States, and was given more or less publicity. It was so fantastic and struck every American as being so childish and ridiculous that no one with ordinary intelligence believed at the time that any responsible Mexican could be cognizant of it, or at least could propose to assist in carrying out the plan.

From the 20th of February, or shortly thereafter, in the year of 1915, up to and following the recognition of Carranza by this Government as de facto president in October, 1915, various attacks were made upon citizens, upon railroads and other property, and upon the Regular United States soldiers stationed along the border and within the State of Texas. Various conflicts occurred, and a large number of Americans were killed, as well as a large number of Mexicans from old Mexico.

It was, of course, well known to the authorities that among the Mexicans who were killed in these attacks there were both soldiers and officers in the Carranza uniform and belonging to the so-called constitutionalist Carranza forces; even yet it was not generally believed that responsible officers in Mexico were aiding or abetting any such movement.

In June, 1916, Secretary of State Lansing, in a message to Mr. Carranza, who had been recognized by this Government prior to that time, called attention to the fact that Carranza soldiers and officers had been engaged in these attacks in Texas, and had even gone to the border upon Carranza trains for the purpose of such attack.

Several indictments were found against various Mexicans in the State and even in the Federal courts of Texas for murder, in what is known as the Arce case, the defendants being convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to death. After an appeal to the highest court of criminal jurisdiction, i. e., the Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas, this case was considered and a comparatively recent decision published in the 202d S. W. Reporter. The court unanimously decided that although the defendant and his companions had killed Oberlies, a corporal in the United States Regular Army, in a night attack upon the soldiers sleeping in their tents at San Ygnacio, that they could not be held for murder because under the evidence in the case they were soldiers in the Carranza Army acting under order of their superior officers, who were commissioned in the Carranza Army; that they were sent from Monterrey and other places in Mexico to carry on war against the United States; that the state of war actually existed; and that these men were doing their duty as soldiers and officers in obedience of orders; that under such circumstances, the state of war existing between Carranza and the United States, these parties, although guilty of killing our soldiers at night, could not be held for murder.

The fact is, as will be shown by evidence in the possession of the committee, that later several Mexicans engaged in carrying out this "Plan of San Diego" were given high commissions by Mr. Carranza, and some of them created, or made, governors of states. Among such men so rewarded were Agustin Garcia, Niceforo Zambrano, and Gen. Nafarrate. Gen. Garcia was afterwards made Attorney General of the Republic of Mexico under the constitutional Government, and is still a high official of that Government.

The trial of the Arce case developed many facts heretofore not understood, but the decision itself has not been given publicity and being of comparatively recent date had not attracted attention which it deserved. Were it not for the fact that conditions similar to those existing in 1915 appeared to be gathering along the border, the committee although after hearing additional evidence, and reading and considering the opinion of the court referred to, were convinced that Carranza had actually carried on a war against the United States while his representatives were seeking recognition at the hands of President Wilson, would have passed the matter by as not bearing directly upon the situation at this crisis. However, at the very moment of closing this investigation of the acts of Carranza in favoring and attempting to carry out the "Plan of San Diego," evidence was brought to the committee not only of the propaganda efforts of the Carranza Government referred to, and of the agitation being carried on by the Carranza consuls and diplomatic agents in this country with the radical revolutionary element in the United States, but further evidence was presented showing that Carranza himself directly was now engaged in assisting in the formulation, or at least with knowledge that plans were being formed similar to those in the "Plan of San Diego" in some respects, and that he was lending Government assistance to the carrying out of such plans, which were again directed to revolutionary effort in the United States, formerly named in the "Plan of San Diego."

The committee has in its possession photostatic copies of two letters sent by V. Carranza, and directed to Aguirre Berlanga, Minister of Gobernacion of Mexico, in one of which he directed pecuniary assistance, etc., to be rendered to two men coming from Texas, who are in Mexico with one Mr. Juan M. Garcia, and in the other letter dated June 14, 1916, Mr. Carranza states to Mr. Berlanga that there are three men—two from Texas. This letter reads as follows:

"V. O.,"

MEXICO, June 14, 1919.

"SEÑOR LIC. MANUEL AGUIRRE BERLANGA,

"ESTEEMED FRIEND: Señor Lino Caballo, bearer of this letter, is the person who, in company with two friends, will bring to you the manifestos and the plan which they desire to put into practice in the State of Texas.

"This plan being very favorable for Mexico, please aid them in every way and give the necessary instructions in the frontier States.

"I remain your affectionate friend,

"V. CARRANZA."

Of course this letter of itself is evidence that Mr. Carranza is ordering the frontier States of Mexico to be prepared to take some action concerning some plan to be carried out in the State of Texas, which plan will be explained and is to be explained by the men introduced by Mr. Carranza to Mr. Berlanga.

Following this or contemporaneous with the receipt by the committee of this photostatic copy, the committee came into possession of the notes of the proceedings of the secret meeting of Lodge 23, an organization of extreme agitators and I. W. W. members in the City of Mexico, held on October 15, 1919.

The notes referred to state that at this meeting on October 15 of Lodge 23 there appeared three delegates, two Americans and one Mexican, who had arrived from the United States, and who claimed that "the society" would be able at the beginning of next November (that is the month of November, 1919 just passed) to call a general strike of all miners and metal workers in the United States; that they have 3,000,000 adherents in that country where they will be able to seize one western and two Atlantic ports; that a large number of American soldiers were preparing to take sides with them, and that they proposed to establish a capital of a reformed Government of the United States in the State of Colorado; that when such revolution was successful, the Mexicans rendering their assistance, the border States which were acquired by the United States under the Treaty of 1848 would be returned to Mexico.

From evidence in its possession the committee is prepared to say that the three men referred to in the minutes of this meeting are the same three men, or at least that the two Texans or Americans were two of the same men referred to by Carranza in his letter of instructions to Berlanga, which is quoted above.

Again this matter would seem preposterous, ridiculous, and so fantastic as of itself to deserve little attention were it not first, for the fact, that it is similar in all essentials to the "Plan of San Diego," which the only judicial tribunal passing upon the question was declared to have been backed or supported by armed forces through a state of war by V. Carranza in 1915; and second, were it not for the fact that the "Plan of San Diego" itself antedating, and this present plan following, were and are in exact line with the note of June 19, 1917, from Zimmerman to Von Eckhart, then ambassador of Germany to Mexico, which among other things, proposed that—

"We (Germany) shall give general financial support (to Mexico) and it is understood that Mexico is to reconquer the lost territory in New Mexico, Texas, and Arizona," and in which Von Eckhart was further instructed to suggest to Mexico that its president, that is V. Carranza, on his own initiative "should communicate with Japan suggesting adherence conditions to this plan and at the same time offer to mediate between Germany and Japan."

In pursuing its line of investigation there came into the hands of the committee a paper which the committee is precluded for very grave reasons from quoting in full, but for the authenticity of which the committee vouches, in which it is stated that a high official of Mexico would communicate to another high official that the "treaty with Japan is coming along," and that the writer is convinced of the great advantage which it would bring Mexico for its national integrity. The committee is also in possession of certain official statements to the effect that great commercial activity might be started in Mexico by reason of the initiative of wealthy Germans, to whom the Mexican Government has the intention of lending its decided support.

The committee may say that these last two matters referred to occurred, or the statements were made as referred to, within the past six months; that they were subsequent to Carranza's introduction of the three men to Berlanga and prior to the meeting of Lodge 23 in Mexico City on October 15.

In its investigation as throwing light upon the attitude and frame of mind of V. Carranza toward the United States and its President, the committee was interested in obtaining authentic copies of other correspondence of V. Carranza, other than that heretofore referred to, and among other things, of a letter, a photostatic copy of the original in Spanish being obtainable here at any moment, of which the following is a translation:

" [Private correspondence of the President of the United Mexican States.]

" MEXICO, D. F., June 29, 1919.

" MISS HERMILA GALINDO,

" Ignacio Ramirez St., No. 6, City.

" ESTEEMED YOUNG LADY: It is necessary that your book, 'The Carranza Doctrine,' be finished in a short time, since I desire that you immediately proceed to write a second part of it, for which purpose I shall shortly send you a 'Bluebook,' which we are about to publish and which will serve to justify the attitude of my government in its systematic hostility toward foreign speculators, especially Americans and English.

" Do not forget my injunction to describe in lively colors the tortuosity of the American policy with relation to our country, causing the figure of Wilson to stand well out as the director of that policy. I also enjoin you to be very careful about the corrections which I have made in the original (manuscript) which you brought me.

" I salute you affectionately,

" V. CARRANZA."

The committee calls attention to the fact that the Bluebook, which can be produced, and which has been heretofore referred to, is mentioned in this letter to Miss Galindo; and also to the statement concerning the attitude of the Government of Mexico, or as Mr. Carranza accurately phrases it, "My government," in its systematic hostility toward foreign speculators, especially Americans and English.

Also the committee calls attention to the direction to Miss Galindo that she describe "in lively colors" the "tortuosity" of the American policy with relation to Mexico, and the direction to cause "the figure of Wilson to stand well out as the director of that policy." It will also be seen that Mr. Carranza is correcting proof as well as directing what shall be said in the book just written and the one to be written by Miss Galindo.

The committee calls attention to the expression with reference to the Wilson policy in Mexico, used by Mr. Carranza, as in direct line with the purposes and statements in the propaganda pamphlet of Arthur Thomson being circulated in this country by Mexico, and to similar statements made in the Carranza Bluebook referred to, and emphasized in Miss Galindo's book, "The Carranza Doctrine," the latter two of which are, as heretofore said, in Spanish, and as declared, for the purposes of impressing upon Latin America the Carranza doctrines and "the tortuosity" of the American policy with relation to Carranza as directed by President Wilson.

The committee has in its possession, and in its files and records, evidences of outrages perpetrated upon Americans for the last few years in Mexico, of the destruction of American property, and of attacks on American life, property, and property rights, convincing it of the determined policy of Mr. Carranza to drive all foreigners, and particularly to drive British and Americans from the Republic of Mexico; in fact, it can be asserted that among many high officials of the Carranza government it is positively stated that the entire policy of the present administration of Mexico is to exclude Americans (although admitting that American investments have built up and civilized the country, and have elevated the Mexican workingman, aiding his condition through the raising of wages and mode of living), for the avowed purposes of retaining for themselves, the governing officials and military clique, at the expense of the working classes, the exploitation and enjoyment of Mexico's resources without reference to the rights of the laboring classes of Mexico.

It is not the purpose of the committee at the present time to attempt further than to report the matters as herein set forth, that same may be considered in connection with the Jenkins case and the other pending serious controversies with Mexico, which Mr. Carranza has declared would mean war if the United States enforced its protest; that the committee may be justified in the eyes of the Senate in recommending, as it has recommended, the breaking off of the relations with Mexico, and the withdrawal of recognition from Carranza.

While it is generally understood that de jure as well as de facto recognition has been given Carranza by this Government, an examination of the documents communicated to Carranza immediately prior to his supposed de jure recognition will disclose that such recognition was made with the statement that Carranza was expected to do certain things, or to cause certain things to be done, which he neither did, nor caused to be done, and which he yet refuses to do, or to cause to be done.

As to a precedent for the withdrawal of recognition of Carranza, it may be said that the United States has been making precedents with relation to Costa Rica, Mexico, Nicaragua, and other Latin-American countries, particularly within the last seven years, and attention may be called to the withdrawal of recognition by President Taft of the Nicaraguan Government a few years since.

The attention of the President was also called specifically to certain acts of the Mexican Government of very recent date in connection with the stoppage of operations by American oil companies in Mexico upon their own lands, and that such action by the Mexican Government was in direct contravention of the distinct warnings of this Government repeatedly that such action should not be taken by Mexico.

It may be well to add to the foregoing the further statement, viz: The committee has identified at least two of the men mentioned in the Carranza letters of June 14, and of August 19.

The committee has also identified one of the agents who was to come from New York to Laredo to support revolutionary doctrine, etc. This particular man is in the secret service of Mexico under Aguirre Berlanga.

The committee also has the evidence as to what took place at Bisbee, Ariz., when the Mexican I. W. W., cooperating with other radical I. W. W., threatened the peace of that town and were deported. It was stated in the hearing before W. B. Wilson, and the President's other mediators, that these Mexicans were largely Villa followers, and had arms in the Ajo Mountains which they proposed to use in the revolution at Bisbee. The committee has information leading it to believe that at least one of the men deported was in Mexico City on October 15, and at the secret meeting of Lodge 23 of that date.

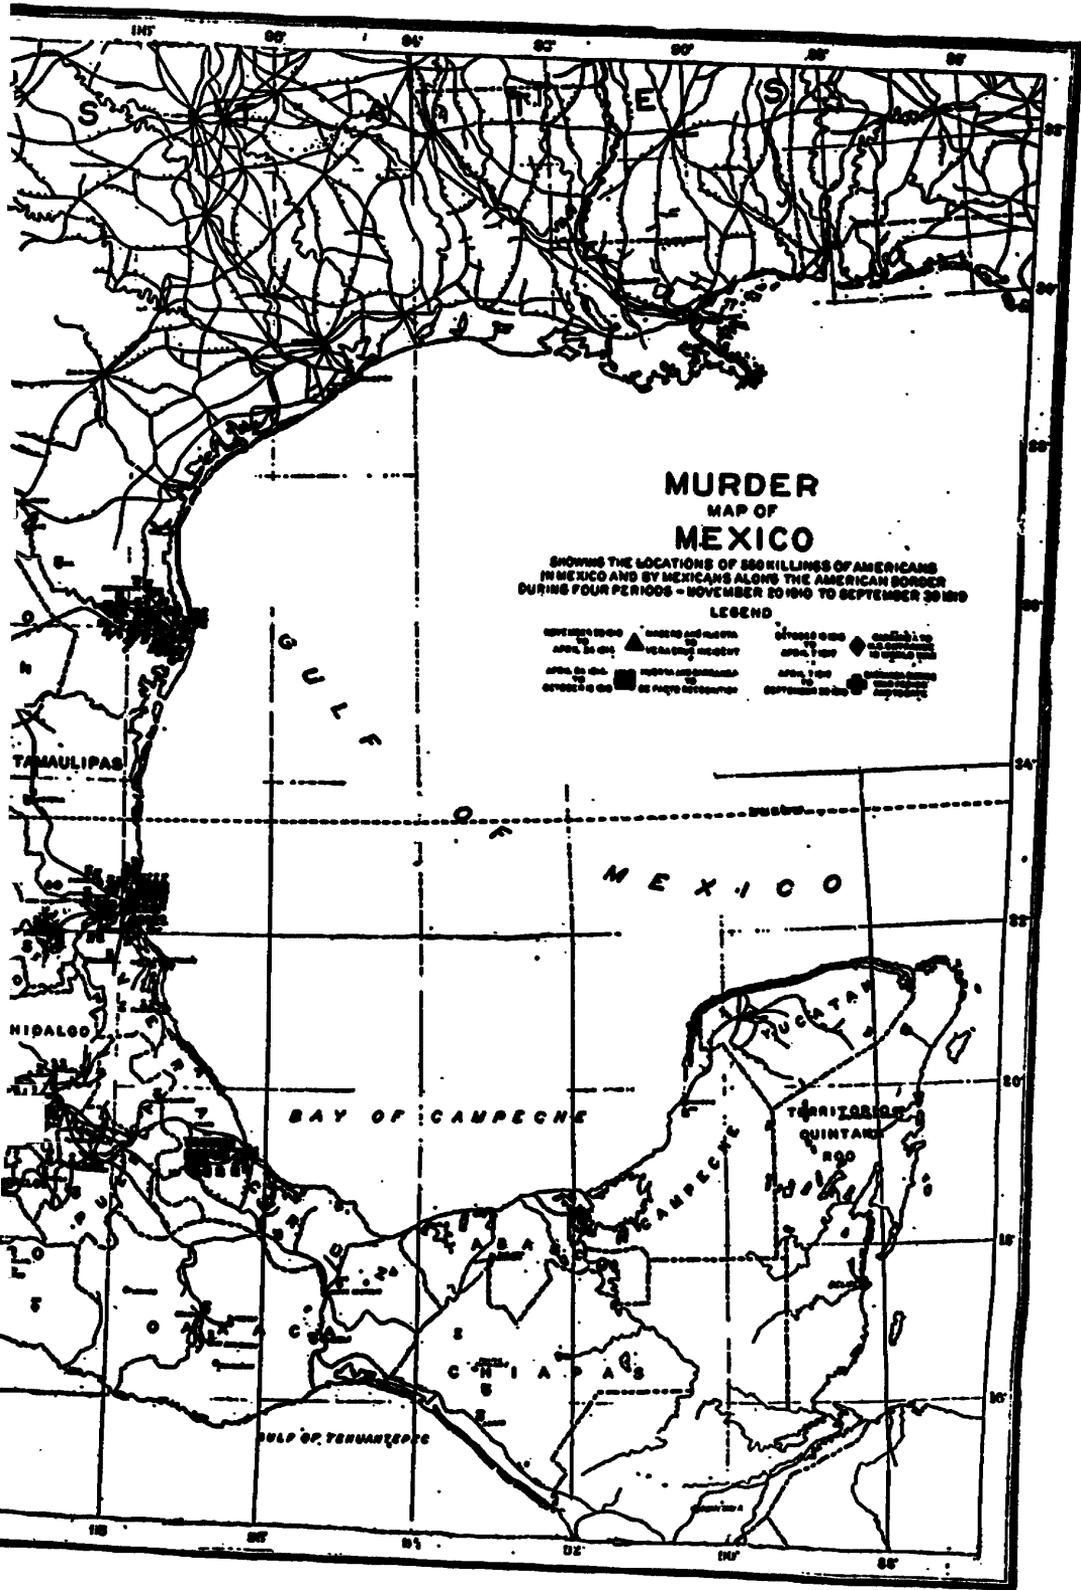

The committee knows who Lino Caballo and Juan M. Garcia are, and are fairly familiar with their activities. We desire to say most emphatically that we are not attempting to give publicity to any portion of a great mass of evidence of outrages upon Americans, destruction of American property, incompetence and inability of the so-called Mexican Government, nor touching upon any matters of this character in this merely preliminary report and statement calling attention to matters of particular interest and moment at this immediate time.

The President, having declared his conception of his duty and having stated that he would further familiarize himself with the facts, the responsibility, of course, now rests upon him. Meantime the committee will continue its very interesting, and we hope, profitable investigations.

Respectfully submitted,

ALBERT B. FALL,
Chairman Subcommittee.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., December 29, 1919, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate:

TESTIMONY OF EDWARD R. SARTWELL.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please state your full name.

Mr. SARTWELL. Edward R. Sartwell.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your present address?

Mr. SARTWELL. My home address is 217 T Street NE., Washington, D. C.

Mr. KEARFUL. And your business address?

Mr. SARTWELL. My business address is 320 Kellogg Building, Washington, D. C.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your profession, Mr. Sartwell?

Mr. SARTWELL. At the present time, a publicity agent.

Mr. KEARFUL. With what concern are you connected?

Mr. SARTWELL. I am connected with the National Association for the Protection of American Rights in Mexico, in their Washington office.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have furnished the committee with a map [see opposite page] entitled "Murder Map of Mexico," showing the location of 550 killings of Americans in Mexico and by Mexicans along the American border during four periods covering the period from November 20, 1910, to October, 1919. Will you please explain the theory of this map and how and from what data it was prepared?

Mr. SARTWELL. This map represents by symbols the location and the approximate date of 550 killings of American citizens during the period indicated. The deaths are indicated by four symbols; the first, a triangle, indicates a killing in the period November 20, 1910, to April 24, 1914. This period represents the period of Madero and Huerta control in Mexico; that is, it covers the revolutionary period from the beginning of the Madero revolution to the time that the Vera Cruz incident began the downfall of the Huerta revolutionary government.

The second period, represented on the map by a square, covers the date from April 24, 1914, to October 19, 1915. This period covers the final dissolution of the Huerta government and the accession of the Carranza government to the period when Carranza was recognized as the de facto head of the Mexican Government by the United States.

The third period, which is represented on the map by a diamond, covers the time from October 19, 1915, to April 7, 1917. This period covers the Carranza régime in Mexico prior to the entrance of the United States into the World War.

The fourth period, which includes the dates from April 7, 1917, to September 30, 1919, covers the Carranza régime during the time the United States was engaged in the World War to the last date mentioned.

The recapitulation accompanying the map shows the number of American civilians and the members of the United States military forces killed in each period and classifies these killings as to their location in Mexico or along the border. This recapitulation shows that during the first period, covering 41 months under the Madero and Huerta régime, 147 American civilians and 2 members of the military forces of the United States were killed in Mexico and that 18 civilians were killed in the United States by Mexicans.

This is a total of 167 Americans killed during this period.

During the second period 17 civilians and 21 members of the military forces of the United States were killed in Mexico and 13 civilians and 15 members of the United States military forces were killed in the United States by Mexicans.

During the third period 83 civilians and 28 members of the United States military forces were killed in Mexico and 19 civilians and 33 members of the United States military forces were killed in the United States by Mexicans.

The fourth period, 58 American civilians and 8 members of the United States military forces were killed in Mexico and 12 American civilians and 16 members of the United States military forces were killed by Mexicans in the United States.

During the 53 months represented by the second, third, and fourth periods, or the period of Carranza responsibility in Mexico, 218 American civilians and 57 members of the United States military forces were killed in Mexico, and 44 American civilians and 64 of the United States military forces were killed in the United States by Mexicans, making a total of 383 killings for these three periods. The total killings for the period covered by the map are 550.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please state from what sources you obtained this information.

Mr. SARTWELL. This map was prepared in the Washington office of the National Association for the Protection of American Rights in Mexico under the direction of Mr. J. P. Annin, Washington representative of the association, who is at present absent on account of illness. The list upon which the map is based is a compilation which coordinates the following authoritative lists of Americans killed in Mexico:

The Fall list, which was submitted to the Senate by Senator Albert B. Fall, of New Mexico, on March 9, 1914, and which was published in full in the New York Times of March 10, 1914. Three lists prepared by the State Department, the first, known as the Lansing list, appearing in Senate Document No. 324, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, dated February 17, 1916; the second, called the State Department list, which appears in Senate Document No. 67, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, dated July 31, 1919, and the third, called the Fletcher list, which was submitted to the House Rules Committee on July 22, 1919, by Ambassador Fletcher, and which appeared in the reports of the proceedings of that committee. A list of Americans killed in Mexico, which appears in the book Mexico Under Carranza, by Thomas E. Gibbon, page 248, et seq; a list called "Gibbon Revised," which is a revised list prepared by Thomas E. Gibbon; the casualty lists of the War Department covering the entire period excepting between October 1, 1916, and February 14, 1917; information in the New York Times newspaper on the dates mentioned in the tabulation and, finally, letters, claims, and other information of a specific character in the possession of the National Association for the Protection of American Rights in Mexico which are now in the files of that association at 347 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was especial care exercised to make the list as full and complete for the period mentioned as possible and to avoid all duplications?

Mr. SARTWELL. Especial care was necessarily taken to avoid all duplications. The lists as I have given them to you in many cases show duplications. All of those lists are incomplete, and in some cases cover only a small part of the period which is covered by the map. In preparing the map the greatest care was exercised to avoid these duplications. Wherever it could be reasonably established that names on two or more of the lists were duplicates they were omitted. In five cases there seemed to be a reasonable doubt as to the duplication and these five cases have been included on the map with a note in the tabulation accompanying each of the five instances showing that they may be duplications and referring to the other cases which would show the possible duplication.

Mr. KEARFUL. I notice that each symbol on the map is accompanied by a number and that the tabulation which you have mentioned and submitted contains the names of the victims opposite each number with a citation of the place where the killing occurred, a brief statement descriptive of the killing and a reference to the particular authority from which the item was taken.

Mr. SARTWELL. Yes; that tabulation also includes the approximate date of each killing.

Mr. KEARFUL. The tabulation which shows on its face in brief from the data to which you have been testifying will be received and placed in the record at this point.

NOTES.

[Authorities.]

Gibbon : Mexico Under Carranza, by Thomas E. Gibbon, 1919, p. 248, et seq.

Gibbon revised : Revised list prepared by Thomas E. Gibbon.

Fall : List of Americans killed in Mexico read in the Senate by Hon. Albert B. Fall, of New Mexico, Mar. 9, 1914.

State : This reference includes the three following lists. In some instances murders attributed to "State" appear on two or all of these lists: List prepared in the United States Department of State and printed in Senate Document No. 324, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, Feb. 17, 1916; list prepared in the United States Department of State and printed in Senate Document No. 67, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, July 31, 1919; list prepared in the Department of State and submitted to the House Committee on Rules by Hon. Henry P. Fletcher, United States Ambassador to Mexico, July 22, 1919. Cf. Part I, printed hearings on House Joint Resolution 124, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session.

War : Casualty lists of War Department covering entire period excepting between Oct. 1, 1916, and Feb. 14, 1917.

New York Times : Information in the New York Times (newspaper) in dates indicated in the tabulation.

Naparin : Letters, claims, and other information of a specific character in the files of the National Association for the Protection of American Rights in Mexico, 347 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

One officer and 20 enlisted men, carried without names, and not included in the War Department casualty lists, are referred to in the report of The Adjutant General of the Army, 1917. They are presumed to have been killed in the period Oct. 1, 1916, to Feb. 14, 1917, for which no more specific information as to Army Mexican casualties is available.

Apx : Accompanying symbol or group of symbols indicates that the cartographer was unable to more than approximate the locality in the State in which the murder was committed.

There are indexed on the map five murders which may be duplications. In each of these cases the possible duplication is indicated in an accompanying note.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you more complete data than that which is shown on the tabulation which you can leave with the committee for the purpose of verification if necessary?

Mr. SARTWELL. The tabulation was made up from a loose-leaf index compiled from the various lists which I have mentioned. This index is in somewhat more complete and extended form than the tabulation which I have placed in the record. It shows as to each case the name of the victim, the number as shown in the tabulation, the location of the killing, the date approximately, and wherever possible the person or persons responsible for the killing. It also shows in each case the list or lists which are authority for each killing. In many cases this loose-leaf index gives a rather complete account of the killing and of the circumstances surrounding it.

Mr. KEARFUL. What information have you with reference to killings occurring since the date when the map was completed?

Mr. SARTWELL. Since the map was completed we have come into possession of information as to the death of Eugene Lack at El Centro, Calif., November 18, 1919, after he had been shot by a Mexican policeman at Mexicali, just across the border in Mexico. This brought the death list up to 551.

Mr. KEARFUL. What, if anything further, have you to say in explanation of the matters to which you have heretofore testified that would be of interest?

Mr. SARTWELL. In 3 of the 550 cases listed on the map the authorities cited reported the punishment of those charged with the murder. For the murder of Mrs. Anderson, her daughter, and an American boy in Chihuahua on June 22, 1911, the murderers served six months in prison and were then released.

The Madero authorities executed two Mexicans for the murder of W. H. Waite, who was killed at Ochotal, Vera Cruz, on April 4, 1912. A Huerta lieutenant and sergeant were reported executed for the killing of Frank Smith at Tampico on January 26, 1914.

The map shows the killings of 18 American women and 10 American children. Thirteen American men are listed as having been killed in their efforts to protect women.

In connection with the deaths listed 8 American women, according to the authorities cited, were outraged.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were any punishments visited upon the perpetrators of these murders and outrages during the period covering the régime of Carranza?

Mr. SARTWELL. None. The three cases where punishments were reported were prior to January 26, 1914.

There is one significant incident shown on the map. On May 30, 1918, Gustave A. Whiteford, an American citizen, was killed, presumably by bandits, in the State of Nayarit. He was carried off and held for ransom, and a finger cut off from one of his hands was sent to his friends with the demand for money. Repeated attempts were made to steal the ransom payments which were delivered to the bandits by his friends, and Whiteford was finally murdered in cold blood after the ransom had been paid in full. The authorities cited declare that the whole Whiteford incident was planned by German alien enemies who sought to hamper or distract the United States in its prosecution of the World War. The story of Whiteford's death was suppressed in the United States while the World War was on.

Mr. KEARFUL. By whom was it suppressed?

Mr. SARTWELL. It was suppressed by the Committee on Public Information, which at that time was in charge of all publicity matters for the Government—at the request of the Committee on Public Information under the voluntary censorship agreement with the press of the United States.

It might be said that in numerous instances the murders were attended by great brutality and in many cases by torture and mutilation as, for instance, William Bishop, Carl Eck, and William Spencer, who were killed by bandits under Jose Perez at Temosachic, Chihuahua, in 1914, were dragged to death by wild horses.

John Glenn Parmenter at Guadalajara, Jalisco, was murdered by bandits who, after killing him, tore his teeth from his head to secure the gold fillings.

Maurice McDonald, an American soldier of fortune who was with Villa, was captured by Carrancistas at San Pedro de las Colonias, Coahuila, in April, 1914. The soles of his feet were cut off and he was forced to walk about the plaza. He was then burned at the stake until his legs had been completely consumed. Finally he was shot.

In many instances the men killed carried American passports and in various instances men were killed after the United States learning that they were held by Mexican factions or bandits had protested against their detention.

When James S. Beard was captured by Mexican revolutionists under Gen. Benjamin Argumedo at Parras, Coahuila, May 11, 1914, he produced his American passport. Argumedo ordered the passport pinned to Beard's breast and used as mark by the firing squad that executed him on the spot.

In many cases the authorities cited assert that the men were killed because they were Americans or because the murderer wished to show that he could kill an American with impunity.

Mr. KEARFUL. I understand you have not included in this list the murders of the nationals of any other country than the United States?

Mr. SARTWELL. That is correct. The list includes only nationals of the United States in cases where the nationality could be clearly and plainly established.

Mr. KEARFUL. In that connection for the record I will quote from a report by Secretary Lansing, dated December 3, 1919, to the President and submitted by the President to the Senate (S. Doc. No. 165, 66th Cong., 2d sess.), in which Secretary Lansing states that—

The number of nationals of other countries than the United States who have been killed in Mexico since President Diaz resigned, as gathered from reports of the representatives of this Government in Mexico, is 927, as follows: Chinese, 471; Spanish, 209; Arabs, 111; British, 38; Italian, 16; French, 14; Japanese, 10; miscellaneous, 58.

In this connection it is of interest to note the large number of Chinese and Americans killed and the small number of British, French, and Japanese, and also that no Germans are reported to have been killed.

For the record I also will quote from a letter from the Acting Secretary of State to the chairman of this committee, dated October 31, 1919, in which he says:

I have the honor to inform you that reports received by this department from all the consulates in Mexico show that approximately 31,707 American citizens were in Mexico when President Diaz retired from the presidency of that country, and that approximately 8,862 American citizens were in Mexico in September, 1919.

Is there anything further, Mr. Sartwell?

Mr. SARTWELL. There is one question of the War Department casualty list of officers and men killed on the border that might be cleared up. The casualty lists do not list men apparently who were killed on the border or in Mexico between the dates October 1, 1916, and February 14, 1917, but on inquiry at the War Department our association discovered that The Adjutant General's office report for August, 1917, showed 1 officer and 20 enlisted men killed during the period from July 1, 1916, to June 30, 1917. These 21 unnamed members of the military forces have been included on the map and may be in some part duplications. They rest, however, upon the authority of a letter to the association from R. I. McKenney, lieutenant colonel of the General Staff, dated August 22, 1919.

I want to say that this material has all been submitted to the State Department for the information of the department.

Is there anything else you want to ask?

Mr. KEARFUL. I think not. We are much obliged to you.

(Witness excused.)

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM J. MCGAVOCK.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you state your full name?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. William J. McGavock.

Mr. KEARFUL. How old are you?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. Seventy.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long have you been acquainted with Mexico?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. Since 1881.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was your business in Mexico?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. Railroad contractor.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what parts of the country?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. Why, pretty much all over it. I commenced first at Laredo, then to Monterrey, and up the Tampico branch of the Central, then as far down as the Isthmus of Tehuantepec.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you one of those American citizens about whom we have often heard who went to Mexico for the purpose of exploiting the Mexican peons?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. I suppose I am.

Mr. KEARFUL. We have sometimes heard from high official quarters that Americans operating in Mexico were not entitled to the protection of this Government or to any special consideration, because they went to that country and were engaged in exploiting the natives of that country to the detriment of the natives and for their own particular benefits. What can you say on that subject?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. Well, my idea is that we were there to build it up and not exploit them—build up their country. We built their railroads, and we opened their mines—a great many of them—introduced the modern improvements in the mines there.

Mr. KEARFUL. According to your observation, what has been the effect upon the laboring classes of Mexico of the enterprise of Americans and other foreign capitalists who operated there?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. When I first went to Mexico the Mexican peons on the haciendas were being paid from 1½ reales to 3 reales. (real=12½ cents) a day, and now they are getting from $2.50 to $3 a day; that is, in parts of the country; that is, the parts exploited by Americans. In their tobacco district they are paying $3 a day to-day.

Mr. KEARFUL. What, if any, material progress have you noted among the Mexicans due to the operations of foreign enterprise in Mexico?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. The peon classes are very much improved over what they originally were; they live better, and they dress better, and they have some education; they have been able to send their children to school, being able to make more money, and not having to work their children when they are too young.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the attitude of the laboring classes toward American and other foreign operators in Mexico as compared with their attitude toward Mexicans by whom they are employed?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. Very favorable to the Americans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do they prefer to work for Americans than for their own people?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. They prefer to work for Americans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever hear of any complaints made by Mexicans as to the treatment accorded to Mexicans by American employers?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. I never did.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you never hear complaints by Mexicans that Americans treated their employees too well and gave them too much liberty?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. Yes; I have heard something of that, that they objected to them treating them so well and raising their wages. In fact, the hacendados were very much opposed to our building railroads there for that very reason. We paid the peons better wages and got them away from the haciendas.

I suppose you know when peonage was abolished by the constitution they had a labor law that they could hold them for debt, which amounted to the same thing as peonage. As long as a man was in debt to his employer he was a peon.

Mr. KEARFUL. And the idea is when the Americans came in and gave them an opportunity to get out of debt they could release themselves from this peonage system?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And that actually happened?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. And that actually happened in a great many instances.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long has it been since you were in Mexico?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. I left there on the 24th of November, 1919, I guess it was.

Mr. KEARFUL. I have here a propaganda pamphlet very recently issued by the League of Free Nations Association, of New York City, which contains among other things a letter to the Evening Post, dated November 26, 1919, by G. B. Winton, a minister of the gospel, who says:

I spent this recent October in Mexico. The country is prosperous and at peace.

And again:

On the basis of personal knowledge I assert again that Mexico is prosperous, and, except in a few retired and unimportant sections, peaceful.

What can you say with reference to the assertion that the country is prosperous and at peace?

Mr. McGAVOCK. It is not true; it is neither prosperous nor at peace.

Mr. KEARFUL. What portion of Mexico has recently come under your observation in reference to that point?

Mr. McGAVOCK. The State of Chiapas and the State of Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please give a description of the conditions in Mexico as you observed them, with reference to the state of prosperity and peace.

Mr. McGAVOCK. Shall I state about Chiapas first?

Mr. KEARFUL. If you please.

Mr. McGAVOCK. As there are very few Americans there it will probably be more interesting to you. I got to Jalisco on the Pan American Road on the 1st of November, 1917. I wanted to go into the interior to Tuxtla Gutierrez, but they would not let me leave until an escort went with the mail. I stayed four days in Jalisco for the escort and we started out at noon on the 4th of November. That night we camped with the escort. By the way, we all went in oxcarts. I was going to buy a horse there to ride through but I was advised not to do so as the rebels might take it away from me, so we went in oxcarts. With the escort I counted 83 oxcarts, some loaded and some empty; principally loaded.

The second night we camped again with the escort but many of the carts, especially the heavily loaded ones, were scattered out probably for 10 miles back and only a few of us kept up with the escort. At 11.40 at night the carters woke us up and said that the escort had left. We got a cup of coffee and left as quick as we could after the escort, but we never overtook them and we traveled all night, leaving the direct road and taking a cut-off, and at 9 o'clock in a little town where we spent the day we got a report that the carts had been held up and robbed behind us and behind the escort. The escort got through and we got through without being molested, but there were 39 of the carts robbed of all their goods. The bandits had a pack train and packed away all the goods they could.

From Jalisco to Tuxtla Gutierrez is 132 kilometers through a very rich country. The first day after crossing a range of mountains we got into very beautiful valleys which were highly cultivated and very rich. Every 4 or 5 miles there would be a big hacienda with probably 50 to 100 peon houses, a fine hacienda residence and peon houses all well built and all tile roofed, but we found every one deserted. Occasionally there would be one or two peon families in some of the houses, but the owners were all gone, every one of them.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the condition of the houses?

Mr. McGAVOCK. The houses were not destroyed. The furniture was taken but the houses themselves were not destroyed.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the condition of the fields?

Mr. McGAVOCK. The fields were none of them cultivated. There were a good many fields of henequen there gone to seed, the stalks were growing up 30 or 40 feet high.

Mr. KEARFUL. Henequen is a crop which needs constant attention and careful cutting in order to get the best results?

Mr. McGAVOCK. Yes; it has to be cut at the proper time. Three years previous to that the Chiapanecos had not been in revolution at all; they did not join the Madero revolution or the Huerta revolution; they went on and paid their taxes and attended to their business and, in fact, they do not consider themselves real Mexicans, but Chiapanecos. They were an independent State at one time and they never amalgamated freely with the Mexicans. I have heard many of them say they were not Mexicans, they were Chiapanecos.

Carranza sent an army down there of 3,000 or 4,000 men, raided these haciendas, drove the hacendados into the mountains, afterwards caught some of them, and some they hung and some they shot, which drove their friends into revolution. When they reached Tuxtla Gutierrez the first thing they did was to tear down the church. There was a beautiful church on the plaza. They tore off the roof and tore out one side. They desecrated the churches in the other large cities, but did not tear them down, I understand. In that way they drove all the people to revolution. But the trouble with them is they don't act in harmony. There are three or four different bands there. If they would join together, they could very soon drive the Carrancistas out, but they don't. There are three or four different bands there operating separately. There is one leader there—Caly Mayor—who took an American dentist—Dr. Carl Sturgis—prisoner while I was down there; took him and his wife and mother-in-law, Americans, and I understood from a Frenchman who had met them that they were from Virginia, but that I am not sure of. I understand he first tortured them; he thought they had some hidden money; tried to make them give up the money, and afterwards took them to camp. The first day they walked them on foot and they gave out, and the second day they gave them some old horses to ride and took them to their camp, and, as far as I know, Sturgis is there yet. I saw a small article in a paper some months ago that Mrs. Sturgis had got away and was on her way to the States, and had reported that her mother had died of starvation and deprivation in the camp and her husband was still there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mrs. Sturgis is here in Washington and will appear before the committee.

Mr. MCGAVOCK. She is here?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes. What condition did you observe in the City of Mexico?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. In Mexico City everything is quiet and apparently normal there. One in the city would not realize there was any trouble. The people act there in the natural way.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of business is being conducted in Mexico City?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. The usual business, on a small scale.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it the sort of business that is necessary to supply the needs of the inhabitants?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. Supply the needs of the people, that is all; yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there a large population in Mexico City now?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. Very large.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the reason for that?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. People coming in from the haciendas and the small towns. In fact, nearly all the best people of Chiapas are up there. Nearly all the hacendados have moved their families to the City of Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that because of lack of protection in the outlying districts?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. Because of lack of protection on the haciendas and in the small towns they flocked to Mexico City for protection. The population is about double the normal.

Mr. KEARFUL. These refugees from the outlying districts are not engaged in any business in Mexico City, are they?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. No, sir; just living there. That makes business very good for many of the retail houses there, because they have all got money.

Mr. KEARFUL. We frequently hear that American capitalists and American interests in Mexico have engaged in a conspiracy to force armed intervention in Mexico by the United States. Have you had occasion to note the sentiments of Americans operating in Mexico with reference to intervention by this country? If so, please state what you have observed.

Mr. MCGAVOCK. The majority of Americans in Mexico, in my opinion, would rather see some settlement without intervention if it can be done. They do not want intervention. If matters can be settled in any other way they do not want intervention, but few of us can see how they are going to settle it without intervention.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your opinion as to the method of settlement that will be necessary?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. My opinion is it never can be settled without intervention.

Mr. KEARFUL. When you say intervention, just what do you mean?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. Well, I mean intervention by the United States or by a combination of powers; armed intervention.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you mean that it will be necessary to take over the country and establish peace and order and effective and stable government by the Mexicans?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. I believe what should be done, what eventually will be done, that the United States, or the United States combined with the allied countries, will send forces in there and do somewhat like they did in Cuba, settle the country; settle the bandit question first, which could be easily done now. With our aeroplanes and everything of that kind we can soon rout out the bandits that used to hide in the mountains and give so much trouble. But the only thing those people would respect is strength, and you have got to show them the strength before you can ever conquer them.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you find the feeling to be among Mexicans by reason of the policy of this Government in failing to protect its citizens in Mexico?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. Well, the upper class of Mexicans are very anxious for intervention.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you find any feeling of hostility toward Americans among Mexicans in general, and, if so, to what was that due?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. The resentment against Americans in general was due to the intervention of the United States, armed intervention, as far as it went, and no good only to aggravate the people; the landing at Vera Cruz and the Pershing expedition into Mexico. It only aggravated the people and made them very bitter toward Americans. Up to the time of the Vera Cruz incident there was no personal feeling—there has always been a general feeling against the Americans ever since the war of 1847, but individual feeling, no.

Mr. KEARFUL. How do you account for the sentiment among the better class of Mexicans in favor of intervention?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. Why, they fail to see where they can ever get a stable government from the people that are now armed in Mexico. You understand there is a very small per cent of the Mexicans there controlling the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. What class of Mexicans is it that controls the country?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. Well, it is what you might call the middle class, those with a little education but not much as a rule.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are they the best class in Mexico?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. By no means.

Mr. KEARFUL. Why is it, if you know, that the better class of Mexicans have not been able to control the country?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. Well, that is a very hard question to answer. In the beginning, those that control the army control the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that the American support of Villa and Carranza had anything to do with it?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. No; I don't think so. If it had not been them it would have been somebody else. You must consider that Mexico now is in a normal condition; it was abnormal during the time of Diaz. They had peace during thirty-odd years, but prior to Diaz's time in 60 years they had 61 Presidents and 2 Emperors. I believe that is the record and they are trying to break it now and they certainly will if this condition lasts for another 50 years.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do not consider it likely that another régime such as that of Porfirio Diaz might be established in Mexico?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. It might be possible that another man would appear like Porfirio Diaz, but it took a long time to find him—about 400 years. And even if Porfirio Diaz lived to-day it might be very hard for him to control it, because the conditions are so different than they were in his day.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there anything further of interest that you think of?

Mr. MCGAVOCK. No; I do not think of anything.

Mr. KEARFUL. We are very much obliged to you.

(Whereupon, at 3.25 o'clock p. m. the committee adjourned to Tuesday, December 30, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.)

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., December 30, 1919, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate:

TESTIMONY OF MICHAEL J. SMITH.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please state your full name.

Mr. SMITH. Michael J. Smith.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your present address?

Mr. SMITH. 27 Cedar Street, New York.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your business?

Mr. SMITH. Hemp merchant.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have been requested to come before the committee investigating Mexican affairs for the purpose of giving a picture of the conditions that have existed in Yucatan with special reference to the hemp industry from the beginning of that industry up to the present time. Will you proceed with the statement in your own way with relation to that subject and then I will ask you some questions as you proceed.

Mr. SMITH. Yucatan is one of the States of the Mexican Republic with a population of about 300,000 and an area of about 22,000 square miles; its capital is Merida, with a population of about 60,000.

Yucatan is a sterile country; its soil is unable to produce anything in large quantity with the exception of henequen.

Henequen was first exported from Yucatan to the United States in about 1864 or 1865, but the industry did not assume large proportions until about 1880, when henequen fiber was brought into use for the purpose of the manufacture of binder twine. From 1880 onward the industry developed rapidly, due to the increase in the consumption of henequen in the grain binders. The price of the fiber averaged from 2½ cents a pound to about 6 cents per pound in New York.

The people in Yucatan were rather primitive. Their mode of living was not elaborate, and the price which they obtained for their henequen was sufficient to enable them to prosper gradually.

In 1898, when the Spanish-American War broke out, the price of fiber advanced rapidly. The supplies of Manila hemp were interrupted on account of the war conditions in the Philippine Islands, and that caused an advance in the price of henequen to about 10 or 12 cents a pound. That sudden advance in the price brought great wealth to Yucatan and it immediately took first rank among the Mexican States.

Shortly after 1900 the State of Yucatan showed very rapid strides in education, sanitation, and in the general improvement in the well being of the people. That very high price, which was high at that time, brought about a boom in Yucatan and the usual consequences of a boom followed, so that there were from 1907 until 1911 a few mild panics brought about by speculation and overextension not only by the banks but by various commercial firms.

MR. KEARFUL. What has been the condition in Yucatan during the period you speak of with reference to order and stable government?

MR. SMITH. There never was any disorder in Yucatan during that period. They are law-abiding people; they obey the laws. Life and property were as safe in Yucatan during that period as they would be in the United States.

MR. KEARFUL. Did they join the revolution against Porfirio Diaz?

MR. SMITH. They did not.

MR. KEARFUL. Did they submit to the rule of Madero?

MR. SMITH. Yes; just as soon as any change was brought about in the government in Mexico City the central Government would send its representative or would appoint a governor to rule Yucatan and the Yucatan people accepted each of the various governors which the succeeding factions which obtained control in Mexico City would send them. They made no resistance to any of them; they accepted Huerta, and they accepted Madero, and they accepted Carranza.

MR. KEARFUL. Has that attitude of the people of Yucatan ever changed?

MR. SMITH. It did change in 1915. Carranza sent as his first governor to Yucatan a man named Eleuterio Avila, who arrived in Yucatan the latter part of 1914. The Yucatan people accepted Gov. Avila's régime without exception.

His first act was to impose forced loans on the planters and merchants of Yucatan for several million pesos. These forced loans were promptly paid and went to the Carrancista treasury. In a short time, however, political jealousy broke out among the Carrancistas and Avila was recalled to Mexico City. Gen. Toribio de los Santos was appointed by Carranza as acting governor in place of Avila. De los Santos ruled Yucatan in such a manner as to arouse the hostility of the people of the State. He made arrests of the leading citizens, exacted further payments of moneys, and was guilty of outrages on the inhabitants, which brought matters to a head in about six weeks after he went into power.

In February, 1915, a small uprising occurred in one of the interior towns, and De los Santos sent Col. Abel Ortiz Argumedo to suppress the movement. Argumedo, however, when he arrived at the point of disorder immediately joined the rebels and sent word back to De los Santos that he would march on Merida and drive De los Santos out of the country. De los Santos fled to Campeche, and Argumedo entered Merida and took possession of the State capital and the government of the State.

The citizens were much relieved at being rid of De los Santos and welcomed the Argumedo régime, feeling that it promised them relief from the outrages which De los Santos had been perpetrating. They had no idea of breaking away from the Carranza Government, and they organized a meeting in the palace at Merida at which they drew up a message to Carranza advising him that the uprising was not directed in any way against his Government but was due to the outrages of De los Santos. They promised adherence to the Carranza Government, offered to continue payment of taxes and duties as theretofore, and merely asked to be allowed to name their own governor or to have Carranza send them a governor who would not treat them in a brutal manner. Carranza never replied to the message, but he sent Gen. Salvador Alvarado with 7,000 or 8,000 troops to Yucatan to wrest possession of the government from Argumedo.

Alvarado and his army landed at Campeche and marched from Campeche into Yucatan. Alvarado sent announcements ahead of him saying that he would come into Merida through blood and fire, and caused such a state of terror in the city of Merida that many of the Yucatecos who had the means of getting away left before Alvarado's arrival. They left in freight boats, sailing vessels, or any other means of conveyance they could find.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please describe what he did to carry out his doctrine of blood and fire.

Mr. SMITH. When he approached the center of the State he encountered a small unorganized army of young men of Yucatan who had been sent out to resist his advance. Alvarado's army was well equipped and had little or no difficulty in defeating them and capturing a great many of them. He lined up the prisoners and shot them down, although after the slaughter had proceeded a short time he pardoned those who had not already been killed.

Mr. KEARFUL. What acts of violence did he commit, if any?

Mr. SMITH. At that time?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. That was the only act of violence except the usual things which happen when an army is on the march.

Mr. KEARFUL. I will ask you to go back now and describe the henequen situation and the means that had been established before the Carrancista invasion to regulate that industry.

Mr. SMITH. The henequen industry was established on a very solid and profitable basis. The panics which I mentioned as having occurred in 1907 and 1911 created merely temporary setbacks, but the State whose only product, or whose only source of revenue, was henequen, became one of the richest States in the Republic of Mexico. At the time of Alvarado's entry into Yucatan it was the richest State in the Republic of Mexico. The planters received an average price of about 5½ cents per pound for their fiber. That price was delivered at New York. At that price they prospered and were peaceful and contented.

There were various buyers and exporters of henequen in Yucatan and have been ever since the foundation of the industry up until 1915, when Alvarado drove them all out.

When Alvarado reached Merida his first act was to seize the railways of the State, and he operated them from that time until the time of his departure.

In 1912, shortly after the inauguration of the first military governor, who was Nicolas Camara Vales, an organization was made of various henequen planters in conjunction with the government of the State. This organization was named the Comision Reguladora del Comercio del Henequen.

Mr. KEARFUL. Commonly known as the Reguladora?

Mr. SMITH. Commonly known as the Reguladora. The purpose of that organization was to regulate the henequen industry—that is to say, that when in the operation of the law of supply and demand any large accumulation of henequen took place the Reguladora was to take this accumulation off the market and hold it until such time as the demand caught up with the supply. The governor of Yucatan was always president ex-officio of the Reguladora. The Reguladora functioned with more or less success but played no important part in the commercial or economic life of Yucatan.

When Alvarado assumed power in 1915 he assumed charge of the Reguladora, appointed his own board of directors, and gave notice that he was to arrange that the Reguladora would be the only institution or firm allowed to deal in henequen in Yucatan. Following out this policy, he ordered his director of the railways to refuse to transport any henequen shipped by anybody except to the consignment of the Reguladora. This brought about a state of chaos, generally, as the planters were suspicious of the Reguladora, did not care to do business with it, and preferred to continue doing as they had been doing.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it possible for them to market their product without opportunity to use the railway transportation?

Mr. SMITH. It was not possible because naturally none of the buyers would buy henequen in the interior. It was necessary that the henequen should be at the coast, otherwise it was worthless. There were about 60,000 bales of henequen held in the various interior points awaiting shipment to the coast. That quantity was owned by American interests and they had great difficulty in moving it. They appealed to the United States Government, and it was only after the greatest pressure had been applied that Alvarado permitted the hemp to come to the ports.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the system inaugurated by Alvarado for the control of the Reguladora?

Mr. SMITH. He automatically assumed the presidency of the institution immediately he came into power in Yucatan, and he appointed his own board of directors and his own manager. The first manager he appointed was Juan Zubaran.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the progress of the henequen industry under the system which he established?

Mr. SMITH. The first effect was to paralyze the industry. The Reguladora had accumulated some hemp and Alvarado was anxious to sell that and turn it into money. The planters made every effort to ship their hemp to the coast; they had to pay bribes to the employees of the railways and to resort to every possible means of marketing their hemp. They even sent it down at great trouble and expense by carts, but Alvarado soon put a stop to that practice by taking possession of the roads entering into Progreso and prohibiting the passing of the carts bearing the hemp to the warehouses.

Mr. KEARFUL. What means did he take to compel the planters to turn over their production to the Reguladora?

Mr. SMITH. Why, he would call the planters to the palace, sometimes in groups, sometimes single individuals, and he threatened to destroy their plantations, threatened to break the machinery, threatened to burn the fields, and to throw the owners into the fire unless they signed a contract agreeing to deliver their product to the Reguladora.

Mr. KEARFUL. Upon what terms?

Mr. SMITH. He promised it would be operated as a cooperative society. He agreed to pay them an advance against their deposit of hemp, but he neglected to pay any fixed price, merely stating in the contract that the Reguladora would pay an advance, which at the present time was 4 cents a pound, but that did not imply any obligation on the part of the Reguladora to pay 4 cents or any other price in the future.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what was his proposition in regard to a division of the profits?

Mr. SMITH. He promised to divide the profits among the planters in proportion to the amount of sisal which they would deliver; that is, when the sisal was eventually sold the product of the sale would be paid to the various planters in proper proportion.

Mr. KEARFUL. How was that carried out?

Mr. SMITH. It was not carried out in letter or in spirit. Alvarado sent agents to this country who negotiated a contract with some bankers in New Orleans. The bankers agreed to advance money to the Reguladora against hemp warehoused in this country. The original agreement called for the Reguladora to pay interest on such loans at market rates and in addition to pay a commission of 5 per cent to the syndicate of bankers that was financing the Reguladora. The name of the syndicate was the Pan American Commission Corporation.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was the agent sent by Alvarado?

Mr. SMITH. Dr. Victor A. Rendon and his brother, Julio Rendon. Later on that agreement was changed, because it appeared to conflict with the antitrust laws of the United States. It appears that the promise to pay a commission of a stated amount on a price that was likely to fluctuate was possibly illegal, so the agreement was later changed during the progress of an investigation which a subcommittee of the United States Senate made of the henequen industry, and a fixed amount per bale was arranged to be paid to the Pan-American Commission Corporation.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who composed this Pan-American Corporation?

Mr. SMITH. The head of the corporation was Saul Wechsler and his associate was Lynn H. Dinkins.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the amount of the commission paid to them?

Mr. SMITH. The original amount agreed on was 5 per cent; then the later agreement called for the payment of—I can not think of it.

Mr. KEARFUL. What effect did the system established by Alvarado have upon the prices of hemp in this country?

Mr. SMITH. When the United States Senate conducted hearings in the investigation into the henequen industry Dr. Rendon and Mr. Wechsler and Mr. Dinkins stated most emphatically that although the Reguladora was an effective monopoly it was not their intention to advance the price of henequen above the then existing price, which was 7½ cents per pound. It will be noted that the price of 7½ constitutes an advance of a little more than 2 cents per pound over the average price for the 15 years prior to 1915.

After the hearings closed the Reguladora proceeded to advance the price, until in 1917 it was 16½ cents per pound; in 1918 they advanced it to 19½ cents per pound; but in 1919, owing to a large accumulation of hemp in their hands, they reduced the price to 15½ cents per pound.

Mr. KEARFUL. What effect did this have upon the prices that had to be paid by the American farmers for binding twine?

Mr. SMITH. This advance forced the American farmers to pay for their binder twine the following amounts in excess of the amounts they had paid for the same quantity of twine in previous years: Excess in 1916, $7,125,000; excess in 1917, $33,375,000; excess in 1918, $42,000,000; excess in 1919, $30,000,000; making a total of $112,500,000 which American farmers were compelled to pay for their binder twine in excess of the amounts they would naturally have been called upon to pay had it not been for the existence and monopolistic actions of the Reguladora.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did the henequen planters of Yucatan get the benefit of this amount?

Mr. SMITH. No; the Yucatan planters derived no benefits.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where did this money go?

Mr. SMITH. That is hard to say. One million dollars was paid to the Pan-American Commission Corporation after the Reguladora refused to carry out its contract. They did this after they had placed themselves on their feet by the collection of these high prices for henequen. Then when the Reguladora commenced to receive these large sums of money Alvarado and his associates organized many subsidiary companies; they also spent very large sums of money for advertising and propaganda work in the United States, Europe, and South America; they paid moneys to newspapers in Mexico City in order to advance Alvarado's political ambitions; they sent anarchists to the United States and to South America, who conducted an active propaganda; they also organized a company called the Compania de Fomento del Sureste, of which Alvarado was president, and which he controlled absolutely. The supposed object of this company was to import everything required by the natives of Yucatan and to exclude from all participation in commerce all private firms and individuals.

Alvarado caused $9,000,000 to be taken from the Reguladora treasury for the purchase of several small steamers. Although he announced that he had acquired these steamers for the purpose of transporting the Reguladora's henequen to the United States, the steamers were immediately chartered to the Compania de Fomento del Sureste, who in turn made a contract with the Reguladora to transport the Reguladora's hemp on these steamers. Alvarado also used the money of the Reguladora for the purpose of acquiring the majority of the stock in the Yucatan railways. He immediately handed over control of these railways to the same Compania de Fomento.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there any undertaking by this subsidiary company to build additional railways?

Mr. SMITH. I think there was no definite undertaking, but they did appropriate a great many rails and railway equipment from the various plantations in the State and they advertised, and in fact they did some work in building a railway in the southern part of the peninsula, but it was generally regarded as a joke, and though several million pesos were ostensibly paid in the construction work of the railroad it was later sold for 150,000 pesos to a friend of the Alvarado Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. What supplemental organization was established by Alvarado for the purpose of controlling the planters? I refer to the Ligas de Resistencia.

Mr. SMITH. Well, as things progress in Yucatan the planters became more and more restless. Although they realized that henequen was being sold in the United States at fabulous prices, and although they observed the prosperity of all the Alvarado officials, they realized that they were becoming poorer all the time, that the moneys which Alvarado promised them and which they were entitled to on the basis of participating in the selling price of the henequen were not forthcoming, they saw that those moneys were being expended for other purposes, and opposition commenced to develop. In order to quell any idea of independence on the part of the Yucatan people Alvarado organized the so-called Ligas de Resistencia. They conducted a campaign of terror throughout the State. Anybody who expressed any antagonism to Alvarado immediately was persecuted by the Ligas de Resistencia.

Mr. KEARFUL. What course did this persecution take?

Mr. SMITH. Destruction of hemp fields, breaking of machinery, and inciting fear in the minds of the workmen on the plantations and driving them off. Another method which Alvarado pursued was in Merida. On the principal boulevard of the city he had hanged two men on different occasions, but on each occasion he allowed the body of the hanged man to swing from an oak tree on this principal boulevard of Merida from sunrise to sunset. That created considerable excitement. After that when anybody showed any tendency to disagree with Alvarado or to resist his decrees he would tell them to "Remember the oak tree," and that brought them to terms in very short order.

Mr. KEARFUL. I will ask you to describe the condition of the henequen plantations as a result of the policy established by Alvarado.

Mr. SMITH. Among other so-called reforms, Alvarado proceeded to inaugurate a school system. He brought several hundred so-called teachers down from various parts of Mexico and sent them broadcast throughout the State of Yucatan, compelling each planter to have a teacher on the plantation. Many of these teachers were unable to read or write and were compelled to make their mark in giving a receipt for pay checks. None of them was able to speak the language spoken by the Indians, and the so-called teachers were merely agitators who did nothing but create discord and dissatisfaction among the workmen on the plantations.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the doctrines they taught?

Mr. SMITH. Anarchistic entirely. They taught them that the planters had kept them in slavery for years, that now the tide had turned and the workmen themselves were masters. They told them that if the plantation owners made any attempt to enforce discipline or to resist the authority which the workmen were to exercise on the plantation they were to take their machetes and cut their heads off.

Mr. KEARFUL. The planters had to pay for this instruction?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What effect did the promulgation of such doctrines have?

Mr. SMITH. Why, it produced almost complete demoralization on all the plantations. A henequen plantation, in order to remain productive, must be carefully attended to; that is, the leaves of the henequen plant must be cut at certain periods, the underbrush must be cleaned out, and the plantations kept clean; otherwise the plants will die. The system inaugurated by Alvarado forced the owners to relinquish the control of their property; the men were allowed to work as they pleased, and instead of devoting their time to keeping the plantations in good condition they would cut the leaves of the hemp plants nearest the road, and by overcutting those plants nearest the road they would produce a condition which caused those plants to die prematurely; also by neglecting the leaves on the plants in the interior of the plantation and by failing to clean out the underbrush they have caused many of the plants to send up a pole, which is the indication that the life of the plant is at an end and it is of no further use.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the natural life of the henequen plant under proper conditions, and what is the effect of the neglect of the plant?

Mr. SMITH. It requires seven years from planting for a plant to produce fiber. After it commences to produce it will continue production for a period of about 18 years. If the plant is not properly cared for it will die in three or four years.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the condition of the henequen plantations in Yucatan at the present time?

Mr. SMITH. The present condition of the henequen plantations in Yucatan is alarming. The planters have been robbed of the money received from the sale of their henequen, so they are now on the verge of bankruptcy and not in condition to continue the development and care of the plantations.

Mr. KEARFUL. What effect will that have upon the farmers of this country who are compelled to use that product for binder twine?

Mr. SMITH. Unless something is done to relieve the situation of the Yucatan planters it is a practical certainty that within a very few years the farmers of the United States will be without binder twine to bind their crops. Up until the present time no substitute for henequen fiber has been found in sufficient quantities to replace henequen in case that fiber should be eliminated, and there is every prospect of its being eliminated now.

Mr. KEARFUL. Has this country been the market for the henequen product?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; this country always consumed about 90 per cent of all the henequen grown in Yucatan. About 90 per cent of the grain crops of the United States are bound with twine made of henequen from Yucatan.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did Alvarado do in reference to establishing prohibition in Yucatan.

Mr. SMITH. Alvarado made the State dry on paper, but liquor continued to be handled in Yucatan. It was smuggled in by many people and the Government made a pretense of enforcing the law. In fact, they did seize fairly large quantities of liquor which they stored in a church, but when the Government lost control of the Reguladora last summer they had no means of getting further revenue, so they commenced to sell the liquor out of the church and a short time ago they made a sale of part of the stock of liquor, but the Federal Government seized the liquor because the State government had failed to pay the Federal revenue tax on it.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what became of the liquor then?

Mr. SMITH. I have not heard its final disposition.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is effective prohibition now established in Yucatan?

Mr. SMITH. Only until the end of this year. I understand they are giving up the prohibition feature of it and next year under Federal regulation they will become wet again.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you proceed to describe the currency system established in Yucatan?

Mr. SMITH. Up until the outbreak of the revolution currency was the usual Mexican peso, but as the trouble and disorder continued there was a natural depletion of the silver currency throughout the country so that in Yucatan the Reguladora, in order to meet the currency shortage, made large issues of paper currency and for quite some time that was the only circulating medium in the peninsula.

Mr. KEARFUL. To what amount has this currency been issued?

Mr. SMITH. Nobody has been able to find out. I understand that some of the banks that have been financing the Reguladora during the Alvarado régime are interested in finding out just what the amount of the obligations are and are trying to uncover the details of the issues.

Mr. KEARFUL. What method did Alvarado pursue for the purpose of forcing this currency on the people?

Mr. SMITH. Why, he issued a decree making it legal tender and promising to redeem it on the basis of 50 cents United States gold per peso.

Mr. KEARFUL. What representations did he make as to the coin reserves held for security?

Mr. SMITH. Well, as the people observed the effect of his various acts they became more and more suspicious of the insolvency of the Reguladora and he had photographs made of safes full of gold coin—United States gold coin—and he exhibited those generally in order to attempt to establish confidence in the Reguladora paper; but last summer, when the Reguladora was, by instructions from the Federal Government, turned over to the planters they took possession of the Reguladora offices and found those safes empty. They did not have enough money even to pay for telegrams they wanted to send.

Mr. KEARFUL. What became of the Reguladora in the end?

Mr. SMITH. It has been turned over to a committee of Yucatan planters, who are now trying to save the situation. They have promised to take up the large issues of paper money made by the Alvarado government just as soon as they can raise the money, but conditions are very hard. They found the Reguladora looted to such an extent as to make their work exceedingly difficult, and it is uncertain what the outcome will be unless they are able to find assistance in some form or other from this country.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what form could assistance be rendered?

Mr. SMITH. Either by somebody in this country making loans to them against warehouse receipts for henequen or else the American binder-twine manufacturers agreeing to take the monthly production of the planters.

Mr. KEARFUL. What prospect is there of successful negotiations along that line?

Mr. SMITH. That is uncertain. The market conditions are very uncertain, because only a month ago a syndicate of banks which had been loaning money to the Reguladora against deposits of henequen in this country foreclosed on 250,000 bales of henequen and the banks themselves bought them in at $20 per bale. Now, if those 250,000 bales should be disposed of by the banks to the cordage manufacturers, it will be many months before the Yucatan planters will find any outlet for their production. In the meantime their source of revenue will have been cut off and they will not have any means whatsoever to continue work on the plantations. That may possibly bring about a situation where they will have to abandon the plantations, and the consequences would be most disastrous not only to the Yucatan planters but also to the United States generally.

Mr. KEARFUL. What confidence could be imposed in their ability to conduct their plantations under the situation that you have been describing?

Mr. SMITH. They could conduct their plantations and they could gradually get on their feet again if they were assured of a steady market for their products.

Mr. KEARFUL. In the face of the anarchistic doctrines that have been imposed upon them?

Mr. SMITH. Those anarchistic doctrines have been discarded. After the State was reduced to the very extreme of demoralization the men who accomplished that work gradually retired, and since the affairs of the State have been turned over to the planters they have been able to restore order to a very large extent. Discipline has been restored on the plantations, and there is a general feeling in Yucatan of a desire to cooperate and to work together to bring about a condition of stabilization.

Mr. KEARFUL. Alvarado himself is not personally in control now?

Mr. SMITH. No; he is not even in Yucatan; he is in Mexico City and is conducting a newspaper there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is he also conducting a political campaign?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; he is a candidate for the presidency of Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What other fiat money was used in Yucatan besides the issue of the Reguladora?

Mr. SMITH. They also used there the various issues of the Carranzista Government; they had the Veracruzanos, the constitucionistas, the infalsificables.

Mr. KEARFUL. With whom were you connected in operations in Yucatan?

Mr. SMITH. With Abalino Montes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any transactions personally in reference to the fiat money of the Carranza Government?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the transactions that you had?

Mr. SMITH. The first transaction I had was early in 1915 during the Argumedo régime. Argumedo used threats to force us to give him a letter of credit on New York for $500,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. For what purpose was this money to be used?

Mr. SMITH. He was sending a commission to the United States for the purpose of buying provisions and supplies for the Yucatan Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the threats he used?

Mr. SMITH. During the De los Santos régime we had bought 100,000 bales of henequen from the Reguladora. De los Santos did not stay long enough to carry out the contract, but it naturally and legally devolved upon his successor to carry out the contract. Argumedo threatened to refuse to deliver us any of this henequen and also to close up our business and to refuse to permit us to do any further business in Yucatan unless we acceded to his request for the letter of credit for $500,000. In order to convince us that it would be in order for us to give him the letter of credit he brought us to the Banco Peninsular to witness the removal of 1,100,000 Mexican gold pesos from the vaults of the bank. That gold was brought to the governor's palace and Argumedo told us that he had brought us there to show us that he had the money with which to carry on his government, but he did not wish to send the gold coin out of the State, and gave us one more opportunity to give him the letter of credit, which we did.

He sent a mission to the United States to purchase the provisions and supplies referred to, and we had made payments against that letter of credit amounting to about $200,000 when Alvarado came into Yucatan and issued a decree nullifying the paper money which Argumedo had delivered us for the letter of credit.

Mr. KEARFUL. How much paper money?

Mr. SMITH. Between 3,000,000 and 4,000,000 pesos in paper money.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is, of the issue of the Reguladora?

Mr. SMITH. Of the Reguladora issue.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what did Alvarado do in reference to that money?

Mr. SMITH. He issued a decree declaring it null and void.

Mr. KEARFUL. And then what did you do?

Mr. SMITH. We stopped further payments against the letter of credit. Later on, Alvarado or the government of Yucatan brought suit against us to enforce the payment of the remaining $300,000. That suit was brought in New York, but has never come to trial.

Mr. KEARFUL. Notwithstanding the consideration had been destroyed?

Mr. SMITH. Notwithstanding that fact.

Mr. KEARFUL. What value has the money issued by the Reguladora?

Mr. SMITH. It is of very doubtful value now.

Mr. KEARFUL. Upon what basis did this fiat money issued by the Reguladora rest? Upon what security was it supposed to stand?

Mr. SMITH. Upon the security of the hemp held by the Reguladora.

Mr. KEARFUL. Upon the henequen itself?

Mr. SMITH. Upon the henequen itself and, in addition, the photographs of the safes full of gold.

Mr. KEARFUL. What about price of henequen at the present time?

Mr. SMITH. The price of henequen has declined until it is now about 7½ cents per pound.

Mr. KEARFUL. I judge from that there would be no prospect of liquidating or taking up this fiat money from the proceeds of the henequen?

Mr. SMITH. It can be done gradually provided the holders will not force matters to an issue, and also provided the banks in the United States which have made large loans to the Reguladora and which loans have to be assumed by the planters do not press matters.

Mr. KEARFUL. What transactions did you have in reference to the issue of Carranza paper currency?

Mr. SMITH. In view of the scarcity of currency throughout Yucatan, it was necessary for us to go outside in order to get currency to finance our business. We bought issues of the Carranza Government from the banks along the border, from the First National Bank of El Paso, and from the Laredo National Bank. Those banks guaranteed the guineness of all the money they sold to us. We shipped the money thus bought from New Orleans to Yucatan.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what amount?

Mr. SMITH. Oh, in varying amounts.

Mr. KEARFUL. In the aggregate?

Mr. SMITH. Probably 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 pesos.

Mr. KEARFUL. This money, by decree of Carranza, was legal tender?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what occurred when you attempted to use this money?

Mr. SMITH. Nothing occurred until one shipment we brought into Yucatan we made a payment of about 400,000 pesos to the Reguladora. It so happened that when we made that payment Luis Cabrera had just arrived in Yucatan.

Mr. KEARFUL. The minister of finance under Carranza?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; and he sent for me and I went to the office of the Reguladora, and he had all this money piled on a table and asked us where we got so much counterfeit money, which was the first intimation we had that they were contemplating declaring it counterfeit. We told him it was not counterfeit and he insisted that it was; that he felt sure he saw imperfections in the bills which indicated its being counterfeit, and said that he was going to have an expert come over from Vera Cruz to decide whether it was counterfeit or not. We suggested that it was not necessary for the expert to come from Vera Cruz to render the decision; that Cabrera could telegraph him what decision he wanted made and that it would be made accordingly. But the expert came over, and of the total amount of 400,000 pesos which we had paid he declared about 160,000 pesos counterfeit, and he confiscated that amount.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you request the delivery of the bills, so that you could hold the banks from which you bought them to their guaranty?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; we explained to him that we had bought it under the guaranty of its being genuine from those banks which I have mentioned, who had assured us that they had bought it from the Carranza treasury agents, and we explained to Cabrera that if he would let us bring it back to those banks we would be able to have them make good, but he refused to do it, and we lost that amount.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of any similar transaction taking place with other persons?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; there was one Mexican, a man named Modesto Alvarez, who was accused of having counterfeit money. He made the same explanation as we made, and made the same request that he be permitted to send it back to the banks on the border, and he was granted that permission.

Mr. KEARFUL. How do you account for the discrimination?

Mr. SMITH. I believe it was because we were Americans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you ever heard Luis Cabrera express his sentiments in regard to what should be done in reference to Americans and their property interests in Mexico?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; Cabrera made no secret of his ideas on that subject. He said the Americans had exploited the Mexicans long enough and ought to be driven from the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are clear about that, are you?

Mr. SMITH. Positive.

Mr. KEARFUL. About what he said?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. W. F. Buckley recently testified before the committee. On page 797 of the printed hearings he said:

I had a conversation in 1914 with Luis Cabrera, in which Mr. Cabrera very frankly told me that the menace of the American in Mexico must be removed and that the only way to do this was to drive him out of the country and take his property.

Is that substantially the sentiment that he expressed to you?

Mr. SMITH. Practically the same. I do not recall that he said they would take the property of the Americans, but he most certainly said that Americans must be driven out of Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Shortly after the publication of Mr. Buckley's testimony Mr. Cabrera issued a statement in which he denied having had any such conversation and stated that he did not know Mr. Buckley. In view of the possibility of Mr. Cabrera's denial of your statement I would like to have you indicate some occurrences which would make it positive that Mr. Cabrera certainly knows you.

Mr. SMITH. Well, he might possibly recall his seizing the 160,000 pesos of our money; he might recall that he and I were passengers on the steamer Morro Castle out of Progreso at the end of July, 1915, at which time I had a conference on board the steamer as she lay off Progreso with Cabrera, Alvarado, Judge Douglas, Carranza's attorney, and Mr. Barrett, the representative of the International Harvester Co. Mr. Cabrera might also recall that in 1916 he telegraphed instructions to the Mexican Embassy here in Washington to bring to the attention of Mr. Bryan, who was then Secretary of State, the fact that I was prejudiced in my views on Mexican affairs and that the State Department should have no confidence in my reports to them.

Mr. KEARFUL. I suppose you were represented to belong to that class of American capitalists who were engaged in exploiting the Mexican peon?

Mr. SMITH. That was his contention; yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your view of that bit of propaganda that has been circulated so assiduously in this country, that American citizens are not entitled to consideration because they have been engaged in exploiting the people of that country to the detriment of the country and for their own especial benefit?

Mr. SMITH. Why, I believe that is being used almost entirely with the idea of having the Mexican politicians continue in power in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your opinion about the truth of that statement that the Americans are not entitled to consideration because they have been engaged in exploiting the people of Mexico?

Mr. SMITH. There is no truth at all in that. Of course, there are individual cases of injustice on the part of Americans toward Mexicans, just the same as there are cases of injustice in every other country of the world, but I think that the progress which Mexico has shown since the Americans went in there with their ability and their money and the knowledge which they possessed is sufficient answer to the claim of the Mexican Government officials that Americans did exploit the Mexican people unfairly.

When Americans went in there and started to really develop Mexico the Mexican people had neither the money nor the knowledge necessary to permit them to develop their own country. It was a case of Mexico being developed by foreign capital and foreign energy or remaining in a semibarbarous condition.

Mr. KEARFUL. What has been the effect upon the laboring classes of the operations of foreign capitalists?

Mr. SMITH. Why, the effect has been remarkably good. During the period of the Mexican development I believe the Mexican workman made more progress comparatively speaking than the workmen of any other country.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the sentiment of Mexican laborers with reference to American enterprise? Are they hostile toward Americans?

Mr. SMITH. Well, I can speak for Yucatan only. I do not know anything about conditions in the northern part of the Republic, but in Yucatan the sentiment among the natives is entirely friendly toward Americans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do they prefer to work for Americans than for their own people?

Mr. SMITH. No; that is not true. In Yucatan there have been very few American employers. The great majority of the hemp planters are Mexicans; but what few Americans have gone in there and run hemp plantations and other industries—gas works, for example, and other industries—have had absolutely no trouble with the natives. In fact, the natives always displayed the most friendly feeling toward Americans.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the condition of the railways of Yucatan up to the time of the entry of Alvarado?

Mr. SMITH. They were on a solid basis; they had been built by local capital, and had practically no loans. In fact, they never had a bond issue until it was, I think, 1912, when they floated an issue of 825,000 pounds sterling. They were being run as a railroad that is up to date, just as much so as any other railroad in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were they in good condition?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. With plenty of rolling stock?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; with plenty of rolling stock. They had a sufficient equipment to take care of the requirements of the State.

Mr. KEARFUL. What has been their condition since that time?

Mr. SMITH. Well, they have been neglected, their rolling stock is in horrible condition, the roadbeds have also been neglected, and, in fact, one of the adherents of the Alvarado government pointed to them as a modern miracle; that is, they have been able to maintain the semblance of being a railroad with the run-down equipment and roadbeds which they are suffering from.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have they paid the interest on this foreign loan?

Mr. SMITH. They have been paying it; I do not know if they have paid it all. Their payments were always delayed, but the bondholders never saw fit to foreclose.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were the roads in a prosperous condition up to the time of Alvarado?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. The stock was worth considerable sums on the market?

Mr. SMITH. I can not recall what the quotation was, but it had a fair price.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what is the condition of the stock now?

Mr. SMITH. I think the stock is worthless. The Federal Government has attached the railroads in Yucatan to satisfy a debt owed it by the State government for the payment of export duties on henequen.

Mr. KEARFUL. The State government does not own the railroads, does it?

Mr. SMITH. No; but the Reguladora is part of the State government.

Mr. KEARFUL. And the Reguladora purchased the control of the stock?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; the Reguladora purchased the control of the stock and Alvarado as president of the Reguladora turned the control over to Alvarado as Governor of Yucatan, and he in turn handed it over to Alvarado as president of the Compañia de Fomento.

Mr. KEARFUL. Before purchasing the stock did Alvarado take possession of the railroads when he entered the country?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the pretext?

Mr. SMITH. He took possession in the name of the revolution. Everything he did there was in the name of the revolution.

Mr. KEARFUL. And as a supposed military measure?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. There was really no opposition to the Carranza government until the Carranza officials came into the country and started trouble, was there?

Mr. SMITH. That is true.

(Whereupon, at 1 o'clock p. m., a recess was taken until 2 o'clock p. m.)

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. KEARFUL. Returning to the transaction which you had with Argumedo, I understand that you were forced to extend to him a letter of credit on New York for $500,000, in consideration of which he delivered to you some 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 pesos in Reguladora currency which you would be entitled to use in the payment for 100,000 bales of henequen that you had contracted to buy from the Reguladora; is that correct?

Mr. SMITH. In part payment.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the exact amount, if you remember, of this Reguladora currency?

Mr. SMITH. Three million five hundred and fifty thousand pesos, as nearly as I can recollect.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you do with this currency? I may say that I understand that Alvarado issued a decree shortly after his entry into Yucatan nullifying this currency. What did you then do with it?

Mr. SMITH. Well, prior to Alvarado's arrival in Merida many of the people gathered together their money and valuables and fled the country. Our people made their escape from Merida carrying with them the currency in question, and brought it to this country. During the Argumedo régime, and prior to the entry of Alvarado into Yucatan, Carranza had blockaded the port of Progreso, and no henequen was allowed to be exported. The United States Government made representations to Carranza which resulted in his lifting the blockade of Progreso, but Alvarado immediately thereafter took steps to prevent the henequen entering Progreso from the interior points.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the consideration that moved the United States Government to take steps to protect the owners of henequen?

Mr. SMITH. It was because that situation arose in the spring of 1915 when the binder-twine manufacturers had not sufficient fiber to manufacture the binder twine required for the 1915 harvest, and the farmers throughout the country realized that without a proper supply of binder twine their crops could not be gathered, so it was of vital importance that the fiber necessary to manufacture the binder twine for the 1915 harvest be obtained without delay. Although the blockade was lifted and theoretically hemp was supposed to be allowed free movement out of Progreso, Alvarado was obstinate and refused to permit shipments of the hemp to be made.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did this lead to negotiations between yourself and the Mexican representatives in Washington in regard to shipments by you of henequen from Yucatan?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; the United States Government was quite insistent that the hemp be moved, and they offered to give us protection in getting the hemp out. When Mr. Eliseo Arredondo, who was then the Washington representative of the Carranza Government, learned of the proposal to see that the hemp was actually shipped, we had several conferences with him which resulted in an agreement being made whereby he agreed that if I should go to Yucatan with the Reguladora currency the Mexican Government would allow the hemp to be shipped, but he was very anxious to avoid all appearance of any coercion on the part of the United States Government. I agreed to take the currency to Yucatan on condition that the Mexican Government would guarantee my personal safety.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it part of the agreement that the arrangement made with Argumedo whereby this money would be received in part payment for the hemp would be carried out?

Mr. SMITH. With Arredondo, you mean?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. It was part of the agreement that the Reguladora would accept that currency in payment for the hemp. I went to Yucatan with the currency, but when I arrived there I learned that two or three days subsequent to the agreement with Arredondo in Washington Alvarado had issued a new decree confirming the previous decree to the effect that the currency held by us was null and void and also declaring it to be counterfeit. In this decree he stated that anybody found with that currency in his possession would be dealt with as a counterfeiter, the penalty in that case being death. I did not take the currency ashore, but deposited it on board the United States gunboat Des Moines, which was lying off the port of Progreso.

Mr. KEARFUL. And you did not yourself go ashore?

Mr. SMITH. After depositing the currency on the Des Moines I did go ashore.

Mr. KEARFUL. Taking care not to have any of this money in your possession?

Mr. SMITH. I had none of it when I went ashore.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then the agreement which was made by Mr. Arredondo was repudiated?

Mr. SMITH. Entirely.

Mr. KEARFUL. Returning to Luis Cabrera and the sentiment expressed by him in reference to driving Americans out of Mexico, what was the sentiment of Salvador Alvarado on that point?

Mr. SMITH. Why, he was much more violent in his expressions against Americans than was Cabrera. Alvarado told me on various occasions that if he had his way he would drive all the Americans out of Mexico immediately.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know anything about certain devious methods employed by Alvarado and his henchmen to secure funds with which to promote the campaign of Alvarado for the presidency of Mexico?

Mr. SMITH. In 1916 Col. Bauche Alcalde of the Carrancista army came to New York and endeavored to sell 100,000 bales of henequen. He informed me that Alvarado was laying plans to make a campaign for the presidency during the next election and was desirous of raising a campaign fund. Bauche Alcalde told me that he would sell us 100,000 bales of sisal at a price 1 cent per pound below the then market price on condition that we would stipulate in the contract that we would export the sisal from the United States. We told him that there was no market for such a large quantity of sisal outside the United States and he suggested that the matter could be arranged if we would merely mention the word "export" in the contract and that we would not be held to any obligation to see that the hemp were actually exported.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what way was he expecting to raise money for the campaign fund by this transaction?

Mr. SMITH. He told me that Alvarado had agreed to sell him and his associates 100,000 bales at a price 4 cents per pound below the then prevailing price.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is, Alvarado acting as head of the Reguladora?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And the 4 cents per pound less the market price referred to the market price fixed by the Reguladora?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; fixed by the Reguladora on sales of henequen to American binder-twine manufacturers.

Mr. KEARFUL. If that transaction had been carried through, what amount of profit would have resulted to Alvarado?

Mr. SMITH. Something in excess of $1,000,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was Alvarado's doctrine in reference to the division of the land in Yucatan?

Mr. SMITH. Alvarado promulgated a doctrine which, to the best of my knowledge and belief, was the forerunner of the Bolshevism now ruling in Russia. He enacted an agrarian law, the principal feature of which was that land should be free as light and air; that there should be no private ownership of land, and this law provided that the Indians should take possession of the land cultivated by the planters.

There is a great plenty of land in Yucatan, so that the land question is not an important one by any means, but Alvarado's plan contemplated the division among the Indians of the land which had been cultivated by the planters. He advertised certain dates on which the land would be distributed free to the Indians, and he attempted to make the distribution, but the Indians refused to take the land because, in the first place, they realized that they would have to pay taxes on the land, and the land being cultivated to henequen was of no use to them without the machinery and the central plant necessary for the deperuration of the fiber.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it possible to successfully cultivate henequen in small tracts?

Mr. SMITH. Absolutely impossible; that is, in a commercial way. A man doing it on a small scale would have to clean it by hand and the process would be so slow that he would never be able to make a living.

Mr. KEARFUL. What would be the effect upon such a process of the fact that the henequen plant requires seven years to mature?

Mr. SMITH. That in itself makes it an absurdity to think of a poor Indian taking up a tract of land to cultivate it to henequen, when it is a well-known fact that the first seven years produce not 1 cent of revenue, but necessitate continued outlay.

Mr. KEARFUL. And is it necessary to have expensive machinery with which to handle the crop?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What has become of Alvarado's bolshevistic doctrines in Yucatan?

Mr. SMITH. Well, they have been put to one side since the planters have taken control of affairs and they had accomplished so much ruin and misery that they have been practically expelled from Yucatan.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is, the bolshevik teachers and leaders?

Mr. SMITH. No; the bolshevik features of his program.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were referring a while ago to a possible crisis that might result to the farmers in this country by reason of failure of the future crops of henequen. Have you figures with reference to the production of henequen from the time of Alvarado's transactions up to the present time as illustrating that feature?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; the production of henequen in 1900 was 500,000 bales; in 1914, the last year prior to the Alvarado regime, the production was 1,026,000 bales; in 1918 the production had declined to 805,000 bales; in 1919 it will not reach 700,000 bales. That is, during the Alvarado régime the production declined by 30 per cent, whereas if normal conditions had prevailed the production in 1919, due to the increased plantings and the installation of large numbers of modern cleaning machines, would have been 1,500,000 bales.

Mr. KEARFUL. As I understand you, substantially all this production is consumed by the farmers of the United States?

Mr. SMITH. Practically all of it.

Mr. KEARFUL. And the farmers of the United States rely upon the henequen production of Yucatan for their binder twine?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; about 90 per cent of the binder twine which the farmers of the United States use is made of Yucatan sisal or henequen. I stated that practically all of that Yucatan henequen is consumed by the American farmers. That is not quite correct, because in addition to the binder twine manufactured in this country for consumption in the United States manufacturers also make fairly large quantities of binder twine which are exported to South America and to Europe.

Mr. KEARFUL. Aside from the hardship upon the farmers in failing to get binder twine, the shortage in the crop would affect those manufacturers of binder twine in the United States?

Mr. SMITH. Very seriously.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there anything further, Mr. Smith, that you want to testify about?

Mr. SMITH. Nothing that occurs to me.

Mr. KEARFUL. We are very much obliged to you.

(Witness excused.)

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,

On account of the illness of the witness to be examined by the committee on this day, an adjournment was taken until to-morrow, Saturday, January 3, 1920, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 3, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., January 3, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the Subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

TESTIMONY OF EMILIANO LOPEZ FIGUEROA.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do not need an interpreter, Mr. Figueroa?

Mr. FIGUEROA. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you be sworn?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Before, I would like to read a statement if you will allow me. I have been summoned to appear before your committee and testify respecting the subject matter under consideration and to produce an alleged "copy of the telegram sent by Rafael Nieto to Luis Cabrera in reference to producing bail to be furnished for W. O. Jenkins" by the service of a writ of subpoena issued by your committee and served upon me personally in New York City. I am here pursuant to such subpoena, but I wish to and hereby do object to my compulsory examination. I am a citizen of the Republic of Mexico, not of the United States. This committee is considering and wishes to examine me respecting matters concerning the country of which I am a citizen. I deny the jurisdiction of this committee and its right and power to compel my attendance and examination on the ground this committee has no jurisdiction over alien residents, but can only compel the examination of citizens of the United States. Furthermore, it is a violation of international comity, as well as the courtesy which this country owes to an alien resident, to compel such an alien resident to testify concerning a matter respecting his country. I am advised that the resolution authorizing this investigation, as well as the statutes and law of the United States, do not confer any such right and power on your committee.

If you demand my examination over my protest and in violation of my rights, any information which I might have, which is of interest and concern to your committee, I will give it, only intending to act in a manner becoming a citizen of Mexico, and a resident of the United States; not wishing to embarrass either, but to facilitate you; expecting, however, that you will have proper respect for my rights as a citizen of Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. The committee is acting under a resolution of the Senate to investigate and report certain facts to the Senate for its information and it is believed that there is no law of this country, under whose law this committee is operating, that excuses you from testifying to such facts as are pertinent to the matters under inquiry pursuant to the Senate resolution. The committee appreciates the delicate position in which you may find yourself by reason of the necessity of testifying to facts within your knowledge but must overrule your objection and ask you to be sworn and testify.

Mr. FIGUEROA. I am perfectly willing, sir.

(The oath was thereupon administered by Mr. Kearful.)

Mr. KEARFUL. Please state your full name to the stenographer.

Mr. FIGUEROA. Emiliano Lopez Figueroa.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your present address?

Mr. FIGUEROA. No. 112 Riverside Drive, New York City.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your citizenship?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Mexican.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long have you lived in this country?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Over five years.

Mr. KEARFUL. Continuously?

Mr. FIGUEROA. No, sir; I was in Mexico City about 11 months ago.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are acquainted with what is known as the case of Consular Agent W. O. Jenkins, who was apprehended by the local authorities of the State of Puebla?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I don't know what you mean, sir. Am I acquainted, you say?

Mr. KEARFUL. Acquainted with the case of W. O. Jenkins?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Well, I know about that case only from what the papers have said.

Mr. KEARFUL. You recall from the newspapers that Mr. Jenkins was kidnapped by the rebel Cordoba and held for ransom?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I do.

Mr. KEARFUL. That the ransom was paid or arranged to be paid and he was released?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Subsequently he was arrested by the local authorities of the State of Puebla charged, as the newspapers reported, with complicity in his own capture and detention for ransom by Cordoba?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I have read that, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. You recall also that the State Department of this Government made a demand for his immediate release upon the Mexican authorities and that the Mexican authorities resisted that demand and refused to release him? You recall that, do you?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I read something about that, yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. You also recall that the Mexican authorities suggested that he might be admitted to bail pending an investigation of the case and that Mr. Jenkins refused to give bail?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I think so.

Mr. KEARFUL. You remember also that subsequently to December 4 Mr. Jenkins was released upon bail having been given by an American named J. Salter Hansen?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I remember the fact; I don't remember the exact date.

Mr. KEARFUL. What connection did you have, if any, with procuring the American, J. Salter Hansen, to furnish the bail for the release of Mr. Jenkins?

Mr. FIGUEROA. No one, so far as I know.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any connection with that matter?

Mr. FIGUEROA. With that matter?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. FIGUEROA. No; as far as I know.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of a telegram having been sent by Rafael Nieto to Luis Cabrera with reference to that matter?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you a copy of that telegram?

Mr. FIGUEROA. No, sir; I haven't got it.

Mr. KEARFUL. The subpoena served upon you notified you to bring a copy of the telegram.

Mr. FIGUEROA. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have such copy?

Mr. FIGUEROA. No; because I have not got it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you in consultation with Mr. Rafael Nieto at the time he sent the telegram?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Well, not exactly consultation, sir. We had a little talk about that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you collaborate with him in the wording of the telegram?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I don't think so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know what the telegram contained?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you state the substance of it, please?

Mr. FIGUEROA. It was only a suggestion to Luis Cabrera about paying the bail or getting the freedom of Jenkins.

Mr. KEARFUL. For what purpose?

Mr. FIGUEROA. The idea of Mr. Nieto, you ask?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. FIGUEROA. Mr. Nieto was worrying on account of the situation, as I was myself—the international situation—and we thought it was fair, good for this country and maybe better for ours, to avoid the danger of a rupture.

Mr. KEARFUL. What suggestion was made in the telegram as to who might be procured to give the bail?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Nobody; it was a simple suggestion without giving any names.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you acquainted with Mr. J. Salter Hansen?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I think I saw him once, but I don't know him.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where did you see him?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I think I saw him in New York City looking for Mr. Nieto one year or two years ago.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you read the telegram that was sent to Luis Cabrera by Rafael Nieto?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I did read it.

Mr. KEARFUL. You did not?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I did.

Mr. KEARFUL. The telegram contained a suggestion that some American be secured?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Absolutely not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you acquainted with Judge Delbert J. Haff, of Kansas City, Mo.?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Yes; I have met him.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was the matter of procuring some particular person to give bail discussed between you and Mr. Nieto?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Not at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. No suggestion was made about securing Judge Haff?

Mr. FIGUEROA. No, sir; I don't know where Judge Haff is. I saw him many months ago.

Mr. KEARFUL. You did not know he was in Mexico at that time?

Mr. FIGUEROA. No; I did not know.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know that Mr. Hansen was there?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I did not know.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you acquainted with the provisions of the Mexican law with regard to furnishing bail for prisoners?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I have only an idea of that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know that the Mexican law provides bail shall be given only when it is asked for by the prisoner or by his counsel or legal representative?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I would not like to discuss the legal phases of that matter because I am not an attorney.

Mr. KEARFUL. I asked you if you knew that to be so.

Mr. FIGUEROA. Well, I know something about that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you prepared to say whether you know that is so or not?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I am not prepared.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you discuss that matter with Mr. Nieto at the time of sending the telegram?

Mr. FIGUEROA. No, sir; I repeat that Mr. Nieto and I only talked about the convenience of sending that suggestion; a plain suggestion, that is all.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your business in this country, Mr. Figueroa?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I am a director of the Mexican National Railways in New York City.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that your only business?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I am the president of the Transcontinental Publishing Corporation.

Mr. KEARFUL. Does that company publish a magazine?

Mr. FIGUEROA. De la Raza it is called; a Spanish magazine.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the policy of that magazine with reference to the policy of the nationalization of properties?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I beg your pardon.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the policy of that magazine with reference to the theory of the nationalization of properties?

Mr. FIGUEROA. That magazine does not treat about that. We don't write about that. It is a social magazine.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is this a copy of de la Raza for December, 1919?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. I notice in this issue of de la Raza an article entitled—I will not attempt to pronounce it.

Mr. FIGUEROA. Let me pronounce it: "Vladimir Illyich Ulianof, alias Nicolas Lenine."

Mr. KEARFUL. That article is quite favorable to the present Russian régime, headed by Nicolas Lenine, is it not?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I have not read the article, sir. I am the president of the company, but I have nothing to do with the writings in the magazine. There is an editor.

Mr. KEARFUL. You control the company, do you not?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Well, I am one of the stockholders.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you not have the control of it?

Mr. FIGUEROA. No; the control is Dr. Ferrara.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the extent of your ownership?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Thirty per cent.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you hold any position under the present Mexican Government?

Mr. FIGUEROA. No, sir; only the one I mentioned before, one of the directors of the Mexican Railways in New York City.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you a friend of Luis Cabrera?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Yes; I am.

Mr. KEARFUL. What position does he hold?

Mr. FIGUEROA. He is secretary of hacienda.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is equivalent to our Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Secretary of the Treasury; yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what position does Rafael Nieto hold?

Mr. FIGUEROA. At the present time I do not think he has any official position.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was his position?

Mr. FIGUEROA. He was subsecretary of the treasury.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where is he now?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I understand he is in London.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it not true that he went to Germany?

Mr. FIGUEROA. What do you say?

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it not true that he went to Germany from New York?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I do not think so, because I had a cablegram from him from London.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know whether or not he went to Germany or was intending to go to Germany for the purpose of arranging for a large colonization of Germans in Mexico?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I don't believe so, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. He never discussed that with you?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Never.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you ever heard Luis Cabrera express his opinion of what ought to be done with American citizens in Mexico?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Never, sir; but I would decline to discuss such a matter.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean you would decline to testify about such a matter here?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Yes; because you are asking me questions about Mexico that I do not consider proper to answer.

Mr. KEARFUL. I hand you a yellow booklet entitled "The Conspiracy Against Mexico" and ask you when you first saw that?

Mr. FIGUEROA. In this very moment.

Mr. KEARFUL. This is the first time you have seen it?

Mr. FIGUEROA. In this very moment, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. I ask you to observe the cartoon on the cover which represented a hideous hairy hand with talons marked "Wall Street."

Mr. FIGUEROA. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. With the talons covering various portions of Mexico and ask you whether you recognize that as being the work of a Mexican cartoonist. You are familiar with Mexican cartoons that have been published in Mexico City?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Yes; I have seen many of them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you not recognize that hand as a typical Mexican cartoon?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Really it is very hard to say, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know the name of the cartoonist that is there?

Mr. FIGUEROA. No; I do not know.

Mr. KEARFUL. This booklet has been distributed throughout this country by the Mexican consuls and by the Mexican ambassador in Washington, and I desire to direct your attention to certain extracts from this book.

Mr. FIGUEROA. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And ask you whether your position is in harmony with those statements. On page 16, referring to the Mexican constitution of 1917, I find this statement:

It is without doubt the most democratic and humanitarian document in the Western Hemisphere.

You agree with that, I suppose?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I did not hear well, excuse me.

Mr. KEARFUL. Referring to the Mexican constitution of 1917 it is said:

It is without doubt the most democratic and humanitarian document in the Western Hemisphere.

You agree to that, I suppose?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I would decline to answer that question.

Mr. DESVERNINE. You may decline to answer any questions expressing your opinion.

Mr. FIGUEROA. I decline to answer any questions about my country. I do not think it is proper.

Mr. KEARFUL. I am asking you as to your own position with reference to these matters; you having testified that you are connected with the magazine de la Raza that contains this article about Nicolas Lenine and the Russian system.

Mr. FIGUEROA. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. I continue:

In fact, outside of soviet Russia no country in the world has taken such a step toward real liberty.

Is that your position? That has nothing to do with Mexico but only your position in this country under whose laws you are living.

Mr. FIGUEROA. I think I told you before that I am the president of the company of the Transcontinental Publishing Corporation and not the editor of the matters in the magazine.

Mr. KEARFUL. I read again from page 18 of the same booklet.

Mr. FIGUEROA. All right.

Mr. KEARFUL (reading):

In fact, as mentioned before, soviet Russia, and also soviet Hungary (which was crushed by those who battled for five years to make the world safe for democracy—the imperialistic allied Governments)—these workers' soviet republics are the only countries that have produced constitutions of the people, as have also the Mexican revolutionists, though not as far advanced as the European revolutionists. If the Mexican constitution has not been put wholly into effect the cause lies more above the Rio Grande than below it. It even might have been worded stronger and made more really emancipating if the colossus of the north had not been in the minds of the framers.

Are those your sentiments?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I am not prepared to discuss that matter.

Mr. KEARFUL. On page 20 is this statement:

If the Mexican Government determines that the interests of the people demand that the oil deposits shall be nationalized, it has a right to go into the oil district of Tampico and tell the American, British, and other oil producers that from such and such a date the oil wells will be operated by the people for the benefit of all.

What have you to say about that?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I would decline to answer.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you advocate such sentiments?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I would not like to discuss that matter.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you expect to advocate sentiments of that kind in de la Raza?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I do not write in de la Raza.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have nothing whatever to do with the policy of the magazine?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Yes; to bring together all the Latin-American countries with the United States, as you can read in all of the issues of the magazine de la Raza.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think it would tend to bring together in happy harmony the Governments of Central and South America with the United States by printing articles favorable to the Russian system?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I have not read that article, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. I ask you the question—

Mr. FIGUEROA. But I have read the previous issues and I am sure that if you do so you will see that really it has been the program of the magazine de la Raza.

• Mr. KEARFUL. I ask you the question if you think it would tend to harmony between this country and Central and South America to print articles favorable to the Russian system?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I have not read the articles.

Mr. KEARFUL. I have not asked you that. I ask you what you think about that policy.

Mr. FIGUEROA. Well, I do not think it is a good policy.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do not agree then with the statements made in this yellow booklet which has been circulated by Mexican officials in this country?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I do not know the booklet, sir. I told you before, this is the first time I see it.

Mr. KEARFUL. I read again from page 28 of the booklet:

Ever since Porfirio Diaz was driven out of power in 1910 the United States Government has threatened intervention. * * * The present Administration's actions are well known. One day President Wilson is for a thing, and the next day he changes.

While the present Administration has not actually intervened by force of arms, it has prevented the Carranza Government from carrying out all the reforms of the revolution by its protests and threats to Carranza whenever his government contemplated putting into effect those reforms.

Mr. FIGUEROA. I would decline to discuss that matter.

Mr. KEARFUL. Again, on page 24:

Franklin K. Lane and his associates on the American-Mexican Joint Commission were attempting to browbeat the Mexicans into yielding the guarantees demanded by the Rockefellers, the Guggenheims, the Dodges, and the Dohenys.

Have you any sympathy with that statement?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I repeat that I would not like to discuss it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe that is true?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I repeat that I would not like to discuss it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe it is true that Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior, and his associates on the American-Mexican Joint Commission, were attempting to "browbeat the Mexicans into yielding the guarantees demanded by the Rockefellers, the Guggenheims, the Dodges, and the Dohenys"?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Really, I could not imagine that; I don't believe it.

Mr. KEARFUL. You don't believe that is true?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I don't think so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember that while we were at war with Germany, a large number of Hindus were arrested and prosecuted in San Francisco? Do you remember the circumstance and the celebrated trial that lasted for several weeks, during which two of the Hindus were killed in the courtroom?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I have an idea that I read something.

Mr. KEARFUL. They were convicted of a conspiracy having for its purpose opposition to this country and its allies. I quote a statement from the yellow booklet with reference to that matter, appearing on page 29:

And whenever the Hindus get tired of the beneficence of their British masters and plan to throw off the yoke of imperialism, the heavy mailed fist is used to crush the disciples of liberty. When necessary, it reaches out across the sea and finds ready help from the imperialistic forces of other countries. Witness the present United States Government coming to the aid of British imperialism and imprisoning Hindu rebels in this country! If you are a friend of freedom, that should make you think—and act!

Do you agree with that sentiment published in the booklet sent out by the Mexican officials in this country?

Mr. FIGUEROA. By Mexican officials, you say?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes. Do you agree with that sentiment? Do you think that the Hindus who were convicted in San Francisco were real disciples of liberty and that they were persecuted by this country?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I am not prepared to discuss the matter. I don't think so, they were. Really, I am not prepared to discuss that.

Mr. KEARFUL. You think they were treated fairly and were properly prosecuted, do you?

Mr. FIGUEROA. That is my impression.

Mr. KEARFUL. I quote this final statement on page 29 of the yellow booklet:

We often hear about European imperialism, but how about American imperialism. All the weak Republics of Central America are well acquainted with this particular brand of imperialism. And the workers of these countries are among the worst-exploited and oppressed in either North or South America. When American capitalists can't manage the native governments, they call on the United States Government and soldiers are dispatched to the scene and government by foreign bayonets is established.

Do you believe that is true?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I don't think so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you personally acquainted with President Carranza?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are familiar with his policies?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I do not think that it is proper that you ask me such a question, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. I did not ask you anything about his policies. I simply ask you if you are familiar with his policies; if you know him.

Mr. FIGUEROA. Anyway, I would refuse to discuss that.

Mr. KEARFUL. On June 14, 1919, at Mexico City President Carranza sent the following letter to Señor Lic. Manuel Aguirre Berlanga. What is his position in the Mexican Government?

Mr. FIGUEROA. He is the secretary of the interior.

Mr. KEARFUL (reading):

ESTEEMED FRIEND: Señor Lino Caballo, bearer of this letter, is the person who, in company with two friends, will bring to you the manifestos and the plan which they desire to put into practice in the State of Texas.

This plan being very favorable for Mexico, please aid them in every way and give the necessary instructions in the frontier States. I remain,

Your affectionate friend,

V. CARRANZA.

Do you know anything about a plan which it was the desire of President Carranza to put into practice in the State of Texas which would be very favorable for Mexico?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I do not believe there is one letter of truth in that.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do not believe that President Carranza sent such a letter?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I feel absolutely sure that is a lie.

Mr. KEARFUL. Why do you feel that so strongly?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Well, that is my conviction; but really I would not like to discuss that matter.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you acquainted with a lady known as Senorita Hermila Galindo?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I don't know her.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have heard of her, have you?

Mr. FIGUEROA. What do you say?

Mr. KEARFUL. You have heard of her? You know her by reputation?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Yes; in American newspapers I have heard something about her.

Mr. KEARFUL. You know that she is the author of a book entitled "The Carranza Doctrine," do you not?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I have read that in the American newspapers.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have never seen the book yourself?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Never, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. The following letter was addressed to Miss Galindo by President Carranza. This is a translation, of course.

Mr. FIGUEROA. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL (reading):

MEXICO, D. F., June 29, 1910.

Miss HERMILA GALINDO,

Ignacio Ramirez Street, No. 6, City:

ESTEEMED YOUNG LADY: It is necessary that your book "The Carranza Doctrine," be finished in a short time, since I desire that you immediately proceed to write a second part of it, for which purpose I shall shortly send you a blue-book, which we are about to publish and which will serve to justify the attitude of my government in its systematic hostility toward foreign speculators, especially Americans and English.

Do not forget my injunction to describe in lively colors the tortuosity of the American policy with relation to our country, causing the figure of Wilson to stand well out as the director of that policy. I also enjoin you to be very careful about the corrections which I have made in the original (manuscript) which you brought me.

I salute you affectionately.

V. CARRANZA.

I should like to ask you, if you know, what you understand President Carranza to mean when he speaks of his Government's systematic hostility toward foreign speculators, especially Americans and English?

Mr. FIGUEROA. In the first place, I do not believe that President Carranza has written that letter. It is too stupid.

Mr. KEARFUL. You think President Carranza would not be stupid enough to write such a letter?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Absolutely not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Even if he entertained those sentiments?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Well, [after long pause], I resent, Mr. Judge, your questioning me in such a way. I don't think it is proper.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of any systematic hostility toward foreigners by the Mexican Government?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I refuse to answer that question.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are informed, I assume, with respect to the diplomatic controversy that has arisen between the Department of State of this Government and the Mexican Government with reference to the oil properties?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I know something about that; I have read it; but I repeat that I would decline to discuss such matters as to my country.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it your opinion that the Mexican Government had a right to nationalize the oil properties for the benefit of the people and take them away from the foreign owners?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I decline to discuss that matter.

Mr. KEARFUL. I am only calling for your own opinion, not for the opinion of your government or anybody connected with your government. That bears upon your enterprise in this country in connection with de la Raza.

Mr. FIGUEROA. That is the third time I told you I do not write in the magazine de la Raza.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you object to giving your opinion of the right of the Mexican Government to nationalize the oil properties?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I do decline to discuss that matter.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you seen the bluebook which is mentioned in this letter that I have just quoted from Carranza to Miss Galindo?

Mr. FIGUEROA. No, sir; I have never seen it.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you understand to be the so-called Carranza doctrine?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I decline to talk about that question.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it the Carranza doctrine, in substance, that foreigners in Mexico have no right to appeal to their own Government under any circumstances, notwithstanding the property which they own may be taken away from them?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I decline to discuss that matter.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you understand the consequences of refusing to testify about a matter of fact within your own knowledge?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I do not know exactly the consequences, but, anyhow, I do decline to discuss matters of my country.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are living in this country under the protection of its laws, and you are connected with a magazine which, from an article in the December number, seems to indicate a policy favorable to the Russian Bolsheviki, and you decline to testify to your own convictions in regard to the nationalization of property, which is one of the prime elements of the Russian system.

Mr. FIGUEROA. Speaking again of the magazine, I say I am not the writer of the magazine, and it is one article signed by somebody. If you see dozens and dozens of the magazines, you will see that its policy has been very, very friendly to this country.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say that you have no commission of any kind from the Mexican authorities in this country?

Mr. FIGUEROA. Absolutely none.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have nothing to do with the Mexican secret service in this country?

Mr. FIGUEROA. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there anything further that you would like to state, Mr. Figueroa?

Mr. FIGUEROA. I do not think so, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. The committee is very much obliged to you for your kindness in attending, and if you will make out a voucher for your traveling expenses and subsistence here it will be paid.

Mr. FIGUEROA. I thank you very much, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. The matter of your refusal to answer certain questions will be considered and a determination made as to whether any further action will be taken in that respect.

Mr. FIGUEROA. All right, sir.

Mr. DESVERNINE. You might have it stated on the record that as to some of the questions which Mr. Figueroa refused to answer they contained the questioner's interpretation and construction and conclusion of legal documents and political theories and opinions which are not necessarily correct.

Mr. KEARFUL. That suggestion will be received and considered for what it is worth.

I think we will adjourn until 2 o'clock. I wish you would be here at that time.

Mr. DESVERNINE. Do you want me to come back?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes; I think so.

Mr. FIGUEROA. Do you want me to come back also?

Mr. KEARFUL. No, sir.

(Witness excused.)

(Whereupon, at 12.10 o'clock p. m., a recess was taken until 2 o'clock p. m.)

AFTER RECESS.

The hearing was resumed at the expiration of the recess.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Desvernine, will you answer some questions, please?

Mr. DESVERNINE. Surely.

TESTIMONY OF RAOUL EUGENE DESVERNINE.

(The witness was duly sworn.)

Mr. KEARFUL. Please state your full name.

Mr. DESVERNINE. Raoul Eugene Desvernine.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your business?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I am a lawyer.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your address?

Mr. DESVERNINE. 24 Broad Street, New York City, is my business address.

Mr. KEARFUL. With what firm?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I am a member of the firm of Hornblower, Miller, Garrison & Potter.

Mr. KEARFUL. You appeared here this morning as counsel for the witness, Emiliano Lopez Figueroa?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I did.

Mr. KEARFUL. You advised him, as I understand, that he need not answer any questions he did not want to answer, because nothing could be done with him upon his refusal; is that so?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I did not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you not give him such advice while you were in the hall in the presence of Mr. Paleri?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I did not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know Charles A. Douglas?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I do.

Mr. KEARFUL. What position does he hold with reference to the Carranza Government?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I do not know.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are not aware that he has been personal counsel in this country for Mr. Carranza for some years?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I knew that he was.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know now that he is not now?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I do not.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your association, if any, with President Carranza?

Mr. DESVERNINE. Our firm is counsel for the Mexican financial agency in the city of New York.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you personally been employed to supplant Judge Charles A. Douglas as President Carranza's personal adviser?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I have not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who composes the financial agency of Carranza in New York?

Mr. DESVERNINE. Do you mean who are the officials at the agency?

Mr. KEARFUL. Who are the members?

Mr. DESVERNINE. The only one I know is the financial agent, Dr. Alfredo Caturegli.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is he in this country at the present time?

Mr. DESVERNINE. He was two weeks ago to my knowledge.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is he here now?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I do not know; I have not seen him in two weeks.

Mr. KEARFUL. When were you last in Mexico?

Mr. DESVERNINE. During the months of April, May, June, and July.

Mr. KEARFUL. Of the present year?

Mr. DESVERNINE. Yes; 1919.

Mr. KEARFUL. While there did you meet an American named J. Salter Hansen?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I did.

Mr. KEARFUL. He is the person, you recall, who furnished the bail for the release of Consular Agent Jenkins?

Mr. DESVERNINE. So I read in the papers.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know J. Salter Hansen in this country?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I did not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know whether he is the same J. S. Hansen whose address was No. 172 West Seventy-second Street, New York City?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I do not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know what his occupation was or is?

Mr. DESVERNINE. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know where he is?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I do not.

Mr. KEARFUL. How old does he appear to be?

Mr. DESVERNINE. He appears to me to be a man probably 40 to 45.

Mr. KEARFUL. Does he appear to be a native American?

Mr. DESVERNINE. Yes; I would say so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know whether or not the J. Salter Hansen you met in Mexico City is the same person who is charged in the court of general sessions of New York City with an offense of committing an abuse upon a young girl and who was released on bail and defaulted?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I do not.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have heard about the circumstances of a telegram being sent by Rafael Nieto to Luis Cabrera in regard to the program for the release of Consular Agent Jenkins?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I have.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have anything to do with the preparation of that telegram?

Mr. DESVERNINE. Absolutely nothing.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any consultation with Mr. Lopez Figueroa or Rafael Nieto previous to its being sent?

Mr. DESVERNINE. Absolutely none.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know where the telegram was prepared?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I do not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know whether you or any member of your firm was consulted with reference to the sending of that telegram?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I do know that nobody, no member of our firm, was consulted respecting the sending of that telegram.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you familiar with a recent bill passed by the Mexican Senate with reference to oil matters?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I am.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you a copy of it?

Mr. DESVERNINE. Not with me.

Mr. KEARFUL. I had a copy, but I have mislaid it.

Mr. DESVERNINE. I am fairly familiar with it, because I took the trouble of translating it into English myself; I am fairly familiar with it.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the substance of that bill with reference to its enforcement of the Carrancista doctrine of nationalization of oil properties?

Mr. DESVERNINE. When you say the Carrancista doctrine of nationalization of oil properties, I suppose you refer to article 27 of the present constitution.

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. DESVERNINE. And the existing decrees of the President putting into effect article 27?

Mr. KEARFUL. And the correspondence between the Mexican Government and our State Department with reference to the matter.

Mr. DESVERNINE. I would say—this is my interpretation—that the present bill, which passed the Mexican Senate, enforces the principles of article 27 of the constitution and the existing decrees.

Mr. KEARFUL. What effect did the passage of that bill have upon the operations of the financial agency of Carranza in New York?

Mr. DESVERNINE. None.

Mr. KEARFUL. What negotiations, if any, were had by this financial agency with reference to securing financial aid for the Carranza government?

Mr. DESVERNINE. The agency never conducted any negotiations to my knowledge.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you or your firm been concerned in the conduct of any such negotiations?

Mr. DESVERNINE. We have.

Mr. KEARFUL. What effect did the recent oil bill passed by the Mexican Senate have upon those negotiations?

Mr. DESVERNINE. No effect whatsoever.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the prospect of favorable outcome of negotiations before the passage of that bill?

Mr. DESVERNINE. Well, the negotiations had gotten to a period where they were just permitted to remain in statu quo; they were not continued at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. So your answer—

Mr. DESVERNINE. Therefore, I would say that this bill in no wise affected the pending negotiations to my knowledge.

Mr. KEARFUL. You wish to be understood as saying that the negotiations being dormant, after the passage of this bill they still remained so?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I do; that is, that we made no attempt to revive them, or nothing has been done whatsoever since the passage of that bill. The loan or anything has not been discussed in any way whatsoever.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your opinion of the prospect of favorable result of the negotiations or unfavorable, as a result of the passage of that bill?

Mr. DESVERNINE. It would be my opinion that the negotiations would be greatly jeopardized by the passing of that bill.

Mr. KEARFUL. What advice did you give to your client, Mr. Emiliano Lopez Figueroa, as to whether he could be compelled to answer questions before the committee?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I read him a copy of the various sections of the Revised Statutes conferring the right upon a committee of Congress to require the attendance and examination of witnesses; I read him a copy of the two Senate resolutions creating this committee, and advised him that this committee, in my opinion, had the right to require the attendance and examination of witnesses, but it was doubtful, in my mind, as to whether or not they had such right respecting alien residents.

Mr. KEARFUL. You believe, then, that because a resident of this country is an alien he may defy the power of the Senate and Senate committees to cause him to testify as to facts within his knowledge?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I have not said so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, you said that you had a doubt about it.

Mr. DESVERNINE. I did. An examination of the law discloses that there is no precedent by any court which has so construed the statutes, so far as my examination went. I simply reported to him my examination of the authorities without any conclusions.

Mr. KEARFUL. You think that there is a doubt about the power of the Senate and Senate committees to require a man to testify to facts within his knowledge and relevant to the matter in inquiry, simply because he is a citizen of another country?

Mr. DESVERNINE. I will say that my examination of the law led me to that conclusion.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is all, unless you have some further statement you desire to make.

Mr. DESVERNINE. No; absolutely no statement.

Mr. KEARFUL. Thank you.

(Witness excused.)

(Mr. Philip Paleri was thereupon sworn as interpreter to interpret testimony of Mr. Rafael Martinez Carrillo.)

TESTIMONY OF MR. RAFAEL MARTINEZ CARRILLO.

(The witness was duly sworn.)

Mr. KEARFUL. Please state your full name for the record.

Mr. CARRILLO. Rafael Martinez Carrillo.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your profession?

Mr. CARRILLO. A lawyer.

Mr. KEARFUL. I will say whenever you have any doubt about your ability to express yourself perfectly in English you can speak in Spanish, and Mr. Paleri, the interpreter, will interpret it.

Mr. CARRILLO. To save your time.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your address?

Mr. CARRILLO. My present address is 46 Cedar Street, New York City.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your citizenship?

Mr. CARRILLO. Mexican.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long since you have been in Mexico?

Mr. CARRILLO. I left Mexico September, 1914.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was shortly after the entry of the Carrancista forces into Mexico City?

Mr. CARRILLO. One month later.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where did you live in Mexico?

Mr. CARRILLO. Independence Avenue, No. 89.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were practicing your profession there at that time?

Mr. CARRILLO. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Why did you leave Mexico?

Mr. CARRILLO. If you will permit me to make a statement before I answer that question, I will appreciate that. In the first place, for my part, I make the statement that was made this morning by Mr. Lopez Figueroa about the testimony of the Mexicans relating to the Mexican inside policies. After that I will say that I wish it be understood perfectly clear that I am not a Carrancista, nor am I connected with the Carranza government, nor can my feelings, my relations, or my thoughts in any way be connected with such a faction. In the first place, because that faction was put in power by the help of President Wilson. So that, as a Mexican, I reject any foreign interference in our Mexican internal affairs. The other reasons for which I do not agree with that faction I do not want to express now or in answer to any question that you may ask me, for the very reason that I do not like that the foreign branch of Government, expressing as this committee of the United States is doing, about the Mexican situation.

Mr. KEARFUL. I will suggest, Mr. Carrillo, you speak in Spanish and stop every sentence or two and let him translate.

Mr. CARRILLO (through the interpreter). Because I do not agree with interference of a foreign power in the Mexican internal situation. For this reason I do not like to testify officially before the Senate committee on internal questions of my country, although I refer to myself. For this reason I am not to express the other reasons for which the Carranza Government does not satisfy me.

Mr. KEARFUL. I understand that you are an exile from Mexico?

Mr. CARRILLO. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And that it would be unsafe for you personally to return to Mexico?

Mr. CARRILLO. Certainly.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you possess properties in Mexico?

Mr. CARRILLO. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what State?

Mr. CARRILLO. The State of Puebla.

Mr. KEARFUL. What has become of your properties in the State of Puebla?

Mr. CARRILLO. Some are taken by the Government, some are given to the Indians, and the others are ruined by the revolution. They have stolen all the mules and cattle and everything.

Mr. KEARFUL. By whom were the mules and cattle and everything stolen?

Mr. CARRILLO. Some by thieves, some more by the forces of Carranza.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did these transactions occur?

Mr. CARRILLO. All during five years at different times.

Mr. KEARFUL. During the five years which you have been absent from Mexico?

Mr. CARRILLO. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the extent of your properties in Puebla?

Mr. CARRILLO. It must be about 2,000 acres.

Mr. KEARFUL. Two thousand acres?

Mr. CARRILLO. Something like that.

Mr. KEARFUL. So this—

Mr. CARRILLO. No, no; about 3,000 acres; I think between 2,000 and 3,000. I want to say about 3,000 hectares, and I think a hectare is about $2\frac{1}{2}$ acres, each hectare.

Mr. KEARFUL. And you have about 3,000 hectares?

Mr. CARRILLO. Which means $2\frac{1}{2}$ acres to each hectare.

Mr. KEARFUL. That would be about 7,500 acres.

Mr. CARRILLO. Something like that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was this land under cultivation?

Mr. CARRILLO. Most of it, and there are mountains.

Mr. KEARFUL. And was the place stocked with mules and implements and everything for cultivation?

Mr. CARRILLO. In full.

Mr. KEARFUL. And all those things have been taken?

Mr. CARRILLO. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Why did you feel compelled to leave Mexico?

Mr. CARRILLO. Well, because I understood I could not be safe there.

Mr. KEARFUL. When do you expect to return to Mexico?

Mr. CARRILLO. I do not know.

Mr. KEARFUL. Upon what event would it be safe for you to return to Mexico?

Mr. CARRILLO. Well, as soon as justice reigns in my country.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you acquainted with American Consular Agent W. O. Jenkins?

Mr. CARRILLO. Yes, sir; he is my friend.

Mr. KEARFUL. You heard the testimony of Mr. Lopez Figeruoa this morning?

Mr. CARRILLO. Yes, sir; I did.

Mr. KEARFUL. In regard to the sending of a telegram by Rafael Nieto to Luis Cabrera for the purpose of procuring the release of Mr. Jenkins from prison?

Mr. CARRILLO. Yes, sir; I did hear it.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you know about the formulation of that telegram?

Mr. CARRILLO. Nothing at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any conversation with Lopez Figueroa or Rafael Nieto with reference to the sending of the telegram?

Mr. CARRILLO. Yes, sir; not about the telegram, but about the case.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you make any suggestion in regard to the matter of the case?

Mr. CARRILLO. Yes, sir; I did.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was that?

Mr. CARRILLO. That I have read in the newspapers that the court at Puebla had granted Jenkins to be free on bail of 1,000 pesos, which means $500, and one evening that I left my office later than usual I read in the Evening Sun the sharp note of the Department of State to Carranza requesting that Jenkins be put free. I understood that if Carranza surrendered that would be a very bad precedent for the justice of my country, if at any time any foreign country can ask by its Government that a person that is under authority of the Mexican court be free. So I think that would be a very bad precedent for Mexico to surrender. On the other side, I thought that if Carranza does not surrender the United States can interfere there, make intervention, and in case of intervention it would be harmful to both countries, and especially to Mexico. So that I think that if somebody would give the bail or give the money the matter could be settled in a good way for both Governments. As I have no relation with any person in that Government and as Mr. Lopez Figueroa is a friend of mine, the same evening I called up his home by phone and he was not there, so the next morning I called him again by phone. He told me that he liked the idea and if I would be pleased to go to his office and talked about that. I went immediately over there and I told him that I was ready myself to give the bail, the money; that I have some relatives who live in Puebla, and that I could send a telegram requesting them to give the bail or give the money. Mr. Figueroa answered me that he did not know anything about law, but he likes the idea, and Mr. Nieto is there and he will call to see him. So he called Mr. Nieto. Mr. Nieto came in. Mr. Figueroa introduced me to Mr. Nieto and he came with me. I told him the idea. Mr. Nieto told me that he liked it. And so I left them in that office, and I knew nothing more until after two days when I read in the newspaper that Mr. Jenkins had been released.

Mr. KEARFUL. This occurred at the office of the magazine de la Raza?

Mr. CARILLO. No, sir; I do not know where is the office of the magazine de la Raza. This is a private office of Mr. Figueroa in 120 Broadway.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you acquainted with Mr. Caturegli, the financial agent of the Carranza Government in New York?

Mr. CARILLO. Only by sight. I have talked with him socially two or three times in my life.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you approach Mr. Caturegli in reference to this matter of releasing Jenkins before you spoke to Mr. Figueroa?

Mr. CARILLO. No, sir; I went to see Mr. Caturegli about 10 days before, because I read in the newspaper a letter that the Senator from Tennessee gave to the press referring to the Jenkins case saying that Mr. Jenkins has sent that letter. It seems to me that there was something very singular in that letter from the knowledge that I have of the City of Puebla, and I went to see Mr. Caturegli with the clipping of the newspaper, suggesting to him that it would be good if he would send by telegram all that letter so that all Puebla could see if Mr. Jenkins had the position before the court as stated in the New York paper, because I had the idea this was not so. Mr. Caturegli told me that probably the Mexican consul had already sent that news to Mexico. So I did not see him any more.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say that you are a lawyer?

Mr. CARILLO. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are familiar with the law and procedure in Mexico?

Mr. CARILLO. I think a little.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know what are the provisions of the code of penal procedure in reference to releasing a prisoner under bail?

Mr. CARILLO. I do not remember at the present time exactly, but you have here some Mexican constitutions, that of 1857 or 1917.

Mr. KEARFUL. I will read to you the provision of article 443, chapter 3, of the code of penal procedure of Mexico, and Mr. Paleri will read it in Spanish.

Mr. CARILLO. I understand it.

Mr. KEARFUL (reading):

Liberty under bond may be asked by the party in interest, or by his defender, or by his legal representative.

Just repeat it in Spanish.

Mr. CARILLO. I understand it perfectly well.

(The quotation was translated by the interpreter.)

Mr. KEARFUL. And article 445 of the same law provides as follows:

When the motion is made the judge shall summon the parties, except the civil party, within the third day, to a hearing in which each one may allege whatever favors his right, and the corresponding decision, which shall be appealable in both effects, shall be pronounced immediately.

Will you repeat that?

Mr. CARILLO. I understand perfectly well, sir.

(The quotation was thereupon translated by the interpreter.)

Mr. KEARFUL. I quote now from the new codes of the federation, article 356:

Liberty under bond may be asked for by the party in interest, by his defender, or by his legal representative at any stage of the trial after the investigating declaration has been rendered.

(The quotation was translated by the interpreter.)

Mr. KEARFUL. And article 357 of the same law:

When the motion is made, the judge or court shall substantiate the incident in separate proceedings and without suspending the criminal procedure. In this incident the proofs of the party in interest offers shall be received with citation of the public bureau (attorney general's office). In the order in which the proofs are ordered received the parties shall be summoned to a hearing, which shall be held within three days, and at which the corresponding decision shall be pronounced, which shall be appealable in the effect of devolution (restored to its former state if the motion is sustained).

Mr. CARRILLO. I know all those articles.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it not clear from those articles that it is in violation of the law of Mexico for any person other than the prisoner or his counsel or his legal representative to apply for release under bail?

Mr. CARRILLO. I do not think so. Those articles speak for themselves. You are saying in your question that from those articles it appears that nobody else but the prisoner or the defender or the legal representative. The articles do not say that. The articles give to those people the power and authority to do it, but do not forbid anybody else to do that.

Mr. KEARFUL. One moment. Is there any other provision of the law of Mexico that you can cite that gives to any other person the right to apply for release under bail?

Mr. CARRILLO. Yes; I must say this about that matter: In the State of Puebla they passed a special code; it is not the code of Mexico or the federal code. The State of Puebla has its own code. But, as I read it, the provision of that code is like this one—nearly like that. When I read the newspapers and I gave this advice it was with the understanding, according to what the newspaper said, that the release on bail was already accorded when they said the amount of 1,000 pesos.

Mr. KEARFUL. Without having been asked for?

Mr. CARRILLO. I do not know how that could be, without asking for it; but I know some more. The constitution that is the supreme law of the country, being that of 1857 or 1917—either of those—says that as long as it appeared that the indicted man deserved a penalty of less than five years in prison—something like that—he must be put free under bail. That is imperative. That is a guaranty for all men and it is the duty for the judge.

Mr. KEARFUL. Provided bail is requested; is not that so?

Mr. CARRILLO. No; it does not say that. If you have a Mexican constitution here, I can show you better, in order for you to have a full idea of my meaning; but I supposed that the release on bail was already considered, according to what the newspapers said. The state of the proceedings I do not know. I know only what the press said.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, the press said, did it not, that in a communication from the department of foreign affairs in Mexico to the State Department of this country the prisoner could be released by giving bail in the sum of 1,000 pesos, and intimated that he could be released upon applying for and giving such bail. Is not that the news item you saw?

Mr. CARRILLO. Not exactly. As I read it, it was agreed to put him free under bail of 1,000 pesos; but by all means, according to our jurisprudence, according to the law of amparo, any man, any relative, or anyone taking an interest in the prisoner can act in his behalf.

Mr. KEARFUL. Over his objection?

Mr. CARRILLO. Over his objection—I do not know whether over his objection, because I think the matter is only a matter of civil effect and not of social or political or penal effects. If a man go and raise bail without the consent of the man in whose favor it is given then he would not have the right to collect the money he paid. If it is given with his consent then he has the right to be reimbursed it if he suffers some damage. For that reason I said to Mr. Figueroa that I was ready myself to give the money in behalf of Mr. Jenkins in order to make good to the Mexican Government and to the American Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. You did not furnish the money yourself, did you?

Mr. CARRILLO. No; but I offered it myself to Mr. Figueroa.

Mr. KEARFUL. You presume, do you, that as a result of that telegram the money was furnished by Luis Cabrera?

Mr. CARRILLO. I know nothing about that, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it not true under the constitution of Mexico, either the constitution of 1857 or that of 1917, that the Federal tribunal alone has jurisdiction in criminal matters of consular agents of a foreign Government?

Mr. CARRILLO. Certainly never have I thought on that question until now, and for me I think not. Of course, that is a matter of opinion, because I have heard some others different. The Mexican constitution says the Federal tribunals would have jurisdiction over the matters of the diplomatic corps and the consular agents, but I understand that is equal to the American Constitution; the United States Constitution says the same. But I understand that that refers to the Mexican diplomatic corps and Mexican consular agents, so that if a Mexican consul does something wrong in New York, the Federal courts are entitled to know about the matter. It can not refer to the diplomatic corps, because you know that a diplomat enjoys immunity. So I believe that article refers only to the diplomatic Mexican corps and the Mexican consuls. Of course, that article could be understood in some other way, but according to my understanding it refers only to the Mexican diplomats. If the Mexican Ambassador does something here in the United States and can not be punished here he would be punished in Mexico under the authority of the Federal courts, not the State courts. That is the manner in which I understand that question.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you not know that the Mexican Constitution of 1917 gives exclusive jurisdiction to the Federal courts not only of members of the diplomatic corps but also of consular agents?

Mr. CARRILLO. That is, that provision is equal to 1857 and equal to the Constitution of the United States of America.

Mr. KEARFUL. How then could it be possible that the State court of Puebla could take jurisdiction of an alleged offense by a consular agent when the constitution itself provides that only the Federal courts could have jurisdiction of such offenses?

Mr. CARRILLO. I told you, I believe, that article refers to the diplomatic corps of Mexico, to the Mexican representatives abroad and the Mexican consular agents abroad, because the United States Ambassador in Mexico is by no means under the Mexican authority. It can not refer to that diplomatic corps, because you know that the American Ambassador in Mexico has immunity. For that reason I do not think that article refers.

Mr. KEARFUL. You think that article then has no reference whatever to American diplomatic representatives or American consuls in Mexico?

Mr. CARRILLO. That is my opinion, and it is more so because the United States Constitution has an equal provision and several consuls here in the United States have been indicted by the courts of the States of the United States notwithstanding that provision of the United States Constitution.

Mr. KEARFUL. Of course, he would have to object to the jurisdiction of the court, and if he failed to object the court could proceed.

Mr. CARRILLO. Of course.

Mr. KEARFUL. You took no steps yourself to procure any of your relatives in Puebla to have Jenkins released by giving bail?

Mr. CARRILLO. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Why did not you do that instead of going to Mr. Figueroa?

Mr. CARRILLO. Because I believed that as this matter was referring to the international relations between the two Governments, it would be better done to do it without the knowledge of the Carranza government; and as I have no relations with that government, it would be necessary for me to say, as I explained to Mr. Figueroa, that I was not in favor of the Carranza government, but in behalf of my own country and in behalf of the United States, not because I believe that the United States would be a weak nation—I know how powerful it is—but I think notwithstanding it would be a dangerous step to have armed intervention in Mexico, and that is what I want to avoid by all means. It was the only idea I had, and Mr. Figueroa understood that perfectly well, the same as Mr. Nieto.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was any suggestion made that the release should be procured to be effected by some American down there?

Mr. CARRILLO. No, sir; I could not make any suggestion myself, so I said, "They don't like me." I understood there would be some other Mexicans in Puebla that would be ready to give that money.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did you understand that? Had you received communications?

Mr. CARRILLO. No; because I understand all Mexicans have feelings like mine.

Mr. KEARFUL. What induced you to feel that there was danger of American intervention in Mexico on account of Jenkins?

Mr. CARRILLO. Because that note was the second, and was in such a sharp manner that the man be free, and Jenkins a man of great capital, has millions, and don't want to give a bail of $500; that means that he is looking for some difficulty between both countries.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is not the first or the second sharp note that you have known to be addressed by this country to Mexico?

Mr. CARRILLO. No; the second. The first I don't remember about. It said that Carranza was only—it went to show the lack of—in order to mislead the public of Mexico and the United States about his lack of power to control Mexico, he was trying to prosecute Jenkins, something like that, and finished with some threat. That, of course, I understood must be very serious when it came from the chancellery of the Government. For that reason I would like by all means that that would be settled in some manner that would be dignified for the Mexican Government and for the United States, because, being free, Mr. Jenkins is now in better position to prove his innocence, if he is innocent. He can do it much better than if he was in jail.

Mr. KEARFUL. You really believed, then, that the sharp note, or at least the second sharp note, that was sent demanding the release of Jenkins meant what it said?

Mr. CARRILLO. I supposed so. Had it not been for that I would not worry.

Mr. KEARFUL. You can recall to mind quite a number of sharp notes that were sent to Mexico that produced no effect?

Mr. CARRILLO. More, unfortunately. It is true what you are saying, exactly; but we can not know if some time there could be something bad, and especially, when I could see in this case that Mr. Jenkins refused or did not want to give the bail of $500, which was nothing for him.

Mr. KEARFUL. You did not know when the time might come when the last straw might break the camel's back?

(Question translated by the interpreter.)

Mr. CARRILLO. It could be; it could be, exactly.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you personally acquainted with Luis Cabrera?

Mr. CARRILLO. Yes, sir; he has been in my office in Puebla two or three times. Those are the only times I have seen him.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have not seen him since your exile from Mexico?

Mr. CARRILLO. Oh, no; it was much before. I told you I lived in Puebla City before I moved to Mexico, and because of some business he had in Puebla he wanted to look for my help in that case.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are not familiar, then, with his recent sentiments of friendship toward Americans?

Mr. CARRILLO. No, sir; I wrote him a letter about five years ago, before I left Mexico, and he did not answer that letter, so that I have not any relation with him.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there any further statement that you would like to make to the committee?

Mr. CARRILLO. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then the committee is very much obliged to you, and if you will sign a statement of your expenses, they will be paid you.

Mr. CARRILLO. Thank you very much, sir.

(Whereupon, at 3:05 o'clock p. m., the committee adjourned to meet on Monday, January 5, 1920, at 11 o'clock a. m.)

MONDAY, JANUARY 5, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., January 5, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the Subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

TESTIMONY OF MRS. CORA LEE STURGIS.

(The witness was duly sworn.)

Mr. KEARFUL. Please state your full name.

Mrs. STURGIS. Cora Lee Sturgis.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your present place of residence?

Mrs. STURGIS. 1226 Irving.

Mr. KEARFUL. Northwest, Washington, D. C.?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have been in Mexico, Mrs. Sturgis?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did you first go there?

Mrs. STURGIS. 1906.

Mr. KEARFUL. What State of Mexico were you in?

Mrs. STURGIS. Chiapas.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of industries do they have in Chiapas?

Mrs. STURGIS. Coffee growing, cattle, and chocolate growing, and henequen.

Mr. KEARFUL. It is an agricultural country, is it?

Mrs. STURGIS. An agricultural country, yes; an agricultural State.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it good land?

Mrs. STURGIS. Oh, very fine land; some of the best land in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were there many planters in Chiapas when you went there?

Mrs. STURGIS. Well, down around Pichucalco, but where we lived there were not very many.

Mr. KEARFUL. With whom did you go to Chiapas?

Mrs. STURGIS. With my husband, Dr. Charles T. Sturgis.

Mr. KEARFUL. And were your mother and father also there?

Mrs. STURGIS. No; they came down to see me in 1913 on a visit.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what business were you and your husband engaged?

Mrs. STURGIS. The raising of cattle and coffee.

Mr. KEARFUL. How many acres of land did you have?

Mrs. STURGIS. Three thousand.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you own this land?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Bought it and paid for it?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. How many acres did you have in cultivation?

Mrs. STURGIS. We had 125,000 coffee trees—I can not tell you the number of acres we had in cultivation, but half of it was in cultivation.

Mr. KEARFUL. The remainder was grazing land?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember how many head of cattle you had?

Mrs. STURGIS. Well, when they raided us we had 300 head.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what year was that?

Mrs. STURGIS. 1917 and 1918.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have the place well stocked with work horses?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And provisions?

Mrs. STURGIS. Everything; we had a well-stocked farm; provisions of all kinds, medicines, horses, cattle, agricultural implements, and a great deal of coffee stored away.

Mr. KEARFUL. And you had some money on the premises?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Pigs and chickens, etc.?

Mrs. STURGIS. Chickens and hogs and goats.

Mr. KEARFUL. What Government existed in Mexico at the time when you first went there?

Mrs. STURGIS. Diaz.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there ever any disturbance or trouble in the State under the rule of Porfirio Diaz?

Mrs. STURGIS. Never; you were perfectly safe down there; never had any trouble.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did the people of the State of Chiapas revolt against Diaz?

Mrs. STURGIS. No indeed, they did not, and never did until they were made to.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there any trouble under the rule of Francisco Madero?

Mrs. STURGIS. No; the people seemed to like him; the people liked Madero; they were somewhat contented with Madero.

Mr. KEARFUL. Madero fell in February, 1913, and Huerta assumed the presidency.

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there any trouble during Huerta's time?

Mrs. STURGIS. No; the people in that part of the country hardly knew Huerta was in. They did not have any trouble down there. They didn't have much trouble when Huerta was in.

Mr. KEARFUL. Huerta abdicated in July, 1914.

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did the troubles begin in Chiapas?

Mrs. STURGIS. Well, when we had our first trouble was in 1915, in November, when Carranza sent his troops to our place and drove all our servants away—all our workers away.

Mr. KEARFUL. And there never was any trouble in Chiapas until the Carralcistas came in?

Mrs. STURGIS. No; not to speak of.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it safe to travel in any part of the country during the time of Porfiro Diaz?

Mrs. STURGIS. Oh, yes; you could travel at night and you could carry any amount of money with you, because we traveled at that time, too; there never was any trouble there. You were safer there than you are right here in Washington right now. Everything was safe in Diaz's administration; everybody was making money and everybody was contented.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the attitude of the natives toward you and other foreigners in Chiapas?

Mrs. STURGIS. Why, the workers of the State of Chiapas would rather work for Americans than for the natives.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the reason?

Mrs. STURGIS. Because we paid them better and treated them better.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was your first troublesome experience and when was it?

Mrs. STURGIS. It was in November. The first trouble we had was in November, 1915, when Carranza sent his troops to our plantation and drove all our workers away.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was in command of the troops?

Mrs. STURGIS. Felisando Gonzales.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he claim to be a Carrancista?

Mrs. STURGIS. Oh, yes; he commanded in a little town just 4 leagues from where we lived.

Mr. KEARFUL. What representations did he make to the native workmen in order to get them to join the army?

Mrs. STURGIS. He said to them, "Don't you want to mount your patron's horse and put on his spurs and be a señor?" Be a mister, you know, a great man.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what representations did he make in regard to looting and dividing property?

Mrs. STURGIS. He said: "We are going to drive out all the foreigners and divide their property up among the followers of Tata Carranza"—Father Carranza, that is.

Mr. KEARFUL. Tata is an affectionate term meaning daddy or something like that?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; that is it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Daddy Carranza?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes. Among the Indians and the ignorant class of people that is what they call him, Tata Carranza. And he is a daddy all right among the people down there. He has certainly complied with his word.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please proceed and describe the experiences that you had one after another.

Mrs. STURGIS. Well, that was our first experience. Then, in 1917, we were attacked by Capt. Julio Castigan and Capt. Garcia, Federal captains.

Mr. KEARFUL. Carrancistas?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes, sir; Carrancistas.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did they do?

Mrs. STURGIS. They came to our house about 8 o'clock at night and accused us of having rebels hidden in our house.

Mr. KEARFUL. Before you relate that, what was the effect upon the operation of your plantation of the representations that were made by the Carrancistas in regard to dividing up the land and taking the property?

Mrs. STURGIS. Why, the servants did not want to go away; they cried and did not want to go away, but they told them if they did not go away they would hang them.

If we catch you back working for these gringos we are going to hang you. We are going to take their property and divide it up.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what effect did that have on the operation of your plantation?

Mrs. STURGIS. Why, we lost everything; we lost all our crop. It was just in November, the coffee picking season, and we lost all our coffee crop that year, and we lost our corn and everything we had.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they take anything from the place at that time?

Mrs. STURGIS. No; just the servants; drove them away, all the workers; they took nothing else at that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you been able to work the place from then on?

Mrs. STURGIS. No, sir; from that time on we could not do anything at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. You stayed on there after that, however?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes, sir; because the American Government advised us to stay.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say the American Government advised you to stay?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; we had advice from the American consul in Frontera Diaz telling us to stay.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have heard the advices given to Americans to leave their places in Mexico, have you not?

Mrs. STURGIS. We never were advised to leave. We left word with the American authorities in Pichucalco and in San Juan and Frontera to advise us if there was anything serious, because we were in the interior of Chiapas and we had no mails at that time; the mails did not come through; and we told them to advise us if there was anything serious.

Mr. KEARFUL. You remember the incident of the taking of Vera Cruz in 1914?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; when Huerta was in.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any trouble at that time?

Mrs. STURGIS. No; it did not seem to affect the people much down there.

Mr. KEARFUL. There were no Carrancistas in there then?

Mrs. STURGIS. No; there were no Carrancistas in there then; there were Huertistas and Maderistas—that is what they call them. I call some of these names in Spanish. If you don't understand them, just tell me.

Mr. KEARFUL. What happened then, upon the occasion of the second visit to your plantation?

Mrs. STURGIS. They made us prisoners and beat us with their guns, my husband, my mother, and myself, and then they brought me out of the corner of the room—they had pushed us into the corner of the room and surrounded us by soldiers, and then they said, "Now, señora can go with us over the house and help us search for the rebels." They said we had rebels hidden in our house. Capt. Garcia took me at the point of his gun with 10 soldiers, and he says, "Now, you go over the house and we will search for these rebels."

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they find any rebels?

Mrs. STURGIS. No. My husband says, "We are American citizens and you have no right to treat us like this." He says, "You know we have no rebels in our house." He says, "Hush up your mouth, old man." That is what they called him. "Hush up your mouth."

Mr. KEARFUL. What did they say to the warning that you were American citizens?

Mrs. STURGIS. They said, "Shut your mouth." They said, "We don't care about the old America—the old gringos." They called us gringos. They said, "What are gringos to us? We are going to drive you all out, anyway." That is what they said to my husband when he said we were American citizens.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did they then do?

Mrs. STURGIS. They then carried me at the point of the gun all over the house. When they finished searching the house, of course, they found nothing. Now, they said, "You have got to climb on the roof."

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you rebel at that?

Mrs. STURGIS. I said, "I am no roof climber; I am an American citizen. You have no right to treat me like this and I am not going to climb on the roof." And with that he struck me with his gun over the shoulder.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then what occurred?

Mrs. STURGIS. And I said, "You will pay for this to the American Government."

Mr. KEARFUL. Did that cause him any uneasiness?

Mrs. STURGIS. He said to me, "Oh, your old Government is nothing but a bluff. We are not afraid of it. Tell them what you please. We are going to drive all the Americans out of here." That is the way he answered me.

Mr. KEARFUL. And divide up their property?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; that is what he said, "Divide up your property. This property belongs to Carranza."

Mr. KEARFUL. What did they do then?

Mrs. STURGIS. Then they came downstairs—I would not climb on the roof and they did not climb on the roof either. We came downstairs then. I was badly hurt. I was so hurt I could hardly hold my shoulder up. They came downstairs and pushed me in the corner again with my husband and my mother and went around the house and helped themselves to some things around the house—not very much; something to eat and some little toilet articles we had around the house, and then went away and said if we did not get out of Mexico they would attend to us.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the next experience you had?

Mrs. STURGIS. Then my husband gave an account of this outrage to the consul in Frontera, and also to the consul in San Juan, because at that time we could not get out, the revolution was so bad, and the road was full of rebels and of Carranza troops, and the one is just about as bad as the other in that part of the country. And the consul sent us a telegram and told us it was very dangerous traveling and if we had no more trouble we had better stay at the plantation, because he thought things would get better and then we could get out.

Then we had no more trouble except threatening us. We stayed at the plantation and were very careful and had no more trouble until June, 1918.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there anyone whom you could leave in charge of the plantation in case you left?

Mrs. STURGIS. We tried to get somebody, but they said, "It would be as much as our life is worth; you can't tell what they would do. We would not dare."

Mr. KEARFUL. That is what they would tell you?

Mrs. STURGIS. That is what they would tell us. "They will burn your house down. If you go away you might just as well give what you have over to the Carranza Government." That is what all the neighbors would say to us. The neighbors felt very kindly toward us; we have a great many friends among them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever have any trouble at all with any of your neighbors?

Mrs. STURGIS. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is, with the Mexicans?

Mrs. STURGIS. No; never had any trouble with them; they were always very nice to us.

Mr. KEARFUL. How were the Mexicans treated—those who owned plantations?

Mrs. STURGIS. Oh, why, they used to tie them up—the Carranza soldiers passed by our plantation with 25 Mexicans tied, with their arms tied behind them and ropes around their necks—rich ranchmen—and they carried them over to the little town 4 leagues from us and told them they were going to kill them; and I went over to the town, and of course the Mexican women in that town knew me, and me being a foreigner they came to me and said, "Can't you do anything with the commander here in the town? They are going to kill them." Of course, their wives had come in to see about it. "They are going to kill them Friday," they said. I said, "I will do what I can for you. I will see the commander of the town," who was Felisando Gonzales. And I went to see him and I said to him, "You should not kill all the innocent men; they have done nothing. If you want money, ask them for money and they will give it to you. Don't kill them. It is a shame. They are some of the best men of Chiapas."

Mr. KEARFUL. Had they rebelled against Carranza?

Mrs. STURGIS. No; they were just neutral. They stayed at the plantations. They were not Carrancistas; they were neutral.

Mr. KEARFUL. Just attending to their own business?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; just attending to their own business and working their farms. I knew every one of them—my husband, too—they were good men, good citizens, and wealthy men.

And so he told me that he was not going to kill them. He says, "I am just bluffing." So he got a fine out of each of them and turned them loose, and then they all became rebels after that. That is why you have the revolutions down there. The best people are with the revolutionaries because Carranza has made them rebels.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where were you in the point of your story?

Mrs. STURGIS. I was telling you about the attack, when we were carried away prisoners in 1918, in June.

Mr. KEARFUL. What had become of your father?

Mrs. STURGIS. My father died; that was the year before. Then my mother stayed on there because we could not get out. My father died of dropsy. He was quite an old man. And we put him there in a vault, provisionally, until we can take him out of Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. You stayed on the place until—

Mrs. STURGIS. We stayed on the plantation until June 26, 1918, when we were surrounded by these rebels commanded by Cal y Mayor.

Mr. KEARFUL. Just describe that incident.

Mrs. STURGIS. Well, they came about 10 o'clock in the morning to our house, surrounded the house, and they had with them 30 Federal soldiers known by us.

Mr. KEARFUL. Federal soldiers?

Mrs. STURGIS. Thirty Federal soldiers known by us. Of course there were Federal troops all around over the country when these rebels came out—Carranza troops.

Mr. KEARFUL. To what party did the rebels claim to belong?

Mrs. STURGIS. They were Zapatistas.

Mr. KEARFUL. They claimed to be Zapatistas?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; Cal y Mayor is commander in chief of all the Zapatistas in that section of Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. And he had with him 30 Federal soldiers whom you knew?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; some of our servants, some of our workers. They had been made Federal soldiers and they were with him.

Mr. KEARFUL. What happened at that time?

Mrs. STURGIS. They carried away all our horses and all the household utensils they could carry; robbed the house completely and carried off all of our clothes.

Mr. KEARFUL. How much money did you have in the house at that time?

Mrs. STURGIS. Twenty thousand of my husband's and $3,000 American money of my mother's; and they looted all of the provisions out of the house—salt, sugar, and medicines, and everything we had in the house. We had our plantation well stocked at that time; and they made us get ready to go to the camp. They said, "We are going to take you to the camp." And, my husband being a dentist, they said, "You must take your instruments with you, your dental outfit, to the camp." Of course he did do dental work at the plantation. A good many Mexicans came to the plantation to have dental work done.

I begged them to leave my mother at the plantation, not to take her. I said, "Mother is old and can't stand this trip. Leave her here if you take us." And they were about to put a rope around my neck for asking them. They had a rope and were to put it around my neck when I told them that. "Get ready," they said; "we don't care anything about your old mother." That is the way they answered me.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of conveyance did they provide for you?

Mrs. STURGIS. They made my husband and myself walk.

Mr. KEARFUL. How far was it?

Mrs. STURGIS. Forty miles to the camp. And my mother, they let ride on one of our horses.

Mr. KEARFUL. One of your own horses?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; one of our own horses—her horse and her saddle. They let her ride her horse. She couldn't walk, but they made me walk, and without a bonnet. I had nothing on my head. My clothes and bonnets and everything were taken away from me, and I had to walk 40 miles without a bonnet.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were there any women with this party—and soldaderas?

Mrs. STURGIS. No, no; no women with them.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long did it take you to reach the camp?

Mrs. STURGIS. We were three days going to the camp. The first day we marched 3 leagues to Texpatan—a little town named Texpatan—and, then, next morning early we heard the Carranza soldiers were already at our plantation weeding it of what was left. The Carranza troops came over from Copainala, the county seat.

They carried us to their camp. We were three days getting to the camp at Pozo Colorado. That means Red Hole in English. That was the name of the camp of this chief.

My husband said to Cal y Mayor, "Why is it you do not take these Carranza soldiers prisoners?" He says, "I was told by the Federal authorities to take you from the plantation. We work together when convenient."

Mr. KEARFUL. When convenient?

Mrs. STURGIS. In this case "We work together when convenient." He was told by the Federal authorities to take us away from our plantation. "We work together when convenient." That is what he told us.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you do or what did they do with you at the camp?

Mrs. STURGIS. They took us in the camp and they made me go to the hospital and wait on their dirty, low-down sick soldiers, amid jeers, and they would tell me, "Now we have got the gringo well done up," and they would insult me in every way and make me do all sorts of work in that hospital. And I was insulted, and I was worked up one day and I said, "You will pay for this, and pay well, too." And it was told to the general, what I had said, and he was going to hang me up. I said, "Well, hang me, then." I was provoked and thought I would just tell him.

Mr. KEARFUL. What kind of a place did they provide for you to live in?

Mrs. STURGIS. A little shack, and at night they put sentinels around our house, and they made my husband fix the teeth of the bandits and grind corn and clean camp, and made my mother sew.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have a sewing machine?

Mrs. STURGIS. They carried my sewing machine away from the plantation.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of food did they provide you?

Mrs. STURGIS. We were starved to death most all the time. I begged for food and they only gave me tortillas without salt, and we were so weak we could hardly keep up.

I used to steal food when I was in the hospital, and that is why we did not die. I used to steal beans they gave me to give to the sick and carry them out to my mother, and cooked them secretly, and that is why we did not starve.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did the bandits themselves have plenty to eat?

Mrs. STURGIS. They had plenty to eat, but they would not let anybody give us anything. There was no way we could get it. I begged on my knees for them to give us something more to eat for my mother. I said "She is old and she will die." They said "No; you lived like kings and now you can starve to death. You will never get out of here alive." That is what they said.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long did you remain there in camp?

Mrs. STURGIS. I was there, and my husband, eight months.

Mr. KEARFUL. What time was this?

Mrs. STURGIS. We were there from June to January this last year—January 18.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were there from June, 1918?

Mrs. STURGIS. To February 18, 1919, last year.

Mr. KEARFUL. Under what circumstances did you leave the camp?

Mrs. STURGIS. Well; on the 15th of September Cal y Mayor called me to his cuartel, and he says to me, "Mrs. Sturgis, I am going to send you to the camp of Gen. Zapata with letters to him."

Mr. KEARFUL. That was in the State of Morelos, just south of Mexico City?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; and I said, "I am too weak to go and I have no clothes." My clothes were almost in rags. He said, "I will get you some of your clothes from the Indian women who have them around here." I said, "I can't go and leave my husband and mother; my mother is sick and I am afraid will die." I said, "Let me take my mother with me." He said, "No; you will leave your mother and your husband here, and if you don't come back, I will kill them. I will give you two months to go and come back."

Of course I had to go; there was nothing else to do.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who went with you?

Mrs. STURGIS. An old woman and six bandits went with me and carried me as far as Minatitlan, in the State of Vera Cruz, where the English have those big oil works.

Mr. KEARFUL. You said an old woman went with you?

Mrs. STURGIS. An old woman they sent with me, an Indian squaw, the wife of a captain, to watch me.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did you carry the papers?

Mrs. STURGIS. I carried them in the soles of a pair of shoes. They nailed them in the soles of the pair of shoes and I had to put the shoes on, because I had nothing else to wear. They made the shoes right there in the camp. They had a little shoe shop there. They had everything there in the camp; it was like a little town. They had been there three or four years.

Mr. KEARFUL. How far was that camp from the Carrancista headquarters?

Mrs. STURGIS. Just about 40 miles in; a little town; there are little towns all around there. The Carranza soldiers would run away; they wouldn't think of trying to fight, because after the rebels would go out and make a raid the Carrancistas would go in after them and get what was left; what they wasted. They kind of worked together. That is a way they have. "We work together, when convenient." That is what they say down there among themselves.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you finally arrive at Mexico City?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; I went to the City of Mexico and put myself in the hands of the American Embassy, Mr. Summerlin—I saw the chargé d'affaires, Mr. George Summerlin, and told him everything and asked him what I should do.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did he advise you to do?

Mrs. STURGIS. He told me to come back the next day, and I went back the next day to the embassy and showed him the shoes I had with the letters in the soles, and they examined them. They said, "Mrs. Sturgis, would you be afraid to go into Zapata's camp?" I said, "Well, if you can't get the release of my husband and mother I am willing to do anything. If you can't get them released, and if by my going into Zapata's camp I can get them released, I am willing to do it."

Mr. KEARFUL. How far was Zapata's camp from Mexico City?

Mrs. STURGIS. They told me two days by train and three days by horseback. I had to go to Puebla and from Puebla to Clisco, and there had to take horses, five days into the mountains to Morelos, and I will tell you how it was. Then they put me in communication with two Zapatista rebels, one colonel and one lieutenant.

Mr. KEARFUL. In Mexico City?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; they were in Mexico City. They have their agents there, you know. Zapata has his agents there, a number of them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, at that time Carranza was in Mexico City with his government, was he not?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; but that don't make any difference; they have them there. I don't know how they work together.

But it was Col. Pena and Lieut. Santiago Rodriguez. They were the two men I was introduced to by a secret-service man, Mr. Jones.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Jones?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. An American?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; he was a secret-service man at the embassy. That is what he told me, and they told me, too. "One of our men will be with these Zapatistas. They will come to your hotel and you tell them everything." And I did.

Mr. KEARFUL. You delivered the papers to them?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; I showed them my shoes; they were nailed in the soles of the shoes, and I showed them the shoes. They said, "Mrs. Sturgis"—in this hotel where I was there were a great many Zapata officers, and they said to me, "To-morrow you meet me and bring Mr. Jones. I will be with you," he said. "And we will arrange for you going out to Zapata's camp."

I said to Mr. Jones, "Is that all right?" He said, "Oh, yes; don't you be afraid. Mr. Gates is a great friend of Mr. Zapata, and one of these men, Santiago Rodriguez, was the man who took Mr. Gates out to see Mr. Zapata. He is a great friend of Mr. Gates," he said. That is what Mr. Jones said, "Don't be afraid."

Of course I felt afraid, because I was pretty badly off then from the exposure I had had.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you go out to Zapata's camp?

Mrs. STURGIS. No; I went down to this place and they told me, "You can't go, Mrs. Sturgis, the bridge has been blown up to Puebla and Clisco."

That was about the 24th or 26th of September, along there. They said, "You can't go. We will have to send these letters out to Zapata by messenger." And I turned those shoes over to these people and they sent them out to his camp.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were those shoes examined by them?

Mrs. STURGIS. They were examined, but they did not take the soles off them. These letters were nailed in between the soles. I delivered the shoes to them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you see the papers yourself?

Mrs. STURGIS. No; I never did. I don't know what was in the papers, either.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did Mr. Summerlin give you any assurance of getting your mother and husband released?

Mrs. STURGIS. Well, I didn't go out to the camp and I fell sick with influenza and nearly died. I was 12 days in bed. And as soon as I got up I went down to the embassy and I told them, I said, "Time is drawing to a close; two months is nearly up, and if I do not get back to the camp I am afraid they will kill my mother and my husband." And Maj. Campbell told me, "Mrs. Sturgis, Zapata is not in his camp; he is in Guerrero, and I don't know when you can get an answer back to your letter." That is what Maj. Campbell, the military attaché at the embassy, told me. "But I will give you a man to go back with you to see if you can get the release of your husband and mother."

Mr. KEARFUL. And did he do that?

Mrs. STURGIS. He did; he sent back this Zapatista lieutenant, Santiago Rodriguez, with me, and paid his way; gave him money and gave me money to buy medicine and something to eat for my husband and mother, and sent Santiago Rodriguez back with me and paid his way, too.

Mr. KEARFUL. And you went back?

Mrs. STURGIS. We went back and got back the 16th of November to the camp.

Mr. KEARFUL. 1918?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; and I found my mother had died of starvation just three days before I reached the camp, and my husband was in a dying condition; he could not walk.

Mr. KEARFUL. What became of the money and supplies that you took back with you?

Mrs. STURGIS. The money and supplies I took back with me they took away from me. I only got to give my husband just a little something that I took back, some of the medicine, and they took it all away from me, and this Santiago Rodriguez, who they sent back with me, knew that my mother had died of starvation; the people there told him that my mother had died of starvation. My husband was in an awful condition; he was all swollen up; he could not walk, he had given up to die. He said, "Well, if my wife don't get back I won't last long; just a few more days." They just gave him tortillas to eat—tortillas without salt—little cakes, you know.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did this representative of the embassy do?

Mrs. STURGIS. This representative went to see Cal y Mayor. He was a great friend of Cal y Mayor, but Cal y Mayor would not let us out, and he went back to the city of Mexico.

I said, "Why is it that you don't take us out? What will our Government say?" He says, "I can't take you; I can't take you out. I will be back here again."

I was so discouraged and I begged him and I begged him on my knees. I said, "You see my husband is dying, and I will die, too. You see this man is a bandit, an awful bandit; he won't let us out. Why can't you take us out of here?" He says, "I can't take you, Mrs. Sturgis. I will have to go back and report to the American embassy."

And then they treated us worse than before. They put me in the woods to cut the wood until my hands were all blistered and sore, and my husband couldn't get off his pallet. And they made me grind corn and go to the woods and cut wood with an ax until the middle of January, until I was reduced to a skeleton. They took the clothes away from me when I went back to camp, and I was almost naked; had no shoes and very little clothes; and they gave me very little to eat, just tortillas and a few beans, and I was almost reduced to a skeleton, and you can imagine how my husband looked.

Mr. KEARFUL. While you were there at the camp did there come to your knowledge any German activities?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; I forgot to tell you about that.

In July while we were in there—the year before—we went in June, and then in July—Antonio Naylor—I knew him—who worked for Henry Gueral, the German vice consul in Chiapas—I knew him—Antonio Naylor told Cal y Mayor that he was sent in there by the Germans and Carranza; that they were forming an army of 3,000,000 soldiers; Germany and the Japanese and Carranza forces were going into the United States from Mexico to fight the Americans, and that the Germans had arms hidden in their hardware stores; they had plenty of arms and ammunition. That is what he told. My husband heard him and so did I; heard them talking about it. And he was to come back again, but he never came back.

Mr. KEARFUL. What, if any, representations were made to the native workmen in regard to looting in the United States?

Mrs. STURGIS. Oh, yes. Now the propaganda down there is that President Wilson is crazy, and they are recruiting people now, and they are telling them, "We will go to the United States and get lots of rich loot in the gringo country; there is lots of rich loot," and lots of the ignorant people believe it, that they can come here and get lots of rich loot in the gringo land. That is the propaganda down there now.

Mr. KEARFUL. Under what circumstances did you leave the camp finally?

Mrs. STURGIS. Well, just a few days before the—on the 14th of February last year I was grinding corn and the general came and said, "How are you, Mrs. Sturgis?" I said, "I am about dead." I said, "Why is it that you keep us in here?" I said, "What have we done? My mother has died and my husband is dying, and I can't stand this work much longer." I said, "Your father lives in the City of Mexico and he is a Zapata agent, and the American Government knows of him, and if we die you will be made to suffer for it." And that seemed to affect him a great deal, and he said they would let us out in a few days. You can imagine how glad I felt. I said, "If we die in here you will suffer for it," because his mother and father and his sisters lived in the City of Mexico and were Zapata agents.

A few days after that he came to our shack and told us he was going to let us out on the 18th, and he let us out more dead than alive. He gave me a piece of machete and gave my husband one of our horses, because he couldn't walk, and put us outside his camp on the 18th day of February, 1919.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have a horse to ride?

Mrs. STURGIS. No, indeed; I had to foot it and clean the road with the machete.

Mr. KEARFUL. How far did you go?

Mrs. STURGIS. Forty miles. We had to go to the plantation, and we only had six tortillas to eat on the way.

Mr. KEARFUL. You had to go to your own place?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; we had to go there; there was no other way.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what condition did you find the plantation?

Mrs. STURGIS. Perfectly bare of everything; even the wire fencing had been taken away. We found 30 Indians living there, some of them planting corn.

We said to them, "How is this?" They said, "The Carranza officials have given your land over to us. They said you would never come back again."

Mr. KEARFUL. Were those some of the Indians who had worked for you?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; and some of the soldiers. They have soldiers that served for 15 days and then they let them off 15 days and another lot will go in. They were soldiers and natives, some of them living on our lands. They are living there to-day.

At our plantation house we found it was in ruins, the windows all broken out, doors broken down, no cattle, no hogs, or anything. They sold our cattle. Our cattle were quite well-known cattle and well thought of around through the country, and they sold them, and our coffee was carried to the State capital. We had some 300 sacks of coffee stored and they carried it to the State capital and sold it; and sold our cattle everywhere around there, and then killed some of them. We only had 300 head at that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was any pretense made of compensating you for the land that was divided up among these Indians?

Mrs. STURGIS. We went to the State capital and the doctor went to see the governor, because we had no money.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was the governor?

Mrs. STURGIS. Villanueva—we knew him—and Gen. Esparza—we knew him too; he was the commander in the military zone.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what did they tell you?

Mrs. STURGIS. We told them we were there without any money, and we thought as they had confiscated our cattle and our money we ought to get some little money to take us to the American consul at Salina Cruz or Vera Cruz, and we said to them "As you have confiscated most of our property, can't you give us a little money." And he said, "We haven't money enough to pay our own officials and we are not responsible for Americans in Mexico." And my husband said, "Then why is it your government is recognized by the American Government if you are not responsible for Americans here?"

So we got in communication then with Mr. Baker, the American consul at Salina Cruz, and Mr. Lansing here of the State Department gave him orders to give us money to come to the United States, and that is how we got back to the United States. The Government furnished us the money.

We got back to the United States in July. We got out of prison in February and got back to the United States in July.

Mr. KEARFUL. When your land was taken and divided up amongst these Carrancista soldiers was there any pretense made that you would be compensated for it in any way?

Mrs. STURGIS. I don't know; they did not tell us. Why sure not; they don't expect to pay us for that land. They gave it over to the Indians. That is what they told us. We don't know when they divided it up, but Indians are there. And we said, "Why is it?" And they said, "The Carranza officials told us you would never come back any more; the American foreigners were to be driven out of Mexico and the land to be divided up among us."

You hear that everywhere; they have done it, too. All these plantations are full of Indians working the land, and they insult the American Government down there and call it all sorts of names, and it is no good, it is nothing but a bluff. And you have to take insults on all sides.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you paid a visit to the State Department in reference to the injuries that were done to you?

Mrs. STURGIS. My husband wrote to Mr. Lansing when he got to the United States, and told him that we were here, and he sent him papers to make up his claims against the Mexican Government; that is all.

Mr. KEARFUL. In those papers, is there anything to the effect that you must first present your claim to the Mexican courts?

Mrs. STURGIS. No; it does not say anything about it. No; they give you papers here at the State Department to make your claims against the Mexican Government. It does not say anything about the Mexican court.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you not have to state in those papers that you have presented your claim to the Mexican Government and it has been rejected?

Mrs. STURGIS. No; but when we saw the judge in Tuxtla Gutierrez, the State capital, and tried to have some papers made out and signed by witnesses, so we could present them to the American Government, showing how we were treated there, the judge told us he had been advised by the Carranza officials that if he made out any papers for us he would be shot immediately, because, you see, that would be against the Carranza government. Of course, it is a well-known fact all over the country how we were treated.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was an attempt by you to proceed in the Mexican way to make a record of it?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; to get witnesses that our place was raided and we had been carried off prisoners and that the Carranza soldiers had gotten most of the loot. And we could have gotten plenty of witnesses.

Mr. KEARFUL. At the time you were in Mexico City at the American Embassy, did they consider at all taking any steps to release your husband and mother and protect you?

Mrs. STURGIS. Who?

Mr. KEARFUL. The American officials.

Mrs. STURGIS. Well, just as I told you; they only sent that man back with me; that is all.

Mr. KEARFUL. They did not consider sending any expedition for the purpose of relieving you?

Mrs. STURGIS. I do not know; if they did, they did not tell me.

Mr. KEARFUL. They permitted you to go back?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; told me to go back.

Mr. KEARFUL. And thought it was the best thing for you to go back?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; thought it was the best thing to do, because Cal y Mayor told me, "If you bring back soldiers here, or if I see a flying machine over my camp," he said, "I am going to kill your husband and mother the first thing, if you cause my camp to be attacked." And I told the American ambassador that.

There are so many things, it is such a long story that I leave out some of them. That is what he told me, if I brought soldiers back or he saw a flying machine over his camp—that is what he called it—"I will kill your husband and mother right away."

Mr. KEARFUL. The American officials thought it was the best thing for you to make a trip back to save your husband and mother?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; that is what they thought. I think perhaps they did the best they could for me under the circumstances. But when I got back to the camp Cal y Mayor told me Santiago Rodriguez told him Carranza had given the American Government $1,000,000 to fool the people that the Mexican Government was all right.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who told you that?

Mrs. STURGIS. Cal y Mayor told me that himself; told my husband and myself that, and he said that is the reason I kept you here for three months longer, to punish your Government, because it is upholding Carranza, and they have received $1,000,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who had received $1,000,000?

Mrs. STURGIS. Fletcher, he said. That is what Cal y Mayor told me that Santiago Rodriguez had told him, that Fletcher had received $1,000,000 to uphold the Carranza Government. And I said it is not true. I didn't believe it. I said "I don't believe the American Government is so dishonest and they don't need Carranza's money. It is a lie," I said, and he was about to strike me with a stick when I upheld my Government. He had a cane in his hand and he said "Don't you say that, because it is the truth, because Santiago Rodriguez told me."

Mr. KEARFUL. Santiago Rodriguez appeared to be a confidential agent of the American Embassy down there?

Mrs. STURGIS. I don't know what he was. They sent him back with me, and I don't know. I told Mr. Campbell "I haven't much faith in this man because he is a friend of Cal y Mayor," is what I told Maj. Campbell at the American Embassy. "Oh, he is all right," they said. "I don't think so. I know the Mexicans pretty well," I said.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was supposed to be the use to which this $1,000,000 was to be put?

Mrs. STURGIS. Why, they told me—this Santiago Rodriguez told Cal y Mayor, the rebel chief, that Carranza has paid the American Government through Mr. Fletcher $1,000,000. That is the way he expressed it. "Mr. Fletcher has received $1,000,000 from the Carranza Government to tell them that Carranza is getting things under his hands, that things are going on nice in Mexico, to fool the public."

Mr. KEARFUL. You are aware, I suppose, that Mr. Fletcher appeared before the Rules Committee of the House and testified to that effect, are you? You know about that?

Mrs. STURGIS. No; I did not know that. I have been very sick here; I have not kept up with what has been going on. But that is what Santiago Rodriguez told me.

Mr. KEARFUL. If he did appear before the Rules Committee and testify to that effect it was not true, was it—the testimony that Carranza was progressing very well?

Mrs. STURGIS. Did he say that?

Mr. KEARFUL. He did.

Mrs. STURGIS. Well.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you say about it?

Mrs. STURGIS. Why, things are awful in Mexico. Why, when I went up to the City of Mexico at that time they blew a train up behind me and in front of me, and when I crossed the Isthmus—why, things are in awful condition down there.

Mr. KEARFUL. You think Mr. Fletcher's testimony to that effect was not the truth, then?

Mrs. STURGIS. Maybe he saw the other way. He did not see it the way I did. Of course, you can't tell. Mr. Fletcher is in the City of Mexico, and maybe he hasn't been out around like I have. That is what they told me, but I certainly don't believe Mr. Fletcher would do such a thing as that, perhaps—receive money. I don't think he would. I think he must be a very honorable man or he would not represent our country in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are aware that Mr. Fletcher has not been in Mexico for some time?

Mrs. STURGIS. Gen. Cal y Mayor, the rebel chief, told me Mr. Fletcher never would come to Mexico again. I didn't know it at the time; I thought he had gone home on a visit, but Cal y Mayor knew he would never come back again. That is what he told me. He told me that with a great sneer on his face.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you personally visit the State Department here in Washington?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; I did.

Mr. KEARFUL. With whom did you talk?

Mrs. STURGIS. With Mr. Johnson.

Mr. KEARFUL. What position does he hold?

Mrs. STURGIS. I don't know what he is. I went there to ask some questions.

Mr. KEARFUL. He appeared to be in charge of Mexican affairs?

Mrs. STURGIS. I went to ask some questions about my claims. Yes; I wanted to see Mr. Fletcher, but he was at Palm Beach; then I asked for Mr. Lansing. I didn't see Mr. Lansing, though; they sent me down to Mr. Johnson.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was Mr. Johnson doing at that time?

Mrs. STURGIS. I don't know what he was doing. He was there all right.

Mr. KEARFUL. He was in the department?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; because the newspaper men were there to see him; I believe about 15 newspaper men were there to see him, but he didn't see me.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did Mr. Johnson tell you about the redress that you would get?

Mrs. STURGIS. Well, he said he did not know, and I told him that I had been called before the committee, and he said, "You tell them everything; tell them the truth, just what happened to you." That is what he told me, and he asked me questions about down there, what happened to us, and when I came back, and like that, you know; and I told him.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you tell him about the report that Mr. Fletcher had received $1,000,000?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. He told you tell the truth about that as well as about the rest?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; that is what he said. I told him I didn't believe it, but Caly Mayor said, "I am punishing you three months longer because your Government is upholding the Carranza Government. Mr. Fletcher has received $1,000,000 out of the Government," he said, "to make fools out of the people, to make the Americans think things are going on all right in this country." Of course, I don't think Mr. Fletcher would receive any $1,000,000. I think perhaps Mr. Fletcher was fooled, you know. He didn't know things were in such a bad state, you know, but he would only have to ask out around and he could have found out. Of course, I understand the Indian language and the Spanish language and I heard all their conversations. When I was in hotels in Mexico I heard them talking.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where is your husband now?

Mrs. STURGIS. Why, he is in New Orleans. He is very sick. He would come to Washington, but you know we haven't anything; we are perfectly penniless and he had to go down there and my sister has been helping us out since I have been here—my sister who lives in North Dakota—because we haven't a cent of money. They got everything away from us, even our clothes. When I came to the United States I was almost without clothes, because they only gave us enough money to get home to the American Government, and since we have been here my sister has been helping us. I don't know what we are going to do. My husband is very sick. He is not able to work.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have heard expressed perhaps the policy of this Government to the effect that Americans in Mexico are not entitled to any consideration for mistreatment because they were exploiting the peons?

Mrs. STURGIS. Oh my, no.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have heard that?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; I have heard that, but it is not true. The Americans down there had certainly done well; they have tried their best to keep peace and tried to stay by their property, and always paid the Mexican peons better than the Mexicans, and treated them like white people down there and the peons all liked to work for the Americans; have great consideration for them.

Mr. KEARFUL. On this trip you made to Mexico City and back again to the camp did you pass through any parts of the country that had been inhabited by Americans?

Mrs. STURGIS. Oh, yes. Oh, I didn't tell you about the fact I was attacked the second time by Gen. Felix Diaz people. I was stopped by his people down the river in the State of Vera Cruz, and my husband is a Mason, and because I wore his Masonic emblem I was saved being carried a prisoner into the camp of Felix Diaz. Felix Diaz is a high Mason, you know, and when I went to the City of Mexico my husband said "Take this emblem. If you fall into the hands of any bandit you may come across a masonic friend," and he told me what to say and to present the emblem to them.

When they stopped me on the river and the guard was going to take me to the camp of Felix Diaz at San Cristobal, a camp of 800 men, and I told him I was going to the City of Mexico to try to get money to release my mother and husband. I didn't tell them I was carrying letters. I was afraid to tell them—going to get money to release my husband and mother, and I said, "My husband is a friend of Felix Diaz and this proves to you he is a friend," and the captain took the masonic emblem and consulted it and looked at me and said, "This woman passes and we will be here when you come back," and that masonic emblem saved me being captured again and taken into the Felix Diaz camp.

There are so many little things that one forgets to tell.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say that you observed some other plantations that had been inhabited by Americans?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; Esperanza and a big banana plantation down the Nauchantal in the State of Vera Cruz, as I went down the river with the bandits.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what condition did you find those plantations?

Mrs. STURGIS. There is not anything; they are all in ruins; their houses had been burned up, and by the Carranza people, too; everything is destroyed.

I saw the big orange plantations; they have about two leagues of orange trees planted out. That is called Esperanza. It is ruins; there is not anything there; the buildings burned up. They made fire water—whisky—out of the orange juice. That is all in ruins. I saw four plantations along the river all in ruins. San Cristobal is another one owned by Americans, where they made castor oil.

Mr. KEARFUL. What faction was in control of that part of the territory?

Mrs. STURGIS. That was in the control of the followers of Felix Diaz under Gen. Castor Lopez. He was one of Felix Diaz's generals.

Mr. KEARFUL. What forces wrought the destruction that you saw?

Mrs. STURGIS. Why, the Carrancistas. That is what they told me—the Government troops.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you see any followers of Villa at any time down there?

Mrs. STURGIS. Well, the followers of Villa are right over toward the Tuxtla country in Chiapas. I know the two men—have known the two men who are the—Gens. Pena and Fernandez are followers of Villa, and Fernandez is another general, and Castellano is another, and they come right into Tuxtla and rob what they want and chase the federals out, and come backward and forward past our place.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say they passed by your place?

Mrs. STURGIS. They passed by our place, yes; a number of these Villistas; but they never did us any harm; just the Carrancistas and Zapatistas have ruined us together, because they are the same kind of people. It looks like Zapata has the same kind of a low-down, ignorant, vicious people, and so has Carranza.

Mr. KEARFUL. And they work together when convenient?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; they work together when convenient, and a great many of the Carranza generals don't even speak the Spanish language; they speak the Indian language. They are very ignorant. Some of them can neither read nor write. I know them; I have seen them and talked with them. My husband has, too.

When Carranza sent Gen. Alvarado down to the State of Chiapas to pacify the State, instead of going about it in a patient way he began to rob the people; accused the people of being rebels. He made a regular business trip out of robbing them.

Mr. KEARFUL. He made rebels out of them?

Mrs. STURGIS. Yes; that is what Carranza is doing all over.

Mr. KEARFUL. Alvarado is the one who went to Yucatan and made himself governor?

Mrs. STURGIS. He is. I think he is one of the biggest cattle thieves in Mexico. He drove out 18,000 head of cattle in one drive.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did he do with them?

Mrs. STURGIS. Sent them to the United States and sold them. And he is an ignorant fellow. Then Gen. Mandajano is the bloodthirsty one. He is the one who killed so many people years before. However, that is what the Mexicans call him—the bloodthirsty Gen. Mandajano.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he hang them up to the trees?

Mrs. STURGIS. That is what he would do; he would hang some to the trees and some of them he would put a rope around their neck and tie them to the saddle and drag them to death, and other people he would cut the flesh off the cheekbones and off the calves of the legs and then take knives and cut their feet and then make the poor victims walk for miles, and some of them they would catch and tie up to a tree and shoot them to death little by little. That is the way the bandits did over in the camp we were at. Oh, they do awful things down there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know of any assaults upon women?

Mrs. STURGIS. Among their own women; yes, indeed; but they never touched us. That is one thing. While we were in the camp they said they were going to feed us to the alligators and going to bury us alive and going to hang us. That is what they would say, you know, but they never touched us; only nearly starved us to death.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there anything further which you think might be of interest that you have not already told the committee.

Mrs. STURGIS. It seems to me if they have all that down I think that is about all I can think of right now.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then you will be excused, Mrs. Sturgis, and we are much obliged to you.

(Witness excused.)

(Whereupon, at 12.10 o'clock p. m., the committee adjourned.)

FRIDAY, JANUARY 9, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., January 9, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate:

TESTIMONY OF MICHAEL A. SPELLACY.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your full name?

Mr. SPELLACY. Michael A. Spellacy.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your citizenship?

Mr. SPELLACY. American.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where were you born?

Mr. SPELLACY. Connellsville, Pa.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where do you live now?

Mr. SPELLACY. Los Angeles, Calif.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you ever lived in Mexico?

Mr. SPELLACY. I was most of the time, or a great deal of the time, for about eight years.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did you first go to Mexico?

Mr. SPELLACY. In 1908 or 1909; I have forgotten which.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you go there as an American capitalist for the purpose of exploiting the Mexican peons?

Mr. SPELLACY. Not exactly. I went as a driller.

Mr. KEARFUL. What part of the country did you go to?

Mr. SPELLACY. I first went to Mexico City and from there to Tampico.

Mr. KEARFUL. You worked as a driller in the oil fields?

Mr. SPELLACY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you afterwards operate in the oil fields on your own account?

Mr. SPELLACY. That and in connection with my brothers and others.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the names of your brothers?

Mr. SPELLACY. Timothy Spellacy and Peter Spellacy.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were those operations?

Mr. SPELLACY. Well, I had followed the oil business for a great many years, drilling, contracting, and I went to Alaska in the Klondike rush and came out without making anything in Alaska, and not finding any nuggets there I went into Mexico as a driller, and as an oil man. I saw a great many excellent opportunities for securing leases in the way that I had been accustomed to in the United States, and I began taking those leases in the upper fields, and later in the lower field, and began negotiations with my brothers to pay part of the expenses of securing of these leases, they and their associates. I went to Los Angeles and called together some of my friends, Capt. Lucey, Tom Kerrigan, Pop Bowles—I have forgotten his first name—and F. A. Montgomery, and several others of my friends and told them what I considered the opportunities in Mexico and about some of the leases we had secured, and that I thought it would be a good investment to operate in that country. They agreed with me and that was the first organization I had anything to do with.

Mr. KEARFUL. And did you and your associates take leases from the Mexican owners of the property for the purpose of exploring for oil?

Mr. SPELLACY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. This was new and unexplored territory?

Mr. SPELLACY. Yes, sir; altogether. We pursued the same system that we did in the United States, paying them a rental in advance and a rental per annum. Generally, in the southern fields more particularly, they not understanding royalties as we were accustomed to them in the United States, insisted on cash payments if the oil was found, in which they had no belief that we would succeed, and we paid them practically at the same rate for the same kind of territory that we would have paid in the United States for wildcat territory.

Mr. KEARFUL. What truth is there in the statement often heard in this country that Americans, especially American oil men, went to Mexico for the purpose of exploiting the Mexicans and have been engaged in that ever since?

Mr. SPELLACY. When I went to Tampico there were only two companies operating in the field, Mr. Doheny, the Mexican Petroleum Co.; at that time it was Sir Weetman Pierson, now known as the Aguila.

The poverty in Tampico was extreme. The natives, when they worked there, received about 15 cents a day of our money, and out on the haciendas they received much less. The peons would sit around the plazas with simply a small blanket over their shoulders and a few garments, barefooted. That was the usual condition of the peons in Tampico.

The Doheny company, every company, in fact, immediately raised the wages to what were very large wages in that country, and they received much opposition from the landowners and other Mexican capitalists for spoiling their cheap labor.

Mr. KEARFUL. What effect did that have upon the mode of living of the Mexican laborers?

Mr. SPELLACY. Well, it was very much improved. They became clothed, and gradually their wages were increased until they were able to buy clothing that was as good as that worn by the American employees. They are not generally very thrifty in the sense of holding money, and that went largely to jewelry and luxuries of which they had never dreamed before. American makes of high-priced goods of all kinds it seemed to be their desire to purchase for their families. They lived much better, the women and children were clothed much better, and generally it was a great improvement in the condition of the Mexican laboring man.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were there any of them educated to perform skilled labor?

Mr. SPELLACY. Gradually they were able to assume positions in offices and to do manual labor of building tanks, etc., in which their salaries were increased to practically the same level as those received by Americans in the same positions.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the scale of wages that was received before the Americans went into that field by the Mexican peons?

Mr. SPELLACY. Well, I might say from the haciendas the Tampico laborer probably received from 10 to 20 cents, American money.

Mr. KEARFUL. And to what point was that scale raised through the operations of the oil prospectors?

Mr. SPELLACY. It was gradually increased. Computing in American money the first jump was 50 cents, 75 cents, $1, $2, and in a great many instances $3, $4, and $5 per day. In the lower field amongst the Indians—they were the owners generally of their own little patches of ground on which they raised corn and beans, and had chickens and turkeys; their little villages had their churches, they had their fiestas; they had their market days at each one of these towns where they would meet in thousands coming in from the surrounding country, and I never saw a quarrel on one of those market days. They were very contented but very poor. They had no luxuries, did not wish them, and did not know what they were. After they secured the rentals from their leases—and that was a very hard thing to get them to do at first, they had always been exploited by different Mexicans who had authority in those regions and they could not realize how any person would try to do any good without selfish motives, and they were very suspicious at first. When I went into these villages they were very suspicious of me and it took me a long time to overcome that suspicion. When I would come along the little youngsters would run and hide and the old fellows would gaze at me as if I was a horse thief.

But finally it got so the little fellows would begin to poke their heads out of the bushes when I came along, and when I would hold out a centavo toward them one of the older ones would run out and grab it and run back and hide in the bushes again, but, finally, when they saw I did not hurt them they would come out gradually, and I would give them crackers, which were their main luxury, and finally they understood that when I came to town they were going to get crackers, and finally the youngsters would look out and then would say, "Señor Miguelito, give us some crackers." My name was Mike, and Señor Mike was my name through that country, and after I had been there for several months the little fellows would hang around me and act like I was the bishop that had come to town. They were the brightest little fellows you would ever want to see and you could almost tell what they were thinking. They had their little schools, but a number of them went down in their own pockets and paid the school-teacher the munificent sum of $8 a month to instruct those children. He knew a little more than the general run of Indians. In fact, when he went to try to air his knowledge when I first engaged him he showed his ignorance in one respect. He heard us speak of San Francisco and he broke in to say he knew where San Francisco was, and the interpreter asked him where San Francisco was, and he said California, Tex.

Mr. KEARFUL. Now, Mr. Spellacy, what can you say about the progress of the country as a result of the oil development?

Mr. SPELLACY. It brought general prosperity to the workingman.

Mr. KEARFUL. What about the building up of towns and schools, etc.?

Mr. SPELLACY. I did not understand—the building up of schools?

Mr. KEARFUL. The building up of towns and schools.

Mr. SPELLACY. Well, the schools—all of the companies, practically, after they got firmly established had schools at the camps for the benefit of the children.

Mr. KEARFUL. With respect to your own operations, what did you and your associates do in reference to providing for these children that you have been speaking about when you were successful in your oil operations?

Mr. SPELLACY. Well, we were what might be called small fishes in that country. Our camps were not extensive enough to introduce schools. We simply drilled one well at first at Puebla, which was successful, and we drilled one well at Panuco, which was successful, but we probably didn't employ over 15 or 20 peons in an operation of that kind, and they had no wish for schools, and we did not introduce schools.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you do with respect to setting aside a certain amount of royalty for the benefit of those people?

Mr. SPELLACY. That was in my favorite little village of Zacamixtle. In subleasing one of our leases to one of the large companies—it came to be so our properties, the small ones particularly, were bound to be grabbed because we could not afford to fight the case through the Mexican courts, and I pursued the policy on the smaller leases I had of subletting them to the larger companies, and in some cases those leases read that the Indians would get so much if wells of a certain size came in, and we forced that on them, that they should receive more money. I knew the royalty was the real wealth if I could make them see it from my point of view, but I had to give it up and without their knowledge I set aside in the sublease to one of the big companies a royalty equivalent to what I would receive for my portion, which was to be devoted to the maintenance, education, and care of the children in the district. If that territory should turn out to be good, and it looks very much like it will, it will be about the richest school district not only in Mexico but in the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were there any revolutionary troubles in that region at that time you went there?

Mr. SPELLACY. Not any in Tampico. I was there when the Madero revolution broke out, and while those peons were not receiving the rights we thought they should receive we were practically unanimous for Madero for the help and bettering the condition of the peons.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there any uprising against Huerta?

Mr. SPELLACY. No; no organized uprising of any kind in that lower oil district or in the fields; a very little trouble of any kind at that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. When was the first trouble that arose?

Mr. SPELLACY. Well, after Madero was killed. I can't remember the exact time, but it gradually increased. Huerta came in power and our sympathies became, you might say, Carrancista, because we were unused to such horrors as Huerta instituted in trying to keep himself in power, butchering, murder, lining up the people and killing them just because they differed in their opinions from him.

Mr. KEARFUL. The people in the country were favorable to Carranza at first?

Mr. SPELLACY. Yes; Americans I am speaking of, particularly in Tampico. But finally when Senator Dominguez made his will and laid it on the table and then exposed Huerta's methods and said he was sacrificing his life, which he was, our sympathies were altogether practically with Carranza. I am talking about the working men and the Americans in Tampico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Now, as to the Mexicans. After Huerta's forces were driven out and Carranza came into power was there any opposition to Carranza among the Mexicans?

Mr. SPELLACY. Immediately after I do not think so. After the first Huertistas were driven out he was very popular.

Mr. KEARFUL. What occurred to start uprisings against Carranza?

Mr. SPELLACY. Well, gradually the issuing of decrees, the autocratic power which he assumed, and the fact that his troops not only attacked American farms and seized all their horses, and their soldiers killed the cattle and sheep and horses and destroyed the crops, but attacked the Mexicans as well—the Mexicans were not immune; their crops were taken from them and their cattle seized. If a man would ask a man if he was a Carrancista, why, he would most certainly say "yes." "Well, then, we want what you have got—a large portion of it."

If a man had the temerity to say "no," which he didn't, he was lined up against the wall and shot.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who is the principal rebel leader in that country now?

Mr. SPELLACY. Manuel Pelaez. I was acquainted with him before the trouble, in securing leases down near where he had a hacienda.

Mr. KEARFUL. How was he treated by the Carrancistas?

Mr. SPELLACY. Well, in a general way all that I know they had no rights that were respected by the Carrancistas. Their property was confiscated and their crops and everything they possessed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he rebel against Carranza before he was mistreated?

Mr. SPELLACY. No. All of these people in that country were in favor of peace and quiet and Pelaez was one of that type.

Mr. KEARFUL. I understand there is a band of savage Indians in that region called the Santa Maria Tribe. What faction have they joined?

Mr. SPELLACY. They joined the Carrancistas.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you describe some of their operations?

Mr. SPELLACY. They are armed by the Carrancistas, and the other Indians unarmed are naturally very peaceful people, but the Santa Maria people began to raid their towns and villages; they attacked Tancoco and all of the population were driven up to the high mountains, women and children, and existed, or a part of them, I suppose, continued to exist for months; that was the same with a great many other villages in there. They burned Tancoco, and either they or they and the Carrancistas in conjunction burned Amatlan, San Antonio, Chenampa, and several other villages in there, but the Santa Maria Indians outdid anything in that country for savagery. Some of the natives told me when they captured them they would strip the skin off their feet before they killed them and make them stumble around on the ground before finally killing them, and they used other means of torture, but they said that was their favorite method.

They went into Mr.—they did not get a chance there; they have never tortured Americans in that way—they went into Mr. Doheny's camp at Cerro Azul, but they only committed the usual plundering there. The Indians fled and got out of the way.

If you would care for me to describe that more fully I can.

Mr. KEARFUL. Has Manuel Pelaez committed any depredations?

Mr. SPELLACY. I have never heard of but one case in which his men committed depredations. That was on Mr. Doheny's property at Juan Casiana, and when his superintendent went over and protested he found it was a drunken underofficer who had ordered it.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what was done by Pelaez?

Mr. SPELLACY. I don't know. But he has generally been very strict in discipline. I was told of one case when I was down there where an American was held up temporarily by one of his sentries. The sentry was drunk and insulted the American, and even made threatening movements with his rifle. The American proceeded finally on to Pelaez's camp, or that of Col. (now Gen.) Rabine, and stated his case. Rabine immediately got a horse and went back and shot and killed the sentry.

Mr. KEARFUL. Has Pelaez kept order in the regions controlled by him, or not?

Mr. SPELLACY. Very much, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Has he protected the property and the rights and lives of the people residing there?

Mr. SPELLACY. To the fullest extent that he has been able; and the native villages also. He does not rob them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Does he exact any tribute from the people?

Mr. SPELLACY. Not from the people; no, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. How does he support his army?

Mr. SPELLACY. By what he calls contributions from the oil companies largely. He has, from the best information obtained from men who are there constantly, particularly one superintendent of one of the camps—he states that he generally has 3,000 men. If he wishes 6,000 men he can get them, or 25,000 men if he had money and supplies and ammunition, but the 3,000 men he has constantly.

Mr. KEARFUL. You spoke of the villages that were outraged by the Carrancista savages. Were these villagers in revolt against the Carranza government, or were they peaceful?

Mr. SPELLACY. Very peaceful Indians, and wished only to keep out of trouble.

Mr. KEARFUL. What has been the opinion of the oil operators in the region controlled by Pelaez in regard to Pelaez?

Mr. SPELLACY. I do not know so much about the operators. I know more from my own driller friends and the men whose lives are in danger there that they very much prefer Pelaez to Felix Diaz or Carranza.

Mr. KEARFUL. And those are the men who are on the ground?

Mr. SPELLACY. And running the risk of their lives; yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the methods resorted to by the Carrancistas to recruit their forces?

Mr. SPELLACY. Well, very often they seized peons and threw them into the ranks at certain times. These were very often inoffensive, hard-working peons, who did not wish to go into the army, but after they were once in the ranks and found they could rob, steal, and shoot as they pleased they became typical Carrancista soldiers. In recruiting in one of the camps in the lower fields the superintendent of one of the big companies gave me an idea how the army was recruited there.

A Carrancista lieutenant or captain—I have forgotten which—had been in the camp and was trying to gain recruits. His argument was: "Look at me. A few months ago I had nothing. Now I have a thousand pesos and I have assaulted some 12 or 15 or 20 girls." I don't know the exact number. He got four recruits there.

Mr. KEARFUL. It was upon such representations as that that recruits were secured besides those who were compelled to join?

Mr. SPELLACY. Yes; that is the only recruiting information he volunteered to me.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember the incident of the taking Vera Cruz by the American forces?

Mr. SPELLACY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. On April 21, 1914?

Mr. SPELLACY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where were you at that time?

Mr. SPELLACY. I was at Tampico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What occurred at Tampico when the news of the taking of Vera Cruz reached that point?

Mr. SPELLACY. Well, will I tell the whole story or as you ask questions, Judge?

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, in reference to the protection of American citizens there and the threatening attitude of the Mexican mob.

Mr. SPELLACY. We learned through Mexican sources—the news was posted at the military stations—that Vera Cruz had been attacked and that American Marines had landed at Vera Cruz. Of course, we were very much alarmed and very much surprised very shortly after to see the American gunboats starting down the river.

Mr. KEARFUL. These were the American boats stationed in there for the protection of the American citizens in Tampico?

Mr. SPELLACY. Yes, sir; American boats.

Mr. KEARFUL. Under whose command?

Mr. SPELLACY. Admiral Mayo. And at that time, while I was not in the American consul's office, I know positively from those who were there by conversation amongst ourselves that Consul Miller insisted very strongly that Admiral Mayo stay and protect the American citizens, and the admiral, of course, was very willing to stay, but he received orders from Washington to go out in the Gulf.

Mr. KEARFUL. How far was the Gulf from there?

Mr. SPELLACY. The mouth of the river is probably 6 miles from Tampico, and before a boat was in safe water outside the Gulf was probably a couple of miles farther, or probably 8 miles from Tampico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did Admiral Mayo leave the Americans there unprotected on April 21?

Mr. SPELLACY. Yes, sir; Consul Miller insisted by his consular rights that he remain and protect the American citizens, but he said his orders from Washington must be obeyed, and he went out.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then what happened to the Americans?

Mr. SPELLACY. Mobs began to form, and we asked first for the protection of our women and children, that they be placed on the German boat, the Dresden, or the English boat, the Hermione. There was a little Dutch boat there; we didn't inquire as to that. The commander of the German boat, the Dresden, Capt. Koehler, I think, was his name, said he would permit our women and children to come aboard the Dresden, and the commander of the British boat said none but British subjects would be allowed on their boat.

Mr. KEARFUL. Before that, what did the Americans do with reference to their own protection? Did they congregate together?

Mr. SPELLACY. We began to collect what revolvers and ammunition and guns we could. We would take a rifle and take it apart, separate it, and put the barrel down the back of our coat and go somewhere else and get another and gradually accumulate what we could at the Southern Hotel and the Victoria Hotel, where the Texas Co. had their offices, and we realized if there was to be any trouble it would be at those places, particularly the Southern Hotel which was a kind of a rallying point for all Americans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were those hotels threatened by the mobs?

Mr. SPELLACY. Not until after dark as the women and children were being carried onto the boat. When it became dark the mob became more threatening and insulting to the women and their escorts, and it was reported to me while there was no actual violence they would grab their baggage and throw it in the street and seize it and jump on it, so they discontinued taking the baggage aboard.

We had, I should judge, about 50 women in the Hotel Southern at that time, and the mob began to march around with tin pans and drums. At first we left the door of the hotel open, but afterwards they began to throw rocks through the door, and I saw a man near me hit in the head and crumple down, and we thought he was dead, but he revived later, and then we thought it was time to close the doors and we did. We placed iron bars across the inside of the door. The mob continued to grow larger and more threatening. We had men up on the roof and in the upper windows who could see them collecting and being addressed by their orators, and they were hollering "Death to the gringos," and Huerta had notified them that the American soldiers and marines in Vera Cruz were taking infants by their heels and dashing their brains out against the lamp-posts, and all that kind of propaganda, and their orators were hollering for volunteers to attack the Americans, and I know there were three guns passed out to them including three women.

The mob would swarm down the street and try to break in the door of the Southern Hotel. First they were content with beating the doors with clubs, and they made two fruitless attacks that way. There was an iron lattice between us and the corner store, and they broke all these windows and smashed them, but had not made a concerted attack through that way yet. In the meantime we had collected the women and children on the second floor, and there is a little patio facing the street in the lobby, and we were standing about 8 feet in the lobby with our rifles prepared for them when they broke the door. We put the shotgun men upon the second floor and the revolver men were they could fire on the lobby to the best advantage if the mob broke in. There were not enough guns to go round. I should judge there were 150 of us in there, and some of the boys, all they had were Mexican machetes, and they were standing at the head of the stairs.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what manner were you rescued?

Mr. SPELLACY. The third attack they got planks, and while they were bumping the doors with the planks there was no impression near where the iron bars were, but near the bottom of it when they would strike the door it would open up 3 or 4 inches, and it seemed imminent they would come in, and about that time the commander of the Dresden told the governor to disperse the mob, and that if there was a single American killed he would land the marines and sweep the streets.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was the German captain?

Mr. SPELLACY. Yes. They asked the British commander to join, but he refused. And about that time they came and drove the mob away from the hotel.

A little after that we heard knocks on the door, and we distinguished that they were not Mexican voices and opened the door and three German officers came in and told us what had been done and they assured us if the women and children wished to go aboard the boat that night they could do it, but as they could see our signals from the roof if there was another attack on the building to notify them by signal and they would immediately come to our rescue. So most of the women and children remained until morning. And I wish to say in connection with that as to the bravery of these women. There was not a whimper in that crowd. They were perfectly collected and took their chances with the rest of us without a murmur.

Mr. KEARFUL. What in your opinion was the effect of the withdrawal of the American gunboats from the river?

Mr. SPELLACY. It seemed almost miraculous that every American was not killed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that had the effect of inciting the mob to violence against the Americans?

Mr. SPELLACY. Yes; not only inciting the mob but giving them practically to understand that we were at their mercy.

Mr. KEARFUL. They understood that as a desertion of the American citizens by the American gunboats?

Mr. SPELLACY. Exactly.

Mr. KEARFUL. I want to call your attention to a statement made by Admiral Mayo which was published in the New York Times on October 9, 1916, about a month before the election in this country. It was quoted in the testimony of Mr. W. F. Buckley, on page 784. In that interview Admiral Mayo stated:

It is misrepresentation to say that American citizens in Tampico were deserted in an hour of imminent danger. It is distorting facts to say that Americans, robbed of the protection of their own flag, were forced to seek refuge under the colors of a foreign power. It is not true that the Tampico affair was marked by gross bungling. The fact that close to 3,000 Americans were taken out of the city, without loss of life or destruction of property, is a result that ought to speak for itself.

Mr. Buckley controverted that statement and said that the American citizens in Tampico were deserted in an hour of imminent danger by the admiral; that they were robbed of the protection of their own flag and were forced to seek refuge under the German colors; that the Tampico affair was marked by the grossest sort of bungling, and that the 3,000 Americans spoken of by Admiral Mayo as having been taken out of the city without loss of life or destruction of property was not due to any effort by Admiral Mayo, but was due to the Germans and afterwards the British.

Which of those two statements is correct, that of Admiral Mayo or that of Mr. Buckley?

Mr. SPELLACY. Mr. Buckley.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is from your personal knowledge, as being present at that time?

Mr. SPELLACY. Yes, sir; I was there. And I wish to say, too, that the unaccountable actions of the English on the day before were not caused by the superintendents or the English commander in the field. The control of all those affairs was taken over by the British Admiralty at that time. I am confident Herbert Hallett and others of our friends would have come to our rescue if left to themselves.

The statement is made in the House of Commons now which says the English did use every endeavor to procure the fuel supply of the world. At that time the statement was the English must secure the fuel-oil supply of the world. And it was the action of the British Admiralty and not our friends in Tampico that caused us to be left in the lurch. They would not give us any assistance of any kind by order of the British Admiralty.

But when it was discovered Mr. Bryan was shanghaiing our people and not letting them come back to their property when quiet was restored, but was shipping them to Texas, the British Admiralty then did everything they could to get everybody out of the country, even going to residents in Tampico and trying to get the Mexican landlords to also try to have them taken out of the country. So the Americans were carried out then on English boats, a few French boats, and German boats, and I saw one little boat going down the river with a bunch of Chinamen with the Chinese flag. The only American flag that I know of that was raised was raised by Mr. Doheny over his launch, and the Mexicans immediately fired on that flag and caused them to pull that flag down, and they went out under the English flag. Then the Americans outside kindly allowed them to get on their boats and be carried to Galveston.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the attitude of the English as to Americans returning after the trouble was over?

Mr. SPELLACY. They were received with open arms. There had been 30 or 60 days that the United States Government let several hundred go back on their signing papers in which they renounced all rights to protection. When they got back they were received like long-lost brothers by the Mexican population who were rapidly starving. In fact, you take away the American payrolls there for 30 or 60 days and there would be starving and revolution.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is with reference to the attitude of the Mexicans. I asked you as to the attitude of the English.

Mr. SPELLACY. We were well received. We had been acquainted with those people for years. There was no more discrimination or attempt to get American territory, because there was an arrangement made soon after that that in cases of nonpayment of rentals, etc., the different companies would not jump one another's leases.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did the English do with reference to American employees?

Mr. SPELLACY. They discharged them all with one exception, I think. Mr. Hayes, who had formerly been the head of the Geological Survey of the United States—they had secured his services and he had made a magnificent organization for them down there. Their field foremen and quite a large number of their office men were Americans. As I say, with the exception of one superintendent these were discharged. I know that to be a fact, because I went up with a newspaper man when they came back and they denied that such an order had been in effect, and the newspaper man drew a copy of that order from his pocket and exhibited it, and it confused them very much, because notice had been received from Mr. Roy, I think that is the name, that there was absolutely nothing in it as to Americans being discriminated against.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was the American consul at Tampico at the time of the incident?

Mr. SPELLACY. Mr. Miller.

Mr. KEARFUL. From whom did he get notice of the landing of troops at Vera Cruz?

Mr. SPELLACY. I think from the fact it was posted on the military headquarters of the Carrancistas. In fact, up to date, he has never received any notice that the troops landed at Vera Cruz officially.

Mr. KEARFUL. No notice was given to the consul or other American officials at Tampico that Vera Cruz was to be taken?

Mr. SPELLACY. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you know of the suppression of news of the incidents occurring there?

Mr. SPELLACY. We sent a committee on to Washington to state the facts before the President and make our statement of the case. The President then or never did receive a committee of American citizens from Mexico. Mr. Bryan, however, received the committee.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was Mr. Bryan's attitude about the matter?

Mr. SPELLACY. Well, his attitude was that Americans should get out of Mexico. That was about all. He did not seem to be acquainted with the circumstances or the conditions there. In fact, Mr. Turner, one of the committee, told me that in looking for Tampico on the map he looked a couple of hundred miles south of Vera Cruz, until it was pointed out where Tampico was. And I understand Secretary Daniels understood Tampico was right facing the Gulf; but they received no satisfaction or encouragement other than to get out of the country, and the permission finally that a great many of those properties—when the oil is shut in the oil runs on the ground and there is a menace to the country if it is set on fire, and they permitted some of the people to go back by signing that paper I told you about. Others they permitted to go to their homes by using money which had been passed by Congress, and I noticed on the head of each of those tickets they were stamped "Charity ticket."

If I might suggest, the first trouble and first difficulty fell on the American colonists. We were rather new to the oil country at that time. If I am right, and I think I am, Consul Miller told me at that time there were about 3,500 Americans in the farming districts around there who got their mail at Tampico. They stayed on their farms until their crops were taken, their horses stolen, their cattle killed, and finally they came into Tampico as paupers. I think I saw in one bunch about 118 with not only the children barefoot but old gray-haired men barefoot and without hats or coats. They were taken care of by the oil companies. There is a sample. There were formerly 3,500 Americans getting their mail at Tampico, and there are now probably 150. Those were the main sufferers.

Mr. KEARFUL. They were colonists around Tampico?

Mr. SPELLACY. Yes, sir; right in territory adjoining and tributary to Tampico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you connected in any way with the Association of American Oil Companies operating in that region?

Mr. SPELLACY. I went up there once, shortly after their organization was formed, and enrolled five names with the sum of $5, just to show my sympathy, just with the object of enlightening the people of the United States of the situation of Americans in Mexico, and they said that was the object. I have never been there since and have never taken any active interest in it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you acquainted with Emiliano Nafarrate?

Mr. SPELLACY. Only by hearsay. I have seen him in Tampico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was his position in Tampico?

Mr. SPELLACY. He was the commander of the Carrancista forces in Tampico, later at Matamoros, and back to Tampico again.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember a decree that he issued in 1916 providing that laborers should be paid and merchandise should be sold on the basis of Mexican gold and that Mexican paper money should circulate at an arbitrary value fixed by him, regardless of the commercial value of the paper money, and that the hours and price of labor should be as fixed by him? Do you remember a decree of that kind?

Mr. SPELLACY. I remember it in a general way, more particularly that he claimed the right to fix the hours and price of labor to be paid. I remember that more distinctly than the other parts of his decree.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember that he called in the oil companies and they agreed to accept that decree?

Mr. SPELLACY. The oil companies did, I think, all of them—most of them—or the big companies.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember a statement addressed to the President of the United States that was drawn up there at that time by a large number of independent operators?

Mr. SPELLACY. Yes, sir; I remember signing that statement.

Mr. KEARFUL. You signed that declaration of independence, did you?

Mr. SPELLACY. If you call it that; yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. It is set out in the testimony of Mr. Buckley at page 833.

Mr. SPELLACY. Yes; we held a meeting at the Country Club and drew up those resolutions and they were sent to the border by a special messenger and sent to Washington. We then secured the signatures of those who were present and started to secure the signatures of the different companies and others interested. They practically all refused, and even some of those who had signed their names on the spur of the moment—one at least—I know a correspondent of a newspaper in the United States there and requested that his name be taken off the list.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember this paragraph in that statement: "We beg to advise the American Government that we will not obey the decree that seeks to regulate contractual relations where Americans are involved, and that we will not obey the provisions of the decree in which an arbitrary value is placed on the paper peso. To do so would be equivalent to abandoning our property."

Mr. SPELLACY. Yes, sir; I remember that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember also that this declaration was sent to Gen. Nafarrate?

Mr. SPELLACY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What effect did that have upon the enforcement of his decree?

Mr. SPELLACY. Well, I remember that the climax came at the time when he arrested an American, a building contractor, and placed him in jail because he would not agree to that decree. After this man still refusing to obey he began to count wages back and until he insisted he should pay those wages and those hours for, I think, several months prior to the time the decree was issued, and the man still stood firm, and Nafarrate finally let him go with a kind of a half apology.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was after this declaration had been served on Gen. Nafarrate?

Mr. SPELLACY. Yes, sir; he released him.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he hold the oil companies to their agreement notwithstanding?

Mr. SPELLACY. I don't know. I suppose he did if they agreed to the decree. I don't remember a great many of the details.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you have any knowledge of criminal assaults upon nuns?

Mr. SPELLACY. The only bunch that came through Tampico—and I was not there present; my friends told me—came from up near Torreon, and George Klein told me the Mother Superior was an Irish-American or Irish, I have forgotten which, and the stories were revolting. They had a school up there for children and Mr. Klein told me later his information was they suffered the same thing. The workmen mostly raised a couple of thousand dollars and sent the sisters on to Galveston.

At Vera Cruz, I am sure of the fact that Father Joyce, chaplain in the Navy at that time, made a statement that there were 96 sisters who had been abused by these people, 32 had become mothers, and a great many of the hospitals were full of these women through the country, and a great many of them killed in the interior, but we have not any actual facts as to that, except the affidavits Father Kelly secured. They were pretty hard to secure. Col. Roosevelt cried when he heard that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did any of those people come through Tampico?

Mr. SPELLACY. One crowd of them. It was the most pitiful thing I ever heard of, I think. I can't tell it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please proceed to state the circumstances so far as you know them.

Mr. SPELLACY. Well, it was the same; there have been 100,000 of their own girls who have suffered the same fate and two dozen American women, probably more Americans, for a great many of them do not publish their misfortune and their country's shame. The sisters called on God to help them, and they said, "There is no God," some of them. The mother superior, an old woman, told me some of the sisters had just come up from that way and the stories they told were too horrible to relate, and she, one of the most charitable-minded women in the world, says, "If our President can stop this, and don't, I don't see how God will permit him to live."

I want to say here I am no different from all the boys down there, but I came up and I got a Springfield and 1,000 rounds of ammunition and had them planted on the border for two years. I was ready to go in with anyone, with any decent Mexicans or Americans, whether it is against the laws or not, and I stand ready to do the same thing to-day, and every 100 per cent American in Tampico and Mexico would stand ready and be glad to do it. There are thousands of those boys right on their toes on the border ready to go over if you will shut your eyes and say "Sic 'em." It isn't a case of intervention with them; it is a case of our women being killed, our flag torn to pieces. We don't know the meaning of the word "intervention" and don't care for it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where are your property interests now?

Mr. SPELLACY. In the Tampico district, and if one of those companies accused of propaganda would open their mouths and lay their cards on the table and let their people tell their stories, instead of looking on the effect it would have on their stock, there would be a great many more facts brought out here. They haven't begun a propaganda. There is only one greater crime than publishing false propaganda, and that is withholding true propaganda, and it is full of it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think the oil companies are opposed to having the truth brought out?

Mr. SPELLACY. They have been until the present, when Mr. Carranza came out and threatened to confiscate their property. Now they are willing to whisper the facts. There is only one man who cared, and he is one of the most charitable men that ever lived, but he has his company's interests to look after, I suppose, like the rest of them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think the employees of the oil companies would be willing to come to this country in a body and tell the truth if the oil companies would pay their expenses and permit them to come?

Mr. SPELLACY. I am positive they would, although they risk their lives, but the boys down there are willing to risk it. If their companies would tell them to come and tell their stories, they would come almost unanimously, I think. But as it is they tell me now when these bandits attack them, one of the boys—Tom Allen particularly—he said he was so enraged when most of them had gone through the camp and there were only three left, and they had a revolver, he was so enraged he wanted to take the revolver and kill them, but he said, "What is the use? If I kill them it is a Carrancista soldier I kill, and if they get away they were bandits."

There have been some bandits, but the boys know the robberies and the outrages are done by the Carrancista soldiers, and when the United States Government says "We will protect property but not lives" and when the boys get tired of this and come to Tampico, Consul Miller says to them, "Go back. You are doing as good work as the boys in the trenches." Tom Allen says, "and a damn sight better. They get a chance to fight but we can't." But they went back.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do the oil companies suppress the facts in regard to the robberies and outrages committed by Carrancista soldiers?

Mr. SPELLACY. Oh, yes; the oil companies and the American Government did that right along until lately. You can't get the news in your papers. Indeed, two men told me they tried to get this in the papers and the Associated Press says, "There is a kind of censorship over Mexican news."

They can talk about propaganda and the suppression of it. Our Government has suppressed the truth, and if a committee like this can give out a few facts they should do it. Most of the companies are opposed to taking the chances. All I have got in the world is in there, but I will take a chance, and if they will take the chance and come out and tell these things, then if the American Government don't take things in hand, take them in hand themselves.

Mr. KEARFUL. How could they take things in hand themselves?

Mr. SPELLACY. As the captain of one of the American gunboats said to me one day, he said, "Why in the world, with as many Americans as you have here, don't you do like they did in Panama? Why can't you take Tampico?" I said, "Roosevelt isn't President."

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the reason for the attitude of the oil companies in suppressing the facts about outrages and robberies of Carrancista soldiers?

Mr. SPELLACY. Well, the main reason, I am afraid, was that they were making money; the second was that they consider the facts were so plain and so well known to our Government that ultimately their property must be protected. But the opinion has become general through the country and through Mexico that there is no protection for American property. I don't care so much for that, but it reminds me that I was through Peru and Brazil this summer, and whenever they would state they wanted foreign capital to come in their country, and particularly American capital, I used to look at them suspiciously, because I thought they felt American capital was easily confiscated. We have had some protection during the war, because they had to have the oil.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it true, as stated by Mr. Buckley, that operators in that region of Mexico must either bribe or fight, and that the oil companies, not being willing to fight, adopted the alternative of bribery?

Mr. SPELLACY. I am sure of that. The United States Government on this side of the bridge and the Mexican Government on the other side of the bridge seeing to it that you get no arms in there; you can't fight. There have been some arms smuggled in, but you can't fight. I could go into more details on that which I am positive are facts, but I hope these companies will make those statements, as they positively could.

Mr. KEARFUL. You think the bribery is not because they want to bribe, but because they are compelled to do so in order to continue their business?

Mr. SPELLACY. Oh, certainly. No one voluntarily stands for any extra expense.

Mr. KEARFUL. The bribery, as I understand it, consists of paying Carrancista officers and agents to do what they ought to do in accordance with their duty under the law without payment?

Mr. SPELLACY. That is the common talk through the district. Now, those boys down there with their books and their facts can probably prove that. I can only say it is the general belief.

Mr. KEARFUL. The bribery is not resorted to for the purpose of getting anything they are not justly entitled to, but simply to get some relief from impossible conditions?

Mr. SPELLACY. Oh, yes; it is absolutely necessary. And another thing, there is undoubtedly an antagonism between the Americans and the Carrancistas. The Carrancistas are the most unpopular people in that country, even with their own people, and our boys, who have had their friends murdered, don't like them a little bit, and the Carrancistas show every contempt, as a general thing, for Americans. But I can say this for Pelaez, on the other hand, that it has been quite otherwise. He was our friend during the war; would not permit any propaganda of any kind in the district; would chase out any persons that there seemed to be any suspicion were there for that purpose. And one of the boys in camp told me some years ago that he was present when Pelaez said, "If the Americans will land in this oil district and give them protection, I will not fight them; I will retire." And one of his best fighting men said, "Retire; I'll stay here and carry water for them." So I know the feelings of Pelaez and his people are not anti-American.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know how much the American oil companies are paying the Carranza Government in taxes and otherwise?

Mr. SPELLACY. No; I do not know the figures. It is increasing all the time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there any other matter of interest which you can think of which you can state?

Mr. SPELLACY. I do not know, Mr. Chairman. I do not like this accusation which is being made here about this propaganda that is being made in favor of the American oil companies, because I know from the start there it was the rural population that was the main sufferers, and not only at Tampico, but through all Mexico. It has finally concentrated in the oil region, because there is about the only district where there is any American capital which is in operation. But along the border, and particularly through there, it is generally known that some papers in Texas—I have not the facts for it—but the papers speak for themselves, that they are being subsidized by the Carrancistas to not publish the facts, and when we find any American going into Mexico and stating facts against American intervention or Americans righting of these wrongs, and in favor of the Carrancista Government, we know in our own hearts they can not as Americans state those facts and believe them. We have had one witness here, only speaking in a general way until I can find the proof, who is said to have peddled his interests along the border in favor of the Carrancistas, but I have only the statements of two men for that, and I won't make any further statement until I can get these two men and get their statements. But if you could send some one—and I will contribute to the expense of it—if you can send some man who can not be bought, like Sam G. Blythe, or some one like him, who would go there and report the truth—I can speak for every oil man—that he would contribute to the expense of that, because if any newspaperman goes in there he can make more money from Carranza than from any publisher outside, if he will misstate the case.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that has been the controlling motive of the men who have gone down into Mexico and come back and published propaganda against the American operators and in favor of the Carrancistas?

Mr. SPELLACY. I am forced to that belief by one of two things, either that they have not investigated or they are not reporting truths.

Mr. KEARFUL. And you think also that the question is very far from being an oil question; that is, the question of American rights?

Mr. SPELLACY. Altogether. It applies to Americans in every part of the country. You see, however, American operators now are confined to a very small strip and attention is drawn to it on that account, but I came up around Cananea, and around there, whatever is said there, I wish to say that Carranza's orders are being paid but very little attention to. Oil men have told me they get their orders from Carranza and take it to the governor, and if he didn't tear it up he would write something insulting on it, telling him he was running Vera Cruz. One of the boys told me they got messages going over the wire to Calles trying to get him to give Carranza a portion of the plunder he was receiving from the Cananea mines up there, but it was impossible up to the time he left for them to get anything from the governor.

Then the colonel refuses to obey the governor, the captain does as he pleases, the corporals and privates run on their own accounts. Anybody who investigates Mexico will find those to be facts and not exaggerations. So I can not understand an American not finding these conditions. They might go into Mexico City and not find these conditions, but if they go where they exist they are forced to these conclusions and to the view that we must go in there. If we did go in and straighten things out, it would be of the greatest benefit to 75 per cent of the Mexican people if we should take them and make them a part of this Government. We might do that, but it would be a mighty big task and it would not be to our interests to do anything of that kind. You can look at Texas, Arizona, California, and see what annexation has done for them, and then look at Mexico. And there are many of these Mexicans who wish we would come in and annex them. Two of the finest Mexicans that I know told me awhile ago, "While we would not dare to preach it in Mexico, the best thing for our country is annexation. We know it has gone too far for us to get Mexico in proper shape and make it an independent government—things have gone too long for anything but to have Americans take our country, it would be the best thing for us." I know these Indians down there and in a couple of years they would be chesty because they belonged to such a fine Government, and the country is full of orators who would come to Washington and join the orators here and everything would be peaceful. But it has gone too far. And another thing, the longer it goes the harder it will be.

When I first went there there was not one of these peons who now constitute this rabble of any army who knew which end of a gun to put to his shoulder, but they have been shooting and firing until some of them are pretty good shots now, and the longer it goes on the worse it will get. I understand there is a program for reorganizing the army and in less than six months there will be 2,000 officers of a foreign government in there. I see that Carranza is reforming his army, and possibly that is so. If you feed and train those fellows they will make a formidable army. They have never had enough arms and munitions, but if they get plenty of arms and munitions they will make a formidable army. There is a sort of fatalism with them. They will run, and then they will turn around and line up to be shot, and smoke cigarettes and say "Adios." They have been used to that for generations.

I think that is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KEARFUL. The committee is very much obliged to you, Mr. Spellacy.

(Witness excused.)

(Whereupon, at 3.05 o'clock p. m., the committee adjourned till Monday, January 12, 1920, at 2 o'clock p. m.)

Testimony taken at El Paso, Tex., December 22, 1919, by Maj. Dan M. Jackson, in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate:

Mrs. SUSAN A. MOORE, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

By Maj. DAN M. JACKSON:

Q. Will you state your name to the stenographer?—A. Susan A. Moore.

Q. You are the widow of John J. Moore?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where is your residence, Mrs. Moore?—A. I don't know just what you mean by that.

Q. Where do you live now?—A. At the Paso del Norte Hotel.

Q. Did you formerly live in Columbus, N. Mex.?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. For what length of time?—A. Five years.

Q. Do you recollect when you moved there?—A. 13th of December, 1912.

Q. Did you and Mr. Moore have any children?—A. No, sir.

Q. When did Mr. Moore die?—A. 9th of March, 1916.

Q. Will you kindly relate the circumstances attending his death?—

A. Now, do you want a little previous to the raid; what happened?

Q. Yes?—A. Sometime previous to the raid there had been a number of reports to the effect that Villa was going to raid Columbus, and there were also a number of strange Mexicans in town, say, for about a week beforehand. On the day before the raid, after I had had my Spanish lesson, the young lady said to me: "Mrs. Moore, you are not afraid of Villa?" I said, "No; and you?" She said, "No; I have no fear, but my mother and my brother have very much fear." There were two Mexican women in the store the same afternoon, and one of them said to the other, "Do you think there is any truth in the report that Villa will raid Columbus?" and one of them shrugged her shoulders and said, "No." After they went out I said to Mr. Moore, "Do you think there is any danger?" and he just smiled. A little later I was sitting in the back end of the store doing some lace work, and a customer entered. I got up to wait on him; as I got within about 12 feet there was a cold chill swept over me. I looked up at him; I saw he was a small man with dark eyes, black mustache. He had on one of these high-class Mexican hats, and I thought to myself, "He must be a lieutenant in the Mexican Army," and I asked him what he wished in Spanish, and he said, "Pantaloons." I was a little bit uncomfortable all the time I was waiting on him because I felt he was looking at me continually. I did not look at him any more until I handed him the change, and I took a good look at him again because I thought if it was ever necessary to know him again I would recognize him, and he smiled and took his change, and I could feel his eyes on me all the time. As he passed out he gave Mr. Moore a very earnest look. I asked Mr. Moore if he noticed him, and he said, "Yes." I said, "He must be a Mexican officer." Between that time and 6, which was about 4 o'clock, I was debating in my mind whether it would be better to stay in town that night or go out to our country home a mile and a half southwest of Columbus. I decided it would be better to go out there because if they did come in they would raid the stores and hotels, and I thought he would hardly come out of his way for just one family. We went home between 6 and 7, and we stopped at Mr. Moore's cousin's, Earl Moore, half a mile from our home, and I said to Mr. Earl, "You want to look out; they say Villa is coming to-night sure," and he laughed and said it would tickle him to death.

Q. Who was Col. Moore?—A. Earl Moore, a cousin of Mr. Moore. The next morning, as he made his escape through the back window and was crawling on his hands and knees to the barn, he thought of what I said. They took two horses from him, but he was not hurt any. About 10 o'clock I stepped out on the porch—

Q. At night?—A. Yes, sir; at night. And listened a while, and I did not hear anything, and I stepped out into the yard, and it was a beautiful moonlight night as I ever saw, clear as crystal. I could not see or hear anything, and I went back in the house rather reassured. Before retiring I laid out a heavy, long coat, just in case I should need it. We retired about 11. I studied about the situation for an hour and went to sleep. About 4.30, I should think, in the morning I was awakened by some shots, and I laid still and listened; then directly I heard a number of shots, and I thought: "That is a machine gun," and in a little while I heard some more shots from this machine gun. I did not hear any noise around the house, so I hurriedly awoke Mr. Moore. I said to him: "Look, Villa has come in, and he is burning the town." He looked out. We were on the sleeping porch facing town. He said: "You are right; we had better get dressed." We hurriedly dressed in the dark so as not to attract any attention by making a light; then we went to the front of the house and listened and looked; not seeing or hearing anything, we drew the blinds within 6 inches of the bottom of the window, so we could see out without being seen; then we went to the back of the house, and Mr. Moore stood at the pantry window, screening his body, and just put his head over so he could see, and I got up in front of the window, and he said to me: "If I were you I would not stand directly in front of the window; you might be hit by a stray shot, or some one might see you." I then went to the kitchen and sat down opposite the little kitchen table and watched the burning of the town through the kitchen window. From time to time I would go in where he was, and on one of those occasions I saw a dark object coming down the road. We watched it come to the front, and we decided it was a man on horseback. He was coming just as fast as he could come and did not even look toward the house. We watched him until he was well by, and then went back, and in a little while there were two more Mexicans on horseback come down, and they rode past.

I don't know why, but I watched the crowds come by, and then there were five and seven and nine, and as we watched these all pass I said to Mr. Moore: "Maybe we had better go to the mesquite bushes and hide." I says: "Some of these fellows may take a notion to come in." He says: "No; I don't think so; we have always been good to them, have harmed none of them, and carried them on our backs; we have nothing to fear." We went back then to the back of the house, looked up the road, and I saw a large number coming down. We went to the front of the house. I counted 17. These stopped right in front of the house; a number of them got off their horses. There was a group that stopped beside the well and was looking at the top of the water. I again said to Mr. Moore: "I wonder if any of them will come in." He said: "No; I just think they want some water." I then looked out of the north window at Mrs. Walker's gate, at the beginning of our land. There was a man on a white horse with a cape coat. He looked down the road to these men and motioned to them and then motioned to Mrs. Walker's house, and a number of them, about 10 I suppose, went over and began rapping on the door and looked in the windows. I glanced up toward town, and I saw that the road was thick with them, and they were breaking from town just like a sandstorm; I guess the entire army was coming that way. It seemed to me like a quarter of a mile on either side of the house the road was filled with men. This man on the white horse; I looked back at him; then he motioned again toward our house, and there were 40 or 50 all around the gate, opened the gate and began pouring into the yard. Mr. Moore said to me: "We had better get in the dining room; we will have better protection." I hurriedly stepped to the dining room and then heard these men come up on the porch. They tried the door, which was locked, and then one of the leaders, who had been leaning on the fence previously looking at the water and house, he took the butt end of his gun and smashed in the west bedroom window.

When I heard the crash I stepped where I could see, and I saw him just in the act of entering. Mr. Moore then opened the door. This leader came around, came in, and was followed by a number of men, just as many as could come into the house, and he said something to Mr. Moore, which I did not hear, and Mr. Moore said no. Then this man looked across Mr. Moore's right shoulder at me and said something else, which I did not hear. Mr. Moore again said no. Then this leader raised his gun and shot, and others raised their sabers, and a few began shooting and stabbing him. He made one rush for his gun, which stood right at the corner of the door, and they blocked his way, prevented him from getting it, and closed right around him. Just then I heard a number of steps on the back porch. The kitchen and dining-room doors were not locked, and a second later the dining-room door opened and the same Mexican who had been in the store the day before purchasing a pair of 32 overalls came in, with his gun just about on a level with my heart, and he said to me, "Gold, money." I told him in Spanish there was no money here; the money was in the bank in Columbus. I told him to take anything that he wanted, only to leave us. He then saw a ring on my finger—my wedding ring. I started to put up my hand—show him my hands. He came around in front of me, grabbed hold of my hand, and started to take off this ring. The house was filled with Mexicans then from all sides, and one of his men stepped up and grabbed me by the right wrist and another one by the left. This, I knew, was very tight. I had my doubts whether they could get it off. I had tried it the day before with a silk string; and thought they would cut my finger off, so I tried to help them get off my ring. As I did, he noticed two rings on my right hand, so he started to take these off. They were quite tight; I started to help him.

I looked out to see how Mr. Moore was getting along. He was about halfway across the porch and he was surrounded by these men, and the left side of his face was all bloody; there was blood all over him. I knew he was either dying or just at the point of dying—staggering. They got the two rings off then, and they started in on the other hand, and I looked out again and I saw Mr. Moore on the front steps. I knew then that he was absolutely killed. One man was taking off his rings, another man had his watch in his hand, and they were taking his clothes. I thought at that time that to save myself I would either have to outwit them or startle them, and the thought came to me to scream, and just as the wedding ring was leaving the last joint of my finger I screamed twice, and at the same time I looked toward Mr. Moore to attract their attention away from me to him, and their hold loosened on my wrist just a little. I gave one big jerk and jerked away from them. I pushed the dining-room door open, and I was shot at in the kitchen. There is a big hole there now about that big around. I ran across the porch, and as I stepped down I looked out toward the garage, and there were a number of Mexicans around the garage, and when they saw me they shouted, "Senora, senora, mira." and began laughing. The camp was about a mile from home, and I started to see if I could run there. I ran just as fast as I could. When I got within, say, about 100 yards—the bullets were flying very fast all the time—and I felt a sensation in my right leg. I knew I had been struck. I went ahead. In about 50 yards from there I fell. I knew I must not lay still, because it would mean certain death, so I got up again and went a little ways farther, and my right leg buckled up on me and I fell again. I got up again and went as well as I could, rather slowly. I had to kind of hop on one leg and carried my wounded leg. The fence was about—we had 20 acres inclosed—the fence, I think, was about 100 yards from where I was then. I thought if I could only get over the fence I would be so much safer.

I got up to the fence, and then went to get on the other side. I thought that would be impossible, because it was a rabbit-proof fence, buried about a foot in the ground; on the top was three barbed wires; I did not see how I could climb it; I knew I did not have strength enough to dig in with just my hands, but I tried, and I got over the fence without even catching any of my clothes; I fell right down side of the fence; I laid still a little while; the shots were coming just as fast as they could come; I looked back and saw that the house was almost surrounded by Mexicans in great numbers, and there were, I guess, 50 or more guns pointed in my direction, all shooting. There was a cluster of mesquite bushes about 25 feet from me; I thought if I could get over there and crawl under the mesquite bush and cover myself up with the dark coat they might think I was dead and stop shooting; I was unable to get up at all, so I dragged myself on my left side over to these bushes and got in around them as well as I could, and I had on a white waist and a gray skirt, and covered myself up so nobody would see that I was a woman, and turned my face in the other direction. I reached down; I felt that my clothes were all saturated with blood; it kind of sickened me. I thought, "Well, my time has come." I closed my eyes, and prayed, and was unconscious for the first time in my life. Later I was aroused by the sound of horses' hoofs, and I looked up and I saw the United States Cavalry; the Thirteenth Cavalry come across the corner of the 20 acres. I looked down at the house; I saw there was no one down there at all.

I then took out my handkerchief and reached as high as I could and hung it on a mesquite bush and called and waived. Directly I saw three horsemen turn out in my direction. As they came up I recognized Capt. Smyzer, with a private on either side. As they came up he said, "Why, it is a woman," and he said, "My God, Mrs. Moore." He asked me if I was hurt, and I said, "Yes; Captain, I am shot," but I said, "I can wait if you will go down to the house and see what you can do for Mr. Moore; they have killed him, and you will find him on the front porch." He said, "But we must do something for you first." I said, "I am only shot in the leg; I can wait; I would rather you would go down and take care of him." He then said to the private on the right, "Get the ambulance." This man almost turned his horse over in his haste, and he said, "All right, Mrs. Moore, we will go down and take care of Mr. Moore; we are chasing the bandits into Old Mexico, and we will have to hurry." I said, "All right." I watched them until they got down to the house, and I thought the ambulance would soon be there, and my leg was paining me terribly then and bleeding very freely, so I tore my petticoat ruffle and bound myself both above and below the wound. I closed my eyes again, and was unconscious. Just at the time I was very cold, too. It was early morning and very cold. I closed my eyes, thinking the ambulance would soon be there and I would be all right. A little later on I was aroused by pain in my leg. I looked out and I saw a number of the United States boys scouting, with their guns drawn. I raised up and motioned to them, and one of the boys came over to me and he said, "Mrs. Moore, you raised your face just in time; I thought you were a Mexican, and was going to finish him." He said, "I never dreamed of you being way out here."

A number of them rushed up then, and two then pulled off their coats and made a bed for me, and Sergt. Johnson, he just cut my clothes right down and gave me first aid to the injured, and when this was finished Lieut. Castleman, who was officer of the day, came up, and he asked if the ambulance had not arrived yet; some one said "No." He said: "See that it gets here at once." He said: "Have patience, Mrs. Moore; we are very busy this morning; you will be taken care of just as soon as we can." I said: "All right." At this point there was a woman—Mrs. Maud Hawks Wright came up, and she was dressed in a coarse linen dress with a little Dutch bonnet, and was very, very dirty. However, I was glad to see a woman, especially an American, and she came up to me and said she had been a prisoner of Villa for nine days. I looked at her; she looked like she was hungry to me. I asked her if she had had any breakfast. She said: "No." I told her when we got to town to go to any of these restaurants and get whatever she wanted and have it charged to me, and I asked her to stay with me and go to town with me in the ambulance, which she did. When they started to lift me to put me in the ambulance they thought my leg was broken or something, so they dug up a fence post and bound it to the right side of my body, so as to lift me easier. I had them bring a mattress from my home and put in the ambulance. I was taken to headquarters, where Dr. Cummings, an Army doctor, began dressing my wound. I was then taken up to the Hoover Hotel. As they passed through town I raised up sufficiently to see the hotel, Lemon & Rumney's store, and Juan Sevilla's home and some other buildings in ruins. I also saw a large number of Mexicans, dead Mexicans—dead and wounded Mexicans. As we passed the store I noticed the windows were all smashed in; the store was raided.

I arrived at the Hoover Hotel about 10:15; I had three nurses; all that night the town was heavily patrolled. The guard outside of my window told me if I could sleep to do so, he would see that no one got there. The Hoover Hotel—the floors were just covered with men that night, and women came there for protection and to spend the night. Friday, the next day, there was a great deal of excitement, as some one reported that the Mexicans were starting and were coming back. I was carried from the front room, in which I was, back to Mrs. Hoover's room, covered with a mattress, and my nurse covered herself as well as she could. I was at the Hoover Hotel Thursday and Friday, and Saturday I was put aboard the El Paso train, the same train on which the dead bodies were taken for El Paso. Mr. Moore's body was taken to the Peak establishment, as I decided to have him taken back to his home at Bucyrus, Ohio. I told them I wanted to accompany him; they told me that was impossible; but I told them to get me a ticket and make preparations, I had decided to go. I was taken to the big hospital here, Hotel Dieu, where I was again treated, and was there the rest of Saturday and Sunday, and Monday I was taken to the train and put aboard on a stretcher for Ohio. I had just one change to make at Chicago, and that was made with difficulty, because I had to be taken in and out of the window, and at the latter part of the journey I had to be turned about every five minutes, I was in such pain. When they got within about two blocks of the depot at Bucyrus I looked out of the window, and I saw a funeral procession; this was Mr. Moore. My train cut the procession right in two. This was as near as I got to attend the funeral.

Q. Now, Mrs. Moore, what business was your husband engaged in at Columbus?—A. Merchandise, dry goods.

Q. Approximately, what was the amount of stock he carried there?—A. Well, we had a stock, I should think, about $10,000 or $12,000.

Q. General merchandise?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You had been engaged in business there since 1912?—A. Yes, sir. Mr. Moore had a partner, Mr. Peck. I said to him one day, "What is the use of dividing the profits as long as we are going to stay out here in this awful country?" I says, "We can take it ourselves, and be through that much sooner." I said, "I will be your partner." He laughed and said, "No; I don't want you to." I said, "Well, you can use my name; we can get through that much sooner." So I said, "I will tell you what you do, let him buy us out or we will buy them out—him and Mrs. Peck." So it fell our lot to buy them out, and the firm became Moore & Moore then. I did not do anything in the store. I just loafed down there a good deal, because it was more agreeable than staying at home.

Q. You owned a merchandise business in the town of Columbus?—A. Yes, sir. At the time we took it over we owed the bank money, and we owed quite a bit for merchandise, and things were not paid up, were not cleared up. I was absolutely helpless, so I gave a power of attorney, and I was away for—let me see—March, April and May; returned to Columbus the latter part of May. I was very unhappy up there. I did not think I would ever see this part of the country again. But I decided if I ever paid out the debt—got out clear—I would have to come back and see how things were going. I came back, and things were not going right. I was not being treated altogether fairly, and I knew then—I knew I would just never get out of debt if I did not take charge myself, so I revoked my power of attorney, and on the 14th of June I took entire charge of the store, and I conducted the business up until March 8 of this year. All this time I had to live in the back end of the store, with a revolver under my pillow and another one up in the front end of the store. During these three years there have been a number of reports to the effect that Villa was coming back, so I just lived in fear all the time; I was afraid of a nervous breakdown.

Q. You owned about a twelve thousand stock of merchandise. Where was your residence in reference to the town of Columbus?—A. A mile and a half southwest of the town.

Q. A mile and a half southwest?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How far were you from the border?—A. Mile and a half.

Q. When did you first learn that your husband was dead, Mrs. Moore?—A. Before I left the house; I could see him.

Q. You say he was shot and stabbed?—A. Shot and stabbed, and his body was just mutilated. They did not let me see him afterwards; they did not let his sister know. I know because I just saw what they were doing.

Q. Do you know whether or not there was a post mortem on his body there?—A. I don't know.

Q. Was his body prepared for burial there or here?—A. I think something must have been done there to get it to El Paso, and then taken to Peak's establishment, and then further taken to West & Co. there, and was further fixed up.

Q. This was on what day in March?—A. March 9, 1916.

Q. You stated in your preliminary statement that you had had some notice or warning of a raid?—A. Yes, there were a number of reports.

Q. Ma'am?—A. I would say for six weeks or more.

Q. What were they?—A. You would just hear—people would come in the store and say they heard Villa was going to raid the town; some would laugh, and say nothing to it, and others were uneasy.

Q. Was the rumor persisted in; did you hear it often?—A. Quite often, the last part, within a week of the time it occurred. Quite often.

Q. Was that from the Americans or Mexicans or both?—A. Both.

Q. Who was the commanding officer at that post?—A. Col. Slocum.

Q. Did you ever hear him talk in regard to the anticipated raid?—A. I don't recollect anything definite. People would come in the store and they might say something, and they might not.

Q. Had you been living in the store before this raid?—A. We had one room at the back end of the store. We had a couch we could make into a bed any time we might choose to stay there.

Q. Did you go to your residence this night by reason of fear of a raid?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Your store is right in town?—A. On Broadway—the center.

Q. What was your home worth?—A. I don't know, exactly, but I think we spent $4,000 on the building, and the well cost us in the neighborhood of $1,300.

Q. Was the house damaged by the raid?—A. This is the condition of it, standing idle; people have torn the metal out [referring to photograph].

Q. Were the windows broken?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you suffer any loss of personal property from the raid?—A. Well, yes; there were three rings and a number of things in the house. I had a very handsome bunch of paradise, worth about $75; they were gone. I had a hand-painted vase I brought from New York with me, worth about $35, and a number of things taken from the house—household effects. When I went back it seemed like it was almost empty. We had three tables in the store that overalls were piled upon, size 30 on one, and 31 was on another. When I got back, it seemed to me like there was about a dozen pair left.

Q. Did you take an inventory?—A. No; I did not.

Q. Did you approximate what you lost out of your place of business?—A. The man who had charge did; I don't know what was taken out; I was gone for three months, and the store opened up, I believe, on the 13th again for business. He told me he did not buy any more than what he had to to carry on the business with, because I had decided to sell and get away as soon as I could.

Q. Then there was no approximation made?—A. No, sir. Before the raid the store was just jammed from the floor up to the ceiling, we had the heaviest stock we ever had, we were doing a good business, but after I went back and looked around I hardly knew the place. My first thought was simply to go back and close out everything and get away, go back to New York to my home, and I saw that would be impossible if I was ever out of debt, and the only thing to do would be to take charge, and do the business, while it was there to be had. The troops were in Old Mexico then. So I took charge, and did all the buying and bookkeeping and everything like that. I did not know anything about it. So as to know what price I would ask I told the drummers I was going to take charge. I said: "If you want me to buy from you, you will have to help me, when you make out your bill make out also the retail price I shall charge, so I can get my bearings," so they all did this, and I worked the stock down to a very small amount; and then the latter part of last February there was a report that everybody was very much concerned about. Mr. Burton, the telephone man, I know he backed his machine in the garage, so he would not have to take time to turn it around, so if anything happened. Mr. French did the same thing, and I don't know how many others. I stayed all night with these people, and one of the captains, who lived near the Burtons, came over and asked permission to leave his wife there in case anything happened he had to go on duty. Nothing happened. So along about the 1st of March there was another report that was very strong. I just thought I could not stay any longer.

Q. I am just trying to get at what was the loss in personal property there by reason of the raid?—A. I just don't know.

Q. Did you lose any silverware from your residence?—A. No; two or three days before the raid I gave it to a party, and they did not get any of it.

Q. You lost your watch and rings?—A. His watch, and all of his clothes, except two suits of underwear. He had a number of good suits. His ring was taken, his watch, and his clothes, and a number of—I don't know what they took out of the house.

Q. Do you know the approximate value of the property taken?—A. No.

Q. And you have not approximated the value of the property taken from the store?—A. I can not do that.

Q. As you went to the hospital that morning, did you learn whether the store had been broken into?—A. Yes, sir; the windows were all smashed in. The front of the store was all smashed in.

Q. Now, you say the raid occurred; you saw the fire about half past 4 in the morning?—A. I would think so; we did not make any light. I don't know what time it was, I did not want to attract any attention.

Q. How long was it after you noticed the fire before the American lieutenant came up to you, the American captain?—A. I would think it only took about, I would say about 15 or 20 minutes for them to attack the house and us, and kill Mr. Moore, until I got away. I think 20 minutes would cover all of that. I don't know how long I was out there in the mesquite bushes.

Q. Was it after daylight?—A. Yes, sir; after daylight. In fact, before I left the house it was light enough to see well, you know.

Q. How old a man was Mr. Moore?—A. Forty-two.

Q. Did you suffer from this wound, Mrs. Moore?—A. I am suffering right now, so far as that goes; my legs are a little sore, and at times I limp.

Q. What physician attended you here?—A. Dr. W. L. Brown.

Q. Now, this is a picture of your residence prior to the raid?—A. We built it and got it in shape like that the first summer, it was built in 1913. On the right we had a beautiful rose bush, and a rose garden all around here, and a rose bush around here. This is the vineyard with 81 vines, which were bearing, and then out here to the south of the house we had about 10 acres in fruit trees. That was the first summer, so at the end of 1916 you see we had got it in very good shape. As it is now I can not get anybody to live there. I succeeded in getting a few people in for a short time.

Q. Would you like to leave these photographs with the committee?—A. Yes, sir. Here is a newspaper clipping from the Tribune, and here is a little sketch of Mr. Moore.

Q. Now, you spoke of a Mrs. Wright that came to you?—A. Maud Hawks Wright.

Q. Where is she now, Mrs. Moore?—A. I have no idea. She was the one that was Villa's prisoner for nine days, and Mrs. Slocum brought her here to El Paso. She is the one that Villa killed her husband, and took her child. There was quite a bit in the paper about it, I think the child was cared for by a Mexican woman, and she got it afterwards.

Q. This story here you have handed me, with head lines "Columbus Raid, Mrs. Lillian Riggs"?—A. Yes, sir; she was the custom man's wife.

Q. Now, Mrs. Moore, you say the Mexican who held you up and robbed you of your wedding rings, was the man to whom you had sold the pantaloons?—A. No. 32.

Q. Do you know his name?—A. I do not.

Q. When was this in reference to the raid?—A. The day before, about 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

Q. You have described his dress?—A. Yes, sir; he had on a pair of overalls, I don't know what kind of leggins, and this beautiful Mexican hat was what attracted my attention, and then his eyes were very piercing, and he had a rather heavy mustache, and heavy eyebrows, was quite an unusual man, and I recognized him instantly when I saw him the next morning.

Q. Do you think of anything else you would like to say, Mrs. Moore?—A. I think that is all.

Q. Mrs. Moore, were you familiar with the Villa soldiers?—A. Yes, I think so. These looked more like bandits to me. They were not dressed in soldier's dress at all—just dressed every way.

Q. Did you recognize anyone aside from the one you have spoken of, to whom you sold the pants? Did you recognize any of the balance of them?—A. No.

Q. Did they seem to be in charge of anyone, any officer with them?—A. Yes, sir; I think there were three officers. The man who came in on me and the man who stood at the fence looking over at the water sometime, he looked like this fellow Lopez.

Q. How did you recognize him as Lopez?—A. I saw a picture in the paper of him later on, I could not swear to it, but it seemed to me to be the same man.

Q. Martin Lopez?—A. Yes, sir. And then there was a man who was on horseback—I could only see this party's face, as he motioned like this—he was an officer of some kind—I don't know—I saw Villa once, and he was about Villa's build, and his general style; I can not say it was Villa.

Q. Was he the man you spoke of as being on the white horse?—A. Yes, sir; he was on a white horse, with a cape coat. I only saw him standing in the road on this horse; did not see him sufficiently well to say who it was; from general appearance he resembled Villa; whether Villa or not I can not say.

Q. Was it your impression that he was in charge of the expedition?—A. Yes, sir; he stood there; they did not do anything until he came up. He stood there and motioned to Mrs. Walker's house, and then motioned to our house, and then came in.

Q. What statement did Mrs. Wright make to you?—A. She said she had been taken prisoner by Villa.

Q. At what place?—A. I don't remember. That her husband was killed, and she did not know what became of her baby; they took her baby.

Q. And that she had been a prisoner for nine days?—A. Nine days; and she said they treated her just fine; when I asked her if she was hungry she said "Yes." She said she had not had anything to eat for about nine days except raw meat. When they got hungry they killed a mule or horse and each one of them would take a piece of meat; if any was left they would hang it on the horns of their saddles; when they got hungry again they would eat it.

Q. Did she tell you whose force this was?—A. She said she had been a prisoner of Villa for nine days. I assumed it was Villa's force.

Q. Did she say whether there had been any indignities heaped upon her?—A. No; she said they had been just fine.

Q. Did you understand from Mrs. Wright that she had been taken prisoner in Mexico?—A. I don't know; she did not say. I have been in the hospital twice since then. My ankle here—I am inclined to think this is a result of nervousness—I cut it to the bone, and Dr. Brown took care of it.

Q. Did you cut it on the barbed-wire fence?—A. No; this was since I came to El Paso. I dropped a bowl and cut it to the bone; a piece flew back and cut my ankle to the bone. Dr. Hughes put in two stitches that night, and the next morning I had to be carried in a chair out of the hotel to the hospital, and Dr. Brown put in a number of stitches; he had to cut it up here to catch the ligaments.

Q. You still, I understand, was suffering from the nervous shock?—A. Yes, sir. I feel this was the result of it, because everything I touch, you know, I am just as nervous as I can be.

Q. What is your permanent address, Mrs. Moore?—A. Before I came out here, Walcott Hotel, New York City; then Columbus; and then came here to the del Norte; then I went back to Columbus; then came back to the del Norte Hotel again for a couple of weeks, and went over to the Y. W. C. A.

Q. You can be reached there by letter?—A. I am going to Columbus to-morrow.

Q. That is for the holidays?—A. Yes, sir; I only expect to stay there two weeks.

(The claim for damages, photographs of the Moore home, and the newspaper clippings were deposited with the committee.)

Testimony taken at El Paso, Tex., December 26, 1919, by Maj. Dan M. Jackson, in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate:

JOSEPH ALLEN RICHARDS being duly sworn, testified as follows:

By Maj. DAN M. JACKSON:

Q. What is your name?—A. Joseph Allen Richards.

Q. What is your age?—A. Thirty-five.

Q. What is your business?—A. Switchman.

Q. Where have you recently been employed?—A. The last switching I have done was on the M., K. & T. at Parsons, Kans.

Q. During the month of October, this year, were you employed?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you a civilian employee of the Army?—A. Of the Army? Yes, sir.

Q. As such employee, did you have anything to do with the recovery of the bodies of the aviators who were lost in Lower California?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you remember their names?—A. Cecil Connelly and Frederick B. Waterhouse.

Q. What was your first information or knowledge of the whereabouts of these bodies?—A. I found them while on a trip to Mexico in the Bay of Los Angeles, Lower California.

Q. Is that on the east or west coast of the peninsula?—A. Now, I want to ask you a question in regard to the coast; the west coast is on the Pacific side?

Q. In reference to the port of Guaymas, which is across the bay from the peninsula?—A. No, sir; it is right across from the Tiburon Island.

Q. It was then on the west coast?—A. No, sir; it was between Sonora and Lower California, on that side. The Gulf is between the two.

Q. It was at a point opposite the Tiburon Island?—A. The Tiburon Island; yes, sir.

Q. What was the approximate date you discovered these bodies?—A. Twenty-first of September at 12 o'clock.

Q. In the day?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Just relate the circumstances under which you happened to find these bodies.—A. I was a passenger on board the Mexican steamer called Navari, of Santa Rosalia. I had come from the mouth of the Colorado River on the same boat, and we had no drinking water, so we pulled into the Bay of Angel to replenish the stock of drinking water—11 kegs. I took a keg and went up to the spring and filled it. I was the first man back to the boat, so when I got back I began walking around the beach looking for sea shells. I smelled an awful strong odor, and about 10 feet from where my keg was I seen a mound of dirt sticking up. I went over there and I seen a human skull in the sand. I dug the skull up and looked at it; it was such a small skull. Then I took part of a turtle shell and dug in the sand and hit against a boot. I reached down with my hand, got hold of the boot, and pulled on it. I pulled him clean out of the sand. About 6 inches of sand was over him. I pulled him out and made an examination of him, and I seen he had on the Army uniform. This man had on high-laced boots, with knee-cord Army pants. I searched him, and in his right-hand pocket he had a pair of gold cuff buttons, with the fancy letter "C" on them, and—I don't know what you call it—a pair of bird wings, with a propeller in the center of them.

Q. Insignia of the Aviation Corps?—A. Something like that. It stood straight up and down, and one little short bar—about that long—silver. That is all this man had on him. I went and got a shovel then from the boat, the crew did, and dug this other man up. I took their clothes off down to the knee and examined them and found black hair on one and sandy hair on the other. The other man had in his watch pocket just one of these propeller wings and a lieutenant's bar. He had on a pair of ox-blood shoes, leather leggins, marked: "Hanan Brothers, New York." I then dug a grave 4 feet deep, but both of them in it side by side and buried them and went on to Santa Rosalia.

Q. This was on what date?—A. September 21.

Q. Who was master of this boat?—A. I have got his name here—Alejandro Abaro, captain of the steamer Navari.

Q. What was the size of this boat?—A. She was, oh, I judge about 50 feet long; just a small steamer that plies in the gulf.

Q. How many passengers were aboard of it?—A. Me and this Italian, the only passengers that came down.

Q. Do you know the Italian's name?—A. William Rose.

Q. Do you know where he is now?—A. I suppose in South America; he was headed that way.

Q. Was he present at the findings of these bodies?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who was present besides you and the Italian?—A. Eleven Mexicans and the captain, and a Mexican prostitute.

Q. Did you find any evidence there of violence to these men aside from the crushed skulls?—A. One man's head was crushed, and the other man's back was all bloody—his underwear and clothing.

Q. Could you approximate how long these men had been dead?—A. From the waist down the bodies were in perfect condition, but up here was all eat out. There was no meat on the skulls. I judge they had been there about 10 or 15 days.

Q. Had there been an effort made to bury the bodies when you found them?—A. They had been covered over; yes, sir; with about 6 inches of sand.

Q. How far back from the beach were they, or the high water?—A. Just about the high-water mark.

Q. Was there any evidence of a wharf where a boat might have been tied up?—A. No. We just pulled in and dropped anchor.

Q. How far is this spring you went to back from the beach?—A. About a good 200 yards.

Q. Was there anything to detect it from the bay?—A. Yes, sir; green olive trees, and some other kind of fruit trees.

Q. You caused some snapshots to be made of the location of the spring?—A. Yes, sir. Here is the spring right here. [Exhibit 1.]

Q. What is that X marked there?—A. That is where the inquest was held, in that house. Here is another one [Exhibit 2]; that is the olive trees there. That is where the bodies were found. [Exhibit 3.]

Q. After having buried these bodies you proceeded with the boat to Santa Rosalia?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When did you arrive there?—A. Arrived there on the morning of the 25th.

Q. Of September?—A. Yes, sir. A storm held us in a little port there for two days.

Q. Did you have any occasion at the port of Santa Rosalia to notify anyone about these bodies?—A. Yes, sir; I went aboard an American steamer called the Providencia, of San Francisco, and made a sworn statement, and showed him these things I had taken.

Q. Was that a private-owned boat?—A. Company boat.

Q. Do you know the master of the boat?—A. No; I had his name. The boat, right now, is in dry dock in San Francisco.

Q. You don't know her owners?—A. Yes, sir; I did. I beg your pardon; she was sold the other day to Boleo Co., of Santa Rosalia, a French mining company.

Q. You made this sworn statement to the master of that boat promptly?—A. Yes, sir; as soon as I got there.

Q. Had you had any talk with the master of the little Mexican steamboat?—A. Yes, sir; he told me if I valued my life and liberty I had better never open my mouth of what I had seen.

Q. When did he tell you that?—A. About 30 minutes after we pulled out, aboard the Navari.

Q. Was that said in the presence of anyone else?—A. In the presence of this Italian, and Mexican crew; they were all around me.

Q. You are familiar with the Spanish language?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You speak it fluently?—A. Pretty fluently; yes, sir.

Q. You have had many years experience?—A. Seven years down there.

Q. Now, what did you do after making this affidavit to the master of the Providencia?—A. Why, I went ashore then; he was just about ready to leave; the Providencia was. He told me he would wire just as quick as he got out of the zone; I don't know what he meant by that. He said: "As quick as I get out of the zone, the three-mile zone, I will wire." So when I went ashore nobody bothered me for an hour, and when the Providencia pulled out I was arrested.

Q. What reply did you make to the master of this Mexican boat when he told you not to tell this thing, Mr. Richards, if any?—A. I just told him "All right; I would keep my mouth shut."

Q. Did he know of your visit to the Providencia?—A. Yes, sir; he watched it.

Q. How did you make it to that boat?—A. I just boldly walked up to it.

Q. Oh, they were all in the same harbor?—A. He could not help but see me, because his boat was about 50 yards from the Provi- dencia, and the dock ran right right around in a half circle. He could not help but see me.

Q. You say about 30 minutes after the Providencia had cleared you were placed under arrest?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. By whom?—A. By the captain of the port.

Q. You mean an officer of the Government?—A. Officer of the Government; yes, sir.

Q. Do you know his name?—A. No; I do not; he is an old man, about 55 or 60 years old, wears glasses, with long gray whiskers.

Q. Did he place you under arrest in person, or have it done?—A. He had it done by two men in uniform; they had white uniforms on and military caps. I judge they were navy caps, or something.

Q. What statement, if any, was made to you at the time you were apprehended?—A. They took me up to the office and asked me my business aboard the Providencia. I told him I went up there to see if I knew any of the crew; he called me a God damn liar! he says, "You went up there to report the finding of the two murdered men." I says, "I don't necessarily know they were murdered." He says, "That is what you told the captain of that boat you went to."

Q. Who told you that?—A. The captain of that port. He says, "You God-damned gringos come down here and start trouble when we don't bother you." I says, "I have not started any trouble at all," he says, "You will wish you hadn't before we get through with you."

Q. What happened then, if anything?—A. He wanted me to sign a document there, I did not know what was on it. This was about an hour later. I did not know what was on it. I refused to sign it. He went outside, then two policemen came and took me to jail.

Q. How long were you in prison?—A. I was in prison from Saturday, about 11 o'clock, until Sunday evening.

Q. Was this on the 25th?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. On the day of your arrival there?—A. The day of my arrival; yes.

Q. What was your treatment while you were prisoner?—A. Mighty rough.

Q. What did they do to you, if anything?—A. Well, they took my clothes all off of me the first thing they done, stripped me naked in a little cement hole about—you could just lay down in it—that was all dirty and filthy—no toilet in there. They took me in there, took my clothes off, and I asked them for a drink of water and the guard, I asked him, he said besame el culo, meaning kiss my —, and I did not say nothing. So they changed guards. When the new guard came on I asked him could I have a drink of water, he said, "sure," he asked me if I had any money, I said: "They taken $10.50 away from me." He said: "I will get it for you," so I stayed there without any clothes until they let me go.

Q. What formalities did you go through after they let you out?—A. They brought this paper there and I just signed it.

Q. Did you know what the paper contained?—A. No, sir; I don't until this date. They took me up on the hill to the juzgado menor—that is, the lower court.

Q. And the military authorities took you in charge?—A. They took me in charge; they treated me a little better.

Q. What did they do with you then?—A. Well, they took me up there—this was about 4 o'clock in the evening. They gave my clothes back and took me up there, and the secretary of the town, they call him; he is a half Mexican and half Frenchman. He told me I was charged with robbery. I asked him who in hell I had robbed, and he said: "You robbed dead bodies." I says, "All right." Then he put up the argument to me: "Why didn't you come to the Mexican authorities when you landed here with this story and these articles instead of going to an American captain on that boat?" He says, "You are in Mexico now, not in America." I told him I did not know any different; I was ignorant of the law. He says, "Well," he says, "We have got a charge of robbery against you and the charge of molesting corpses before inquest was held." I told him I was ignorant of both laws; I had not robbed anything. I got kind of bewildered in talking Spanish; I got all mixed up; I did not know anything about them big words, so the judge, Juez de Primera Instancia—he is the mayor of the town—I went and got him; he talked English good, just as good as I do; he is a Mexican. He says: "I can not act officially; I can act as interpreter for you," is what he told me, "but," he says, "I will give you a little help." So he came in there; he says, "You ask whatever you want to and I will interpret it for you, so then I just put the case up to this district attorney," I says: "Suppose I was to come along and find your brother and father murdered in the sand, and I was to dig them up and try to find out who they were and bury them a little deeper, so the coyotes would not eat them up, would you call that an inhuman act or a human act?" I says, "I done this just through an act of humanity," and so they got to studying it over a little bit, and the captain of the port came up again while I was arguing my case; he says, "Throw the gringo bastard in jail; don't let him go," he says, "He done reported to the United States now, so you might as well hold him."

So they got to figuring how many days the Providencia had been out of Santa Rosalia. She had been gone then a day and a half. I says: "All right, you call me a gringo if you want to; I never said I am a gringo; I am a German, born in Berlin; I am not a gringo." This captain of the port asked me: "Can you talk German?" I say: "Just as good as I talk English." He says: "I will damn soon find out whether you can or not"; so he never got anybody up there to talk German to me; if he had of, I don't know—well, there was nobody came up. They asked me two or three times where I was going; I told them South America. They went and got this Italian then and asked him if I was going with him to South America. He says: "Yes; I am paying his way." He never came to me all the time I was in trouble until they sent for him. So he told them I was going to South America, and they let me go.

Q. Do you remember the date you were discharged?—A. Sunday evening.

Q. Then where did you proceed to?—A. To Guaymas.

Q. Aboard what?—A. Aboard the Prickison, sister ship of the Providencia.

Q. Was it owned by the same people who owned the other boat?—

A. Yes, sir.

Q. When did you land in Guaymas?—A. The next morning.

Q. Did you land in Empalme or Guaymas?—A. Guaymas.

Q. What did you do then, if anything, in regard to this information you had?—A. I never said a word; I kept it to myself; and I went up to the—I had no money—I went up to the general manager of the Southern Pacific de Mexico Railroad and told him I had worked down there, was stranded, and would like to get transportation to the United States. He gave it to me.

Q. Where did you come out of Mexico?—A. Nogales.

Q. On what date?—A. On the 28th.

Q. 28th of September?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What, if anything, did you do then toward reporting this information?—A. I went right to the intelligence department. They got me, I did not get them. They were waiting for me to come out, the consul at Guaymas had wired them I was coming.

Q. The American consul?—A. Yes, sir; Mr. Yost.

Q. Had the Providencia made a report of your story?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long did you stay in Nogales?—A. I was in Nogales from the 28th to the date of that telegram there. I don't quite remember the date when that telegram came.

Q. This is apparently a copy of a telegram from Harris, adjutant general, addressed to you at Nogales, dated 11th of October, 1919.—
A. The 12th of October I left Nogales for San Diego.

Q. To whom did you report?—A. To Maj. R. S. Bratton.

Q. You went where?—A. To Los Angeles, and from Los Angeles to San Diego.

Q. Then what did you do?—A. They kept me in San Diego, I think it was, four days, four or five days, then I went aboard the United States destroyer Aaron Ward 132, and started for Mexico.

Q. Is this a picture of the destroyer [Exhibit 4]?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did Maj. Bratton accompany the expedition?—A. Yes, sir; he was in charge of it.

Q. When did you put into the Port of Angel?—A. On the 19th of October, about 5 o'clock, we put in.

Q. Did you have any trouble locating the bodies?—A. No; about five minutes.

Q. You went with the crew?—A. We went in in a power boat; left the battleship out so in case there were any Mexicans there they could catch them, and the boat came in afterwards.

Q. What did you do then?—A. Took shovels—we had shovels—I took a shovel and dug around the bodies, then we put a guard up that night, then the next morning we went in and dug them up and put them in caskets.

Q. Took them aboard the boat?—A. They examined them first, the Mexican authorities.

Q. Where did you pick up the Mexican authorities?—A. At Ensenada.

Q. Did they accompany the expedition from Ensenada, then?—
A. All the way up and back; yes, sir.

Q. When you got the bodies aboard the boat where did you go?—

A. We went 20 miles up the coast to where the aeroplane was.

Q. Did you know anything about the aeroplane?—A. Only from overhearing a conversation.

Q. Whereabouts?—A. From the crew on the first ship down; I had overheard them make the remark that the aeroplane was worth salvaging.

Q. Worth salvaging?—A. Yes, sir; they could sell the engine of it.

Q. Do you remember whether they were members of the crew or officers of the steamboat?—A. The whole works, the whole business. Now, there is another incident there I would like to mention before we leave. Up by Angel, going down on the first boat, they pulled around a bend there to what is known as the old mine, American-owned mine, by Mr. Thompson, of Nogales, to-day owns it. He had a coal pile there and a Ford truck, auto truck. The crew of the Navari stole the engine out of the Ford truck.

Q. On the trip you were with them?—A. On the trip I was with them, and stole 17 sacks of coal, but I did not know then it was an American-owned mine until I got back. I was telling some people in Nogales about it, and Mr. Thompson came up and told me it was his property.

Q. When did you overhear this conversation about the aeroplane being worth salvaging before you discovered the bodies or afterwards?—A. Afterwards.

Q. Had you heard anything about the aeroplane before you found the bodies?—A. No, sir; but from the action of the crew and the action of the men they knew it was there.

Q. And it was through this conversation that you knew where the wreck of the aeroplane was?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you have any trouble discovering the aeroplane?—A. No, sir; we seen it right on the boat.

Q. That was the first time you had seen it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was there one or two machines?—A. One.

Q. Do you remember its number?—A. No, sir; come to thing of it, I never seen any number.

Q. Was it intact?—A. Yes, sir; the picture is there.

Q. Had it been damaged in any way?—A. Only some minor parts taken.

Q. Is that a picture of the aeroplane? [Exhibit 5.]—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did it have the insignia of the United States painted on it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Bull's-eye?—A. Yes, sir; painted underneath the wings.

Q. What did you do with the aeroplane?—A. They dismantled it, took the engine and all parts worth salvaging aboard, and burned the frame, and put a small monument up there.

Q. What is this a picture of? [Exhibit 6.]—A. That is the engine being taken aboard.

Q. After salvaging the machinery, where did you proceed to then?—A. We went back to Santa Rosalia.

Q. What was done there, if anything?—A. I don't know; I did not go ashore.

Q. Did the officers of this destroyer go ashore?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You don't know of your own knowledge what was done?—A. Only what Maj. Bratton told me, that they had demanded those papers they got me to sign, and my personal effects.

Q. Did he get them?—A. He got the paper, but nothing that belonged to me.

Q. Do you know where the paper is now?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you ever have the paper translated to you?—A. No, sir.

Q. You don't know what its contents were?—A. No, sir.

Q. When did the boat get back to the United States?—A. I think it was on the 21st of October that the boat, at 1 o'clock landed at San Diego.

Q. Were you present during the identification of these bodies?—A. Yes, sir; I helped to dig them up personally myself; nobody would touch them.

Q. I mean after you got back to the United States?—A. No, sir; they were never opened. The caskets were sealed. They were too far gone.

Q. They were in a bad state of decomposition?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did you do with the insignias you say you took off the bodies—the wings and the propeller?—A. The Mexicans took them away from me.

Q. Were they ever recovered by Maj. Bratton?—A. No; but they were seen by two American captains I made this statement to.

Q. And they were kept at Santa Rosalia?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. This telegram referred to in your evidence, was that the authority from this Government to proceed with Maj. Bratton?—A. Yes, sir.

The following is a true copy of the telegram referred to:

WASHINGTON, October 11, 1919.

Mr. JOE ALLEN RICHARDS,

Care of Commanding Officer, Nogales, Ariz.:

Confidential: Secretary of War requests that you report to Maj. R. S. Bratton, Twenty-fifth Infantry, at Rockwell Field, San Diego, Calif., by the 14th instant to accompany expedition to recover bodies concerning which you reported to State Department. Maj. Bratton will explain plan. Please telegraph him when you will arrive.

HARRIS.

A true copy:

FRED L. WALKER [SEAL],

Lieutenant Colonel, Twenty-fifth Infantry, United States Army.

Q. Is this also your authority?—A. That is my authority for transportation and subsistence.

The following is a true copy:

HEADQUARTERS NOGALES SUBDISTRICT, ARIZONA DISTRICT.

SPECIAL ORDERS,
No. 135.

NOGALES, ARIZ.,
October 12, 1919.

1. Pursuant to authority contained in telegram from The Adjutant General of the Army, Washington, D. C., dated October 11, 1919, Mr. Joe Allen Richards, civilian employee, will proceed from Nogales, Ariz., to Rockwell Field, San Diego, Calif., reporting upon arrival to Maj. R. S. Bratton, Twenty-fifth Infantry, United States Army, that station, not later than October 14, 1919, to accompany expedition to recover bodies of two lost aviators from Lower California, Mexico.

The Quartermaster Corps will furnish the necessary transportation, and in lieu of subsistence Mr. Richards will be allowed a flat per diem in accordance with the provisions of existing Army Regulations for the actual time required for the journey according to the schedules of the common carrier.

The journey is necessary for the public service.

By order of Col. Carnahan.

FRED L. WALKER [SEAL],

Lieutenant Colonel, Twenty-fifth Infantry, United States Army, Adjutant.

Q. Do you think of anything else, Mr. Richards, you would like to add to your statement?—A. Only I absolutely know that they are antigringo down in that country; they have no use for an American in the port of Santa Rosalia.

Q. How big a port is Santa Rosalia?—A. It is a pretty good-sized port, mining industries there. I can not state what the population is, as I was never around enough to know.

Q. Has a report of this expedition been made by you to the War Department or anyone else, officially, I mean?—A. Oh, yes; it has been made officially.

Q. Did you make a statement to any one about it?—A. No; but Maj. Bratton did.

Q. Had you heard of the loss of this aeroplane when you took passage on this boat?—A. I had read of it in the paper. I had read where a searching party was going down in that country and try and locate them, afoot and with aeroplanes.

Q. You said you told the master of the port that you were a German subject?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where were you born?—A. I was born in Chicago, Ill.

Q. An American citizen?—A. Absolutely. But there were 12 German boats interned here at Santa Rosalia, and the Germans are pretty strong in Mexico down there. A German is treated like a prince. They have got the freedom of the city, and have had it for five years.

Q. Was there any message or notes left by these aviators?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In what manner did you find them?—A. They were scratched on the side of the aeroplane with a nail. I remember what they were. Mr. Claypool has the copies I had; I let him use them the other night.

Q. What were these?—A. They were two messages to the boys' mothers; I know them by heart; I have read them so much, and the other message gave a description of how they were lost, and how they flew.

Q. You say Mr. Claypool has them?—A. Yes, sir; but I can recite them for you, word for word.

Q. All right; state what they were?—A. 'The letter of Cecil Connelly to his mother stated:

Finder please copy and send to Mrs. N. T. Connelly, 4733 Edgemore Road, San Diego.

DEAREST MOTHER: My time to die is here. God knows it will be welcome enough after our suffering so of hunger and thirst. Try to forget my fate. What I had is yours. Use it for your own comfort and happiness. I tried to live a good life, and I do not fear death. I have slighted you in many ways. I am sorry for it now, but can't make it right this date. Please do not wear mourning for me. Love to you, Dad, Nora, Hazel, and Ethel. God bless you all.

CECIL.

Waterhouse's letter was:

Finder copy and send to Mrs. G. M. Waterhouse, A 0 7 W. Main St., Weiser, Idaho.

DEAREST MOTHER: We have been here now 10 days. No signs of any help, and our water nearly gone, so I thought I would write a short letter to you, while I had the strength. I don't want you to grieve for me. I want you to have everything, which is not much. All my love to you and Sis and Dad.

Loving son,

F. B. WATERHOUSE.

Now, a description of where they fell; it said:

Flew 4 hours and 5 minutes. Hit rainstorm and got lost. Hit coast in 1 hour and 30 minutes. Turned to our right and flew for 2 hours and 35 minutes. Didn't see any signs of civilization all the way. Saw boat here. Circled it and landed, but it went on. I guess they did not see us. We have no food. Drinking water from the radiator. Tried to catch fish, but after two days gave it up. We have been here five days now, and are pretty weak. We will put marks on left of this sign, for days here. We started walking up the beach for a day and a half. Ran out of water and turned back. Marks for days ////- ////- ////- //.

FRED WATERHOUSE.

There were 17 marks, scratched with a nail.

Q. Did where these bodies were found originally show they had been covered by human agency?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. They had not been covered up by the wind?—A. No, sir; they were strung across each other, in a grave. One man's head facing one way, and the other man's feet the other way.

Q. Was there any mark, cross of any kind, over the grave?—A. Nothing. The coyotes had dug up these skulls. Both heads were loose from the bodies.

Q. Was there anything there that might have been used by the person or persons who buried them to cover their bodies, like a shovel or spade?—A. No; there were lots of turtle shells there, that is about all. There was a bar of iron, about that long, in the grave where they were at.

Q. About how long was that?—A. About 2 feet, and about that thick.

Q. About an inch and a half in diameter?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were there any marks on it?—A. No; it looked rusty like.

Q. Was there any money or thing of value on the person of these men, except what you have described?—A. No, sir; none at all. Now, on our way back, coming to the United States with this battleship—previous to that, an American officer went up in the hills and brought a Mexican down out of the hills, watching these mines, and he made a sworn statement, and told them that the Mexican steamer—the Mexican steamer Esperanza; it was no steamer, but a fishing scoop, whatever you call them—had picked up these two aviators at Guadalupe Mesa, and had brought them over there for water—brought them to this Port of Angel for water, 20 miles—and he claims that these Mexicans had American money. Where they got it I don't know, but on our way back, anyway, we ran this boat down in the Gulf.

Q. The Esperanza?—A. Yes, sir; and tied them right alongside of us. The Mexican judge, and Maj Bratton, and a few more men went aboard. It was right down below me, and I stood there and heard everything that was said; and this Mexican judge had their deposition taken and let them go. We found the altitude clock, the compass, and chairs of the aeroplane aboard this boat.

Q. The Esperanza?—A. Yes, sir, and these Mexicans were shivering to beat the band. They were scared, the sailors were. They were pretty nearly scared to death, but the captain of this Esperanza told the judge, this Mexican judge, that another Mexican had given him this stuff to keep for him.

Q. Was that the Esperanza that the Mexican caretaker of the mine had described?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he give you the name of the boat?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did the Mexican caretaker purport to know anything about how these men met their death?—A. No, sir; he said he did not know anything about it; he was just an innocent onlooker of what happened. He claimed they were murdered; he said he was an innocent bystander, though; he would not say any more.

Q. How many men constituted the crew of the Esperanza?—A. There were three on it when we ran it down.

Q. Where was the Esperanza from?—A. Santa Rosalia.

Q. Did Maj. Bratton take the altitude clock, the seats, and the compass?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know whether Maj. Bratton got copies of the depositions.—A. I don't think he did.

Q. So far as you know has the crew of the Esperanza ever been apprehended?—A. No, sir; not so far as I know.

Q. The location of these graves, or this grave, is in what State or Territory of the Republic of Mexico.—A. It is in the upper end of Lower California, in the Cantu district.

Q. You mean that portion of Lower California controlled by Gov. Cantu?—A. Yes, sir.

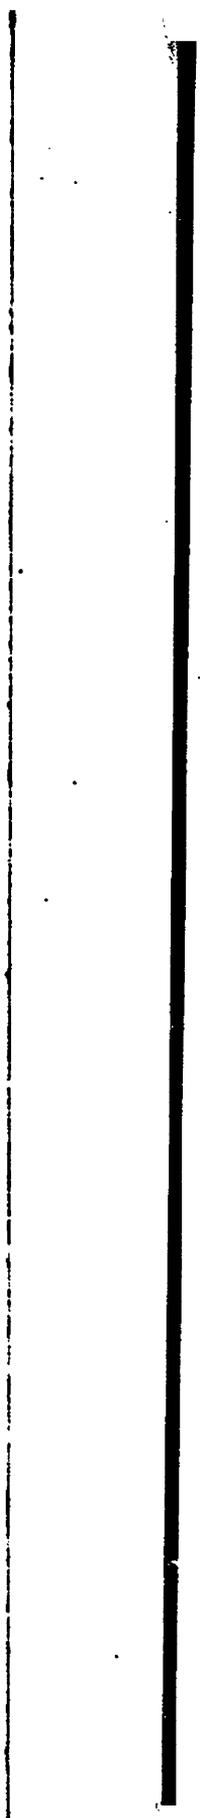

Q. Of your knowledge has any representations ever been made to Gov. Cantu?—A. None that I know of.

Q. Now, have you related all the facts of this expedition?—A. Yes, sir; all that I think of.

Q. What is your permanent address?—A. Where will I be?

Q. Yes?—A. Chicago, after I get well. I am here right now sick for about 10 days. When I get cured up I am going home. I am living at the Sheldon Hotel here.

Q. I mean in Chicago?—A. No. 2951 Calumet Avenue, but you can get me more direct—they always know in case I am working—Switchmen's Union No. 2, Kansas City.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 14, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
San Antonio, Tex.

The subcommittee met pursuant to the call of the chairman at 10.30 a. m. in the Pink Room of the Gunter Hotel, in San Antonio, Tex., Senator Albert B. Fall presiding.

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir; it was 1902.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you happen to meet him?

Mr. BLALOCK. Mr. Garrett—Pat Garrett carried me to him.

The CHAIRMAN. Patrick F. Garrett?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. At that time sheriff of Dona Ana County, N. Mex.?

Mr. BLALOCK. No, sir; I think he was collector of customs at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. I mean shortly prior to that time he had been sheriff?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir; I think so.

The CHAIRMAN. He introduced you to the consul?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, where did you go then?

Mr. BLALOCK. Well, I went to a great many different States in Mexico; I traveled over—I put in eight months traveling, looking around.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you finally locate?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir; I located 80 miles northwest of Tampico, in the State of Tamaulipas.

The CHAIRMAN. Mexico?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And that was in 1902 or 1903?

Mr. BLALOCK. I bought the property in 1902.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have any difficulty or any trouble in your investigations in Mexico?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir; I frequently ran up against things that were, of course, unusual; I was arrested several times, but I had a letter from this consul at El Paso, that on showing that letter I was always immediately released and apologized to.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you—you say you were arrested. Were you simply held up?

Mr. BLALOCK. Just held up.

The CHAIRMAN. Or were you put in jail?

Mr. BLALOCK. For instance, once I was held up for passing through a town without calling on the mayor, or jefe.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. You finally located in the State of Tamaulipas?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you acquire any land holdings there for yourself or for the colony?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir. We bought a ranch known as the Chermal Ranch, a body of land that is about 18 miles wide and 45 miles long.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you buy that from—

Mr. BLALOCK. 314,000 acres.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom did you buy it from?

Mr. BLALOCK. From the bank. What is the Bank of Agriculture—Hipotecario.

The CHAIRMAN. The Bank of Hipotecario?

Mr. BLALOCK. In Mexico City.

The CHAIRMAN. That is land mortgage bank. Well, what did you do with it, toward developing it, if anything?

Mr. BLALOCK. Why, in 1903—the 1st of March, 1903, I got there with my colony of 55 families, the first 55. However, the colony had increased to something near 100, and I got concessions and carried in every—almost everything that was absolutely necessary, free of duty.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes?

Mr. BLALOCK. And I had to guarantee the location of 100 families within two years, which we did, and got—we put up a forfeit to guarantee that, and we showed the 100 families and got our forfeit then—

The CHAIRMAN. What was the amount of the forfeit?

Mr. BLALOCK. Fifteen hundred dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. In what form was it put up?

Mr. BLALOCK. Cash.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom was it put up?

Mr. BLALOCK. Well—

The CHAIRMAN. To the Mexican authorities?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir; on the other side—yes, sir—to the Mexican authorities; but I don't just remember the—

The CHAIRMAN. But you had to make a deposit to show your good faith and to secure the Mexican Government in the performance of your contract as to colonization before you could get exemption of duties?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the products which you carried?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the ordinary Mexican custom at that time?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you were accompanied by 100 families there?

Mr. BLALOCK. We had 55 with the first division.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; have you the names of those families?

Mr. BLALOCK. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Or any of them?

Mr. BLALOCK. Why, at the time that the—of the first 55 I knew every man personally; of course, I could by just thinking a while—I could name almost every one of them now.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, could you prepare for us—

Mr. BLALOCK. But my memory is very poor.

The CHAIRMAN. Could you prepare for us a list as far as you can recall them?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir; with some time—you would have to give me some time, though.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLALOCK. I might do better by conferring with my family, my wife; she would remember those names quicker than I would; my memory is very faulty.

The CHAIRMAN. If you will be kind enough, we would be glad to have you prepare a list as completely as possible and file it with the secretary here and the reporters.

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir; I will do so.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you proceed to work or to develop the properties; that is, how did you divide up the lands, etc.?

Mr. BLALOCK. We were all from Oklahoma and had undergone the Oklahoma rule of division, and so on; we surveyed one valley, we had one valley that was 8 miles wide and 24 miles long, and we surveyed that off into sections and quarter sections.

The CHAIRMAN. Following the United States land laws in the division?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. 160 up to 640 acres?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir. We then drew for that land.

The CHAIRMAN. For choice?

Mr. BLALOCK. We drew according to stock. Our stockholders ran from $500 to $2,000, and of course the man with $2,000 got four times as much as the man with $500, and drew for it, you know.

The CHAIRMAN. He got four times as much of this land; you say?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir; of this division and all the entire ranch.

The CHAIRMAN. The interests, then, of the colonists, their several interests, were measured by their stock interest in the company?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir. And I also want to add right now that we set aside part of that land, the surveyed land, for a school, which we still—

The CHAIRMAN. How much was that?

Mr. BLALOCK. I couldn't tell you right now, I have forgotten; but we built a read good two-story schoolhouse, a stone building, and furnished it with furniture bought in San Antonio, we had everything almost that you could find in any school here in San Antonio in that house when we left there.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you go into Mexico with your colony?

Mr. BLALOCK. Came through San Antonio, stopped here a day and night, exchanged our money right here in San Antonio. I remember very well we got $2.66 for each dollar of American money.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, you say you built a schoolhouse?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the colonists build residences?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Each family for themselves?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir; that was the rule with each—that a man, when he bought a piece of land there, if he was one of the original colony, he was to get into his own house as soon as possible. However, when we went there this ranch was very well improved; there were a great many houses; there were 325 Mexican families on the ranch, and there were 13—no, 16—different ranches on the place, and in drawing for this land the Americans were scattered completely over this valley, and many of them drew good farms and houses with them.

The CHAIRMAN. There was room enough or housing enough for all the colony until they could build good houses?

Mr. BLALOCK. Until they could build; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I see. What became of the Mexican families who were on the ranch?

Mr. BLALOCK. They remained—part of them remained right there.

The CHAIRMAN. In what capacity did they remain?

Mr. BLALOCK. Well, as laborers, tenants and laborers.

The CHAIRMAN. What were those Mexicans getting—receiving for their work or labor—when you went there?

Mr. BLALOCK. Twenty-five centavos per day.

The CHAIRMAN. What did you pay them—your colonists?

Mr. BLALOCK. Why, soon after our arrival we held a meeting—colony meeting—and took that matter up and decided to pay them fifty—double their wages—and they have never gotten less.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the extent of your colony later; did it increase or decrease?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir; it increased. We had—when the Madero revolution was a year old—we had 92 families in the colony. When the general exodus took place we had 110 children in school and—I don't remember the number of families then; however, when the Madero revolution started, why, our people, some of them began to get cold-footed, you know, and began to leave, and it had come down to, I think, probably 60 families when the general exodus took place.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by "the general exodus"?

Mr. BLALOCK. Well, after Carranza, some time after he had been recognized by the United States, we were notified by our consul at Tampico, Mr. Miller—Clarence Miller—to come into Tampico at once, and the people were very much excited and immediately went to Tampico. We called that a general exodus; every man, every woman and child left the ranch. I think 11 men stayed with me, and we stayed there; did not leave.

The CHAIRMAN. The other families, and particularly the women and children, went into Tampico?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir; all went to Tampico—and a great many of the men.

The CHAIRMAN. About what was the date of that; do you remember—1912 or 1914?

Mr. BLALOCK. 1914.

The CHAIRMAN. 1914?

Mr. BLALOCK. The 5th of September.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; that was about the time that the United States forces took Vera Cruz?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir; I think that was.

The CHAIRMAN. And you came out under instructions from the American consul?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did the 11 men remain there with you?

Mr. BLALOCK. Part of them are still there.

The CHAIRMAN. Some of them are still there?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Are they living or dead?

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Smith asks you if they are living or dead.

Mr. BLALOCK. Oh, they are alive.

The CHAIRMAN. What were your instructions by or through the American consul with respect to resisting any attack, if any was made upon you?

Mr. BLALOCK. When they first began to raid us I went to Tampico to see Mr. Miller, and we had been having to give up our good work stock and saddle horses and anything else—

The CHAIRMAN. Give up to whom?

Mr. BLALOCK. To the Carrancistas—we called them Carrancistas—the soldiery of the recognized Government at the time. We have never had, I will say, Senator, we have never had but very little trouble from bandits at our ranch—very little.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, whom do you call "bandits"?

Mr. BLALOCK. Well, those people who are opposing Carranza.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLALOCK. I went to Mr. Miller and asked him if we wouldn't be allowed to protect ourselves and not let those people take our stuff. He said, "No, Blalock; I am very sorry to tell you that I am instructed that you people—to advise you people that this country is under martial law, and that you must not resist the recognized Government. If they come and want your stuff, you just have to give it up." And we acted on that.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you say you went to Mr. Miller?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you happen to go to Mr. Miller?

Mr. BLALOCK. Well, for a number of years I was president of the colony—I was elected president of the colony when we organized it—and I kind of took the lead.

The CHAIRMAN. Naturally you would.

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You went there as a representative for the colony?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. As well as the representative of yourself?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What has become of the ranch?

Mr. BLALOCK. Well, the land is still there.

The CHAIRMAN. That is good.

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir; I am certain of it. I have a letter from there every week, Senator, and our farmers—we had large farms—some of our people had 150 acres in cultivation; and if any of you men have been in Mexico you know what it takes to make a farm of 150 acres—to hew it out of those jungles.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, now, just describe some of the work that you did that was required to make that farm.

Mr. BLALOCK. Well, it cost me—I put in 75 acres—it cost me between five and six dollars gold to clear that land.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the growth on them—

Mr. BLALOCK. And I paid 50 cents a day or 25 cents a day for the labor.

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-five cents gold, 50 cents Mexican money?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And that was double the wages that the Mexicans had been getting prior to that?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir. And I want to say to you right here now, Senator, that our neighbors they were very much angry at us for raising the price of labor.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what neighbors?

Mr. BLALOCK. The Mexicans; the people, you know, that owned these ranches surrounding us.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLALOCK. And they frequently came and tried to get me to put the wages back and said it would not do, and the people would not be friendly to us, and so on, you know.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, now, after this general exodus that you speak of did any of the colonists or their families return?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir; they gradually began to drop back there, one or two or three at a time, families; you know, getting back there and occupying their homes, until we had 34 families when the second exodus took place.

The CHAIRMAN. About when was that—how long after the first?

Mr. BLALOCK. I think it was in 1918—no; in 1916.

The CHAIRMAN. Why did you get out at that time?

Mr. BLALOCK. Why, an officer, a Carranza officer by the name of Morelos, and Rodrigues Flores came there with about 150 men and notified us that they had instructions to kill all the men and take our property because we had not gotten out.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, who was this officer; was he an officer?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir; he was an officer; he was in charge of the men; and then we knew him—knew of him—he was a major.

The CHAIRMAN. A major?

Mr. BLALOCK. Maj. Rodrigues Flores.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know under whose Government, or supposed Government, he was?

Mr. BLALOCK. Nafarrate.

The CHAIRMAN. Nafarrate?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir; so he told us.

The CHAIRMAN. Nafarrate was general in command of the—

Mr. BLALOCK. At Tampico.

The CHAIRMAN. At Tampico? Well, now, whom did Nafarrate represent; do you know?

Mr. BLALOCK. Carranza.

The CHAIRMAN. Carranza?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And this major came there with 100 or 150 men and told you to get out?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir; he didn't tell us to get out; he said he came to kill us. Now, I wish to describe the day and the way that he got there with his men.

The CHAIRMAN. Just go right ahead, in your own language.

Mr. BLALOCK. Well, it was on Sunday--and we have our little town there, post office and the telegraph office, and so on—

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have a church?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir; we had a church. And the people from the little ranches around, nearly everybody, went to town. I didn't; I happened not to go in. And the first thing they knew the town was surrounded, and they caught everybody—caught all the visitors and the people that lived in the town besides; they put the men all under guard, and immediately the soldiers began sacking the houses—and cloth is pretty scarce in Mexico, and they would take bedticks, beds, feather beds, and empty the feathers out in the street and in the yards, and just take the ticking for the cloth; and mattresses and pillows, and everything of the kind; they took all of our blankets and nearly everything that there was that was loose, and gathers all that up—the soldiery did—while the men were under guard. They finally took 21 of our men up, as they told them, to be shot; and when they were first stood up, they sent a man—after they were stood up to be shot, they sent—this Morelos was in charge at the time, there present—and he had a man go through those men, go around and take everything they had—their knives, tobacco, money, watches, and everything else they might have; then a man came rushing up with a large official envelope in his hand and handed it to the commanding officer; he asked them if we had anyone who could read Spanish; we did have several that could, you know, and we sent a man up and he read it, and he said that there was instructions from Nafarrate not to kill the men, but that they must leave. Well, they left about 8 o'clock in the morning, and by 9 o'clock our people commenced to flee to the mountains—we have a mountain district that is almost inaccessible, and all the women and children went there immediately—up into the mountain and stayed there for two months.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have arms?

Mr. BLALOCK. Oh, yes; we had arms; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What were you going to do with them?

Mr. BLALOCK. Well, I guess that we would have protected our homes; that is, we would have protected our women and children; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You deserted your homes?

Mr. BLALOCK. Oh, yes; we deserted our homes, and sent our women and children up into the mountains, and nearly all the men went—just a few men remained down in the valley, myself, and a few others, as a kind of guard defense, and we would send grub up to them, provisions and other things up into the mountains to them, you know, and they would come down for those things, too.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, what became of the property left behind?

Mr. BLALOCK. Well, the household goods and such things were just taken.

The CHAIRMAN. What about your stock, live stock and all, if any?

Mr. BLALOCK. Why, one bunch took 175 head of our best horses and mules.

The CHAIRMAN. How far were you from the railroad?

Mr. BLALOCK. Forty miles.

The CHAIRMAN. Forty miles.

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir; and I would like to tell you now how they got a good many of those mules and horses.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, go right ahead.

Mr. BLALOCK. It was out in the country, they would hold a man—somebody told on us, of course, they knew just how many mules and how many horses and other stuff we all had—that the Americans had—and they would hold a man and send out to his ranch for five mules or four mules.

The CHAIRMAN. How do you mean hold him, hold him under guard?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir; he was under guard, he was of that 21 bunch.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. BLALOCK. And they wouldn't come back until they would get them, they would make our peons that we kept there, our servants or hands—

The CHAIRMAN. Employees?

Mr. BLALOCK. Employees; they would make them hunt those mules up, go out in the woods and hunt them up; we kept everything away from our place, wouldn't keep stock around the place because they were taking them constantly; and these men were held and not released until a certain number of animals would be brought in.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to ask you a personal question, Mr. Blalock?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How much money did you have when you went there?

Mr. BLALOCK. I and my son had $4,000 of stock in the colony, and we had some money besides.

The CHAIRMAN. About how much?

Mr. BLALOCK. I suppose about a couple of thousand dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you the representative of any corporation?

Mr. BLALOCK. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you representing an oil company?

Mr. BLALOCK. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you go there backed by any American capital?

Mr. BLALOCK. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It was an organization of your own people?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Each family putting in what they could?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. To acquire a home?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They were there to make a home in Mexico?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir. Many of the people had never owned a home, Senator—many of them had never owned a home, had been tenants all their lives.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you interfere—did you or any of your colonists interfere in any way with the Mexican authorities?

Mr. BLALOCK. How?

The CHAIRMAN. Did you take any interests in Mexican politics?

Mr. BLALOCK. None whatever; no, sir—none whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you learn about any revolutionary conditions there?

Mr. BLALOCK. Well, we just learned it through the American papers; if we hadn't read the papers we wouldn't have known—that is, now, during the Madero—

The CHAIRMAN. Yes?

Mr. BLALOCK. We wouldn't have known there was a revolution in the country.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you have known about the Carranza revolution?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir; mighty quick.

The CHAIRMAN. How?

Mr. BLALOCK. Because the soldiers began visiting us. Senator, I will have to be excused a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, you can be excused.

(The witness retired and shortly returned.)

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Smith, will you conduct the further investigation?

Senator SMITH. Mr. Blalock, I understand from your testimony thus far that you had formed a community colony of people going out to make homes in Mexico?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Were they people well to do, or were they poor people as a class?

Mr. BLALOCK. They were poor people, Senator; as I stated, many of them never had owned their homes.

Senator SMITH. What did you do after you got to Mexico and acquired the land; what did you do toward the development of these homes?

Mr. BLALOCK. We immediately went to clearing the land and preparing the fields to make farms.

Senator SMITH. How long did you continue there?

Mr. BLALOCK. Just as long as we were permitted to stay there.

Senator SMITH. Just as long as you were permitted to stay there?

Mr. BLALOCK. Just as long as we were permitted to stay there.

Senator SMITH. Well, what, if anything, was done by you or any member of the colony, as far as you know, inimical in any way to the interests of the Mexican Government?

Mr. BLALOCK. Well, if we did anything, why, we didn't know it, because we knew that we were in a foreign country and a strange country and we did our very best not to violate any of the laws.

Senator SMITH. And you maintained that attitude until you were absolutely driven out of the country?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Do you know of any other community, by reputation or otherwise, that were likewise treated, with American citizens, in Mexico?

Mr. BLALOCK. Well, yes.

Senator SMITH. I mean, for my own information, what other colonies?

Mr. BLALOCK. The Atascador.

Senator SMITH. Where was that?

Mr. BLALOCK. That was 75 miles south of Chemal colony—Blalock colony.

Senator SMITH. How many were represented to be in that colony, do you know?

Mr. BLALOCK. I think there were only about 35 families, I think, all told, about 35 families, that is my recollection.

Senator SMITH. Do you know whether they are all there now or not, or any of them, or whether they have all been driven out?

Mr. BLALOCK. When I was there last there was just a few men there; I ranched on that colony some time; and we, four of us, moved a thousand steers down there, and I was there with the cattle; I stayed there with the cattle about a year, and knew all these people well.

Senator SMITH. Did any of your colonists, your neighbors, or those who were associated with you, did any of them lose their lives down there?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. How many?

Mr. BLALOCK. Five.

Senator SMITH. Five?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Did you know personally the circumstances attending the killing?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir; so far as I might know—

Senator SMITH. From investigation?

Mr. BLALOCK. For instance, we found W. L. Randle, we found him in his well. He lived alone on his ranch, and he wasn't seen for several days, and on some inquiry being made we went to his ranch, and couldn't see anything of him, and in looking around we discovered something in the well, and on investigation found it was Mr. Randle.

Senator SMITH. How did you know, or did you have any idea, or have any knowledge of who killed him?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir. Immediately I and Mr. Medlin, one of the colonists, went to Victoria, to the governor, and reported the matter to him and asked him if it wasn't possible to give us protection. He asked us to come back the next morning—he said he would, positively that he would—he asked us to come back the next morning, and he reported that he had already sent officials from Xicotencatl—that is the biggest town between us and the station, our station; quite a town, and they have district court there—that he had ordered this district judge to go immediately on the ground and to arrest these people; that I reported the next morning—we had missed our train, had to lay over until next day, and when we got home they had our people, had the men who had done the killing; these men immediately went out—that is, the next morning after our arrival at Victoria these men, the court, had taken his officers and went immediately over there, and just before I arrived at my ranch I met him with the three criminals that had done the killing, bringing them—going back to his court, and he says, "We have them."

Senator SMITH. Do you personally know what was done with those prisoners?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. What?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. What was done with them?

Mr. BLALOCK. I was notified that they had been—I will say this first now, this judge, he was called a very bad man by the Mexicans, and he straightened things around in that country to a considerable extent; he notified me, wrote me that these men had been convicted and sent to Victoria; however, they convicted them and gave them a life sentence; soon afterwards the wife of one of the men told me that her husband was a soldier, and later on we learned that all three had been turned loose to join the army. Later on they came back to the colony and were there when I left it—I frequently saw them, I suppose they are all—

Senator SMITH. Now, that is one of the deaths. How about the others?

Mr. BLALOCK. That was Mr. Randle.

Senator SMITH. Yes. How about the others?

Mr. BLALOCK. Mr. Pilgrim was killed about three years ago and we had the very best circumstantial evidence as to who killed him; he was shot in the back on his own ranch inside of his own inclosure, in his pasture, and the coroner—we reported, of course, everything to the coroner when he came to sit on the body, and he in turn examined several different witnesses; and the witnesses we wanted to put in—the date was Saturday when we were to be there and we had sent those witnesses with an American—I didn't know him, but we sent them, and when they arrived—when the witnesses arrived on the date they wished them to be in Ocampo, and he said the military had charge of the case—had taken it out of the hands of the civil authorities, and the military—the officer, I have his name at home, I haven't it here but I have it at home, that was then in charge of the town—

Senator SMITH. Who were these witnesses?

Mr. BLALOCK. The witnesses were two Mexican women; they were our main witnesses—two Mexican women, one of them was a very beautiful woman, a young woman and a beautiful woman, the other was passable. Immediately those men began to make advances to those witnesses; the officer—the judge, soon afterwards invited them to go into an adjoining room; they refused and that passed off one day without anything at all being done. The next day they were ordered in at 10 o'clock and appeared, and during the time this major, he was trying to get those women to go into a private room with him, he grabbed this younger woman and tried to carry her into this room, and she bit him and made him turn her loose, bit the blood out of him and he turned her loose, and the American that had went there with them, that had carried the women there, he felt more or less responsible for them, of course, he jumped up—he didn't make any demonstration at all—he jumped up and pleaded with the officer not to do that, he pulled his revolver and it—and we call it snapped the cartridge, failed to explode; well, he fell under the table and the people ran out of the court room—it was right on the sidewalk—and some one notified our judge, the man that had held the inquest, he happened to be near, he ran in and implored the man not to shoot the gringo, and finally got him to agree not to kill him—but he was under the table, and several times he was ordered out and ordered not to leave the town; and he stayed there four days, kept those women there four days without ever asking a question about the murder or anything about taking the case up at all.

Senator SMITH. Whatever became of the case?

Mr. BLALOCK. The case?

Senator SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLALOCK. It is just like we left it—they finally—our judge finally prevailed upon this man to allow the people to go home; they went home and there allowed to stay. That was the case of J. D. Pilgrim; we feel, Senator, that was the worst thing that ever happened in our colony, it hurt our people worse.

Senator SMITH. Yes. About those other deaths?

Mr. BLALOCK. Mr. Gorman was killed a year ago—more than a year ago—he was killed in 1918; yes.

Senator SMITH. Who was that?

Mr. BLALOCK. Frank Gorman—F. P. Gorman; and the time that Mr. Gorman was killed they had got up quite a little bit of talk, you know, about the United States doing something—I think maybe the Fall senatorial committee got into existence, or something, and it seems that these people down there got very much excited; the commander at Tampico sent out this word, because we got it from our friends down there—he said to catch those people that killed the man Gorman, try them and shoot them. They were caught immediately—they were civilians right there, were people on the place, and during this time, during this investigation now, it developed that one of these men had choked one of the men, I haven't told you about, a man by the name of Bob Penix, we found him dead, no marks on him, we couldn't tell anything about it, and it developed in this case—in this trial, that one of these men, Constancio Colocho, had choked this man to death, had killed him—they were drinking at the time, and I don't know why—he was the leader of the three that killed Gorman—they were found guilty and ordered to be shot, and I was expecting to get a letter every week from there that they had been shot, you know, and I finally got the letter stating that they had been released to join the Army; the man's wife writes me—Mr. Gorman's wife writes me that they are all three back there—have quit the Army, of course—deserted, I suppose—and are back on the ranch.

Senator SMITH. How about the case of Mr. Byrd, was Mr. Byrd killed?

Mr. BLALOCK. Mr. Byrd was killed on the Atascador ranch.

Senator SMITH. Do you know personally about his death?

Mr. BLALOCK. No, sir; I do not; it is only hearsay. I came very near knowing personally about the Gourd incident they had on the Atascador. I was there with Mr. Kennard, within a mile or two of Mr. Gourd's ranch when that happened, the night that it happened.

Senator SMITH. Tell us about it?

Mr. BLALOCK. As Mr. Gourd related, and as the girl related, there were three men rode up to Mr. Gourd's residence after nightfall and asked for a match to light their cigarettes; Mr. Gourd walked out to give them the match and gave them the match; as they turned to walk back, they roped him, threw a lasso on him and jerked him down and tied him, and went in—and the girls say they don't have any idea of how many times they were raped. The news next morning spread out over the country; it was on my ranch or property by sun-up; a man passed by and told me about it, and we did all we could. We sent people right into Tampico, sent those girls with the old gentleman; Mr. Miller took charge of the people, the American consul; the Americans made up a sum of money—I don't remember, but it seems to me five hundred or seven hundred dollars—and then afterwards they captured those people, those three men. We were notified—I was still with my cattle on the Atascador—we were notified that those men had been tried, I think it was seven months after the offense had been committed, we were notified that they had been found guilty and were being sent to San Luis Potosi to be shot. I suppose it is 25 miles, I guess, from Rodriguez, the nearest station, to San Luis; well, we protested, you know, but, of course, that didn't do any good—why not shoot them there, or send them over to the Gourd place and shoot them there where they committed the crime? But they sent them to San Luis Potosi—I don't know—that is all I know; I do know that they were carried off, because a friend saw them when they were put on board the train in the custody of officers and sent to San Luis Potosi. We never could imagine why they would send them clear up there to shoot them, you know; we don't know, of course, it was stated they were shot.

Senator SMITH. What was the name of that colony that Mr. Gourd belonged to?

Mr. BLALOCK. The Atascador.

Senator SMITH. What is yours?

Mr. BLALOCK. The Blalock-Mexico colony.

Senator SMITH. That is yours?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir. But this Gourd incident was on the Atascador, and I happened to be right there.

Senator SMITH. Well, all your crops and all the accumulations and improvements that you had at this colony of yours—live stock and all—were dissipated, were gone?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir. We have sold a good many head of cattle. A few years back we had 800 head of cattle, and I have a pretty close record of what I have sold. I sold out of that 800 head, sold about 300; I carried to the Atascador 320 head; I got 60 head; they taken the rest. They taken from the Atascador at one time 62 of our steers and brought them to Matamoros, across the river. One of our neighbors, one of our colonists, saw them as they brought them across the river; that was Carranza's government—gave them 500; they refused to gather them, and they brought them into our corral and then made two of the boys cross them; that was from the Atascador, though; that was cattle we carried down there to put on that new range.

Senator SMITH. How many of those homes that were established in your colony—how many of the homes are left there with people living in them?

Mr. BLALOCK. There is just one.

Senator SMITH. One?

Mr. BLALOCK. Mr. Kennard, the German, has been there with his wife all the time.

Senator SMITH. They are living there still?

Mr. BLALOCK. Still there; I heard from them last week, and they are still there and have a fine crop.

Senator SMITH. Are they interfered with at all?

Mr. BLALOCK. Why, Senator, yes; but so little it don't amount to anything. To give you an idea, now, when I left the colony two years ago he had a very nice little stock, what we call in that country a commissary—which is a country store—and all of our stores have been broken down, broken into long ago and everything gone, and when I left there we didn't ride the road at all going from one point to another; we always went through the woods for fear of meeting somebody that would dismount us, you know. But it seems he was not molested; there is no doubt about that, he was not molested like the rest of us, and he is still there.

Senator SMITH. What is his name?

Mr. BLALOCK. Kennard.

Senator SMITH. Kennard?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir. I don't know, don't remember his initials; I have forgotten.

Senator SMITH. You have named three men that were killed. What was the name of the other colonist there?

Mr. BLALOCK. Why, I knew three or four men that were killed at the Colonia.

Senator SMITH. Of your own colony?

Mr. BLALOCK. Of mine; yes, sir. I understood you said other colonies.

Senator SMITH. Of your own colony.

Mr. BLALOCK. Of mine; yes, sir. Mr. McCuistian was the first one; we have no idea of who killed him; he was shot in bed. Bob Penix was the next. J. R. Randle was the next one. Pilgrim was the next one, and Frank Gourd was the last one.

Senator SMITH. All of whom you have named?

Mr. BLALOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all. We are much obliged to you, Mr. Blalock.

(Thereupon, at 11.45 a. m., the committee recessed until 2 o'clock p. m. of the same day.)

AFTER RECESS.

(2.45 o'clock p. m.)

TESTIMONY OF JAMES J. BRITT.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., duly authorized thereto by the subcommittee.)

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Britt, state your name and age.

Mr. BRITT. James J. Britt, 36 years of age.

The CHAIRMAN. Citizen?

Mr. BRITT. American.

The CHAIRMAN. Native born?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live?

Mr. BRITT. Tampico.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you lived in Tampico?

Mr. BRITT. Off and on since 1913.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you do there?

Mr. BRITT. Attorney.

The CHAIRMAN. Practicing attorney?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom are you representing, if anyone?

Mr. BRITT. I represented the Mid-Co Co. at one time, and now I am for myself.

The CHAIRMAN. What you say of Tampico, of course you mean Tampico, Mexico?

Mr. BRITT. Mexico; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you go to Tampico?

Mr. BRITT. I went down there in August.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what year?

Mr. BRITT. In 1919.

The CHAIRMAN. That is recently?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you before that?

Mr. BRITT. In France.

The CHAIRMAN. What were you doing in France?

Mr. BRITT. I was in the Tank Corps.

The CHAIRMAN. Tank Corps—what Tank Corps; what do you mean by it? Explain it.

Mr. BRITT. United States Tank Corps, Battalion 326, reorganized 344.

The CHAIRMAN. You were in the United States service during the last war with Germany?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And was in the American Tank Corps in France during that time?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. When were you mustered out?

Mr. BRITT. I was mustered out in March, 1919.

The CHAIRMAN. And upon being mustered out you removed shortly afterwards to Tampico?

Mr. BRITT. I went to Arizona, and from Arizona to Nevada, to regain my health.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you happen to go to Arizona?

Mr. BRITT. I weighed about 127 pounds—I was gassed—and went there to regain my health.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you have been practicing your profession in Tampico?

Mr. BRITT. I have, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you know of the conditions in Tampico since you have been there, Mr. Britt?

Mr. BRITT. Throughout the oil fields, extremely bad.

The CHAIRMAN. How do you mean? Explain that.

Mr. BRITT. An American's life is not worth—well, would be worth more in the Argonne than down in the oil fields of Tampico.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean that an American's life to-day in the Tampico oil fields is worth as much as an American's life was worth during the attack in the Argonne in France?

Mr. BRITT. In the Argonne; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Due to what?

Mr. BRITT. Due to a certain percentage of propaganda of Germans.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any evidence or do you know anything about that personally? About the propaganda?

Mr. BRITT. I have and I do.

The CHAIRMAN. State what it is.

Mr. BRITT. The Mundo, a newspaper of Tampico, was owned and controlled by German finances; that statement was given out at a meeting of the American Legion on Tuesday night at the Y. M. C. A. by our consul. In the article is stated that every American who was a member of the American Legion and wore a button should be deported from Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a member of the American Legion?

Mr. BRITT. I am, sir; I have my button and it will never come off. We have in the neighborhood of 400 members there, and the 400 members—

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what does that membership consist of?

Mr. BRITT. Men that are well-trained soldiers.

The CHAIRMAN. Where?

Mr. BRITT. Both in France and the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. All Americans?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. About 400?

Mr. BRITT. About 400.

The CHAIRMAN. Of whom you are one.

Mr. BRITT. I am one.

The CHAIRMAN. Just proceed now and tell your own story, Mr. Britt. You are an intelligent man; just tell your own story of the conditions there.

Mr. BRITT. Why, one condition existing down there is that in order to transfer money, of course, it has all to be in gold to pay off, they have to get a permit. As soon as they get that permit, information is passed down the line that the paymaster is on the way, and then they waylay anybody but the Carrancistas, because that country is just flooded with them.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Tampico, as we understand, is under the authority of the Carrancistas?

Mr. BRITT. Of the Carranzistas and M. Palaez.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is Palaez?

Mr. BRITT. Palaez is through Amatlan and Tampico.

The CHAIRMAN. Where are the oil fields?

Mr. BRITT. Amatlan, Tampico, Panuco, and also the southern fields.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is largely in charge of the producing oil-well district in addition to Tampico?

Mr. BRITT. The Aguila Co., Metropolitan, the Huasteca has got some rights of way there, the International, the Texas Co., the Union Oil Co., and I am not positive as to whether the Island Co. has any interest there or not.

Senator SMITH. Who owns these interests—these oil interests?

Mr. BRITT. American interests.

The CHAIRMAN. They do not own the Aguila?

Mr. BRITT. No; but I understand they are somewhat interested in the Aguila, because there has been a consolidation in the last two months.

The CHAIRMAN. The Aguila, however, was originally British?

Mr. BRITT. British; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Lord Cowdry?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir; Lord Cowdry.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, as we understand, these oil wells in the oil district are built largely by pipe lines to Panuco and other points, and the pipe lines themselves are in the control of the Carrancistas?

Mr. BRITT. Absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the oil wells are largely in control of Palaez?

Mr. BRITT. Why, he gets his money before the producers get a five-cent piece.

The CHAIRMAN. It is in evidence before this committee, Mr. Britt, testified to by Mr. Doheny and others, American well producers, that they are paying to Palaez approximately $30,000 per month for protection?

Mr. BRITT. I venture to say more than that for protection.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; and then they pay all the regular duties, whatever they may be, from month to month, to the Carranza Government?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It is also in evidence—I do not know whether you have had your attention called to it—that the payments made to Palaez are made under the precedent established by the payments originally made to Candido Aguilar, a son-in-law of Mr. Carranza, and by the advice of Mr. John Lind of the State Department of the United States?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir. I happened to be down there with Mr. John Lind.

The CHAIRMAN. So the committee understands it, and we think it is uncontroverted, that while it is true that the American oil interests in Mexico are paying for protection, for their protection to Palaez, that they are doing so with the acquiescence and by the request, first, of the Mexican Government, and, second, by the advice of the American Government?

Mr. BRITT. Personally, I think by John Lind.

The CHAIRMAN. And directly by the State Department, as the evidence before this committee shows.

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir; by the State Department.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, have there been any occurrences of particular interest in the Tampico oil district since you have been there?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What?

Mr. BRITT. That has been already testified to, but I do not mind stating it again.

The CHAIRMAN. If you will.

Mr. BRITT. Two of my very dear friends, F. J. Rooney and Earl Bowles. They were at my house for Christmas dinner, and they left on the 30th. Prior to that F. J. Rooney was employed by the Texas Co., and he resigned and joined the International Co. He was a very heavy-built man, and he went down there on the 30th. As to the day he was killed I am not positive, but in the meantime the paymaster—they came over to the Texas Co. to get some gasoline, and the paymaster of the Aguila Co. had stopped in to get permission to carry gold down, which information had been imparted down the line that the paymaster was going, who happened to be stocky built the same as F. J. Rooney.

The CHAIRMAN. The Aguila Co. is the original Lord Cowdry?

Mr. BRITT. Lord Cowdry; yes, sir. These men were waylaid, and Rooney was shot through the back and the bullet pierced his heart, and his right shoulder was blown off. Earl Bowles jumped up and started to run, and he was shot through the ankle. Of course, that brought him down. They got upon him, and they took a machete and ran it clean through his body and brought it up and turned it over and brought it right up just as they would take a piece of beefsteak and cut it off. That is the way they chopped him up. All for the money; they mistook Rooney for the paymaster.

The CHAIRMAN. Who were these men you speak of?

Mr. BRITT. They were Carrancistas.

The CHAIRMAN. I mean Rooney.

Mr. BRITT. F. J. Rooney was from Houston, Tex., and Earl Bowles was from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. Are they Frenchmen?

Mr. BRITT. One is an Irishman, and Earl Bowles is an Irish-American.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether they are native citizens of this country?

Mr. BRITT. I am absolutely positive of it. Rooney's family is in Texas, and Earl Bowles' body was brought through this city day before yesterday for Thorndale.

The CHAIRMAN. They were from Texas, then?

Mr. BRITT. From Texas; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They were American citizens?

Mr. BRITT. American citizens. F. J. Rooney I know positively had bought $3,500 worth of Liberty bonds, and Earl Bowles had bought about $5,000 worth of Liberty bonds.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean bonds issued by this Government during the war?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. American Liberty bonds?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. With which to carry on this war?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know with what ammunition these men were shot?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir; they were killed by Mauser bullets, which were used by the Carrancistas.

Senator SMITH. No other kind?

Mr. BRITT. That bullet is used by nobody else.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were they killed with respect to the lines of Palaez and Carranza?

Mr. BRITT. They were killed right in the Carranza lines.

The CHAIRMAN. Within the Carranza lines?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What effort, if any, has been made by the Carrancista authorities to apprehend these men?

Mr. BRITT. The same as usual—nothing.

The CHAIRMAN. You say the same as usual. Explain that.

Mr. BRITT. They have never endeavored to get culprits of any of these deprecations and crimes, and, furthermore, there was not a witness within a mile of these two men, and the paymaster of the Aguila Co. came up about a half an hour afterwards and the bodies were warm, and he picked the bodies up and took them in the car and took them down to the plant. The Carrancistas are now crying that the Americans killed them, that they had no business to take the bodies away from there. The bodies were brought to Tampico and the Americans stood guard at the undertaker's to prevent the bodies from being taken.

The CHAIRMAN. How was that?

Mr. BRITT. Because we had the same experience when Wallace—Joe Wallace—was killed.

The CHAIRMAN. How was that?

Mr. BRITT. Well, he was a man that never took a drink, and when these Mexican physicians held the inquest the body was just covered with tequila. They had taken the body and poured it down his throat after he was dead, and then poured tequila all over his body, and this statement was made—that it was a drunken brawl that he was killed in.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean James Wallace?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean to say that after he was dead that tequila or some other liquor was poured in his mouth?

Mr. BRITT. In his mouth and all over him.

The CHAIRMAN. With the intention of making the impression that he was intoxicated?

Mr. BRITT. Intoxicated and got into a brawl with these Mexicans.

Senator SMITH. Was he a drinking man?

Mr. BRITT. No, sir; he was not a drinking man. I know that to be a positive fact.

The CHAIRMAN. And for that reason the Americans guarded the body?

Mr. BRITT. Guarded the body until we got the American doctor to come down and hold this inquest with these Mexican doctors, and Dr. Garnett, of Tampico, Mexico, held the inquest.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the condition with reference to the relative safety of American citizens within the district controlled by Palaez and the district controlled by Carranza, if you know?

Mr. BRITT. Well, sometime ago after one of the men was killed down there, or the men came out of the fields; I think they were very foolish not to come out of the fields and leave the companies and leave the United States to suffer for the shortage of oil.

The CHAIRMAN. Although you know, having served in France and having your attention called, more or less, to the conditions, although you know that more than 20 per cent of the oil that was used by the American fleet and the British fleet, and to which we consider largely due the victory of the allied arms, came from Mexico?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir. Mexico produces more oil than the United States and Roumania.

The CHAIRMAN. And yet you think they should shut down?

Mr. BRITT. If they are not going to get any protection.

The CHAIRMAN. What would be the result?

Mr. BRITT. Starve out Mexico. Without the production of the oil, Mexico could not exist.

The CHAIRMAN. How about the United States?

Mr. BRITT. Well, Oklahoma could produce enough oil for the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, it did not during the war.

Mr. BRITT. No, sir; it did not.

The CHAIRMAN. You think the recent developments in Oklahoma and Texas would enable us to continue without the Tampico oil fields?

Mr. BRITT. Well, I do; for it would only last about three or four months.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by that?

Mr. BRITT. Tampico is paying the running expenses of the whole Republic, and without the income from the oil wells the Mexicans could not exist. It would cause an uprising against the Government.

Senator SMITH. They could not pay anybody?

Mr. BRITT. No, sir; they could not pay; it is impossible. A good percentage of the feeling down there is that they want the Americans down there. It is just a common, ordinary grafting of Luis Cabrera and Carranza.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you had your attention called to the report of the Fuel Administration of the United States with regard to gasoline production?

Mr. BRITT. I have not had it—have not paid much attention to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you understand that in the event the United States was compelled to depend entirely upon production in Texas and Oklahoma, or the old oil fields, as well as those which our experts claim may be developed within the United States, within 50 years the United States resources would be absolutely exhausted?

Mr. BRITT. I rather believe that is a hard problem for any man to answer, but I do not think these men—

The CHAIRMAN. I understand it is; but I want to know whether you had had your attention called to the Government report?

Mr. BRITT. I noticed an editorial.

The CHAIRMAN. You are living down there among American oil men of Tampico, Mexico. Do you know the American producers there personally?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know Mr. Edward Doheny?

Mr. BRITT. I never met him down in Tampico but I have met him in Los Angeles.

The CHAIRMAN. You know he is one of the big ones?

Mr. BRITT. He has the biggest plant around there—the Huasteca.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you happened to read over Mr. Doheny's testimony before this committee?

Mr. BRITT. No; I have not, sir; but I can make this statement, that the reason why Mr. Doheny was going down to Tampico, Mexico, with Mr. Harold Walker, attorney for the Huasteca, and information was received that their lives would not be worth—well, would not be worth 24 hours in that city—so they sent Dr. Paddleford down and Mr. Green went—

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Green is the manager for Doheny?

Mr. BRITT. He is, I believe, the assistant manager now, since Dr. Paddleford—

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Doheny is antagonistic to the Mexican administration there, is he not, or do you happen to know?

Mr. BRITT. I am not familiar enough with their office to answer that.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, do you know whether or not the Doheny Co., being the largest individual operator among the Americans, whether they have refused to manifest their holdings there, a request of the Mexican Government on permits to drill new wells?

Mr. BRITT. I do not know that positively, but I have been informed.

The CHAIRMAN. That is your information?

Mr. BRITT. That is my information.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know where they secured the advice upon which they acted with reference to that?

Mr. BRITT. From their counsel.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether the matter was submitted to the State Department of the United States Government?

Mr. BRITT. I have been informed that information was submitted to the State Department, and they were acting upon the advice of the State Department.

The CHAIRMAN. That the Government of the United States had advised them not to submit to the Carrancista decree?

Mr. BRITT. That is my information.

The CHAIRMAN. And that in the action which they have taken and which they have sought to advise the other people interested in the oil production in Mexico to take they have been guided by what they understood to be the desires of the United States Government?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Through its State Department?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then these Americans down there are not simply acting as outlaws, are they?

Mr. BRITT. Oh, my heavens, no.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you ever had your attention called to the note of the American State Department of August 18, 1918, to the Mexican Government with reference to these manifests on their oil properties?

Mr. BRITT. I was not in Mexico then, I was in France.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I did not know but what your attention had been called to that. Then you do not know, of course, that on that day following the protest of four years, that the American State Department—the President of the United States acting through the Secretary of State Mr. Lansing—notified the Mexican Government that the oil producers in Mexico would not be required to submit to the decrees of Mr. Carranza?

Mr. BRITT. I was informed of that.

The CHAIRMAN. And that the United States Government would protect any American citizens against such decrees?

Mr. BRITT. Well, the United States Government at the present time has not been doing anything.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, they notified them?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. On October 31, 1919, did you know that the State Department again notified Mexico?

Mr. BRITT. I have not seen the order, but I have been informed of it.

The CHAIRMAN. So that these oil people who are discussing in the press in the United States that the United States, as well as Mexico, are not actually international outlaws, as you understand it?

Mr. BRITT. Well, I can not see where they have been outlaws, they have been a benefit to the United States, and they have done their duty as much as the men that have been across the "pond" fighting.

The CHAIRMAN. And they were notified by the advice of the United States State Department?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They abided by the advices of the State Department of the United States?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then when Mr. Doheny, who was the original American oil man in Mexico, and developed the first well there, when he refused to submit his titles to the Carranza Government and to abide by the orders they may issue, you understand, as this committee does, that he has been acting under advice of his own Government?

Mr. BRITT. From the State Department; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you do not know Mr. Doheny, you do not know where he came from?

Mr. BRITT. Yes; I do know Mr. Doheny. I met him in Los Angeles. I know Mr. Hal Walker.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about Mr. Doheny, who he is and what he is?

Mr. BRITT. I know he is an oil man, he is the Huasteca.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a matter of interest to the committee, a matter of interest to the people of the United States.

Mr. BRITT. He has been very liberal to the Mexican Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir. Do you know whether he was one of those millionaires?

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Doheny was a very poor man until he made a strike in California, and then down in Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know who developed the oil wells in Mexico?

Mr. BRITT. He was a poor man working for a living.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether he mortgaged his house or his wife's jewels, etc., to develop this property?

Mr. BRITT. I do not know whether any of you have been in Mexico, but he lives right down in that cactus there in those fields for months.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, he is what the border men—

Mr. BRITT. He is a pioneer down there.

The CHAIRMAN. What we Texans and New Mexicans and Arizonans know as a pioneer, he made himself?

Mr. BRITT. He made himself, yes, sir; he is a pioneer.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not for publication, but for your information, I will say that I worked on the hammer with Ed Doheny at $3.50 a day myself.

Mr. BRITT. Any man that goes down in that country deserves everything he gets out of it.

Senator SMITH. He does not deserve something he gets down there.

Mr. BRITT. No, sir; he does not. I remember in 1918 or 1914, I am not positive which it was, Mr. Daniels, then the Secretary of the Navy, stated that we were all outlaws and adventurers and he took the fleet out. I happened to be in Vera Cruz when orders came in, we were going to embark and they got—and the boats went out, and although we fought them afterward, the Germans and English took us aboard and took us away from there.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you?

Mr. BRITT. Vera Cruz.

The CHAIRMAN. When?

Mr. BRITT. 1918 or 1914, I can not say—it was 1914.

The CHAIRMAN. Who took you out?

Mr. BRITT. The Germans and English.

The CHAIRMAN. What Germans?

Mr. BRITT. The German ships.

The CHAIRMAN. The Dresden?

Mr. BRITT. I am not sure of the name of it now.

The CHAIRMAN. You were in Tampico?

Mr. BRITT. I was in Vera Cruz.

The CHAIRMAN. You were not in the Southern Hotel at Tampico at that time?

Mr. BRITT. No, sir; I had just left there. Clarence Miller was then American consul.

The CHAIRMAN. You considered yourself very fortunate?

Mr. BRITT. Well, it was just as bad in Vera Cruz.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Britt, you are a member of the American Legion?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Of whom is the American Legion composed?

Mr. BRITT. One hundred per cent Americans—and every man that done his duty on this side is 100 per cent American.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, that is a broad assertion. I think I am 100 per cent American, and I know Senator Smith thinks he is 100 per cent American. Directly, what composes the American Legion?

Mr. BRITT. The fighting men, the men that produced and furnished the material for us to gain victory in this war.

The CHAIRMAN. The men who were in this war between the United States and Germany?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir; and done their duty.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you seen a copy of the City of Mexico papers, or reproductions in the American papers, of any statement from Luis Cabrera within the last few days with reference to the American Legion at Tampico?

Mr. BRITT. Of course, it is all hearsay with me.

The CHAIRMAN. I say, have you seen that?

Mr. BRITT. I have; and this Luis Cabrera said that the American Legion men in Mexico should be deported.

The CHAIRMAN. You are ready to be deported, are you?

Mr. BRITT. No; I am not.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is Luis Cabrera—minister of Hacienda?

Mr. BRITT. He is the Acting President of Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. His nominal title is that of secretary of the treasury, minister of Hacienda?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir; and very little goes in the Treasury. I think I read a report that they were $23,000,000 short down there—23,000,000 pesos, and they can not find that.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee's information was that the shortage was 175,000,000 pesos.

Mr. BRITT. Well, Carranza has part of that and Cabrera has got the rest. I understand that is all American money. Coming up I was talking to a gentleman in Monterrey, Mr. Miller, he is in the cattle business, and he was telling me that when Villa was operating down there, it was on a Sunday morning, and he called a meeting of all the members of the chamber of commerce, and of course they all came down to see the General, they did not know what was going to happen, and they got in this room and the soldiers were outside, and they locked the door, and Villa said, "Now, you damned Gringos, I need," I think it was 169,000 pesos or 600,000 pesos.

The CHAIRMAN. It don't make any difference.

Mr. BRITT. Anyway, he gave them 24 hours to dig up the money, and he said, "If any of you don't like it, I have my soldiers out there and the train is out there to take you out, and if any of you Mexicans don't like it, I will take you out of here and just line you up. I have got some men out there who are good shots."

The CHAIRMAN. Did they get the money?

Mr. BRITT. Oh, he got the money.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you traveled in Mexico since you have been there at all on the trains?

Mr. BRITT. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What has been your experience in traveling and where?

Mr. BRITT. Oh, very pleasant [speaking sarcastically].

The CHAIRMAN. Yes? Where did you travel?

Mr. BRITT. From Tampico to San Luis Potosi. I just missed one blow up, and I missed the other one coming back.

The CHAIRMAN. You were fortunate. Was the train on which you were proceeding guarded at all, or did it have a troop train in front of it, or did it run at night?

Mr. BRITT. They carried a box car back, and they range from up that high to that high [indicating], all ages.

The CHAIRMAN. About from three to four or four and a half feet?

Mr. BRITT. The gun is bigger than they are, and the children are about four feet, and then they have men there about sixty years of age, and they have their refreshments over there in the corner, and this tequila, and before they get away they are all drunk.

The CHAIRMAN. That is on the train?

Mr. BRITT. That is on the train. Their guns are all rusty, and they beg, borrow, or steal from the Americans that are on the train.

The CHAIRMAN. I notice in the last few days that the train guards on the regular trains in Mexico have been increased from 50 to 100 in number. Instead of 50 as ordinarily, they have been increased on the passenger trains to 100. When you were describing this car, did you mean to say that car was occupied by train guards?

Mr. BRITT. Oh, they all have their train guards on there.

The CHAIRMAN. Who do you mean by guards? Carranza troops?

Mr. BRITT. Carranza troops.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether the train between Saltillo and the City of Mexico, that is to say, San Luis Potosi, proceeded at night or not?

Mr. BRITT. Well, these trains have been blown up at night. One of them was blown up at 10 o'clock. I had a picture of that train that was blown up on December 6, and I mailed it to you at Washington, with the names of the Americans that were on the train.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you when it was blown up?

Mr. BRITT. I was safe in bed at Tampico; that is, I thought I was safe in bed, but I was robbed the next night.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the train before you, or the train after you?

Mr. BRITT. That was the train after me, and then the next train was December 11, but now it has got to be every other day or every three days.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a railroad between Tampico and Monterrey?

Mr. BRITT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that run regularly?

Mr. BRITT. Oh, no; nothing is run regularly in Mexico. From Victoria to Tampico it is a pretty dangerous place.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Britt, you are an attorney and you are an exsoldier, and you are an intelligent man. Do you notice in the papers reports constantly coming out of Mexico that conditions there are all right and that traveling is secure and people are safe in going backward and forward?

Mr. BRITT. Well, the Mexican Government is very proficient in their lying alibis.

The CHAIRMAN. What are the facts?

Mr. BRITT. The facts are exceedingly bad—the conditions are exceedingly bad. There is a man right here that came up from Monterrey with me, or from Tampico. He was over there and looked at his trunk, and I waited for my trunk to see it aboard the train, and he was over there to see his trunk got aboard the train. When we got to Monterrey his trunk was not there, and it contained considerable money and valuable papers. He has not got his trunk to this day.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Britt, do you read the San Antonio papers?

Mr. BRITT. The San Antonio Light.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you read the papers from along the border?

Mr. BRITT. We only get the San Antonio Light; once in a while we get the El Paso papers.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, take the El Paso Herald, the San Antonio Light, or other papers of that kind; I am not classifying them, but I mean other papers published here, you notice, I presume, constantly reports in those papers as to favorable conditions in Mexico and how conditions are improving?

Mr. BRITT. Well, they ought to live down there, and they would probably tell the truth.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mean to say by that you think that they do not always tell the truth?

Mr. BRITT. I do not mean to question their integrity, or veracity, but I do question the source of their information.

The CHAIRMAN. I can safely say, with the acquiescence of my colleague here, that the committee is entirely in agreement with you. Senator Smith mentioned that you spoke of having gotten back subsequent to some train disturbance and prior to another, and that at the time of the occurrence of the second train robbery you were in safety but you had been robbed there. What do you have reference to?

Mr. BRITT. Well, you know, our houses are all screened. We are supposed to have doors in the houses and passages they generally get in, and all they have to do is to take a knife and cut out that screen and open the door. I did not hear them the first time. I woke up in the morning; in fact, my wife woke up, and I went out and the Victrola was gone and a bed was gone.

The CHAIRMAN. A Victrola is an ordinary talking machine, a singing machine?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir. And a considerable amount of jewelry was gone, and they even took a little parrot that I had there, and if the confounded thing had been able to talk, I would have gotten them, but I was just trying to teach him; he was a young parrot.

The CHAIRMAN. It would not talk at all?

Mr. BRITT. No, sir. The second time they came into the house I finally got one of them, and we went over to the jail two or three times and over to the court a couple of times, and I just wasted four or five days, and finally I could not find my man.

The CHAIRMAN. What had become of him?

Mr. BRITT. Fred Burns who moved into a new house, and they cut the glass out of the window and opened the door and took two trunks of his with them, and all the jewels of his wife.

The CHAIRMAN. They did not take his wife?

Mr. BRITT. No, sir; it is a wonder they did not take his wife, because he slept so sound. Then, Mr. George Kline, who owns the Imperial Hotel, he was robbed. They took his jewelry. One thing I feel satisfied about is that Aragon, a big attorney down there, he was robbed, so that is some consolation.

The CHAIRMAN. They do not play favorites?

Mr. BRITT. No; not at all. Senator, on this train of December 6 that was blown up, there were four Americans, and they were robbed of everything they had—Mr. Spaulding and Mr. Marlock.

The CHAIRMAN. You say they were robbed and it was blown up?

Mr. BRITT. They were robbed. The car that had the guard on it was blown up. The picture that I sent you will show you how they blew this up. They blow up any car they want to blow up. Of course, they don't want to blow up the first-class passenger car, because they would blow up all the valuable stuff. They had a wire and an automatic, and this wire was attached to the trigger and the bottom attached to a trap, and this man was behind a big rock, and they would blow up wherever they wanted to. All these soldiers were killed. Of course, up on top there was some soldiers, but as soon as they would come out of the car they would tumble them over. There were four officers in the train, and they started firing out of the windows, and after they emptied their guns they threw them under the seats of the Americans, and when these men came in there they found the guns under the seats of the Americans, and the Americans told them they did not fire, and they would take the guns and smell the smoke, and they took them out on the hill and put a rope around Marlock's neck and took all their clothes, and they gave him a jumper and overalls; and when he got in he was as white as a sheet and sick for four days. On the second train that was blown up—

The CHAIRMAN. Are Americans allowed to carry guns there at all?

Mr. BRITT. Only with a permit, and then you are liable to get arrested for having a permit.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you get that permit, who did you get that permit from to carry a gun?

Mr. BRITT. From the comandante.

The CHAIRMAN. Did these Americans have permits to carry guns?

Mr. BRITT. No, sir; and they had no guns.

The CHAIRMAN. They had no guns or permits?

Mr. BRITT. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And the Carranza soldiers or officers threw the guns under the seat?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir. And the second train that was blown up, young Forgarty, who had seen service across and had his arm blown off.

The CHAIRMAN. Is he a member of the American Legion?

Mr. BRITT. He is a member of the American Legion now. They robbed him and took everything away from him and humiliated him and told him he was a damned American.

Senator SMITH. The idea has gone out and been more or less prominently published in the United States that the difficulties down in Mexico originated largely from the enormous American capital invested in Mexico inimical to the interest of that republic and that all the excitement in America about Mexican outrages was due largely to the fact of the extreme energy of the great moneyed interest of Americans down in Mexico. Being in Tampico, as you say, in the heart of the main oil industry owned by the United States, can you give the committee any information as to whether that propoganda is justified by any conduct on the part of those oil interests, or whether those men are attempting to obey the reasonable laws of the country that they are in, or whether they are there disturbing the people of the Republic of Mexico?

Mr. BRITT. I will answer one question first, that they are there living up to all reasonable laws. Second, their initiative and their capital in going into these damnable holes to locate this property, is due only to the American who is progressive. These men go down there and they sink in those mud holes on blankets with the rain pouring down, and the Mexican is willing to take anything at all, anywhere from $25 to $5,000, and then after production they want more. They knew they had these oil wells down there, but they would not do it. It took the American to do it.

Senator SMITH. Since the American occupancy there—the American development—I am curious to know what truth there is in the report that these financial interests are inimical down there to the orderly government of Mexico?

Mr. BRITT. No, sir.

Senator SMITH. Do you know of any lawlessness on the part of the capital invested there? If you do, we want to know it, for if the American is down there disturbing by force conditions in Mexico he ought to be restrained. You feel that way and every other right-thinking man does.

Mr. BRITT. There is not an American down there, Senator, that does not live up to every reasonable law; and the peons down there are well satisfied with the money and the conditions. Of course, they are receiving more wages and receiving their wages promptly; that is, when they are not held up, and that is through the Carrancistas, and Mr. Carranza is cognizant of the fact. I would not be a bit surprised if he and Luis Cabrera were not receiving part of that money, because it was just shown that two of the officers were implicated in the robbery of $60,000 gold; and it was reported that they were shot, and they were on the streets in Tampico two weeks afterwards. You know Villa has been dead nine years, but he is on the march to join M. P. (Manuel Palaez). I really believe that Villa would give the Americans a better show than Carranza has given them.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Britt, do you know whether there was ever an oil well sunk in Mexico by the Mexicans themselves prior to the formation of the Aguila Co. and prior to the Doheny explorations?

Mr. BRITT. Not to my knowledge.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether there is a factory run in the entire Republic of Mexico, aside from one shoe factory in the City of Mexico, run by Mexicans?

Mr. BRITT. No, sir; I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether there is on Calle de San Francisco or on Francisco I. Madero, the principal street in Mexico City, whether there is a Mexican store or place of business?

Mr. BRITT. No, sir. I do know there are some Spaniards running stores. The only thing I have ever seen a Mexican do is begging.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether any American company or individual operating in the oil districts of Mexico has acquired from Mexico any oil property of any kind or character—I mean from the Mexican Government, or whether their acquisitions have been from private parties, who have held titles to their lands from anywhere from 50 years to 200 years?

Mr. BRITT. Well, as a matter of fact, there is no title down there that is any good because there are so many illegitimate children.

The CHAIRMAN. That does not mean illegitimate children of Mexico, does it?

Mr. BRITT. Absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. What I am asking you is, whether the titles to American properties in Mexico are acquired from the Mexican Government, or whether they have been acquired from private individuals?

Mr. BRITT. They were acquired from private individuals, and I recall one piece of property—of course, they have a notarial system there. One piece of property was sold to three different parties—three different companies by three different notaries, and all filed on the same day.

The CHAIRMAN. The idea seems to be entertained in some circles in the United States that Americans in Mexico who have been complaining of conditions there, are there by some special privilege holding some oil lands, for instance, by concession from the Mexican Government.

Mr. BRITT. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How are the oil wells taken over, by concessions from the Mexican Government?

Mr. BRITT. No, sir; emphatically no.

The CHAIRMAN. Were they dug like they were at Ranger, Tex., land owned by private individuals?

Mr. BRITT. Private lands.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Mexican Government had nothing more to do with them than the United States Government?

Mr. BRITT. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Had nothing more to do with the oil wells in Tampico than the United States Government had in the Burkburnett or Ranger oil wells?

Mr. BRITT. No, sir; they buy the land from the people, and in some cases—I know that the Huasteca has given them royalties from the production.

The CHAIRMAN. I wanted to emphasize that, that the oil wells dug in that district, dug in Tampico and in that district, Tuxpam and the other districts?

Mr. BRITT. I will name the places there, Nationalize, Tlampan, Tuxpam, Panuco. All that property was purchased from private parties.

The CHAIRMAN. Just as a man here would buy a piece of land out here at Ranger or Burkburnett?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir; absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. And the Mexican Government had nothing more to do with it than the National Government at Washington, as at Burkburnett?

Mr. BRITT. Nothing more.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the oil properties in Tampico would be as though the National Government at Washington would take away from the people the titles to the oil wells at Burkburnett and Ranger?

Mr. BRITT. It means confiscation of their property.

The CHAIRMAN. Exactly, just as I say, if Mr. Wilson issued a decree that the people did not own the lands at Ranger or Burkburnett, that they belonged to the National Government, and that the people did not have any title?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the condition now?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. The assumption has gone out also that the United States—holdings of the individual citizen of the United States, his holdings not only in oil but in many of the great holdings that the American has in Mexico, that that has been done through bribery and corruption of Mexican authority to the great detriment of the Mexican people. That has been done, as I say, through the bribery and corruption of money in America to the injury of Mexico. Your statement is that, on the contrary, instead of dealing with the Government in these concessions at all that the purchases are from the individual owners of the property directly, and that the Government had, if it ever had any interest, already disposed of it?

Mr. BRITT. These properties have been granted from Maximilian down to themselves, and the Mexican Government has no more control, outside of collecting the taxes, than our National Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, if under the organization of the Republic of Texas, and under its agreement with the United States by which it came in as a State of the Union, retaining its own lands, the State of Texas has granted in Burkburnett, or Ranger, or any other oil field a title to an individual, and that title had been acquired, or a part of it, by a Mexican who was a citizen of Mexico to-day, and the United States Government, or the National Government, would undertake to take his property away from him, the Mexican Government would have exactly the same right to object that the American Government has to the same course of procedure by the Mexican Government in Tampico, Tuxpam, Panuco, or any other field?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir. You see, Senator, all of the companies have their men; these men speak Spanish. They go down—pioneer down—through these countries, notify the owners of all the properties, and there is a civil record kept at Tuxpam. That civil record is examined, the family tree is perfected, and then the money is turned over.

The CHAIRMAN. The same as you would here?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir; you make an examination of the title.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, we hear a great deal about concessions—oil concessions—and the impression seems to be somewhat prevalent in the United States that the Americans are down there under a concession from the Mexican Government, and therefore they are amenable to the national laws of Mexico as to their oil lands. Now, I ask you whether they had acquired their titles to the oil lands from the private owners or from the Mexican Government?

Mr. BRITT. They acquire them from the private owners.

The CHAIRMAN. What does a concession of an oil well mean, if you know?

Mr. BRITT. A concession of an oil well means he has the privilege to go in there and drill.

The CHAIRMAN. And, under the decree of Carranza, that is exactly what our oil men have been objecting to; that is, that they, owning their titles, they should not be subjected to a national law under which they are required to renounce their titles. You are familiar with that decree?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And that the Mexican Government, by a decree of President Carranza—not by an act of Congress, but by a decree of President Carranza—have stated that the Americans who desire to drill on their own lands must first—having private title belonging to them—that they must first apply to the Carranza government to drill their well; not under the police authority, such as the State of Texas has an absolute right to make; of course, under the general police authority, the State of Texas would have a perfect right to say you must, before drilling your well on your own property, file a statement and show you are drilling within certain boundaries; but, instead of doing that, the Mexican Government has required the American to say that they surrender all our title, that you bought and paid for, and that, unless you file a quit-claim to the Mexican Government, you are not permitted to drill?

Mr. BRITT. Every title down there is an absolute bona fide purchase from the individual and not from the Mexican Government.

The CHAIRMAN. And that is the decree the Americans refused to abide by?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They won't surrender their titles to their lands for the purpose of getting this police permit?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And the Government says they shall not drill wells unless they surrender or unless they give a quit claim to their lands?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And the United States Government has said to the Americans who own these lands, "You need not file any such title. We will stand by you"?

Mr. BRITT. Well; they should stand by them.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, they said they would. It needs to be seen whether they will. Now, as I understand, what is meant by concession, where such term is properly used, you need no concession under the law of 1910 or all laws prior to that, for the digging of a well. You can go and dig it just as any other citizen here in San Antonio.

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Complying with the police regulations of the city, you can go and dig it, but if you want a right of way across your neighbor's property for a pipe line, that is public business, a public matter, and that is a question of eminent domain?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And the State of Texas exercises eminent domain, but the individual can not?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Therefore, if you want to exercise eminent domain for a right of way for a pipe line or otherwise across your neighbor's property, you must get that from the State of Texas. Now, that is what the concession is from the Republic of Mexico?

Mr. BRITT. Down there the Huasteca, they have a big right of way there, but they purchased every bit of their right of way from those individual lands.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I know that you are correct entirely; that was years ago when they went in there and got an invitation from Mr. Diaz.

Mr. BRITT. Yes; they were invited down there.

The CHAIRMAN. But what I want to emphasize is that what you call a concession, that strikes our American people as a special privilege, is the right of eminent domain?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And there is no concession required to enable you to drill a well?

Mr. BRITT. No concession from the Mexican Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any land in the Republic of Mexico owned under any concession, or is it owned under the laws of Mexico as we acquire land in Texas or anywhere else?

Mr. BRITT. Exactly the same.

The CHAIRMAN. We own it, but if we want to introduce mining machinery free of duty we ask them for a concession, and we agree that we will do certain developments.

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir; but you never can get it.

The CHAIRMAN. But that is the only concession you can get?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. A concession is what is known here, in other words, in the city of San Antonio, as a franchise?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. As for a street railway or electric-light plant?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In Mexico we call it a concession; in San Antonio we call it a franchise?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. You get your property from the individual owner and you get your concession from the State?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir. Another outrage that was perpetrated that skipped my mind was Mr. Porter. The Mexicans claim that he was on a hunting trip, but he had some money in his pocket, and on this hunting trip he must have lost the money that was in his pocket.

The CHAIRMAN. What became of Porter?

Mr. BRITT. He was only shot in the back, that was all.

The CHAIRMAN. When was that?

Mr. BRITT. Recently.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was he—only an American?

Mr. BRITT. He was only an American down there.

The CHAIRMAN. He was not even a Texan?

Mr. BRITT. I believe he was from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that so?

Mr. BRITT. I believe he was from Texas, Tom Porter.

The CHAIRMAN. Shot where?

Mr. BRITT. Alamo.

The CHAIRMAN. What district?

Mr. BRITT. Carranza district.

The CHAIRMAN. Inside the Tampico district, Tamaulipas?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Very recently?

Mr. BRITT. Right recently. Right after James Wallace was killed. I have some statistics on the number of Americans killed in the Tampico oil district; I think something like 168, and there has never been a one of those culprits brought to justice. They will say as to Mr. Bowles and Mr. Rooney, that they were brought to justice, but they were not.

The CHAIRMAN. The line of Tamaulipas, from Vera Cruz to Tamaulipas, runs through the oil district?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. When you say Porter was killed in Tamaulipas, you mean over the line in Vera Cruz?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. You know nothing personally of Mr. Porter's death?

Mr. BRITT. Personally nothing, only that the papers say that he was on a hunting trip, and that he had gone down through the fields there, and it seems strange that the money was missing, and he was with some Americans.

The CHAIRMAN. That is likely to happen. You spoke of the number of Americans killed in the oil district. You say 160 odd?

Mr. BRITT. That is only hearsay.

Senator SMITH. I mean, how did you get on the line of finding out?

Mr. BRITT. Well, one of the men that has been down there a number of years kept tally, and he has been there 22 years, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the American consul has a list of them.

Mr. BRITT. Well, he ought to have a list of them all. Miller and Dawson, and I think the man who is down there that could give a great deal of information would be Irby Swift, who is secretary of the chamber of commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the American Legion going to get out of there on the statement of Luis Cabrera?

Mr. BRITT. Well, we won't get out if the United States Government stands behind us. We will fire the first shot.

The CHAIRMAN. How many Mexican citizens belong to the American Legion at Tampico, if you know?

Mr. BRITT. There is four—three or four, and they have been placed under arrest, I understand. I am not positive about that, because we had the meeting on Tuesday night and I left on Thursday, and this article came out Wednesday.

The CHAIRMAN. They served with the American Expeditionary Forces across?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Four Mexican citizens?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

• The CHAIRMAN. You understand they have been arrested?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the American Legion at Tampico looking after their interest?

Mr. BRITT. Yes, sir; we have the commander of our post, Capt. T. Lee Miller, who served, I think, 24 months across in France, and one of the bravest little fellows that put on an American uniform.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all, Mr. Britt, and thank you very much.

TESTIMONY OF F. M. McBEE.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., duly authorized thereto by order of the subcommittee.)

The CHAIRMAN. Give your name to the stenographer there, please.

Mr. McBEE. F. M. McBee.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live?

Mr. McBEE. Del Rio.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a citizen of the United States of America?

Mr. McBEE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you become a citizen?

Mr. McBEE. I was born in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Where?

Mr. McBEE. Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. Tennessee?

Mr. McBEE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where have you lived since your birth?

Mr. McBEE. I have lived in Texas 60 years.

The CHAIRMAN. Texas, this State?

Mr. McBEE. My father moved to Texas in the spring of 1860.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you been interested at any time within recent years in the Republic of Mexico?

Mr. McBEE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where, Mr. McBee?

Mr. McBEE. Me and my son have rented a pasture 20 miles from Las Vacas—or Del Rio, a little down, right across.

The CHAIRMAN. You rented a pasture? What did you use it for?

Mr. McBEE. To put cattle and goats on.

The CHAIRMAN. How many cattle?

Mr. McBEE. We bought 500 cows and calves and about—

The CHAIRMAN. And goats?

Mr. McBEE. About a thousand goats

The CHAIRMAN. When was that?

Mr. McBEE. In 1915.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you buy this stock that you placed there?

Mr. McBEE. We bought the cattle at the Jasoleco Ranch, about a hundred miles south.

The CHAIRMAN. In Mexico?

Mr. McBEE. In Mexico; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That was in what year?

Mr. McBEE. In 1915.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you still in business there?

Mr. McBEE. No, sir; we stayed there until 1917, and came out with what we had left.

The CHAIRMAN. Why did you come out?

Mr. McBEE. Well, they was stealing them all from us.

The CHAIRMAN. Stealing them out of your pasture?

Mr. McBEE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How were they stealing them? Just like the cowboys in Texas would, or how?

Mr. McBEE. They came there at nights and ran them off; I didn't see the trail, my man that was working for me would see the trail. All during 1915 old Gen. Burronego had charge of the place there; he was a good man, and told us: "Don't be afraid, you will not lose a cow or nothing," and we felt safe; but he was ordered to Saltillo to take the place of the governor when he was electioneering and right away after he left they began to steal our cattle.

The CHAIRMAN. Who?

Mr. McBEE. The Mexicans—somebody. Then we complained to the captain there—that was there in Las Vacas—and he sent us a kind of escort out there.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom did he represent?

Mr. McBEE. Carranza. And he sent us four or five men in our camp, and we had to feed them.

The CHAIRMAN. Who fed them?

Mr. McBEE. I did; and they struck the trail of those cattle and would follow them until they got outside of the pasture, and, of course, this is what my man told me, I wasn't there, and when the trail would get fresh they would stop and squench their shoulders up a little and say, "No tiene permiso." I guess you know what that means—they didn't have any permission. This man Fernando Elizondo, who was possibly with my boys, advised my son not to stand there. "You will be killed the first time you ride upon a bunch of these fellows that are taking these cattle; you will be killed, because they are armed and you are not allowed to take arms."

The CHAIRMAN. Were you allowed to have arms there for your protection?

Mr. McBEE. No.

Senator SMITH. Were you allowed to have arms?

Mr. McBEE. They notified us we couldn't take arms.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose you should arrive at the border with a Winchester and a six-shooter, could you take them across?

Mr. McBEE. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Who stopped you?

Mr. McBEE. They stopped you on the other side then, but on this side now.

The CHAIRMAN. Who stops you on this side?

Mr. McBEE. I don't know; I never tried it; but they say they wouldn't let you take a gun from here over to the other side now.

The CHAIRMAN. Who were they?

Mr. McBEE. I reckon that is what is called the river guards, the old river guards.

The CHAIRMAN. How much did you lose, Mr. McBee, in your cattle investment?

Mr. McBEE. We kept on trying to get them out; they wouldn't allow us to bring them out, but finally we got them to let us bring out what we had left, and we brought on this side 330 head and had to pay them $10 a head in order to get them over.

The CHAIRMAN. What year was that?

Mr. McBEE. In 1917, in the fall.

The CHAIRMAN. You bought them in 1915?

Mr. McBEE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Cows and calves?

Mr. McBEE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What ought you to have had?

Mr. McBEE. Well, I don't know, I never figured only just what I bought. I figured up then, I ought to have had an increase, but that is all I ever figured.

The CHAIRMAN. You got less than you bought?

Mr. McBEE. I got about 700 less; I got 330 and I had about a thousand.

The CHAIRMAN. What about your goats?

Mr. McBEE. We never did keep right with tab of what they took from us, but the man in charge of the goats, the man came just as they had killed a herder, told us he had got 400 out of the pasture, and had went to Musquiz. We never could get anybody to go with us, we couldn't follow him ourselves, and we couldn't get anybody to help us.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether $10 a head duty is the regular duty on cattle or not?

Mr. McBEE. No, sir; I don't.

The CHAIRMAN. You don't know whether it was at that time?

Mr. McBEE. No; that was the duty, so they said.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether or not any Americans on this side had any special permits entitling them or authorizing them to bring cattle over here for less than that sum?

Mr. McBEE. No.

The CHAIRMAN. If they did, you were not fortunate enough to stand in with them?

Mr. McBEE. No; I know it looked to me like they just fixed the price after that to suit themselves, and got you in that kind of a shape—of course, that was giving one-third of the cattle away, and I thought I'd better get over with something than nothing.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you get over with your saddle horses?

Mr. McBEE. No; they gave them back.

The CHAIRMAN. Who gave them back?

Mr. McBEE. The Mexicans wouldn't allow us to bring them over.

The CHAIRMAN. The officials in Mexico?

Mr. McBEE. Yes; I had about 15; I have 35 over there and I got out 20 of them—crossed them over at night. I smuggled them over or they would have got away with them all.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you lived in Texas, did you say?

Mr. McBEE. Sixty years.

The CHAIRMAN. You only got 20 over?

Mr. McBEE. Yes; 20. I had to have some left, you know, to work the cattle and drive them out of there, but I had 20 good ones, you know. I was either going to lose them—they kept stealing them on me; I got out 20 of the top ones and swam them across the river—son and I.

The CHAIRMAN. You didn't pay any duty on them?

Mr. McBEE. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Ain't you afraid you are going to have to pay that duty?

Mr. McBEE. I might. I noticed on this side, to come out right on the bank, we were going to make an effort to get over with 20 of our saddle horses; the river guards were standing there and they saw they were horses I raised on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. We are needing the revenue; we will have to look into that, I guess.

Mr. McBEE. I guess so; maybe you will get the Government to make me, by getting the Mexican Government. If you ever get anything out of them you will be a dandy.

The CHAIRMAN. How about you—you live here in San Antonio, Mr. McBee?

Mr. McBEE. No, sir; I live in Del Rio. I only ranch 40 miles north of Del Rio, and I live there; I have got my home there.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you come from Mexico?

Mr. McBEE. In 1917; but I go over there once in a while.

The CHAIRMAN. Still have business over there?

Mr. McBEE. Not particularly, only I—[laughter]—I never go over there to get a drink, but I never fail to get one when I go.

The CHAIRMAN. Just go over there to kind of get even?

Mr. McBEE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you surrender your lease on this land?

Mr. McBEE. I leased it from—well, right from the one I got my cattle; we had it about three years.

The CHAIRMAN. Just leased it to you from year to year?

Mr. McBEE. Yes, sir; by the year.

The CHAIRMAN. Then he was removed and somebody else was put there in charge?

Mr. McBEE. Yes. Now, right on this same ground where I had these cattle is where two young men were killed—Sellers and Sharp.

The CHAIRMAN. Who were they representing?

Mr. McBEE. After I moved out of there Mr. Weathersby put some cattle there, then he put this Mr. Sharp to assist the boss, and he hired this Mexican that was my man to work with him, and then Mr. Sellers, was a neighbor, sent his son over there with two flocks of sheep. It was mighty dry and bad and they stayed around together for company's sake, and this man was the first man I ever spoke to—this man Fernando Elizondo—was the first man that I spoke to that told me he was gone; he ran up to me and says: "Mr. Mac, Sharp and Sellers's boys are missing. I have hunted for them four or five days and I know they are killed," and then I got a bunch and went over there and got them out of a cave.

The CHAIRMAN. Who went over there?

Mr. McBEE. Mr. Sharp, father of one of the boys, and some of the Sellers, brothers to the boy that was in there; oh, there was a good many over there.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, from Texas?

Mr. McBEE. Yes; from Del Rio, I think, Mr. Weathersby, maybe.

The CHAIRMAN. You found the boys?

Mr. McBEE. Yes; we were out there, and we knew where this cave was, or had an idea where it was, and they went to camp there. They hunted and hunted for this camp, for this cave, and it was just like an old well hole in the ground, and they finally gave it up; said they couldn't find them. And the next morning they sent the Mexican boy out to hunt the horses—that is the way they tell me—I know, because I questioned them closely about it; I was going to the funeral of both of the boys. They said the boy came running back and said, "I've found the cave." He said he got close to the cave and smelled something, and he went and threw something dry in there to see if he could see something. He caught this Sellers boy on a cliff about 20 feet; it burned his legs.

The CHAIRMAN. How old was this boy?

Mr. McBEE. About 21, the Sharp boy.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he live in Texas?

Mr. McBEE. Yes, he lived right there; his father and brother lived there in Valverde County. Now Sharp missed this table and fell on about 100 feet, his father told me. I think he gave $15 or $20 for a rope, and gave a Mexican $20 to go down and put him on a piece of canvas and tie him up and bring his remains out. He had been dragged to death, from all appearances; they put the rope around his neck and half hitched it in his mouth and dragged him to death. He didn't have any gunshot wounds, they could see where it had dragged him; then they hung him over this cliff and cut the rope off, and there was 2 or 3 feet left.

The CHAIRMAN. The other boy?

Mr. McBEE. He had been shot.

The CHAIRMAN. What were these men doing over there; these men and boys?

Mr. MCBEE. Sharp was working for Mr. Weathersby, for these cattle, and the Sellers boys was taking care of his own sheep. They were on the same ranch, and they were staying together for company's sake.

The CHAIRMAN. They were attending to their business, representing their employers?

Mr. MCBEE. Yes. I am satisfied there has never been a man arrested for none of it, it has always been the opinion of all of us there, there is no sensible person in that country that don't know who done it. After we got over there, there was a Mexican—he was an officer that belonged to the Carranza Government—he got in pretty bad and they had run him out of there and run him across the river—he was raised in Del Rio and talked good English, and me and my son was good friends, he liked us; he said, "If you will intercede for me and have me pardoned I will guarantee to take care of your interests," and I thought that was about right and I told him we would talk about it. We talked to Gen. Neda about it, and he said, "Yes, if you will come back and do what you promised we will pardon you," and he came back and was a colonel, from the best information we have always got from men that worked over there, they were afraid to tell. He was the head of the bunch that killed these two boys; was the main man that done all of the stealing from me, and Juan Quiroz was his lieutenant, he was "Juez de Campo," I don't know what that is; that was an officer in the Carranza army, and we believe and have been told since he was identified.

The CHAIRMAN. There has been nobody punished in the matter.

Mr. MCBEE. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. There has been no attempt so far as you know to apprehend or punish any one in the matter?

Mr. MCBEE. No; not a bit in the world. Now, right by the side of me the Rangers had to fight off a lot of smugglers one night and fired about 15 or 20 shots.

The CHAIRMAN. The Texas Rangers, you are talking about?

Mr. MCBEE. Yes; Capt. Borler. The next morning I went down there, and the people that was doing the smuggling had jumped in the river and made their escape. They shot at them 15 or 20 times; I don't know whether they shot any of them or not, but they captured their mules, loaded with hides. I went back down town and we unloaded those mules and took those hides off, and there was seven skinned hides, right fresh.

The CHAIRMAN. None of them were yours?

Mr. MCBEE. No. Mr. Weathersby was standing there and he sent over to Las Vegas to get this little captain. I took him over to one side and I said, "Do you think you will get anything out of that gentleman?" I said, "I will bet you anything he has eaten some of that meat?" Why, they fed the soldiers on them; you could see them hanging in the camps and everywhere. I said, "These soldiers are eating our cattle." That was it; there was seven fresh hides there and they never arrested a soul for it, not a soul; I told Mr. Weathersby I was going to have him brought down here, and I want you to bring them all and make them tell all they know.

The CHAIRMAN. He is still doing business in Mexico?

Mr. MCBEE. Yes; has got lots of stuff there. He said he wouldn't like to volunteer because he has got lot of stuff in Mexico, but you bring him here and he will tell it. And William Gurley—in regard to my own part of it, I don't care who knows it.

The CHAIRMAN. Looking at you, I would think that.

Mr. McBEE. You bet.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, Mr. McBee; very much obliged to you.

Mr. McBEE. I feel just this way: If the Government has done enough to send an investigating committee here I think the people who know these things ought to come.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all we are here for; is to get the truth as nearly as we can get it.

Mr. McBEE. We have been treated worse—now the people of this country know how we have been treated. Capt. Davis—do you know Capt. Davis?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. McBEE. He said he was going to come.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, sir; very much obliged.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentleman, we are going to have an executive session for a few moments, and we will have to ask the audience to let us have the room, and the newspaper men.

Thereupon at 4.15 o'clock p. m., the room was cleared of every one but the members of the commission and attachés and official reporters, whereupon the following testimony was taken in executive session.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 15, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 11.15 o'clock a. m. in the pink room of the Gunter Hotel, San Antonio, Tex.

Present: Senators Fall (chairman) and Smith. Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order. Mr. Secretary, I hand you a telegram there, which you will read into the record. [Handing telegram to Mr. Jackson.]

Mr. JACKSON. This is a cablegram by way of Galveston, dated Mexico DF 14 [reading]:

Senator ALBERT B. FALL,
San Antonio, Tex.:

I confirm and renew invitation sent you through Mr. McCullough to come to Mexico and look into the real situation of our country. Instead of looking into the Mexican situation through the keyhole of the door of an official investigation, distorted by the lenses of prejudices and biased by specially interested parties, come to Mexico and see how our country is living and fighting her way to reconstruction through all sorts of obstacles, both internal and external. As a Mexican, I can not accept that the Senate of the United States has power to investigate the domestic affairs of Mexico, because that would mean a right to interfere with our own private affairs, but any straight, clean-minded, well-meaning American may know Mexico as it is. Although you are not considered very friendly to our country, Mr. Fall—not Senator Fall—will be welcomed at the border, either in Laredo or Ciudad Juarez, with pleasure, and we will place special car at your disposal so that you may visit any part of Mexico you desire. Awaiting your reply, I am,

Courteously, yours,

LUIS CABRERA.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Reporter, read into the record the personal answer to this telegram which I have just dictated.

(The reporter thereupon read into the record the following telegram:)

HON. LUIS CABRERA,
Mexico City, Mexico DF.

Acknowledging your exceedingly courteous cablegram of yesterday I assure you that I understand fully and appreciate sincerely not only the words but the spirit in which the same were sent. I assure you personally that I will engage in no official or personal investigation of the Mexican situation through the key hole of a door distorted by the lenses of prejudices or by influence of specially interested parties. I am confident that the American Congress and the American people are interested in Mexico and its conditions and have ordered an investigation of same because of a friendly neighborly feeling of interest for our nearest national neighbors and because of the very material interests of our American citizens who have been assisting in the development of Mexico's resources and who have been entirely responsible for increasing the remuneration of the Mexican workmen in Mexico to my personal knowledge in the amount of not less than five hundred to three thousand per cent within the last thirty years. The American people are only interested for the above reasons in the domestic affairs of Mexico. Personally I appreciate the fact that if I visited Mexico I would be received with the extremes of courtesy by yourself and associates. I also realize, of course, as you do, that if I sought to visit sections of your country not guarded by your Federal troops I would subject myself to your criticism and that of at least some other Mexicans upon the ground that I was in communication with those opposed to your and the Carranza administration.

I have no doubt that documentary evidence would be readily found and telegraphed to this country as well as throughout Mexico to the effect that a number of the Congressional Committee of the United States was holding communication with opponents of a Government recognized by this country. And yet you, of course, appreciate that should I visit Mexico as your guest I would be precluded from investigating any complaints of your own people against the Government with which you are connected.

I regret that under the Constitution and laws of the United States no official of this Government can extend to you the reciprocal courtesy of a special train as governmental funds here are used for governmental purposes. I regret that my personal means will not permit the expense of a special train to be placed at your disposition should you come here, but I assure you both, personally and officially, that should you desire to consult this committee I will arrange for paid transportation for you from any border point to any point in the United States and that the committee and myself personally will be delighted to welcome you at any time.

Gratefully, yours,

ALBERT B. FALL.

The CHAIRMAN. That is to be signed by me personally and charged to my personal account.

TESTIMONY OF MRS. MARY WRIGHT.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

The CHAIRMAN. Mrs. Wright, where do you live?

Mrs. WRIGHT. In San Antonio.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Yes, sir; born and raised near Austin, Tex.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you been living here?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Well, this last time, seven years.

The CHAIRMAN. In San Antonio?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you come from to San Antonio?

Mrs. WRIGHT. I came from Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. What portion of Mexico?

Mrs. WRIGHT. In the southern part of San Luis Potosi.

The CHAIRMAN. In the State or the city of San Luis Potosi?

Mrs. WRIGHT. In the State.

The CHAIRMAN. In the State of San Luis Potosi, about seven years ago?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Yes, sir; in the State of San Luis Potosi, about seven years ago.

The CHAIRMAN. You can just state in your own words, Mrs. Wright, anything which you desire to communicate to the committee, and through it to the American people, with reference to your experiences in Mexico.

Mrs. WRIGHT. Thank you. Well, Senators and citizens, as I sit here to-day, fond memory brings the light of other days about me. When I remember all my friends in Mexico, so linked together, I have seen them fall like leaves in wintry weather. Some are dead and some are gone, and some are here to-day to tell it all. Thus I am here to tell of my experiences and my family's experiences of seven years in Mexico. Well, in 1918, my husband, Mr. Wright, myself, and three daughters left Austin, Tex., for the southern part of San Luis Potosi.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that your first visit—in 1918?

Mrs. WRIGHT. In 1908.

The CHAIRMAN. 1908? I misunderstood you.

Mrs. WRIGHT. Yes, sir. I would like, at the start, to present these photographs of my three daughters, who accompanied me, and two of them had the same experience that I wish to give. (The witness handed photographs to the chairman.) We went in this—we bought the land, 500 acres, in the southern part of San Luis Potosi, a rich valley. On the east of this valley was a mountain a thousand feet high, on the west a smaller; at the foot of this mountain lay a beautiful crystal stream, the El Salto River; this valley, however, is the El Salto Valley. On the banks of this beautiful river we established and founded that beautiful realm called "home." There we employed hundreds of peons, and proceeded—but, by the way, I am a little ahead of my story. As I went in I took stock—cows, hogs, implements—modern implements and everything to begin business right in the spring, so that would be ours—and began to clear and improve and plant this wonderfully rich land; by the way, this country abounded with wonderful fruits—oranges and lemons and many other of the smaller fruits the whole year round came up in plenty. We could hear the roar of the lion, the scream of the tiger and the wildcat, and it was a country of splendor. So you can see I was beginning to live, it seemed good. For three years we labored earnestly, willingly—of course, enduring some hardships, as this country is not all paradisiacal, but I can say it was as near so as any country I have ever lived in. This beautiful valley—

The CHAIRMAN. Pardon me just a moment. You lived there for three years, did you?

Mrs. WRIGHT. For five.

The CHAIRMAN. At that time?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Five years; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, at the expiration of the third year, or three years, were the conditions in Mexico and in your neighborhood different from those that existed when you went there?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Yes, sir. At the end of three years we had these depredations, after Madero was killed—of course, in certain parts of Mexico, why, we would hear of these bandits and these little roving bands that would come—of course, at that time we were safe; we had never been visited by them, and yet they were approaching, and there would be a few scattering men that would come in and ride around a little bit, but yet we had not suffered any losses whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. These men that you speak of were in opposition to the Madero government?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Well, seemingly. That would be a hard question to answer.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, who were their leaders, Mrs. Wright?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Well, they claimed to be revolutionists. Who their leaders were I don't know.

The CHAIRMAN. Were they under the leadership of the Cedillos brothers, or any of those?

Mrs. WRIGHT. No, sir; not at that time; really they called themselves "capitans"—just called themselves revolutionaries.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they visit your ranch at any time?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Many times; yes, sir; many times.

The CHAIRMAN. In what year was it?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Well, 1916.

The CHAIRMAN. How did they conduct themselves?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Well, the first raid they made there was a band of men, I suppose 90 to 80 of men, that were considered the ruffians—the bad men of the peon class.

The CHAIRMAN. Was your family at home?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. With you at that time?

Mrs. WRIGHT. My family—my two daughters and my husband.

The CHAIRMAN. Your husband and two daughters?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Yes, sir. On this first raid they made they came with about 14 or 15 men, came in, demanded money—demanded first arms and ammunition. They took what we had.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have arms and ammunition?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Yes, sir; we had some revolvers and a few guns.

The CHAIRMAN. They took them, did they?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Yes, sir; all except one, a revolver that I had hidden myself. And they demanded that we open our store—we furnished our peons everything from food to clothing—and they took what they chose and destroyed a good deal of stuff in the way of glass.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they pay for what they took?

Mrs. WRIGHT. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they give you receipts for it?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Never.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they say how they took it, whether it was under the cloak of impressing it for governmental purposes, or did they explain?

Mrs. WRIGHT. They made no explanation, none—they took it and walked out.

The CHAIRMAN. How long before your place was raided again?

Mrs. WRIGHT. It was raided then on May 28—it was—in the mean time they were taking off all the women and all the girls, Americans, and Mexicans as well, carrying them off; so we, to protect ourselves, we hid in the cane night after night, many nights, and would feel—we never knew when we were going to sleep at home, but we had provisions enough. Sometimes, of course, when they came into these haciendas they stayed, they camped as long as there was anything to eat or to wear or destroy; so that was the life we led about six months—no, for six weeks; and then this last raid, they seemed to have discovered us; they came into our home several times and searched for us, for myself and our daughters, and this last raid is something I would like to picture in your mind, to describe, if you will let me and allow me any time.

The CHAIRMAN. Just as briefly as you can.

Mrs. WRIGHT. Yes, sir. Anyway, they came with an army through there, with a captain, head man, they were coming, bringing from 50 to 60 men; it was a dark night; we took ourselves to the cane field as usual; they were going to burn the cane, set the cane afire to burn us out and capture us; that was the last ray of hope we had of escape; they discovered our hiding place, so there we stayed in suspense for hours. They came into our home—my husband was a very sick man alone; they destroyed our telephone; they demanded money; they demanded that he pay them so many pesos in so many days; tried to hold him for ransom; they helped themselves to any thing they wanted in the house, in the store, and went down into our camp—our Mexican camp—where we had fed hundreds of employees; demanded that so many go with them: if they refused it was death—they shot two dead—and I believe at this time took off 10 of our best men. And then after that there were raids frequently, off and on, every week, sometimes two weeks. All this time my husband was cut off from medical aid—the roads were cut off; they were destroyed; we had no provisions, only what we had hid in the banks of the river, for over two months, yet we were fortunate enough to have them; and the roads being torn up, he was cut off from medical aid and doctor and physician.

The CHAIRMAN. How far were you from the nearest town?

Mrs. WRIGHT. We were from Valles about 18 miles.

The CHAIRMAN. Were there any governmental or Federal troops anywhere, at Valles or in the neighborhood?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you call for protection upon those troops or upon any official at any time?

Mrs. WRIGHT. On our first raid we called upon the governor of San Luis Potosi for protection, and his answer was, "We can not protect ourselves. Do the best you can." We never had any protection from the Mexican Government or from our own Government—we were told we couldn't have, and if we saw conditions were too bad, to get out.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, you were told by the American Government to get out?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Yes, sir; that was all the protection we ever had in Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the Mexican officials tell you to get out?

Mrs. WRIGHT. No, sir; we finally made our escape. They had taken practically all of our stock, and clothing, and food, and, of course, under the conditions we were desperate. The next thing was to get out. The roads were going to pieces between Tampico, and all of the roads to San Luis Potosi. So we made our way, myself and my daughter, accompanied by two Americans, 18 miles to a daughter who lived at San Mateo, Mexico, and we went there with the hope of catching some train out to the States. We made it, but were attacked on the way but ran the gauntlet safely—they were kept off by guns and revolvers and, of course, we put our hands in our pockets—

The CHAIRMAN. Well, who used the guns and revolvers in repelling the attack?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Two gentleman friends and Americans, Mr. Speedy and Mr. Holguin. Well, we stopped for 10 days. Trains were coming occasionally, a passenger train with refugees, as many as it would hold. At last we got on a train, got into Tampico—it took two days and a night to make this trip—it usually takes nine hours to make the trip. We got in there, there wasn't standing room in the hotel; thousands of refugees were begging and pleading to get out anyway, as fast as they could.

The CHAIRMAN. When was this?

Mrs. WRIGHT. In June, the 25th of June, 1913. At last we got transportation and boarded a German vessel, a lumber vessel.

The CHAIRMAN. On what vessel?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Pardon me, I have forgotten the name.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, what nationality?

Mrs. WRIGHT. A German—German, German vessel—74 of us, and we arrived in Galveston after four days, a terrible storm—a terrible storm—we drifted several days, four days and three nights safely.

The CHAIRMAN. You reached Galveston?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Yes, sir; safely.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you return to Mexico at any time?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Yes, sir; after two years I went back. I sold my place—and in the meantime Mr. Wright died—sold our place to a Mexican, an intelligent Mexican.

The CHAIRMAN. Did Mr. Wright remain in Mexico when you came out?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Yes, sir; for a while; six weeks after we left he was there and very ill; he landed in New Orleans, he got out more dead than alive, he lived six days after he had arrived in Texas. After two years I went back, accompanied by my son-in-law's brother, to look after my business the best I could. Well, as I went into Mexico, into the State of Tamaulipas, they burned the bridge. We passed over it; that cut us off entirely at Tampico. I arrived at my son's home and stayed there six weeks. Two weeks prior to that time the Villistas had taken everything from Ciudad Porfirio Diaz to San Luis Potosi, down as far as Cardenas, they controlled everything; and the report was they were coming—they were coming by the thousands—and, of course, as they would go into these haciendas, they would camp there, and stay there as long as there was anything there to destroy.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were the federal troops, if any?

Mrs. WRIGHT. The federal troops? I couldn't tell you where, I don't know; we only knew of the Villista movements. Well, they came in one afternoon—I would like to tell you this little incident, while I experienced it all myself—they came, 7,000 of them; they cut the wires; they drove over 4,000 head of horses into this field—

The CHAIRMAN. You mean they cut the fence wires?

Mrs. WRIGHT. The fence wires, and they turned this stock, these horses, in themselves, that they drove in themselves, they were driving them; they turned them into these beautiful orange and fruit trees, you may say this orchard; they were like blackbirds, all over the earth, so we ran, fled, we were frightened, and attempted to get in the back of the house and go into the mountain, but the earth was simply covered with them, they were everywhere, so, therefore, we ran into the house, as my son said, "and close the doors and don't show your faces." We did so. In the meantime he had a hearing with the colonel of this company; they rode into his yard, unsaddled their horses; they demanded that he open his store; they took what they chose—they didn't leave one grain of sugar or coffee; they simply took what they got their hands on. He got them finally to come below the hill by the railroad to get them out of his yard. He also told him that his wife and mother-in-law were there, and he would be glad if they would protect us under the circumstances. He told him, "I will do the best I can, but in a vast army like this it is hard to control the bad man in the army. You had better get them away." How were we to get them away? The roads were cut, the bridges were burned, we were at the mercy of those demons—for they are all that, there are no good ones alive. Six weeks of holy terror we stayed in that house, and they arrested what they would call bad, very bad men. My son had about 150 men employees on the place; they impressed them. They brought eight girls there; I saw them.

The CHAIRMAN. Mexican girls?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Yes, sir; beautiful and young; 16 and 18 on up; they penned them up like they would cattle, and held them as I left there; they took as many women as they chose out of the peon—the working class—to work for them, and took them off, in fact. Then in about two weeks after the Villistas came, 8,000 more came; they planted themselves on this plantation, on this hacienda; they killed the milch cows as they drove them into the milking pen, and the little calves also. They demanded eight fat cattle every morning to be brought up to feed them, although they didn't need it—they had cars and cars lined up with corn, heaping and poured in just loosely in those box cars; they had coffee; had everything good to eat, and an abundance of everything.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did they get their supplies, if you know?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Really, I don't know. I suppose they took a great deal of it off from those haciendas; moreover, when they went out into town—or went out into the interior of the country, they took every animal, every cow, and everything—they cleaned up everything as they came down. Well, this thing was getting pretty bad—we were saved, but, of course, were uneasy. So it was reported that the Carrancistas were coming; and all the time the supposition was that we would likely be in the midst of the battle, which we were—the Carrancistas approached from the west; the Villistas were on the east; this house—this residence was in the midst of the battle for four hours; they fought like demons—or as Mexicans fight.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you at the house at the time?

Mrs. WRIGHT. We placed our safety in mattresses, and put them together and lay under the mattresses for four hours; the bullets crashed through the house, tore the furniture, split things all to thunder, and yet we escaped—we escaped without one injury. And so this fight lasted for four hours and the Villistas gained the day; the Carrancistas retreated. So we stayed there then for three weeks longer; had no means of getting out, and, of course, in suspense.

The CHAIRMAN. You received no personal injury from the hands of the—

Mrs. WRIGHT. None whatever; no, sir—none whatever. But at this time that I was at my daughter's the raids were going on at my home; they were carrying off mules, and as we ground our cane, as we made up our crops; they carried it all off—we had almost ended that season's grinding, but they took it off as we made it, and told us to go home. I made my way home through nine States, riding in box cars with greasers—Mexicans—and glad to do it, glad to come; and arrived at El Paso, Tex., more dead than alive. I must say. Today my place is utter ruin; there is not a board left there; there is not anything left there; the lands have grown up into brush and trees, and the houses are gone; the furniture is gone.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you had oranges growing on the place?

Mrs. WRIGHT. We had lovely fruit of all kinds and magnificent fruit—oranges—bananas were wild—lemons.

The CHAIRMAN. What has become of the fruit orchard?

Mrs. WRIGHT. What has become of it? Well, in the first place, they cut the fences—their cattle came in and destroyed these things, and so these people couldn't care for it—at least, they cut them down and destroyed them—cut them down, and the homes were burned, while my home was never burned; a part of my crop was and my orchard and garden.

The CHAIRMAN. I suppose the weeds growing up in your orchard that the fire burned the weeds and destroyed the trees?

Mrs. WRIGHT. No, sir; I don't suppose it would; they never grew there; it was perfectly bare, as clean as this floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, how did they burn the orchard?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Well, they chopped the trees down and piled it dry—it would readily burn, and especially banana trees.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you ever made any claim for loss—damage?

Mrs. WRIGHT. I have just sent—a few weeks ago, a few days ago—my claims into the Secretary of State.

The CHAIRMAN. There has been no offer from the Mexican Government or authorities to remunerate you in any way for your loss?

Mrs. WRIGHT. None whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the amount of the claim which you filed?

Mrs. WRIGHT. It was forty-eight thousand and some odd dollars. I have this year's loss to put in yet—I mean 1919.

The CHAIRMAN. That has been filed with the department?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The story which you have just repeated to us represents shortly what you desire to say to us?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Yes, sir. My experience is like a book; I would not try to tell it all. The experience of my son, who lived there 15 years, I could tell his experience, I could tell the experience of any, but that would take too long. I have told you in a little way, but I have not told you all.

The CHAIRMAN. This battle that you spoke of occurred in 1915?

Mrs. WRIGHT. 1913, June 25.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the battle between the Villistas and the Carrancistas?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That was prior to the recognition of Carranza by this Government?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Yes, sir, I think; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Villistas and the Carrancistas were then cooperating—acting together?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Yes, sir; they held that convention or met at Aguascalientes just previous to this battle.

The CHAIRMAN. This was just after the convention at Aguascalientes when the Villistas and Carrancistas split?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, since the Villistas have been out of that portion of the country, what has been the condition since then?

Mrs. WRIGHT. It is infected with bandits. The Cedillos brothers have been very active up in that country and are still depredating and robbing and have been, and yet there is a great deal taken by what you would call, I suppose, regular bandits—they are still there.

The CHAIRMAN. The Carrancistas themselves, since this Government recognized Carranza, have not depredated upon your property?

Mrs. WRIGHT. Carrancistas?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mrs. WRIGHT. Yes, sir; they certainly have, indeed they have, they have been, I believe the Carrancistas, since I left there—I could not say this truthfully, I know the bandits have robbed and pilfered, but I know to my certain knowledge that they came into my home at one time after I left there, and one day it only cost me about $13,000 that the Carranza soldiers absolutely did.

The CHAIRMAN. Mrs. Wright, we thank you very much for the kindness, and are sorry that we have not time. It is very interesting and we would like to listen to all of your experiences.

TESTIMONY OF MRS. LOLA C. BAILEY.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Mr. JACKSON. What is your name, Mrs. Bailey?

Mrs. BAILEY. Mrs. Lola C. Bailey.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live, Mrs. Bailey?

Mrs. BAILEY. I live here in San Antonio, 703 Austin Street.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mrs. BAILEY. Yes, sir; I am a citizen of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you lived in San Antonio?

Mrs. BAILEY. I have lived for the better part of 9 years.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you live before coming to San Antonio?

Mrs. BAILEY. In Valles; I came directly from Valles, Mexico, here.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did you live in Valles?

Mrs. BAILEY. Why, I had lived several years off and on. I had never lived any very long time in the city of Valles, though I was born and raised in the Republic of Mexico; my parents were Americans; they emigrated there from this State just after the Civil War, and all their family was born and raised there, and I claim American nationality on account of the fact that my father was an American citizen and my present husband being an American citizen.

The CHAIRMAN. Was your husband with you in Mexico?

Mrs. BAILEY. No, sir; we were married in 1911.

The CHAIRMAN. Your father and your family with you there?

Mrs. BAILEY. No, sir; my father and mother and most of my family had died prior to this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was with you in Mexico when you were living there at Valles?

Mrs. BAILEY. I had two brothers.

The CHAIRMAN. What were you doing out there?

Mrs. BAILEY. Farming. In 1909 I lost my husband; he left me a little money, and I went to Mexico, in this district, and invested it in property and did everything in order to improve it in a modern way; I bought modern implements and everything and started out to work my property.

The CHAIRMAN. Farming?

Mrs. BAILEY. Yes, sir; farming principally; a little cattle.

The CHAIRMAN. Were there any other Americans in that neighborhood?

Mrs. BAILEY. Yes, sir; there were quite a number of Americans.

The CHAIRMAN. What were they doing there?

Mrs. BAILEY. Principally farming.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it a colony of Americans?

Mrs. BAILEY. Why, not exactly where we were living; they were not colonized; there was a colony near us, but we did not belong to any colony.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the name of that colony?

Mrs. BAILEY. Los Platanos.

The CHAIRMAN. Approximately, how many families constituted that?

Mrs. BAILEY. I will tell you I really don't know, for at the time this was formed I was not there, and most of them had already left.

The CHAIRMAN. How many Americans were living in that neighborhood, approximately, of course?

Mrs. BAILEY. Well, I could not truthfully say that I knew; 10 or 12 families scattered throughout that district.

The CHAIRMAN. Where are they now? Do you know?

Mrs. BAILEY. They have moved out and gone to different parts of the United States; I don't know; I am not in touch with scarcely any of them now.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about the members of this colony that you spoke of; have they moved out?

Mrs. BAILEY. Yes, sir; they have moved out, mostly; they were mostly from Oklahoma, I think, and Warner was the name of the man who got up this colony, the Warner Colony, at Los Platanos.

The CHAIRMAN. Were those neighbors of yours people of wealth or—

Mrs. BAILEY. No, sir; not anything extra; no, sir. They were just people who had acquired a little money and had gone there with the illusion that most people have when they go to that place.

The CHAIRMAN. Approximately how much money did you and your family invest there?

Mrs. BAILEY. I invested $15,000, all told. That was a separate investment.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that all you had?

Mrs. BAILEY. That was all I had; that is, I invested it in the lands and improvements; not all in lands, however.

The CHAIRMAN. How much have you gotten out of it?

Mrs. BAILEY. I have not gotten a thing, only the loss—the murder of my brother and the destruction of my property, belongings.

The CHAIRMAN. When did the murder of your brother occur?

Mrs. BAILEY. Well, we call it a murder because he disappeared on his way to the United States with his wife and family on the 1st day of July, 1915.

The CHAIRMAN. What became of his family?

Mrs. BAILEY. His family are now with me. They made their way to me, and his widow is here with me to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. You say your brother disappeared?

Mrs. BAILEY. Yes, sir; my brother disappeared. He left Valles for San Luis Potosi, and at San Luis Potosi the consul at that time gave him the means and all the necessary papers to carry him through to El Paso. They had to come up by the way of Aguascalientes owing to the fact that there was no other way of communication at that time. There he had to wait for the night train, and he went to a rooming house. In the afternoon he went out looking for a hack in order to take his family to the depot, for his wife was in very bad health and his children were too small to walk—two little boys; I had them here with me Tuesday. He went away with another man, an American who was traveling with him, a Mr. Harmon, and my brother was named Willis. They went in order to get this hack to take the family to the depot, and they were never seen or heard from from that day to this. I mention that fact on account of my brother being my manager on my ranch at a salary of $1,200 a year; he was managing my ranch at this time, and was forced to leave it on account of the conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you at that time?

Mrs. BAILEY. I was here in San Antonio with my husband. When we were married in 1911, in March, he came away from there and went to California, and went to visit his people on the way. We arrived here with the intention of going back to Mexico, but conditions were so bad we hesitated, and still hesitated, and are here yet, and in the meantime everything has been lost for the want of some one down there, and if some one had been down there they might have been lost also.

The CHAIRMAN. While you were there personally were you subjected to any indignities, or did you lose any property?

Mrs. BAILEY. Never, nothing at all up to the time that President Diaz was sent out of the country or went out of the country, up to that time we never had any trouble in any respect, we were perfectly safe, day and night, at any place.

The CHAIRMAN. After that time?

Mrs. BAILEY. Well, I did not experience it, because I came away in 1911, and had no personal experience, my knowledge comes from what has happened to my family only.

The CHAIRMAN. Your sister-in-law is here?

Mrs. BAILEY. Yes, sir; she is here.

The CHAIRMAN. She remained in Mexico with her husband, did she?

Mrs. BAILEY. Yes, sir; she remained there, they were on my ranch as my managers in Mexico, they were taking care of my property for me.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you made any claim for damage?

Mrs. BAILEY. Not yet; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you estimate your damage as a total loss: that is, your entire investment?

Mrs. BAILEY. I estimate my damage not only the money I put into it, but what I might have gotten out of it up to this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The interest on it?

Mrs. BAILEY. Yes, sir; interest and salary I was paying my brother and the approximate income from that property with his management, because we had two years where we got enough out of it to know what we could have gotten.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the income which you derived during those two years?

Mrs. BAILEY. It was approximately about $1,200 a year; not less than that; that was the average, because it was cane principally that they—

The CHAIRMAN. Sugar cane?

Mrs. BAILEY. Yes; sugar cane; and, of course, we know that is a source of revenue; cane is, in Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you have any other statement that you desire to make?

Mrs. BAILEY. No, sir; not particularly, unless you care to hear anything especially.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

TESTIMONY OF MRS. FELICITAS B. WILLIS.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Mrs. LOLA C. BAILEY. Senator, if you do not object, I would like to stand here by her, because her English is not very perfect.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly. What is your name?

Mrs. WILLIS. Felicitas B. Willis.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a native of Mexico, Mrs. Willis?

Mrs. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is your husband; do you know?

Mrs. WILLIS. I don't know.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you last see your husband?

Mrs. WILLIS. In Aguascalientes.

The CHAIRMAN. What year; do you remember?

Mrs. WILLIS. 1915.

The CHAIRMAN. Under what circumstances did you last see him?

Mrs. WILLIS. Why, they went to the depot to take us, my husband and an American, Mr. Harmon, both Americans, and they never came back.

The CHAIRMAN. You were going to take the train; were you?

Mrs. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you coming—coming to the United States?

Mrs. WILLIS. Coming to the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you coming from?

Mrs. WILLIS. Coming from Valles, San Luis Potosi.

The CHAIRMAN. And you got as far as Aguascalientes?

Mrs. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You were going to take the train there for the United States?

Mrs. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And your husband was making arrangements to take you to the depot?

Mrs. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. He was in company with another American, you say?

Mrs. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you have never seen him since?

Mrs. WILLIS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you make any inquiry as to what became of him?

Mrs. WILLIS. Yes; I stayed in Aguascalientes six days seeking information.

The CHAIRMAN. You have never been able to hear anything of him?

Mrs. WILLIS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he have any money on his person when he left?

Mrs. WILLIS. Yes, sir; he had; I don't know how many dollars in change he got.

The CHAIRMAN. He had money for the expenses?

Mrs. WILLIS. About $500 in cash.

The CHAIRMAN. Why were you coming out of the State of San Luis Potosi at this time; what was the reason that you were leaving at that time; just on a visit?

Mrs. WILLIS. No; just to pass coming from Valles and Cerritos, because it was too many bandits, I came one day and stayed in Cerritos eight days, and then took the train for San Luis Potosi.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you were leaving the place where you had been living because of the disturbed conditions in Mexico?

Mrs. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You were living on the ranch that belonged to Mrs. Bailey?

Mrs. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. She is your sister-in-law, is she?

Mrs. WILLIS. Yes, sir; she is my sister-in-law.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was in charge of that ranch, who was the manager of the ranch?

Mrs. WILLIS. My husband.

The CHAIRMAN. The brother of Mrs. Bailey?

Mrs. WILLIS. The brother of Mrs. Bailey.

The CHAIRMAN. How long had you been living with him on that ranch, approximately about how many years?

Mrs. WILLIS. Six years.

The CHAIRMAN. You say that you were leaving because of the disturbed conditions?

Mrs. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In San Luis Potosi?

Mrs. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by disturbed conditions, in what did the disturbances consist, bandit raids?

Mrs. WILLIS. Bandits, all kinds of bandits, Villistas and Carrancistas and Indians and everything else, and we could not stay on the ranch because my husband has no work, all of the bandits take everything.

The CHAIRMAN. The bandits took everything you raised and would not allow him to raise crops?

Mrs. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they take your stock, work stock?

Mrs. WILLIS. Everything was taken away.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there any destruction of implements or fences, improvements?

Mrs. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You say the bandits were Villistas and Carrancistas Indians?

Mrs. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Carrancistas did not protect your property?

Mrs. WILLIS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Were there any other soldiers anywhere in the neighborhood, stationed at Valles or anywhere else?

Mrs. WILLIS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They were just riding past; coming through the country?

Mrs. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you found no difference in the treatment which your property received at the hands of the Indians or the Villistas or the Carrancistas; they all treated you alike?

Mrs. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You have never heard of your husband since you saw him last?

Mrs. WILLIS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How many children have you?

Mrs. WILLIS. Two.

The CHAIRMAN. How old are they?

Mrs. WILLIS. One is 10 and the youngest one 8.

Mrs. LOLA C. BAILEY. Now, they had three at the beginning of this trouble; one little girl who we can claim died for want of attention—medical attention—suffering from complications because of smallpox. She was taken to Tampico and they could not get medical attention on account of their being poor; doctors do not work for their health in that country. The child died. I am speaking of this disappearance; she can not relate it; she can not speak much; and I know much more. There was one time when my brother had to leave this ranch on account of bandits and seek work in Tampico; he worked for a dredging company for a while on account of the revolutionists, and he was thrown out of employment, and his wife joined him there. She stayed on the ranch until one morning they were notified the Indians were coming. There were several troops of Indians over in there that were headed by these partly educated Mexicans, and they would cause commotions among the Indians and make them believe they had a right to do that. The Indians did not cause the trouble; it was these different parties.

The CHAIRMAN. Who were those different parties?

Mrs. BAILEY. Well, they were just nothing; they would just rise up; they were nothing; they were a band of Indians raiding on the other side of the river and hiding out; and he was with Catron that was killed, and he came and notified them to get out, and in less than two hours he had them on a wagon with a yoke of oxen hitched to it, pulling out for Valles, where they arrived late in the afternoon; and just as they got out of hearing of the ranch the Indians struck it. There was not anything that could be knocked down and pulled up or burned they did not destroy. She never went back to the ranch—not with him—she joined her husband in Tampico, and there is where her child died.

The CHAIRMAN. They, of course, had to leave everything at the ranch; they had no means?

Mrs. BAILEY. Yes, sir; at the mercy of the Indians. The brother who is down there has been hiding out for months with these Catron brothers.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the brother who disappeared at Aguascalientes?

Mrs. BAILEY. No; that is the one that is still there. That one that disappeared at Aguascalientes is another brother. I have one there now who has never left Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is he?

Mrs. BAILEY. Out on my ranch, 3 miles from Valles. My brother was starting, and resolved it was better for them to come to the States, because they had no protection there—that is, he is not given American protection—so he started out with his family, and arrived at Aguascalientes on the 1st of July, 1915, and there was the place where he disappeared.

The CHAIRMAN. Where was your other brother?

Mrs. BAILEY. He remained at the ranch, and he did not know about this disappearance for about three months, because we had no communications. She remained there six days and investigated; she notified several of the generals that were there at the time—at the time the Villistas were there. She notified Gen. Urbino.

The CHAIRMAN. Tomas?

Mrs. BAILEY. Yes, sir. His secretary was that one-legged, one-armed Orozco, and she notified him, and he denied any knowledge of having seen the Americans, because she went by the name of the Americans, she always asked for the Americans, never asked for her husband alone. She asked for the other man also. She also went to the governor, Benito Diaz, and she got the same answer. The American consul was too sick to be seen, and she never got to see him at all. I guess it was quite convenient to be sick about that time.

The CHAIRMAN. What was his name?

Mrs. BAILEY. I do not know. I know she could not see him anyway, so then the governor asked her what she wanted. She had heard the remark by Urbino, the secretary, to the effect that probably these men were in Chihuahua. You know that was the saying they had when they executed them, that they have gone to Chihuahua, that was the way they had to express they were gone, they had killed him. She didn't know that, and I did when she told me about it—so she took her cue from that any asked for transportation to Chihuahua City; so he gave her transportation, where she arrived in about three or four days after she started; I do not know how long. She was on a troop train and was the only woman on it for about three days, and she arrived there and went to the American consul, Marion Letcher, American consul there at the time, and she appealed to him for help, and he was preparing to leave, and he communicated with the consul in Aguascalientes and got a denial also of the report, and he took note of all she told him, and then he permitted her or told her, advised her to go and search the prisons, if she wanted to, and she got permission to search all the prisons, all the places where a man could be hidden or imprisoned, as she had done in Aguascalientes. He asked her where she wanted to go, and she said to Juarez, and he gave her $20, and she went to Juarez with her two little children. She arrived there on the morning of the 15th of July, arrived there at 5 o'clock in the morning. Rooms were $8 to $10 a day, and therefore she was not in very good shape to rent a room, so she stopped out under the trees on the edge of acequia, Juarez, Mexico. The immigration officials there took charge of her. She was in hot water all the time she was there; they would not let her go, said they disregarded everything she asked, every question made they refused to hear her and positively said that they did not believe any of her statements. She went to the American consul there, Edwards is his name—by the way, I know the gentleman—and he refused to hear her, told her positively he could not do anything for her, she could go further to get her information. So one thing brought on another, and finally the Red Cross Chapter in El Paso, Tex., got hold of the thing, and Mrs. Del Campo came over in her automobile and picked the little girl up after a word fight and almost a fist fight with the officials and brought her over into El Paso and gave her in charge of a family that agreed to take charge of her in case they could get her across there, until she could get into communication with us. In the meantime we had moved to Fort Stockton, and this telegram was sent to us from here to Fort Stockton. It was just three weeks from the time we got the telegram until the red tape could be unwound and she was sent to us, and when she arrived there she was an invalid, and she had to be operated on.

The CHAIRMAN. That was on account of the mistreatment?

Mrs. BAILEY. Mistreatment and the want of attention at the proper time and the proper place. My husband got four sheets of paper about that long [indicating] with about 500 questions to fill out, that were all to be sent back to El Paso before they would turn her loose at all, and when he told them who he was, a Spanish War veteran, they bundled her up and sent her to us that same day, and the Red Cross saw to it that she got what she needed for her trip.

The CHAIRMAN. Very much obliged to you.

I think that we can make a little progress by taking a recess just at this moment. The committee will be in recess till 2 o'clock.

(Thereupon, at 12.15 o'clock p. m., the committee recessed until 2 o'clock p. m. of the same day.)

THURSDAY, JANUARY 15, 1920,
2.30 o'clock p. m.

TESTIMONY OF P. W. WARNER.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the committee, duly authorized thereto.)

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live, Mr. Warner?

Mr. WARNER. San Antonio.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you an American citizen?

Mr. WARNER. Well, I should say I was; I was born and raised in the United States. I am of German parentage, though; my people came from Germany in 1832, I believe it was.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you born and raised?

Mr. WARNER. Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your age?

Mr. WARNER. I will be 71 next month.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you in 1860 to 1865?

Mr. WARNER. I was in Wisconsin, I was quite a boy; but during the Civil War I was one of five brothers that enlisted in the Civil War. There were four of us under 20 years of age, and we served to the end of the war. The last year I served with Gen. Custer.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you have a right to claim American citizenship?

Mr. WARNER. Well, I believe so.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Warner, have you lived in Mexico at any time?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir. I would like the committee to insert a statement in the records that I appeared before this committee on a subpoena by order of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly, that is understood.

Mr. WARNER. And also that I have nothing against the people of Mexico; they have my respect, and I have lived amongst them and I have a very high opinion of them, was always treated well by the people of Mexico. When I say that, I mean to say the same as I would say for the United States. I do not refer to the I. W. W.'s, or the Bolsheviks; I am talking about the people of the country as a whole.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think you will find any quarrel with this committee for those sentiments, Mr. Warner.

Mr. WARNER. I want it understood that I am not against the Mexican people as a nation or a class.

The CHAIRMAN. What part of Mexico were you?

Mr. WARNER. I was located 60 miles west of Tampico, on what is called the Atascador, and I would like to explain about that. One of your witnesses explained about a Warner colony. That is Los Platanos. I had nothing to do with it.

The CHAIRMAN. That is another proposition?

Mr. WARNER. Another proposition; and I had no charge of any colony, but I was general agent of the Atascador and had charge of the settlement and getting the people to settle. And another explanation I would like to make in regard to the colonies. Mr. Blalock testified his colony was made up of an association of farmers from Oklahoma, the same way as the San Dieguito colony. They bought their land; each one owned a certain interest. The Atascador colony was different. It was 185,000 acres, and then it was colonized and settled along as the people came down and bought their lands, and when I had charge of it we had to bring the people down there and they selected the lands themselves and it was sold to them like Blalock.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the average size of the individual holdings in the Atascador?

Mr. WARNER. Well, it ran all the way from 50 acres up to 3,300.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the class of the colonists?

Mr. WARNER. They were all farmers.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were they from, generally?

Mr. WARNER. Generally, from Nebraska, Iowa, and Illinois, and a great many from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. Approximately how many did they number?

Mr. WARNER. I could not say exactly, but I have a list of all our colonists up to 1910, and I just merely figured this up to-day and I could give you an idea. [Producing paper.] We had something like 305 that you might say was heads of families; that is, men that came down there and bought, a great many of them brought their families down and others just bought the land and wanted to move down, especially those that bought after 1910, and you might say we had something of about 500 people in the families, of course they would number three or four to the family. They were settlers on there, and when we would have a church or social gathering I counted up as high as 185 men, women, and children.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have churches?

Mr. WARNER. We had a church.

The CHAIRMAN. Schools?

Mr. WARNER. Schools, and the farmers were very successful in farming. In fact, Gutierrez, the industrial agent for the Government of Mexico on the railroads, told me we had the most successful colony there was in the Republic. We had plenty of transportation and good soil and rainfall of about 50 or 60 inches, and the farmers did well.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the colonists, any of them, employ labor?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What labor, native labor?

Mr. WARNER. All native labor. I employed from 25 to 200 men putting the land under cultivation.

The CHAIRMAN. What were these people being paid when you went there, for similar work?

Mr. WARNER. The first bunch I employed when I shipped out a car load of lumber and stuff to put up my ranch house—there were six of those there—and I set them to work on the foundation, and I paid them 75 centavos a day, and they said they had just come from a hacienda up north—about 25 miles north—where they were getting 20 centavos a day, and I paid them 75 centavos. That was the universal wages on the Atascador for the next five or six years—75 centavos a day.

The CHAIRMAN. How did that compare with the other wage of the other natives throughout the country there?

Mr. WARNER. Twenty-five centavos most of the natives got.

The CHAIRMAN. Most of the natives working for natives got 25 centavos?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you paid them 75 centavos?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did their children have any school advantages there?

Mr. WARNER. Well, the natives would only come and work for us occasionally and some of them worked three or four years, but they never seemed to be interested in schools, some of them could read and write, the older people.

The CHAIRMAN. Where are those colonists now?

Mr. WARNER. They are scattered all over the country; there is only one family living down there; they are Germans, and they have not been disturbed. The rest of them have left the colony and the thing has all gone back to grass and weeds. I saw Capt. Hunter, who came from there last week, and he said he had been out on the ranch, and he said the things had been taken away and the wire was gone from the fences, and he stopped at Mr. Weeder's house, and the house cost something like $5,000; it was made of brick he manufactured there—2-foot walls, a very large house. He was a Pennsylvania German, and I said, "They did not surely tear that down?" He said, "No; but they took all the lumber and the roof off." That was a galvanized steel roof. He said they had their shacks built in the corner of the wall and he said that the Mexicans had possession of the Atascador and were squatting on it, claiming they were going to hold it; and, under the Mexican law, where they improve for six months they claim they have a right to possession. I would like to say before this committee one thing about our title. In going down there I had charge of our county records in Nebraska, back in the 80's I was county clerk and recorder. I knew something about records and consequently when I went down there, the first thing I wanted to look out for was titles to land, and the conditions, and the safety, etc.; and the Mexican railways, through the authority of the Government, circulated literature all through our country and all up through the United States encouraging and inducing people to come down and settle on their land and improve the same, as we did it ourselves after coming out of the Civil War. I went to Nebraska and people were living in sod houses and dugouts and I knew something about pioneering. Then I went on west, farther west, and opened up land in Nebraska. Consequently, when I went down to Mexico I knew just what to do. I bought 20 four-mule teams and set my boys to work. We hired Mexicans and ran out 800 acres of prairie land the first year we were there. We planted it in corn. The literature they circulated showed that the life and property was perfectly safe and titles were good, etc., and I looked into that and found it all true; and I want to say this, that we never had any trouble in our colony anywhere in that neighborhood, and I think every American that lived in Mexico will say the same—that it was the most peaceful country that I ever lived in.

The CHAIRMAN. When was that?

Mr. WARNER. All the way from 1907 to 19—well, in 1913 they began to have occasional bandit raids.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you come out?

Mr. WARNER. I came out of there in December, 1913.

The CHAIRMAN. Why?

Mr. WARNER. Well, I had my family up at Houston, and I thought I would go up and pay them a visit. I got up there and took sick, and aimed to go back, and I had a good big crop in, and about 200 head of Jersey hogs and pigs and some other stock, and I sold my mules to the oil company before that on account of the raids. Before I got ready to go back they got to scrapping and fighting there and consequently I never went back.

The CHAIRMAN. Had there been any disturbances before that, any raids?

Mr. WARNER. Nothing more than an occasional band of what called themselves Constitutionalists, armed with 30.80's, Winchesters.

Miss OLLIE WARNER. Louder, papa.

Mr. WARNER. Nothing more than occasional raids of what called themselves Constitutionalists, they held up our train one time when I was going out to the ranch from Tampico and when they were robbing the express, I went out and talked to them. At that time they never molested Americans, and in fact they seemed to like us. We took no sides in their politics—both factions.

The CHAIRMAN. Both factions? What factions do you mean?

Mr. WARNER. Well, they called themselves Constitutionalists and Huertistas. The Huertistas in 1913 came in power there in Mexico and had Federal troops there protecting the people and occasionally one of these bands would come along and kill these Constitutionalists. When this train was held up I went out and mingled with them and talked to them, and I found one of the men that had worked for me, and I said, "Don't you know if Huertistas troops catch you holding up passenger trains they will hang every one of you?" He said, "No; we are revolutionists; we are making war on the Government." They never molested us in any way at all until they took Vera Cruz. One time they came to my house and I had my watch upstairs, I was away from there, we never locked our doors, we never had occasion for it. They took my rifle and the commissary there. Our Mexicans were more afraid of them than we were. When we had an idea that the revolutionists were likely to come they would hide out in the brush.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you sold your mules to the oil company. Why did you sell your mules?

Mr. WARNER. Well, I could see they were making these bandit raids in there and I was afraid I would lose them. Our land joins the Doheny land on the west. In fact, I think it is the original estate. Our abstract goes back to 1870, the old Spanish grant. They made a raid on the Doheny property and got away with them up as far as Xicotencatl, Capt. Hanson's ranch, and they caught them and brought them back.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know where Capt. Hanson's ranch was?

Mr. WARNER. I have never been on the ranch, but I knew it.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know the other colonies in that neighborhood?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Aside from the Atascador?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How many colonists were there?

Mr. WARNER. Well, just make a rough guess, 15 or 20, but they did not have very many people on them except the Blalock colony and the San Dieguito and ours. They would buy a large tract and bring people down there and settle it.

The CHAIRMAN. Subdivide it?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you financed by any company or corporation?

Mr. WARNER. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The colonists went there as individuals?

Mr. WARNER. We had no connection whatever because when we went there the only oil production was what Doheny was doing.

The CHAIRMAN. You never had any connection with Doheny?

Mr. WARNER. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They did not finance you?

Mr. WARNER. No, sir; not at all. One of our neighbors dug a well in 1909 and there was so much coal oil in it they could not use it and he had to dig another well.

The CHAIRMAN. Did any of your colonists get any money for their property when you left there?

Mr. WARNER. No, sir; not a single one.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you ever been able to sell out?

Mr. WARNER. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How much did you lose there?

Mr. WARNER. Well, it is pretty hard to tell, I went down there and the first season I put in about $6,000 and I was out the improvements, etc., the balance of the time, about $15,000 more.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a wealthy man?

Mr. WARNER. I do not think I am. Everything I have got is down there, and there is nothing there they tell me.

The CHAIRMAN. How about the other colonists, Mr. Warner?

Mr. WARNER. Well, they are in the same condition.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, were they wealthy, independent families?

Mr. WARNER. No, sir; they were all well-to-do, they were well-to-do, most of them, and successful in farming and raising crops, and most of them had brought some means with them, considerable means.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, did they get the means out when they left, or leave them?

Mr. WARNER. Not that I know of. One of my neighbors had about 200 head of cows, Mr. Hornby, and I was talking to his widow up here at Jacksboro and she said she lost them all. Mr. Weeder was working down in the field, that is the young man, he went up there and ran his cattle off, and according to Nieto, this representative of the Carranza Government in Washington, a statement that I see from the papers, that Col. Larga, in charge of the district, had him shot and killed because he was taking his stock.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was that?

Mr. WARNER. Weeder. His parents were about 80 years old. They had 1,100 acres and, if I remember, it was under fence and pretty well improved.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know a man by the name of Byrd?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir; I was well acquainted with him.

The CHAIRMAN. Where was he?

Mr. WARNER. He was on the west end of our colony, about 15 miles.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he one of your colonists?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir; he had 3,300 acres on the west end.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he have any means—was he a man of independent income?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir; I believe he was. He paid off his land in cash, so I was told, and he had considerable means after that. His family and mine were associated very closely.

The CHAIRMAN. What became of him, is he there?

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Byrd; no. He moved his family—well, he had to leave there after that Vera Cruz excitement and he went to Galveston, and from there he moved his family to Mineral Wells, Tex., and he died up there this last November. He was paralyzed, and I believe he was probably injured in some way.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you think he was paralyzed?

Mr. WARNER. I know he was paralyzed; I was at his house.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the cause of it?

Mr. WARNER. I expect from what the doctor said it was from being pounded over the head by one of the officers there at the station. He got off the car there and he accused him of associating or rather fraternizing with rebels.

The CHAIRMAN. The officer accused him?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir; and sent him to Mexico City, and he was there quite a while, and we immediately took the matter up with our consul at Tampico and San Luis Potosi and Mexico City, and then he was sent to Vera Cruz and from there he was sent to Tampico, and then when Wilson shanghaied all the people out of Tampico, his family went out with them.

The CHAIRMAN. You say he was beat over the head?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And the paralysis is supposed to be the result?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What became of his family? Any members of his family left there?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir; his wife and one of his sons are down in the oil field now they told me when I was up there this summer, and one of his sons and sister was down at my house in San Antonio about two weeks ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Was any son of his killed?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Who killed him?

Mr. WARNER. He was killed by this—I understand, of course, it is only what I am told and they all agreed—we all agreed on the same story; killed by bandits; by Villistas or Carrancistas; I do not know what they were. He was taken to the next station east of ours and executed there with two or three of his men that he had working for him.

The CHAIRMAN. Executed?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he have a trial?

Mr. WARNER. They claim so. I was told by one of the Americans that tried to prevent it—prevailed on the officers to not shoot him, and he said if he did not keep still he would be shot. That was the first station west of Ebano, where the Doheny property is. They were fighting then with the Federal troops at Ebano, and they had their headquarters at this switch there.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was the commander of those troops who were fighting with the Federal troops?

Mr. WARNER. I could not tell you, I could not tell you.

The CHAIRMAN. Who were the Federal troops that you spoke of—Huertistas?

Mr. WARNER. I was just trying to think whether—

The CHAIRMAN. What year was it?

Mr. WARNER. Whether—well, I could not tell you that now.

Miss OLLIE WARNER. 1914, wasn't it, papa?

Mr. WARNER. Oh, it was after that. I think it was in the latter part of 1914, I am not certain though. I do not know whether Huerta had been driven out of Tampico at that time or whether the Carrancistas had it, or whether they were fighting the Villistas or not.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it is hard to tell the difference between them?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It is rather confusing and hard to differentiate?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Gen. Pablo Gonzales was in control there part of the time, was he not?

Mr. WARNER. I believe he was from what I heard. He had headquarters in Tampico.

The CHAIRMAN. Gen. Caballero?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir. I believe he was, and Gen. Gonzales was stopping at the large hotel there at Tampico, the new one; I forget the name of it now.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not know what officials executed young Byrd?

Mr. WARNER. No, sir; I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not know who he claimed to owe allegiance to at that particular moment?

Mr. WARNER. No; I could not tell you that. You mean the officer?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; whether he was a Huertista or a Carrancista or Villista?

Mr. WARNER. Well, I know he was not a Huertista, because he was in power and was fighting those forces, but I was at Houston at the time and I know nothing about that.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you say that your colony numbered as many as 300 heads of families?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir, more than that. That was up to 1914 when this pamphlet was got out, and a great many bought after that.

The CHAIRMAN. The majority of them had their families there?

Mr. WARNER. Well, I would not say the majority. There was something about 200 left on the colony.

The CHAIRMAN. What became of the women and children?

Mr. WARNER. Well, when I was down there I was down to Tampico, and there was a bunch of bandits—three of them, came to one of my neighbors there and attacked him and tied him to a tree and made depredations there on his daughter.

The CHAIRMAN. That was Mr. Gourd?

Mr. WARNER. Mat Gourd. Mat Gourd came from Corning, Iowa. I induced him to come down there and sold him 400 acres of land on the Atascador.

The CHAIRMAN. You say there is one family there now?

Mr. WARNER. Yes. I got a letter from the head man at Tampico in charge of our colony and property there, and he said this German was living out on the ranch and had charge of the ranch house.

The CHAIRMAN. A German?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir; a German.

The CHAIRMAN. He has not been molested?

Mr. WARNER. He has not been molested, he has been there now six or seven years.

The CHAIRMAN. And all the other colonists gone?

Mr. WARNER. Every one of them.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you give the committee a list of the names of any of the colonists there? Can you furnish us with the names of any of those colonists?

Mr. WARNER. That were located on the land?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER. I have a list of them in that book.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. We will make a list, we will file that.

Mr. WARNER. There is over 300 there.

(The list as produced and identified by the witness, P. W. Warner, was thereupon handed to the chairman and ordered incorporated into the record, and is as follows:)

The CHAIRMAN. What became of those colonists when they had to come out of there?

Mr. WARNER. They scattered all over—they lost everything they had; some of them went down in the oil fields and worked down in there.

The CHAIRMAN. Went to work for wages?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Those who came to the United States—do you know anything about them?

Mr. WARNER. Very few; I have visited eight or ten or more families.

The CHAIRMAN. Visited the families?

Mr. WARNER. Visited the families last summer, they are all anxious to go back.

The CHAIRMAN. Where are they?

Mr. WARNER. They are in Texas—different parts of Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. What are they doing?

Mr. WARNER. Well, they are doing a little bit of everything they can. Mr. Hornbeck's family, one of his daughters is working in a department store there and the old gentleman died, and they are just living on the salary that the girl earns. And Mr. Byrd, I believe his daughter married a druggist up at Mineral Wells, and Mr. Byrd, the old gentleman, and his wife are living with them up there.

The CHAIRMAN. They had means besides what they had invested in Mexico?

Mr. WARNER. I think so.

The CHAIRMAN. Did many of the colonists have means so they could come back and live in this country?

Mr. WARNER. Most of them had, but a few of them, of course, did not have. Our consul sent out a letter in the fall of 1913, when I was out on the ranch alone. I had left my girls in Tampico the winter before. I felt uneasy about these roving bands around, but none of us had been molested and they had gone on to Houston, and while I was putting in another crop one of my neighbors came there with a letter that he had got from the consul direct from President Wilson, and it read something like this: "You know, undoubtedly, there will be severe fighting. I will advise you to leave the country. I shall do nothing to protect you if you do not, because I am not going to intervene." He said, "What do you think of that?" I said, "That is possible." For Mr. Taft told us that we would not intervene. We knew that the moment they landed marines in Mexico we would have to abandon the country. I was against intervention then, and I am against intervention now, but I am in favor of this: I think Mr. Wilson made a mess of that thing and he will have to straighten it out. He put Carranza in and if Carranza don't fulfill the duties it is his business to attend to that. The Mexican people have been the victims of our bandits and our conditions. They were armed and put in power in Mexico by virtually ourselves. Villa would not have been in power if it had not been for the backing Mr. Wilson gave him, gave Mr. Villa, and allowed him arms to help Mr. Carranza. We hear so much about watchful waiting. It is nothing but watchful meddling. They sent those marines in there to take Vera Cruz, according to Reuter's description of it, without getting any authority from Congress. You ought to know that better than I do.

The CHAIRMAN. His action was ratified.

Mr. WARNER. It was ratified after he did it.

The CHAIRMAN. I voted to ratify his action.

Mr. WARNER. That is all right; but I want to say that the people of Vera Cruz never did us any harm, nor any of the people in the United States, and when they bombarded that city and slaughtered several hundred of their innocent people, I consider it one of the greatest crimes ever committed. It endangered all the lives of Americans in Mexico; all of us had to run for our lives.

The CHAIRMAN. You came out before Vera Cruz?

Mr. WARNER. I came out then; I was very grateful; I had to. My son was down in the oil fields 100 miles south of Tampico; he had been cashier for the Aguila Co., and when they got notice Vera Cruz was to be taken they were ordered by the company to come to the beach. They started to Tuxpam, and there they were landed on the beach, some one hundred and forty-odd miles, and there were 296 in the car; and the evening after they got there they got word up at Tuxpam that Vera Cruz had been taken and about 2,000 people slaughtered, and a little Huerta captain came down there and he said, "I have only got about 40 troops and they are about to come down here and murder all you people." He said, "I am keeping them back and doing as well as I can, but if they come you will have to do the best you can." Charley said, "Why, there is over 60 women and children in this crowd." He said, "For God's sake keep them back." He said, "We will do the best we can." I did not hear from him for three weeks. I went to Galveston when this bunch of refugees came up there, over 2,000 of them; I could not hear a word from him.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean 2,000 Americans?

Mr. WARNER. Yes; they loaded them on the ship at Tampico, and then after the mobs had quieted down they wanted to go back to their houses and their hotels and homes, and the captain of the boat said, "You can not go"; and one of our wholesale grocerymen told me, he said one man came up to him, he said, "I just saw the captain of the boat, and he said they are going to take us to Galveston." He said, "I am not going to Galveston." He said, "I bet you are." He said, "I am a free-born American citizen; I am not going to Galveston." He said, "I guess you will; you are a subject of Kaiser Wilson; you are going to Galveston." Judge McCabe came to Houston in order to get back to Tampico; took a train to Brownsville and hired an automobile and came back that way. The moment the mob was put down by that German captain everything was quiet. Huerta—I want to give credit to Gen. Huerta that all of those thousands of Americans that were in there had to run for their lives after that crime of Vera Cruz; every one got out alive with just the clothes they had on their backs; they had to leave their stock, their homes, and everything. According to, as I said a little while ago, it is the meddler. There is no occasion for that at all. The excuse was to stop the landing of some ammunition for Gen. Huerta. Gen. Huerta was recognized by all the leading foreign nations and all the governments of the Republic of Mexico except two, and that is Sonora and Coahuila, where Carranza was governor. Of course he had a right to buy his ammunition, as I understand international law. I don't know much about it; but, anyway, instead of stopping the boat from landing the ammunition—and Wilson got a telegram, according to Reuterdal—I have the information from him—somewheres about midnight.

They have war board organization in Washington, with Admiral Dewey at the head of it, to eliminate Gen. Huerta without any bloodshed. And Wilson had them wire Fletcher to have them take Vera Cruz, and the bombardment started. At first they consulted no one, they committed those crimes, and that ruined all of us. We were friendly to all of those factions, they didn't bother us. Wherever there were two or three under a leader they never interrupted us. This 150 that held up our train. I talked to them, and they said, "We are not making war on you Americans." When we got my coach to the station, going out to my place, there were five of us, and we met 58 more of them, and they called them Constitutionalists; they were all armed with 30.30 Winchesters and two strings of ammunition. By the way, where they got their ammunition was through our administration backing them. They never molested us. They met these two Gourd girls, they were going to Sunday School, and they asked them if that was the right road to the railroad and they said yes, and a little ways farther they met Mr. King's daughter, a young lady about 18, and they politely lifted their hats to her and they never molested her. They told us, "We came through your colony up here and we stopped at the Casa Grande—large house—and got our breakfast and found everything all right." They said, "We are not making war on you Americans; we are making war on the government." They were going to the railroad to hold that freight train up, and afterwards when Huerta got his troops in there they retired. Then after that Huerta put troops at each station, they generally put 40 or 50 men and a captain in charge of them, while I was there in the summer of 1913.

The CHAIRMAN. Why don't you colonists go back there now?

Mr. WARNER. Well, I have a gentleman here, in this room now, that wanted to go there and go out on the colony, and they advised him if he would go out he would get killed, and he was bound to go anyway, and he talked to a number of Americans and some of the oil men there and they said he would not go out. Mr. Johnson, the manager of the Atascador, said:

I would not go out there. I have not been out there for four years. I would not go out there; that Gorman family is out there, they have taken charge of our machinery, and that is all. I would not go out there for the whole ranch. We have done nothing. We are afraid to go.

The CHAIRMAN. What are you afraid of?

Mr. WARNER. Well, we are afraid of being killed.

The CHAIRMAN. By whom?

Mr. WARNER. By the bandits, they call them; I don't know.

The CHAIRMAN. Weren't there any Federal troops there for protection?

Mr. WARNER. Not that I know of; no, sir. They have got a Federal general in there, this Mexican, a member of the Carranza Treasury Department. He said that he was murdering the Americans in there; had called Lincoln Weeden and young Catron to get their cattle. Mr. Crawford was down to see Mr. Catron; he wanted to buy his cattle, but he said he would not attempt to drive them to the station. You should take them to the stock pens.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is that general?

Mr. WARNER. Largo, I think they call him.

The CHAIRMAN. Who does he claim to be?

Mr. WARNER. A Carrancista. Nieto says, "I got the stock from the raids on the Atascador, among his relatives to-day, and also Nieto said, he—I think that is the way you pronounce it. He ran for governor of the State of San Luis Potosi.

The CHAIRMAN. Nieto; yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER. He claimed that Largo had—Mr. Catron lived there, had three sons, and last summer one of them was shot and killed about 3 miles from the house, and Largo says he is responsible.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it is Largo that you are afraid of, or the men under his command?

Mr. WARNER. Well, I don't know anything about that. We do not know who did it, whether they are Carrancistas or what they are.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, Largo is a Carrancista general?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir; so Nieto says himself, and also I got my information through a resident in Tampico.

The CHAIRMAN. Nieto is the assistant secretary of the treasury, is he?

Mr. WARNER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Assistant secretary of the treasury?

Mr. WARNER. Yes; I understand he represented Carranza's treasury in Washington. He ran for governor of the State of San Luis Potosi, and I see by the paper where Carranza counted him out, or he was not allowed to take possession, but I think he has some appointment under Carranza; I am not certain. I want to say this, that in speaking about intervention, I want it distinctly understood that I am against intervention, and I do not want this evidence to go in without that understanding. But I want to say this, that the people of Mexico, and when I say the people I mean the common people of the whole Republic, the same as I speak of the people of the United States; I don't speak of the Bolsheviks nor the I. W. W.'s. The people of Mexico have been victimized by these men that we have been putting in power through our administration.

The CHAIRMAN. Are they sustaining Carranza, the people?

Mr. WARNER. I don't know nothing about that, only what I hear. I wouldn't say, but I want to say this, that when Gen. Scott met Villa at Juarez and, according to Buckley's testimony, he made a deal with Villa and Villa was to conduct civilized warfare, that he has the protection of the United States and expects to be recognized, and one of the greatest blunders that Wilson made amongst the others, after making this deal with Gen. Scott, Carranza's troops go to head Villa off and ask the privilege to ship his troops through the State of Texas and New Mexico to head off Villa's troops at Agua Prieta, and, of course, Villa knew nothing of this.

Senator SMITH. You do not know anything more about it than we do. That is all history.

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir; but I want to say this much, that the consequence of these Mexicans coming in there and destroying Villa's army, he then cursed the Americans and killed all the Americans, and we had the raid at Columbus.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; we have him indicted now in New Mexico for murder, and we have hung six of his men.

Mr. WARNER. Well, these people would all be alive to-day; besides all the murders they were committing, that were committed by Villa afterwards, we can lay that transaction to the crooked deal with Villa. Villa was double-crossed; they meddled.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Smith just remarked that, of course, we have the history which you are detailing in the record, so it is not necessary to go into that at this time.

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir. Well, I just did that to explain the position I have; that I am against intervention, because the conditions down there were brought on through his meddling and helping one bandit chief and then another and arming them and putting them in power. They came down and robbed us with Winchesters they got through his authority.

The CHAIRMAN. At any rate conditions are such that you and your cocolonists do not dare to go back there?

Mr. WARNER. Yes; and before that we were perfectly safe, and we never had any trouble, any thieving, raiding, or anything of that kind going on.

Senator SMITH. Up to the flight of President Diaz, before his flight, there was peace all over Mexico?

Mr. WARNER. How is that?

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Smith asks if it is not true that prior to the expulsion of Diaz or resignation of Diaz that you had peace and order all over Mexico?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir; all over Mexico.

Senator SMITH. And ever since then you have had trouble?

Mr. WARNER. Ever since then there has been more or less banditry. Gen. Huerta made the remark that he looked to this country—I am not a Huertista or anything of that kind; I don't take any part in politics—I saw in the magazine of Frank Leslie an interview that he had; he made the remark that while Diaz was in power any young lady could have ridden from one end of the Republic to the other and would not be molested. I have known cattle buyers leave Tampico with fifteen or twenty or thirty thousand dollars in their saddle bags to buy stock here and there and camp out with the natives.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Smith and I have been riding down there for the last 30 years, but we never either one of us had that much money, but we were not molested.

Mr. WARNER. I have lived in the West all my life, and I have never carried a revolver, and I never carried one down there; I never had any occasion to.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe that is all, Mr. Warner; very much obliged to you, sir, for your statement.

TESTIMONY OF P. F. POORBAUGH.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Mr. JACKSON. What is your name?

Mr. POORBAUGH. P. F. Poorbaugh.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live, Mr. Poorbaugh?

Mr. POORBAUGH. I live in San Antonio.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you an American citizen?

Mr. POORBAUGH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What experiences, if any, have you had in Mexico?

Mr. POORBAUGH. I went to Mexico in the fall of 1912. I was invited to go with a special train that started from Kansas City. They were more or less representative men that were gathered up there from all over the United States. We had been offered an inducement to make a 10 or 12 days' trip where we would be taken into the Isthmus and given the privilege of stopping in Mexico City one day going and one day coming back, at the small rate, I think, of $60 from San Antonio, including the sleeper and diner. A majority of these men were going down there to see the country because of the extraordinary rates made. Not very many of them had any anticipation of buying anything.

When we got into Mexico City, as we had known we was not expecting anything of the kind, a report came to the train that we had been extended an invitation from the President, who was then de la Barra, to visit the palace at Chapultepec. So, after being carted around the parks and various scenes of the town and shown the city over pretty well, we were taken up in the afternoon to the palace. De la Barra came out and made a very nice speech to us. He seemed to be a very intelligent man. I understood that he had served at Washington as ambassador from that country, and he went on to say that he needed the American help and brains and money to help develop the country; that it was the only schooling that they could afford to give their people—the best that they could give them—and that if any of us should get interested in the country we could depend upon them for protection of our lives and property, and that it would be their pleasure to give us every encouragement they could possibly give. He wound up his speech by saying, "And if for any reason that it might become that we could not give you, or did not give you, or do not give you protection for your life and property that you deserve, that you come from the country worthy of the name of your country under our international law—they will give you such protection."

The CHAIRMAN. You are endeavoring now to repeat his words?

Mr. POORBAUGH. I am endeavoring, and I think I am repeating his exact words.

The CHAIRMAN. He was the interim President after Diaz went out and before Madero came in?

Mr. POORBAUGH. Yes, sir. He also invited us then to go to the Hotel Sans, where he would tender us a banquet that night, that evening. We went there and gathered around in groups and talked over his remarks. Judge J. J. Mansfield, who is now in the House of Representatives, was with us, and he acted as our spokesman and made a speech replying to De la Barra, after which we went out on the veranda and took some photographs, which I will show you. At the banquet they had four or five representative men. [Referring to photograph]: De la Barra is holding the handkerchief and Judge Mansfield right behind him. Among those was a railroad president, who was then building a railroad from San Lucrecia out to Yucatan, and he said, "These men that are taking you down to the Isthmus are going to show you a body of land known as the Fortuna tract." They had 162,000 acres of land they were trying to colonize. He went on to say they were building a road through that by Oaxaquena Sugar Works. The work was then under way, and of course after three or four of these fellows made speeches to us and outlined the prospects of that country and the advantages and what we might depend upon in the way of assistance and encouragement in every way, we went about midnight to our trains, and the next morning we had dropped in below Cordova and into the Tropics, and we were all very much surprised, all of us, at what we saw. By the time we got down to San Lucrecia, we got there at daylight, and the parties were ready for us to take us down to the Coatzacoalcos River. It means crooked snake. It is the largest river in Mexico, I understand, navigable up for a great many miles; in fact, quite a large boat runs clear up to San Lucrecia. They stopped the boats at this big sugar plantation, where there are some thirteen or fourteen hundred people working, and they went down a few miles farther and stopped at the New York Coffee Plantation, a very nice ranch building. They dropped then on down to the headquarters building that had been built, where it would take care of perhaps 150 or 200 people.

We spent the afternoon there, and the next day they went out onto this ranch property. They showed us the very finest and richest kind of lands, with mahogany timber standing there 4 or 5 feet through and maybe 60 or 70 feet to the limbs, beautiful stuff, and they offered us the land at $10 an acre and showed us where this railroad was going through, and they are already working on it. The company agreed to build a graded road across the Coatzacoalcos River, straight through the tract. And there was quite a stir made there, and when they got off for dinner they sent all their Indians to serve their lunch, and they pulled out maps and passed them out to the people, these different men. The maps were colored where it was sold and not colored where it was not sold. And the fellows began to holler out I will take such a section and this section, and they sold within a half an hour about 45,000 acres of land. I don't think there was hardly a man in the entire bunch that didn't buy land, Judge Mansfield among the others.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you buy some?

Mr. POORBAUGH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How much did you buy?

Mr. POORBAUGH. I bought at that time about a thousand acres. It might have been a little bit more than that, but I think it was right at a thousand acres. After I got home, a few months later than that, I bought a half a section, I got a chance to get it through another party. It lay on this road they were going to grade through there, and I paid him $3,200 for that half section in addition to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have any organization among the land purchasers of any kind; then or thereafter did you organize yourselves into an association?

Mr. POORBAUGH. No; the colony was being handled by the Kansas City Land Co.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is at the head of that?

Mr. POORBAUGH. George W. Wright was really at the head of it; he is the man that bought the land.

The CHAIRMAN. He is still in Kansas City?

Mr. POORBAUGH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know Mr. Inglesby?

Mr. POORBAUGH. Yes, sir; Mr. Inglesby was one of the gentlemen that made a speech to us at that Hotel Sans banquet.

The CHAIRMAN. He was engaged in the business of colonizing lands down there?

Mr. POORBAUGH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In other portions of the Isthmus?

Mr. POORBAUGH. Yes, sir. They seemed to stand very high with the officials down there; everybody seemed to think they were A1, reliable men.

The CHAIRMAN. Did any of those that bought lands attempt to make a residence upon them?

Mr. POORBAUGH. Quite a number of them; I expect we had two or three or four hundred people there at one time.

The CHAIRMAN. What has become of them?

Mr. POORBAUGH. I think I was probably the last man down there. I went there in the spring of 1914—I will go ahead with my story, beginning a little earlier than that: In 1912 we went there and bought this stuff. In the spring of 1913 we went with two full special trains, something like about a hundred people, and a great many of them were people that remained there. Among them I took my son and son-in-law and left them there. I had my family here in the States. I had some interests there, and I was not ready to establish my home there until we could get that started; in fact, we were still working on this road, and I left them there and they had not been there but a few months, and they had done some work when the order came to get out. There was a man came there from Salina Cruz, a representative of this Government, and on the same day there was a man came there from Puerto Mexico, both of them to advise for the people to get out, that the boats would not carry anything only the people and grips; they were not even allowed to take their trunks.

We had lots of people there that had lots of furniture, stock, and lots of provisions laid in, it was quite a ways to town and they would lay in quite a good stock of provisions, and they just called a kind of council and we got together and decided, most of them decided to go, and so there was only just a few of the men stayed, and I think all the women and children went, and they filled their grips and went off and left everything. Then in the spring of 1914, I was living then in Houston, I decided I would make an effort to go down there and get out some mahogany timber. This road had got through and you know there was a lot of timber that was down and going to rot if it was not got into the water and taken care of, and I thought I would see if I could not relieve my financial condition.

I had investéd most everything I had there. I went down there and on my way down there I got caught in a storm on the Gulf and was lambasted over the ship until I was almost killed; it was several weeks before I could stand up. I had two men with me from Houston that took care of me. I got them down on the ranch to try to get out these logs. Some of the people had agreed to buy some work stock in the way of cattle to help haul out the logs. We thought we could start in it with the natives we could hire. We had some natives at that time on the property. In the meantime I went over to Zavala and stayed with E. E. Morgan, the man that was murdered on the 8th of April of this year, and I stayed there and doctored myself up with him because he had a nice place to stay. And I visited over at Salina Cruz some after I got so I thought I could navigate. I had him take me back down and take me down to the grounds. He starts and goes back to his ranch. On Saturday I got on a horse with the rest of the boys and we took a pack mule, and they started out to show me where we had better land the raft of logs and looked the thing over. We went out and stayed overnight—I believe we went out on Thursday and came back on Saturday, we were gone two or three days—anyway I came back on Saturday, and we had it all planned where we were going to start our logging.

I was sitting at a table a little longer than this one Sunday afternoon writing some letters to my folks, and I thought it would be several weeks or months before I could write any more. The boys had been out hunting that afternoon and they had left an old shotgun lying on the end of the table. They had taken our guns away from us in Puerto Mexico—they were pump guns—and 350 shells. They said they would not allow us to take them in because it was dangerous. I had papers from the War Department that I had taken these guns out of there and could take them back whenever I wanted to; but they thought it would be dangerous, and I had to leave the guns there with them. I kept insisting on the guns; I thought I had to have them there because there were so many tigers up in my country; but finally the German consul offered to get them for me if I would give him $10, but I would not trade with the German consul and he gave me a hint; he said, "You are a d— fool to go up there unless you go as an Englishman or a German." I said, "All right. I will try it anyway." Along about 2 o'clock there was a native woman sitting at the sewing machine and she jumps up and runs and grabs this gun, and as she did so she was so excited she said something hurriedly to me. She said there were bandits coming. I could not understand her she was so excited, and she rushed out the side door and I followed her out to see what she was doing, and she was sticking that gun under the house. She let the butt stick out, and I said, "If you are going to hide it, stick the whole thing under." I thought maybe she wanted to hide the gun so the boys could not hunt. As I started back there a man came—I saw a man coming. Our house was boarded about that high [indicating] and the balance had a screen. I was looking through the screen and I saw a man coming along with a slouch hat on. I saw he had a gun: I thought that is what's up, some fellow is coming wanting to hunt. I breezed out the door to meet him, and as I did I saw he had a great big No. 10 American gun like I used to have myself, and he had a belt of shells around this way and that way and around here, and he had a big revolver and a knife, but I still didn't get excited, because there is lots of game in that country. Just then Mr. Porter, a young lawyer, came out from the cookhouse, but Porter did not get there quite as quick as I did. He was in his shirt sleeves; but, anyway, he commenced talking to Porter, but I held out my hand to admire the gun and he gave me a look that sent chills down my back, and then I glanced around my eyes out into the barn lot and saw about 25 of them, and they were bandits.

I went into the house, and the woman in there grabbed me by the arm, and says, "You want to keep away from that man; that is a bad man; that is the man that killed the captain of the Oaxaquena boats last week." I said to her, "Well, he looks it." I grabbed my grip with the two revolvers and watches and what money I had and stuff was sitting on this table where I was writing, and I ran and clamped that grip shut and went through the side door and went to the cookhouse, and that old woman that was doing the cooking up there was all excited and scared to death. She grabbed me by the arm, and said, "If you will go up the river and hide, we will get them after you, and that will save us." I was still walking with a cane. I knew I would have to go about 200 yards where they could see me if they were looking. There was broom grass standing about a foot high, and I says, "I guess that's the only way," and I started up and went as close as I could to the broom grass; it was raining a little bit. And when I got along where the path turned I looked back and seen they had not seen me. I kept the house between them and me. I knew it could not be very long before they would be after me. I walked along in the path and I made plain tracks, and I stepped off on the other side and scuffled along until I saw that I was not making any tracks, and I jumped out of the path into the bamboo where it was very thick and hid, and I sat down and got my guns out where they could not see me, and I was on the wind side when the wind was blowing from the river. I had not been there more than a minute or two until I could hear them coming, when they went by me Indian file, and there I was sitting in the rain; I did not know whether I dared go back to the house, or whether they had left somebody back there. I knew if I stayed out all night I would have to have a fire to keep the tigers away from me. I knew if I done that they would know where I was, and I was in a bad fix. I suppose I sat there about an hour.

We were expecting a bunch of men in there from California; they were due at that time. They usually came in there on Sunday, but I had given up hopes, because there was so much friction going on in Mexico at that time that I did not have any idea they would ever come. In about an hour I heard the sound of a boat, and I commenced listening and I knew it was the boat. My first thought was I would rush down to the river and I would notify them and have them to come in and tell them for fear they would run into some of the bandits there at the house. I knew they did not have any guns, but the river was so wide and they were out so far and had the curtains down that I did not take any chances, but I went back to the house, and there wasn't any bandits left there. Now, going back I made up my mind them fellows was coming back again; they know I haven't got any gun; the chances are they will be back in the morning, and the only chance to save our lives will be to play their bluff for bravery. Mr Porter met me as I came out to find out what my experience had been, and I said, "Now, let me do all the talking for this crowd, don't say nothing about being held up." I went in to dry my clothes and I told the Indians not to whimper a word that they saw the hold-up. After we got in and all settled I told Mr. Morgan about what had happened. I told him that I thought they would be back the next morning. We must keep these men out laughing and joking around and he must be out and meet them when they came. So the next morning at daylight he worked very hard to get the horses saddled before breakfast so as to get these men out into the interior before they would come.

The CHAIRMAN. These the Americans?

Mr. POORBAUGH. Yes, sir. Well the Americans were there; they had arrived. Mr. Baxter, a friend of mine, was there, a man that had been there several trips. I never told him a word. About daylight I had a field glass and I went out and began to watch. I finally seen them coming. I went in and told Mr. Morgan, and we put the dinners in a little sack and put them on the horses on the horn of our saddles. I told him, "They are coming," and Mr. Morgan showed fear. He had had a great deal of experience with bandits and he showed fear. He had one of those Colt's automatics. I said, "You take that fellow off to one side and talk to him, and if you see you can't settle with him and he is bound to get our guns, shoot him and get his gun, and at that moment I will have Porter in the saddle room with a gun pointed at them, and I will be in the yard with my hand on my revolver, and the moment you make a move we will all shoot at them." He went out and it seemed he was talking an hour.

We had one man named John Walker who stepped up after these men stopped there, and he looked kind of scared. He said, "Who is that bunch there?" I said, "That is a bunch of natives, they always come in here when we have a bunch of men here, they think they may get contract work," and they were laughing around and talking, and old John steps up in front of this bunch and threw both hands up, playing they were bandits. I dared not say anything. I got around to old John and jerked his coat and told him what they were. I said, "Fellow, get out." Mr. Morgan was telling them that these men cared nothing about them, that they will shoot their eyes out with revolvers if they started anything, and the only show you have got is to come out and play the game. He was so weak that he could not hardly come out, but he came out. Afterwards Mr. Morgan broke away and came. I dropped in his way and he whispered to me that they had settled. I found out afterwards that he went back and paid them, he gave them $50 in money and some boots. The reason it took so long he insisted on the guns. Well, I went, that settled me. Up to that time I had not made up my mind that I would still return home, but after that I went and got these two boys together, I says, "I am going to go to Vera Cruz with them, and while they are going to Florida and around that way home, we will take boats and go to Tampico and from there to Galveston." Mr. Bennett promised to go, but Mr. Porter would not go. Mr. Porter was a lawyer. He had sold his law library in Houston to get the money to go down there. He had a family, two children, two or three children in Indiana, they had been sent back there to his wife's father. He felt he had nothing to go back to and the prospects looked good to him, and a cattleman had offered him half of his cattle ranch to stay there and take care of them. I divided some money with him and gave him my .38 revolver, and that is the last I ever seen of Porter, never heard of him from that day to this. I went to Vera Cruz on that train with these men, and had a visit with Mr. John Lind. I thought if I could get any encouragement there I would return. In the meantime Mr. Bennett had decided to stay with Mr. Porter another week, that he hoped that he could get him to come with him and they would go down to Puerto, Mexico, which he did, and I never heard from Porter any more. As I didn't get any encouragement from Mr. Lind, he was sent there for just one purpose and that was to drive Huerta out of there, to get him out in some shape, and while it looked as though they were trying to put Carranza in, I did not think half as much of him as I did of Huerta and the prospects, and so I told him that if I could not get any encouragement there I was going home, that I was going to try to forget my losses there and start life over again, that I had no hope whatever in what was going to take place, and I went up from there to Tampico, and from there to Houston, and a few days later, why, the troops had landed at Vera Cruz, and this crowd came out that was landed there at Galveston.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you been back since?

Mr. POORBAUGH. No, sir; I have not been back since.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any of the other colonists there?

Mr. POORBAUGH. No, sir; I do not think there has been any of our colonists or any people on that ranch since I was there. I visited a number of their homes on that trip I was there, there was absolutely nothing to be found in their houses, lots of them were well furnished, with the exception of the cook stove, and cook stoves seemed to be in the places where they were without being molested in any manner. Every house had a cook stove, absolutely nothing else in the house except the cook stove, what farm machinery they may have had out around in the back lot, you will find lying around there, that was not molested, but everything else, you could see where a great many of the houses had been used for chicken houses.

Senator SMITH. Who were those, that band of robbers that made this assault on you there, whom did they represent, do you know?

Mr. POORBAUGH. They represented just themselves, little squads would gather up to make money out of it. Now, in justice to the old man that is dead, I want to explain what became of him. We got to Vera Cruz on the night, I think it was Tuesday night, and that night I wrote a letter to Huerta and told him all about what had happened. I had had quite a little correspondence back and forth with him about this gun business, and on Friday that band got back there and carried everything off that was on the place. They had stripped their people, Mr. Bennett told me they had stripped the natives naked and turned them loose and got everything that was worth anything on the entire place and carried it off.

The CHAIRMAN. They claimed to be revolutionists against the Huerta administration?

Mr. POORBAUGH. Oh, no, no; they were just out for the money. The Huerta soldiers, a squad of them, were sent out from San Lucrecia, it was not a very great distance, however, on Saturday, and caught up with those fellows within a mile of our place and killed 18 of them, and they had taken 7 of them and took them into Puerto Mexico, and while Mr. Bennett was getting on the ship to Galveston those seven were taken out and shot, and the story was given out that they tried to get away, and that wound up that bunch of 25.

Senator SMITH. They were captured by the Huertistas?

Mr. POORBAUGH. Yes, sir; they were captured by the Huertistas.

Senator SMITH. What has the condition been so far as you could ascertain as to the safety of anybody going back there now, and if it is not as safe, what are the present conditions?

Mr. POORBAUGH. The present conditions from all that I can hear—of course, I am keeping in touch with friends and people in various ways, and have very closely since I landed in this country in May of this year—I had been a year over in the Orient, China, Japan, and the Philippines, and while I was over there, of course, I did not get much of any news, but in the meantime I had not given up hope of Mexico. My son being interested in cocoa-nut oil, I decided to buy the Zavala Ranch, and we had to send some money to Mr. John Baxter here—by the way, Mr. Baxter's letter here this morning might interest you—we sent him to Kansas City to find out what this property could be bought for and asked him to cable us, and he cabled us that it would cost $150,000. We had decided we would take it; so we went to—when we got to San Francisco we cabled Mr. Baxter that we had to be in New York shortly and to meet us in San Antonio and ride with us to Houston and we would talk with him on the way and make our arrangements. The first thing he told me when we got on the train here at San Antonio was that Mr. Morgan had been killed on the 8th day of April. We had figured that there was about 125 head of natives on this ranch, and we would put Mr. Morgan in charge and have him put them to work putting out cocoa nuts. And it took about 8 or 10 years to get them to bear. When we found out Mr. Morgan was dead, and not knowing what had become of the ranch we had lost all hope. We had given Mr. Baxter what we thought was ample expense money, but my son gave him another $50 bill and told him to go home and try to forget it.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we have in our files an account of the death of Mr. Morgan.

Mr. POORBAUGH. I was very well acquainted with Mr. Morgan.

Senator SMITH. Who was in possession, if you know, what particular faction was exercising jurisdiction or control over that particular land?

Mr. POORBAUGH. Well, so far as I know, nobody, since Carranza has been recognized; I suppose it is the Carranza faction. At the time I left there one proposition I made to Mr. John Lind was that if he would go out and travel with me 30 days and we would travel through the interior and central part of that country, and we would take an exhibit to him everything that had white blood in it, and if 85 per cent of them didn't agree with me that Huerta had given us a better government than Madero had, and he was their choice of all the prospects there was in Mexico, I would pay all expenses of the trip.

Senator SMITH. I am trying to get at this particular time, I want to get, if I can, from anybody who knows, what effort at order is being made, what protection of life is being offered to Americans down in that country where you speak of?

Mr. POORBAUGH. None whatever.

Senator SMITH. Who has control of it at this time?

Mr. POORBAUGH. Well, it is supposed to be Carranza, but there is nobody got control.

Senator SMITH. I mean, it is within what is the jurisdiction of Carranza?

Mr. POORBAUGH. Yes, sir; it is within the jurisdiction.

Senator SMITH. And within that jurisdiction you do not think Carranza or anybody else has any control of it?

Mr. POORBAUGH. No, sir; the Government of Mexico is in more the shape of China; it has got a dictator of the north and a dictator of the south; and every city makes its own money in China, and that is about what it does in Mexico. Every district or any village of any size in the country has got its own dictator.

The CHAIRMAN. In what State is this land of yours?

Mr. POORBAUGH. The lower end of Vera Cruz on the Isthmus Railroad, it was south of the Isthmus Railroad.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is the governor of the State of Vera Cruz; do you know?

Mr. POORBAUGH. I don't know. There is one other thing I would like to call to your attention.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well, sir.

Mr. POORBAUGH. It looks as if I had been picked in my title. I don't know whether you folks could assist me in any way, shape, form, or manner about it. When I was in the Philippines I got a letter from Mr. Parker; he paid my taxes for about eight years; he had paid taxes for all of our people down there, and when I got home here this year I received this letter, written the 31st day of July, but I didn't get it until some time in August, but as the letter will show you he asked me to show him my deed, but not the abstract, and that he has fixed my particular title, although it was a court of fomento title, that it would have to be sent there for them to validate under this Government, under Carranza rule, and he sends me this copy that he had translated from the Spanish, that I should keep as my receipt for this deed. He goes on to say that the Washington Government here has recommended that we do this. I took the deed and went to the post office and mailed it to him. I have never heard a word from it. I have got my tax receipts—that is, I paid them every year—every year in December he has been sending me the tax receipts, and telling me about what the taxes would be for next year; I would always keep a little ahead there. I didn't hear a word about my tax receipts, nor my probable taxes, nor about my deed. After writing a number of letters to him I went to the American consul and he asked me to write him a letter, which I did, to give the statement to him in regard to what I had done. I don't know whether any of these letters will do any good or not, but from what I have heard since that time I understand that is coming to be a common thing down in that country. Now, I don't know whether that man Parker has been killed or whether these records fell into—

Senator SMITH. I presume this comes within the line of notices given to landowners in Sonora, that they would steal their lands, they were going to be confiscated.

Mr. POORBAUGH. This shows that it has been in the hands of French heirs, a family in France; the Ferdona people are French, and it has been in their hands for more than 150 years.

The CHAIRMAN. This circular is circular form, to be filed by a land owner, certificate to be made by him.

Mr. POORBAUGH. I signed one of these and that was the copy I was to keep. I signed the other one, it was in Spanish, that one in connection with my deed, but this letter is what I sent it in. I think if our own Government had recommended it, of course, I was safe in doing that.

The CHAIRMAN. This is an act of February 21—not an act, but it is as usual, it is an Executive Order of the President of Mexico of February 21, 1918, forfeiting certain concessions, grants, and requiring individuals claiming lands, then those who sent down there for reregistration their titles, make claim.

Mr. POORBAUGH. Yet the President of Mexico, at the time he made this speech to us, assured us the court of fomento title was absolutely perfect and could not be overthrown by any government.

The CHAIRMAN. This President of Mexico has shown you about that. You are speaking of another President?

Mr. POORBAUGH. Yes. I don't know. I don't concede the fact he was elected President. I don't know whether the United States can appoint one and make one down there legally or not. I happen to know something about his election. I know he wasn't elected. I know another thing, there never was a person elected in Mexico. Huerta was man enough to come out and tell us he would pull off the stunt, but he didn't want any of our intelligent people to think he was going to pull off an election. Mr. E. E. Morgan told me about several of those elections. He told me they required the boys to pay 25 cents a piece to sign their names, but when Mr. Huerta was elected the same stunt was pulled off in the same way; they had no chance to put their names on the paper either for Madero or Huerta, but they were charged 25 cents.

The CHAIRMAN. We can have these papers copied.

Mr. POORBAUGH. That is what I think, if you can use them. I will have them copied, because they are all I have got.

The CHAIRMAN. Very much obliged to you.

TESTIMONY OF O. G. COMPTON.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized.)

The CHAIRMAN. We are meeting the convenience of witnesses as nearly as we can, and when one is here who must leave we will take his testimony out of rotation—that is, we will take evidence upon some other subject than that which we have been following—to meet the convenience of the witness.

What is your name, sir?

Mr. COMPTON. Compton, O. G.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live, Mr. Compton?

Mr. COMPTON. I live in San Antonio.

The CHAIRMAN. You are an American citizen?

Mr. COMPTON. I would hate to think otherwise. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you had any experience with reference to Mexico, or to disturbances from this side?

Mr. COMPTON. Yes, sir; I was in the Glenn Springs raid, May 5, 1916.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is Glenn Springs?

Mr. COMPTON. About 75 miles south of Alpine.

The CHAIRMAN. How far from the international border?

Mr. COMPTON. It is between 8 and 9 miles from the Rio Grande.

The CHAIRMAN. When was the raid you speak of?

Mr. COMPTON. May 5, 1916.

The CHAIRMAN. Were there American soldiers there?

Mr. COMPTON. Nine.

The CHAIRMAN. What occurred there, Mr. Compton? Just tell it in your own language.

Mr. COMPTON. A bunch of Mexicans ran in there that night about 11 o'clock and began to shoot things up immediately and set the soldiers' quarters on fire, the barracks.

The CHAIRMAN. How many people were there in Glenn Springs, about?

Mr. COMPTON. There were the nine soldiers and my family and Mr. Ellis's family and several Mexican families, but that immediate night I don't think there was but three Mexican families that was in their quarters; they were nearly all off on a visit, different places.

The CHAIRMAN. Glenn Springs, of course, is in Texas?

Mr. COMPTON. Yes, sir; Brewster County.

The CHAIRMAN. You say the soldiers' quarters, or barracks, were set on fire?

Mr. COMPTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there any fighting?

Mr. COMPTON. Constantly from 11 o'clock on until nearly daylight.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was engaged in the fight?

Mr. COMPTON. These Mexicans, these nine soldiers and myself.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you happen to become engaged in the fight?

Mr. COMPTON. I was living there, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. You didn't attack these Mexicans?

Mr. COMPTON. No, sir; they attacked us, and it was either fight or get killed. We were surrounded.

The CHAIRMAN. Were any Americans killed?

Mr. COMPTON. There were three American soldiers killed, and my little boy, 5 years old.

The CHAIRMAN. How was your boy killed?

Mr. COMPTON. Shot through the heart. The bullet went through that arm (indicating the left arm) and through the heart.

The CHAIRMAN. Where was he at the time he was shot?

Mr. COMPTON. He was standing right in the middle of the room, right in front of the door.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it at night?

Mr. COMPTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Were any of these Mexicans identified, or was there any method of identifying them?

Mr. COMPTON. Well, there was three of them brought back to the United States by Col. Sullivan and Maj. Longhorn's troops when they went in.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, the American troops went across the line?

Mr. COMPTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Captured some of the raiders and brought them back?

Mr. COMPTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They were identified, were they?

Mr. COMPTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They were identified as having been in that fight?

Mr. COMPTON. One of them was identified as being in this fight, and the other two, I believe, in the Boquillas raid.

The CHAIRMAN. To what faction, if any, did these Mexican people claim to belong?

Mr. COMPTON. Well, they were "Viva Villa" and "Viva Carranza" both. This general, I believe, had Carrancista papers on him.

The CHAIRMAN. Which general?

Mr. COMPTON. I can't tell you his name now.

The CHAIRMAN. One of these men who was arrested, you mean, by our soldiers?

Mr. COMPTON. Yes, sir; and brought back to the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. But he was known as a general, was he?

Mr. COMPTON. A colonel.

The CHAIRMAN. Under what command? Do you know who he claimed to give allegiance to?

Mr. COMPTON. No, sir; he wouldn't tell it.

The CHAIRMAN. But he had some papers on him, however?

Mr. COMPTON. Yes, sir; he had some papers on him.

The CHAIRMAN. What did those papers show as to his identity?

Mr. COMPTON. Well, I believe that it would show he was commissioned in the Carranza army as a colonel.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we have in our records a statement of some of the Army officers there as to the identity of these men. Was there any robbery committed out there?

Mr. COMPTON. Yes, sir; they carried off everything they could carry off—everything that they wanted out of the stores—and carried everything out of my home but the big cookstove and the iron bedsteads; of course, they didn't want them.

The CHAIRMAN. They got possession, then, of the property, did they?

Mr. COMPTON. They got possession.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did they remain there?

Mr. COMPTON. Twenty-three of them—I believe it was 23—remained until about 7 o'clock the next morning.

The CHAIRMAN. What became of you and the other members of your family in the meantime?

Mr. COMPTON. Before these soldiers broke for liberty out of this burning building I couldn't do nothing with my little girl 9 years old, she kept hollering and crying, she wanted me to take her over to the wash woman's house. I told her I would if she would hush crying, and get on my back so I could carry her, it must be about 100 yards over there. I carried her on my back over there and turned her over to this Mexican woman and told her to take care of her. She told me she would. She proceeded to wrap her up in a black shawl like all Mexican kids are wrapped up. I started back to the house to get these boys that were asleep at that time. I got between the boiler room and the blacksmith shop, between 50 and 75 yards from my house, and these soldiers broke for liberty. Sergt. Smith hollered, "Don't shoot, Compton, this is Sergt. Smith." I dropped down, but instead of him coming to me, he popped out on a hill, and I didn't see him any more. These Mexicans followed him, looked to me like 25 or 30 of them. They attacked my house and I proceeded to warm them up.

The CHAIRMAN. You shot at them?

Mr. COMPTON. Yes; and I thought I heard Mexicans walking on that cinder path trying to get in behind me, and I backed up into that space by the boiler room, I didn't want anybody to get in between me and that light, or shoot back and forth in right around the light that was back away from this fire here. I got out of the boiler room and got behind a rock about the size of that table, and stayed there the balance of the night. There was a trail going west out behind the boiler room, and while I was behind that rock, I judge it was 2.30 or 3 o'clock in the morning, these Mexicans left there, going up the river on horseback, all except 20 or 25 of them; they stayed there and took these soldiers' horses and mine, and Mr. Ellis's horses, and took what they wanted of them, and they went south the next morning about 7 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. Any of the Mexicans killed?

Mr. COMPTON. There was only one of the men left on the ground. Several puddles of blood around there, like—several puddles of blood, like you might have been killing a bunch of sheep.

The CHAIRMAN. How many boys did you have?

Mr. COMPTON. I had two boys and a girl.

The CHAIRMAN. What became of the boy who was not killed?

Mr. COMPTON. He stayed there in the house. They didn't bother him. He was deaf and dumb, and I am satisfied that some of these Mexicans knew it, because they knew how to get in this store.

The CHAIRMAN. They killed the other boy?

Mr. COMPTON. They killed the little one; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was done with those Mexicans who were arrested by our soldiers, do you know?

Mr. COMPTON. Yes, sir; they were brought to Marathon; the sheriff came down from Alpine and carried them to Alpine and put them in jail.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether any of them were tried?

Mr. COMPTON. Three of them were tried; yes, sir; and sent to the penitentiary.

The CHAIRMAN. Have there been any other raids, either prior to this or subsequent, that you know of, there along that border?

Mr. COMPTON. Well, there has been—a Ranger customhouse—one up the river 40 or 50 miles from there; and there are frequent raids, Senator, all up and down the river, taking stock across.

The CHAIRMAN. You could hear of them every few days?

Mr. COMPTON. We expected a raid this very night. It had been rumored around there for a few days that that night they were going to shoot up Terlingua, but they didn't; they attacked Glenn Springs and Boquillas.

The CHAIRMAN. They did raid Boquillas that same night?

Mr. COMPTON. The same night, and carried Mr. Deemers into Mexico with them.

The CHAIRMAN. How far is Boquillas from Glenn Springs?

Mr. COMPTON. I believe it was 23 miles; that is right on the river, not over a mile from the river.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you own your own home there at Glenn Springs?

Mr. COMPTON. Not there; I own a section of land down on the river. I had only been up there nearly two months.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you leave Glenn Springs immediately after this?

Mr. COMPTON. Yes, sir; I left there Monday morning after the raid Friday night.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all, Mr. Compton.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand Mr. Schuls, the witness we expected, has a sick child. Of course, that is sufficient excuse; this is not a formal court proceeding, but I hope the witnesses who are subpoenaed here will remember they are under process, and they will be in attendance unless there is a very good excuse for nonattendance in which case they will notify Capt. Hanson or the secretary of the committee. Senator Smith is compelled to be absent for a while, and the committee will be in recess until to-morrow morning at half past 10 o'clock.

(Thereupon, at 4.30 o'clock p. m., the committee recessed until Friday, January 16, 1920, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.)

FRIDAY, JANUARY 16, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE.

The subcommittee met pursuant to adjournment at 10.45 a. m. in the Pink Room of the Gunter Hotel, San Antonio, Tex.

Present: Senators Fall (chairman) and Smith; Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee.

TESTIMONY OF J. G. SCHULS.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Mr. JACKSON. Give your name to the stenographer.

The CHAIRMAN. Give your full name.

Mr. SCHULS. Schuls is my name; J. G.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live?

Mr. SCHULS. San Antonio at present.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you an American citizen?

Mr. SCHULS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you born?

Mr. SCHULS. State of Iowa, in the year 1864.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you lived in Mexico?

Mr. SCHULS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. When?

Mr. SCHULS. We were there since—we were there—before we came to San Antonio at the present, why, we were there two years and a half.

The CHAIRMAN. What year?

Mr. SCHULS. We went there in 1916 and came back here in October.

The CHAIRMAN. What portion of the country were you in?

Mr. SCHULS. We first went to San Luis Potosi; that is in the state of San Luis.

The CHAIRMAN. What were you doing?

Mr. SCHULS. I was trying to go to ranching, until I got in with a man over in the Rio Grande country. He lived in the City of Mexico, so after I lived a while in San Luis Potosi, I moved my family to the City of Mexico, because I thought it would be safer there than in San Luis Potosi, but it proved to be worse in the City of Mexico than in the State of San Luis Potosi.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you live in the city or in the Federal district?

Mr. SCHULS. Yes; we lived in the Federal district, in the suburbs, in a little place called Colonia del Valle.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you thought it would be safer there?

Mr. SCHULS. We thought it would be; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean to say it was not safe, or you did not consider yourselves safe in San Luis Potosi?

Mr. SCHULS. No, sir; no, sir; we were bothered there all the time.

The CHAIRMAN. What year was that?

Mr. SCHULS. In San Luis Potosi?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. SCHULS. That was in 1916, and the next year then we moved to the City of Mexico and there we moved in one afternoon in a little house in Colonia del Valle, and we did not know they went through the wall until next day, and when we moved in the people went through the wall and got five pigs. We began to raise pigs.

The CHAIRMAN. Pigs?

Mr. SCHULS. Yes, sir; the place was probably 300 feet or more square, and the boy woke up that night dreaming, and that is the way I scared them away, but they would go and take them all, and after that I had to stay in my house every night with my rifle and six-shooter.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, who were they?

Mr. SCHULS. Well, as far as I could learn they were all Carrancista soldiers; they were all over there in the valley, right east of me.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, in San Luis, who was it giving you the trouble?

Mr. SCHULS. Well, generally what they call bandits there.

The CHAIRMAN. Were there any Government or Federal troops in the neighborhood, Mr. Schuls?

Mr. SCHULS. Yes, sir; lots of them.

The CHAIRMAN. They could not afford you and your family protection?

Mr. SCHULS. Oh, no; no.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they try to?

Mr. SCHULS. No, sir. When in the City of Mexico, when we applied for aid there, why they told us that they had no time to wait on us at all. Carranza last summer took all the pistols away from the policemen; every policeman in the City of Mexico has no gun at all; all that he has is a stick.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is the American colony situated in Mexico City; if you know?

Mr. SCHULS. I do not know of any. I did not get acquainted around there in that colony, where we was; what they call Colonia del Valle; there was five or six Americans in there, and there was a big French dairy, and there was two or three English families living there where we were, and the rest of them were Mexicans.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you ever in the City of Mexico at night?

Mr. SCHULS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you at any time acquired any property in the Republic of Mexico?

Mr. SCHULS. Yes, sir. We had some in San Luis which we sold last summer; or I mean last spring rather, my wife went there and sold it. We fixed our deed in the City of Mexico and she went up there to receive the money, and on her way coming back she was robbed at Queretaro at noon.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean the city of Queretaro?

Mr. SCHULS. As the train stopped there for dinner she went in and was robbed.

The CHAIRMAN. How much was taken from her?

Mr. SCHULS. Two thousand American dollars. We got it all in American gold in San Luis.

The CHAIRMAN. Who robbed her?

Mr. SCHULS. Mexicans.

The CHAIRMAN. In the city of Queretaro?

Mr. SCHULS. Yes, sir; right at the railroad station; and she was also anxious when she was in the train.

The CHAIRMAN. In the train?

Mr. SCHULS. Yes, sir; the way it happened——

The CHAIRMAN. When was that?

Mr. SCHULS. That was the latter part of March.

The CHAIRMAN. Of 1916 or 1917?

Mr. SCHULS. No; of this last year, 1919.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, 1919.

Mr. SCHULS. Yes, sir; this year, 1919; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, Queretaro is the city where Mr. Carranza lives a part of the time; does he not? Retires from the City of Mexico to Quaretaro?

Mr. SCHULS. That I could not say.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether that is the city where they formed the constitution of 1917?

Mr. SCHULS. Yes, sir; yes, at that time; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How far is it from the City of Mexico by train; what time does it require?

Mr. SCHULS. Well, now, it takes a good deal of time. It took my wife from noon that day until half past 2 the next morning, when she arrived in the City of Mexico. Sometimes we have no trains, and again our trains are very late.

The CHAIRMAN. Ordinarily it is about a four-hour run by train?

Mr. SCHULS. Ordinarily it is about a four-hour run.

The CHAIRMAN. Were the federal soldiers in Queretaro?

Mr. SCHULS. Yes; they probably had a company of soldiers on the train, they carry that many and sometimes more on the train.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mean when the train was robbed?

Mr. SCHULS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How many people robbed it?

Mr. SCHULS. There was nobody robbed in the train but my wife, of course; they may have robbed others, but the way I look at it was that when she drew her money in the city of San Luis Potosi the man that paid the money must have given the conductor a tip that she took the money with her, and when she got there somebody hurt the baby and she reached over to get the child and somebody stole everything she had. They called the soldiers out and there was somebody running and they shot at them here and there, but they never rounded them up. They got into the wrong car. my wife was in the Pullman and these fellows had no business in there, and that is the way I said to my wife, that it was all cut and dried.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you come out of Mexico?

Mr. SCHULS. We started on the 9th day of October.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have any property anywhere else in the Republic of Mexico?

Mr. SCHULS. Yes, sir; I have a little ranch over there at Rosalia, in the State of Chihuahua.

The CHAIRMAN. Santa Rosalia?

Mr. SCHULS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Why don't you live on it?

Mr. SCHULS. I can not.

The CHAIRMAN. Why?

Mr. SCHULS. Why, it is not safe at the present.

Senator SMITH. Why?

Mr. SCHULS. Because they rob you, and not only that, but they would probably kidnap me and hold me for ransom, and kill me. That is the reason we got out now, we could not stay. I went there when Carranza said that all Americans that wanted to go to work and have property he would protect us, but he never protected us at all. As long as we had money he would protect us. He stole all our money this time.

The CHAIRMAN. How much land did you own in Camargo?

Mr. SCHULS. There were 3 leagues of it, or 3 leagues that I had there. Also my wife has 1 league there that her father gave to her. There was a lawyer in San Luis Potosi—she probably knows his name; I have forgotten it now—that took her papers and went up there to look over the records, but she never saw him again, she stayed a week there but she never saw this man again.

The CHAIRMAN. How much land did you own in San Luis Potosi?

Mr. SCHULS. We had just a little house and lot that we sold there.

The CHAIRMAN. What means did you have when you went to Mexico, about how much property and money?

Mr. SCHULS. Well, we had something like $4,000 when we went there; that was the money that I made in Mexico, that I saved out of the wreck after they robbed me up there.

The CHAIRMAN. I mean when you went into the Republic of Mexico?

Mr. SCHULS. Oh, when I went in there first?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCHULS. I went into the Republic of Mexico with something over 6,000 American dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. How much did you come out with?

Mr. SCHULS. Well, I came out with a good deal less than that, after making improvements and everything, and I bought a farm, etc., down there, and I spent more than that money to buy mules and horses and implements.

The CHAIRMAN. What became of your mules, horses, and implements?

Mr. SCHULS. They were all stolen. After Madero overthrew Diaz a bunch of bandits came here and there and they began to rob, and then when Madero was killed, well, it was precisely the same people, because the men who were fighting for Madero are the same men who are with Carranza to-day; precisely the same people. When Madero overthrew Diaz he went to the penitentiary and unlocked the doors and said, "Every man that will fight for me, all the loot that he can steal will be his."

The CHAIRMAN. Well, you do not mean Madero personally said that; you mean some of his leaders, Mr. Schuls?

Mr. SCHULS. Well, I do not consider Madero any better than the rest.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe that is all, Mr. Schuls; thank you.

TESTIMONY OF W. W. MILLER.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Mr. JACKSON. W. W. Miller?

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live, Mr. Miller?

Mr. MILLER. San Antonio.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you an American citizen?

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Native born?

Mr. MILLER. Born in Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you lived at any time in Mexico?

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Had business there?

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was your business?

Mr. MILLER. I had land and cattle.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you go there?

Mr. MILLER. In 1906, in June, 1906.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did you remain?

Mr. MILLER. Well, at that time I only remained a month. I had been down there. I had made eight round trips down there—had made nine round trips.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you first make investments there?

Mr. MILLER. In 1907.

The CHAIRMAN. And what has been your experience in Mexico with your investments?

Mr. MILLER. I put it down there and I can't get anything out.

The CHAIRMAN. What was it in 19—what was the condition in 1906, 1907, and 1908?

Mr. MILLER. In 1906 I went down there, and through J. J. Fitzgerald, in Mexico City, and others, and Senator Castellot was with us, he was the president of the Mexican Senate—

The CHAIRMAN. He now lives in New York?

Mr. MILLER. Well, I do not know what became of him. And he said conditions were good down there and they invited American capital down there, and I thought conditions were safe, and I wrote it to my friends here that I thought that the conditions were just as good for investments of capital as in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, what were the conditions then?

Mr. MILLER. Well, they were good; I never had any trouble as long as Don Porfirio was in office.

The CHAIRMAN. You did later have trouble?

Mr. MILLER. Well, they took our cattle.

The CHAIRMAN. When?

Mr. MILLER. Well, they commenced taking them prior to December 1, 1911. I have a letter that I wrote to the President on December 15, 1911, asking for protection.

The CHAIRMAN. What President?

Mr. MILLER. President Taft.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you get any protection?

Mr. MILLER. No, sir; I never, not under Taft or Wilson, or Don Porfirio, or any other string of Presidents—after Don Porfirio left. Under any other President we had down there we had no protection, and we had mighty little before that when it came down to that.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the subject of your communication to Mr. Taft?

Mr. MILLER. Well, I have a copy of the letter right here. [Witness produces letter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Just read that, if you have no objections to its going in the record.

Mr. MILLER. Why, none at all. [Reading:]

DECEMBER 15, 1911.

Hon. W. H. TAFT,
President of the United States,
Washington, D. C.

MR. PRESIDENT: Myself and partner have something over $200,000 gold invested in Mexico.

Owing to the unsettled political conditions, and especially the unprotected conditions of the Americans in Mexico, our holdings are practically of no value, and there seems to be no chance of a better condition until the United States takes some action for the protection of her citizens, their lives, and property.

I was in Mexico City all during the month of September, 1911, and saw posters which were posted in conspicuous places in the cities of Puebla and Torreon—notices wherein they stated that American meat, meaning American human flesh, would be on sale September 15, 1911, at 5 centavos per kilo, equivalent to 1 cent a pound.

WITNESS (interpolating). Now, I bought two of those posters; I bought them from Mr. Homer Porter, of the Hotel Porter, and I paid 5 centavos each for them, and I sent them to President Taft. You will find them there on record. [Continuing reading:]

I would like to ask you, Mr. President, how long is the United States Government going to let her people be subject to such degrading humiliation, and how soon will the United States take adequate steps to protect her citizens in foreign countries, their lives, and property? Our cattle are driven away or butchered and our plantations devastated.

Mr. President, are we going to get proper relief, and when? This may seem to be a small matter to you, but it represents a lifetime of saving, toll, and privation to me, and is a matter to me of the gravest importance.

The CHAIRMAN. Were these posters that you had—these placards—did they purport to be signed by anyone?

Mr. MILLER. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not know whether they were signed by "La Gran Liga"?

Mr. MILLER. No, sir; I do not. I just remember reading them, and I could read Spanish enough to know what they were. They were probably almost as long as that and probably that wide [indicating].

The CHAIRMAN. Did you hear of any anti-American organization at that time known as "La Gran Liga"?

Mr. MILLER. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, what experience did you have later—what occurred with reference to the property?

Mr. MILLER. Not much of anything, only they commenced taking our cattle, and some time in 1912 we had a letter from our foreman that told us they were driving away 506 of our cattle. I think I have that letter here from Secretary of State P. C. Knox that is an acknowledgment of it, and I have, further, this letter—a letter I got an acknowledgment from Secretary of State Knox.

The CHAIRMAN. It is an acknowledgment signed by Mr. Hilles, secretary to President Taft.

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. After the reference of your letter to the State Department of the United States Government, did you hear anything further about it?

Mr. MILLER. Oh, yes; I had much correspondence; continued on up to August, 1912.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you get any material results?

Mr. MILLER. No, sir; they wanted to send Mexican soldiers there to guard our ranch, and I would not have them.

The CHAIRMAN. Why?

Mr. MILLER. For the simple reason that as soon as those soldiers are withdrawn it becomes just one continuous round of petty transactions, such as E. G. Church, of Tetahuacapa, Vera Cruz, experienced.

The CHAIRMAN. What was his experience?

Mr. MILLER. He asked for protection and soldiers were sent there, and as soon as they were withdrawn everything about his place that could be carried away was stolen, his rubber trees tapped and his cattle carried away and his store burned.

Senator SMITH. I have not the locus of your business there. Where were you at that time?

Mr. MILLER. About two hundred to two hundred and fifty miles south of Vera Cruz on the Tesauan and Popolapa Rivers.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you anyone in charge of that property now?

Mr. MILLER. We left a man in charge there, but he disappeared about 1915, and we have never heard of him.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he an American or a Mexican?

Mr. MILLER. No, sir; he was a Mexican.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what became of him?

Mr. MILLER. No, sir; I do not. He wrote us in one letter that he was invited to go to the mountains when they drove some cattle off and he said, "I had to run for my life." After that I do not know what became of him.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the sum of your personal investment there?

Mr. MILLER. Personally?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; and your assets?

Mr. MILLER. I have a record here personally of putting in a little over $70,000 gold.

The CHAIRMAN. How much have you gotten out of it?

Mr. MILLER. Nothing.

The CHAIRMAN. Did that loss mean anything to you?

Mr. MILLER. It meant all I had.

The CHAIRMAN. You had associates with you in business?

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they lose what they put in?

Mr. MILLER. All but two.

The CHAIRMAN. Two of them succeeded in getting something?

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir; two women; and they invested down there and they invested practically all they had on letters that I had written up here, they took it; so later when I came up here and found that out, I made them a check covering that amount, I have the checks there. There is one. Just take them, I do not care if you read it [producing checks].

The CHAIRMAN. You mean you reimbursed those women?

Mr. MILLER. I reimbursed those women.

The CHAIRMAN. Who had invested on your advice?

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir. That was all they had. There were some men there that lost all they had, but they did not invest on my advice and I let them take care of themselves. There are the two checks.

The CHAIRMAN. One for $2,537.50 and the other for $3,403. You felt morally obligated?

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir; I did. I told them that the conditions down there were as safe as they were in the United States. It was at the time I met the sister.

The CHAIRMAN. You have a claim for damages with the State Department of the United States Government?

Mr. MILLER. No, sir.

Senator SMITH. Have you filed any with the Mexican authorities?

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Got recognition at the time?

Mr. MILLER. Well, it is with Taylor & Howett, of Mexico City, attorneys.

Senator SMITH. Any recognition of your claim against Mexico—has it been recognized in any way?

Mr. MILLER. Well, it has been denied. Now, I have no record of this, but this is the way it was told to me by one of my associates, that in driving away some of those cattle the Federal lieutenant gave a receipt for 506 or 526, I forget which, cattle that they took away, and the receipt was given to Taylor & Howett to present to the Secretary of Agriculture of Mexico for reimbursement, and he told him to come back in a few days, and in a few days when he went back he shrugged his shoulders and said, "We have no lieutenant by that name in the army."

The CHAIRMAN. Your claim is being contested or denied?

Mr. MILLER. It is not contested; it is just denied.

The CHAIRMAN. It is denied?

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You have not taken it up through this Government?

Mr. MILLER. No; and what is the use? I asked for protection in a dozen letters here, and I never got anything except they wanted to send Mexican soldiers down there, and they said, "If you do not want them, we do not see that we can do anything for you." There is only—

The CHAIRMAN. Just a moment, Mr. Miller. Did you make any request of the State Department of this Government to present for you a claim for damages against Mexico?

Mr. MILLER. No, sir; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Why not; why didn't you?

Mr. MILLER. Well, for the first reason I did not think it was necessary, because I would not get any satisfaction out of it. We never have gotten any satisfaction out of any letter that we have ever written there. I will state further in regard to this that this was an American corporation incorporated in San Francisco and that any claim there—it might have been put in there later, but I have not heard of it; but any claim would be presented through the secretary of the company and not through me.

The CHAIRMAN. The State Department at that time, I think, had inaugurated a policy of not presenting claims to the Mexican Government for consideration. I think that is a matter of record. I do not know whether they follow that policy or not.

Mr. MILLER. Well, one might just as well say they are busted as to present a claim to the Mexican Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The department at the present time is furnishing blanks upon which any American can make claims for filing with our department, but they are not making statements that they will present the claims to the Mexican Government.

Mr. MILLER. Does that mean anything to us Americans who lost there?

The CHAIRMAN. They are receiving them and filing them away in the archives of our State Department. I received some blank forms yesterday, and if any claimants desire to make out their claims on those blanks they will be furnished by this committee or the clerk. What are the names of your property, so that we may have it for identification?

Mr. MILLER. San Antonio Plantation, Faulkner Plantation, and one of them, one tract known as the Boca de Coapa.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe that is all. Much obliged.

TESTIMONY OF D. B. BOLLINGER.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Mr. JACKSON. D. B. Bollinger?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Here at San Antonio at present.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Native born?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you resided or been interested in Mexico at any time?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. When and where?

Mr. BOLLINGER. I was in the State of Chiapas, I went there in 1905.

The CHAIRMAN. Where was that, you say?

Mr. BOLLINGER. The State of Chiapas, it is down below the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, down about 150 miles below the Isthmus on the Pan-American Railway.

The CHAIRMAN. What State were you born in?

Mr. BOLLINGER. State of Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. In what did your property consist in the State of Chiapas?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Principally of land and cattle and horses and hogs.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you farming and ranching?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you living there yourself?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Yes, sir; had my family there, my wife and seven children.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did you remain there?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Seven years, about.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you leave there?

Mr. BOLLINGER. May, 1912.

The CHAIRMAN. Why did you leave?

Mr. BOLLINGER. I did not consider it safe to stay there.

The CHAIRMAN. Why was it not safe?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Well, they were taking possession of my property, taking my hogs and my cattle, and if I would protest—the only occasion—on one occasion they turned their horses in my corn field and I protested and they beat me up considerably and I protested then, and the "Jefe," I protested to him, and they would not do anything with them.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was president of Mexico at that time?

Mr. BOLLINGER. That was about the time—oh, I think President Madero had been in a few months, I do not remember just exactly how long.

The CHAIRMAN. You protested to the nearest local authority, did you?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Yes, sir. I lived near the town of Tonalá, where we had all the protection that was necessary up to that time, and we could go to the "Jefe" with our troubles. I went to the "Jefe" that time and oh, yes, they were going to do wonders, but they did not do anything. They were just simply small bands there then.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you were beaten up. Were your injuries serious?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Why, it has proved serious in this knee. I was on the horse and they beat me in the back with machetes, they did not mean to kill me, I do not think, but they meant to give me a pretty good scare, which they did. That night I went to the doctors and they examined it, and there was little knuckles broken off, it was not dislocated, but it was sore and tender here a right smart, and that was the last of that.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you able to dispose of your property before leaving?

Mr. BOLLINGER. No, sir; there was no sale for anything.

The CHAIRMAN. How many cattle did you have?

Mr. BOLLINGER. I had near 100 head, it was milk stock that I had taken from the State of Texas here, Durham cattle, and I bought some other at the dairy.

The CHAIRMAN. What became of them?

Mr. BOLLINGER. I could not say what became of all of them; there was a few left there—when I came away I left a good old Georgia negro on the place to take care of the stock and a Yankee American in the city to watch the negro, and it was not long till the negro died.

or disappeared in some way, and the Yankee taken possession of the ranch, and I went back down there just at the time of the split of President Carranza and Villa. I thought there was going to be a little peace there and we could do something probably, and I went there to see what I had left, and the best I could learn the Yankee got about five or six thousand dollars and stuffed it in his pocket and skipped out to Guatemala and I did not get anything, not as much as tax money at that time. Then it was a little scarey over there again when they split, and Carranza was drawing back to Orizaba and Cordova with his army, and he had liberated his jails and penitentiaries and the peons from the haciendas there to get his army, and it was quite a mess at that time on the isthmus.

The CHAIRMAN. From your experience I presume that you learned that was the ordinary method of recruiting an army there, to deliver the jails and penitentiaries?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then did you feel that with such an army as that you were protected?

Mr. BOLLINGER. No, sir; I did not consider them any army for protection or anything but Mr. Carranza.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any recent news from that locality of Mexico?

Mr. BOLLINGER. There was——

The CHAIRMAN. From any authentic source?

Mr. BOLLINGER. There was one friend of ours remained there out of about 300, and I have received several letters from him; occasionally get letters from him with regard to our property down there.

The CHAIRMAN. You say there was about 300. You mean about 300 American families, or 300 Mexicans?

Mr. BOLLINGER. There was something like 200 families, something over 300 there; there was a good many Americans around in there that were engineers and conductors, and at Tonalá, the place where we lived near, was a regular hold-out place for them, it was a division on the railroad, and they had some little interest in ranches around there, and there was a good many men there without families, but there were something like 300 Americans there; there was a colony below me, a place called San Pedro.

The CHAIRMAN. An American colony engaged in farming and ranching?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What has become of them?

Mr. BOLLINGER. They all left, except this one, when I came out, a few days before that.

The CHAIRMAN. And the American railroad men, what became of them?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Most of them went to Guatemala. When I was back there, I think it was 1915, I only met one man out of the great number that was in the colony and around in the city there.

The CHAIRMAN. Did those who left dispose of their property before leaving?

Mr. BOLLINGER. They disposed of some, but there was no sale and I could not sell anything, and I just packed two or three trunks and I did not consider it safe to start with them, but we wanted a little clothing and bedding and happened to get through with what we started with.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, all the other Americans, did they leave in the same way?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they take their property with them?

Mr. BOLLINGER. They taken almost nothing with them. They had invested their money in homes and were doing well and was well satisfied.

The CHAIRMAN. Most of them were men of moderate means and making homes there in Mexico?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Yes, sir; they felt it a safe investment at the time they went there.

The CHAIRMAN. With the intention of living there?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Yes, sir; some of them built very good homes; good residence houses.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it your intention to live there permanently, keep your family there?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Yes, sir; we had a very good school there, and down below the colony they had a very good school there. They had made considerable progress, planted cotton and put in a cotton gin, and there was a good sale for the cotton, and they were all prospering.

The CHAIRMAN. And the other Americans had gone there for the purpose of making homes?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I mean permanent homes?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And not done for the purpose of exploiting Mexico and making money and getting out of it?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Make permanent homes. I went more for my health; you see these fingers are stiff yet. I lived up in Eastland County, and it was cold and I went down there to the climate; it was even; there were no changes; it was even.

The CHAIRMAN. It was your intention and that of other Americans there to make your permanent homes and raise your families there in Mexico?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Yes, sir. We had intended to raise and educate our children there.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is the one that is left there?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Mr. J. W. Bedwell.

The CHAIRMAN. How did he happen to remain?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Why, all the way I can understand was that he thought more of the dollar than he did of his life. He wrote me that he had been caught four times and if some friends had not intervened they would have killed him. Once he went to Guatemala, one time. When I was there he would not sleep at home at night; he would slip out at night and sleep off somewhere. They set his house afire and robbed him of everything he had; and since, he wrote me, that they had rounded up—that was in 1917 or 1918—they rounded up 650 head of his cattle and killed them and skinned them for their hides; they did not care for the meat; they had plenty of that; they threw the meat away.

The CHAIRMAN. He still hangs on, as far as you know?

Mr. BOLLINGER. Yes, sir. I have a letter from him. I wrote to him twice during the last two months how they were getting along, but I have not heard from him. It is very likely that they have killed him by this time, because in his last letter, something over two months ago, he said, "Don't come down, conditions are worse than they have ever been; there are more men being killed than there has been, and less said about it."

The CHAIRMAN. That is all. Much obliged to you, Mr. Bollinger.

TESTIMONY OF MR. C. W. ENDERS.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Enders desires to give a portion of his testimony in executive session, but he will make a statement now.

Where do you live?

Mr. ENDERS. I live in San Antonio at present.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. ENDERS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Native born?

Mr. ENDERS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where—what State?

Mr. ENDERS. Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you lived in Mexico at any time?

Mr. ENDERS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you first go there?

Mr. ENDERS. I went to Mexico in August, 1891.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did you remain there?

Mr. ENDERS. I left there the last time December 19, 1916. I lived in Mexico during all that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you interested in Mexico during those years?

Mr. ENDERS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, had property interests there?

Mr. ENDERS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the character of your investment?

Mr. ENDERS. Well, I had investments in bank stock and mining stock and ranches.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were your ranches?

Mr. ENDERS. There was a company of us known—

The CHAIRMAN. If there is any question that you think you might not desire to answer publicly to avoid identification or have any other reason for not answering, why, you can just so state.

Mr. ENDERS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were your ranch properties?

Mr. ENDERS. The ranch—the organization—we organized a company, the Torreon Construction Co., the ranch was owned, Senator, by the Torreon Construction Co., of which I was a member. There were three of us organized the Torreon Construction Co., I. A. Porter, Sam Graham, and myself, organized under the laws of Arizona. We have one ranch, the ranch house was about 12 miles from Santa Rosalia, Chihuahua, and consists of 80,253 acres.

The CHAIRMAN. A cattle ranch?

Mr. ENDERS. Yes, sir; and farming as well.

The CHAIRMAN. Stocked with cattle?

Mr. ENDERS. It was at one time. We have another ranch out about 50 miles from San Pedro, in the State of Coahuila, which consists of 253,000 acres.

The CHAIRMAN. Stocked with cattle?

Mr. ENDERS. We had some stock on there; very little.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you in Torreon City at any time during the years that you were there?

Mr. ENDERS. I lived in Torreon from 1907 until 1916.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you see any fighting?

Mr. ENDERS. I have seen all the battles that they had there except one.

The CHAIRMAN. When was the first battle?

Mr. ENDERS. The first fight was during the Madero revolution; it started May 13, 1911, about in the outskirts of the town, about 9.30, and at 5 o'clock that evening—we lived five blocks from the market-house—and at 5 o'clock that evening the Maderistas were in our backyard and they held that part of the town until the night of the 14th, about 2 o'clock, if I remember right, and the general in charge of the Diaz troops evacuated the city on account of finding a lot of ammunition with wooden bullets; he did not have but about six or seven hundred men.

The CHAIRMAN. He found his cartridges loaded with wooden bullets?

Mr. ENDERS. Yes, sir. And the Maderistas commenced entering the town about daylight on the morning of the 15th.

The CHAIRMAN. Were they quiet and peaceable, and did they maintain order when they entered the town?

Mr. ENDERS. No, sir; there was no order whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. Any Chinamen in Torreon at that time?

Mr. ENDERS. Yes, sir; there was somewhere between 600 and 700, of which 303 were massacred by the Maderista troops that day.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you see any of the occurrences during that day—killing of the Chinamen?

Mr. ENDERS. I saw two Chinamen murdered.

The CHAIRMAN. Were the Chinamen fighting or making any defenses?

Mr. ENDERS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, just how were they massacred?

Mr. ENDERS. Well, the two that I saw they brought around from—we lived right back of the Chinese laundry, and they brought them around right in front of our house, and had them roped—of course, roped by the neck—and brought them around right in front of our house and shot them right in front of our house, shot them with Winchester, and I do not suppose the Chinamen were more than that far from the front of the gun [indicating] when they shot these two. Shortly afterwards they drug another Chinaman around and left the body with these two that they had just killed. Then the Mexican children—small children, from 8 to 10 years old—came around and kicked and hit the dead Chinamen in the face and spit on them. A little later they brought three more Chinamen around who were roped by the neck to the horn of the saddle, and they were roped 2 feet apart, I should judge; and they met a party there coming down the street who apparently notified them, so I understand, that they was not to kill any more Chinamen, and they took those Chinamen back around the corner, of course, out of my sight; I could not see them any longer, but shortly afterwards there was three more Chinamen killed over close to another American friend of mine, and I heard the three shots, and I suppose it was those same Chinamen.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been reported that they were killed on the streets and shot down.

Mr. ENDERS. That afternoon I left the house just as the clock struck 8. That was the first time I had went up town. I went up town on Avenida Juarez, and I came to the market, but it was so choked with peons—that is, the poor people.

The CHAIRMAN. Mexicans?

Mr. ENDERS. Yes, sir. It was almost impossible to get through, so I turned and went across the Avenida Hidalgo and walked up Avenida Hidalgo, aiming to what they called the old Chinese Bank Building, which was occupied at that time by the Chinese Bank; not on the corner, but just around the corner of the street. They massacred, so I was told, some 17 or 19 Chinamen in the second story of this building; but I do not remember myself; but I met a friend of mine by the name of Taylor, an American, who was a conductor on the road, on the branch running from Torreon to San Pedro, and he had a little camera with him, and I stopped and talked with him a little while there; and while I was talking with him they were bringing the dead Chinamen to the top of the stairway—the stairway leads to Avenida Hidalgo—and giving them a little start and rolled them down the step, the dead bodies, to the middle of the street; and I asked him if he had got any picture of them dead Chinamen, and he said no, he had not yet; he wanted to wait till they got more in the pile, and I left before he got a picture; and he told me afterwards that they took the camera away from him; but I understand there was pictures got of the dead Chinamen just the same, by whom I do not know. Well, I asked Taylor at this time—this must have been about 3.20—if they had got into the Chinese Bank safes. This was about 3.20. He said, "Not yet; they are still working on them." He said, "If you listen you can hear them." They got into the safes about 5 o'clock that afternoon. Emilio Madero was the general in charge of this supposed army—Maderista army.

The CHAIRMAN. What relation was he of the President?

Mr. ENDERS. A brother.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether China made a claim against Madero for the massacre of those Chinamen?

Mr. ENDERS. I understand that during the Madero régime there was a settlement with China; that there was an agreement that they were to pay China 3,300,000 pesos, but to my knowledge there was never a cent of it paid.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever hear of any agreement to pay for any Americans down there?

Mr. ENDERS. No, sir. We had one small claim presented to the Madero Government. It did not amount to much. The morning of the 5th of May, when they entered, my partner, Mr. Sam Graham, had saddle horses apiece, very good ones, and they got them, about the first thing, and then they occupied the back lot, the corral of our place, about 60 of them, and made a corral out of that, and we had some hay and corn that we kept out in the corral in a little horse stable, and we had hid a friends of ours' shotgun under some hay; they were there, and, thinking we would try and save that, we thought we would try and save his gun by hiding it in the hay, and when they made the corral there they fed up the hay and got the gun. We made a claim for about 325 pesos for the horse and gun, put our horses in for reasonable prices, and it went to Mexico City, and a man by the name of Parkenson, who was an attorney and the manager of the Continental Rubber Co., of Torreon, took care of our claim. It was returned several different times for more stamps to be put on it; and finally we refused to put any more stamps on it, and the last communication we had from them they wanted to know why we thought they ought to pay this claim, and we told them because they had stole the horses, and that was the end of it; we never heard any more from it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that about as far as you care to go?

Mr. ENDERS. That is about as far as I care to go in my open session.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, we will ask you to appear in executive session.

TESTIMONY OF PAUL C. RENARD.

(Witness was duly sworn by the Chairman.)

The CHAIRMAN. What is your name?

Mr. RENARD. Paul C. Renard.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live?

Mr. RENARD. I live in San Antonio.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. RENARD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Native born?

Mr. RENARD. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Naturalized?

Mr. RENARD. Naturalized.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what country are you a native?

Mr. RENARD. Germany.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you had any experience in Mexico at any time?

Mr. RENARD. Yes, sir. I lived there from February, 1907, to September, 1913.

The CHAIRMAN. That was after you became a citizen of the United States?

Mr. RENARD. Oh, yes; considerably after.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you live in Mexico?

Mr. RENARD. In Torreon, Coahuila.

The CHAIRMAN. You lived there during the years that you have mentioned?

Mr. RENARD. Yes, sir; all the time. I was out with the exception that we were called out once before in 1912.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your business?

Mr. RENARD. I am an architect and engineer.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have any investment—property?

Mr. RENARD. No, sir; not more so than I had in my own office.

The CHAIRMAN. In your office?

Mr. RENARD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You say that you were called out in 1912?

Mr. RENARD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean you were warned out by the Americans?

Mr. RENARD. Yes, sir; Carruthers, the American consular agent, sent us word to get out.

The CHAIRMAN. George Carruthers?

Mr. RENARD. Yes, sir; George Carruthers.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the nature of his warning?

Mr. RENARD. Well, he had sent all American citizens a pamphlet coming from the United States office—I believe this is it here—that told us to make out a list of our possessions and leave the country for a while. This is the notification that we got from him. [Producing paper.]

The CHAIRMAN. When did you leave there last?

Mr. RENARD. On the 25th day of September, 1913.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the occasion of your leaving at that time?

Mr. RENARD. At the same time Mr. Carruthers furnished us a train and in fact made us leave. We were notified to get ready on very short notice and not to take any more than we could possibly have to take, because there would not be room on the train for anything superfluous, just to take enough to wear and eat.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have any instruments or tools of your profession as engineer and architect?

Mr. RENARD. Well, I had my office in this same Chinese bank building—we called it Shanghai on the Avenida Hidalgo and Calle Zepeda, in the second story, and the first floor where the Chinese bank was on the corner, and on the side entrance on Avenida Hidalgo went up to my office upstairs. There were several other offices which were occupied by different people. I forget now who they were.

The CHAIRMAN. What became of your office furniture and instruments, etc.?

Mr. RENARD. When the Maderistas entered Torreon on the 15th of May, I believe on the morning, at daylight, my wife and I—of course I did not live where the office was; I lived on Avenida Morelos, right across from the "Jefetura," and they were fighting on our roof from Sunday morning to Monday morning. It was raining bullets; and my wife cooked coffee for the Maderistas and afterwards for the Federalistas. Well, we did not go out of the house until Tuesday afternoon; my wife said, "You do not know what will happen;" so I stayed home, and on Tuesday I went out a little, and my first walk was up to my office. There was a cordon of Maderista soldiers around it; I could not get in, so I went up to the hotel, some hotel, what is the name—well, some hotel where Emelio Madero had his suite—and I asked him for a permit to go to my office, and after a lengthy talk and examination he believed that I had an office up there, and he gave me a permit, and I went up there and found the doors were locked, but I found the panels were chopped out of my office door and everything in there was stolen; they had taken out everything they could move, and what they could not take they had spoiled and ruined, tore up.

The CHAIRMAN. What became of the Chinamen, if you know?

Mr. RENARD. Well, when I came into the office, these wide stairs, the stairway was just smeared with blood and brains and matter and everything, and upstairs you could see where they had dragged the bodies. I personally have not seen them kill anyone.

The CHAIRMAN. There was quite a large Chinese colony in Torreon?

Mr. RENARD. Yes, sir; I judge there was about 700.

The CHAIRMAN. What were they engaged in generally?

Mr. RENARD. Well, they were growing garden fruits, and they were good workers there, too. They had the vegetable gardens on the outskirts of Torreon, and that was their main business, besides having little restaurants, but very few, and there is also a laundry, the main business that they engaged in, the business there, was the laundry. They had a large three-story brick building, which was modernly equipped for the laundry business, and they done a big business there.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you make any claim of any kind?

Mr. RENARD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. To Madero or anyone else?

Mr. RENARD. Mr. Emilio Madero issued a proclamation that anyone who had been harmed or lost anything during the entrance of the Maderista soldiers should make a reclamation, which I have made at that time, and it is decreed to be signed by two Mexicans, Mexican citizens, who have investigated themselves, and here is a copy of it. [Producing paper.] It does not amount to very much. It is the form that Emilio Madero wanted.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever receive any remuneration?

Mr. RENARD. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Or any payment on it at all?

Mr. RENARD. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you file any claim through Mr. Carruthers or otherwise?

Mr. RENARD. Yes, sir; through Mr. Carruthers, or the State Department at Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the amount of the claim?

Mr. RENARD. 996 pesos.

The CHAIRMAN. The same as this?

Mr. RENARD. Yes, sir. Of course, it was a long time ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether any demand or request was made for the payment of this by this Government?

Mr. RENARD. No; I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. If there was any request or demand for payment, you have not heard from it?

Mr. RENARD. No; I have not. I heard from them, yes, sir, inasmuch as the Mexican Government informed me once that I had to send stamps there, and I sent them, and I had to send stamps again, and Mr. Henry Lane Wilson who was there at the time——

The CHAIRMAN. Did they give you the stamps?

Mr. RENARD. No, sir; no sir, I had to buy them. They returned me one stamp, saying inasmuch as I had already stamped that document, it was not necessary to stamp it again.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the reason for requesting you to re-stamp it?

Mr. RENARD. That is more than I know.

Senator SMITH. There had been a change of the administration?

Mr. RENARD. Well, yes—well, no; this was during the Madero administration. Mr. Madero was still in.

The CHAIRMAN. You heard that Madero took out of the treasury $750,000 and repaid himself for expenses during the revolution?

Mr. RENARD. No; I did not hear that.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not hear that?

Mr. RENARD. No; I did not hear that, but I think he took more than that though.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that is all. Very much obliged to you, Mr. Renard.

TESTIMONY OF MISS ANITA WHATLEY.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a citizen of the United States, Miss Whatley?

Miss WHATLEY. I am.

The CHAIRMAN. Native born?

Miss WHATLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What State?

Miss WHATLEY. Texarkana, Tex.—nearly in Arkansas.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your business?

Miss WHATLEY. I am modern language supervisor for the State department of education.

The CHAIRMAN. Of this State?

Miss WHATLEY. Of this State.

The CHAIRMAN. Engaged in educational work?

Miss WHATLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you ever been in Mexico?

Miss WHATLEY. Eight years, about.

The CHAIRMAN. During what years?

Miss WHATLEY. From about 1899 to—no, from 1900 until 1907, consecutively, and then the summers from 1907 till 1910, and the year from 1910 to 1911.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you in Mexico in 1911?

Miss WHATLEY. Parral, in the State of Chihuahua, the southern part of the State.

The CHAIRMAN. Parral, it is a mining city?

Miss WHATLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you observe conditions in Parral at that time?

Miss WHATLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have any particular reason to pay any attention to them?

Miss WHATLEY. Several.

The CHAIRMAN. Just state for the benefit of the committee your experiences there, Miss Whatley.

Miss WHATLEY. Well, I suppose that I shall have to start with explanations somewhat about the family. My father was in Mexico for his health. He was a physician, but he was forced to retire from practice in about 1907, I think it was. We were engaged also in the dairy business.

The CHAIRMAN. Where?

Miss WHATLEY. There in Parral.

The CHAIRMAN. At Parral?

Miss WHATLEY. Yes; which was, of course, conducted in town, and we had a ranch 40 miles from town. My father had spent from 1910 till 1911 on the ranch on account of his health, and he was better off there than he was in town. That left my mother practically with the responsibility of running the dairy business. We had a good deal of fine stock cattle, I suppose, oh, in the neighborhood of 200 registered Jersey cows, and those that were not registered were subject to registration. About 60 of them were then in town. On the night of July 4, 1911, my mother was awakened by someone having hold of her throat. Of course, you understand, nothing was going on then, and the house was open. She thought it was a dispute between two milkmen; one had been trying to drive the other off. So she thought that was what it was, but as soon as she awoke she found the room full of armed men. They asked for our arms. We had a little .22 rifle. So, thinking it was in our room upstairs where my sister and I slept, she came up there and knocked on the door and told me to get up; and I asked her why, and she told me there was robbers and they asked her for the rifle, and I took it downstairs and gave it to them. Then they asked me for keys, and I gave them the keys, and they took the money that was in the drawer, and they said, "This is not enough." They said, "We have information that you have about $5,000 in the house."

Of course, it was the beginning of the month and the time when all the bills were to be paid, and they presumed there would be a good deal of money in the house. I said, "We haven't." "Oh, yes; but we know you have it." One man acted as spokesman, and said, "We know you have it; we have the information you have money in the house;" and from the way they acted, they knew how things were run around there absolutely. And the leader said, "Take these three girls"—my two sisters and myself—"take them out and shoot them." Nobody said anything for a moment or two, nobody made any moves, and in a moment he took me by the arm and said, "You come with me." Well, of course, my mother grabbed me and said, "No," I could not go. I made her turn me loose. So they took me out in the patio, a man on each side, and the leader walked behind, and they stood me up against a wall, and they stepped back and he raised his rifle and said, "Will you give me the money?" I said, "No, we have not got it." He said, "We know you have; will you give it to us?" And he said then, "You Gringos,"—what they call Americans—"love money better than you do your life." I said, "No, if I had it I would give it to you." He said to one of the men, "Give me your knife," and he came close then and took the knife and held it to my throat, didn't hurt me, though, and then he turned me loose; there was a little sidewalk there, and I stepped down on that, and he said, "We are going to kill you and cut off your fingers and toes," and he took off my bedroom slippers and did cut my foot, not very much—it hurt a little bit anyway—and one of the men said, "Let's go—these people haven't any money, let's go," and they left. The next morning this man that we were afterwards sure had something to do with the robbery, came to my mother and said, "I know two of the men who were here last night; I saw them on the street this morning, and if you will protect me, I will go down to the comandancia and denounce them." Well, of course, we sent for my father, and he came in then about that time, and this man gave him the information, and they went down and they had them arrested; and shortly after that they took my mother and me down to the jail, and they lined everybody up—all the prisoners up in the patio, and they took us out one at a time and said, "Now, see, you look at these people and see if there is any one here who looks like any of the band that was at your house." Well, my mother did not identify any of them, but I picked out a man whom I was sure was the leader. And the judge said, "Well, he is convicted, just as good as convicted." About a month after that, I believe, they changed judges and they turned the man loose and that was the last I heard of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was in control of Parral at this time; what faction?

Miss WHATLEY. The Maderistas.

The CHAIRMAN. The Maderistas? There was no male member of the family in the house?

Miss WHATLEY. My older brother, who had a stroke of infantile paralysis when he was a child, and the man that was guarding him snapped his pistol at him and would have shot him if the thing had gone off.

The CHAIRMAN. He was not able to protect you?

Miss WHATLEY. He was not able to protect us.

The CHAIRMAN. Did your family remain in Parral?

Miss WHATLEY. My mother remained there until February; I left in September—I and my two sisters came back to Austin to school, but my mother stayed until February, 1912, and then she came out, and my father and brothers stayed until Gen. Pershing went in.

The CHAIRMAN. What became of the property, the dairy?

Miss WHATLEY. Well, it has just dwindled away little by little, stolen a little bit here and a little bit there, until it is almost all gone; the ranch is still there; all the fences are gone, all the equipment of every kind is gone.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the family made any claim for damages?

Miss WHATLEY. We just finished making out our application the other day.

The CHAIRMAN. Filing it with our State Department—United States Government?

Miss WHATLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the amount?

Miss WHATLEY. About $60,000.

The CHAIRMAN. And your father and brother came out after Gen. Pershing went in?

Miss WHATLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Why?

Miss WHATLEY. Well, they were advised by the American consul to come out. It is impossible for my father to live in this climate.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all. Thank you very much.

Thereupon, at 12.05 o'clock p. m., the committee recessed until 2 o'clock of the same day.)

AFTER RECESS.

TESTIMONY OF C. W. GURLEY.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

The CHAIRMAN. You are a citizen of the United States, are you?

Mr. GURLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Native?

Mr. GURLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACKSON. Talk louder.

The CHAIRMAN. Native born?

Mr. GURLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What State?

Mr. GURLEY. State of Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live?

Mr. GURLEY. Del Rio.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you been living there?

Mr. GURLEY. Well, about seven or eight years.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you live before going to Del Rio?

Mr. GURLEY. Crockett County.

The CHAIRMAN. What have been the conditions in and around Del Rio from 1910 and 1911 up to the present time, so far as you know?

Mr. GURLEY. It has been—or has been—the town has been pretty tough.

The CHAIRMAN. Because of what?

Mr. GURLEY. Of the Carranza Government—or revolution.

The CHAIRMAN. How did the disturbances in Mexico affect you at Del Rio?

Mr. GURLEY. Well, they taken a lot of stuff away from me over there—cattle, horses.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that on the Mexican side?

Mr. GURLEY. That was on the Mexican side; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You had cattle, horses—stock on the Mexican side?

Mr. GURLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Whereabouts, how far from the border?

Mr. GURLEY. Well, some of them were about 75 or 80 miles, and some of them closer, not over 6 or 7 miles.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you own the property on which they were grazing or have it leased?

Mr. GURLEY. Had it leased.

The CHAIRMAN. What have been your losses during that time, approximately?

Mr. GURLEY. Well, I don't know; hardly, I expect, forty-five or fifty thousand dollars' worth of stuff, first and last.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you put in stock?

Mr. GURLEY. Well, I went over there and bought a lot of stuff—that was taken away from me in 1915.

The CHAIRMAN. What was it?

Mr. GURLEY. Cattle.

The CHAIRMAN. About how much?

Mr. GURLEY. Well, I had 600 head taken away from me in one bunch of cattle; and then I had 180 steers, 4 and 5 years old and up, taken away from me in another bunch.

The CHAIRMAN. Who did that?

Mr. GURLEY. Well, I don't know whether the Carranza government or the Villistas; I suppose Carranza.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, you say you "bought" them; you mean you bought back your own stuff?

Mr. GURLEY. Well, no; I bought them, and they were taken away from me after I bought them.

The CHAIRMAN. I see.

Mr. GURLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You had bought them in Mexico?

Mr. GURLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you had grazing permits or rights there?

Mr. GURLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What became of them—did you ever recover them?

Mr. GURLEY. No, sir; never did. I don't know—they were, I reckon, butchered and ate, shipped, and everything else.

The CHAIRMAN. Couldn't you find any trace of them? What became of them?

Mr. GURLEY. Well, no, sir; I couldn't.

The CHAIRMAN. Were there no authorities or Federal soldiers, governmental representatives, anywhere in the neighborhood?

Mr. GURLEY. Yes; but you never could get anything out of them.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you make any effort—

Mr. GURLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. To get assistance from them?

Mr. GURLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom did you go?

Mr. GURLEY. Well, I went to several of their officers, and they never did know anything.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they try to get any information?

Mr. GURLEY. They said they did.

The CHAIRMAN. To get your property?

Mr. GURLEY. They said they did; that is all I know.

The CHAIRMAN. But if they did use any efforts they were without results?

Mr. GURLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. So far as you were concerned?

Mr. GURLEY. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Do you know of their making any efforts?

Mr. GURLEY. No; I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Are those the only losses you have incurred, those that you spoke of—the steers and cattle?

Mr. GURLEY. Well, yes; that was about all; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have there been any disturbances on this side of the border during the time that you have been there—in your vicinity?

Mr. GURLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. From what sources?

Mr. GURLEY. Well, the Villistas and Carrancistas had several fights over there, pretty close, during this time—1914, I believe—1915.

The CHAIRMAN. Did that cause any disturbances on this side?

Mr. GURLEY. Some; yes, sir—right smart.

The CHAIRMAN. Have there been any raids across the border?

Mr. GURLEY. Well, not in that vicinity; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The raids have occurred below you principally?

Mr. GURLEY. Yes, sir; and above.

The CHAIRMAN. And above?

Mr. GURLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In the immediate vicinity of Del Rio, then, on this side?

Mr. GURLEY. No, sir; none to amount to anything; there has been a few come over and steal horses and take them across, but none to amount to anything.

The CHAIRMAN. All right; I am very much obliged.

TESTIMONY OF A. D. ALVIN.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Mr. JACKSON. What are your initials, Mr. Alvin?

Mr. ALVIN. A. D.—A. D. Alvin.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live?

Mr. ALVIN. At present in San Antonio.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a citizen of this country?

Mr. ALVIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Native born?

Mr. ALVIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. From what State?

Mr. ALVIN. Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you ever lived at any time in Mexico?

Mr. ALVIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. During the last 10 years?

Mr. ALVIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. At what time and where?

Mr. ALVIN. I went to Mexico in the early spring of 1908, about April.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did you remain?

Mr. ALVIN. I remained there until June, 1912.

The CHAIRMAN. In what portion of the Republic were you?

Mr. ALVIN. I went to Guadalajara, and from Guadalajara to Manzanillo, and from Manzanillo to a point 112 miles south of there, on the coast, the nearest town to the proposition I went to was Coalcoman, in the State of Michoacan, I was employed there by a timber company, stayed there a few months, and then I went to Manzanillo. I worked for the Southern Pacific Railroad during the remainder of 1908 and until the spring of 1909; I met up with an Austrian that was working there, and we concluded that we would go down to Acapulco.

The CHAIRMAN. In what year was that?

Mr. ALVIN. That was in 1909 I went there.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you in 1911?

Mr. ALVIN. At Acapulco.

The CHAIRMAN. You remained there?

Mr. ALVIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What were the conditions as to violence or peace in Acapulco, in the portions of Mexico you were familiar with in 1911 to the present time?

Mr. ALVIN. Well, from the time I left there, it commenced in 1911, the Madero revolution, and as long as that lasted, we had everything that we wanted, everything was peaceful; that is, and until after Madero was elected. Then Zapata rose in the State of Morelos, and his gang worked all through Guerrero, came down through there and cleaned out everything they could get hold of, irrespective of nationality; and I was posing as a Canadian at the time, always went to the English consul, because I found out that the American consul wouldn't give any protection—so as long as I was considered a Canadian or English subject I was not molested, and when the Zapatas came there they came with the intention of killing me, but as soon as they were told by the people working for us that we were Austrian and English subjects they said, well, they wouldn't kill us, but would take what we had, which they did, and let us go.

The CHAIRMAN. You were working in Acapulco at this time?

Mr. ALVIN. Not—I was 18 kilometers southeast, on the ranch.

The CHAIRMAN. And whom were you working for?

Mr. ALVIN. Myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Yourself?

Mr. ALVIN. I had 1,000 acres leased.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have stock?

Mr. ALVIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Agricultural implements?

Mr. ALVIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What became of them?

Mr. ALVIN. Why, those people took them—they took everything they could, and what they couldn't take they burned up right before my eyes—burned my barn and houses and everything—I kept all my machinery right in my barn, you see, when I wasn't using it—they set fire to the barn; burned that and burned the house with all the household goods.

The CHAIRMAN. They claimed to be Zapatistas?

Mr. ALVIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And in revolution against the Madero government?

Mr. ALVIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you left there at that time, did you?

Mr. ALVIN. Yes, sir; I left there at that time. They left me one horse that they couldn't catch, and I packed what few little things I could save from the fire and struck out across the country.

The CHAIRMAN. Were there any federal soldiers or officials anywhere in the country—any Maderistas?

Mr. ALVIN. About 18 miles, at Acapulco, there was a garrison of federal soldiers, but they could scarcely give protection to the people of Acapulco direct.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; could not protect the surrounding country?

Mr. ALVIN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The rural districts?

Mr. ALVIN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Or, at least, did not do it?

Mr. ALVIN. Did not do it, and, in fact, did not try; never made an effort to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, did you leave Mexico at that time, after the—

Mr. ALVIN. I did.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you ever received any remuneration of any kind?

Mr. ALVIN. No, sir; not a cent.

The CHAIRMAN. For your loss? Have you made any claim against the Mexican Government?

Mr. ALVIN. No, sir; I have not.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you at that time file any list of the property or any claim with the American consul or any other authority?

Mr. ALVIN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you have made no claim?

Mr. ALVIN. No, sir. I didn't see as there was any use, as I have lost my lease—I had my lease with me, and all my books, in which I kept account of everything. I had with me and I had it in my suit case and expressed it from Mobile to Birmingham a year ago last May, this last May, and have never received it.

The CHAIRMAN. So you have lost your records?

Mr. ALVIN. I have lost my records; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You would be able, I presume, to testify as to your lease?

Mr. ALVIN. Oh, yes; I could swear to my lease.

The CHAIRMAN. Approximately what was it?

Mr. ALVIN. Approximately—well, approximately it was $50,000 Mexican or $25,000 American money.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, of yourself and your partner?

Mr. ALVIN. Yes, sir; the two of us.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all; we are very much obliged—just one moment: Of course, Acapulco and this district in which you were located is on the west coast of Mexico?

Mr. ALVIN. It is on the west coast of Mexico; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Just relate what else you know about occurrences in Mexico?

Mr. ALVIN. This was in 1908 after the—or during the—Madero revolution: A man by the name of Godman, representing a cocoanut plantation—representing a company of Seattle, he was manager; and he and his three sons were considerable stock owners, and when the Madero people began to come in there—that is, the soldiers from the north—prior to the battle of Acapulco, they came to this place, and they heard of them coming, so Mrs. Godman and a younger son and Mr. Godman went to Acapulco, leaving the two older boys at home; and one of them was a doctor, about 35 or 36 years old, a dentist, and the other was a man about 26 or 27, and they had an interpreter. At night some one rapped on the door, and the older one of the Godman boys—I think his name was Everett, if I ain't mistaken—and he went to the door to open it and let them come in and take whatever they wanted, and just as he opened the door they fired on him and killed him instantly, right in his own door, without any protest at all. But the other brother and interpreter got out the back way and had to stay in the woods all night—the rest of the night; and they got assistance to bury the brother the next day, and went to Acapulco. Now, I personally know of those Godmans and was on the ranch, and I know that they had no antipathy toward the Mexicans on either side, and Mr. Godman made quite a good many claims against the Madero administration, trying to get satisfaction, but to my knowledge he never did.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

TESTIMONY OF JAMES E. ELLIS.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live?

Mr. ELLIS. San Antonio.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a citizen of this country?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Native born?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where?

Mr. ELLIS. San Antonio.

The CHAIRMAN. You were born in San Antonio?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you lived in any part of Mexico within the last 10 years?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where, and how long?

Mr. ELLIS. Well, I lived in Mexico about 18 years.

The CHAIRMAN. But for the last 10 years—I say during the last 10 years, during the revolutionary period, since the Diaz administration?

Mr. ELLIS. Why, at Matamoros, Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Matamoros?

Mr. ELLIS. And later at Monterrey.

The CHAIRMAN. In what years?

Mr. ELLIS. Well, I was at Monterrey in—at Matamoros during the revolutions of 1913-14.

The CHAIRMAN. And later at Monterrey?

Mr. ELLIS. And later at Monterrey—1915 and 1916 at Monterrey.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you in business of any kind there?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What?

Mr. ELLIS. Well, I was—I was the owner of a café in Matamoros.

The CHAIRMAN. In Matamoros?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have any particular reason for leaving Matamoros?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was it?

Mr. ELLIS. Well, they put me out of business.

The CHAIRMAN. Who?

Mr. ELLIS. The officials, Carranza government.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, you mean the officials of the army?

Mr. ELLIS. Army officials; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Or civilian officials?

Mr. ELLIS. Army officials.

The CHAIRMAN. How did they put you out of business?

Mr. ELLIS. Well, on the credit basis.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have to credit them?

Mr. ELLIS. Why, in a way I did—to a certain extent; at least, I thought I did.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there any reason why you felt that you had to extend credit to them?

Mr. ELLIS. I beg your pardon.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there any reason why you felt that you had to extend credit to them?

Mr. ELLIS. Well, I—I thought I had to—it would be best to extend some credit at first to kind of get their friendship and good will.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, did you get it?

Mr. ELLIS. Why, no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mean to say that they ate you out?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And then what became of your property?

Mr. ELLIS. Why, they took it away from me.

The CHAIRMAN. Who took it away from you?

Mr. ELLIS. Why, the building that I was occupying when they took the town belonged to a Spaniard, and they confiscated this building on account of this Spaniard's son being a federal government employe, and he came to this side of the river, and they took this old man's property, demanded me to pay my rent to the jefetura de hacienda, which I did; and later on, why, this—I was getting down very low in funds, and the Spaniard was permitted to come back to town; when he came back, why, I was called up into court and asked why I had not paid my rent to this Spaniard for a year or so; I says, "I have paid the rent, I have been paying it to the jefetura." And I showed him my receipts. He says, "Those receipts are no good. This man's property has been given back to him, and he was just put out for a temporary time; we find he is a friend of our cause, and you will have to pay him this money that was coming to him." And I didn't have the money so I—they took what I had for the—

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). For what they claimed was the debt?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir. The man that owned the building didn't get it. Then they took it, and the next day it was turned over to a friend of Carranza, an officer, and he opened up business with it, with my fixtures and furniture.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, now, as I understand you, first they went just as far as you could allow them to go as to the matter of credit, and then on the theory that the owner of the property was not a friend or had a son who was not their friend, they took away the property?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And compelled you to pay your rent to the public officials there?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. To the Mexican officials?

Mr. ELLIS. I paid it to the army officials.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Spaniard came back and the Mexican court officials ordered you to pay him the back rent?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that it?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And when you did not do that, why, then the Mexican officials took the fixtures, etc.?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir; the city authorities came right over.

The CHAIRMAN. Instead of turning it over to the Spaniard, to pay his debt, they turned it over to themselves?

Mr. ELLIS. They moved it out the day after I closed the door and handed the key to the Spaniard, why, they came and got the key and moved all this stuff out.

The CHAIRMAN. He turned it over to somebody—

Mr. ELLIS. To another fellow.

The CHAIRMAN. You said a Carranza official? Was he a military official or civil?

Mr. ELLIS. He was a military official; he was a colonel in the Carranza army.

The CHAIRMAN. And he ran the restaurant?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir. His name was Lucio Rendon.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you locate then at Monterrey?

Mr. ELLIS. Afterwards I went to these people and tried to—they always told me they were going to pay me, and I met a general in the Mexican Army—here in the United States; he was over on this side and he told me to come to Monterrey. He seemed to be very friendly with me and I went to Monterrey—and my profession, I am a railroad conductor—and he gave me a passenger run between Monterrey and Torreon, and saying he was just giving it to me as—

The CHAIRMAN. Compensation.

Mr. ELLIS. Compensation, and wait until things got better and they would pay me.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did you continue on this run?

Mr. ELLIS. Until Gen. Pershing went into Mexico. I was discharged.

The CHAIRMAN. The railroad, was that a part of the national lines?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir; operated by the Carranza army at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. You never received your pay then?

Mr. ELLIS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You never received any compensation? And how much were your damages?

Mr. ELLIS. Well, I—my damages—my books show some fourteen—a little over $14,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Mexican money?

Mr. ELLIS. Mexican money; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. About $7,000 gold?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you ever filed any claims?

Mr. ELLIS. Why, the one I am making up now, but on account of my mother's health; why, she is unable to come down town for me, to get my birth certificate; as soon as she is able, why, we will have that completed.

The CHAIRMAN. You will forward that and file it with the State Department?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir; I have my application blanks all ready.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all. We are much obliged to you.

TESTIMONY OF MR. H. M. HANDSHY.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Mr. JACKSON. State your name.

Mr. HANDSHY. H. M. Handshy.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a citizen of the United States?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Native born?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where? What State?

Mr. HANDSHY. Zanesville, Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you lived in Mexico any time during the last 10 years?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What years?

Mr. HANDSHY. Principally the last 15 years, off and on.

The CHAIRMAN. But I mean what time during the last 10 years; since the revolutionary disturbances in Mexico?

Mr. HANDSHY. Well, I was down at Tampico, and I was at Laredo, and at Magistral, Parral, right south of Parral, two years ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Two years ago?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What were you doing at Magistral?

Mr. HANDSHY. I was representing the National Mines & Smelters Co., as bullion conductor and freight—hauling freight on trucks.

The CHAIRMAN. Were there any disturbances around Parral while you were there?

Mr. HANDSHY. No, sir; not at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you—did you have any safe conduct of any kind or any passports or papers?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir; I had passports from the United States consul, and Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. From whom in Mexico, if you remember?

Mr. HANDSHY. From the Mexican consul at El Paso.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know or come in contact with any of the Mexican leaders around there?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir; we had a guaranty from the time we left El Paso to pass through Magistral in safety, and when we got to Parral—south of Parral, I think, about one day or two days' ride—we had an escort of 400 soldiers, and they escorted us clear through Magistral, and when we got to El Oro there were about 900 soldiers joined in there with those 400, and just a few days before we got there they had a battle with Villa, and it seemed like they ran him into the mountains; and we went on to Magistral with our escort and 10 trucks, and unloaded—we had three big 10-ton trucks loaded with provisions—we unloaded there, and started—were possibly a block below the smelter—had just about got started—when Villa came in Sunday morning and took the town, put the town to the bad, sacked the town, killed a good many people, and we took a truck load of provisions and went across the mountains to El Oro, about 2 miles away.

The CHAIRMAN. When Villa was at Magistral now and sacked the place, the Carrancistas were at El Oro?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. About how many miles?

Mr. HANDSHY. Well, you could hear the guns crack over there very distinctly, it wasn't very far, about walking distance; some of the men who worked with me lived in El Oro.

The CHAIRMAN. About 2 miles?

Mr. HANDSHY. Something like that—just over the hill.

The CHAIRMAN. So you went there?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir; went over there and stayed two days, and then came back—we saw Villa had gone—we sent scouts along there and they said they had all left, and we went back. Smith came back in his car the next morning and took the secretary—about 9 o'clock that morning Smith came in, or 10 o'clock—I was at the smelter and Smith was down at the office; he came in—

The CHAIRMAN. Who?

Mr. HANDSHY. Villa and his bunch, and he only had about three or four hundred men, the balance were out at the camp some place, he had about three or four hundred more out there; he didn't need them; he came in, blew the smelter up, dynamited everything, hung Smith and killed his father-in-law and about four other Mexicans out there, and ran the rest into the mountains. Of course, he caught Smith and myself up the road after shooting at us a few times, they headed us off, after a little bit had a little trial out there, took Smith out and hung him, put me under guard and kept me under guard; threw a rope around me but didn't do anything—Villa kept me and treated me well—Villa and I were good friends, I kept his horses; and he went out to the smelter, by that time they got the dynamite out of the shaft and commenced blowing the power plant up; and we stayed around there then all that day, and the Carranza soldiers over the mountain knew all this was going on, because they came along there and we told them what was going on—they knew all about Smith—and they didn't venture to come down to assist us at all. And Pancho told me to stay there a while; I stayed there that day and that night, he gave me plenty of provisions, and went down to where his other men were, about 8 miles.

The CHAIRMAN. That was Pancho Villa?

Mr. HANDSHY. That was Pancho Villa. And the government didn't make any attempt to come over and help us out any. And Pancho told me I had better go to El Oro, that they were going to leave there and go that night; so I got up and walked to El Oro and told them the news and what had happened. So I went over there the next morning—or a couple of days later—and made an estimate of the damage done; I didn't see anything over there, didn't see anybody, the buildings were all burned down.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you did make an estimate?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the investment in your power plant?

Mr. HANDSHY. Well, I suppose the whole business, about $500,000. They blew up, dynamited the plant, the gas plant and engines and smelter.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he tell you why he destroyed it?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir. He said he wanted to show the American people and the public at large that Carranza couldn't carry out his guaranty, that it was worthless—that was the truth, he couldn't carry it out—he told me to bring that proof to the United States—and so I did. I reported it to Zach Cobb, at El Paso and to the American and English consuls at Chihuahua.

The CHAIRMAN. You were friendly with Villa, you say?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. With his treatment?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir; he sure did treat me fine.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; that is, after he took the rope off your neck the second time?

Mr. HANDSHY. Well, he didn't put it on there, some other fellows put it on there—he ordered it off mighty quick when he got there—I guess I had some of the marks on me after I got home; I was afraid of him, I went to meet him and told him I was glad to see him, I knew whose hands I was in, I knew where I was—I got kind of over my scare after they had been shooting at me for about an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. And Villa himself ordered those men who had put the rope on you to take the rope off?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir; he sure did, and I sat down and ate with him; he told me to ride his horse out to the smelters and lead a bunch of horses out there to keep them away from the destruction of the dynamiting of the buildings; they carried that on about an hour, I guess, before they got through with it. I think they fired about 20 boxes of dynamite and took about 50 away with them in Smith's automobile.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you manage to get along around the country without Villa being with you?

Mr. HANDSHY. Well, I went just over to El Oro and had people come in and tell us.

The CHAIRMAN. Did Villa give you any paper or anything of that kind for your protection?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was it?

Mr. HANDSHY. He gave me a passport; I have it in my pocket.

The CHAIRMAN. He gave you a passport?

Mr. HANDSHY. And I have a photograph I sent to President Wilson, and also sent a copy to Congressman Slayden and Senator Shepard, with Pancho's name on it. Zach Cobb had that passport. You can read it out—here is the passport and here is the original signed with his name.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you show this to anybody at any time?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir; I showed it to the general at El Oro, he said that was all right; he didn't object to my carrying that as long as I had any other papers.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, anywhere in Villa's territory that assured you safety, did it?

Mr. HANDSHY. I got through everywhere; yes, sir—they seemed to know that I was the right man, but they stopped me once or twice coming through, and I brought some trucks back, right from the mines to Parral, without any disturbance at all—we met a few small gangs; they didn't bother us—I suppose he had sent word on ahead that we would go out, and I wanted to get those trucks out, because he had scouts in pretty near all those towns; he has pretty near all these small towns handicapped when it comes to getting through.

The CHAIRMAN. You are familiar with the people in the small towns there?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In the country districts in that neighborhood?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir; very much so—Jimenez and different places.

The CHAIRMAN. Talked with them; been with them?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Had them in your employ?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the feeling among them generally, as far as you are able to judge, as to whom they favor now?

Mr. HANDSHY. Well, they favor better conditions than Carranza gives them—I don't know who—they claim they are getting to be worse all the time.

The CHAIRMAN. They are as well satisfied when Villa is in the country as when Carranza is?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir; they seem to be; yes, sir; many of the merchants in Parral told me that when they had Villa in there they were much better satisfied; much better protected with their stores, and everything, than when the soldiers were in there.

The CHAIRMAN. Did Villa seem to have control of his soldiers when he was there with them?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir; and they were better equipped by far than the other soldiers, according to their surroundings and everything.

The CHAIRMAN. You say that he was—appeared to be better outfitted, his men?

Mr. HANDSHY. Oh, yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How do you mean?

Mr. HANDSHY. He had better horses and better rifles—he got about 50 or 60 rifles out of our bunch and a couple of thousand rounds of ammunition; they were all good, principally new guns; when we left El Paso, a good many of the men had private guns in there, you know—had them stored over in Juarez. What I did find out at Chihuahua—I was there a couple of months at intervals and found out over at the arsenal, where they were making guns and repairing guns, they had at least 25 or 30 German mechanics in there; I was over there practically every day just fooling around to find out—they didn't have no objection to my being there at all—they boarded at the same hotel I did and ate at the same restaurant and I was with them every once in a while.

The CHAIRMAN. For whom were you doing this work?

Mr. HANDSHY. For the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. For Villa?

Mr. HANDSHY. No; for the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. For Carranza?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir. Guns came in there, you know, half a car load at a time, and saddles—old broken guns; and they were making repairs and everything there, of the equipment.

Senator SMITH. What year was that?

Mr. HANDSHY. That was 1917 and part of 1918. I left there in 1918.

The CHAIRMAN. 1917 and 1918?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Were those German workmen experts?

Mr. HANDSHY. Seemed to be; a good many of them came down from the strike of the miners, from Arizona—I knew a good many of them from Phoenix and Bisbee, out there—they were miners at that time then when I was there.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you been back since?

Mr. HANDSHY. No, sir. I had no occasion to go back, only in one direction—I know where there is $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 worth of bullion hid away, that Villa told me about, so I guess I will go and get that out when I have time—I know right where it is.

Senator SMITH. How many men did Villa have over at the place where these works were destroyed?

Mr. HANDSHY. He had about 400.

Senator SMITH. How many Carrancistas were over the hill a mile or two away?

Mr. HANDSHY. They claimed to be 900.

Senator SMITH. Nine hundred?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. And those 900, you say, were in easy hearing of these guns?

Mr. HANDSHY. Yes, sir; you could hear the guns both ways—when Villa would go up on the hill, you could see that bunch going across every day—and you wouldn't have the soldiers.

Senator SMITH. After notifying the Carranza soldiers, after arriving there, were any efforts made by them—these Carranza soldiers—to further engage Villa?

Mr. HANDSHY. No, sir. He just came and went whenever he wanted to. They just stayed at their posts all the time; they had dugouts, dugouts for about two miles and a few guns buried there and barricaded there, they didn't attempt to go from there at all.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all. We are very much obliged.

TESTIMONY OF MRS. A. H. McCAIN.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized.)

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live, Mrs. McCain?

Mrs. McCAIN. I live in San Antonio at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a citizen of the United States?

Mrs. McCAIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Native born?

Mrs. McCAIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What State?

Mrs. McCAIN. Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you lived here?

Mrs. McCAIN. In San Antonio?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, ma'am.

Mrs. McCAIN. At the present time I just returned from Europe. I served overseas over a year.

The CHAIRMAN. In what branch?

Mrs. McCAIN. In the Y. M. C. A. canteen service.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you before you went to Europe?

Mrs. McCAIN. Before I went to Europe, six months I was in San Antonio, previous to that I was in Refugio, Tex., and in Brownsville, traveling mostly.

The CHAIRMAN. I don't know what the substance of your testimony is, you can make any statement you want to, Mrs. McCain.

Mrs. McCAIN. My husband was killed in Brownsville, Tex., October 18, 1915, in a border raid, and the train was wrecked. Several United States soldiers were killed at the same time.

The CHAIRMAN. Who killed them, if you know?

Mrs. McCAIN. I don't know, it was supposed to be from the other side, I don't know.

The CHAIRMAN. That was what was known as the De la Rosa raids?

Mrs. McCAIN. I suppose so; yes, sir. The State of Texas at the time offered a reward for his capture.

The CHAIRMAN. You know nothing about the identity of those who wrecked the train and did the killing?

Mrs. McCAIN. No, sir; I know nothing about it because I left Brownsville at the time, after that.

The CHAIRMAN. Was your husband on the train?

Mrs. McCAIN. Yes, sir; he was on the train.

The CHAIRMAN. At the time of the wreck?

Mrs. McCAIN. At the time of the wreck, and he was shot that night.

The CHAIRMAN. He was shot?

Mrs. McCAIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Killed by a gunshot?

Mrs. McCAIN. Killed by a gunshot; died the next day at 1.25.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he conscious—did he know anything about who killed him?

Mrs. McCAIN. He was perfectly conscious, but I don't know whether he did or not—I don't know anything about that very much. I think his statement was, though, he was shot by Mexicans; I know that was his statement; that is proven without doubt.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; the committee will have other evidence more nearly identifying the perpetrators. What was your husband's name?

Mrs. McCAIN. Eugene Shannon McCain.

Senator SMITH. What was his profession?

Mrs. McCAIN. He was a medical man, a doctor.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he have any official position?

Mrs. McCAIN. He was quarantine physician of the State of Texas, stationed at Brownsville.

The CHAIRMAN. His official duties required him to travel on the train?

Mrs. McCAIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. He was on official duty at this time?

Mrs. McCAIN. Yes, sir; in line of duty.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course you received no remuneration of any kind from any source?

Mrs. McCAIN. No, sir; absolutely none.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, we will have other evidence.

TESTIMONY OF D. R. McCORMICK.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the committee, duly authorized thereto.)

The CHAIRMAN. What is your name?

Mr. McCORMICK. D. R. McCormick.

The CHAIRMAN. Your residence, please.

Mr. McCORMICK. 716 West Cypress, San Antonio, Tex.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Native born?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What State?

Mr. McCORMICK. Maryland.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about Mexico; have you ever lived there?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you go to Mexico?

Mr. McCORMICK. In 1882.

The CHAIRMAN. 1882?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you go?

Mr. McCORMICK. In Chihuahua.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you familiar with any other part of Mexico?

Mr. McCORMICK. Some; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What other part?

Mr. McCORMICK. In Coahuila I went—excuse me, I first went in Coahuila in 1882, and in Chihuahua afterwards.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have your family with you?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was your business?

Mr. McCORMICK. Cattle.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you own a ranch, or lease property?

Mr. McCORMICK. I leased property in the State of Coahuila.

The CHAIRMAN. How many cattle did you have there?

Mr. McCORMICK. I had a partner, Thomas Hughes; we had about 15,000.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did you continue in the cattle business?

Mr. McCORMICK. On that ranch, 12½ years.

The CHAIRMAN. That would be until 1894?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What were the conditions of the country during that time, from 1882 to 1894?

Mr. McCORMICK. In what respect?

The CHAIRMAN. Well, as to peace and order, or violence of law?

Mr. McCORMICK. We didn't have any trouble, I didn't have any trouble during that time, with the State nor with the Federal authorities, at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, did you have any trouble with bandits?

Mr. McCORMICK. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you go then, in 1894?

Mr. McCORMICK. In 1894 we sold out and I came back into Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you go back to old Mexico after that?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. When?

Mr. McCORMICK. I think that was in—I think that was about 1897 I went back there.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did you remain, then?

Mr. McCORMICK. I think it was about four years, in the State of Coahuila. Four years in the State of Coahuila, I was on the Tierra Blanca ranch.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you own it or lease it?

Mr. McCORMICK. I was manager there.

The CHAIRMAN. Cattle ranch?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How many cattle were there running on the ranch?

Mr. McCORMICK. I expected there was about 8,000 there.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you come out—come away from there?

Mr. McCORMICK. I was there, I think, about four years.

The CHAIRMAN. That would be about 1901?

Mr. McCORMICK. I think something like that; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And did you ever go back to Mexico?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What year? Well, during the years from 1897 to 1901 what were the conditions as to law and order?

Mr. McCORMICK. I didn't have any trouble at all; shipped cattle to the City of Mexico all the time I was there; crossed some into the United States on the other ranch, after I crossed out, while I was there in 1882. Then, you know the Wilson bill took effect and I could cross them out, but during the other time the duty was too high.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you dispose of them within the Republic?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir; disposed of them in the City of Mexico and in the other cities there, too.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, when did you go back into Mexico, if at all?

Mr. McCORMICK. Well, I went into Chihuahua about six months after I quit there.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did you stay there?

Mr. McCORMICK. Well, on that ranch I went and took charge of the T. O. ranch in the State of Chihuahua. It belonged to Dr. Wood, of Kansas City. It had 1,000,000 acres of land in it, and there were about 14,000 cattle, I suppose.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did you remain there?

Mr. McCORMICK. I think about three years. Senator, I would like to say this: I didn't intend to testify; I might get these here dates mixed up; if you will leave me until to-morrow I can have the dates and everything fixed up. I can make a little note of it.

The CHAIRMAN. You can get it approximately; that is what we are after. I want to show by you the condition during the years previous to 1911 and the conditions subsequent to the year 1911, in so far as you know. State what year you were on the T. O. ranch.

Mr. McCORMICK. I think I was there three years.

The CHAIRMAN. The conditions were what during that time?

Mr. McCORMICK. I didn't have any trouble with the State or Federal authorities at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you in Mexico at all after the year 1910?

Mr. McCORMICK. Some; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where?

Mr. McCORMICK. In Chihuahua.

The CHAIRMAN. In the cattle business?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Whereabouts?

Mr. McCORMICK. Well, I went and received those cattle on the Palomas Land & Cattle Co., and I forgot just the dates, but I received these, and I stayed there about two years, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. The Palomas Land & Cattle Co.?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir; that is in the State of Chihuahua. Yes, sir; they had about 2,000,000 acres of land, and I counted there about 28,000 cattle.

The CHAIRMAN. That ranch is along the border of New Mexico, extending west?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir; I think there is something over—pretty nearly 100 miles along the line of New Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. South of Columbus?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The T O ranch is on the border below the Rio Grande?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir; right south of Sierra Blanca.

The CHAIRMAN. What were the conditions after 1910 and 1911, subsequent to 1910?

Mr. McCORMICK. When I first went on this ranch, it was before that, everything was good before the revolution started, on Madero—I was there when that started.

The CHAIRMAN. Then what occurred?

Mr. McCORMICK. A good bit from that on.

The CHAIRMAN. Any of your family with you?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir; my wife was there with me. I had my wife with me.

The CHAIRMAN. I mean on the Palomas Land & Cattle Co.?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir; I brought my wife out just a few days after the fight there at Casas Grandes.

The CHAIRMAN. As long as you remained there, then, were you familiar with that part of the country subsequent to 1911; what were the conditions as to peace and order, or violence?

Mr. McCORMICK. We didn't have any trouble; didn't feel any uneasiness at all.

The CHAIRMAN. I say subsequent to 1911, subsequent to the battle of Casas Grandes?

Mr. McCORMICK. Everything was peaceable; they didn't have any trouble at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Afterwards?

Mr. McCORMICK. Well, after that there was trouble.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the character of the trouble?

Mr. McCORMICK. Well, different parties would come along and they would take cattle and horses and demand the money and the things, provisions, take them, and the horses and saddles.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you give me the names of any of the bands, or the leaders of bands, who demanded money and took property?

Mr. McCORMICK. Well, the first one that came by the ranch there was John Cruz Blanco; I believe that was his name.

The CHAIRMAN. Jose de la Luz Blanco, was it not?

Mr. McCORMICK. I think so; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. He was originally with Orozco, Pasqual Orozco, in the Madero revolution, was he not?

Mr. McCORMICK. I couldn't say. He came there and got provisions, but he paid for them; but he killed some cattle and didn't account for them nor pay for them. He didn't make much trouble.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, who else came afterwards?

Mr. McCORMICK. Well, I wasn't there in charge after that very long; my sons took charge.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know from your son what happened to him?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir; then I was in there and helped him to cross out a good many cattle; I saw some things then, also.

The CHAIRMAN. What happened to your son, if anything?

Mr. McCORMICK. Well, they captured him and held him for a ransom.

The CHAIRMAN. Who held him, do you know?

Mr. McCORMICK. Well, the first outfit was the Salazar outfit.

The CHAIRMAN. Inez Salazar?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he ransomed?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How much?

Mr. McCORMICK. $5,000, gold. The company paid it—the Palomas Land and Cattle Co.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he ever captured again?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Who took him the next time?

Mr. McCORMICK. Why, it was the Castillo outfit took him.

The CHAIRMAN. Maximo Castillo?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman who had something to do with the burning of a train with Americans on it in Cumbre Tunnel?

Mr. McCORMICK. The same party.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he capture your son?

Mr. McCORMICK. No, sir; not he himself; some of his men did.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they demand a ransom?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they get it?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How much?

Mr. McCORMICK. Five thousand gold, First National Bank at El Paso.

The CHAIRMAN. That seemed to be the regular price?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes; well, the next time, Castillo, he wasn't quite so vicious, he only got the five thousand Mexican.

The CHAIRMAN. But this third time?

Mr. McCORMICK. This time was Castillo.

The CHAIRMAN. That the second time?

Mr. McCORMICK. The second time he didn't get gold then, they bought the money in El Paso but didn't give so much. Then he was captured another time but he was with the vice president of the company, Stevenson.

The CHAIRMAN. Stevenson, of Los Angeles, vice president of the company, was in company with Mr. McCormick's son?

Mr. McCORMICK. They held him while Stevenson went and got the money at El Paso, held him three days there.

The CHAIRMAN. How much did they get that time?

Mr. McCORMICK. I ain't real sure, but I think it was in the neighborhood of $3,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know who that was who had him that time?

Mr. McCORMICK. I have forgotten who that was.

The CHAIRMAN. Did your son come out then?

Mr. McCORMICK. Sir?

The CHAIRMAN. Did your son come out then or did he stay there?

Mr. McCORMICK. No, he went back.

The CHAIRMAN. Did anything else happen to him?

Mr. McCORMICK. Well, I think he had a good bit of unpleasantness there, horses taken, and the like of that.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he captured any more?

Mr. McCORMICK. No, sir; that was the only three times that they took charge of him.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know how many times they took charge of Stevenson himself?

Mr. McCORMICK. I don't know, I think only twice. He wasn't in there as much as my son, they didn't have a chance.

The CHAIRMAN. They had a negro man working for them there?

Mr. McCORMICK. No, sir; he was with the Ojitos ranch, Warren, he would make you a good witness.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether he had to pay a ransom?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. For Bunk?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir; for Bunk.

The CHAIRMAN. How much did they have to pay for Bunk?

Mr. McCORMICK. I think the price was $5,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you been at all familiar with the country since there recently—within the last year or two?

Mr. McCORMICK. No, sir; I have not been over there since my son left there—about—

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know Tom Kingsbury?

Mr. McCORMICK. Oh, very well. He was the man that turned the cattle over to me—that is, from the other company—we counted them together.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know where he is?

Mr. McCORMICK. Dead, they told me.

The CHAIRMAN. He was working for the Palomas Land & Cattle Co. at the time of his death?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir. He was the second man after my son quit there; I got my son to quit when Carranza was recognized; I didn't think it was safe for him to stay there.

The CHAIRMAN. It had been apparently safe before that?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. After Carranza was recognized?

Mr. McCORMICK. I thought it was time to get out; he wasn't as old as I was, and I finally got him to come out, but Kingsbury was the second man. You know there was another man in charge after my son was, a fellow by the name of McKinney—Arthur McKinney.

The CHAIRMAN. What happened to him?

Mr. McCORMICK. The same road as Kingsbury. He is dead. They killed him.

Senator SMITH. Who did the killing, do you know?

Mr. McCORMICK. The outfit that killed—yes, sir; I know him. I know who killed Arthur McKinney; that was the Villa outfit after they got defeated up at Agua Prieta. He came down there then and Arthur McKinney was working on a ranch rounding up, and Villa came down there on the Boca Grande River and found him there and killed him, and killed another American up there with him.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you remember the name of the man—was it Bishop?

Mr. McCORMICK. Cobert was the man that was killed there.

The CHAIRMAN. Then Kingsbury disappeared within the last year or two?

Mr. McCORMICK. Kingsbury, I think; I have forgotten just when it was.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a comparatively recent date?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir; I don't think they found him or his horse. Arthur McKinney's remains were brought back on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. After Carranza was recognized you didn't go back into Mexico yourself, I mean, to live there?

Mr. McCORMICK. To live there; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you persuaded your son to come out?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

TESTIMONY OF PAUL METZENTHIN.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the committee, duly authorized thereto.)

Mr. JACKSON. State your name.

Mr. METZENTHIN. Paul Metzenthin, jr.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live?

Mr. METZENTHIN. 221 Van Ness.

The CHAIRMAN. San Antonio, Tex.?

Mr. METZENTHIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. METZENTHIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Native born?

Mr. METZENTHIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In what State?

Mr. METZENTHIN. Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you had any experience in Mexico?

Mr. METZENTHIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In what year?

Mr. METZENTHIN. 1913.

The CHAIRMAN. What part of Mexico?

Mr. METZENTHIN. In the lower part of the State of Sonora.

The CHAIRMAN. What were you doing there?

Mr. METZENTHIN. We went down there to raise cattle and farm.

The CHAIRMAN. Who?

Mr. METZENTHIN. The family—father, mother, three boys, and a sister.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is your farm?

Mr. METZENTHIN. It was approximately 50 miles due south of Guaymas.

The CHAIRMAN. On a river?

Mr. METZENTHIN. Below the Yaqui River in what is known as the Yaqui Delta.

The CHAIRMAN. Under an irrigation project?

Mr. METZENTHIN. Yes, sir; under an irrigation project.

The CHAIRMAN. Were there many Americans there?

Mr. METZENTHIN. Yes, sir; it was quite an American colony.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that under one of Richardson Construction Co.'s enterprises?

Mr. METZENTHIN. Yes, sir; Richardson Construction Co.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did you live there?

Mr. METZENTHIN. We went down the 1st of March, and after we were raided we, of course, tried to get out in the quickest time possible. The raid occurred on the 6th of May, and it was about the 22d of August before I got out of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the reason for the delay?

Mr. METZENTHIN. Why, after the raid I had three cripples on hand.

The CHAIRMAN. How do you mean?

Mr. METZENTHIN. After the raid father's health was such he could not move, and mother and sister were nervous, broke down, they couldn't walk around the house at all, much less make any sort of a trip.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was responsible for the raid, who were the leaders, I mean?

Mr. METZENTHIN. Yaqui Indians.

The CHAIRMAN. Were they in any governmental force, or were they just raiding on their own account?

Mr. METZENTHIN. No; they were under the command of Luis Espinoza. He was a regular commissioned lieutenant under Carranza. Carranza had, all during our stay in Sonora, complete control over the State. He was recognized as the stable government of that State.

The CHAIRMAN. Espinoza was in—

Mr. METZENTHIN. Regular commission.

The CHAIRMAN. About how many were there in the party of raiders?

Mr. METZENTHIN. There were possibly 200 but only about 80 came into the ranch—that is, came up to the house, and the others stayed out.

The CHAIRMAN. What did they do when they came to your place?

Mr. METZENTHIN. They took complete possession of the place. They lined us three boys up against a wall and held machetes to our throats and told us if we dared to drop our hands they would cut our heads off. They held us in that position from approximately a quarter past 12 until about 4.30 in the evening.

The CHAIRMAN. In the meantime?

Mr. METZENTHIN. In the meantime they carried off everything they could—that is, they ransacked the house, took all the provisions—we had stocked up for a year—and took all the stock we had, and they drove the stock that they took, which consisted largely of hogs, and they drove them through the crops, broke the irrigation canals, and cut fences—in other words, they ruined the crops.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what did the crops consist?

Mr. METZENTHIN. The crops consisted largely of corn, milo maize, beans, watermelons, and canteloupes. You see, it was truck farming.

The CHAIRMAN. Where was your market, where did you propose to sell your crops?

Mr. METZENTHIN. We sold our stuff to a St. Louis agent who was stationed in Esperanza.

The CHAIRMAN. What did you do with your hogs when you raised them?

Mr. METZENTHIN. Well, the hogs we disposed of at the same market.

The CHAIRMAN. This raiding party drove the hogs off?

Mr. METZENTHIN. They drove everything off.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. METZENTHIN. They drove everything off, didn't leave anything on the place; they even took everything off of us in the way of clothes, except our underwear, and on this occasion they stripped a chinaman, our house servant; stripped him in front of mother and sister; and they threatened to carry off, tried to carry off, mother and sister; but we left them under the impression that there were more Americans than what there really were, and it seemed as though it had some weight with them; at any rate, after a while they left mother and sister alone; and they threatened us and told us they were coming back again, which they did. We, of course, were not on the place any more; but they said they were coming back, and wanted a sum of money; what the sum was I have forgotten, and told us if the money wasn't there they would kill us and burn the house and barns, which they did; they burned them.

The CHAIRMAN. They did, later?

Mr. METZENTHIN. They came in, just as they said.

The CHAIRMAN. And burned the house and barn?

Mr. METZENTHIN. About 30 days later.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you go after they left the ranch?

Mr. METZENTHIN. After they left the ranch that night we were all afraid to venture anywhere off the place anywhere; we were not familiar with the ground, and we stayed on the place that night, and some Americans heard of the raid, and they sent a man down with a small buckboard, and he got mother and sister and father and one brother, and took them into the village. The other brother and myself, we had to hit for the hills; that is, we took a roundabout way on foot.

Senator SMITH. What village?

Mr. METZENTHIN. Esperanza, on the railroad.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did you remain out in the hills?

Mr. METZENTHIN. We got in that same night; made a roundabout trip so as to avoid the Yaquis.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the difference between the Yaqui soldiers and any other soldiers in the Carranza command there; any?

Mr. METZENTHIN. Well, the Yaquis are full-blooded Indians, and in that section of the country they are known as devils and broncos—anything that expresses meanness. They are the cruelest soldiers that are known to be in the Mexican Army.

The CHAIRMAN. Then as soon as you could, you got out of the country?

Mr. METZENTHIN. As soon as we could we got out of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. You said your mother and your sister were prostrated through shock?

Mr. METZENTHIN. Absolutely; and to this day, sister is not normal; absolutely, not normal; in fact, sister has suffered a complete lapse of memory for approximately three and a half years.

The CHAIRMAN. You haven't been back since?

Mr. METZENTHIN. No, sir; I have not been back since.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether any of the other colonists left?

Mr. METZENTHIN. Well, we were among the last; that is, among the last families to leave. There were men without dependents who stayed down there later than we did; but we were about the last family to leave.

The CHAIRMAN. The others had been driven out before?

Mr. METZENTHIN. No; they had ways of getting out; and among other things, the Richardson Co. furnished a boat for the women and children who could stand an overland trip of possibly 60 miles through the desert, and most of them got out on this boat.

The CHAIRMAN. About how many colonists were there who came out; if you know, approximately?

Mr. METZENTHIN. Approximately 200 left on that boat.

The CHAIRMAN. They came out before this raid upon your place?

Mr. METZENTHIN. No; they came out after the raid. There was no one had left before the raid.

The CHAIRMAN. Everything seemed to be comparatively safe?

Mr. METZENTHIN. When we went down, in fact, with this stock in Hermosillo, we left a wide trail, and wanted to be sure what we were getting into. We were assured on every hand. Among others who assured us every protection in the world was this Col. Alvarado. He is now general.

The CHAIRMAN. Salvador Alvarado?

Mr. METZENTHIN. What his initials are I really don't know. And we went farther down, and when we got to Esperanza we went over to the little village Cocorit. Cocorit was the seat of the municipal government, and the authority at Cocorit told us we would not be molested in any way, and told us if anything came up they would notify us; they would warn us, and would give us any protection we wanted; so we felt perfectly safe in going ahead, and we stayed there from—let's see—it was a little better than two months, without any trouble of any kind.

The Carranza troops and the Huerta troops both would come by, and they would send two or three messengers up and ask for supplies or for stock, and we would absolutely refuse this; we explained to them we were Americans. They offered us paper money at first, that is, promissory notes, and then grew rather insistent, and we always explained to them we were Americans, we would neither sell nor give to either side. And, whenever there was any little engagement in the neighborhood we stayed away from it, so there was nothing in the wide world for them to have any hard feeling toward us.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know how far from your place Gen. Alvaro Obregon's home was?

Mr. METZINTHIN. No; I don't know how far it was.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know who was in general command of the Yaquis fighting the Huertistas down there in that country?

Mr. METZINTHIN. They were under an Obregon. He had his headquarters at that time at Cruz de Piedra, which is, roughly estimating, about 15 miles from Guaymas. Now, which of the Orozcos that was I don't remember; there were three Orozcos.

The CHAIRMAN. I spoke of Obregon.

Mr. METZINTHIN. Oh, Obregon?

The CHAIRMAN. Obregon; yes.

Mr. METZINTHIN. I can't place an Obregon just now, the name though I know that we came in contact with it somewhere, but just where it was I don't recollect.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course the Orozcos whom you mentioned were in there, I think, Pasqual Orozco, he was never there in that part?

Mr. METZINTHIN. No; Pasqual was never there; it was one of the lesser Orozcos.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I recall one of them. You have never received any remuneration of any kind?

Mr. METZINTHIN. Not a cent; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Approximately what were your losses, roughly speaking?

Mr. METZINTHIN. I should imagine it run in the neighborhood of $20,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Mexican money or gold?

Mr. METZINTHIN. Well, in our money. You must remember—bear in mind at the time I went down there I wasn't 17, and after this raid, why, things happened so fast and I had so much on my hands that on certain points I can't be positive.

The CHAIRMAN. Is your mother too ill to appear before the committee?

Mr. METZINTHIN. Well, I shouldn't like to have her appear.

The CHAIRMAN. We had no intention of subpoenaing her unless she was able to come. How old was your sister at this time?

Mr. METZINTHIN. Sister, at that time, was 14.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that is all, sir; very much obliged.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the record show the committee will now be in recess until to-morrow morning, as it will go into executive session; there are several witnesses in attendance who for one reason and another, who, in judgment sufficient to themselves, and in the judgment of the committee, is sufficient to justify them in having their testimony taken in executive session. In the absence of any witness to be examined in open session we will take a recess now until to-morrow at 10.30. We will have an executive session all day.

Thereupon at 3.50 o'clock p. m., the committee recessed until Saturday, January 17, at 10.30 o'clock, a. m.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 17, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The subcommittee met pursuant to adjournment at 11.15 o'clock a. m. in the pink room of the Gunter Hotel, San Antonio, Tex.

Present: Senators Fall (chairman) and Smith; Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee.

TESTIMONY OF C. L. GARDNER.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live, Mr. Gardner?

Mr. GARDNER. At present I am located at Hot Springs, Ark.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Native born?

Mr. GARDNER. Native born.

The CHAIRMAN. In what State?

Mr. GARDNER. Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you been in Mexico within the last 10 years; that is, since 1910?

Mr. GARDNER. I came out of Mexico—I left the City of Mexico the 25th of August—last August.

The CHAIRMAN. 1919?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir; I came through San Antonio.

The CHAIRMAN. When were you first in Mexico?

Mr. GARDNER. I went to Mexico to live in 1897.

The CHAIRMAN. What was your business there?

Mr. GARDNER. I was a railroad conductor.

The CHAIRMAN. Where was your residence?

Mr. GARDNER. My residence?

The CHAIRMAN. I mean, where did you—did you have a home, temporary or otherwise, in Mexico?

Mr. GARDNER. In the City of Mexico, all the time I was there.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have a family?

Mr. GARDNER. My wife was with me.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did she reside?

Mr. GARDNER. She was with me.

The CHAIRMAN. In the City of Mexico?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon what roads were you employed?

Mr. GARDNER. At first on the Mexican Central, and then with the Cuernavaca during the construction of it—when Joe Hanson was building, I worked for him over there; and then I came back to the Central, and then I went to the National lines and worked there awhile, and back to the Central, and finally the Central was taken in by the National, and later on the Cuernavaca division; that was the last work I did after it got to be a division of the National lines.

The CHAIRMAN. When was that; when you went back the last time to the Cuernavaca division?

Mr. GARDNER. Cuernavaca division—that was about 1908.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you there when the Madero revolution occurred?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you then?

Mr. GARDNER. In the City of Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. That was in 1911?

Mr. GARDNER. In 1911 I was running a passenger train between the Balsas River and the City of Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you a railroad conductor?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you belong to your order?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What happened, if anything, to the Order of Railroad Conductors in Mexico after the Madero revolution?

Mr. GARDNER. Well, sir, they were discriminated against to such an extent that they could not stay.

The CHAIRMAN. You had an order in the Republic of Mexico?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir; we had a division there.

The CHAIRMAN. The headquarters were at Guadalajara?

Mr. GARDNER. In the City of Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. City of Mexico?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was the chief of that order there?

Mr. GARDNER. Well, there was different ones.

The CHAIRMAN. I mean just before you came out?

Mr. GARDNER. I was.

The CHAIRMAN. You were?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes; I was the chief there.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you recall the issuing of a statement addressed to the Order of Railroad Conductors in Mexico by one of their members about 1912 disbanding the order and telling them to get out of Mexico, that they were being so discriminated against?

Mr. GARDNER. That was the 17th of April, 1912; we all got.

The CHAIRMAN. The 17th of April, 1912?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you quit of your own accord or because of circumstances compelling you to do so?

Mr. GARDNER. We were compelled to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you remember what was known as "La Gran Liga" among Mexicans?

Mr. GARDNER. "La Gran Liga," si, señor.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the watchword of "La Gran Liga," if you know in Mexico? "Mexico for the Mexicans"?

Mr. GARDNER. "Mexico for the Mexicans."

The CHAIRMAN. Supposed to be organized by Mexican railroad employees originally?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And claiming to number about 25,000 members about the time you went out of there?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That was my understanding. Do you know Jack Johnson?

Mr. GARDNER. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is he?

Mr. GARDNER. He is the ex-pugilist of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. He is "ex" now. Do you know where he is?

Mr. GARDNER. He was in Mexico when I left; I seen him every day.

The CHAIRMAN. In August of this year?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. He is the colored ex-champion?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what his business is there?

Mr. GARDNER. Well, he is in the same business; holding bouts there for money.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever see an advertisement in the Mexico papers or magazines along that line? [Handing a slip of paper to the witness.]

Mr. GARDNER. No; I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. That is an advertisement of the Jack Johnson Land Co. You did not see that?

Mr. GARDNER. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I will have this placed in the record at any rate. [Reading:]

COLORED PEOPLE: You who are lynched, tortured, mobbed, persecuted, and discriminated against in the boasted "land of Liberty," the United States. Own a home in Mexico where one man is as good as another and it is not your color that counts, but simply you. Write for particulars.

JACK JOHNSON LAND Co.,

Mexico City, D. F., Mexico.

No. 50 Donceles Street.

The CHAIRMAN. This is taken from Gale's Magazine, published as an advertisement in Gale's Magazine, in the city of Mexico, recently.

Mr. GARDNER. That has come out recently.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; that is, since you left there.

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you have met Mr. Johnson?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir; I have seen him in the automobiles going around there, and I have seen him in the restaurants.

The CHAIRMAN. Any particular instance occur there that called your attention to Mr. Johnson at any time?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir; there was.

The CHAIRMAN. Where was it?

Mr. GARDNER. In Sanborn's there; Sanborn's restaurant; Sanborn's café.

The CHAIRMAN. What was it, Mr. Gardner?

Mr. GARDNER. Well, he came in one afternoon—the Sanborn brothers are wholesale and retail druggists.

The CHAIRMAN. Who are they, Americans?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir; but they have attached to their drug store a restaurant business. There was a lady in charge of it, and Jack Johnson came in there one afternoon and sat down in the middle of the room and she refused to wait on him.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was she?

Mr. GARDNER. She was a Mrs. Thinguin, a Swedish name.

The CHAIRMAN. Was she an American?

Mr. GARDNER. An American.

The CHAIRMAN. And she refused to wait on him?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir; she refused to wait on him, and simply politely told him he would have to go somewhere else, and he informed her that he would come back later and raise a rough-house. I was working in the office upstairs, in the general offices, and the word went around the office that Jack Johnson was coming back in the afternoon to raise a rough-house, so we watched for him. About dark he came in with four or five Carrancista officers, all drunk, and sat down in the middle of the dining room and hammered on the table and ordered everything that was there, and, of course, other customers were there, the dining room crowded by this time, and everybody was interested; they were pushing and shoving around and made a great disturbance, and after they got what they wanted to eat they sent for Mr. Walter Sanborn, who was in charge, one of the brothers; there was two brothers.

The CHAIRMAN. One of the owners?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir. And he naturally would not come in, and they sent out two or three of those officers and they found him and made him come in and they made him shake hands with Jack Johnson and apologize to him the best they could, and embrace him, and shook sombreros over his head, and they were all armed and drunk, and then Mr. Johnson brought in his white lady and seated her and one or two others at the table, and they had a flash-light picture taken to prove that they were there. I stood by the door and watched the whole of it, and they got away with at least $1,000 worth of food and never paid for it.

The CHAIRMAN. You say "they"—who?

Mr. GARDNER. Well, the crowd. Jack Johnson, I think, offered to pay for what he got, you know, so they could not say that he alone did this. He was pretty cute. Not only that; they had a little street which is one and a half blocks from there lined full of soldiers ready to come in if anything was started.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, something was started, wasn't it?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, but there was no shot fired, you know. I do not remember the exact date, but that was about the 1st of July.

Mr. JACKSON. What year?

Mr. GARDNER. 1919.

The CHAIRMAN. That was this incident which you have just related?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir, because I left there on the 10th—left Sanborn and went to the American Club and it was just before I went over there.

The CHAIRMAN. While you were on the Cuernavaca division operating trains did you come in contact with the Mexican soldiers of either faction, Zapatistas or others?

Mr. GARDNER. Every day; I knew all of them.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have any reason to know what their methods were in the treatment of girls or women?

Mr. GARDNER. Well, they didn't treat them; they just took them wherever they got their hands on them; that was all.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever witness any incident of that kind yourself?

Mr. GARDNER. I remember one very beautiful girl standing on one of the platforms between the coaches with a ticket in her hand, and one of them rode up and grabbed her by the wrist and took her off with him.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did he take her?

Mr. GARDNER. He took her off down through the yard and out into the brush.

The CHAIRMAN. Any other witnesses besides yourself?

Mr. GARDNER. There were two or three Zapatistas around there.

The CHAIRMAN. This was a Mexican girl, was it?

Mr. GARDNER. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What did the audience do or say, if anything?

Mr. GARDNER. Oh, they just laughed and hollered, they thought it was a good joke.

The CHAIRMAN. What are the general conditions in Mexico with reference to law and order or violence and disorder, do you know?

Mr. GARDNER. Well, there doesn't seem to be any law and order; they all do absolutely just as they please. Every general and every fellow that has any authority at all does just as he likes in the community that he is in. There is no head to anything.

The CHAIRMAN. Those conditions yet exist there?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir; and they are growing worse every day.

The CHAIRMAN. The present so-called Government of Mexico is not then able to maintain order, according to your judgment; or does not desire to; or is not able to?

Mr. GARDNER. It seems to me that there is no government.

The CHAIRMAN. At the time that the railroad—American railroad conductors came out in April—April 17, 1912—were there any other railroad men there in Mexico?

Mr. GARDNER. There were a few officials left.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I mean before that had there been—were there American locomotive engineers?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes; they all left at the same time.

The CHAIRMAN. All American railroad men employed by or on the national roads left at the same time?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir; except a few division superintendents and officials; they stayed.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there any report made by your members to the organizations in the United States?

Mr. GARDNER. Oh, yes, yes; they have all the data.

The CHAIRMAN. You made official reports?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. At that time?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Published in your official journals?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir; you could get that at Cedar Rapids; or Tommy Echols, he could furnish it, he was our chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir. Personally I have had letters from Mr. Echols in my possession for 12 years, reports from him, a private report to myself from him aside from the official report which was made.

Mr. GARDNER. He is now in El Paso, I think his address is 1000 Newman Street. I have not heard from him for some time.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, we would be glad to look Mr. Echols up when we go to El Paso and have his evidence. Well, I thank you very much in the name of the committee, Mr. Gardner, for your testimony; it is very interesting.

At the desire of several witnesses, the committee will be now compelled to have an executive session, but we have subpoenas out for at least two witnesses whom we hope to have here in a very short time, and the session will be opened again if we secure their attendance; so I will have to ask you gentlemen to let us have the hall a little while now. I will say, at least for the benefit of the newspaper men, that executive sessions are held simply where the witnesses request it. The committee has no desire to hold executive sessions, but simply conforms to the witnesses' wishes where there is apparently some good reason.

(Thereupon the newspaper men and the audience retired from the hall and the committee continued its hearings in executive session.)

TESTIMONY OF MR. N. S. MORRISON.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you reside, Mr. Morrison?

Mr. MORRISON. San Antonio.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your occupation?

Mr. MORRISON. Newspaper reporter.

The CHAIRMAN. For a local paper?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In San Antonio?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You have been in attendance on these hearings since the committee came here?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The information has come to the committee that there has been some newspaper story, or some story publicity for which has been sought, if not reflecting upon, at least tending to show some private or personal interests of one of the members of this committee in the matters under investigation. Do you know anything about it?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir. I think that I sent that story out, probably on the International News wire. It was not though—when the story was sent out though it was not intended to reflect on any member of the committee. It was sent out more with the intention of showing how these hearings were bringing a retaliation from Mexico. The story was to the effect, as I remember it, that secret agents of the Mexican Government were investigating Senator Fall's record in an attempt to prove that he had, at any rate, personal interests in Mexico, and that they would attempt to prove that he had at one time been an attorney for Terrazas.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they mention what Terrazas—Gen. Luis Terrazas, of Chihuahua?

Mr. MORRISON. No; I will tell you. I do not know much about the Terrazas excepting this was the man that was supposed to have been the owner of the Terrazas ranch.

The CHAIRMAN. That was Gen. Luis Terrazas?

Mr. MORRISON. Well, I don't know.

The CHAIRMAN. You sent the story out?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir; I sent the story out.

The CHAIRMAN. From whom did you obtain it?

Mr. MORRISON. I obtained it from Miss Smith, a reporter on the Evening News.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all you know about it?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir. She told me the source and I supposed it was reliable. I asked her, as I remember now, if it was reliable, and she said it was.

The CHAIRMAN. She gave you the name of her informant?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was that name?

Mr. MORRISON. That was a Mr. Hall; I can not pronounce his first name, or I do not know how it is spelled. I understand he is the head of the Mexican bureau of the chamber of commerce here.

The CHAIRMAN. Of this city?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir. Now that story was put on the wire, and later a notice was sent out from New York to kill the story.

The CHAIRMAN. I thank you very much.

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. This young lady whom you referred to as Miss Smith—Miss Genevieve Smith?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Has she been in attendance on the committee?

Mr. MORRISON. No, sir. Well, I believe she has been in the audience, but she has not been covering it.

TESTIMONY OF GUILLERMO FRANKLIN HALL.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

The CHAIRMAN. What is your name?

Mr. HALL. Guillermo Franklin Hall.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you reside, Mr. Hall?

Mr. HALL. San Antonio.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your business?

Mr. HALL. I am director of the Mexican trade bureau of the chamber of commerce of this city.

The CHAIRMAN. Of San Antonio?

Mr. HALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Hall, information has been imparted to the committee and one of the witness was called and made a statement with reference to a newspaper story concerning in some way the supposed connection of one of the members of this committee with some interests in Mexico, rather possibly indicating that the member of the committee was by virtue of such former interests not impartial or not conducting an impartial hearing. Do you know anything about it?

Mr. HALL. I do not know anything of the facts in the case. I did not know there was such a thing in the newspapers.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you heard anything of such a report?

Mr. HALL. Not based on any knowledge, I heard it said that—

The CHAIRMAN. Be perfectly frank; we just want to clear the whole matter up, that is all.

Mr. HALL. Yes. I heard it said that there was a possibility, or probability perhaps, that some of the committee might have some relations in Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Referring to myself?

Mr. HALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman of the committee?

Mr. HALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you impart that information to anyone?

Mr. HALL. I asked if the chairman of this committee—I asked different people different times, if the chairman of this committee had property interests or any of the members of the committee had property interests—that was what I was asking for, particularly—in Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you have asked if they had?

Mr. HALL. I have asked if they had.

The CHAIRMAN. What information did you obtain from them upon that subject?

Mr. HALL. I have not obtained any information that they did have any property interests in Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, now, in this particular matter did you impart such information as you had received or that you said you had received to anyone else?

Mr. HALL. I said that I had no positive information of the fact, but that I believed it was entirely possible that some of the members of this committee might have had in the past and perhaps still some relations with big business in Mexico or some relations with reference to property interests there, but I did not know. I had no facts in the case; I stated that thoroughly.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom did you make this statement?

Mr. HALL. I do not remember.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have a conversation with Miss Smith, of this city?

Mr. HALL. Yes. I have had several conversations with Miss Smith.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon that subject?

Mr. HALL. She is a reporter, I believe, upon one of the papers; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Newspaper?

Mr. HALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You had a conversation with her upon this subject?

Mr. HALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what, if anything—what use she made of the information which you gave her or the statement which you made to her?

Mr. HALL. I do not remember her having said anything of the thing.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not know what she did or attempted to do with that information which she thought she had or acting upon any conversation which she might have had with you with reference to this matter?

Mr. HALL. No; because I did not see in the paper anything that she wrote with reference to it, and I do not know of any particular conversation with her. These reporters are in my office every day. Anything that happens they come to see me and ask my opinion about things, and frequently give it. I told them that I did not know anything about the facts back of this thing.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, what was the source of your information which caused you to investigate or ask questions or attempt to impart information to others upon the subject? From whom did you obtain any information?

Mr. HALL. I did not—if you will pardon my calling in question the form of your question.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I may have incorrectly framed the question.

Mr. HALL. I did not attempt to impart any information to anybody on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Well you testified—

Mr. HALL. But I had heard that the chairman of this committee was formerly connected in some way with the Terrazas interests in Chihuahua.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you hear that?

Mr. HALL. Oh, that was—that would be hard for me to tell. It is a part of so many things that I had heard with reference to Mexico and things in Mexico that it would be impossible to segregate it.

The CHAIRMAN. It must have made some impression upon your mind, because you sought information along that line, and then you repeated to others something that you had heard along that line.

Mr. HALL. Well; I had in mind times back in Diaz's administration, when Enrique Creel, he was part of the group that ran things in Mexico, and I remembered something of the Terrazas interests during the time I lived in El Paso.

The CHAIRMAN. You have reference to Gen. Luis Terrazas of Chihuahua?

Mr. HALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The father-in-law of Mr. Creel?

Mr. HALL. Yes, sir. And I had reference to some things that probably have come from my residence of longer and shorter intervals at El Paso at different times.

The CHAIRMAN. You knew that Gen. Terrazas had lived for a time in a residence in El Paso known as my house?

Mr. HALL. I did not know that detail.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not?

Mr. HALL. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, it is a fact. I supposed that from your stating that you had resided in El Paso that possibly you were familiar with it.

Mr. HALL. Not for any length of time at any one time.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, what did you learn or what excited your interest in my activities, or supposed activities in Mexico, what did you learn during your residence in El Paso with reference to it?

Mr. HALL. I did not learn, as I tell you again, I had no information, and I have stated to nobody that I had information. I stated simply that in line with a good deal of things that are coming up at the present time, we have to keep our heads on them carefully and see if there is any possibility of animus on anybody's part on both sides of the line.

The CHAIRMAN. And from your information you had some impression that there might be some animus in the mind of the chairman of this committee?

Mr. HALL. I did.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what information was it lead up to that?

Mr. HALL. Not from any information. Well, coming back to that again, I have stated frankly now, as I stated then, I have never had any information, I never stated I had any information, but in trying to account for a lot of things and a lot of propaganda—pardon me the word, not with reference to yourselves, sir, but with reference to the press of this country against our neighbors, I expected also that it might very likely be true that some of the things that were ascribed to the chairman of this committee ought not to be ascribed to him, and not inferred on the part of certain newspapers who published certain things and gave them certain coloring, it might be possible that things were exaggerated, but that—

The CHAIRMAN. To whom did you make that statement that things might be exaggerated which had been circulated or repeated with reference to myself, or any animus of the chairman?

Mr. HALL. I do not remember, sir. I have had so many conversations on that subject here, you can readily understand that there is not a day passes that somebody does not catch me on the street or come to my office and ask me for things.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know any of the Mexican secret service men in this country?

Mr. HALL. No, sir; not a one.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know the Mexican consul here?

Mr. HALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you state to Miss Smith that the Mexican secret service men were investigating the chairman of this committee?

Mr. HALL. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not make any such statement to her?

Mr. HALL. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Made no such statement?

Mr. HALL. Absolutely not.

The CHAIRMAN. You are an American citizen, of course?

Mr. HALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you born?

Mr. HALL. Grand Rapids, Mich.

The CHAIRMAN. I notice that—the reason I asked the question—I supposed you were an American citizen, but I notice that you spell your name Guillermo, which is the Mexican for William?

Mr. HALL. Yes, sir; but that happens because I spent my early boyhood in Spain.

The CHAIRMAN. And you were connected with the Mexican trade committee of the Chamber of Commerce?

Mr. HALL. Yes, sir; I am the director of the Mexican trade bureau for the Chamber of Commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you connected in any publicity work along that line?

Mr. HALL. Certainly; we are trying to further our business interests with Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the purpose of the Mexican trade committee?

Mr. HALL. Yes, sir; that is the purpose of the Mexican Trade Bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. It was to further American trade relations with Mexico?

Mr. HALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the business which you are engaged in?

Mr. HALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you receiving remuneration for your services?

Mr. HALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, as I understand you, whatever you may have said with reference to the possible bias or prejudice of any member of the committee, particularly the chairman of the committee, it has been merely in a casual conversation?

Mr. HALL. Absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. Based simply upon rumor and conversation?

Mr. HALL. Absolutely. No foundation further than that. I am perfectly willing to go on record as saying that I have at no time had any positive information on that subject and I have no animus against the chairman of this committee or any member of it. The only purpose that I have had at any time has been a sincere desire to do my—to use my influence as far as possible to get my fellow citizens to think straight on international lines.

The CHAIRMAN. You are aware of the fact, which is public history, that this committee is proceeding under instructions from the Senate of the United States, and that this subcommittee conducting these hearings is composed of three members of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate?

Mr. HALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You have knowledge of that fact?

Mr. HALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you have, also at least read in the press, if you have not gleaned from the Congressional Record, that the committee was appointed by a resolution offered by Senator King, of Utah?

Mr. HALL. That was a detail that I did not know, or, if I did, I had forgotten it.

The CHAIRMAN. You had your attention called to the fact, through reading the Congressional Record or otherwise, that the resolution—that portion of the resolution directing the committee to report to the Senate its recommendations as to what, if anything, the United States Congress should do with reference to Mexican matters, was adopted in the open Senate, by unanimous vote, upon a motion offered by Senator Ashurst, of Arizona, a colleague of Senator Smith, who is a member of this committee.

Mr. HALL. Of that detail I did not know.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a matter of record.

Mr. HALL. I do not read the Congressional Record—I am too busy.

The CHAIRMAN. You read the papers, however?

Mr. HALL. Naturally; yes, sir. I knew that this committee was— to put it into definite shape—that this committee was named by the United States Senate to take testimony and investigate Mexican affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you familiar with the procedure in the Senate and Congress of the United States with reference to resolutions authorizing or directing committees to make investigations in behalf of Congress?

Mr. HALL. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You have not had your attention called to the fact, either through the newspapers or otherwise, that this resolution was reported out of the Senate committee, after being referred to it by the Senate, by a unanimous vote of all the membership of that committee, and was unanimously adopted by the Senate of the United States, with the amendment offered by Senator Ashurst, also unanimously adopted, broadening the scope very materially of the inquiry, and demanding that the committee themselves should make a report with recommendations with reference to what the United States should do?

Mr. HALL. I did not know of it being unanimous, or about the amendment, but I knew that they were empowered to make such investigation.

The CHAIRMAN. And directed to make such recommendations?

Mr. HALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You know the politics of Senator Ashurst, of Arizona?

Mr. HALL. Not a bit.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know the politics of Senator King, of Utah?

Mr. HALL. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know the politics of Senator Smith of Arizona?

Mr. HALL. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know my politics?

Mr. HALL. No, sir. Oh, yes; I have heard that you were a Republican.

The CHAIRMAN. Correct, sir. Have you had your attention called to official statements in the nature of a report by this committee and published statements made officially that this committee is cooperating with the State Department of the United States?

Mr. HALL. I have seen that statement made; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know the politics of the head of the State Department of the United States?

Mr. HALL. I have not been able to make that out.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know that instructions have been issued by the Treasury Department of the United States to the agents of the Treasury Department along the border to cooperate in every way, even to the extent of submitting all their books and records to this committee?

Mr. HALL. I did not know that.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know that officials of the Department of Justice, engaged in work along the border, who have been representing this Government for many years, have been furloughed and assigned for service to this committee?

Mr. HALL. I did not know that until your arrival here.

The CHAIRMAN. Has your attention been called to the fact that the War Department of the United States has assigned for service to this committee one of its intelligence officers, who is in company with this committee wherever they go, assisting them?

Mr. HALL. I did not know that.

The CHAIRMAN. I will introduce you to Capt. Hyde, who sits at the end of the table there, Mr. Hall, who was assigned to us by the War Department. Do you know Capt. Hanson?

Mr. HALL. I have not had that pleasure. I saw him at the banquet last night and had him pointed out to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know he is a captain of the Texas Rangers?

Mr. HALL. I knew through the newspapers or I read in the newspapers that he had been assigned to the service of this committee by the governor of this State.

The CHAIRMAN. By the governor of this State?

Mr. HALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you at least have some information which would—unless contradicted—which would tend to satisfy you that the committee is cooperating with the State of Texas and also with the national administration at Washington?

Mr. HALL. Absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Hall, where did you live in Mexico?

Mr. HALL. I lived in Guadalajara, Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you live in the northern part of the Republic at any time?

Mr. HALL. No.

The CHAIRMAN. So you are not personally familiar with any activities which I might have been engaged in in Chihuahua or Sonora or the northern States?

Mr. HALL. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you in Mexico in 1883?

Mr. HALL. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you would not be familiar with any activities of mine in that year in the State of Zacatecas, in the event I was engaged in such activities?

Mr. HALL. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that is all, Mr. Hall. Very much obliged to you, sir, in assisting us to clear up the matter.

(Thereupon, at 1.05 o'clock p. m., the committee recessed until 2 o'clock of the same day.)

AFTER RECESS.

TESTIMONY OF MISS GENEVIEVE SMITH.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized.)

The CHAIRMAN. Miss Smith, where do you live?

Miss SMITH. In San Antonio.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your occupation?

Miss SMITH. Newspaper reporter.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know Mr. Guillermo Hall

Miss SMITH. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you had any conversation with him within the last few days with reference to any member of this committee?

Miss SMITH. Yes; about a week or 10 days ago; I don't remember the date exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you interested in the conversation as a reporter?

Miss SMITH. Yes; certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Just let us have the general purport of that conversation, if you please.

Miss SMITH. As you probably know, I go to the chamber of commerce, where Mr. Hall's office is. I see him daily. Frequently he gives me tips, as we call it in our profession; that is, hints as to where I can get a story. One day, in speaking of the coming hearing, he mentioned the facts that he had been told that Mexico was making an investigation of your—of Senator Fall. He said further that he had been told that he had been connected with the Terrazas interests in Mexico, and I think the conversation stopped there and I went away thinking about it. Oh, yes; he gave me the names of several people in this city who are Mexicans, because his work keeps him closely in touch with the Mexicans; he gave me the names of several people, and later I went to the library and read the story of the Terrazas family, and then I came back with the Literary Digest of the date of November 8, which carries this story, and I asked Mr. Hall if that was the family he referred to and he said yes, and we had a little conversation about it there; I think about the same information as given—

The CHAIRMAN. Did you take the information which you obtained in this way to any one else here?

Miss SMITH. I discussed it with Mr. Morrison, on the paper; he was covering this hearing. I told him because he was covering the hearing.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Morrison prepared the newspaper story on it?

Miss SMITH. A very short one.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom did Mr. Hall tell you to interview here with reference to this?

Miss SMITH. Well, he said the Mexican consul, Consul Gonzales de la Mata, would probably know more about it, and he gave me the name of Mr. Gonzales—Mr. Roque Gonzales—a former citizen of Mexico, who is now in San Antonio, and one or two other names I don't remember. There was one who is an agent, I think, for Villa; he said he would be unfriendly to the Carranza interests and he might have something about it.

The CHAIRMAN. Something about my connection?

Miss SMITH. About the investigation of Mexico. Then I said—I asked him if he knew whether the vice consul was from Chihuahua, the State in which this Terrazas family resided, and he didn't know; but I was under the impression the vice consul was from Chihuahua. I believe he also said Mr. Beltran, ex-consul in San Antonio, might know something about it. Later I talked to the consul and vice consul about it.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you get any information from them?

Miss SMITH. The vice consul said, when I asked him, it was possible—when I asked him that Mexico was making an investigation he said, "Possibly." I said, "Do you think that Mexico would likely launch a counterpropaganda?" and the consul said, "Possibly." I asked him if he knew anything about it and he said, "We are not in touch with Mexican politics," and he shrugged his shoulders.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Hall told you that the Mexicans were investigating; did he say who—whether Secret Service men or agents?

Miss SMITH. He said agents of Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Agents?

Miss SMITH. That is the impression I got. Whether he said Secret Service agents I couldn't positively swear, but that was the impression I got.

The CHAIRMAN. He was giving you a tip?

Miss SMITH. A tip.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ask him for it, or how did he happen to give it to you?

Miss SMITH. I have known Mr. Hall ever since he has been in the chamber of commerce and he frequently gives me tips. He frequently gives me tips, because I go over there daily and follow them up; sometimes he gives me very good stories.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you had any conversation with Mr. Hall as to what would be his course in the event there was any trouble between this country and Mexico?

Miss SMITH. No; I have not.

The CHAIRMAN. He has not told you what would likely be his course in the event there was any trouble between this country and Mexico?

Miss SMITH. No; he has not told me what his course would be.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know Mr. Hall's wife?

Miss SMITH. I do not; I know him only in a business way.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you present at any time when Mr. Hall made any public speech with reference to Mexico?

Miss SMITH. I heard him make one public speech at the Rotary Club, and I have heard him express himself privately sometimes.

The CHAIRMAN. I won't ask you how he expressed himself privately.

Miss SMITH. It has been the same, Senator Fall, as it has been in public.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know any occasion upon which Mr. Hall, in the interests of the chamber of commerce, sought to go to Mexico?

Miss SMITH. In the interests of the chamber of commerce?

The CHAIRMAN. Or otherwise in trade relations?

Miss SMITH. He went once last year as official interpreter for the Mexican trade trip, and he has planned to go this year for a similar trade trip.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about his passport arrangements?

Miss SMITH. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. You know the Mexican consul here, and the Mexican vice consul?

Miss SMITH. Yes; I go there almost daily, too. I frequently have applied to Mr. Hall for information because he is a linguist, and he was very well acquainted with the Mexican consul, because their business interests are similar, and he has frequently helped me in stories.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you ever been referred by the Mexican consul to Mr. Hall for verification of a story?

Miss SMITH. I think on minor things once or twice. I remember one time the Mexican consul was about to give me a message that had come from the Mexican Government, a message of greeting; I think it was in anticipation of the proposed trade trip. I believe he referred me to Mr. Hall because he had sent it to him—in little minor affairs like that.

The CHAIRMAN. On any trip which you have made, or any visit that you have made to the Mexican consul, or any interview with the Mexican consul, have you secured any documentary—any documents from the consulate, of any kind or character?

Miss SMITH. Frequently I get written interpretations of official messages; I mean, press messages, from the Mexican Embassy in Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. I call your attention specifically to one pamphlet; have you ever seen the pamphlet "The Conspiracy Against Mexico"?

Miss SMITH. I have seen a pamphlet called "Intervention in Mexico," by Arthur Thomson. I believe "Intervention in Mexico" is the title.

The CHAIRMAN. Isn't it "The Conspiracy Against Mexico"; are you positive?

Miss SMITH. "Intervention in Mexico."

The CHAIRMAN. We have a copy of it here.

Miss SMITH. I know the cover very well; it is that of a clawlike hand extending over the book.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; extending over the picture of Mexico.

Miss SMITH. And I know the author is Arthur Thomson.

The CHAIRMAN. Arthur Thomson. Where did you see that?

Miss SMITH. I saw it first in Mr. Hall's office.

The CHAIRMAN. In Mr. Hall's office?

Miss SMITH. He handed me a copy of it, saying it was Bolshevik literature.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he tell you where he had obtained it?

Miss SMITH. Yes; he said he had obtained it from the consul, De la Mata; he had given it to him to read over and to pass his opinion upon.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have any conversation with the consul about it?

Miss SMITH. I had a conversation with the vice consul because the consul was absent.

The CHAIRMAN. What did you learn from him, if anything, with reference to this pamphlet?

Miss SMITH. Before I had the conversation with the vice consul I knew the story; virtually, I learned it from Mr. Hall, and the vice consul corroborated the story—do you want me to tell that?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Miss SMITH. He said several copies of this, a package, had been received at the consulate from an unknown address. That interested me because I thought that sounded rather unusual for books to be coming from an unknown address, and I asked him how they came, and he said by express. I didn't say anything further about that. He said these books had come by express from an unknown address and that the consul had given one to Mr. Hall to read over, because the consul does not read English, they were printed in English, and so Mr. Hall read it over and told him, the consul, that it was Bolsheviki literature, to have nothing to do with it. Vice consul Marshall told me that he understood he had followed his advice and hadn't distributed any of the literature. I asked him for a book, because we had gotten in a telegraph story, and he didn't give it to me because he said he didn't have any authority, since the matter was in the consul's hands.

The CHAIRMAN. You didn't yourself trace it up through the express office to ascertain really where it came from?

Miss SMITH. I asked a man who was with the express company if it were possible that package came from an unknown address, and he said it might be possible, but wasn't probable because there was carbon copies of the bills of lading, I believe he said, made of every package sent out, and that the address of the sender was pasted on the wrapping. He said now this might have been torn off, but it is not very probable.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you examine this pamphlet and see whether you can identify it, or whether you have ever seen one like it before? [Handing witness a pamphlet.]

Have you got a copy, Mr. Jackson, of the previous hearings of this committee in which this matter is referred to—have you a copy of the part there?

Mr. JACKSON. I can go through my baggage and see—I have part of this.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that part include the report that was made by this committee to the President of the United States?

Capt. HANSON. Yes, sir; I have that.

The CHAIRMAN. You have that?

Capt. HANSON. Yes, sir; I have it.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me have a copy.

Is that similar to the document which you—

Miss SMITH. The cover is exactly the same; however, I was under the impression it was called "Intervention in Mexico," the author is the same—I was looking for some of the passages I have discussed, to see if the subject matter is the same.

The CHAIRMAN. The subject matter is the same. Was your attention called at that time that you read it over to any paragraphs in which occurred the names of Secretary Lane—

Miss SMITH. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Of the Department of the Interior, or the President of the United States, or did you read it carefully?

Miss SMITH. I did not read it carefully, because the copy that was handed to me was lost, and the other time I merely glanced over it with the consul in discussing it. At the time that matter came up, Senator Fall, I paid attention to certain passages that had been pointed out through the press, that you had called attention to.

The CHAIRMAN. In reference to the soviet?

Miss SMITH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. A comparison between the constitution of Mexico and the soviet government?

Miss SMITH. I remember that the paragraph said in the subject matter that Mexico, next to Russia, had made the greatest progress in soviet government.

The CHAIRMAN. You recognize the paragraph?

Miss SMITH. Yes; that was one of the paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that the document that I was calling your attention to, which attracted your attention, you verified?

Miss SMITH. That's what I wanted to do—was to verify it. I had your paragraphs, and I tried to verify it afterwards.

The CHAIRMAN. Your attention at that time wasn't called to the statement that occurs on page 24, of this paragraph.—

Meanwhile, Franklin K. Lane and his associates on the American-Mexican Joint Commission were attempting to browbeat the Mexicans into yielding the guarantees demanded by the Rockefellers, the Guggenheims, the Dodges, and the Dohenys. Although in explaining the expedition the President had declared that the troops would not be used in the interest of "American owners of Mexican properties" "so long as sane and honorable men are in control of the Government;" and the public statement of Lane, issued at the end of November (1916), after a long interview with the President, was nothing more nor less than an acknowledgment that the troops were being held in Mexico for that purpose and for no other, and a threat that they would remain there until an agreement was reached regarding such little matters as oil and mining taxes.

Miss SMITH. No; it was not.

The CHAIRMAN. You didn't have your attention directed by Mr. Hall or any one else to the paragraph on page 23: "The present administration's actions are well known. One day President Wilson is for a thing and the next he changes;" then quotes from his Indianapolis speech, and then from his note to Carranza of June 2, 1915. You didn't have your attention called to that?

Miss SMITH. I think that was one of the paragraphs that you had called attention to in the press.

The CHAIRMAN. In that way, at least, you identify this document as identical to the one which was handed you by Mr. Hall, and which he told the Mexican consul was bolsheviki literature? Did you, in noticing the statement that you say attracted your attention, as coming from myself as chairman of the committee with reference to this article, did you notice any statement as to how it was being disseminated?

Miss SMITH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You learned it from the statement which the press published from myself; you learned it was being disseminated through the Mexican consuls and Mexican ambassador at Washington, and that this committee had received from the Mexican ambassador at Washington?

Miss SMITH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you at that time have your attention called to the author of this document by Capt. Hanson, investigator for this committee?

The CHAIRMAN. No; I read the story. The matter rested for several days until Mr. Hall asked me for a copy of my story.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Hall asked you for a copy of your story?

Miss SMITH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What became of that story?

Miss SMITH. That copy that I gave him?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Miss SMITH. I don't know.

The CHAIRMAN. The original—what did you do with that story?

Miss SMITH. We killed that copy; it was destroyed, I suppose, but it came out in the story virtually as I wrote it.

The CHAIRMAN. I find it in the report that has not been printed, a copy of the letter of the author, but I was under the impression that there had been, and consequently you would have noticed it possibly. I may say, for the information of the public, that the author wrote that he had disposed of 5,000 copies of it to the Mexican consul at San Francisco for distribution, and if they could secure more money from the Government he would furnish additional copies of the document, which Mr. Hall pronounces Bolsheviki literature.

I thank you for your information.

Miss SMITH. You are quite welcome.

The CHAIRMAN. You may place this telegram in the record, and also the answer:

MEXICO, D. F., January 16, 1920.

Senator ALBERT B. FALL,
San Antonio, Tex.:

I acknowledge receipt of your telegram of yesterday, and am very sorry that you have not taken my telegram in the sense and spirit in which it was sent; that is to say, a really sincere and candid invitation that you would visit and see our country. Your telegram declining my invitation is nevertheless the most illuminating document that could have been written, since it gives us the opportunity of knowing the purpose of the investigation that you are carrying on. The fact is that the Government of Mexico could not invite you to come and have conferences with the rebels, but we invited you to travel and see the country; and I can assure you that there is not a railway line here you could not go in a special car under the protection of our troops, if you consider essential, to know what the opinion is of such and such a group of rebels; and if you think that the best way of ascertaining the real conditions of our country is to listen to reports instead of really and actually seeing the way the nation is living and working, I do not think I can be useful to you.

I do not think that, being as you are a man of very independent criterion, that you would not be able to see the truth even though you were our guest. I am very sorry that I can not accept your invitation to go to San Antonio, and, in fact, I do not see any purpose to my trip, since my opinion has been perfectly consistent on the point that the investigation that the Senate is carrying on is contrary to the international principles and to the respect due to the sovereignty of my country. I welcome the opportunity you have given me to change a few words and of knowing the true object of the investigation. Hoping to meet you personally some time in the future, I am most cordially, yours,

LUIS CABRERA.

SAN ANTONIO, TEX., January 17, 1920.

Hon. LUIS CABRERA,
Mexico City, D. F.

Your telegram of the 16th. I note your opinion has been "perfectly consistent that the investigation that my committee is carrying on is contrary to international principles and to the respect due to the sovereignty of your country."

I am surprised, in view of this statement, that you should have invited me to carry on this investigation in your country when you declare it contrary to international law that I should conduct it under orders from my own Government in my own country.

In suggesting that I may think that the best way of ascertaining the real conditions of your country is to listen to reports instead of actually seeing the way the nation is living, I may state to you that there are more than 200,000 former citizens of your country now under the protection of the American flag because of actions of yourself and associates, and through whom I think it possible to secure a fairly accurate picture of some, at least, of the conditions existing in Mexico. I may further call your attention to the fact that 40,000 Americans, formerly developing the farming resources of Mexico, building railroads, opening mines, constructing irrigation and power plants and building electric tramways and representing American investments approximating a total of 50 per cent of the entire tax-paying and revenue-producing wealth of Mexico, who have been driven out of your country, are now in the United States, many of them poverty stricken and are now requesting of the representatives of the American Congress a hearing as to the true conditions in Mexico resulting in the unfortunate situation in which these Americans find themselves.

I can see no impropriety, inconsistency, nor violation of national comity or international law in an investigation being carried on among these people as throwing light upon the conditions which now surround them and which may or may not be accentuated in Mexico itself.

You suggest that there is not a railway line in Mexico upon which I could not go in a special car under the protection of your troops. I have been familiar with Mexico since 1883, and until recent years, even prior to the construction of many of your railways, felt no suggestion of peril or danger to whatsoever remote districts my business might carry me in the Republic of Mexico. I regret that conditions now necessitate assurance of protection through armed forces in those traveling even as your guest upon your railways in Mexico.

I reciprocate your expressed wish that at some future time we may again meet personally.

A. B. FALL.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, swear me as a witness.

TESTIMONY OF SENATOR ALBERT B. FALL.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized.)

Senator FALL. I am going to make a statement for the record and for the public; I am going to break the silence of eight years. From time to time my colleagues and friends have insisted that I should make public a statement as to my interests in Mexico, rumors concerning which have been constantly circulated by Mexican propagandists and those possibly sincere or otherwise, knowing or unwittingly assisting in the circulation of such propaganda.

I went to Mexico in 1883; I went on horseback through eight States of the Republic. I located at Nieves, in the State of Zacatecas, about 60 miles from the station of Cañoncitos on the Mexican Central Road. I became interested in mining at Nieves. My associate in some of the mining interests was Don Jesus Pefleri, a member at that time of the Mexican Congress. I was a practical miner, a timber man—I educated certain of my Mexican laborers in timbering mines under the American system of mining; I worked with my hands with them; I had 600 men, Mexicans, the majority of whom I paid 12½ cents a day. Mexican money, and the highest paid labor at that time—picadero¹ received 50 cents a day, Mexican money; they boarded themselves. I quit Mexico in 1906, and I had for the company's control, under my charge, 8,000 men on my pay roll, the maximum wage paid to either, if my recollection serves me, was $1.50—from that to $5 or $6, and $7 per day, for Mexican labor.

I never had a concession of any kind in my life in Mexico, and knew nothing about concessions, except that in agreeing to erect public smelters or reduction works where ore might be treated for the Republic—for the public as well as for our private enterprises—I had agreements with the Mexican authorities in more than one instance that machinery for such purposes might be introduced into Mexico free of import duty, and in each instance a bond was required of me that I should faithfully perform my portion of the contract, and the prices for which ores were to be reduced or handled were fixed by the Mexican Government—the maximum price. I was interested in Mexico from 1883, in a greater or less degree, until July 12, 1906. In the latter years my interests consisted entirely of stock interests in American companies only, one the Sierra Madre Land & Lumber Co., owning and controlling some 2,217,000 acres principally in the State of Chihuahua; in certain railroad companies being developed in connection with the lumber companies and mines; in certain large mining companies which invested very heavily in Mexico. The nucleus of the mining companies were the mines which myself and an old Texan, my partner, located ourselves—found, discovered in Mexico in two or three different places in the Sierra Madres. I spent a great deal of time, both alone and in company with this partner, camping out, prospecting, and mining throughout the Sierra Madres along the line of Sonora and Chihuahua. I assisted in organizing some large companies and merged my industrial interests with them, took stock for my interest and holdings. I became, of course, well acquainted with the Mexicans in the Republic. I went there during the administration of Gonzales as President. I knew Mr. Diaz personally very well, and am proud to say that I had his friendship and his very material assistance in the various enterprises with which I was connected.

Of course I knew the prominent Mexicans, and I was in camp with and associated with the men who worked for the companies which I had control of, and came in contact with the Mexican worker or peon or laborer, and knew him as very few Mexicans of the higher class ever knew the Mexican lower class, or peon, or pelado. In July, 1906, I severed my connection with every company or interest which I had in Mexico except that I retained a personal power of attorney for my partner, who had a great many million dollars invested there, and who was to me much more than a business associate or partner. In 1907 and 1908 this partner became very deeply involved in Mexico, largely through indorsements for the companies in which we had been jointly interested. His health was very bad, he was compelled to leave the United States and take a sea voyage to Japan, and all his property was deeply involved, and I arose from a sick bed and went down to take charge of his business, without remuneration, for the purpose of saving something of the business for his family of little children. He died shortly afterwards. In winding up his business affairs I became personally interested in certain mining claims in the district of Jesus Maria de Ocampo in the State of Chihuahua. I disposed of those interests for his account and mine and that of a large number of Mexican creditors, to an American syndicate, and formed what is known as the Sierra Mines Co. (Ltd.). So, disposing of my interests I received $75,000, par value of the stock of the company. I yet have that stock in my possession. That is my only interest in Mexico of any kind or character.

In my operations in Chihuahua I became very well acquainted with Gen. Luis Terrazas, who was the war general of that State, the man who had driven Maximilian out of the State and who had enabled Benito Juarez to make headway against the French when Juarez was a fugitive in El Paso, Tex. I have always been proud of the acquaintance and friendship with Gen. Terrazas. After the battle of Chihuahua, when Mercado was driven from that State, came through Ojinaga and took refuge with his soldiers in this State, I received from Gen. Luis Terrazas, who came out through Ojinaga with Mercado, a telegram asking me to meet him in the city of El Paso. I did so, and would have gone to meet him under any circumstances. He spoke to me of conditions in Mexico and particularly of the incarceration of his son, Luis, Chico, as I know him and had known for 20 years or more, by Villa; that Villa was demanding $500,000 ransom for him, and asked me to assist if possible in securing his release. He had some business disagreements with an American in El Paso touching a cattle contract, and at the same time a suit was brought against him there for a large amount, I think $185,000. He asked me to assist in the settlement of that suit. I did so, paying to the American, I think, $26,000 in full settlement, and taking his receipts in favor of Gen. Terrazas for that amount. I was never the attorney for Gen. Terrazas; I was never interested with him in any business transaction of any kind or character, nor with any member of his family, nor with Governor Creel, who was his son-in-law, nor with any member of his family. I never, as an attorney, represented any American interests in Mexico except those which I had assisted in organizing, and in which I had the stock interests which I have referred to. I never owned a dollar of oil stock in my life. I never represented an oil company in Mexico. I worked for $3.50 a day on the hammer in quartz mining with Ed Doheny. I think very highly of him, and personally I would do anything possible to assist him. I have many friends who have been interested in Mexico, who are in the United States, for whom I have the same feeling. I have very many friends among the Mexicans who are fugitives and are being protected under our flag here, for whom I have the very warmest feeling.

I represent a constituency, the majority of whom, more than 55 per cent, are of the Mexican blood. Any prominence which I may have achieved politically I owe to Mexican people. I am their one representative in the Congress of the United States. I have a very great and sincere, deep and abiding affection for the Mexican people in general. Since I have been in the Senate I have had in my office at one time representatives of Huerta, of Carranza, of Villa, and of the old Cientifico element, all consulting me, and I think telling me everything that they knew or thought, and asking advice. I should have said, in speaking of the Cientifico element, representatives of Gen. Felix Diaz himself personally.

As to my ideas as to what should have been done with reference to Mexican affairs, it is not necessary for me to mention them now. Any recommendation hereafter made by this committee as to what shall be done with reference to Mexico, if anything, such recommendation will be made upon the record of this case, in so far as I am concerned. This committee was appointed by the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate, of which I am a member, upon a resolution introduced in the Senate by Senator King, of Utah; he is not a member of the Foreign Relations. It was reported back unanimously from the Foreign Relations Committee, and I was directed to make such verbal report to the Senate. I did so, and the resolution providing for the appointment of the committee was adopted unanimously by the United States Senate, without dissenting voice. I may say that it was understood that in any committee that was appointed that I would be a member of it, because of my long knowledge of Mexico and of the Latin American, my familiarity with the language and the laws. I devoted five years of my time to the civil law of Mexico, and had seven prominent Mexican attorneys on my staff for more than seven years there.

I was appointed without any division of sentiment, political or otherwise, just as I have been appointed by the same authority as the chairman of the committee on Colombian affairs, handling the Colombian treaty and Colombian oil matters, etc., at issue between the United States and Colombia. No question of politics has ever arisen in any of these things. After this committee was appointed I was directed to formulate a resolution providing for its procedure, and giving me authority to use any amount of money whatsoever necessary, not limiting the amount. The two resolutions are the broadest which the Senate has ever adopted in authorization of any investigation. The committee is authorized to go anywhere and has all powers that the Senate of the United States can vest in a committee. Except by propagandists, or those knowingly or unknowingly influenced by certain propagandists, no question has ever been raised of the good faith of this committee. I have had my attention called to an editorial recently appearing in one of the great papers of the State of Texas under date of January 13, and I want to say now that what has occurred here to-day with reference to the newspaper story which was attempted to be sent out, concerning myself—not that, but rather more, this editorial has caused me to make the statement which I have just made, and which is my last word on this subject. It is an astounding thing to me that any great American paper would reflect upon the American people and the American Congress by questioning the motives of a committee appointed as this committee has been appointed.

It is hard for me to understand it. But my resentment is not because of personal criticism—that I have never replied to until this moment—but it is because such an editorial, and such efforts as have been made from time to time to attack this committee, are, under the circumstances, a reflection upon the Senate of the United States and upon the departments of this Government with which this Government is so cordially cooperating. I have no personal resentment in a matter of this kind. I do not propose to be drawn into any further controversy in this matter, but I make this statement for the benefit of the public.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will go into executive session now to hear some of these witnesses who desire to testify. No further public hearing to-day.

MONDAY, JANUARY 19, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The subcommittee met pursuant to adjournment at 10.30 o'clock a. m. in the pink room of the Gunter Hotel, San Antonio, Tex.

Present: Senator Smith and Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee.

TESTIMONY OF G. O. DELAMAIN.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator SMITH. What is your name?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Delamain.

Senator SMITH. Where were you born?

Mr. DELAMAIN. New Zealand, Christs Church.

Senator SMITH. British subject?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. You are a citizen, then, of the British Empire?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Have you ever had any experiences in Mexico?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. When?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Well, since—I lived in Mexico since 1891.

Senator SMITH. Well, will you please tell us your experiences there, when you went, and what business you were on, and what resulted in your own way—the history of what happened there?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Well, I went into the—I went into the sheep business when I first went to Mexico near Muzquiz, Coahuila, until 1902; after that I was up on the La Babia property of Gen. Geronimo Trevino.

Senator SMITH. A little louder; I can not hear.

Mr. DELAMAIN. On the property of Gen. Geronimo Trevino, on the La Babia; then I was in the cattle business.

Senator SMITH. Where?

Mr. DELAMAIN. In the cattle business?

Senator SMITH. Where?

Mr. DELAMAIN. On the La Babia property.

Senator SMITH. Well, you went into the cattle business there. Who owned the cattle?

Mr. DELAMAIN. I did.

Senator SMITH. You? How did you obtain the property on which you were keeping the cattle?

Mr. DELAMAIN. I was renting it.

Senator SMITH. From whom?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Gen. Trevino.

Senator SMITH. Who is he?

Mr. DELAMAIN. He is dead now.

Senator SMITH. I know, but who was he?

Mr. DELAMAIN. He was a general in the Mexican Army, and he was at the time the chief of the third zone—military zone—in Mexico, in Monterrey.

Senator SMITH. What year was that?

Mr. DELAMAIN. 19—just about the time—in 1902.

Senator SMITH. Well, what happened?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Well, nothing happened until after the Madero revolution.

Senator SMITH. Well, what happened then—well, up to the Madero revolution you had no trouble of any kind?

Mr. DELAMAIN. No trouble of any kind.

Senator SMITH. Did you know of any trouble in that whole community up to the Madero revolution?

Mr. DELAMAIN. No, sir; none whatever.

Senator SMITH. Well, after that what happened?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Well, the first trouble we had was when Gen. Caraveo came through from the State of Chihuahua.

Senator SMITH. Well, go ahead.

Mr. DELAMAIN. He passed my ranch and took pretty well everything he could get, except the stock; he didn't take any stock more than kill some cattle. He took my provisions and everything else that he could take off, and my wife's property—all her clothes, provisions, and all the arms, and saddles, and bridles, and everything else on the ranch.

Senator SMITH. In your immediate neighborhood were there other foreigners?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Who were they?

Mr. DELAMAIN. The Piedra Blanca Cattle Co.

Senator SMITH. Who were they?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Blocker, Jennings, and Moore.

Senator SMITH. How many foreigners were in that immediate neighborhood at that time, estimating, just guessing at it?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Well, only three, three different ranches.

Senator SMITH. How far were they from you?

Mr. DELAMAIN. They were about 20 miles each on different sides.

Senator SMITH. Now, what happened after this first visit and the property you spoke of was taken—after the visit of which you spoke, Caraveo?

Mr. DELAMAIN. We had no more trouble at all until the Carranza revolution.

Senator SMITH. How long was that?

Mr. DELAMAIN. That must have been pretty near a year afterwards. It was after the assassination of President Madero.

Senator SMITH. When the Carranza revolution started, then what was the next thing you met with in the country in the shape of difficulties?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Only the different parties of men passing through going from Coahuila to Chihuahua—Carranza's men.

Senator SMITH. Well, what happened; what did they do to you?

Mr. DELAMAIN. They used to take horses and kill bunches of cattle—take cattle.

Senator SMITH. How long did that continue?

Mr. DELAMAIN. That continued practically until I left Mexico.

Senator SMITH. When did you leave?

Mr. DELAMAIN. In 1915.

Senator SMITH. What relations did you have with those Carranza people—what interviews did you have with them—what reason, if any, were they giving for taking your stock?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Necessity—that they needed them—that they had to have them for the purpose of feeding their men.

Senator SMITH. Did you know Mr. Sebastian Carranza?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Who was he?

Mr. DELAMAIN. He was a nephew of President Venustiano Carranza.

Senator SMITH. What relation did you have with him or he with you?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Merely I used to go to see him to try to prevent him from taking my stock horses.

Senator SMITH. Did you succeed in preventing him?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Not at all, sir.

Senator SMITH. Were your horses taken by these Carranza people?

Mr. DELAMAIN. All of them, except this first case of Caraveo.

Senator SMITH. You told us about that?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. I mean from that time on?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. You were captured—were you captured by anybody?

Mr. DELAMAIN. I was captured in 1916, but that was after I had gone to the Piedra Blanca Cattle Co. ranch, after I had gone to take charge of the Piedra Blanca.

Senator SMITH. Who owned that ranch?

Mr. DELAMAIN. The Piedra Blanca Cattle Co.

Senator SMITH. The same one that you spoke of?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Well, what happened there?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Well, the same thing practically happened there; they took all the horses and stock and crops and everything else there; the whole time.

Senator SMITH. Well, what happened in your capture?

Mr. DELAMAIN. I was captured by Maj. Felipe Musquiz Castillo.

Senator SMITH. Was he a Carrancista?

Mr. DELAMAIN. He was an officer in the Carranza army.

Senator SMITH. Where were you captured?

Mr. DELAMAIN. I was captured at Conejo, on the Piedra Blanca.

Senator SMITH. Anyone with you?

Mr. DELAMAIN. No—my family was there.

Senator SMITH. What did they do?

Mr. DELAMAIN. They took me away, and held me 10½ days, until I paid a ransom.

Senator SMITH. A ransom?

Mr. DELAMAIN. A ransom of $2,000.

Senator SMITH. They held you for that?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. And the ransom was paid?

Mr. DELAMAIN. The ransom was paid by the Piedra Blanca Cattle Co.

Senator SMITH. Did you know one Mr. Fred Hillcourt?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Hillcourt? Yes, sir; a very old friend of mine.

Senator SMITH. Where was he living?

Mr. DELAMAIN. He was living at his ranch, at the Encantada.

Senator SMITH. What became of him?

Mr. DELAMAIN. He was murdered by Felipe Musquiz Castillo—with his family.

Senator SMITH. Well, that was the same man that held you for ransom?

Mr. DELAMAIN. The same man; yes, sir; it was afterwards.

Senator SMITH. Do you know anything about the conditions of the murder—why he was shot?

Mr. DELAMAIN. He was ordered to—Musquiz sent him an order to leave the ranch; that he wanted the cattle; and Mr. Hillcourt refused to leave; so he went in and murdered them all and threw them down in the well?

Senator SMITH. Murdered them all?

Mr. DELAMAIN. All of them.

Senator SMITH. Who did he kill?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Mr. Hillcourt and Mrs. Hillcourt, their son, Gerasha, and their daughter.

Senator SMITH. Who was he?

Mr. DELAMAIN. He was an English subject.

Senator SMITH. What became of the property there?

Mr. DELAMAIN. It was abandoned, of course; nothing has been done with it since.

Senator SMITH. Well, the live stock and movable property?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Well, that was probably taken by Musquiz.

Senator SMITH. Did you know a man down there by the name of Pat Malone?

Mr. DELAMAIN. No; I did not know him personally.

Senator SMITH. Did you know of him?

Mr. DELAMAIN. I knew of him.

Senator SMITH. Do you know anything about his being held for ransom?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Not more than that he was held.

Senator SMITH. You know that he was?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Yes, sir. That was after I left Mexico.

Senator SMITH. That was after you left?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Now, about this ransom of—you don't know the amount of ransom required in the Pat Malone case?

Mr. DELAMAIN. No, sir.

Senator SMITH. Do you know anything about the Carrancista officers knowing of any ransom sent by Maj. Castillo?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Yes, sir; Felipe Musquiz Castillo.

Senator SMITH. What became of Castillo, if you know?

Mr. DELAMAIN. He was shot at the—he was captured by the Carrancista soldiers and shot at Conejo.

Senator SMITH. Who was he?

Mr. DELAMAIN. He was a major in the Carranza army.

Senator SMITH. And he was caught by his own men?

Mr. DELAMAIN. He was caught by his own men, men sent out by President Carranza.

Senator SMITH. And shot. Where did you go after leaving Mexico?

Mr. DELAMAIN. I came here to San Antonio, and then I went from here to England.

Senator SMITH. Did you go into the army there?

Mr. DELAMAIN. No; I worked in the war office.

Senator SMITH. In England?

Mr. DELAMAIN. Yes, sir; in England.

Senator SMITH. Did you have a son there in the war?

Mr. DELAMAIN. I had a son killed in the war, and I had a second son who has been demobilized.

Senator SMITH. All right, thank you, that is all.

TESTIMONY OF FRED WELSH.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator SMITH. Where do you live?

Mr. WELSH. I live at Hidalgo.

Senator SMITH. Where were you born?

Mr. WELSH. I was born in England.

Senator SMITH. You are an American citizen or an English?

Mr. WELSH. I am an American citizen.

Senator SMITH. When were you naturalized?

Mr. WELSH. I was naturalized in 1887 at Ottawa, Ill.

Senator SMITH. Since which time you have remained in America?

Mr. WELSH. Remained in America; yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. And lived in the United States?

Mr. WELSH. Lived in the United States all the time.

Senator SMITH. You live in Hidalgo?

Mr. WELSH. I live at Hidalgo now.

Senator SMITH. Will you please tell the committee what depredations, if any, you suffered, whether you had property in Mexico, or whether it was on this side of the line, and what you suffered from the incursions?

Mr. WELSH. I lost three valuable mares that were taken on the 3d of May. I notified the officers—

Mr. JACKSON. What year?

Mr. WELSH. 1918.

Senator SMITH. Whereabouts?

Mr. WELSH. At Hidalgo.

Senator SMITH. On the American side?

Mr. WELSH. On the American side; yes. And I notified the military authorities and we went and traced the mares across to where they took them on this side and we traced the men back to our place. There were four men came to my farm and we traced them back, and we traced one man to the "jacal" that was on this side—the instrument on this side to help the ones on the other side to pick out—they were allotted to pick them out, I think, and we captured him—the military officer captured him and took him to Hidalgo, and Mr. Beeson, the inspector there, went across and notified the Carranza officers in Reynosa about my losses.

Mr. JACKSON. What place?

Mr. WELSH. Reynosa; it is just opposite from Hidalgo. And they went—the Carranza soldiers went out and took these animals from the bandits and brought them up to Reynosa, and Gen. Ramos, he sent a captain over to Mr. Beeson to make arrangements to get these animals back to me. While they were there this captain claimed he was insulted by some of our officers, or somebody there that said they were a band of grafters and that if Welsh would only give them a ransom like the other farmers that he would have no trouble to get their stock back again. Some of the men who had lost stock before I lost mine had given a hundred dollars or two hundred and they just naturally got their stock back. I said the only thing I would give them a reward for was if they would hang the men on the other side so they wouldn't steal anybody else's stock; I didn't propose to bribe anybody to protect mine. They went back and Mr. Beeson went over again and he said they refused to give up the stock, and they put them on the car and took them away. That is all I have heard from them since.

Senator SMITH. That was the regular—

Mr. WELSH. That was the regular Carranza officer, Gen. Ramos. The cases are all on file in the Intelligence office at Brownsville. Before that I lost considerable stock at odd times, but I could never trace it, my pastures are away off and I could not track them, for I could not tell where they went, but this time, it was a very wet night, and the tracks were sunk in 6 inches, and any fool could track them. It was a very wet night. They made a big fuss and the dog barked and there were two stationed about 5 rods from the house, just waiting for me to come out. My wife woke me up. I sleep pretty sound and I didn't hear them very likely, and my wife said next morning it was a good thing I did not wake up because I might have been shot myself. They took the mares, and we got track of them. I lost about $600 or $700 worth of stuff, besides that, at different times, but we could not trace them. I heard there was some of that over there, but I could never locate them. I didn't like to go over there, it was not worth going over there after. I would rather stand the loss than risk my life. I think that is all I know about it.

Senator SMITH. What do you know of the general depredations of the Carranza forces along the border in your neighborhood?

Mr. WELSH. Only just petty thieving. I have never heard of anybody being killed or anybody being injured close there.

Senator SMITH. As to the constancy of that depredation going on across the line—

Mr. WELSH. Yes, sir; just all the time even up to this time.

Senator SMITH. Who is in control on the opposite side of the line down there now, the Carranza people?

Mr. WELSH. Carranza; yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. And were all during the depredations of which you speak?

Mr. WELSH. No, sir; not all the time. The Villa troops were there for a short time. At the time they went to Matamoros, they were going to take Matamoros and got beaten out and went back again, that was about three or four years ago I think.

Senator SMITH. That is all.

TESTIMONY OF W. E. FRASIER.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator SMITH. Where do you live?

Mr. FRASIER. I am making my home at present at El Campo, Tex.

Senator SMITH. You are an American citizen?

Mr. FRASIER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Born in the United States?

Mr. FRASIER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. What experiences have you had in Mexico; have you ever lived there?

Mr. FRASIER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. When did you go?

Mr. FRASIER. I went into Mexico first in 1903.

Senator SMITH. Well, go on and tell us the history of your life there and what happened.

Mr. FRASIER. Well, now, that is a great big tale to tell.

Senator SMITH. I know; make it as brief as possible; just the facts.

Mr. FRASIER. I went first in 1903, and I liked the country and I liked the conditions there, seemingly, and as we had guaranties from both Governments—the colonists had guaranties that went in there from both Governments—and I thought it was a good thing. I bought some property while there, and at that time came back, and went again in 1904. I liked it still better and bought some more and I moved my family there in 1905, and went into business, trading and buying some land and trying to raise some stock, and a general mercantile business. I stayed on from that until the Madero revolution without a flaw, without a kick, nothing seemed to be better, it was all good up to the Madero revolution and even during the Madero revolution we weren't molested hardly in any way. Hardly any petty larceny was committed, if it was, it was very small. After the Madero revolution troubles commenced. During the Huerta régime we had trouble, we had troubles with all, but with the Federal Government the worst. It seemed that our colonists suffered worse from the Federal Government than it did from the rebel government.

Senator SMITH. What was the Federal Government at that time?

Mr. FRASIER. Well, the Federal Government at the time that the first depredations started out, was under Huerta, and it went from one to the other, and it finally came on down to Carranza, and he got charge of it; he has got it yet, and during his reign we suffered the worst.

Senator SMITH. You speak of "we"?

Mr. FRASIER. I mean the colony at large.

Senator SMITH. What colony was that?

Mr. FRASIER. The Blalock Colony, of Mexico.

Senator SMITH. We had Mr. Blalock on the stand?

Mr. FRASIER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. You were in that same neighborhood?

Mr. FRASIER. Yes, sir; I was not one of the colonists—one of the first settlers—I went in the second year.

Senator SMITH. Do you know about any outrages committed; if so, by whom, against any Americans?

Mr. FRASIER. Well, there were so many of those outrages committed, and so many different times, it is hard for me to keep data. I kept posted on those things every day. I kept a diary of all the news I heard that transpired; I kept a diary of it; but that, with every other paper I had that was worth a cent in the world, was destroyed, consequently I am short on that. I can recollect the incidents, but can not recollect it all.

Senator SMITH. Then, you say that all the data you carefully kept was destroyed, and that you have to depend on memory?

Mr. FRASIER. Yes, sir; I have to depend on memory.

Senator SMITH. Do you remember anything about the case of an American girl—any outrage committed by the Federal soldiers at Tampico?

Mr. FRASIER. Well, in or near Tampico; it was a family by the name of Gourd, Gourd was the name; I was not acquainted with them, some of our colonists were acquainted with them, but I was not. I believe I saw the two girls, women, I think I did, when we came out of there in 1913—well, in fact I know I did; they were pointed out to me, and then I saw this man Gourd there, and I saw the two women. They said they were his daughters.

Senator SMITH. You know nothing personally about it?

Mr. FRASIER. No, sir; I know nothing personally about it, only just from hearsay, that was all I know about that, and the depredation was pretty tolerably tough, the way I can gather.

Senator SMITH. What was the feeling of the Carranza officers down there, did you hear their expression generally as to the Americans?

Mr. FRASIER. Well, not very good.

Senator SMITH. Well, were they very bad?

Mr. FRASIER. Well, you might term it bad; if you was at the point of a gun—I have been punched in the belly several different times by those people.

Senator SMITH. For what?

Mr. FRASIER. Just because I would not dance when they wanted me to. I have been punched around at various times a right smart by the different people at different times—that is, the Federal troops; that is, it was this Castro's bunch passed through our country at that time, about 750 strong, and part of his men came in at night and demanded that I go to my corral and get the horses out for them, and I told them I would not do it—if they was a mind to take my horses they would have to take them, but I wouldn't give them to them. They threw down a rope and told me to give it to them or they would kill me, and I told them they can go on and kill me, just go on with their killing, I am not going to do it. One of them dismounted with his gun presented and the other two rode up on either side and punched me around a right smart with their guns and scared my family pretty bad, to a considerable extent; they thought they were going to kill me, and I didn't know whether they would or not, but I refused to go get the horse. Finally they had a peon fellow, they had him go and get it. Well, they turned a little sheep of a pony into my pen, and it stayed there during the night, and it looked like it needed feeding pretty bad, and I fed it.

The next morning I reported to one of the officers, I do not know his name now, and I told him about it and he told me to point them out. I pointed out one, because he had my horse, and he went to him and drew his sword and I thought that I would get to see a little sight, the way he talked. I imagined that there would be a head rolling around there somewhere, but he got down there and waved his sword around him considerable, and brought him on back and told me to go down there and get it and put that horse back. I told him I didn't take it out and it was up to him to have it put back. So he went and had him take his horse and put him back and took out the little pony. Well, they didn't do anything serious to any of us there, only palavered around a little while and got what beef cattle they needed. That was all they did there. They had shot into the houses of some of the colonists, just before they got to my place, these same men, but they didn't kill anybody.

Senator SMITH. After the Vera Cruz incident things got a little worse, didn't they?

Mr. FRASIER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Well, do you know anything about robbery by the Carranza soldiers of any American just after this Vera Cruz incident?

Mr. FRASIER. Well, I have heard of it, but personally knowing it, I did not see it.

Senator SMITH. You do not know anything about that except from general reports, hearsay?

Mr. FRASIER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Do you know a man by the name of McElroy or Medlin?

Mr. FRASIER. Yes, sir; there was Medlins and McElroys there.

Senator SMITH. What became of them?

Mr. FRASIER. They are out in the States somewhere, I don't know whereabouts; they are in the States somewhere, the McElroys are, and some of the Medlins.

Senator SMITH. Well, were they held?

Mr. FRASIER. Were they held in captivity?

Senator SMITH. Yes.

Mr. FRASIER. I don't know, sir.

Senator SMITH. Don't know whether they had any ransom paid?

Mr. FRASIER. Well, you see, I came out in 1916; there might have been something happened afterwards, but I do not remember of these people being held for ransom while I was there.

Senator SMITH. Very likely it was after you left.

Mr. FRASIER. Yes, sir; because they were out in and around Tampico and up and around our ranch after I left there, the Medlin's were, considerably.

Senator SMITH. Down at Ocampo do you know of the killing of anyone down there by Carranza soldiers?

Mr. FRASIER. Any Americans at Ocampo?

Senator SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRASIER. No, sir; I do not. There were several American citizens killed at our ranch, but we were 12 miles from Ocampo, west of us 12 miles.

Senator SMITH. Who was killed on your ranch?

Mr. FRASIER. Well, I believe about the first man that was killed on our ranch was a man by the name of Brooks, supposedly killed by the Mexicans. He had some trouble with a Mexican down there about a girl, and got some stuff at my place, got some groceries, and there on the mountain he was killed before he got home; and it was supposed to be by a Mexican, and I believe it was from the evidence.

Senator SMITH. What were the initials of Brooks?

Mr. FRASIER. I do not know. Mr. Blalock, you know.

Mr. G. E. BLALOCK (from the audience). Bill Brooks.

Senator SMITH. Mr. Blalock has testified.

Mr. FRASIER. It was supposed that he was killed by this Mexican from the evidence that I gathered, and the evidence that I gathered came in peculiarly, but maybe you would like to have it. I sold shot as well as other stuff there at my store, and had ordered some shot from Tampico and they sent me out "blue whistlers."

Senator SMITH. Buckshot?

Mr. FRASIER. No; bigger than buckshot, great big shot. There was no shotgun there that could use that hardly at all, and there was one Mexican, it was the Mexican who was supposed to have killed this man, who bought some of this shot; he bought a great many, he would kill a great many deer with it, and he always put seven of these shot in his shell; and this man was shot with seven of those big bullets.

Senator SMITH. Do you know of anyone else that had such shot in the country?

Mr. FRASIER. No, sir; I do not. In fact, I was the only man that was selling shot in the country.

Senator SMITH. Did they ever try him for that?

Mr. FRASIER. Well, they had a little trial and it was all bosh; we have learned that.

Senator SMITH. Do you know anything about the wife and sister-in-law of I. M. Voight?

Mr. FRASIER. No, sir; I do not. I have heard something about that, but I don't know anything positive about it.

Senator SMITH. Do you know anything about the killing of Randle?

Mr. FRASIER. Yes, sir; I do.

Senator SMITH. What about it?

Mr. FRASIER. He was killed on our ranch. I reckon that was about 1909 or 1910; along there; possibly it was as late as 1910. I had it in my diary, but I have not got it now. He was murdered by—as it was proven afterwards—three or four different Mexicans. There was one, I suppose, lying down in the wagon, watching, giving signals; that is the way they told it, as to when he was coming, which direction, etc. They came on into his house and murdered him in his house, and cut him all to pieces with machetes, and then robbed and carried over there to his well. I know he was robbed because he had money; he was at my place the day before this occurred and he had quite an amount of money, and the money that I saw taken from the Mexicans they said had killed him.

Senator SMITH. Did they ever try them for that?

Mr. FRASIER. These Mexicans that killed him, they were tried in a way; the evidence was conclusive and they were bound to find them guilty; they found those Mexicans guilty; I saw the three gentlemen in strings, elbow to elbow. I was going to Tampico to buy goods, and I saw them at the station; they told me they were carrying them to Victoria to shoot them, execute them.

Senator SMITH. How far was it from your ranch to Victoria?

Mr. FRASIER. From their ranch, I think 80 miles; something near 80 miles.

Senator SMITH. They gave no reason for carrying them that distance?

Mr. FRASIER. Victoria was the capital of the State, and they carried them up there to have a good thing of it.

Senator SMITH. Did you ever hear of those men afterwards?

Mr. FRASIER. Yes, sir. They afterwards, some of them, came back to our ranch instead of "putting the bud" to them, they put them in the army as a punishment, to serve out their term there, I do not know how long, but anyhow they were seen at our ranch afterwards, some of them; I do not know whether all of them were, but I saw one of them, he looked liked the same Mexican. All coons look alike, they say, and very nearly all Mexicans look alike; unless you are very well acquainted with them you can not recall them very well.

Senator SMITH. I appreciate the difficulty. Say, did they ever have you prisoner down there?

Mr. FRASIER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Whereabouts?

Mr. FRASIER. At Ocampo.

Senator SMITH. What for?

Mr. FRASIER. For kicking a Mexican out of my house.

Senator SMITH. And they arrested you and held you there? How long?

Mr. FRASIER. Oh, three or four days.

Senator SMITH. How came you to kick the Mexican out of your house?

Mr. FRASIER. Well, the first of it, I had sold the Mexican a sewing machine on the installment plan—to pay for it every week—for the machine. He paid the first week—he was a shoemaker, and he used this machine in sewing leather, and his wife used it also in sewing garments, so in our transaction it was stipulated before a witness—you have to have things witnessed before a Mexican contract—and it was witnessed at that time, to pay me an installment every week. Well, he went on until he paid a little bit of it, and paid by letting me have shoes at a stipulated price to sell in the store. I would take these shoes and credit him; and he had a tendency to drink right smart, when he could get it, and he got in the habit that instead of selling me shoes, he would sell them to somebody else and drink it up. His wife came over and told me that Federico was drinking up all the money, and she didn't believe that he could pay for the machine.

He and his wife both went into the trade to pay for that, I told her I couldn't do anything in regard to that, he would have to come around and pay, because the time was pretty well up for him to pay for the machine, there was only a part of it paid, a small part at that. Well, he came over with a pair of shoes, and he wouldn't sell them to me only except for the money. I told him that I would not pay him the money on them, that I wanted the machine paid out. He told me not to have any fear, that he would soon have plenty of money. He was drinking some then and he went off with the shoes and sold them to another party. He said his brother was in there, or his wife's brother, I disremember which, they wanted to have a "fiesta," they could get the whisky and get on a pretty big drunk, so they got the money from somebody else, and during the time his wife hollered to us, I went across the street where she was at, and she said, "Federico is 'mucho barracho'"; that is, drunk. I said, "Well, you are going to have to do something with him, or you will lose that machine." I told her I could not do anything with him. I went on back to my place of business, and he came on up there, and I told her that he would either have to lose that machine or pay for it, that there was no 27 ways about it, that I could not give it to him, I would have to have the money or the machine; he got awful mad and he came over to my place of business. They generally carry a blanket with them, whenever they have something up their sleeve. A man by the name of Smith was doing my freighting. He came in, abusing me, and I told him I didn't want to have anything to do with him, that he was drunk. He didn't want to get out and I pushed him out. He came in and I pushed him out again. He came in and that time he made a scratch on my face, and I just gathered him by the shoulder, and that blanket, and I put him out of that house, and as I undertook to throw him out of the door—it had a little gallery—his blanket slipped and I threw him down on the floor and his face struck the corner of a box somewhere along here [indicating] and it bled a little bit, and he turned to kick me, and of course I was some kicker, too, and I kicked him until he said he would be good.

Well, we went out from there and my friends told me—my Mexican friends told me—they said "There will not be anything to this; he has laid himself liable, as you can prove, and there will be nothing to it; let him go."—As I didn't do anything, he had me arrested and put in jail. It didn't cost me much.

Senator SMITH. How long were you in jail?

Mr. FRASIER. About four days.

Senator SMITH. And got out?

Mr. FRASIER. Yes, sir; paid out.

Senator SMITH. When did you come away from Mexico?

Mr. FRASIER. The last time I came out on August 4, 1916.

Senator SMITH. 1916?

Mr. FRASIER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Now, what became of all the movable property that you and the colonists and all those people had that were down there?

Mr. FRASIER. I think the bulk of it went up; mine did.

Senator SMITH. What do you mean by going up?

Mr. FRASIER. Into the hands of those fellows that were there to receive it—they got it—both sides got it; but I think from what I can gather—I think the Federal side got the bulk of ours. When I came out in 1913 I left quite a stock of stuff there of various classes. I have never gotten anything out of that. I had a considerable store full of goods, and I never got anything out of it, except when I was there in 1915 I sold for such money as I could get; I had to sell for that or they would take it. They would count the money no good; I would either have to take that or something else, but while it was good I could buy something to eat with it just the same as anybody else. But finally I came out; I was not stocked up much.

Senator SMITH. What is the hope, as you see down there, for any law or order?

Mr. FRASIER. There has got to be one made.

Senator SMITH. There is none there now?

Mr. FRASIER. No, sir.

Senator SMITH. There has not been since the revolution started?

Mr. FRASIER. Practically none.

Senator SMITH. That will do.

TESTIMONY OF DR. JOHN HUNTER.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator SMITH. Where were you born?

Dr. HUNTER. I was born in Hamilton, Ontario.

Senator SMITH. Are you an American or British subject?

Dr. HUNTER. American.

Senator SMITH. Where were you naturalized?

Dr. HUNTER. Never was; my parents just happened to be on a visit there, so I am told.

Senator SMITH. Oh, I meant whether you are an American citizen?

Dr. HUNTER. I am an American citizen.

Senator SMITH. So, you were born there, but you were born of American parents?

Dr. HUNTER. Yes, sir; they were just on a visit.

Senator SMITH. And ever since you have been exercising the rights of an American citizen; have lived in the United States principally?

Dr. HUNTER. Yes, sir. I have lived in Mexico quite a while.

Senator SMITH. All right. I will get to that in a minute. What is your profession?

Dr. HUNTER. Medicine.

Senator SMITH. Where were you practicing before you went to Mexico?

Dr. HUNTER. I was practicing in Hawaii.

Senator SMITH. Where?

Dr. HUNTER. I was practicing in the islands of Hawaii, before I went to Mexico; I was practicing in New York before I went to Hawaii.

Senator SMITH. When did you go to Mexico?

Dr. HUNTER. In 1906; I entered at Nogales.

Senator SMITH. Where did you land in Mexico?

Dr. HUNTER. Hermosillo.

Senator SMITH. Will you please succinctly try—it is not necessary for me to ask you the questions; you know the history of your experience there. Will you commence with your advent into Mexico and detail as briefly as you can your experiences there?

Dr. HUNTER. I went into Mexico partly an invalid; I was ill, and I went into Mexico at the invitation of Dr. Johnson, of Tennessee, to visit him at his mine on the Yaqui River in Sonora. At that time the Yaquis were on the war path, and they were killing about a man a day. I stayed there about a month and went back to Guaymas, and from there I went to the mine called Lluvia de Oro.

Senator SMITH. Where was that?

Dr. HUNTER. I believe that was in the edge of Chihuahua; it may be, they are right near where Chihuahua and Sinaloa come together. I am not positive which side they are in now. These mines shut down to build—I became physician to the mines, and they shut down to build a new mill, which would take them two years, but it took them longer than that. I started back to the States, and on the way I made arrangements to go back to the mines in the State of Sinaloa, and I stayed there for a while and went to—I left there because I found it was a wild-cat mine, and I went to Culiacan and established a practice there. I came back to the States, however, before I located in Culiacan. This was in the time of Diaz, and I went to Chihuahua and got some mules and an Indian guide; he could not speak English and I could not speak Spanish then, and I went across the Sierra Madre Mountains to the west coast alone, and I slept anywhere that night would catch me. In the little towns on the water—they all build on water courses when they could, they did not want to be where there is no water—I would sleep in the edge of the towns, in the center of the towns, in the woods, or anywhere, without the slightest uneasiness at all, and I went on without any trouble. Now I hardly want to stay anywhere in any house anywhere in Mexico. I went to Culiacan and I practiced nearly two years there.

Senator SMITH. Now, conditions changed from the days of the—who was in control of Mexico; who was President of Mexico at that time?

Dr. HUNTER. Diaz.

Senator SMITH. Now, coming on down—what the committee wants to get at is the conditions down there; what you have seen with your own eyes?

Dr. HUNTER. Well, they changed very materially after the revolution started—the Madero revolution.

Senator SMITH. Do you know a man by the name of Kelley, a mining-engineer?

Dr. HUNTER. Yes; sir; very well.

Senator SMITH. Where was he living?

Dr. HUNTER. At the El Favor mine, in Jalisco?

Senator SMITH. What year was that?

Dr. HUNTER. 1912 and 1913, and up to 1914.

Senator SMITH. Did they have mines down there?

Dr. HUNTER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. What became of them?

Dr. HUNTER. Of the mines?

Senator SMITH. Yes.

Dr. HUNTER. I do not know; I left them there.

Senator SMITH. The mines are still there?

Dr. HUNTER. Yes, sir; but that is about all the property, though. Mr. Neal, I understand, who was manager at that time, is back in Mexico.

Senator SMITH. Do you know whether any of that property was destroyed by dynamite there?

Dr. HUNTER. No; I do not know that the property was destroyed by dynamite. I know they tried to destroy my house with dynamite.

Senator SMITH. That is what I am trying to get at. Where were you then?

Dr. HUNTER. I was in a house that I occupied down on a large gulch that ran below the mine, and below the plateau, on which the residences of the mine workmen were—where they lived, and they had a store. And I had built about a 10-foot rock fence around it with a tower in each corner, and there was an opening in each side of the tower; and one time we were notified that Julian Medina, a noted bandit, was coming down to the mine, and Mr. Neal telephoned me to come up to the mine as quickly as possible, and I went up to the mine; I had a shotgun and a pistol and I carried them with me. He said, "You are just in time; they will be here in 20 minutes." There were four of us there, Mr. Hardley, Mr. Williams, Mr. Neal, and myself, and we held a council of war, and we all decided to fight them. We got into those towers and held them off until we could get aid from Gen. del Toro, who was stationed at Hostotipaquilla. He had 400 armed men over there, and there were 300 claimed to be in this band. They had sent down and asked Mr. Neal if he would surrender the place, and he sent them word, "No; that if they got it they would have to take it, and Mr. Neal said, "I want to fight them, too; we can hold them off for three weeks; we have provisions here for three weeks, but during that time they will dynamite the mine, the mill, and lose the company a great deal of property. He said, "I think we had better let them come on down and try to compromise with them." So we agreed to do it. I was in one of the towers as they were coming down; the trail zig-zagged over the mountain as they came over. The first man had a big, red flag, about four feet square. To his rear there were 20 men, a long distance, then another group of men; then a distance, and then another group of men, and so on to the end.

I was dressed in white clothes, so they could see me; they saw me through this opening of about 3 inches by about 4 feet high. I was in the corner next to the door that had been dug out of the side of the gulch on the other side, about as far as the width of two of these streets from my tower. We had agreed that we would not shoot a gun at all until notified by Mr. Neal, unless there was somebody trying to get over the wall or fence back of us. Those fellows saw me, the first ones; just in an instant they dropped down in the road and everyone pointed their guns up, hid behind the rocks, and pointed their guns at me up in the tower like that. I waited a few minutes, somewhat in suspense, and they jumped on the horses as quick as lightning and ran around to the gate or door and hollered, "Viva, Villa; viva Zapata." And when they got there they said they wanted to talk to the manager. "I am the manager," said Mr. Neal. "Open the door," said Julian, and they said, "If you don't open it we will dynamite everyone; we will dynamite it." And every one of them had dynamite, so far as I saw. He said, "I will open it if you will come in by yourself." "All right," said Julian; and he opened the gate and stepped in Julian, and stepped in Estrada, and stepped in another man, and when he started to slam the gate he stepped up and turned to us and said, "Men, don't allow this gate to close under any circumstances; don't allow anybody to come in or go out, and at the sound of the first gun dynamite the whole place." Mr. Neal said, "I guess you had better come up to the office." They compromised by giving them $500 in money, a few rifles, ammunition, and letting them take $500 worth of goods out of the store, which they did. Gen. del Toro, Huerta's general at Hostotipaquilla, had been notified of their coming long before they reached the mine. Mr. Neal knew it probably two hours before they got down there, and del Toro notified him over the telephone that he would come to our assistance. These fellows got down there at 10 o'clock in the morning. They robbed the whole gang of Mexicans, took every gun, pistol, horse, and everything they could get, and they stayed there until about 3 o'clock in the afternoon; still there was no del Toro; no Huerta soldiers.

They went in the direction of Hostotipaquilla and stayed there that night and the next day and still there were no Huerta soldiers. Now, three nights after that I was in my house below and this man Kelley occupied a room that was nearly adjoining my room, and a little supply of drugs and an operating room were between us and I was in my room by myself and he was in his by himself; and sometime in the night I was aroused by the most terrific explosion I have ever heard in my life, and I brushed the dirt that fell from the walls off from my face and I said, "That is dynamite. I guess I am gone now." I thought of my gun, and I had left it up at the house and my pistol, I had that in the office. I guess I would have to take it; I laid there and momentarily waited for another blast that would carry me off, but nothing more came of it, and sometime or other I went to sleep, and in the morning I woke up and went out and the sun was shining and there was quite a hole that this dynamite had made in the ground over there on the road in front of my house. The road zigzagged up to the mines that way, and they naturally had thrown this dynamite from the road over to the house and if it had struck us, of course, we would have been gone. Mr. Neal told me to come up, said he had plenty of room up here in this inclosure in which to stay. I said, "No, I won't do that, because if I do it, these Mexicans will think I am afraid of them and I will be up against it sure enough." I said I would not do it. I stayed there nearly a month before I went into Guadalajara.

Senator SMITH. What became of the mines there? Did these people, Neal and Kelley, did they leave?

Dr. HUNTER. They did not leave then. The train that was gotten up by Mr. Holmes, the British Consul, to take us all down to Manzanillo—he got the governor by staying with him until 1 o'clock in the morning—to return the train down, after the soldiers landed and captured Vera Cruz. They went back out to the mines. This I did not see myself; I got it from Mr. Neal; it was all published in the newspapers. He told me it was facts, as published in the newspapers of New York City. Shall I tell that?

Senator SMITH. I did not catch that.

Dr. HUNTER. I say, I did not see these men that were killed after I left there, but I got it directly from the manager, Mr. Neal, himself, in a letter telling me these facts were correct as published. Shall I tell that?

Senator SMITH. Yes; as briefly as possible.

Dr. HUNTER. Well, he would not go on that train; I begged him to go on that train—to go back to Manzanillo, and come out of there. He said, "Those men are my friends, they won't bother me." I said, "They will kill you just as quick as they will anybody else." He said, "Well, I have got to go; I have got to go pay off the men to-morrow; if I don't, there will be trouble. I will come back just as quick as I can and bring the other men in." He went out to the mines and paid off the next morning. That day at noon somebody notified them in the dining room while they were eating dinner that the bandits were in the zinc room taking the bullion out. He and a young man named Baird came out of the dining room, out of the inclosure, with their guns, and turned to the left and went down a little gulch that led down by this big gulch by my house, and Williams went down toward the zinc room, Williams and Hardley, which was on the other side of another gulch that led down to the big gulch.

Mr. Neal stayed and heard shooting, but he did not know what it was. He supposed that the boys had been shooting at the bandits; that they had gone up an arroyo instead of going down, and came on back to the house. When they got on the little flat place in front of the store, some one hollered to him, "What are you men running around here with guns, what are you men anyway?" And as he turned around to see what was the trouble he heard Mr. Baird say, "No, Tiremas mas"—that is, "don't come any nearer to me," he turned around to see what was the matter with Baird and he saw a man over him stabbing him with his knife, and as he turned he got five stabs in his back.

Senator SMITH. What man was that that was stabbed by the knife?

Dr. HUNTER. Neal and Baird.

Senator SMITH. Neal was the manager of the mines?

Dr. HUNTER. Yes, sir; Walter Neal.

Senator SMITH. What do you know about seeing men hung up there and ropes under their arms and tortured?

Dr. HUNTER. I have seen that frequently.

Senator SMITH. Who were the men?

Dr. HUNTER. Mexicans.

Senator SMITH. Mexicans?

Dr. HUNTER. Mexicans; hung up by Mexicans.

Senator SMITH. For what purpose?

Dr. HUNTER. Heavens only knows. I suppose they thought they were against them. They were all claiming to be Villistas that were doing the devilment around there; the Huerta soldiers were incapable of suppressing them in any way; they would not try to do it. I saw the men hanging. They tied a rope around their arms, under their arms like that [indicating], under their neck, and hung them up to trees so they would suffer a long time, and they will shoot them, and these fellows had their feet chopped off; they will chop off their feet and chop off any other piece, just to give them all the torture they can.

I have seen them hanging up along the road. I saw three of them at one time there; there was no feet beneath their white breeches, they wore big, loose white drawers, white shirt, the custom they have there in that country, and big hats and sandals; I saw no feet, I rode over there and lifted up their pants and saw they were chopped off, missing. When the soldiers captured Vera Cruz there were great flaming circulars spread all over the country, all over Guadalajara, I was in Guadalajara at the time, stating they were actually in war with the United States; that they had captured every town on the border, Brownsville and Laredo, and every one, except El Paso; that the prisoners at Fort Bliss had killed 800 American soldiers and with their arms and ammunition were marching on El Paso which would soon fall; that Villa had already united with Velasco, and that 150,000 brave Mexican soldiers were marching over American soil, tramping over American soil, and that the cowardly American dogs were running like chaff before the wind, that God is with us and we are going to win. It fired them so they wanted to kill everybody they saw, nearly. One morning I was going down the street, down to the hotel where the Americans had housed in the Cosmopolita Hotel, and the French in another place, and the English in another, and they had destroyed everything in the American consulate that I knew. They took the flag down and drug it through the streets. There was a little group on the corner as I went by and I heard some of them say—I had learned Spanish by this time—I heard them say, "There goes one of the beasts. Let's shoot that fellow, let's begin on him. Now is a good time to shoot him, let's begin on him." I wasn't doing anything much, and I went on and paid no attention to him, and I went farther down the street. I heard a man, I knew him, Salvador de la Campa, he said, "We will go over and kill Keep." Mr. Keep was a large merchant there, he had an immense store, selling hardware and American mining and farming implements, he must have had a couple of hundred thousand dollars' worth of stock, it was a big thing.

He said, "We will go over and commence on him." He did not see me, he was standing with his back to me, and I went over and told Mr. Keep to get out of there as quick as he could, told him what I had heard and said, "You go to the house, don't stop for anything, go to the house immediately and telephone Mr. Holmes, and see if he has arranged for that train to take us to Manzanillo," and he did it. The train had been arranged for, and he disguised himself and got down to the train, and his wife came in afterwards. I went down to the store and a Mexican came in with his hands up, and he said, "We ought not to allow any of those Americans get away from here. We ought to take them every one, men, women, and children, and put them in the penitentiary, and blow them up with dynamite the minute we hear about a Mexican being badly treated in the United States." I saw them make some Americans get out of a coach on the street and made the driver throw their valises out and told the driver that they would kill him if he took another one in the hack. They got out of the hack and went around the street and got in another carriage and got up to the British Consulate, because Mr. Holmes had been to the Cosmopolita hotel and told them, the Americans, that they were not safe there, to come down to the British Consulate and he would try to protect them, and they all went and there was never a move made after that against them.

Senator SMITH. In the meantime, while they were getting protection under the British flag at the British Consulate, what was done to the American Consulate there?

Dr. HUNTER. It had been ransacked, so far as I know, I did not see it, I did not go to it, but everybody said it had been, and the American consul was in hiding.

Senator SMITH. Who was the American consul?

Dr. HUNTER. Who was he?

Senator SMITH. Yes; who was he at that time, do you remember?

Dr. HUNTER. Yes—I knew his name, I do not remember now, I knew him well.

Senator SMITH. It does not matter, it can be obtained.

Dr. HUNTER. Yes, it is in that thing I sent to Mr. Hanson.

Senator SMITH. What indignities did you see perpetrated, if any, on the Americans there, as to shaving their heads and that sort of thing?

Dr. HUNTER. Plenty of it. I was in Culiacan when the Southern Pacific Railroad built in there, and they would catch any American that they could without any excuse except that he was an American, catch him on the street, and put him in jail, and the next morning they would shave his head just as clean as they could get it, and if he had any money, they would take it and turn him loose. There was one man, a young man that I knew, standing on the corner waiting for a friend and two policemen came along and said, "What are you doing?" He said, "I am waiting for a friend." They said, "No, you are drunk." He said, "I do not drink." And I knew he didn't, they said, "You are drunk." And they took him down to the jail and the next morning they shaved his head and turned him loose. He was a British subject and he complained at once to the British consul at Manzanillo, and there was never another head shaved. They notified Gov. Canales at Culiacan and the thing was stopped right there, there never was another head shaved at all.

Senator SMITH. Then your observation was that the only chance for an American's protection at that time was through the British consul?

Dr. HUNTER. Yes, sir; a number of Americans claimed to be British to get protection. They told the Mexicans they were British, and it was all right then.

Senator SMITH. What became of that American flag that was at the consulate there; do you know?

Dr. HUNTER. I do not know what became of that flag; but I know what became of one I saw along the railroad. Now, we will get you to Manzanillo. When we got on the train we started out to go from Guadalajara to Manzanillo; there were a lot of soldiers on the train, and I noticed a lot of officers talking to each passenger down in the front of the car I was sitting in. I thought nothing of it. I thought they were looking at the tickets or passes or something of the sort, and when he came to me he told me that they were ordered by the governor, for our protection, to take up whatever we had—whatever silver money we had, or arms, or anything of the kind—and they would give us a receipt for that and give them back to us when we got to Manzanillo. Well, I had a nice little Smith & Wesson pistol and scabbard and belt, and I gave it to him, and I gave him what silver money I had—Mexican money—and he said, "I am out of a receipt; I will bring you one in a minute." That was the last I saw of him, except on the train, except when the train stopped there were a lot of automobiles waiting for them, and they got into these automobiles and went back to Guadalajara and left us without money or protection in any way, and the first town they stopped at was Zacoalco.

Senator SMITH. Who was doing this?

Dr. HUNTER. Those were Huerta's soldiers.

Senator SMITH. Do you know of any connection of Obregon with that, at all?

Dr. HUNTER. No, sir; I do not. When we stopped at this station of Zacoalco there was an immense, howling mob there, crying, "Kill the Gringos; dynamite the train; don't let one get away"—all that sort of thing, whooping and cursing us for everything that was vile and dirty, and they had a big American flag, and they waved that up and down, and threw it down and trampled over it and yelled and cursed it, and finally they ripped it up in strips and put matches to it and burned it, and threw the ashes in the windows at us. They threw in sticks and mud and dirt; nearly every one of us got mud on them. I was sitting at a window, and a fellow threw a little stick with a Mexican flag on it like a dart—threw it right at my face—and I dodged and it went right by my side.

Senator SMITH. Who is Mr. Will B. Davis?

Dr. HUNTER. That was the American consul—he was on that train.

Senator SMITH. And Mr. Crawford, also?

Dr. HUNTER. Mr. Crawford was on that train.

Senator SMITH. Where does Mr. Davis live now?

Dr. HUNTER. He came to some point in Texas; I tried to find out, but I do not know.

Senator SMITH. What about Mr. Hunt? Do you know a man by the name of Hunt?

Dr. HUNTER. Very well—he was a land dealer in Culiacan.

Senator SMITH. Did he suffer any indignities that you know of?

Dr. HUNTER. Not that I know of.

Senator SMITH. He lived at El Paso, I believe.

Dr. HUNTER. I think he lived at El Paso; but when we got to Colima we were held up there till near morning. It was only 25 miles to Manzanillo, but the train was held up there, for what purpose I do not know. I know the British consul came there and told us all to be calm and not to be uneasy; that he was doing everything to protect us that he possibly could; that the Government had promised that we should be protected. Before morning they pulled out and took us down to Manzanillo. When we got down there I got out of the train with a couple of valises and got two little boys to take them down, and a soldier walked up and kicked them and told them to drop the valises, and I had to carry them myself. When we got down to the wharf they put the men in a room that was part out over the dirt and the other part over the water; they let the women go aboard the ship Maria, a German steamship. They let us stay there until 3 o'clock before they would let us go aboard the ship. I was told that they had dynamite under the room and they were going to blow us up if any American ship came up in the harbor.

Senator SMITH. Where was this German ship bound?

Dr. HUNTER. That German ship had come in there with over 200 Chinese men, and they would not let them land, and the German captain of the boat said in order to protect us to come aboard; that he would take us to California; that he didn't know whether he had enough for us to eat or not, but he would do the best he could. He took us all aboard and put us on two meals a day, at half rations. He put the Chinese in the aft hold—it was an old freight ship—and gave us the under deck in front. There was a young man on that boat that had gotten there the day before.

The Americans from the ranches had gotten there before. They formed a procession of all these Americans; they took Wilson's picture out of the consulate and painted long black horns on it; they took the American flag and made the Americans follow this flag and picture around, singing, joking, and cursing the Americans; they threw that down and made them walk over them and burned them up and threw the ashes over their heads. This young man was on that ship, and they sent word to him—I don't know what for; some Mexicans had a grudge against him—and they sent word to him that somebody had sent him some money by telegraph, and to come over and get it; and he told them to tell them if anybody had sent him any money they could have it; he didn't want it. They sent over some soldiers to take him off the boat and take him over. The American consul, both of them—Dr. Davis and Mr. Stratton, at that time consul at Manzanillo—knew the man, and they knew he was all right, and they told them so, but they would not listen. There was a young man there, a German, who had been a bookkeeper at one of the mines that I was a physician to; I knew him very well, and he told them that he was a German consul; he said, "I am acting consul, and I demand in the name of my country that you liberate that man." He said, "You have got the United States down on you now; you are at war with the United States; do you want to go to war with my country now?" He said, "I demand that you liberate that man," and they turned him loose and he got back to the ship and came on with us.

Senator SMITH. Do you know anything about the kidnapping of Mr. Baird?

Dr. HUNTER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. What about it?

Dr. HUNTER. He was at the mine that I was physician at. I was always physician of three or four mines, and that was one I was going to twice a week. There came a crowd to his house one night and knocked at the door, and he said, "What do you want?" And they said, "We want some medicine for a sick man." He was accustomed to giving them a little medicine himself that way. He opened the door, and there were a lot of rifles at his face. He slammed the door and ran back to the telephone by the window and grabbed the telephone, and a gun stuck through the window and said, "Drop that or we will kill you." He said, "We are not going to hurt you; we came here to get your guns and ammunition. Open the door; we will take it and not hurt you." He opened the door, and they took his rifle and shotgun and the ammunition, and he complained about it to the fellow who was really the boss of the gang himself who was talking, and he told him the "jefe" of the gang was down on the Santiago River; he said, "Come on and go with us down there, and he may give them back to you." He said, "All right," and he started out with them, and he did not go 20 feet from the house before two men grabbed him and they searched him and took a pistol out of his coat pocket and took his money and told him to write a note back to the bookkeeper to send them a thousand dollars or they would kill him. And he wrote in English to send $500—maybe they would take that, or they could increase the amount. Well, they became frightened in the meantime and took him in a boat and carried him across the river on back to a little Indian village halfway up the hill. When the money got there they were gone, and there was a Mexican there about half drunk, and he said, "I will take it to them." They gave him the money, and he carried it, and Mr. Baird got back about 1 o'clock in the morning. Del Toro, this man at Hostotipaquilla, the Huerta officer, was notified as soon as possible after the thing occurred and asked to pursue them promptly, and he said he would do it. Three days after Mr. Baird had been in his house here came Del Toro with 50 soldiers—in hot pursuit. He came to El Favor mine and came on down to La Espada mine, where I was, and took dinner and stayed there that night, and next day he went down to the Santiago River and stayed there that night, and the next morning came back to Hostotipaquilla and sent a telegram to the governor, which I have a copy of here, stating that he had restored Mr. Baird safely to his home and had annihilated the band.

Senator SMITH. That was a report made to the governor?

Dr. HUNTER. Yes, sir; that was Gen. del Toro, and he made that report himself.

Senator SMITH. He was for Huerta?

Dr. HUNTER. Gen. del Toro was a Huertista.

Senator SMITH. Who were those who were doing the outrages?

Dr. HUNTER. They were claimed to be Villistas. All the depredations that were committed around there that I know of, were committed by Villistas.

Senator SMITH. Do you know the case of Mr. Harrison?

Dr. HUNTER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. What were the facts as to that?

Dr. HUNTER. We were notified one evening that 17 men had sacked his mine and that he had taken refuge in the tunnel and was hid in there. Two of us from the El Favor mine and two from La Espada and two from another mine down the river tried to rescue him and we rode all night to try to get there before day to surround the town before daylight, and we got there just at daylight, and we surrounded the town and rushed in there with our rifles ready—there were just a few houses in there, just a little town, and we rode into the center ready to shoot these fellows, but they were gone. That underground telegraph that they have in Mexico beats everything I ever heard of in my life; they always know everything, and we saw them going up the mountain on the other side of the big gulch. We rescued Mr. Harrison and took him back to the La Espada Mine and then sent him to Guadalajara. That night the two young men, Richards and Kaiser, started down the river and went down, and they were met by a lot of women who asked them not for God's sake to go down there, there are a lot of bandits in your house now. They went around this house, but before they got to where they could do any shooting or see them, they got wind of it in some way and they rushed out of the house, and they divided when they got out in such a hurry, and some went up one side of the mountain and some the other, and it was a bright moonlight night, and they opened fire, and fired and fired. and nobody was hurt at all. The next morning they sent word to these boys that they had only got $20, and they wanted 200, to send it to them, and they sent them word that if they wanted anything down there, they would have to come get it, but they never came.

Senator SMITH. Who was that went down to the rescue of Mr. Baird?

Dr. HUNTER. Who was with me?

Senator SMITH. Yes; the rescue of Mr. Harrison, I mean.

Dr. HUNTER. Mr. Richards and Kaiser and Mr. Nelson and Mr. Holmes and Mr. Kelley and myself. This was a brother of the British consul.

Senator SMITH. Of the British consul?

Dr. HUNTER. On a visit to this mine at this time. That telegram of del Toro's is so characteristic of the Mexican that it was no surprise to me at all. I spent 10 years in Mexico, nearly 10 years, and I think I know them pretty well, and I have yet to see the first living Mexican—I know Carranza, too, and from him down to the veriest peon on a backwoods ranch, I have yet to see the very first one whose oath I would accept.

Senator SMITH. Do you know anything about the attack on that mine down there near Ameca?

Dr. HUNTER. Near Ameca?

Senator SMITH. Yes, sir.

Dr. HUNTER. Well, there is a number of attacks that I do not know personally of, but this one where Mr. Foster—

Senator SMITH. Foster; yes?

Dr. HUNTER. Yes. I can not think of the name of the other man, the two of them were at the mine by themselves, and a road ran right in front of the house like this, and went down that way down into the gulch, and the Mexican passed by and he said, "Ya vienen los bandidos"—that is "Here come the bandits"—and they got their guns quickly and got right up to the windows, and as they made a turn they called to them to halt, and as they did not stop—they called to them in English, and I suppose they did not understand it—they did not stop, and they opened fire on them and they ran away, and after that one of them was shot with buckshot from a shotgun through the side. After that he was down in a little hut down the mountain there, and one of his intimate friends called on him, and as he was in bed helpless he took a machete and chopped him to pieces.

Senator SMITH. These depredations that you speak of were all by the Villistas?

Dr. HUNTER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Do you know anything about the attempted assassination of Mr. Villamin?

Dr. HUNTER. Yes, sir. He told me about it himself. He had been into Ameca and he went back to his mine, and when he got near the house he was passing through a gate and he got down to tighten his saddle, and he had a "mozo" with him, as they call them there, a valet, and when he got down to tighten his saddle he was fired upon by a number of shots; he did not know how many; many of them; and his mule fell dead and he rolled down a little, and he ran down to get his rifle from the mule, and when he got down on the ground upon the mule to get his rifle and while he was getting his rifle they thought he was killed, I guess, and he was one of the best shots in the country, and he took out his rifle and fired at them, and he saw that the bullet hit about 10 or 20 feet away from the fellow, and he said he could not account for it, and he tried to put another bullet in and he could not; it had been bent. Then he went down to his house. That night they tried to dynamite his house; they would tie it to a big rock and roll it down there, but it didn't strike the house.

Senator SMITH. Did you know anything about or do you know anything about the sufferings undergone by Miss Flores and her abduction?

Dr. HUNTER. Not personally, but I was there in Ayutla when Flores took his wife and daughter into Guadalajara for protection, and while I was there they concluded it was a little safer, and he took them back home, and as soon as they went back home there came along a band and robbed the town and took her off to the mountains. She was one of the nicest girls I ever saw.

Senator SMITH. Do you know what became of her afterwards?

Dr. HUNTER. No, sir; I do not know; I did not see her afterwards. They would take them that way and keep them for a week or two until they got tired of them, and then turn them loose.

Senator SMITH. Do you know anything about the killing of the former manager of the El Favor mine?

Dr. HUNTER. Not personally; but it was an undoubted fact that he went down into the quarters on hearing a shot fired and he asked who did the shooting and they told him that this—this man said he did it. "Well," he said, "you do not belong here; you are drunk; I do not want you on this place again and I want you to get out of here," and he took him by the coat and pushed him out the door and gave him a kick, and as he kicked him a bullet went through his head and he fell on the ground, and as he fell a Mexican chopped his head with a machete, and one went up the hill and one went down the hill. I wish you would ask is Mr. Job Mathews in the house.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. John Mathews.

(There was no response to the calling of his name by Mr. Mathews.)

Dr. HUNTER. He saw this and he came down the hill and he got his rifle and he saw a man hiding in a bunch of bushes, and he was also a crack shot, and that Mexican laid down and he hired these soldiers—they always had a few soldiers stationed at every mine—and he bribed these soldiers to say that they killed him, and that ended it. The man that killed him got away. They always pretend to pursue, but they never do anything with one of them. I have never known of a man being punished for murder in Mexico in my life. There was a Mexican killed a young man from Texas named Brackenridge, at Ayutla. This Mexican and the American were courting Flores, and that night at the dance this young fellow Brackenridge said to the Mexican—I believe his name is Gave—he said, "Let's go out and fight it out and the one that is left will have the girl." He said, "All right," and the American walked out the door and the Mexican behind him, and as soon as the American stepped on the sidewalk the Mexican plugged him through the body with a bullet and he died two or three days afterwards. Well, that fellow was arrested and put in jail and tried and convicted and sentenced to six years and he was sent up to the penitentiary at Guadalajara, and in six months he was at his home.

Senator SMITH. Do you know anything about the case of Mr. Gates?

Dr. HUNTER. Well, I know him well. Mr. Gates was largely interested in the Carrizo mine, and after everybody had been forced to run out and abandon the mine, he went back out there himself to protect it, and he stayed there by himself, a two-story house with a piazza above and below, and one afternoon he was sitting on his piazza reading, and he heard the bullets whistling around him. He looked out and saw seven Mexicans shooting at him, and he went in the room and brought out his 30.30, and he only had three cartridges, and he shot one off the horse with one and killed the horse with the next, and the other he did not know where it hit. He telephoned over to Sebastian to send men to pursue them, and they sent men over to pursue them, and they found one man almost dead, yet sitting on his horse; he was almost dead, with a bullet through his breast, and they took him and swung him up and left him full of bullets hanging there.

Senator SMITH. How long did these general outrages of which you have been speaking—this conduct, how long did it exist in that community and among those mines which you spoke of, how long was that going on?

Dr. HUNTER. I think about three years, more or less. It commenced soon after the Madero revolution.

Senator SMITH. And kept up until when?

Dr. HUNTER. It kept up until I left, and I came out on that ship Maria in 1914.

Senator SMITH. 1914.

Dr. HUNTER. It was going on then; yes; I do not know of a single ranch they had not been robbing and murder committed at and rape and burning and arson and everything of the kind, and every ranch that I knew of nearly had been robbed.

Senator SMITH. Well, did they confine themselves to the Americans alone or to the Mexicans against whom they had any feeling?

Dr. HUNTER. They were just out for pilf, out for robbery; it was easier than to work.

Senator SMITH. What effort was made to prevent that condition by the Government?

Dr. HUNTER. Well, just about the effort that Del Toro made against those bandits.

Senator SMITH. So you had no security?

Dr. HUNTER. Absolutely no security for anybody; it was not then and it is not now; there is no safety for life or property in Mexico.

Senator SMITH. Do you know of the paymaster being killed there near Culiacan?

Dr. HUNTER. I heard of it only. I know it is a fact, but I did not see it. Now, the day that del Toro—I will tell you this and give you a more clear idea of the prejudice that exists in Mexico to the Americans. There is a deep-dyed hatred that can never be eradicated from the class that exists there now. Old Gen. del Toro the day I went to leave, he took my hands and he took them both in each of his, and he said, "Doctor, I want to ask you a favor." I said, "All right, General, what is it?" He said, "If not for my sake, for God's sake quit riding around this country here by yourself. There are hundreds of men every day on that road that will kill you the first chance they get, if for nothing more than to say, 'I killed a gringo who was not afraid to ride around.'"

Senator SMITH. That, you say, is the feeling that exists yet?

Dr. HUNTER. All over Mexico; yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. I have here a purported list of the passengers that came out. Can you identify that list, or do you know [handing paper to witness]?

Dr. HUNTER. Yes, sir; I have a copy of it right here in my pocket; yes; that is all right.

Senator SMITH. How many in that list do you know; have you counted them?

Dr. HUNTER. Well, it is figured up here, 245.

Senator SMITH. They were passengers, you say, that came out?

Dr. HUNTER. They were the crowd that came out penniless on that steamship Maria from Manzanillo.

Senator SMITH. All right, that will do.

Dr. HUNTER. I would like to add this, that I overlooked. At the time these bandits were in the mine, Mr. Hoadly and Mr. Williams went down the other gulch to pursue the bandits, and when they got down under the gulch the men who were employed on the mines shot them down there, and the bandits came back and chopped them all up with machetes, and went up the other way and left.

Senator SMITH. The committee will stand adjourned until about 2.30 this afternoon.

(Thereupon at 12.10 o'clock p. m. the committee recessed until 2.30 o'clock of the same day.)

MONDAY, JANUARY 19, 1920.

2.30 o'clock p. m.

TESTIMONY OF J. G. WARD.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized.)

Mr. JACKSON. What is your name?

Mr. WARD. J. G. Ward.

Senator SMITH. Where were you born, Mr. Ward?

Mr. WARD. Born in Red River County, northeast Texas.

Senator SMITH. You are a citizen of the United States?

Mr. WARD. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. When did you go to Mexico, if you went?

Mr. WARD. I went the first time in 1912.

Senator SMITH. Where did you go to?

Mr. WARD. Colonia, Mexico.

Senator SMITH. How many Americans were there, or, foreigners were there?

Mr. WARD. There was something like 15 families, I don't know exactly, but something like that many.

Senator SMITH. What happened to those 15 families of yours down there at the time of which you first spoke? What year was it?

Mr. WARD. Well, it was—what do you mean, which year this trouble happened—anything down there?

Senator SMITH. Yes.

Mr. WARD. Well, it was about 1915 before any trouble happened to amount to anything.

Senator SMITH. Please detail to the committee what occurred there, without my asking you specific questions.

Mr. WARD. Well, the first case I know of was two Germans—well, one of them was an American citizen; he is a German by birth—there were two Germans robbed; one of them was hung up and robbed of something like $1,600.

Senator SMITH. What was his name?

Mr. WARD. Ernest Heckle and Philip Rapp.

Mr. JACKSON. How do you spell "Heckel"?

Mr. WARD. I don't know, Judge—he was a German.

Senator SMITH. Where were they when robbed; what was the circumstances under which one was robbed; was he the American citizen?

Mr. WARD. Yes, sir; they were robbed at night and he never did know who done that, because these fellows that robbed them came across the river—that way we could tell; we tracked them to the river and after that we never could hear of them, or track, or anything.

Senator SMITH. What river?

Mr. WARD. It was the Panuco—I think it was.

Senator SMITH. What was done with the other German, if anything?

Mr. WARD. Well, he was not hung up—I don't think—but he was robbed of some amount of money; I don't know just what it was. That's all the robbing they done in there that night; we don't know whether they were soldiers or not.

Senator SMITH. That was Mr. Heckel and Mr. Rapp?

Mr. WARD. Yes, sir. Well, my first experience was they stole a horse from me. I didn't have any trouble until, well, it was about the first of 1916; just about January. Well, they stole a horse between the times, and one evening there were a couple of fellows came in there and stole two horses. I was gone, and when I came back home some of the boys told me they saw these fellows take the horses off, so I got on the train and went to Tampico to head them off; and I got me an American boy friend of mine there to go down the railroad on horseback, and so he overtook them coming, and got the horses back. I don't know how; he just said he bluffed them and he got them back. And then in a few weeks I saw this same fellow. I caught him in my orchard grove; I had 15 acres. I went down there and talked to him and told him there wasn't any use of him stealing fruit, if he wanted any I would give it to him; it made the other Mexicans want to steal too. He had papers to search our house for guns. He came up and searched our house. I didn't refuse him; I didn't care. He didn't find anything but a shotgun; that didn't bother anything; I was allowed to keep a shotgun. He searched the house all over, and went on off. That was on Sunday, and on Thursday night he came back about 9 o'clock; I didn't go to bed, I was reading, so he wanted me to come out there. I asked him what he wanted, and he said he just wanted to talk to me, so I went and told my wife to bring the light and I would go out on the porch and see what he wanted, and when she brought the light to the door that threw the light on him, and as I went out I picked up my shotgun. He asked me what I was doing with my shotgun and I told him that I thought it was my place and I had a right to protect it, a stranger coming that time of night, and war times and things torn up like they were. Of course that made him mad. We could see the fire off of some of the cigarettes of some more parties down the road a little piece.

Finally I told him to come in, and he started in and got to the line fence, through one of the line fences, and he got to this other fence and I told him he would as well go back, I would rather talk to him in the day time, I wouldn't be doing anything the next morning, for him just to come back. So he didn't say a word, but went on back, got on his horse, and rode on down the road. We went back in the house; there was something like four or five shots fired; I don't know just how many, but there was only one shot hit the house that night; hit the roof. They got some fruit, we could tell that; we could hear them down there in the orchard talking. They went on off. That was on Thursday night. Then the coming Monday morning about 2 or 2.30 I heard some talking down in the orchard, and the dog barking—

Senator SMITH. What night was this?

Mr. WARD. Sir?

Senator SMITH. What night are you speaking of now?

Mr. WARD. I am talking about Monday night.

Senator SMITH. On Thursday night was there any shooting?

Mr. WARD. Yes, sir; that was the first time they came. On Monday morning about 2.30 is when they brought this bunch back; they all came piling upon the porch and hollered; the first thing they said—one fellow could speak a little English—and they said, "Come out of there, boy," and they just rushed up against the door and tried to get in, and I wouldn't let them in, kept talking to them. I asked them what they wanted and about all they would say was they wanted in, wanted some money. I worried with them; they kept trying to break in a door. I finally told them if I would give them some money would they go away and leave me alone, and they said they would, so the door wasn't tight, I could get it down from the top a little bit without unlatching it, and I gave them thirty or forty dollars which was there, I didn't know how much. Well, that made them much madder I reckon, because we didn't get the door open. They kept charging against the door, the screen door; broke it all to pieces. I finally told them would they, if I gave them my purse and all the money that was in it, would they go away and leave me alone. I finally gave it to them; they got it the same way; they struck a match and I could tell they were looking at the money. They came back against the door, madder than ever, and during all the time one of them would be working the guns, throwing shells out, and hammer on the house.

I finally told them; I seen I wasn't going to get rid of them that way; I made up my mind to let them in. I told him that if he would send his men all back to the fence I would let him in; you see there was one party doing nearly all of the talking; once in a while another one talking. So we could hear these parties walking off the edge of the porch; then they would tiptoe back, and I just made up my mind then there was something awfully crooked about it, so I just went over to where my wife was; well, I had told her to get under the bed, because she being on top of the bed she would be in line of the shooting; if you are lying on the floor you are not in much danger. I went over there and told her I might as well have it out with them; they wasn't going to leave us alone until I did, and no telling what they would do if they got in, because I knew how they had been treating these Germans. I told them to wait a minute until I got my clothes; that was after I told them they could get in. They was pounding on the doors, and I just unlatched the door, and one started in; just stepped in front of the door, and I had done prepared to fight it out with them, so I just shot him and he just fell backward and screamed. When I made this shot I just stepped on the outside of the door. One started to run, and I shot him, and he fell, and there was a stray shot I made. I shot a sack of oranges. I seen the bulk of it, and I shot it, and then I went in and laid down back of the door. I left the door open, but it was dark on the inside. I lay there a few minutes and I heard a fellow shooting right in front of the door, and I finally got up and looked out. I could see just this much of a man's hand sticking out shooting with a six-shooter. I let him shoot a few shots and I managed to get a shot at him, and there wasn't any more shooting right around the house; all the rest of the shooting was a distance, shots back, so my wife stayed there just a few minutes until the shooting ceased. I told my wife we just as well go down to the barn, because they might get a bunch and come back and dynamite the house or to shoot it all to pieces. So we went down to the barn and stayed under the barn the rest of the night. The next morning when we came back to the house this fellow was still on the porch; he was the only fellow I seen there; he was the fellow that had stole my horse and had searched the house. He was supposed to be a Carranza officer, a corporal; that's what he was; he was a Carranza corporal and had these papers to search my house. I don't know; I didn't see but three men, but this nigger claimed there was eight of them.

Senator SMITH. What negro?

Mr. WARD. You see, they robbed a nigger just before they robbed me; just came from his house right over to mine. They beat the man, bruised him up with the guns; I seen where they punched him around; I could see the places on him the next morning where they had punched him around with the guns. They got all the guns he had; I don't know whether they got any money or not, but they got all the money and valuable things; they even got little bits of things, and thread, family pictures, the like of that, and a lot of clothes. He came over there the next morning, and he said this fellow on the porch, he knew him; he said he was the leader of the bunch.

Senator SMITH. Is he the man that had taken your horses?

Mr. WARD. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. That the boy had recovered from him?

Mr. WARD. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. He is the same man that was at your house those two times that you speak of?

Mr. WARD. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. How far did this negro live from you?

Mr. WARD. About half a mile.

Senator SMITH. What other depredations, if any, if you know, were committed against the family of that negro?

Mr. WARD. This nigger, his wife, I heard they both was, the next morning they mistreated him and they had also mistreated his wife two or three times.

Senator SMITH. You mean they ravished her?

Mr. WARD. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. What was his name, do you remember?

Mr. WARD. I don't just remember; I was just trying to think of that fellow's name, because he hadn't been there but a short time, and I never did have much dealings with him. I knew him at the time, all right.

Senator SMITH. Do you know what his nationality was? I don't means as to blood, but where did he come from?

Mr. WARD. He came from the United States, because hadn't been there but just a short time; he came from up here. There was a wealthy negro went down there and bought this property and stayed there awhile, then he got some of his poor friends to go down there; and that is how it was; I don't know his name.

Senator SMITH. Now, after this had occurred at the negro's house and they had come to your house as you have described and you did the shooting as you have described it, what else, if anything, happened to you in the matter and the balance of those people living up there—you American people?

Mr. WARD. Well, there hadn't nothing happened at that time; we hadn't had any trouble at all. Of course, they would take some corn. Altogether I think I lost 4 or 5 acres of corn that was in the shock. The Huerta men started to get it, then the Carranza men finished it up. You see, the Huerta men came out there and camped. That was after the first battle in Tampico. Huerta came out there; his bunch came out there and camped at Colonia two or three days, and during the time they taken this stuff, this corn, and we never had no serious trouble with them. Well, the next day or two the Carranza people came in there and ran them back; then they finished the corn.

Senator SMITH. What became of that colony near down there?

Mr. WARD. I don't know of anyone there now except these two German families.

Senator SMITH. Do you know how they are getting along?

Mr. WARD. I have heard from them several times; they seem to be getting along all right; I mean they haven't had any real serious trouble; they claim they take stuff away from them; they have been robbed of their household furniture, too, since that.

Senator SMITH. You finally came out?

Mr. WARD. Yes, sir; after this trouble I went to the American consul, and he advised me to come out and stay out six months or a year, and so I hid out over across the lake 10 days until I caught an oil boat, and I got on an oil boat and came out, and I have not been back since.

Senator SMITH. Where did you land?

Mr. WARD. In Texas City.

Senator SMITH. That is all; much obliged.

TESTIMONY OF DR. ODIA M. JACKS.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized.)

Senator SMITH. What is your name?

Dr. JACKS. Dr. Odia M. Jacks.

Senator SMITH. Where were you born?

Dr. JACKS. I was born in east Tennessee, in the old Cherokee Nation.

Senator SMITH. Where did you live before—did you ever go to Mexico?

Dr. JACKS. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Where did you live in the United States just before going to Mexico?

Dr. JACKS. I lived at Fort Worth and owned a farm out on Bear Creek, out of Fort Worth, right opposite Smithville.

Senator SMITH. You went from there to Texas?

Dr. JACKS. From there to Mexico.

Senator SMITH. I mean, from there to Mexico?

Dr. JACKS. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. When?

Dr. JACKS. In '95.

Senator SMITH. In '95?

Dr. JACKS. Yes, sir 1905—I will get it right directly—in 1905.

Senator SMITH. Who was then President?

Dr. JACKS. How is that? Who was President of Mexico?

Senator SMITH. Yes.

Dr. JACKS. Diaz.

Senator SMITH. How long did you live there—from 1905 all during that time up until the revolution?

Dr. JACKS. I was there from that time up until a year ago last August. I came out two or three times when we were told to come out, but would always go back again.

Senator SMITH. What was your experience down there as to the loss of property, if you had it—what property you had and when it was lost, how, and who did it—who took it?

Dr. JACKS. Well, it would take a mighty long time to tell my experience. I practiced in the army there for pretty near three years, nearly straight, and my experiences are very wide. I had a written copy of my trouble, with everything I had burned out in February a year ago, and everything I had in the world was burned, with the exception of what I had on my back.

Senator SMITH. Was that at your place in Mexico then?

Dr. JACKS. No, sir. I had come out then. That was here at Pine Bluff, Ark.; that is where I am from now.

Senator SMITH. Your family is there?

Dr. JACKS. My family is there; yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Now, what losses did you sustain there, or those colonists—was there a colony up there?

Dr. JACKS. Yes, sir; I was in the Blalock colony at the time Mr. Blalock was present at that time.

Senator SMITH. Then you know something about the killing of Mr. Gorham and Mr. Pilgrim?

Dr. JACKS. Well, I only know of Mr. Gorham through his son; he is the agent for my property there now; he wrote me about it, how he was killed, etc., and that is all; I meant to bring the letter with me, but my wife and daughter were in the country—15 miles in the country, and are there now—and I hadn't time to get it. Now, in regard to Mr. Pilgrim's killing, I held the inquest over his body, with a Mexican juror, and my memory is very clear even to now in regard to that.

Senator SMITH. Well, what about it; what did the inquest show?

Dr. JACKS. Well, he was murdered on a little creek there that we call Rock Creek—or Mud Creek—and he had went hunting for to see if he couldn't kill a deer; it was during a dry spell of weather, and the deer would have a certain place, where they had the water at; and he went down to get him a deer, and he was shot, and shot from the back—just one bullet; it penetrated him, and it seemed to have been a dead shot; he didn't seem to have struggled a particle.

Senator SMITH. Was anything done about it? Tell any other facts.

Dr. JACKS. Why, there hadn't been any—the body, through Mr. Humphrey, had been partially examined before they got me there; the Mexican court sent word for the Mexicans to take me over there and hold the inquest; that was how came me to go there—it was in closer to Mr. Humphrey and Mr. Hitt, and they had been to the body before I got there, but when I got there the body had not been moved, no more than they had partially turned it to look at it; but they didn't understand it, even the wound or anything of the kind when I got to the body, so when I got there I turned the body about—it was badly decomposed—it was a bad old turn; he had been lying there several days; it was warm weather, and he was bloated very badly; and I found he was shot, I think, through the left shoulder blade and ranged and come out like that [illustrating], seemed to have penetrated—

Mr. JACKSON. Near the right nipple?

Dr. JACKS. Yes, sir; I think now it was very near the shoulder blade and came out from the front—

Senator SMITH. From the front?

Dr. JACKS. From the front, he was shot behind.

Senator SMITH. Was there any evidence showing who committed that crime?

Dr. JACKS. Well, we were pretty certain who did it, but no effort was made to try to catch anybody at all; they made a bluff of holding a little court, I had to go before it, I was alone—and afterwards Mr. Humphrey and a couple of women—the women, if they could have examined them, they knew exactly who killed him, they knew all about it, but they wouldn't let them be examined at all. I think, during the time, I think Mr. Humphrey liked to have lost his life; one of the officers offered to shoot him because he had interfered with some violence that they were doing upon one—upon the women, and one of the women seemed to have been Mr. Humphrey's cook or housekeeper, something of that kind, and knew of the trouble and knew who killed him and all about it, but he never would let them in, wouldn't examine them at all; and after this everything was simply squashed, they never did anything more about it.

Senator SMITH. I am not asking you who it was or anything, but do you know the man who was suspicioned?

Dr. JACKS. Yes; but I couldn't tell you—I don't know the name of him.

Senator SMITH. I am not asking you about telling your knowledge of who he was, but do you know the man who did it?

Dr. JACKS. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Have you seen that man since the killing?

Dr. JACKS. If so, I don't know it.

Senator SMITH. You do not know?

Dr. JACKS. You see, the country is just like that, in a stir-up, and I was arrested and held a prisoner quite a while myself.

Senator SMITH. What for?

Dr. JACKS. Well, I reckon, for nothing. I don't know what else. I am sure I wasn't guilty.

Senator SMITH. You had violated no law?

Dr. JACKS. I don't know how; but I think I have got friends here—that I had not violated anything—just simply because my name is Jacks, and they call me a Yaqui Indian, and claimed I was from Sonora and a spy from the Villa army.

Senator SMITH. Who was doing the ordering?

Dr. JACKS. Lopez De Lara, a general of the Carranza people—Gen. De Lara was the man.

Senator SMITH. He was there during this time of the trouble that you speak of?

Dr. JACKS. Well, he came in right away afterwards—his people with him.

Senator SMITH. Were there any depredations following his advent—after he got there?

Dr. JACKS. Well, there were so many I couldn't tell you; I can't even recall—there was just one thing after another, all the time, gentlemen; you couldn't recall—part of the time it was dodging in the brush, dodging bullets, hiding out in your pasture—anywhere you could get to to keep from encountering them.

Senator SMITH. What became of that colony—did I ask you that?

Dr. JACKS. Well, the president of the colony is here—he wasn't at that time; at that time, I think Mr. Ingram was made president of the colony, I imagine, I don't know—my mind is not just clear on that; but that was the colony—Blalock Colony—and there may be three or four men down there, but I came out a year and a half ago; simply came out because I had nothing to stay there for. They got all my cattle, horses, and I had a good stock of drugs, and they made me practice three or four months with them, but I got ahead of this Lopez De Lara. I was held a prisoner 19 days and court-martialed and ordered shot by Lopez De Lara. Mr. Blalock was one of the Americans who helped to rescue me, through the American consul and Mexican officers at Tampico. They knew it was not so, but they wouldn't let me bring a witness at all; they were just bound to shoot me—they did shoot at me. These was all Carranza people now—no one else at all—these was no bandits at all, it was Carranza soldiers. I met a little bunch coming in to Xicotencatl—I had had a great deal of sickness, and I went to Tampico with my servants—always carry servants there, a mozo, and we were riding and met a bunch of about 25, and they hailed me. I didn't answer them, and they opened fire on me but didn't hit me, and I rode right up to them. Well, one of the men got a beating; that is, with a machete—that was a bad beating—one of these long knives, and, of course, if it had hit me that wouldn't have saved me—wouldn't have done me any good—but they didn't; that is about all there is about it. Now, in regards to being held. John Rose was also being held—one of the men who was being held with me. He was a cattle dealer, John Rose was; he and I were together—you have heard his name here. He had started to Tampico with me. Well, then, my last experience there—well, then, an experience before that was with this Rodriguez; he was one of the main men that got our stock.

Senator SMITH. Now, whom did Rodriguez follow?

Dr. JACKS. Rodrigo Flores, I just didn't finish his name—Rodrigo Flores, he was the man that did it, he did more dirt than anybody ever did there in the colony, done more theft.

Senator SMITH. Whom was he supposed to be with?

Dr. JACKS. Carranza, he was a lieutenant colonel of Carranza, and his father was a general. I got personally acquainted with him later on, he said has was a friend of mine, but he didn't fail to send his men after my horses just the same, and take them, and he took a lot of my cattle and butchered them. Now, this man Rodrigo was the man that they said robbed so many of the other men and stood them up and shot them; but I wasn't there then; I heard Mr. Frasier give a little of that testimony this morning, and I read Mr. Blalock's a week ago, and I see he gave some of it—so they were there and knew more about it than I did.

Senator SMITH. What is your blood?

Dr. JACKS. I am a Cherokee Indian.

Senator SMITH. Is that all?

Dr. JACKS. No; that is not all I know; I couldn't tell it all this evening—my mind, I couldn't begin to tell it all.

Senator SMITH. What the committee is trying to get at now is the conditions there.

Dr. JACKS. Well, the conditions—I was there where Mr. Randle—of course, I have heard that, like anyone—when Randle was butchered and chopped up with a machete—with knives, and threw in the well; I was there also when this man was killed in the mountains—oh, Walter Hitt's brother-in-law—what is it? Brooks. I was there then at the same time and was doctoring in the colony all the time, and it is a hard matter for a man just to sketch out a thing, you know, and give the straight details about everything that has happened, and there are so many things to tell that it is enough to make any sane man go crazy—especially as I had a wife and six children—five little girls and a little boy—and not a dollar left in the world, or anything of the kind, there wasn't anything left, they had taken every dollar in the world I possessed.

Senator SMITH. They treated the balance of them left pretty much the same way?

Dr. JACKS. Yes, sir; but they never did punch me with a gun, although I was shot at and ordered shot.

Senator SMITH. I mean, as to property losses?

Dr. JACKS. Property losses? I learned that Rodrigo was the man that took part of my horses; I was very sick, had partial paralysis, and they brought me to El Paso to have an operation performed, during the time my main stock was taken; but my last stock, I wrote in to Mr. Hanson—he wrote me and I wrote him, I sent him the list at the time, 25 horses, and one of them a $500 horse, and mares that I paid $50 apiece for in Texas and shipped down there—I had a fine horse ranch and a fine cow ranch, and they got everything, nothing there, they didn't leave me a thing on earth to support my family with, or anything else. That, of course, just to kinder sketch along, as you know.

Now, in regards to Mr. Gorham, I couldn't give you any details; any more than his son wrote me—his son is my agent there now, looking after my property and so on; I have a farm.

Senator SMITH. Have you anything but your land?

Dr. JACKS. That is all—well, I had an old gray horse that they gave me back to practice medicine with; I furnished my own drugs until I didn't have anything to doctor with, and they sent me off to get drugs, and I didn't come back any more; I went to Tampico and got my passport and came out. This man, now, was Aniceto Mariana, that was the only one—the only bandit that ever did me any harm at all really—Aniceto Mariana, he was a lieutenant colonel that was there in charge under Mateo Hernandez, they skinned us of the last cattle at all, they taken everybody's.

Now, there is another thing—a man that had stole Mr. Blalock's coat came and called me out of my house; I walked right out to the edge of the gallery, and I had got about to where we was—I thought they would get me before I got out there; I didn't mind getting shot; I had got casehardened. He says, "Come out here." I says, "Tell me what you want to say to me." He says, "You come out here or I will shoot you." I says, "Shoot," and he made an oath and says, "I will come in and hang you;" he had two or three other men with him, and I said, "Come ahead," and he opened my yard gate and ran his horse in right up until his horse's head could touch me, with his rope in his hand; he said, "Why didn't you come to me when I called you?" And I said, "Why didn't you come here if you wanted to talk to me?" And he says, "I will hang you." I says, "Well, hang me, then, you have got your rope," I said, "hang me." And so he finally turned to a Mexican woman, who was my house-keeper. He says, "Is this your husband?" She said, "Yes." Well, there was no truth in that—my wife was in this country, in the United States—she was afraid they were going to kill me, and she thought that would help me out, by her saying that, and she said "Yes," and he burst out in a good laugh and said, "You had better quit him, he will kill you," and just turned and rode out and said good bye, and that was all then; and he had on Mr. Blalock's cow coat then, a leather coat they wear in picking up cattle; and he was then with the Villistas.

Senator SMITH. Well, what was that? I don't want to interrupt you; go ahead.

Dr. JACKS. Well, I have just got so much in my head, it is hard for me—

Senator SMITH. Well, from the time that this trouble commenced up to the time you left there—

Dr. JACKS. Yes; I was going to speak about the taking of stock there.

Senator SMITH. Well, I understand. I mean as to the general conditions, as to peace and order in that country?

Dr. JACKS. Oh, peace and order? Everything that was done was done by the Carranza army; they did more harm, three to one, than any of the other fellows ever did do, after they ever came in there; if we had any friend at all that offered us any friendship, it was the Villa people that did it; that was so, it was proved to me; it seemed most any of them would take anything they wanted, and I never would run out; I stayed as long as there was anything to stay for; and, besides, when they were fixing to rob me—I had a little money planted among the trees in my yard on the place, $1,600—and at the time they gave me a paper—a passport, they said—they had Col. Mariana come out and buy drugs; they found out that the Federals were coming up there right away, and, as the captain had always promised me—for a favor I did him—that if he ever knew anything was coming up against me he would let me know, and he came up there and said, "The lieutenant colonel wants to know if you will send him $200 in silver for $200 in gold."

Well, the first thing that popped into my head was how did they know I had any money? And they had sent a man the day before that to borrow money, $250; his name was John Medlin—you have heard his name called here at different times—John was doing a little business for them, buying a little whisky and tobacco and such stuff, trying to save his own stock through this, and did for a while. Well, I told him, "I am sorry I haven't got it." John told me he would leave the money with the general, and did do it, down in the valley with the Federals. Just before he got through—the captain—and left, he says, "I will tell you, Doctor, we will be here early tomorrow morning." That was the main thing he wanted to tell me and to impress upon me, that they were going to rob me the next morning. And just as soon as he told me, I got right out of there, and I saw he made emphasis enough to it to make it a friendly word, for he wanted to tell me right away; so he left, and I told my servant to get ready to go out, to come to my house at 4 o'clock the next morning, and he came there, and by sunup the next morning I was getting across the mountains. I was out of his lines—I knew that was earlier than he would start; I went to Mr. Taylor's and stopped and took breakfast with Mr. Taylor, right on the Federal lines, right where they almost daresn't go, and fed my horses and drank some coffee and left. Taylor says, "Don't leave Mariana until I come," he says; "if my passport will come I will go on with you." The American consul wrote me that my passport was there, so I knew I wasn't going back there. The next morning, when Taylor came there, he said, "Doctor, you just barely escaped," he said; "there were three armed men there after you, but you had gone; you were hardly out of sight when they came there." I did have $300 American gold with me at the time, and the way I escaped with it I put it in my morral and hung it to the horn of my saddle, and put it in another larger one filled with corn, so that if they would touch it they would feel nothing but the corn, not the money; and sure enough, we ran into some of them, and the leader touched the corn and said, "What have you got there?" I said, "Corn." "What do you want with corn?" "Feed my horse with." That was all that let me out with my money. As for the cattle, I was there and knew that they had taken everybody's cattle; Mr. Blalock had some cattle left there. And every now and then there was a brand or mark of Mr. Smith's, or Mr. Tom Young's, or somebody's; but what could you say?

Every once in a while you could see your stock going off with them. During the time they left me three or four milk cows and a jersey bull to plow the crop; I had my Mexicans put on the horse collar—they stole my horse away, big large stallion, I wouldn't have taken $500 for him—they put that on the bull and put the harness on him and plowed and finished laying by the crop as best they could, so they left me that, and made me pay $8 a head on them to let John Medlin run across the mountain and bring them back whisky and tobacco and matches, and such stuff as I didn't have and had to get within the Federal lines, or Xicotencatl, which is in what is known as the federal district.

Senator SMITH. Well, what is known as the federal district at this time?

Dr. JACKS. Well, the federals were in one town and the rebels had run them out of our community, that was this fellow I spoke of—this Aniceto Mariana—there were about four thousand of them, and Zapatistas, and they stayed on us three months—during that time, three months, came in on the 24th day of April, and turned me loose on the 28d day of July—I was a prisoner that long; still I could go anywhere, but dare not cross the line.

Senator SMITH. It was sure death?

Dr. JACKS. They would shoot me sure, but they allowed me a little more privilege than they did some of the others, because they wanted me to practice medicine with them and doctor their sick.

Senator SMITH. All right. That is all, Doctor. Did you ever prepare a list of your damages?

Dr. JACKS. I sent it here; I sent it to Mr. Hanson.

Senator SMITH. You identify the things you sent to Mr. Hanson?

Dr. JACKS. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. As listed on your list?

Dr. JACKS. Yes, sir. And I knew every man nearly that was in there and got this stuff; the federals got most of my horses and stuff, the rebels didn't get anything hardly, the federals got it; and the very night they caught me, on the 28d of April, and had that fight, the Federals got three horses that night, only left me an old stallion and three or four horses, and the rebels got them, and finally returned to me one horse over for me to practice medicine, because I wouldn't walk for them, and they sent that back to me.

Senator SMITH. All right.

We have no other witnesses that we can examine this afternoon, except those that we wish to examine in executive session, so you will leave us in possession of the room, that we may take their testimony that way.

(The room was cleared of everyone except the committee, its attachés, and the official reporters, and the committee went into executive session.)

TUESDAY, JANUARY 20, 1920.

SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
UNITED STATES SENATE.

The subcommittee met pursuant to the call of the chairman, at 10.50 o'clock a. m., in the pink room of the Gunter Hotel, in San Antonio, Tex., Senator Marcus A. Smith presiding.

Present: Senator Smith and Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee.

TESTIMONY OF MRS. F. M. PARMELEE.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Mr. JACKSON. You are Mrs. F. M. Parmelee?

Mrs. PARMELEE. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Mrs. Parmelee, you were the wife of Mr. G. M. Parmelee?

Mrs. PARMELEE. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. What became of Mr. Parmelee?

Mrs. PARMELEE. He was killed by bandits, I presume, on December 29, 1917.

Senator SMITH. Nineteen and when?

Mrs. PARMELEE. 1917.

Senator SMITH. 1917. Where?

Mrs. PARMELEE. Between Mercedes and Llano Grande.

Senator SMITH. In the United States?

Mrs. PARMELEE. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. How far from the border?

Mrs. PARMELEE. I think it was about 6 miles from the border, wasn't it?

Senator SMITH. Can you give the details of that killing—the circumstances?

Mrs. PARMELEE. Well, I can give from hearsay, not positive. Two weeks before that my husband came home and he said, "We have had warnings from across the river that some of the bandits are coming over and rob the pay roll and kill all the men at Llano Grande," where there is a sugar mill. Well, two weeks after that my husband went in with another man, Charley Greenslade, to get the pay roll at Mercedes, and the people at Mercedes said they might need guards, and it was a very cold day, and you know how Mexicans are with the cold. My husband said that he did not think there was any danger on account of this extreme cold weather; that they would not molest them in any way. Well, when they started out they started at about 1.30. When they got out about 6 miles, I believe, from town, there was a closed gate, and there was a rock against it on the other side, closing the gate. My husband was in a Ford, and he said he never stopped for a closed gate with a Ford and they pushed right on through the gate, and just after they pushed through the gate—it was a plan of the Mexicans, we presume—when the car stopped to shoot both of them, and get the pay roll. Well, they went right through. Of course, they had to slow up quite a bit. Just as they got to the other side of the gate the Mexicans fired; they fired about six shots. One killed my husband instantly. He was driving, and just as soon as he fell back, Charley Greenslade took the wheel, and about 10 minutes after that they met some rangers, and a posse was formed right then to follow these men. Now, I do not know how many were killed; they said they killed several, and I heard Capt. Spencer Crump, he was talking to me, and he said that he led the posse, and he was positive that some of the men that were in the posse are still living on the other side of the river, and that they have had trouble with them since. Capt. Spencer Crump could possibly tell you that.

Senator SMITH. You mean that they were in the posse pursuing them?

Mrs. PARMELEE. No; they were in the band of bandits—with the bandits.

Senator SMITH. They are over on the other side?

Mrs. PARMELEE. Yes, sir; they have given them trouble.

Senator SMITH. Now, was your husband supposed to have money to pay the men?

Mrs. PARMELEE. My husband had the pay roll for the sugar mill.

Senator SMITH. I mean, did he have the money?

Mrs. PARMELEE. Yes; he had the money.

Senator SMITH. Pay roll means a list of names; but he had the money to pay the men?

Mrs. PARMELEE. Yes, sir; he had the cash.

Senator SMITH. Did he have it with him?

Mrs. PARMELEE. Yes.

Senator SMITH. Did they get the money from him?

Mrs. PARMELEE. No.

Senator SMITH. Why?

Mrs. PARMELEE. Because, Mr. Greenslade, as soon as my husband was shot, put on all the speed that they had and they shot several times; he was inflicted several times with flesh wounds, but got away before the Mexicans could get him.

Senator SMITH. Then immediately afterwards, you say, a posse was formed to pursue the Mexicans. Where did they go, across the river?

Mrs. PARMELEE. Well, I do not know just where they went. I heard they chased them to the river; I heard they chased them to the river and killed some of them, and some of them got in boats and went across the river, and I heard that one or two were killed on the way across.

Senator SMITH. Where was your husband raised?

Mrs. PARMELEE. In Elyria, Ohio.

Senator SMITH. He was a citizen of the United States?

Mrs. PARMELEE. Yes.

Senator SMITH. When did he move down to Texas?

Mrs. PARMELEE. In 1911, I believe.

Senator SMITH. What pay roll was that you referred to; what were the men doing that were getting paid with this money?

Mrs. PARMELEE. The Llano Grande Sugar Mill; I believe that is the name.

Senator SMITH. Where was that located?

Mrs. PARMELEE. At Llano Grande; that is between Mercedes and the border.

Senator SMITH. Did your husband leave you anything, or are you dependent on your own labor for your living?

Mrs. PARMELEE. No; I am dependent on my own labor. He left me something, but not enough to make me financially independent.

Senator SMITH. That will do, I think.

TESTIMONY OF JOHN B. BLOCKER.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator SMITH. Where were you born?

Mr. BLOCKER. Edgefield District, S. C.

Senator SMITH. You are an American citizen?

Mr. BLOCKER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Never renounced your allegiance?

Mr. BLOCKER. No, sir.

Senator SMITH. Mr. Blocker, did you ever live in Mexico?

Mr. BLOCKER. Yes, sir; I have had a ranch there about 20 years.

Senator SMITH. Whereabouts?

Mr. BLOCKER. In the State of Coahuila.

Senator SMITH. Coahuila?

Mr. BLOCKER. Yes, sir; about 150 miles right west of Eagle Pass and 130 miles right west of Del Rio.

Senator SMITH. Then, it was in the State of President Carranza?

Mr. BLOCKER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Was he governor of Coahuila once?

Mr. BLOCKER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Now give as succinctly as you can a brief history of your treatment there and the resulting loss that you have sustained, if any, and what you have gotten back, if you have gotten anything.

Mr. BLOCKER. Well, we started that ranch in 1898.

Senator SMITH. "We" started the ranch; was anyone connected with you in it?

Mr. BLOCKER. Yes, sir; it is a stock company under the laws of Mexico; we organized under the laws of Mexico.

Senator SMITH. Purchased that land or rented it?

Mr. BLOCKER. We first rented, and then purchased it all. We first rented when we went there in 1898; we leased 125,000 acres, and about two years after that we bought 125,000 acres, and the year after that we bought another 125,000 acres, and in 1908 or 1909 we bought 237,000 acres of the Madero company. Our first year's work there was perfectly satisfactory; everything worked nice; we were treated well, and during Diaz's administration nobody was ever treated any nicer than we were.

Senator SMITH. When did your troubles commence?

Mr. BLOCKER. After the Madero revolution commenced. Our troubles commenced after Madero was killed. We never had any trouble until after Madero was killed, but when he was killed then our troubles commenced.

Senator SMITH. What were these troubles?

Mr. BLOCKER. Well, we were bothered by roving bands; some called Carrancistas, some Villistas, some Orozquistas, and they just molested us so that we could not stay in there. Our horses were taken from us. The first raid made on us was by Gen. Caraveo, and he came there with about 900 men, and 1,000 or 1,200 horses, and took a hundred and twenty-odd horses from our ranch, 10 big work-mules, killed 40 hogs, all the chickens that we had on the ranch, and killed the milch cows and calves, and killed all the beef they wanted and stayed there four or five days and pulled out.

Senator SMITH. Who was he?

Mr. BLOCKER. He was supposed to be a man in Orozco's division of rebels.

Senator SMITH. Which Orozco; Orozco himself?

Mr. BLOCKER. Orozco himself.

Senator SMITH. That was the first raid?

Mr. BLOCKER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. You say this continued constantly?

Mr. BLOCKER. Yes, sir; this continued constantly from that time on. In the seven or eight years we lost something like 350 or 400 saddle horses, and on this same raid of this Orozco we lost about $2,000 or $3,000 worth of provisions out of our commissary; they didn't leave enough for the women and children to eat.

Senator SMITH. These depredations kept up until the whole place was denuded?

Mr. BLOCKER. Yes, sir. We commenced moving out, getting out what we could, and selling at a sacrifice and any other way to get out to save what we could from the wreck.

Senator SMITH. What do you estimate the losses of these depredations to be reasonably worth?

Mr. BLOCKER. Well, sir, you couldn't hardly figure that.

Senator SMITH. Have you ever made any claim yet?

Mr. BLOCKER. No, sir; we have never made any claim yet. If we had not been molested, the ranch was bringing us a clear profit of revenue of half a million dollars—to-day the ranch would have been paying us over half a million dollars income.

Senator SMITH. If you had been left alone as you were under the Diaz administration?

Mr. BLOCKER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Did you have any visits from the Carrancista soldiers?

Mr. BLOCKER. Yes, sir; lots of them.

Senator SMITH. Was that while Carranza was supposed to be in control—while he was President?

Mr. BLOCKER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. When did that occur and to what extent were those depredations carried on?

Mr. BLOCKER. Well, they would come there and pretend—say that they wanted some horses, and we would tell them that we didn't have any horses, and they would just go to the lot and get out as many horses as they pleased and take them off, and take your provisions and kill your beef or just whatever they pleased.

Senator SMITH. Did they ever pay you anything for it?

Mr. BLOCKER. Not a cent on earth.

Senator SMITH. All through these depredations what federal authority, if any, attempted to or seemed to try to prevent these depredations?

Mr. BLOCKER. They didn't any of them try to prevent them.

Senator SMITH. And when the alleged rebels were there?

Mr. BLOCKER. I paid $2,000 for a man by the name of Delamain. I paid $2,000 ransom for that man, and it was to a man that was supposed to be a major in Carranza's army.

Senator SMITH. Carranza's army?

Mr. BLOCKER. Carranza's army; yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. You paid for him?

Mr. BLOCKER. I gave it to Mr. Delamain to pay. Mr. Delamain was our foreman on the ranch. We had seven or eight men run out of there, and we had to just keep changing them, and a nephew of mine, J. M. Blocker, he was run out of there three times. And a man by the name of Dawson, he was run out twice, Edgar Dawson; and a fellow by the name of Cull Bruner was run out.

Senator SMITH. Now were they run out by the assaults of these men?

Mr. BLOCKER. Yes, sir. They would come out there, and these men would hear they were coming, and they would get uneasy and leave. This Blocker, a nephew of mine, he was warned to leave. There was a Mexican came to him and told him that one of the Carranza men at Boquillas, the little town of Boquillas, was going to send over there the next day and get him, so he pulled out the night before they got there.

Senator SMITH. What are the present conditions in that particular State, if you know, as to preservation of law and order?

Mr. BLOCKER. There was no order.

Senator SMITH. There was none?

Mr. BLOCKER. No, sir; the rifle was the law. This fellow Musquiz that took this money from Dalamain he was at my ranch there one day talking, and I was talking to him and I said, "You should not do this; there is no law for acting this way," and he tapped his rifle and said, "Here is the law." That was the Mauser-rifle law.

Senator SMITH. And that you found to be a fact?

Mr. BLOCKER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. As to the present conditions in Coahuila, do you know?

Mr. BLOCKER. I do not know much about the present conditions in Coahuila. I know that two years ago Mr. Weathersby and Russel put three or four thousand head of cattle on this Piedra Blanca ranch of ours, and I know they lost a thousand of them out of the 3,000. They were driven off and butchered, and they found where they were butchered and they caught the men and carried them to Saltillo and they were turned loose after they were captured and carried there; they were turned loose and had nothing done to them. They found the beef in the camp and the brands of the cattle, and nothing was done.

Senator SMITH. And that was the condition when you left?

Mr. BLOCKER. Yes, sir. I know we have not got a cent of revenue off the ranch in five years; it is half a million acres of land lying idle.

Senator SMITH. That will do, I think.

Mr. JACKSON. Thank you, Mr. Blocker.

Senator SMITH. We are short of witnesses this morning and we will have to go into executive session for a little bit, and after that I think we will adjourn for the day. We will get through this morning. We will go into executive session now.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 31, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The subcommittee met pursuant to the call of the chairman at 10.30 o'clock a. m. in the Pink Room of the Gunter Hotel, in San Antonio, Tex., Senator Marcus A. Smith presiding.

Present: Senator Smith and Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee.

TESTIMONY OF W. B. HINKLY.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator SMITH. Where were you born?

Mr. HINKLY. Luverne, Minn.

Senator SMITH. You are an American citizen?

Mr. HINKLY. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Where have you lived recently, the last several years?

Mr. HINKLY. I lived for 12 years in the Rio Grande Valley.

Senator SMITH. Where?

Mr. HINKLY. In the Rio Grande Valley, San Benito, Tex.

Senator SMITH. How far were you from the international line, the river?

Mr. HINKLY. San Benito is about 8 miles from the river.

Senator SMITH. Do you know anything of any raids across the river or depredations on the American homes or property on this side of the river?

Mr. HINKLY. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Will you please tell of those raids, and especially affecting you and your property?

Mr. HINKLY. Well, the first few years I was down here, up until about five years ago—four years ago, about the time that the Madero revolution came up—while Diaz was in power in Mexico everything was very peaceful on the river—we had no trouble with stealing or anything; but ever since the revolution started in Mexico, ever since then, we have had a good deal of stealing and, of course, we had a good deal of bandit trouble about three years ago, and there has been a good deal of stealing ever since then.

Senator SMITH. On what Mexican state does Texas border?

Mr. HINKLY. Tamaulipas is the Mexican state opposite San Benito, our country.

Senator SMITH. Who was supposed to have control in Mexico over that side at that time?

Mr. HINKLY. Well, Carranza has had control over it for the last several years.

Senator SMITH. Now, since Carranza has been in control of it, how about the depredations down there?

Mr. HINKLY. Well, up to the time of the revolution there never were any depredations there. During the Diaz administration I lived on the bank of the river myself—right on the bank of the river—for about two years, and during that time there was nothing stolen, and we had no trouble then.

Senator SMITH. Well, when did it commence?

Mr. HINKLY. It commenced when the revolution started in Mexico, after Diaz was overthrown, and then more stealing since Carranza has been in power than any other time.

Senator SMITH. What property did you have down there?

Mr. HINKLY. Well, I owned about five or six different farms; I had a couple of dairies—the principal interests that I have there—and I am in the manufacturing business—I run a wholesale ice-cream business there.

Senator SMITH. What is your nearest town?

Mr. HINKLY. I live in San Benito.

Senator SMITH. Was that the point where you did your selling and trading, with your dairy that you said you had?

Mr. HINKLY. Yes, sir; I was also cashier of the bank there for five years.

Senator SMITH. State what you know of those raids along that border?

Mr. HINKLY. The raids along the border, what they called the bandit raids, I do not remember the exact date when they started, but I believe it was about three years ago. The people around San Benito, there, got news that the Mexican were organizing to make raids on the people; the first fight they had was at a ranch about 12 miles from San Benito where they heard that there was a bunch of bandits organizing, and the posse went out there and found them. I think there were one or two Mexicans killed and two officers wounded, I believe, in that first fight. After that the raids occurred at intervals of about every two weeks—that is, the fights right in that locality, about every two weeks.

Senator SMITH. How far do you live from Brownsville?

Mr. HINKLY. It is 21 miles from Brownsville.

Senator SMITH. Up the river?

Mr. HINKLY. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. What was the amount of the settlement on the American side along that river in your vicinity?

Mr. HINKLY. At what time?

Senator SMITH. At the time of which you speak; any time before they were driven out, if they were driven out; I have not got to that yet.

Mr. HINKLY. It had had a very rapid growth—our locality had, at the time I went there in 1907 there was no town at San Benito at all, and they didn't even have a post office, and just before the bandit raid started, I think, San Benito had a population of five or six thousand people; the country was prosperous, all the farmers around there were prosperous, and the community was growing very rapidly. As soon as the bandit raids started the more timid ones commenced to move at once, and inside of three months, I think, all the tenant farmers had left and a good many people there left their own farms, and others went up north or came to town and stayed until the bandit troubles were over. Some of them returned and some did not return.

Senator SMITH. How often would those incursions from Mexico occur?

Mr. HINKLY. Well, my observations of it was that there was a big raid pulled off about every two weeks.

Senator SMITH. At some point along the border there?

Mr. HINKLY. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Where would these bandits or the lawless people come from?

Mr. HINKLY. Nearly all of them were traced across the river, come across over the river and were driven back to the river, traced across the river.

Senator SMITH. Do you know of any on this side of the river, Mexicans, for instance, joining in those raids, or do you know?

Mr. HINKLY. The first fight that was had near San Benito, they rounded up some men out at this ranch about 12 miles from San Benito, and that was the only bunch that I know of having been found that was organized on this side. Now, whether they were operating with people from the other side I do not know; but after that fight everything crossed from the other side of the river there was nothing organized on this side.

Senator SMITH. I understand you, then, that there was a reign of terror on our side of the river?

Mr. HINKLY. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. On account of these invasions?

Mr. HINKLY. Yes, sir; everybody was afraid to stay out in the country. There was not anybody stayed in the country during those bandit raids. All the farms laid out. There were no farms under cultivation there that year.

Senator SMITH. About how far did that extend up and down the river—that leaving their homes to get out of danger?

Mr. HINKLY. That was more or less general, I think, all through the Rio Grande Valley; what they call the Lower Rio Grande Valley; that is, the part that is in cultivation. In our particular locality I think it was about as bad as any other place in the valley.

Senator SMITH. What number of families would you estimate, at a rough guess, had to leave the country and leave their homes on account of those raids?

Mr. HINKLY. It would undoubtedly run into the hundreds of families.

Senator SMITH. Many of them have not yet returned?

Mr. HINKLY. Yes; I would say a great many of them have not yet returned; however, I think that probably more than half of them have returned.

Senator SMITH. As to the depredations on the movable property in that county—cattle, horses, and crops and stores—if there were any, whether or not this property was ever taken, or whether it was left there intact?

Mr. HINKLY. No, sir; there were—there was a good deal of stealing right around San Benito. I do not think there was very many raids in which property was taken, but it was mostly all taken in thefts—stealing.

Senator SMITH. By common stealing?

Mr. HINKLY. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. What were those raids for, does it seem; to hurt some one?

Mr. HINKLY. Yes, sir; those raids were conducted for the purpose of killing.

Senator SMITH. Any robbing?

Mr. HINKLY. No, sir. Well, they robbed some stores, but it seems they wanted to kill people; that was the main thing.

Senator SMITH. Do you know anything about the size of the bands that would come across the river?

Mr. HINKLY. Well, they ranged all the way from 15 to 20 up to 100 or more.

Senator SMITH. How long did this continue?

Mr. HINKLY. It continued for about a year.

Senator SMITH. What is the condition there now—any better or worse?

Mr. HINKLY. Well, we have had no raids since the soldiers were located down there in big bands, large quantities.

Senator SMITH. When were the soldiers located there?

Mr. HINKLY. The soldiers—the militia, it took them about four months to get down there from the time the raids started.

Senator SMITH. You mean the State troops?

Mr. HINKLY. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Any Federal troops there; any United States troops?

Mr. HINKLY. Yes, sir; the Federal troops were the first ones to get there; we had the Twenty-sixth Infantry; they were the first ones there.

Senator SMITH. After the establishment of those soldiers there, a greater quiet, I understand you to say, prevailed?

Mr. HINKLY. Yes, sir. There were about 60,000 soldiers moved into that territory within a radius of about 60 miles, and after they came down everything soon quieted down.

Senator SMITH. I think that is all.

TESTIMONY OF E. L. TURNER.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator SMITH. Where were you born?

Mr. TURNER. DeWitt County, Tex.

Senator SMITH. You are a citizen of the United States?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Do you know anything about the raids along the border? Where do you live in Texas now, or have for the last several years?

Mr. TURNER. For the last two years I have been living in San Antonio.

Senator SMITH. Where were you at the time of those raids down there; do you know anything about that?

Mr. TURNER. Well, I went down there in 1911, and the first three years were very quiet and peaceful, and after the first three years till 1915, when I left there, why, we were disturbed by the bandits, and the last four months we had to go in bunches to keep our families together and stay and guard, not knowing whether they would or would not come in, so we was expecting them any time.

Senator SMITH. How long did that condition prevail there where you were guarding families in bunches?

Mr. TURNER. About four months before I left there.

Senator SMITH. How long after that before any troops came down to the assistance of the people there?

Mr. TURNER. Well, that I could not say just when the troops went there.

Senator SMITH. Why?

Mr. TURNER. Well, I left there and came up to Corpus Christi, and I seen troops going in, but I was not present to see where they were putting them.

Senator SMITH. Where was your place?

Mr. TURNER. One mile below Santa Maria, on the interurban line.

Senator SMITH. What did you do down there?

Mr. TURNER. I had a truck farm and hogs.

Senator SMITH. Where was your point of dealing?

Mr. TURNER. Mercedes.

Senator SMITH. Are you still living there?

Mr. TURNER. No, sir.

Senator SMITH. Why did you leave there?

Mr. TURNER. Well, because we could not stay up and guard all night and make a living to support our families.

Senator SMITH. Did you feel, or not, whether your families were safe?

Mr. TURNER. Did not feel like they were safe.

Senator SMITH. And on that account—

Mr. TURNER. On that account we left there.

Senator SMITH. Did that condition generally prevail as long as your experience extended?

Mr. TURNER. Well, so far as I know there were several families left out of the valley before I did, and at the same time I did and after I did; people I know.

Senator SMITH. What were your losses down there; your individual losses?

Mr. TURNER. Well, I could not replace to-day my losses for $3,000; what my loss was when I left there.

Senator SMITH. What occasioned the losses?

Mr. TURNER. Well, you mean what were the losses?

Senator SMITH. What caused it; how come you to lose it?

Mr. TURNER. On account of the Mexican bandits, the Mexican trouble, we were actually afraid to stay there, and we had to get up and come off and leave there.

Senator SMITH. That is all.

TESTIMONY OF HENRY FORRES.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator SMITH. Where have you lived, Mr. Forres, for the last 20 years?

Mr. FORRES. In Mexico.

Senator SMITH. Are you an American citizen?

Mr. FORRES. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Where were you born?

Mr. FORRES. Fayetteville, Tex.

Senator SMITH. Your experience in Mexico for the last 20 years, where have you lived?

Mr. FORRES. I have been all over the Republic; principally in Coahuila, Nuevo Leon, and Tamaulipas.

Senator SMITH. What has been your business in Mexico?

Mr. FORRES. In leasing lands for oil and coal.

Senator SMITH. Connected with any corporation?

Mr. FORRES. At times, but for the last several years acting independently.

Senator SMITH. You are not representing any of the alleged big interests?

Mr. FORRES. No, sir.

Senator SMITH. Acting entirely on your own—

Mr. FORRES. Absolutely.

Senator SMITH. Line of business?

Mr. FORRES. Getting leases and then getting friends of mine to buy them.

Senator SMITH. And you would just obtain a lease and then obtain a purchaser for it?

Mr. FORRES. Either that or tie it up under an option and then get some party with a little money to go in and finance it.

Senator SMITH. Had you ever lived at Matamoros?

Mr. FORRES. I am living at Matamoros now.

Senator SMITH. At this time?

Mr. FORRES. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. What were the conditions in Mexico up to the time of the revolution as to peace and order?

Mr. FORRES. Up to the time of the revolution a person could have gone into any part of the Republic, either day or night, without an escort and not be bothered, and have slept with the doors of his house open and no one would have entered at all.

Senator SMITH. And the country at that time was as safe as any country?

Mr. FORRES. Absolutely.

Senator SMITH. When did that peaceful condition change?

Mr. FORRES. As soon as Madero started his revolution.

Senator SMITH. Will you please detail the experiences you have had down there in the development of that newer condition of things?

Mr. FORRES. Well, it has been so voluminous, because I have been right in between the different bunches of revolutionists ever since Madero started his revolution.

Senator SMITH. What members of revolutionists as known by the heads of them?

Mr. FORRES. Well, it is pretty hard to determine, because the Mexican is a very ambitious kind of a fellow, and if one has eight or ten men operating independently, he calls himself a general. At one time, in Piedras Negras, right opposite Eagle Pass, 15 generals had a banquet, and I do not think any one of those generals, at any one time, had ever had over 40 men under his command.

Senator SMITH. Then you have been in the country where the Villistas are?

Mr. FORRES. The Villistas, the Carrancistas, the Maderistas, the Zapatistas, the Felicistas, and the Palaecistas, and every "partido" in the country.

Senator SMITH. Every shade of revolution?

Mr. FORRES. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Do you know anything about an article known as 27 in the new constitution that they have adopted since Carranza's reign?

Mr. FORRES. Article 27 was devised by Luis Cabrera, and I think it is the most ingenious piece of legislation for selling the subsoil that was ever invented by the mind of man.

Senator SMITH. What was the effect of that article 27 on the American interests in Mexico?

Mr. FORRES. It virtually means the confiscation of all of the oil rights of the Republic.

Senator SMITH. How did it affect your particular business?

Mr. FORRES. It absolutely wipes us out if it is sustained, because all of the leases that I have gotten have been since that time.

Senator SMITH. What was your personal experience within the last week or so in Mexico in this regard?

Mr. FORRES. I went to Mexico City about two weeks ago in order to get some denouncements removed that some parties in Brownsville, American citizens all, with the exception of a party by the name of Pacheco, a merchant, and the American citizens were Fernandez, a banker; Cole, a lawyer; Friedman, a German-Jewish money lender; Dr. Dixon, recently discharged from the United States Army; a man by the name of Walker; and another by the name of Craig; they had denounced about a thousand acres right in the heart of a lease of 50,000 acres that some clients of mine at Wichita Falls were drilling on, had the machinery there on the ground; and I went to Mexico City with a petition from the owners—I have here a copy of one of the petitions taken to Mexico City, signed by the owners, protesting against these people going in and denouncing their property—subsoiling their property; they stole it, deliberately went in and made a survey of this property, and then went to Mexico City and denounced it, and some of these same owners are among the Carrancistas. So when I got to Mexico City I tried to see Salinas, and I would go to his office in the morning—

Senator SMITH. Who is Salinas?

Mr. FORRES. Salinas is the subsecretary of the Department of Industria y Comercio—Industry and Commerce—in Mexico City; but he was having a conference every day with Carranza, because he was going East to see Secretary Lansing, and at the same time to see some financiers in New York to tell them so far as any anti-legislation was concerned that everything was going to be removed. The reason of that was that every officeholder in Mexico City of any prominence is supporting one or the other of the candidates—either Bonillas or Pablo Gonzales—and trying to get the money power at least to back one of the two as against Obregon, the independent candidate and an anti-Carrancista. But I never got to see Salinas. I went there first, I was there repeatedly, and repeatedly, and repeatedly; and after I saw his chief, a man by the name of Shiafano—I had to wait two days to see him, because those fellows all have kind of reception days that they receive and other than that you do not see them—and after seeing this fellow, the first thing he said—he had read all of my documents, because I had left them there two or three weeks, some of them, and some of them I had taken there with me in the last few days, on my trip down. He said, “Why, you people have absolutely no claim on these properties whatever, because your contracts were all made after May, 1917.”

Senator SMITH. That was the date of this article?

Mr. FORRES. The date of the constitution—the date of article 27; yes, sir. I told him, “Well, but under the ruling of your last Congress this article was to be revised.” He said, “Yes, but that was just a project”; that the article 27 was effective. I then asked him whether or not a party could deliberately go in a man’s private property and denounce the subsoil of the property without getting the consent of the owners, telling him that the owners of the land had acquired their title from the King of Spain and had been in continuous, actual, adverse, peaceable possession for over 100 years. He said that the oil and all the derivatives of the oil belonged to the nation, and that there was no controversy on that, inasmuch as oil was a substance, it was a national property and that if I wanted to I could go out to Guadalupe, a suburb of Mexico City, and denounce the property so far as the subsoil was concerned. Well, that got me up in the air; I had never agreed to his rulings. I finally asked him—I said, “Well, can we denounce some of my property, go in and work it?” He said, “No; you have allowed too much time to elapse.” We only denounced our property in June last year; that is, we registered our titles in June, and these other people denounced the land in August of last year; but I had no rights and these other people went in and denounced.

Senator SMITH. Well, as a real fact, they stood about in the same attitude as to the right of location as you stood?

Mr. FORRES. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. That is, they had no superior right in the world?

Mr. FORRES. They had no right whatever.

Senator SMITH. And yet they were allowed to denounce the very property that you were in possession of, and they refused to let you denounce it?

Mr. FORRES. Absolutely. He asked me—he said, “I do not see how you get your titles, your leases, registered, because you first have to get permission of the governor of the State before you can register a lease.” I told him—I said, “We have letters from Gov. Osuna authorizing us to register these leases.” He said that Gov. Osuna had no right to grant this authority. My leases were registered and protocolized two months before these other people went in and made their denouncement, so a couple of days after, when they found I was going to the States, they came to me and told me that if I wanted to get this fixed, they could adjudicate this matter, but I told them that there was nothing to adjust.

Senator SMITH. Adjudicate your rights, how?

Mr. FORRES. Well, this man Santaella is one of the chiefs of the department of petroleum, and when Shiaffano saw that I would not abide by his decision, they "passed the buck" to this other man; and, inasmuch as I would not see him, his brother, being a lawyer, sent me word that if I would go to see him—Santaella's brother said that he would fix everything and get me anything that I might want. I told them that they were just two days too late; in other words, if I had gone and slipped them a piece of money, I could have gotten these denouncements removed. That is the reason I did not get anything in Mexico—because these other people from Brownsville had beat me to it and slipped them a little piece of change.

Senator SMITH. So you got there too late?

Mr. FORRES. A little too late.

Senator SMITH. Did he say, or did anyone say, what hope of success has one appealing for property that has been treated as yours has; for instance, what relief has he in the courts?

Mr. FORRES. Absolutely none whatever; none whatever. If the native himself has no recourse, what recourse has a foreigner?

Senator SMITH. Then, as I understand, they do pretty much as they please, open and aboveboard, and just tell you you can not have the right?

Mr. FORRES. Well, that is the trouble in that country. They send a bunch of emissaries to the States, some of whom are Americans themselves, telling us how they love the American people and what they are going to do for us there, and inviting us there, and the door is open for capital; but among themselves they tell altogether a different sort of story—they do not need the foreign capital; they can develop their resources with their own money.

Senator SMITH. Have you noticed in their laws, or can you see rather, how under article 27, carried out in the spirit of its execution or passage, what chance do you see of any American holding oil, coal, or other mineral lands?

Mr. FORRES. He has absolutely no chance whatever—absolutely no chance whatever.

Senator SMITH. Article 27, then, is a confiscation?

Mr. FORRES. Absolutely; absolutely.

Senator SMITH. What remuneration do they purpose to give?

Mr. FORRES. There is no stipulation; and even if they agreed to give a remuneration, you would have to get it before you believed that you would get it.

Senator SMITH. In the meantime the forfeiture would go on?

Mr. FORRES. Absolutely.

Senator SMITH. Were you at Cuatro Cienegas when Mr. Carranza recently visited his old home?

Mr. FORRES. I was there.

Senator SMITH. The report came out that he went back in peace to his home, I believe. Were you there?

Mr. FORRES. Yes, sir; the Mexico City papers, all of the morning papers are Government organs, all of them controlled by the Carrancistas, and they came out in glaring headlines telling how peaceful things were in the Republic. They said, in order to illustrate, here is our president going up into the wilds of Coahuila to visit his ranches with only 400 men. He had 7,000 men more scattered all over that country.

Senator SMITH. Did you notice his train in which he came?

Mr. FORRES. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. How was that equipped?

Mr. FORRES. Sumptuously; they had everything in the world that a person could think of wanting, and in the little towns all that a person could see on every hand was destitution.

Senator SMITH. As to the armor or soldiers on the train—

Mr. FORRES. Well, the soldiers—the armored trains would either go in front or behind the presidential train. The presidential train was the train that Don Porfirio had during his régime.

Senator SMITH. Then the peaceful trip, you say, going into the wilds of the desert with 400 soldiers turned out to be fully 7,000?

Mr. FORRES. At least 7,000. He had every general from all over the Republic there with him.

Senator SMITH. That is, that was under his control?

Mr. FORRES. That was under his control. Why, if he had gone up to Cuatro Ciénegas with 400 men and Villa had known it, he would have taken him into the wilds of Sonora and held him as a hostage.

Senator SMITH. At least, he did not attempt to go there?

Mr. FORRES. No; not with 400 men; and he won't go anywhere with 400 men.

Senator SMITH. What chances do you see, looking over the country as much as you have; are the conditions improving down there?

Mr. FORRES. Oh, my ——! It is absolutely unsafe for a person to travel in any part of the Republic. For instance, their best train, the train that they boast of, is a train running from Laredo to Mexico City. This train gets into Saltillo about 8.30 at night and is held there until about 3.30 the next morning, because they are afraid to run from Saltillo to San Luis on account of the rebels blowing up the trains, and the train coming north from Mexico City is held at San Luis from 8 o'clock until 3.30 in the morning on account of fear of the rebels blowing it up going north.

Senator SMITH. The conditions then, you say, are just as bad as ever, as far as peace is concerned? These outrages that are committed there, are they confined to anybody or is it just recklessness, lawlessness, and disorder against everybody?

Mr. FORRES. No; there is not a feeling of animosity in general against foreigners, but of the Carrancistas against the Americans. You have not heard of any Germans being killed in the west part of the district in the Palaez neighborhood, nor any English; whenever you hear of some one being butchered, it is one of the Americans working for some one of the companies there. Six weeks ago I was all through the Tuxpam region. I went through the oil fields and got photographs to substantiate it. I happened to be at this little place of Agua Dulce, where Bowles and Rooney were killed, a couple of weeks ago. I was there about six weeks ago walking all over that country.

Senator SMITH. Who has charge of it, or control of it?

Mr. FORRES. The Carrancistas. There are no followers of Palaez in that district at all. The followers of Palaez are farther west along the line of the State of Hidalgo.

Senator SMITH. How did you go through without any molestation?

Mr. FORRES. God sometimes does wonderful things.

Senator SMITH. You think it was a sort of providence?

Mr. FORRES. Yes, sir. I would not take the trip again, not through that section.

Senator SMITH. From your knowledge of the Republic there, and your long experience, what authority has Carranza over the Republic of Mexico?

Mr. FORRES. Mr. Carranza has control of the cities, but the country around the cities he does not.

Senator SMITH. How do you account for this; do the outsiders have any necessity for taking possession of the cities?

Mr. FORRES. No; the outsiders, as a general rule, live off of the tribute that the ranch owners give them; the majority of the ranch owners and farmers are all in sympathy with the rebels.

Senator SMITH. Do you know President Carranza personally?

Mr. FORRES. I have known of Carranza for a great many years. I have never had any personal desire to know him, because I know of him. I have never asked favors of the Carrancistas either directly or indirectly, nor any other régime.

Senator SMITH. You have your reasons for that?

Mr. FORRES. Yes, sir. I do not want to be under any obligations to any faction in Mexico.

Senator SMITH. Do you know Mr. Gonzales—Gen. Gonzales?

Mr. FORRES. Gen. Pablo Gonzales? We all know of him around Monclova; yes.

Senator SMITH. How about him as to keeping order?

Mr. FORRES. It is impossible; it means the same old crowd, in the same old place. If either Pablo Gonzales or Bonillas are elected, it means the rule of Carranza. When I was at Cuatro Ciénegas we knew two months before anything was given out that Bonillas was the candidate selected by Carranza.

Senator SMITH. He was the personal representative of the Carranza government at Washington?

Mr. FORRES. Yes, sir; ambassador.

Senator SMITH. Ambassador there. How is Obregon; is he also a candidate for the Presidency?

Mr. FORRES. He is; yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Who is he supposed to represent; is he a Carrancista?

Mr. FORRES. He was; he was the prime reason of Carranza being President of the Republic—he and Villa—but after he got seated he treated them as he has done everyone else; he kicked him out. Obregon has now launched an independent campaign. He has never said anything against Carranza. The only thing Carranza can say against him is now he is affiliated with the rebels.

Senator SMITH. Running against Carranza?

Mr. FORRES. Yes.

Senator SMITH. Have you a passport to go back to Mexico?

Mr. FORRES. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Do you expect at some time to go back?

Mr. FORRES. It would be impossible for me to go back.

Senator SMITH. Why?

Mr. FORRES. Well, I noticed in the paper the other day that the Mexican consul had received instructions from Medina, at Mexico City, not to visé any passports.

Senator SMITH. To whom?

Mr. FORRES. To everyone testifying before your committee.

Senator SMITH. Anyone who comes before this committee of the United States Senate?

Mr. FORRES. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. To give evidence?

Mr. FORRES. Here is my passport with the visés [handing passport to Senator Smith].

Senator SMITH. Anyone coming before this committee, that they will not visé their passports to return to Mexico?

Mr. FORRES. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. In order to return, this passport that I have in my hand, of yours, I notice the number is 38933—in order to return to Mexico you would have to have this viséd by the consul here, I understand?

Mr. FORRES. Yes; either here or at Brownsville.

Senator SMITH. Or wherever you leave the country?

Mr. FORRES. Wherever I happen to leave; yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Have you presented that for visé?

Mr. FORRES. No, sir; because they know me all along the border and they have never asked me; in fact, they have not viséd my passport for several months, because I am so well known.

Senator SMITH. Are you going to present this?

Mr. FORRES. Oh, I will have to, because I have all of my maps and one thing and another in Matamoros, that I will want to get to take to Brownsville.

Senator SMITH. So your interests there, what you have left in Mexico, you have to go back to take care of, as I understand?

Mr. FORRES. No; I can only stand on the American side and look across.

Senator SMITH. I mean, that is your purpose—to try to get back?

Mr. FORRES. Yes, sir; to protect my interests.

Senator SMITH. Well, will you let me know, or the committee, the effect of the refusal to?

Mr. FORRES. With pleasure; yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Will you let us know the reasons assigned for not doing it?

Mr. FORRES. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Have you ever taken any pictures of the conditions down there?

Mr. FORRES. Yes, sir; I have got a number of photographs of the different parts of the country, but I gave the most of my pictures away; I have the original films with me.

Senator SMITH. You have the original films?

Mr. FORRES. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Have you any objection to our using them?

Mr. FORRES. Absolutely none; they are at your disposal.

Senator SMITH. All right; I would like to have them after they are developed. Have you ever seen the order of which you speak prohibiting the visé of passports of anyone who appeared before this committee to testify?

Mr. FORRES. I read in the paper of yesterday that order; I have not seen it; no, sir.

Senator SMITH. I have what purports to be a translation of this telegram.

Mr. FORRES. I would not be surprised, because I saw a gist of it in the Mexico papers before leaving Mexico.

Senator SMITH. Signed by the subsecretary of relations, Hilario Medina?

Mr. FORRES. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. I believe I will just ask the secretary to insert this order in the record. I want it proved as being a correct translation by some one who knows it is, and then I will have it inserted.

Mr. FORRES. I want to kind of give you an idea of the way things are down in Mexico City. There is an American by the name of Ryan who has been down there about five weeks. He doesn't speak a word of the language; he has organized what he calls the Ryan-Soteel Oil Corporation. Now, this party is there, he has been in Mexico City about five weeks, he doesn't speak a word of the language, and he has organized a corporation with Pablo Gonzales and this man Soteel, and has annual passes for him and his party to ride all over the Republic, and has been made assistant oil inspector for the Mexican Government. Now, he and a great many other Americans who have some mercenary interests will send out wonderful reports about how peaceable conditions are in Mexico. Among others, there are some people living in San Antonio who have private franchises for running special trains in the Republic, but the most pernicious of all is a little organ published in Mexico City by a man by the name of George F. Weeks, circulated freely all over the Nation, telling how peaceable things are all over Mexico, and some party who is ignorant of the conditions in general will buy this little magazine, and on the strength of it go down into Mexico and maybe lose his life. He is in the employ of the Mexican Government, of the Carranza government, and has been for a number of years.

Senator SMITH. The committee has seen evidences of an extensive propaganda as to peace and quiet through the Republic of Mexico, and, as you say, it is through these instrumentalities that you have mentioned that most of that is published.

Mr. FORRES. To give you an illustration, yesterday evening, leaving Brownsville, the Brownsville Herald, the afternoon paper, came out and said that this meeting of yourselves should be suppressed inasmuch as Mr. Cabrera had invited Senator Fall to go into Mexico and look conditions over, and he didn't see fit, etc., and so on, but you can absolutely believe this, that whenever you see an American or any American organ supporting the Carrancistas they are getting something out of it.

Senator SMITH. What is the name of that Weeks publication?

Mr. FORRES. The Mexican News Bureau.

Senator SMITH. That is published in the City of Mexico?

Mr. FORRES. Mexico City; yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Who is Weeks?

Mr. FORRES. Why, Weeks at one time had a little candelilla factory at Cuatro Ciénegas.

Senator SMITH. What nationality is he?

Mr. FORRES. He is an American.

Senator SMITH. Who is connected with this man Weeks in that publication, do you know?

Mr. FORRES. He has two or three other Americans, but the proposition is financed directly by the Carrancistas.

Senator SMITH. Do you know of any other American in connection with Weeks in the publication?

Mr. FORRES. No, sir; I do not.

Senator SMITH. In the preparation of the paper, etc.?

Mr. FORRES. No; because I never went around his plant. His plant was right near the hotel where I stopped; I stopped at the Cosmos, and his little plant was right near it. Now, another thing, you hear a great many of the missionaries and the preachers, emissaries of the different religious interests that go into Mexico and come out and tell you what a wonderful man Mr. Carranza is.

Senator SMITH. What hope does the American see, the man experienced in Mexican affairs; what hope do you see of final peace?

Mr. FORRES. There is no peace unless we determine upon some man that is actively against the Carrancistas and support him to go in there and organize all of the rebel bands and make peace in the country.

Senator SMITH. That will do, unless you have something else.

Mr. FORRES. No; I have not.

Mr. JACKSON. Will you be kind enough to leave these negatives?

Mr. FORRES. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACKSON. I will have them printed and return them to you.

Mr. FORRES. That is perfectly all right, sir.

TESTIMONY OF ARTHUR GRAHAM.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized.)

Mr. JACKSON. State your name.

Mr. GRAHAM. Arthur Graham.

Senator SMITH. I hand you, Mr. Graham, a copy of a telegram, in Spanish, signed by Hilario Medina, touching the viséing of passports into Mexico, especially against any that have appeared before this committee as a witness. I will ask you whether or not this is the paper?

Mr. GRAHAM. That 's the paper.

Senator SMITH. Where did you get it?

Mr. GRAHAM. Consul De la Mata gave it to me.

Senator SMITH. As an order coming to him?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. And who translated it, if you know?

Mr. GRAHAM. It was translated by one of the men in our office first, and later by one of your committee's attachés.

Senator SMITH. I will find out who that is; that is all.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. GEORGE E. HYDE.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized.)

Senator SMITH. Capt. Hyde, you understand the Mexican language?

Capt. HYDE. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Are you a competent translator?

Capt. HYDE. I consider myself so; yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Do you know whether you are or not?

Capt. HYDE. Yes, sir; I am.

Senator SMITH. You are a competent translator of the Spanish, as I understand it?

Capt. HYDE. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Will you look at the article just shown you, just identified by the witness last on the stand, and say whether the copy there is a correct translatic . of this Spanish telegram?

Capt. HYDE. I have already compared them, sir, and it is a true translation.

Senator SMITH. Now, I will ask that to be put in the record.

(The telegram identified by the witness, Arthur Graham, and ordered by the committee to be incorporated into the record, is as follows:)

[Translation of telegram.]

MEXICO, D. F., January 17, 1920.

MEXICAN CONSUL, San Antonio, Tex.:

Some Mexicans have been called to make declarations before the so-called committee of investigation of the Senate of the United States and whether due to their ignorance of what the procedure of this committee signifies for Mexico, or because of any other motives, they have appeared to make them. Wherefore the department of foreign relations believes it opportune to call to the attention of all Mexicans residing in the United States, and of the public in general, the true character of this committee and what it signifies for Mexico from the international point of view.

The so-called committee of investigation of the Senate has a tendency to set itself up as a tribunal for the purpose of passing judgment on the Mexican Republic as a free and independent nation and respecting questions which are the exclusive function of its internal government. Neither the Mexican Government nor any public official nor any private individual resident in the territory of the Republic or outside of it may nor should recognize the jurisdiction of authority on the part of this committee to carry on this sort of investigation, in view of the fact that the Mexican Republic in international law cannot be judged in any form and the responsibility for the acts of its governments or of their representatives are subject to other rules than those which govern the trial of a private individual. These rules can not be the same as those which involve an entire people whose majesty, whose honor, and whose dignity should be scrupulously respected by all the other peoples of the earth.

The so-called investigating committee, furthermore, with its procedure, offers the opportunity for acts which are in reality hostile to a country which like Mexico maintains relations of friendship with the United States and it is a cause of offense to the good name and the good reputation of Mexico, since in view of the facilities which this committee offers to the enemies of the Republic they incessantly calumniate her and offend her prestige and moral dignity.

No Mexican worthy of the name should lend himself in contributing to these acts which are hostile and whose tendency is to prepare the public opinion of the United States for certain propositions which no one ignores. As a matter of fact, the interventionist elements in that country have decided upon the formation of this investigating committee of the Senate and its object is to take advantage of the series of observations which are collected by this committee against Mexico in order to make notorious the necessity of intervening in our interior affairs.

The Mexicans who have assisted with their declarations to bolster this information which in time will serve as a base for the commission of an attack against the Republic unquestionably commit the crime of treason to the fatherland and it is the desire of this department to warn them publicly so that in the future they may not appear before this committee which has no power at its disposal to oblige a foreign citizen to testify against his own country and in the remote event that a Mexican should be subject to annoyance for having refused to testify before a tribunal whose power is not recognized by any law of the United States nor any principle of international law, he should suffer these annoyances rather than fail in the first duty which he has, to respect and cause the good name of his country to be respected in any part of the world.

It is easy to understand from another point of view that this committee is not inspired by any feeling of friendship toward Mexico, but that, on the contrary, its acts are dictated by an open hostility to the present laws and institutions of our country.

The Mexican who knowing that this committee is functioning in this way and who in spite of that fact assists it in carrying out its work, contributes notably to the development of prejudices which may arise from the obstinacy of this committee in delving into questions which are the exclusive functions of the interior government of Mexico and the determination of the government to not permit the good name of the Republic to be tarnished.

Bearing the above in mind, you are directed to bring to the attention of the Mexican colony residing in that place through such means as you may consider efficacious the following instructions:

"Every Mexican who receives an order to appear before the so-called committee of investigation of the American Senate to testify about facts bearing on Mexico should answer refusing to recognize the authority or jurisdiction of that committee to have knowledge of affairs bearing on the Mexican Republic, and should flatly refuse to give such testimony."

You will advise the Mexican consul of the locality or our embassy in Washington of the aforesaid order, so that the consuls or the embassy may carry out the instructions which they have received from this department. Should any Mexican be arrested or suffer any other penalty for refusing to testify, he should avail himself of all resources authorized by the laws of the United States to oppose it and should make an immediate report of his arrest or the annoyance, should he suffer from this cause, to the Mexican consul or to the embassy, in order that the corresponding representations may be made through diplomatic channels.

Mexican law considers that the crime of treason is committed, article 1071 of the Penal Code, "He who makes an attack against the independence of the Mexican Republic, its sovereignty, its liberty, or the integrity of its territory, if the offender is a Mexican by birth or by naturalization." And article 1090 of the same code provides: "The Mexican who by acts not authorized nor approved by the Government provokes a foreign war against Mexico or causes it to be declared or exposes the Mexicans to suffer annoyances and acts of retaliation, shall be punished by four years' imprisonment."

HILARIO MEDINA,
Subsecretary of Relations.

(Thereupon, at 11.45 o'clock a. m., the committee recessed until 2.30 o'clock p. m. of the same day.)

AFTER RECESS.

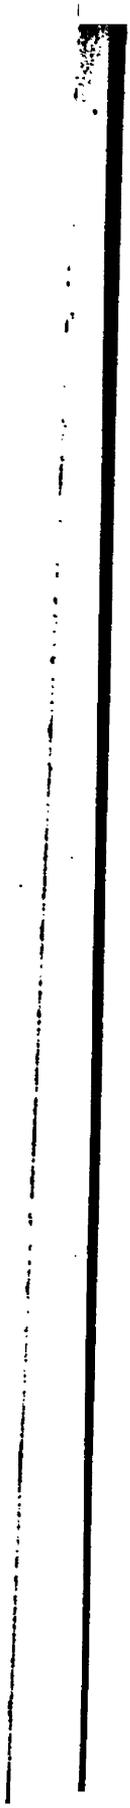

Senator SMITH. The committee finds that with the witnesses now to be examined we can facilitate matters by ascertaining what they know this evening and proceeding with our work to-morrow morning, with the hope of expediting it that way.

☞ In the meantime I would like before the final adjournment to order expunged from the record as taken the statements touching the personal morality of the President of the Republic of Mexico, and also his general, Gonzales, because that is not the purpose of the committee to go into any such question, and it was not in response to any question presented to the witness. I would ask also of the press about giving any notoriety to it, out of the common harmony between nations ostensibly at peace, that no publicity be given to the mere declamations of the witness along the lines that I have suggested. If the reporters will be good enough to hand to the secretary of this committee the transcript of the record, he will indicate to them the point that I wish to have expunged from the record.

We will meet to-morrow morning; I expect half past 10 o'clock would be as early as we could get ready. Much obliged.

(Thereupon, at 2.45 o'clock p. m., the committee recessed until Thursday, January 22, 1920, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.)

THURSDAY, JANUARY 22, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The subcommittee met pursuant to the call of the chairman at 10.40 o'clock a. m. in the pink room of the Gunter Hotel, in San Antonio, Tex., Senator Albert B. Fall presiding.

Present: Senators Fall (chairman) and Smith; Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee.

TESTIMONY OF JOHN A. VALLS.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

The CHAIRMAN. Will you please state your full name, Judge?

Mr. VALLS. My name is John A. Valls.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you an American citizen?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir; I am.

The CHAIRMAN. Native born?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you born?

Mr. VALLS. I was born at the mouth of Rio Grande, but my father was born in Spain, and when I was two months old my parents moved to Brownsville, Tex., and in 1876 my father received his final papers in the Federal court in Brownsville.

The CHAIRMAN. Where have you lived the greater part of your life?

Mr. VALLS. With the exception of seven years of my life that I spent at the University of Virginia and other American universities, I have spent all of my life on the Texas border.

The CHAIRMAN. On the American side?

Mr. VALLS. On the American side of the Rio Grande.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your profession?

Mr. VALLS. I am a lawyer. I have been district attorney of the forty-ninth judicial district of Texas since 1902.

The CHAIRMAN. You are still the district attorney in the forty-ninth district?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you familiar with the Spanish language?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir; I am.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you been interested in and made a study of Mexican history and laws and customs?

Mr. VALLS. Since my earliest boyhood I have taken a lively interest in Mexican politics and in Mexican history.

The CHAIRMAN. And Mexican law?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you been familiar with the Mexican people during your life on the border of Mexico?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir. I have known a great many of the most prominent men of Mexico, especially during the administration of President Diaz—President Diaz, Manuel Gonzales, Ramon Corral, Jacinto Trevino, and a great many others.

The CHARMAN. What were your personal relations with Porfirio Diaz during his lifetime, or from 1878 until 1911?

Mr. VALLS. Senator, will you allow me to explain that in my own way?

The CHAIRMAN. I will be glad to have you do it, sir.

Mr. VALLS. Because I know that my statements will be misinterpreted and distorted in certain quarters. Some of my nearest and dearest friends are of Mexican extraction. There is no truer or nicer gentlemen than the cultured, educated Mexican, and the really refined Mexican woman is a glory to her sex. The Mexican people of the border have been true to me and I will be true to them. I wish for them all the blessings of a good and stable government, and God forgive me if I for one moment forget the best interests of the Mexican people. Ever since my earliest boyhood I have had a most affectionate regard for Porfirio Diaz; you might call it a filial affection. In 1898, when I was struggling hard in the practice of my profession, Porfirio Diaz surprised me by appointing me Mexican consul in Brownsville, Tex., of his own initiative and without any solicitation on my part. The appointment paid a handsome salary and from a financial point of view it was a tempting offer; but I have always been so thoroughly American that I declined the offer and, American as I am, and the cultured as I was in the purest principles of American liberty, I am proud to say, Senator, that the friendship of Porfirio Diaz for me is one of the proudest and most tender recollections of my life. Will you permit me to read you, Senator, a letter President Diaz wrote to me when I declined the consularship.

The CHAIRMAN. I will be glad to have you do it.

Mr. VALLS. I was apprehensive it would displease President Diaz, and I wrote him as nice a letter as I knew how. The answer is in Spanish, and I will translate it as I go.

MEXICO, December 14, 1898.

Mr. JOHN A. VALLS,
Laredo, Tex.

ESTEEMED FRIEND: I have read the contents of your letter of the 7th instant and I give you my most sincere thanks for the explanations which you kindly make me, and I advise you in return that you have much reason for not accepting the consulship in Brownsville, which fact does not offend me, because indeed in the place where you are now established, you are rendering me friendly and important service.

Your very affectionate friend and servant,

PORFIRIO DIAZ.

When he was struggling hard against Madero, Senator, I wrote him a letter and asked him please not to give up; that he would win the battle yet. And in order to show you how that great heart loved the Mexican people, this is what he replied (it was before he left Mexico):

MEXICO, April 29, 1911.

MR. JOHN A. VALLS,
Laredo, Tex.
ESTEEMED FRIEND—

Among other things he says:

You may rest easy that this government, when it treats with the rebels, will not for one moment lose its decorum, and the only concessions that I grant will be made solely to avoid the effusion of blood.

Your affectionate friend and servant,

PORFIRIO DIAZ.

My relations with him were very close, Senator, for many years.

The CHAIRMAN. Right here may I inject: You are elected by the popular vote, to your position as district attorney of the Forty-ninth district?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what blood are the majority of the voters of the Forty-ninth District?

Mr. VALLS. Of Mexican extraction, and whatever political perferment I have, Senator, I owe principally to those people.

The CHAIRMAN. In your official capacity as district attorney you have had more or less to do with the international or border disturbances, complications, and the troubles since the outbreak of the Madero revolution, I presume?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have there been, to your knowledge, any disturbances on the American side of the boundary line, due to the disturbed conditions in Mexico?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir. If you will allow me to relate them now?

The CHAIRMAN. I will be very glad to have you, just in your own words, Judge, give a history of such troubles, as they came under your observation, and the causes of the same?

Mr. VALLS. In February, 1915, I first heard of the plan of San Diego. To me it appeared so visionary and ridiculous that I paid no attention to it. Subsequently, on the 10th day of April, I discovered that a branch of that organization existed in the city of Laredo. I had in my possession the minutes of that order. I communicated that fact to a certain officer, with a request that he assist me.

The CHAIRMAN. An American officer?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Military?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Civil?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir; and through his indiscretion it was discovered that we had learned of this order. The members were all strangers to Laredo, and they immediately left the city. After that, of course, I kept a careful watch on matters along the border. Some time in June of 1916 Dr. Thompson, a dentist in Laredo, came to my office at night and gave me this letter, addressed to Dr. J. K. Thompson, dentist, Laredo, Tex. Inside of this envelope was a smaller one addressed to Mr. John Valls, lawyer, Laredo, Tex.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the date of that letter?

Mr. VALLS. June 9, 1916. The day after I received this letter, or the morning after, I received information that a band of outlaws had attempted to burn the bridges and cut the telegraph wires at Webb Station. This letter was written from Monterrey, and it predicted that fact. Among other things, he says:

I am not a prophet, or within the next few days there will be some people who will burn bridges on the American side of the river, under the different names of Japanese, Texans, I. W. W.'s, or intervention in Mexico. God grant that that great country may soon remedy these evils.

Of course, the name that was signed to it wasn't the name of the real writer of the letter.

The CHAIRMAN. You are positive that another name was signed?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The writer didn't want his identity known?

Mr. VALLS. He says here after a while he will let me know who he is. Then a few days after receiving this letter the Laredo Auto Sales Co. brought to my office this large envelope [exhibiting an envelope]. And in this one there was found a smaller one addressed to Lawyer John Valls. The date of this letter is Monterrey, June 16, 1916. The day after the assault was made on the American soldiers at San Ignacio. Among other things he says:

In this city for nobody was it a secret that the authorities were preparing these outlaws to go into Texas and burn bridges and to interrupt the traffic, nor that De la Rosa and his companions might commit all kinds of depredations in the southern part of Texas. Whom can you ask that does not know that on the plaza, in streets, in the theaters, even in the very offices of the Carrancista officials, it was publicly stated that within a few days this number would be increased and all traffic between San Antonio and Laredo would be interrupted. De la Rosa publicly organized his men in Victoria, Tex., and so on.

Very well. I communicated the fact to the officials, but that very morning the assault was made at San Ignacio. In that case, Senator, Lieut. Kyle Rucker, of the Fourteenth Cavalry, was stationed at San Ignacio, Tex., in Zapata County, about 45 miles down the river from Laredo. That afternoon he went across the river into Mexico and conferred with Federico Gutierrez Zapata, who was the Carranza commander in San Ignacio, Mexico. He informed this Carranza commander that this band had left Jarita for the Texas border. The Carranza commander assured Lieut. Rucker that he would send some picked men to intercept these bandits, and that very night Federico Gutierrez Zapata, the Carrancista commander, was the guide that led the attacking force that assaulted the American soldiers, and Federico Gutierrez Zapata to-day is holding a commission in the government of President Carranza, in the city of Nuevo Laredo, Mexico. In that fight several of the American soldiers were killed in their tents. The fight lasted a short while, and the Mexicans returned to Mexico. Col. Cruz Ruiz and Col. Frias were the officers who commanded that band that consisted of about 75 men. They had bombs, dynamite, hand grenades, and were otherwise well equipped.

Senator SMITH. Senator, permit me to ask you there: This assault was made on a garrison of American troops?

Mr. VALLS. Stationed at San Ignacio, in Zapata County, Tex.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. VALLS. The evidence of these men—four of these men were indicted in Webb County, Tex. I prosecuted those four men, and the jury gave each one of them the death penalty. I also prosecuted the men who were arrested for attempting to burn the bridges and for attempting to cut the telegraph wires at Webb Station. The men who made the attempt to burn the bridges had in their possession all the implements to cut wires; they had coal oil to burn the bridges with; and the evidence in that case, Senator, established this fact: That Niceforo Zambrano, who was then the treasurer general of Mexico, and who subsequently became the governor of the State of Nuevo Leon, recruited some of these men in the City of Mexico, and Niceforo Zambrano, together with a tall man—a tall, slender man, dressed in a brown suit—his name I have never been able to discover—Niceforo Zambrano and this Mexican general left the City of Mexico in a special car with these men for Monterrey, and at Monterrey they were taken to a hotel. There other men were recruited. Niceforo Zambrano, the treasurer general of Mexico, Col. Leocadio Fierros, of the Carranza Army, accompanied these men to the railroad station, and there, amid the acclamations of the people, in three railroad cars, these men openly left the city of Monterrey for Jarita. These things were done with the knowledge—this is a fact, Senator, the evidence shows it—these things were done with the knowledge and consent and the approbation of the Carranza government, and not a finger was raised by that government to frustrate this cruel and murderous mission—murderous, Senator, because the Carranza commander, after conferring with Lieut. Kyle Rucker, assured him that he would intercept these bands, and instead of doing that, the Carranza commander led these troops in the assault that killed American soldiers at San Ignacio.

The evidence also shows that the men who burned the bridges at Webb station publicly consorted with the Carranza troops at Hidalgo in Mexico. These men, some of them, were wearing the uniform of the Carranza army. Some of them had commissions in the Carranza army. Well, the case was appealed to the court of criminal appeals, and the court of criminal appeals decided that war existed between the United States and Mexico and that these men were prisoners of war. I then delivered the four men to Col. Ferguson of the Twenty-seventh Infantry at Laredo, Tex.; he in turn delivered them to the Mexican consul, and the Mexican consul escorted these four men at Nuevo Laredo, where they were acclaimed as heroes by the populace of that city.

The CHAIRMAN. That was in Mexico?

Mr. VALLS. Nuevo Laredo, Tamaulipas, Mexico. That is, in a few words, the history of that event.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the title of that case, the appeal to the supreme court, do you recall?

Mr. VALLS. Arce versus the State.

The CHAIRMAN. Jose Antonio Arce et al.?

Mr. VALLS. Jose Antonio Arce et al. versus the State.

The CHAIRMAN. You are familiar with the decision of the court; you have stated that the decision was that a state of war existed between the United States and the Carranza or Mexican Government at that time?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Carranza government was in authority in Mexico?

Mr. VALLS. It was.

The CHAIRMAN. And the men who had come across the river attacked our people on Texas soil and murdered them were freed of the charge of murder by the supreme court of the State of Texas, or the court of criminal appeals of the State of Texas, upon the grounds that the evidence disclosed that a state of war existed between the Carranza government and the American Government, and therefore these men, as soldiers, were not guilty of murder?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They having obeyed the orders of their superiors?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Judge, is it generally known throughout the State, do you think, that this decision was made upon this ground; do you think the people of the State of Texas generally have understood it?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir; and I was surprised that more publicity has not been given that decision.

The CHAIRMAN. I may state to you that it was not even understood in the city of Washington amongst some of our Federal authorities, because Carranza had prior to that time been recognized by this Government. Judge, do you know Mr. Mendez, who has been postmaster general of Mexico?

Mr. VALLS. Mario Mendez?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir; I am well acquainted with him, he is in Matamoros.

The CHAIRMAN. I stated his official position approximately correctly, did I not, that he is what would correspond to our Postmaster General?

Mr. VALLS. The last I heard of the general he was the director general of the telegraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Possibly I was mistaken as to his exact position. Did any evidence develop in the trial of these cases connecting Mr. Mendez with this plan of San Diego in any way?

Mr. VALLS. Not that I recall.

The CHAIRMAN. We will have other evidence which will connect him.

Mr. VALLS. I wouldn't be surprised, because I know him very intimately and he has always been anti-American. Some things may have escaped my memory, Senator, in this matter, I don't know.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the case that you have so lucidly explained was that of the State against Arce, and grew out of the San Ignacio raid?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know of any other specific cases concerning these raids, with which you were connected?

Mr. VALLS. May I also tell you that in that raid the evidence showed that Col. Frias, of this band, crossed to San Ignacio that afternoon and saw that there were 10 tents containing 4 soldiers each, 40 men. That night Col. Alonzo Gray—he was then Maj. Alonzo Gray—and Lieut. Sirmyer arrived with Troop I of the Fourteenth Cavalry on the way to the county seat, and they decided to spend the night at San Ignacio and that is how Lieut. Kyle Rucker happened to be reinforced, and these men in the company didn't know, they thought they only had to take 40 soldiers.

The CHAIRMAN. And the Mexicans had spied out the lay of the land and the men in the tents and knew approximately that he had only 40 soldiers, but fortunately these reinforcements came up and surprised the attacking force?

Mr. VALLS. And these men testified and the evidence showed that they were carrying out the plan of San Diego. Their purpose was to kill the American soldiers and take whatever they could lay their hands on and go into the interior of Texas and do likewise.

The CHAIRMAN. You had in your possession copy of this plan of San Diego, did you?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you examine this paper and state whether you can identify it as connected with this proposed plan of San Diego?

Mr. VALLS. I will also state, Senator, that this man Basilio Ramos who originated this plan, when he returned to Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, he was dined and wined by the government officials of that place.

Senator SMITH. You say he was the author of this plan of San Diego?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir; supposed to be the author. Yes, sir; I have seen this before, it is just like the one I have.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a copy then of the plan of San Diego under which these raids were made?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Clerk, read this into the record.

(Thereupon the clerk read into the record the copy of the plan of San Diego, which is as follows:)

PROVISIONAL DIRECTORATE OF THE PLAN (PLOT) OF SAN DIEGO, TEX., JANUARY 4, 1915.

We, who in turn sign our names, assembled in the revolutionary plot of San Diego, Tex., solemnly promise each other, on our word of honor, that we will fulfill, and cause to be fulfilled and complied with, all the clauses and provisions stipulated in this document, and execute the orders and the wishes emanating from the provisional directorate of this movement and recognize as military chief of the same Mr. Agustin S. Garza, guaranteeing with our lives the faithful accomplishment of what is here agreed upon.

1. On the 20th day of February, 1915, at 2 o'clock in the morning, we will rise in arms against the Government and the country of the United States of North America, one as all and all as one, proclaiming the liberty of the individuals of the black race and its independence of Yankee tyranny which has held us in iniquitous slavery since the remote times; and at the same time and in the same manner we will proclaim the independence and segregation of the States bordering on the Mexican Nation, which are: Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, Colorado, and Upper California, of which States the Republic of Mexico was robbed in a most perfidious manner by North American imperialism.

2. In order to render the foregoing clause effective, the necessary army corps will be formed under the immediate command of military leaders named by the Supreme Revolutionary Congress of San Diego, Tex., which shall have full power to designate a supreme chief, who shall be at the head of said army. The banner which shall guide us in this enterprise shall be red, with a white diagonal fringe, and bearing the following inscription: "Equality and independence," and none of the subordinate leaders or subalterns shall use any other flag (except only the white flag for signals). The aforesaid army shall be known by the name of "liberating army for races and peoples."

3. Each one of the chiefs will do his utmost, by whatever means possible, to get possession of the arms and funds of the cities which he has beforehand been designated to capture, in order that our cause may be provided with resources to continue the fight with better success, the said leaders each being required to render an account of everything to his superiors, in order that the latter may dispose of it in the proper manner.

4. The leader who may take a city must immediately name and appoint municipal authorities, in order that they may preserve order and assist in every way possible the revolutionary movement. In case the capital of any State we are endeavoring to liberate be captured, there will be named in the same manner superior municipal authorities for the same purpose.

5. It is strictly forbidden to hold prisoners, either special prisoners (civilians) or soldiers; and the only time that should be spent in dealing with them is that which is absolutely necessary to demand funds (loans) of them; and whether these demands are successful or not, they shall be shot immediately without any pretext.

6. Every stranger who shall be found armed and who can not prove his right to carry arms shall be summarily executed, regardless of his race or nationality.

7. Every North American over 16 years of age shall be put to death, and only the aged men, the women, and children shall be respected; and on no account shall the traitors to our race be spared or respected.

8. The Apaches of Arizona, as well as the Indians (redskins) of the Territory shall be given every guaranty; and their lands which have been taken from them shall be returned to them, to the end that they may assist us in the cause which we defend.

9. All appointments and grades in our army which are exercised by subordinate officers (subalterns) shall be examined (recognized) by the superior officers. There shall likewise be recognized the grades of leaders of other complots which may be connected with this, and who may wish to cooperate with us; also those who may affiliate with us later.

10. The movement having gathered force, and once having possessed ourselves of the States above alluded to, we shall proclaim them an independent republic, later requesting (if it be thought expedient) annexation to Mexico, without concerning ourselves at the time about the form of government which may control the destinies of the common mother country.

11. When we shall have obtained independence for the Negroes, we shall grant them a banner, which they themselves shall be permitted to select, and we shall aid them in obtaining six States of the American Union, which States border upon those already mentioned, and they may form from these six States a republic, and they may therefore be independent.

12. None of the leaders shall have power to make terms with the enemy, without first communicating with the superior officers of the army, bearing in mind that this is a war without quarter; nor shall any leader enroll in his ranks any stranger, unless said stranger belong to the Latin, the Negro, or the Japanese race.

13. It is understood that none of the members of this complot (or any one who may come in later) shall, upon the definite triumph of the cause which we defend, fail to recognize their superiors, nor shall they aid others who, with bastard designs, may endeavor to destroy what has been accomplished by such great work.

14. As soon as possible each local society (junta) shall nominate delegates who shall meet at a time and place beforehand designated, for the purpose of nominating a permanent directorate of the revolutionary movement. At this meeting shall be determined and worked out in detail the power and duties of the permanent directorate and this revolutionary plan may be revised or amended.

or pecuniary, from the Government of Mexico; and it need not consider itself under any obligation in this, our movement.

Equality and independence.

SAN DIEGO, TEX., January 6, 1919.

PORFIRIO SANTOS.
A. S. GARZA.
MANUEL FLORES.
B. RAMOS, JR.
A. G. ALMARAZ.

The CHAIRMAN. I notice a note attached to this document directed to Basilio Ramos, jr. Is this Basilio Ramos the man whom you say was acclaimed a hero on the Mexican side?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. This note directs his attention to a meeting held in Monterrey, Nuevo Leon, January 6, 1915, and states:

That the provisional directorate has deemed it proper to name you as a representative with full authority to organize lodges (junta), and give commissions to persons in cities which you may think proper, in the State of Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado, California, and Texas, as well as along the northern frontier of Mexico, in order that, by all means available to you, you may assist in the consummation of the plan of San Diego.

We extend to you this commission in order that you may be constant in your work, and that it may serve you as a credential and for identification to all concerned.

(Signed)

L. PERRIGO, President.
A. GONZALES, Secretary.
A. G. ALMARAZ.

The CHAIRMAN. Was this not in evidence in the trial of the Arce case?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It did not come under your observation?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir. I forgot to say, Senator, that a flag was found in the assault of San Ignacio, and also at Webb station, that was borne by these bandits, that was identified as the flag of the plan of San Diego, a red flag with a white stripe.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you have stated that the evidence in the trial showed that recruits for carrying out this plan were obtained in the City of Mexico, and other cities in Mexico, that men engaged in carrying out the plan in this State bore Carranza commissions as officers; that Niceforo Zambrano, of Mexico, was one of the leaders in recruiting men, and Isabel de los Santos, and others.

Mr. VALLS. Isabel de los Santos, I had forgotten that name. And after this decision was rendered by the court of criminal appeals, Niceforo Zambrano, before crossing into Texas, asked my permission, as he put it, whether he could come over or not. I told him unfortunately the court of criminal appeals said he could.

The CHAIRMAN. What position, if any, did he hold at that time in the Mexican Government?

Mr. VALLS. Governor of the State of Nuevo Leon.

The CHAIRMAN. Appointed by Carranza or elected?

Mr. VALLS. No; he was then appointed by Carranza.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Judge, when this document first came to your attention, the evidence of this plan first came to your attention early in 1915, what impression did it make upon you as an officer of the law?

Mr. VALLS. To me it appeared so ridiculous that I paid no attention to it.

The CHAIRMAN. It appeared preposterous?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir; impractical. Maj. Burns, who was then a member of the Department of Justice, saw me in Laredo and I explained to him how he could get at the bottom of this thing in a confidential way, and I believe he has a great deal of information he can give you.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, do you know the details of the Webb raid?

Mr. VALLS. I also prosecuted those men, and they were given a term in the penitentiary. The evidence in that case shows that Niceforo Zambrano and Gen. Maurillo Rodriguez recruited these men and sent them to Jarita with instructions to go from there to Hidalgo, Mexico. There they conferred with the Carranza commander at Hidalgo. There they mingled with the customhouse officers of the Carranza government. They were given horses there. They crossed the river into Texas at that place, and they went on to Webb station. They were met by a posse and a fight ensued, and Lieut. Col. Villareal who was well known in Victoria, was killed. The others, four of them, were captured and they were given a term in the penitentiary. They were also carrying a flag.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know Maurillo Rodriguez?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir; not personally.

The CHAIRMAN. Never saw him?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you ever heard him described?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir; I don't remember.

The CHAIRMAN. You don't know whether he was slightly lame in one leg?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir; I don't. And this evidence, Senator, was brought out in answers to direct questions propounded by the court itself, by the district judge himself.

The CHAIRMAN. This case of Solis, and others whom you convicted?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Wasn't carried to the Supreme Court?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And these people are still in the penitentiary?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You say Lieut. Col. Villareal was killed? Do you know what service he was in?

Mr. VALLS. I know from people who knew him that he was an officer in the Carranza army. When he was killed he was wearing a uniform.

The CHAIRMAN. What uniform?

Mr. VALLS. They say, of the Carranza army.

Senator SMITH. Killed on the American side?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir; in Webb County.

The CHAIRMAN. You say they were met by a posse and a fight ensued? Of whom were the posse composed?

Mr. VALLS. Of civilians of Webb County.

The CHAIRMAN. Texas?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know how many were in the raiding party?

Mr. VALLS. There were six; one of them testified that he had been an officer under Gen. Torres in the City of Mexico in the Carranza army. Previous to that, Senator, there was a newspaper published in Laredo called El Progreso. That was financed by Mr. Carranza publicly and notoriously known. It was conducted by him, controlled, and its policy conducted by the consul of Mr. Carranza in Laredo, Tex., a man named Melquiades Garcia. That paper, previous to these raids, was publishing articles of the most incendiary nature, and particularly assailing President Wilson, and hostile in every way to American interests. When I received these two letters that newspaper claimed that these letters had been written in Laredo, Tex.; that they were not genuine. That afternoon some American gentlemen of Laredo, Tex., tired of these incendiary editorials, took the editor, Leo D. Walker, put him in an automobile, and escorted him to the bank of the river and told him to cross and never come back. Mr. Arredondo, who was then the representative in Washington of the de facto Government—

The CHAIRMAN. Eliseo Arredondo?

Mrs. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now minister representing the Mexican Government at Madrid, Spain?

Mr. VALLS. That's the one. He complained to Mr. Lansing that two Mexican citizens had been assaulted in Laredo, naming them, Leo D. Walker and Emitterio Flores, and that the American authorities had done nothing. Mr. Lansing complained to Gov. Ferguson, and Gov. Ferguson sent the correspondence to me, and I wrote a reply, substantially what I have stated just now, showing that one of them was an American citizen, Emitterio Flores, and showing the circumstances under which Leo D. Walker was escorted to the bank of the river and told to cross, and that settled the matter.

Senator SMITH. Judge, when you first heard of this plan of San Diego it struck you, as you say, as so preposterous that you paid little or no attention to it. How long before you were convinced that there was really a purpose in it?

Mr. VALLS. On the 10th day of April following that.

Senator SMITH. What caused you to believe it?

Mr. VALLS. Because I discovered that this lodge, a branch, you know, had been organized and was existing in Laredo, Tex.

Senator SMITH. Any raids made in pursuance of this?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir; the raids we spoke of as having been made, firing on the American soldiers when they thought there was only forty there.

The CHAIRMAN. That followed much later.

Senator SMITH. I am only speaking—what I am trying to get at, the judge heard and I have heard evidence of the plan of San Diego, we thought nothing of it, only the preposterous inability of carrying it out. Then I am trying to develop whatever was done that looked like was in pursuance of the plan as to the invasion of America and whether or not from what you have seen since you have found out the plan of San Diego, whether what you have detailed was not convincing to you that there was a real purpose in it?

Mr. VALLS. Certainly, all of these raids were in direct pursuance of that plan.

Senator SMITH. You think it was carrying out the plan?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. There was an indictment found in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Texas in 1915 against the parties signing this plan?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The conspiracy continued, and the particular raids that you have referred to, Webb Station raid and San Ignacio raid, occurred in the early spring or summer of 1916?

Mr. VALLS. In June, 1916.

The CHAIRMAN. So that the matter of the formation of this conspiracy had reached such an extreme or such proportions that the indictment was found in the United States court against the parties on the 18th day of May, 1915?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then these prosecutions took place, which you directed, following the raids in 1916?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I notice that one of the names signed to this plan of San Diego is that of A. S. Garza. Was that Agustin S. Garza?

Mr. VALLS. Of San Diego, Tex., a school-teacher there.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know him personally?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether he went at any time by any other name than that of Garza?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir; I found that out afterwards.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the name?

Mr. VALLS. Leon Caballo.

The CHAIRMAN. He is known in Mexico as Leon Caballo?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know where he is now?

Mr. VALLS. About a month ago, I think it was, more or less, I was trying to find out where he was, and a friend of mine went to Nuevo Laredo to get the information, and he reported to me that Leon Caballo—that Agustin Garza—Leon Caballo, in the employment of the Carranza government, would be in Nuevo Laredo on the following Sunday.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what character of employment he has with the Carranza government?

Mr. VALLS. Not well enough, Senator, to tell you.

The CHAIRMAN. What is that information, if any, you have; is he a secret-service man?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir; in the confidence of Mr. Carranza.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know Aguirre Berlanga, ministro de gobernacion?

Mr. VALLS. Ministro gobernacion?

The CHAIRMAN. Ministro gobernacion in the Carranza cabinet?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever know Manuel Ochoa in Mexico, at one time on Carranza's staff?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You didn't know him? Do you know whether at any time Agustin Garza had an office at No. 17 Avenida Independencia in the City of Mexico?

Mr. VALLS. I don't know, only from hearsay, you know; I have not been in Mexico, Senator, since January, 1912.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, as an official investigating these matters, why, you had to act upon information. Do you know, or did you ever know at any time, so-called Gen. Fortunato Zuazua?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir; knew of him.

The CHAIRMAN. What position, if any, does he hold in the Carranza government?

Mr. VALLS. He holds some prominent position; I don't know exactly what it is.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether he is a native of the State of Nuevo Leon?

Mr. VALLS. I think he is; yes, sir; Nuevo Leon, Lampazos.

The CHAIRMAN. The family resided at Lampazos, State of Nuevo Leon. Did you ever hear, through the course of your investigations, of any connection of Fortunato Zuazua with carrying out of this plan of San Diego, by raising money or otherwise?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir; his name was frequently mentioned in the course of that investigation.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know Gen. Nafarrate of the Mexican Army?

Mr. VALLS. Also by reputation very well; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what has become of him?

Mr. VALLS. He was killed at Tampico.

The CHAIRMAN. From information coming into your possession in connection with your official duties and investigations along the border have you any information as to the circumstances immediately surrounding or immediately preceding the death of Gen. Nafarrate, did you hear of any reason why he met his death?

Mr. VALLS. It was reported to me that he was assassinated by orders of President Carranza.

The CHAIRMAN. For what reason, if any?

Mr. VALLS. He knew the order that Carranza had given and interviews he had had with Carranza with reference to Americans and what he should do in this matter of the border raid.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, the plan of San Diego?

Mr. VALLS. The plan of San Diego, and he was about to divulge these things, and he was assassinated by a man sent there from the City of Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know where his wife is?

Mr. VALLS. She was about to leave to come to the United States, whether she did or not—

The CHAIRMAN. She was residing for a time in the City of Mexico?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you hear that she claimed to have the original documents?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Which her husband was going to divulge?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know Minister Acuna, of Mexico?

Mr. VALLS. By reputation; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever hear of him, Minister Acuna, in connection with the plan of San Diego?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir. You know, Nafarrate's name was mentioned there frequently, also in the course of this investigation of the San Ignacio raid.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; he was directly connected, personally, with some of the recruits?

Mr. VALLS. Yes; sent some of the recruits to Monterrey, so they testified.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know, or did you ever know Jacobo Ayala Villareal, connected with Gen. Zuazua, as his treasurer or in any capacity?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir; his name was also mentioned frequently in the course of that investigation.

The CHAIRMAN. As being connected with the carrying out of the plan of San Diego?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir; raising money for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what position he had, if any, subsequent to the raids in this State?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether he was at any time collector of customs under the Carranza Government at Naco, Ariz.?

Mr. VALLS. I don't remember it.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether he is now in charge, or recently in charge of the office of Bienes Intervenidos at Matamoros—

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir; I have heard of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Tamaulipas, Mexico?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir; I heard that recently.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever, in your investigations, in connection with this matter hear of a Jap commonly known as Mago?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You didn't hear?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know, or did it directly appear in evidence in any of these cases that there were seven Japanese who swam the river at the attack of San Ignacio, and returned—

Mr. VALLS. They were called Japanese; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about the details, how they got back across the river after they were repulsed?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You don't know whether they claimed that they swam under water and used canes for the purpose of securing air to enable them to swim?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir; I don't recall it.

The CHAIRMAN. We will develop that by other testimony. Did you ever know, or did Gen. Pablo Gonzales's name ever appear in any of your investigations, or did you hear of him in connection with the plan of San Diego?

Mr. VALLS. No, Senator; no.

The CHAIRMAN. That didn't appear from the evidence here?

Mr. VALLS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. I thought not; we will develop that a little later. Do you know what relation, if any, this Col. Maurillo Rodriguez who was connected with these raids—do you know the relationship, if any, existing between him and President Carranza?

Mr. VALLS. He remained on the border but a short while after that. I understand he went to the City of Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether he was a nephew, or is a nephew, of President Carranza of Mexico?

Mr. VALLS. I heard that; yes, sir; I heard that.

The CHAIRMAN. You never heard of Gen. Pablo Gonzales having furnished Maurillo Rodriguez with arms and ammunition that he used in these raids in Texas?

Mr. VALLS. It was reported that somebody did in the City of Mexico; some general; they never gave me his name—simply gave me a description of what kind of a suit of clothes he was wearing.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know the so-called Gen. Juan Barragan, the chief of staff to Carranza?

Mr. VALLS. I know of him; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever hear his name mentioned in connection with the San Ignacio raids?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. He is chief of staff of the Mexican army at this time?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about any family connection between Barragan and Carranza?

Mr. VALLS. Not well enough, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. In your investigations here the name of this Jap—that this Jap was going by; that is, Pablo Nago—did not appear?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir; that I remember, Senator. So many of these details, you know, I don't remember them.

The CHAIRMAN. This man Mendez, whom we referred to a little while ago—the general in charge of the telegraph lines of Mexico—was Mario Mendez?

Mr. VALLS. Mario Mendez; yes, sir. He has several brothers in Mexico, who belong to the "Circulo de los Amigos," or Circle of Friends.

The CHAIRMAN. The Circle of Friends is the translation. Did you know Candido Aguilar, at one time minister of foreign affairs of Mexico?

Mr. VALLS. Carranza's son-in-law?

The CHAIRMAN. The son-in-law of Mr. Carranza?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did any of the evidence which you had your attention called to connect Candido Aguilar with the raids?

Mr. VALLS. It did; yes, sir. It connected him very prominently with it, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. You say it connected him very prominently?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir; his name appeared very frequently.

The CHAIRMAN. In what respect?

Mr. VALLS. That he was so bitterly anti-American, encouraging these things. I could remember these prominent names much better than the others. I was giving my attention always to bigger things, and I paid no attention to the small details.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever, during the course of your investigation, hear of any attempt of Mario Mendez or Candido Aguilar to secure the services of one Forseck to come to the United States during the war to dynamite certain places in the United States?

Mr. VALLS. I have heard that recently, sir; within the last six months; I heard it very frequently after that. Forseck lives in Webb County.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever know Garzaya Ugarte, private secretary to Gen. Carranza?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you every know of Luis de la Rosa in connection with these raids?

Mr. VALLS. Yes; I did.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is Luis de la Rosa?

Mr. VALLS. Well, he had a prominent part in those matters, and that commission that was found in the pocket of Jesus Cerda, one of the bandits who was convicted in Webb County, was sent by Luis de la Rosa and Col. Isabel de los Santos.

The CHAIRMAN. Was Luis de la Rosa ever wanted on this side of the border?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir; out of my district; yes, sir; Mr. Cliber's district.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever see De la Rosa?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir; I had that picture in evidence, or one just like it, in the trial of the Arce case.

The CHAIRMAN. This picture?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It is testified to that that was the picture of De la Rosa. He was often found in company with Col. Estevan Fierros and his cousin, Leo Locadio Fierros.

Mr. VALLS. And with Niceforo Zambrano.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what position does Niceforo Zambrano hold at this time under the Carranza Government?

Mr. VALLS. Up to a few months ago he was governor of the State of Nuevo León. I don't know that he is holding any position just now. Mr. Amaya, you know, Senator, Mr. Amaya is what is called Introdutor de los Embajadores in Mexico. He and Zambrano were very close friends. He lived in Laredo, Tex., for a while. I know him very well; he is very close to the President. His name was also mentioned very prominently in this plan of San Diego, and in these raids Manuel Amaya—excuse me—he is well known in San Antonio.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know where Luis de la Rosa is supposed to be now?

Mr. VALLS. Recently, no, sir; I don't.

The CHAIRMAN. You don't know whether he is employed at Chapultepec, in Mexico?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever read what is known as the Zimmerman note to Mexico?

Mr. VALLS. A long time ago I did, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. During the war?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In 1917? Did that note strike you as having any familiar sounds as compared with the plan of San Diego, the purported contents of the note?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir; I don't remember, I don't remember whether it impressed me that way or not.

The CHAIRMAN. You would recall what you read of it if it were called again to your attention at this time?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you recall having read at any time the note of June 20, 1916, of Secretary Lansing, Secretary of State of the United States, directed to Carranza, during the Pershing expedition in Mexico?

Mr. VALLS. I have read it; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You recall the strength of the arraignment of the Carranza government by Secretary Lansing in that note?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You recall that Mr. Lansing spoke of de la Rosa and various raids, and the fact that the State Department evidence showed that the raiders had come to the border without being interfered with by Carranza and in fact had ridden on the official trains of the Carranza government?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In connection with this testimony of Judge Valls the note referred to will be placed in the record.

(The note of Secretary Lansing of June 20, 1916, referred to by the chairman is as follows:)

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 20, 1916.

SIR: I have read your communication, which was delivered to me on May 22, 1916, under instructions of the chief executive of the de facto Government of Mexico, on the subject of the presence of American troops in Mexican territory, and I would be wanting in candor if I did not, before making answer to the allegations of fact and the conclusions reached by your Government, express the surprise and regret which have been caused this Government by the discourteous tone and temper of this last communication of the de facto Government of Mexico.

The Government of the United States has viewed with deep concern and increasing disappointment the progress of the revolution in Mexico. Continuous bloodshed and disorders have marked its progress. For three years the Mexican Republic has been torn with civil strife, the lives of Americans and other aliens have been sacrificed; vast properties developed by American capital and enterprise have been destroyed or rendered nonproductive; bandits have been permitted to roam at will through the territory contiguous to the United States and to seize, without punishment or without effective attempt at punishment, the property of Americans, while the lives of citizens of the United States who ventured to remain in Mexican territory or to return there to protect their interests have been taken, and in some instances barbarously taken, and the murderers have neither been apprehended nor brought to justice. It would be difficult to find in the annals of the history of Mexico conditions more deplorable than those which have existed there during these recent years of civil war.

It would be tedious to recount instance after instance, outrage after outrage, atrocity after atrocity, to illustrate the true nature and extent of the widespread conditions of lawlessness and violence which have prevailed. During the past nine months in particular, the frontier of the United States along the lower Rio Grande has been thrown into a state of constant apprehension and turmoil because of frequent and sudden incursions into American territory and depredations and murders on American soil by Mexican bandits, who have taken the lives and destroyed the property of American citizens, sometimes carrying American citizens across the international boundary with the booty seized. American garrisons have been attacked at night, American soldiers killed, and their equipment and horses stolen; American ranches have been raided, property stolen and destroyed, and American trains wrecked and plundered. The attacks on Brownsville, Red House Ferry, Progreso Post Office, and Las Peladas, all occurring during September last, are typical. In these attacks on American territory, Carrancista adherents, and even Carrancista soldiers took part in the looting, burning, and killing. Not only were these murders characterized by ruthless brutality, but uncivilized acts of mutilation were perpetrated. Representations were made to Gen. Carranza, and he was emphatically requested to stop these reprehensible acts in a section which he has long claimed to be under the complete domination of his authority. Notwithstanding these representations and the promises of Gen. Nafarrate to prevent attacks along the international boundary, in the following month of October a passenger train was wrecked by bandits and several persons killed 7 miles north of Brownsville, and an attack was made upon United States troops at the same place several days later. Since these attacks leaders of the bandits, well known both to Mexican civil and military authorities as well as to American officers, have been enjoying with immunity the liberty of the towns of northern Mexico. So far has the indifference of the de facto government of these atrocities gone that some of these leaders, as I am advised, have received not only the protection of that government but encouragement and aid as well.

Depredations upon American persons and property within Mexican jurisdiction have been still more numerous. This Government has repeatedly requested in the strongest terms that the de facto government safeguard the lives and homes of American citizens and furnish the protection which international obligation imposes to American interests in the northern States of Tamaulipas, Nuevo Leon, Coahuila, Chihuahua, and Sonora, and also in the States to the south. For example, on January 3 troops were requested to punish the bands of outlaws which looted the Cusi mining property, 80 miles west of Chihuahua, but no effective results came from this request. During the following week the bandit Villa, with his band of about 200 men was operating without opposition between Rubio and Santa Isabel, a fact well known to Carrancista authorities. Meanwhile a party of unfortunate Americans started by train from Chihuahua to visit the Cusi mines, after having received assurances from Carrancista authorities in the State of Chihuahua that the county was safe and that a guard on the train was not necessary. The Americans held passports or safe conducts issued by the authorities of the de facto government. On January 10 the train was stopped by Villa bandits and 18 of the American party were stripped of their clothing and shot in cold blood, in what is now known as the "Santa Isabel massacre."

Gen. Carranza stated to the agent of the Department of State that he had issued orders for the immediate pursuit, capture, and punishment of those responsible for this atrocious crime, and appealed to this Government and to the American people to consider the difficulties of accordng protection along the railroad where the massacre occurred.

Assurances were also given by Mr. Arredondo, presumably under instructions from the de factor Government, that the murderers would be brought to justice and that steps would also be taken to remedy the lawless conditions existing in the State of Durango. It is true that Villa, Castro, and Lopez were publicly declared to be outlaws, and subject to apprehension and execution, but so far as known only a single man personally connected with this massacre has been brought to justice by Mexican authorities. Within a month after this barbarous slaughter of inoffensive Americans it was notorious that Villa was operating within 20 miles of Cusihuiriachic, and publicly stated that his purpose was to destroy American lives and property.

Despite repeated and insistent demands that military protection should be furnished to Americans, Villa openly carried on his operations, constantly approaching closer and closer to the border. He was not intercepted, nor were his movements impeded by troops of the de factor Government, and no effectual attempt was made to frustrate his hostile designs against Americans. In fact, as I am informed, while Villa and his band were slowly moving toward the American frontier in the neighborhood of Columbus, N. Mex., not a single Mexican soldier was seen in his vicinity. Yet the Mexican authorities were fully cognizant of his movements, for on March 6, as Gen. Gavira publicly announced, he advised the American military authorities of the outlaw's approach to the border, so that they might be prepared to prevent him from crossing the boundary. Villa's unhindered activities culminated in the unprovoked and cold-blooded attack upon American soldiers and citizens in the town of Columbus on the night of March 9, the details of which do not need repetition here in order to refresh your memory with the heinousness of the crime. After murdering, burning, and plundering, Villa and his handits, fleeing south, passed within sight of the Carrancista military post at Casas Grandes, and no effort was made to stop him by the officers and garrison of the de facto Government stationed there.

In the face of these depredations not only on American lives and property on Mexican soil but on American soldiers, citizens, and homes on American territory, the perpetrators of which Gen. Carranza was unable or possibly considered it inadvisable to apprehend and punish, the United States had no recourse other than to employ force to disperse the bands of Mexican outlaws who were with increasing boldness systematically raiding across the international boundary. The marauders engaged in the attack on Columbus were driven back across the border by American cavalry, and subsequently, as soon as a sufficient force to cope with the band could be collected, were pursued into Mexico in an effort to capture or destroy them. Without cooperation or assistance in the field on the part of the de facto Government, despite repeated requests by the United States, and without apparent recognition on its part of the desirability of putting an end to these systematic raids or of punishing the chief perpetrators of the crimes committed, because they menaced the good relations of the two countries, American forces pursued the lawless bands as far as Parral, where the pursuit was halted by the hostility of Mexicans, presumed to be loyal to the de facto Government, who arrayed themselves on the side of outlawry and became in effect the protectors of Villa and his band.

In this manner and for these reasons have the American forces entered Mexican territory. Knowing fully the circumstances set forth, the de facto Government can not be blind to the necessity which compelled this Government to act, and yet it has seen fit to recite groundless sentiments of hostility toward the expedition and to impute to this Government ulterior motives for the continued presence of American troops on Mexican soil. It is charged that these troops came across the frontiers without first obtaining the consent or permission of the de facto Government.

Obviously, as immediate action alone could avail, there was no opportunity to reach an agreement (other than that of March 10-18 now repudiated by Gen. Carranza) prior to the entrance of such an expedition into Mexico if the expedition was to be effective. Subsequent events and correspondence have demonstrated to the satisfaction of this Government that Gen. Carranza would not have entered into any agreement providing for an effective plan for the capture and destruction of the Villa bands. While the American troops were moving rapidly southward in pursuit of the raiders, it was the form and nature of the agreement that occupied the attention of Gen. Carranza rather than the practical object which it was to attain—the number of limitations that could be imposed upon the American forces to impede their progress rather than the obstacles that could be raised to prevent the escape of the outlaws. It was Gen. Carranza who suspended, through your note of April 12, all discussions and negotiations for an agreement along the lines of the protocols between the United States and Mexico concluded during the period 1882-1896, under which the two countries had so successfully restored peaceful conditions on their common boundary.

It may be mentioned here that, notwithstanding that statement in your note that "the American Government gave no answer to the note of the 12th of April," this note was replied to on April 14, when the department instructed Mr. Rodgers by telegraph to deliver this Government's answer to Gen. Carranza. Shortly after this reply the conferences between Gens. Scott, Funston, and Obregon began at El Paso, during which they signed on May 2 a project of a memorandum ad referendum regarding the withdrawal of American troops. As an indication of the alleged bad faith of the American Government, you state that though Gen. Scott declared in this memorandum that the destruction and dispersion of the Villa band "had been accomplished," yet American forces are not withdrawn from Mexico. It is only necessary to read the memorandum, which is in the English language, to ascertain that this is clearly a misstatement, for the memorandum states that "the American punitive expeditionary forces have destroyed or dispersed many of the lawless elements and bandits, * * * or have driven them far into the interior of the Republic of Mexico," and further, that the United States forces were then "carrying on a vigorous pursuit of such small numbers of bandits or lawless elements as may have escaped." The context of your note gives the impression that the object of the expedition being admittedly accomplished, the United States had agreed in the memorandum to begin withdrawal of its troops.

The memorandum shows, however, that it was not alone on account of partial dispersion of the bandits that it was decided to begin the withdrawal of American forces, but equally on account of the assurances of the Mexican Government that their forces were "at the present time being augmented and strengthened to such an extent that they will be able to prevent any disorders occurring in Mexico that would in any way endanger American territory," and that they would "continue to diligently pursue, capture, or destroy any lawless bands of bandits that may still exist or hereafter exist in the northern part of Mexico," and that it would "make a proper distribution of such of its forces as may be necessary to prevent the possibility of invasion of American territory from Mexico." It was because of these assurances and because of Gen. Scott's confidence that they would be carried out that he stated in the memorandum that the American forces would be "gradually withdrawn." It is to be noted that, while the American Government was willing to ratify this agreement, Gen. Carranza refused to do so, as Gen. Obregon stated, because, among other things, it imposed improper conditions upon the Mexican Government.

Notwithstanding the assurances in the memorandum, it is well known that the forces of the de facto government have not carried on a vigorous pursuit of the remaining bandits and that no proper distribution of forces to prevent the invasion of American territory has been made, as will be shown by the further facts hereinafter set forth. I am reluctant to be forced to the conclusion which might be drawn from these circumstances that the de facto government, in spite of the crimes committed and the sinister designs of Villa and his followers, did not and does not now intend or desire that these outlaws should be captured, destroyed, or dispersed by American troops or, at the request of this Government, by Mexican troops.

While the conferences at El Paso were in progress, and after the American conferees had been assured on May 2 that the Mexican forces in the northern part of the Republic were then being augmented so as to be able to prevent any disorders that would endanger American territory, a band of Mexicans, on the night of May 5, made an attack at Glenn Springs, Tex., about 20 miles north of the border, killing American soldiers and civilians, burning and sacking property, and carrying off two Americans as prisoners. Subsequent to this event, the Mexican Government, as you state, "gave instructions to Gen. Obregon to notify that of the United States that it would not permit the further passage of American troops into Mexico on this account, and that orders had been given to all military commanders along the frontier not to consent to same." This Government is, of course, not in a position to dispute the statement that these instructions had been given to Gen. Obregon, but it can decisively assert that Gen. Obregon never gave any such notification to Gen. Scott or Gen. Funston or, so far as known, to any other American official. Gen. Obregon did, however, inquire as to whether American troops had entered Mexico in pursuit of the Glenn Springs raiders, and Gen. Funston stated that no orders had been issued to American troops to cross the frontier on account of the raid, but this statement was made before any such orders had been issued, and not afterwards, as the erroneous account of the interview given in your note would appear to indicate. Moreover, no statement was made by the American generals that "no more American troops would cross into our territory."

On the contrary it was pointed out to Gen. Obregon and to Mr. Juan Amador, who was present at the conference, and pointed out with emphasis, that the bandits De la Rosa and Pedro Vino, who had been instrumental in causing the invasion of Texas above Brownsville, were even then reported to be arranging in the neighborhood of Victoria for another raid across the border, and it was made clear to Gen. Obregon that if the Mexican Government did not take immediate steps to prevent another invasion of the United States by these marauders, who were frequently seen in the company of Gen. Nafarrete, the Constitutionalist commander, Mexico would find in Tamaulipas another punitive expedition similar to that then in Chihuahua. American troops crossed into Mexico on May 10, upon notification to the local military authorities, under the repudiated agreement of March 10-13, or in any event in accordance with the practice adopted over 40 years ago, when there was no agreement regarding pursuit of marauders across the international boundary. These troops penetrated 158 miles into Mexican territory in pursuit of the Glenn Springs marauders without encountering a detachment of Mexican troops or a single Mexican soldier. Further discussion of this raid, however, is not necessary, because the American forces sent in pursuit of the bandits recrossed into Texas on the morning of May 22, the date of your note under consideration—a further proof of the singleness of purpose of this Government in endeavoring to quell disorder and stamp out lawlessness along the border.

During the continuance of the El Paso conference, Gen. Scott, you assert, did not take into consideration the plan proposed by the Mexican Government for the protection of the frontier by the reciprocal distribution of troops along the boundary. This proposition was made by Gen. Obregon a number of times, but each time condition upon the immediate withdrawal of American troops, and the Mexican conferees were invariably informed that immediate withdrawal could not take place, and that therefore it was impossible to discuss the project on that basis.

I have noted the fact that your communication is not limited to a discussion of the deplorable condition existing along the border and their important bearing on the peaceful relation of our Governments, but that an effort is made to connect it with other circumstances in order to support, if possible, a mistaken interpretation of the attitude of the Government of the United States toward Mexico. You state in effect that the American Government has placed every obstacle in the way of attaining the pacification of Mexico, and that this is shown by the volume of diplomatic representations in behalf of American interests which constantly impede efforts to reorganize the political, economical, and social conditions of the country; by the decided aid lent at one time to Villa by American officers and by the Department of State; by the aid extended by the American Catholic clergy to that of Mexico; by the constant activity of the American press in favor of intervention and the interests of American business men; by the shelter and supply of rebels and conspirators on American territory; by the detention of shipments of arms and munitions purchased by the Mexican Government; and by the detention of machinery intended for their manufacture.

In reply to this sweeping charge, I can truthfully affirm that the American Government has given every possible encouragement to the de facto Government in the pacification and rehabilitation of Mexico. From the moment of its recognition it has had the undivided support of this Government. An embargo was placed upon arms and ammunition going into Chihuahua, Sonora, and Lower California, in order to prevent their falling into the hands of the armed opponents of the de facto Government. Permission has been granted from time to time, as requested, for Mexican troops and equipment to traverse American territory from one point to another in Mexico in order that the operations of Mexican troops against Villa and his forces might be facilitated.

In view of these friendly acts, I am surprised that the de facto Government has construed diplomatic representations in regard to the unjust treatment accorded American interests, private assistance to opponents to the de facto Government by sympathizers in a foreign country, and the activity of a foreign press as interference by the United States Government in the domestic politics of Mexico. If a denial is needed that this Government has had ulterior and improper motives in its diplomatic representations, or has countenanced the activities of American sympathizers and the American press opposed to the de facto Government, I am glad most emphatically to deny it. It is, however, a matter of common knowledge that the Mexican press has been more active than the press in the United States in endeavoring to influence the two peoples against each other and to force the two countries into hostilities.

With the power of censorship of the Mexican press so rigorously exercised by the de facto Government, the responsibility for this activity can not, it would seem, be avoided by that Government, and the issue of the appeal of Gen. Carranza himself, in the press of March 12, calling upon the Mexican people to be prepared for any emergency which might arise, and intimating that war with the United States was imminent, evidences the attitude of the de facto Government toward these publications. It should not be a matter of surprise that, after such manifestations of hostile feeling, the United States was doubtful of the purpose for which the large amount of ammunition was to be used which the de facto Government appeared eager to import from this country. Moreover, the policy of the de facto Government in refusing to cooperate and in failing to act independently in destroying the Villa bandits and in otherwise suppressing outlawry in the vicinity of the border so as to remove the danger of war materials, while passing southward through this zone, falling into the hands of the enemies of law and order is, in the opinion of this Government, a sufficient ground, even if there were no other, for the refusal to allow such materials to cross the boundary into the bandit-infested region. To have permitted these shipments without careful scrutiny would, in the circumstances, have been to manifest a sense of security which would have been unjustified.

Candor compels me to add that the unconcealed hostility of the subordinate military commanders of the de facto Government toward the American troops engaged in pursuing the Villa bands and the efforts of the de facto Government to compel their withdrawal from Mexican territory by threats and show of military force instead of by aiding in the capture of the outlaws, constitute a menace to the safety of the American troops and to the peace of the border. As long as this menace continues and there is any evidence of an intention on the part of the de facto Government or its military commanders to use force against the American troops instead of cooperating with them, the Government of the United States will not permit munitions of war or machinery for their manufacture to be exported from this country to Mexico.

As to the shelter and supply of rebels and conspirators on American territory, I can state that vigorous efforts have been and are being made by the agents of the United State to apprehend and bring to justice all persons found to be conspiring to violate the laws of the United States by organizing to oppose with arms the de facto Government of Mexico. Political refugees have undoubtedly sought asylum in the United States, but this Government has vigilantly kept them under surveillance and has not hesitated to apprehend them upon proof of their criminal intentions, as the arrest of Gen. Huerta and others fully attests.

Having corrected the erroneous statements of fact to which I have adverted the real situation stands forth in its true light. It is admitted that American troops have crossed the international boundary in hot pursuit of the Columbus raiders and without notice to or the consent of your Government; but the several protestations on the part of this Government by the President, by this department, and by other American authorities, that the object of the expedition was to capture, destroy, or completely disperse the Villa bands of outlaws or to turn this duty over to the Mexican authorities when assured that it would be effectively fulfilled, have been carried out in perfect good faith by the United States.

Its efforts, however, have been obstructed at every point; first, by insistence on a palpably useless agreement which you admit was either not to apply to the present expedition or was to contain impracticable restrictions on its organization and operation; then by actual opposition, encouraged and fostered by the de facto Government; to the further advance of the expedition into Villa territory, which was followed by the sudden suspension of all negotiations for an arrangement for the pursuit of Villa and his followers and the protection of the frontier; and finally by a demand for the immediate withdrawal of the American troops. Meantime conditions of anarchy in the border States of Mexico were continually growing worse. Incursions into American territory were plotted and perpetrated; the Glenn springs raid was successfully executed, while no effective efforts were being made by Gen. Carranza to improve the conditions and to protect American territory from constant threat of invasion.

In view of this increasing menace, of the inactivity of the Carranza forces, of the lack of cooperation in the apprehension of the Villa bands, and of the known encouragement and aid given to bandit leaders, it is unreasonable to expect the United States to withdraw its forces from Mexican territory or to prevent their entry again when their presence is the only check upon further bandit outrages and the only efficient means of protecting American lives and homes—safeguards which Gen. Carranza, though internationally obligated to supply, is manifestly unable or unwilling to give.

In view of the actual state of affairs as I have outlined it above, I am now in a position to consider the conclusion which you have drawn in your note under acknowledgment from the erroneous statements of fact which you have set forth.

Your Government intimates, if it does not openly charge, that the attitude of the United States is one of insincerity, distrust, and suspicion toward the de facto Government of Mexico, and that the intention of the United States in sending its troops into Mexico is to extend its sovereignty over Mexican territory, and not merely for the purpose of pursuing marauders and preventing future raids across the border. The de facto Government charges by implication which admits of but one interpretation that this Government has as its object territorial aggrandizement, even at the expense of a war of aggression, against a neighbor weakened by years of civil strife. The Government of the United States, if it had had designs upon the territory of Mexico, would have had no difficulty in finding during this period of revolution and disorder many plausible arguments for intervention in Mexican affairs. Hoping, however, that the people of Mexico would through their own efforts restore peace and establish an orderly government, the United States has awaited with patience the consummation of the revolution.

When the superiority of the revolutionary faction led by Gen. Carranza became undoubted the United States, after conferring with six others of the American Republics, recognized unconditionally the present de facto Government. It hoped and expected that that Government would speedily restore order and provide the Mexican people and others, who had given their energy and substance to the development of the great resources of the Republic, opportunity to rebuild in peace and security their shattered fortunes.

This Government has waited month after month for the consummation of its hope and expectation. In spite of increasing discouragements, in spite of repeated provocations to exercise force in the restoration of order in the northern regions of Mexico, where American interests have suffered most seriously from lawlessness, the Government of the United States has refrained from aggressive action and sought by appeals and moderate, though explicit, demands to impress upon the de facto Government the seriousness of the situation and to arouse it to its duty to perform its international obligations toward citizens of the United States who had entered the territory of Mexico or had vested interests within its boundaries.

In the face of constantly renewed evidence of the patience and restraint of this Government in circumstances which only a Government imbued with unselfishness and a sincere desire to respect to the full the sovereign rights and national dignity of the Mexican people would have endured, doubts and suspicions as to the motives of the Government of the United States are expressed in your communication of May 22, for which I can imagine no purpose but to impugn the good faith of this Government, for I find it hard to believe that such imputations are not universally known to be without the least shadow of justification in fact.

Can the de facto Government doubt that, if the United States had turned covetous eyes on Mexican territories, it could have found many pretexts in the past for the gratification of its desire? Can that Government doubt that months ago, when the war between the revolutionary factions was in progress, a much better opportunity than the present was afforded for American intervention, if such has been the purpose of the United States as the de facto Government now insinuates? What motive could this Government have had in refraining from taking advantage of such opportunities other than unselfish friendship for the Mexican Republic? I have, of course, given consideration to your argument that the responsibility for the present situation rests largely upon this Government. In the first place you state that even the American forces along the border, whose attention is undivided by other military operations, "Find themselves physically unable to protect effectively the frontier on the American side."

Obviously, if there is no means of reaching bands roving on Mexican territory and making sudden dashes at night into American territory it is impossible to prevent such invasion unless the frontier is protected by a cordon of troops. No government could be expected to maintain a force of this strength along the boundary of a nation with which it is at peace for the purpose of resisting the onslaught of a few bands of lawless men, especially when the neighboring State makes no effort to prevent these attacks. The most effective method of preventing raids of this nature, as past experience has fully demonstrated, is to visit punishment or destruction on the raiders. It is precisely this plan which the United States desires to follow along the border without any intention of infringing upon the sovereign rights of her neighbor, but which, although obviously advantageous to the de facto Government, it refuses to allow or even countenance. It is in fact protection to American lives and property about which the United States is solicitous and not the methods of ways in which that protection should be accomplished.

If the Mexican Government is unwilling or unable to give this protection by preventing its territory from being the rendezvous and refuge of murderers and plunderers, that does not relieve this Government from its duty to take all the steps necessary to safeguard American citizens on American soil. The United States Government can not and will not allow bands of lawless men to establish themselves upon its borders with liberty to invade and plunder American territory with impunity, and when pursued to seek safety across the Rio Grande, relying upon the plea of their Government that the integrity of the soil of the Mexican Republic must not be violated.

The Mexican Government further protests that it has "made every effort on its part to protect the frontier" and that it is doing "all possible to avoid a recurrence of such acts." Attention is again invited to the well-known and unrestricted activity of De la Rosa, Aniceto Pizana, Pedro Vinos, and others in connection with border raids and to the fact, as I am advised, up to June 4 De la Rosa was still collecting troops at Monterey for the openly avowed purpose of making attacks on Texan border towns, and that Pedro Vino was recruiting at another place for the same avowed purpose. I have already pointed out the uninterrupted progress of Villa to and from Columbus and the fact that the American forces in pursuit of the Glenn Springs marauders penetrated 168 miles into Mexican territory without encountering a single Carrancista soldier. This does not indicate that the Mexican Government is doing "all possible"; this is not sufficient to prevent border raids, and there is every reason, therefore, why this Government must take such preventive measures as it deems sufficient.

It is suggested that injuries suffered on account of bandit raids are a matter of "pecuniary reparation," but "never the cause for American forces to invade Mexican soil." The precedents which have never been established and maintained by the Government of the Mexican Republic for the last half century do not bear out this statement. It has grown to be almost a custom not to settle depredations of such bandits by payments of money alone, but to quell such disorders and to prevent such crimes by swift and sure punishment.

The de facto Government finally argues that "if the frontier were duly protected from incursions from Mexico there would be no reason for the existing difficulty"; thus the de facto Government attempts to absolve itself from the first duty of any government, namely, the protection of life and property. This is the paramount obligation for which governments are instituted, and governments neglecting or failing to perform it are not worthy of the name. This is the duty for which Gen. Carranza, it must be assumed, initiated his revolution in Mexico and organized the present Government, and for which the United States Government recognized his Government as the de facto Government of Mexico. Protection of American lives and property, then, in the United States is, first, the obligation of this Government, and in Mexico is, first, the obligation of Mexico and, second, the obligation of the United States. In securing this protection along the common boundary the United States has a right to expect the cooperation of its neighboring Republic, and yet instead of taking steps to check or punish the raiders the de facto Government demurs and objects to measures taken by the United States. The Government of the United States does not wish to believe that the de facto Government approves these marauding attacks, yet as they continue to be made they show that the Mexican Government is unable to repress them. This inability, as this Government has had occasion in the past to say, may excuse the failure to check the outrages complained of, but it only makes stronger the duty of the United States to prevent them, for if the Government of Mexico can not protect the lives and property of Americans exposed to attack from Mexicans the Government of the United States is in duty bound, so far as it can, to do so.

In conclusion, the Mexican Government invites the United States to support its "assurance of friendship with real and effective acts," which "can be no other than the immediate withdrawal of American troops." For the reasons I have herein fully set forth, this request of the de facto Government can not now be entertained. The United States has not sought the duty which has been forced upon it of pursuing bandits who, under fundamental principles of municipal and international law, ought to be pursued and arrested and punished by the Mexican authorities. Whenever Mexico will assume and effectively exercise that responsibility, the United States, as it has many times before publicly declared, will be glad to have this obligation fulfilled by the de facto Government of Mexico. If, on the contrary, the de facto Government is pleased to ignore this obligation, and to believe that "in case of a refusal to retire these troops there is no further recourse than to defend its territory by an appeal to arms," the Government of the United States would surely be lacking in sincerity and friendship if it did not frankly impress upon the de facto Government that the execution of this threat will lead to the gravest consequences. While this Government would deeply regret such a result, yet it can not recede from its settled determination to maintain its national rights and to perform its full duty in preventing further invasions of the territory of the United States and in removing the peril which Americans along the international boundary have borne so long with patience and forbearance.

Accept, etc.,

ROBERT LANSING.

The report of the Secretary of State has my approval.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you had any experience with the different Governments of Mexico with reference to the surrender or extradition of fugitives from justice?

Mr. VALLS. I have had a great deal of experience with them. In prior times, when Gen. Diaz was in power—I refer to him as Gen. Diaz all the time; I can't help it—these matters were a pleasure to me. Inside of 60 or 90 days the fugitive was always surrendered to the officers of Texas. No matter whether the fugitive be Mexican or an American citizen, no stress was laid on that point. I don't recall a single instance where the extradition was refused, and I have handled a great many cases of extradition. They tell me that one of the last official acts Gen. Diaz did was to grant the extradition of a very notorious criminal, a desperate outlaw, known by the name of Dionisio Martinez. I went across the river to receive him in company with Sheriff Will Wright, who is now a Ranger captain. Gen. Diaz had left on the Yperanga a few days before his surrender was refused, and shortly after that he was allowed to escape from jail. His extradition was again requested—again and again—and that man to-day, Senator, is holding a commission as a captain in the Carranza army in New Laredo, under Crecencio Barrera, who committed a most cruel murder in Zapata County. I demanded his extradition. He was found in Mier, Mexico; and that man is to-day holding a commission in the Mexican Army—Crecencio Barrera.

The CHAIRMAN. His extradition having been refused?

Mr. VALLS. No attention paid to our requests.

The CHAIRMAN. Your experience leads you to believe that one of the qualifications which might earn a man a commission in the Carranza army, as a captain at least, should be that he should have murdered some one and be a fugitive from justice on this side of the river?

Mr. VALLS. Looks very much like it, Senator. Then, we had three well-known desperate outlaws who went to the ranch of Mr. Ignacio Benavidez, the president of the First State Bank & Trust Co., of Laredo. They tied his men, they stole nine of his best horses, and three days afterwards the Carranza commander in the city of Guerrero was seen riding the best horse in the bunch. And I requested the extradition of these men and nothing was ever done, and they are also in the army of President Carranza.

The CHAIRMAN. Corroborative evidence of the statement you have just made as to the qualification?

Mr. VALLS. I might give you a number of instances, but it would just tire you and I don't ask for extradition any more.

The CHAIRMAN. On June 19, 1917, Zimmerman, at that time, I believe, subsecretary of foreign affairs of the German Government, sent to Von Eckhardt, then German ambassador in Mexico, certain copies of instructions, the originals of which were obtained by the Government of the United States and given by the President of the United States to the public and to Congress. You stated that you had read it but don't recall the terms of it. Do you recall—I will call your attention to one or two passages in it.

"We (meaning Germany) shall give general financial support (to Mexico) and it is understood that Mexico is to reconquer the lost territory in New Mexico, Texas, and Arizona, and in which Von Eckhart was further instructed to suggest to Mexico that its President—that is, V. Carranza—on his own initiative should communicate with Japan suggesting adherence conditions to this plan and at the same time offer to mediate between Germany and Japan.

"In pursuing its line of investigation there came into the hands of the committee a paper which the committee is precluded for very grave reasons from quoting in full, but for the authenticity of which the committee vouches, in which it is stated that a high official of Mexico would communicate to another high official that the 'treaty with Japan is coming along,' and that the writer is convinced of the great advantage which it would bring Mexico for its national integrity. The committee is also in possession of certain official statements to the effect that great commercial activity might be started in Mexico by reason of the initiative of wealthy Germans, to whom the Mexican Government has the intention of lending its decided support."

Mr. VALLS. I recall that; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Something sounds a little familiar to you compared with this plan of San Diego?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did it appear any more preposterous to you than the plan of San Diego did in the early spring of 1915?

Mr. VALLS. Coming from the Carranza government, it didn't surprise me much, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. These raids that finally formed in the mind of the witness that this plan of San Diego meant something continued along in 1915, disturbances of all kinds, up until the middle of 1916, and the Zimmerman note suggesting the same thing came along in the early part of 1917. Now, we propose to show or have shown already by evidence in this case that the same thing is still in the mind of Mr. Carranza, as shown by correspondence which we have on file. His own correspondence. For instance, the letter of Mr. Carranza, dated—

MEXICO, June 14, 1919.

SEÑOR LIO. MANUEL AGUIRRE BERLANGA.

ESTEEMED FRIEND: Señor Lio Cuballo, bearer of this letter, is the person who, in company with two friends, will bring to you the manifestos and the plan which they desire to put into practice in the State of Texas.

This plan being very favorable for Mexico, please aid them in every way and give the necessary instructions in the frontier States.

I remain, your affectionate friend,

V. CARRANZA.

Did you have any reason to notice any German propoganda along the border among the Mexicans?

Mr. VALLS. Oh, a great deal of it.

The CHAIRMAN. During the war?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir; a great deal.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you happen to know—I presume, however, it is useless to ask you this question—one Gen. Klos in the City of Mexico; do you know how he is employed, what he is doing?

Mr. VALLS. No; how do you spell that name?

The CHAIRMAN. K-l-o-s-s or K-l-o-o-s. Do you know Gen. Pablo Gonzales?

Mr. VALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know his wife?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what descent his wife is?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What nationality?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know a certain German now in custody in this country known as L. Witzke?

Mr. VALLS. No, sir; I don't remember the name, Senator; there are so many of them I don't recall the name.

The CHAIRMAN. Judge, unless you desire to make some further statement yourself, we thank you very much, sir, for the exceedingly lucid and interesting and beautiful statement, as my colleague remarked, that you have given the committee.

Mr. VALLS. Thank you, sir.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. W. M. HANSON.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

The CHAIRMAN. Capt. Hanson, you are connected with this committee, in this investigation, are you?

Capt. HANSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your official position aside from that?

Capt. HANSON. I am senior captain of the Texas Ranger force.

The CHAIRMAN. In your investigations and also in the performance of your official duties, have you been brought in contact with one L. Witzke?

Capt. HANSON. I have.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is he now?

Capt. HANSON. He is at Fort Sam Houston, in custody.

The CHAIRMAN. Under what condition is he in custody?

Capt. HANSON. I understand he is under sentence of death as a German spy during the war.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you, at any time, in the presence of anyone else, or alone, interview this man Witzke?

Capt. HANSON. I did.

The CHAIRMAN. In whose presence?

Capt. HANSON. Capt. Kile of the Intelligence Department of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there a statement made by Witzke at that time?

Capt. HANSON. There was.

The CHAIRMAN. A voluntary statement?

Capt. HANSON. A voluntary statement.

The CHAIRMAN. In the course of that statement was the name of Mario Mendez mentioned?

Capt. HANSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was this statement taken down in writing?

Capt. HANSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Who took it down?

Capt. HANSON. I took it down in longhand, and later Capt. Kile had it typewritten.

The CHAIRMAN. I have here in my hand a typewritten purported statement.

Capt. HANSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is this the same one that was prepared by Capt. Kile of the Intelligence Department?

Capt. HANSON. That is the one.

The CHAIRMAN. Taken down by you and in the presence of Capt. Kile?

Capt. HANSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did, or did not this German spy Witzke state to yourself and Capt. Kile at that time that Mario Mendez, Minister of Telegraph, was in the pay of the German Government; that is, Minister of Telegraph in the Mexican Government?

Capt. HANSON. Yes, sir; he did.

The CHAIRMAN. His pay was paid through Carranza, who was repaid by the German citizens of Mexico?

Capt. HANSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is this Mario Mendez the same Mario Mendez whose name has just been mentioned by the preceding witness in connection with the plan of San Diego?

Capt. HANSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all at this time.

Senator FALL. In consultation with my colleague we have decided that we would now state in the record that we have in our possession documentary evidence concerning the connection of certain Mexican officials with the plan of San Diego and the raids upon this side of the river, corroborating the statements which have already been made and elaborating to some extent upon those statements, throwing additional light upon them. We expect to place a witness upon the stand later to identify, if necessary, the documents in the possession of the Department of State of the United States of America and of this committee. We expect to show the connection of Manuel Ochoa, of Carranza's staff; that he introduced the witness to Agustin Garza, alias Leon Caballo, as has been testified to, who was mentioned in the Carranza letter of June 14, 1919, and who is shown to be identified as Agustin Garza, one of the signers and framers of the original plan of San Diego. We will show that Agustin Garza recently had an office at No. 17 Avenida Independencia, in the City of Mexico; that he was there consorting with Fortunato Zuazua, supposed to be a general in the Mexican Army; that the witness asked Zuazua and Ochoa whether Carranza knew personally of the plan of San Diego; that he was assured that Carranza did know it, and that any connection which the witness might have with the plan of San Diego or the Texas revolution would assure him absolute and ample protection; that the witness then consulted Minister Acuña upon the subject, explaining fully the propositions made by Garza. Acuña advised the witness to accept the proposition and to assist in the plan of San Diego or the Texas revolution.'''

The witness had an office in the same building with Zuazua and was enabled to observe the movements of the leaders of the Plan of San Diego, especially of Jacobo Ayala Villareal, treasurer to Gen. Zuazua, prominently identified, as testified to in connection with this plan, and that as testified to Villareal was subsequently collector of customs in the Carranza government at Naco, Sonora, and is now in charge of the office under the Mexican Government at Matamoros; that while connected with Gen. Suazua, and in communication with the other officials of the Mexican Government, the witness came in contact in the office at Avenida Independencia No. 17, with Pablo Nago, a Jap, whom the witness will testify was living under an assumed name—in other words, that Nago was not his correct name; that Nago was connected with Carranza and Acuña while they were at Vera Cruz in 1914-1915; that Nago was a go-between and constantly in touch with the witness and with those who were formulating and carrying out the Plan of San Diego; that he was also in touch with the witness and Nago, with Gen. Zuazua and others, with Gen. Pablo Gonzalez at Tacubaya; that Zuazua and the Jap obtained money, 10,000 pesos in Carranza money and a thousand dollars in American gold from Pablo Gonzalez; that the gold money was stated by Garza to be intended for the use of a negro in the United States who had been employed to endeavor to secure a revolt among the negro troops on the American side of the border. The witness afterwards came in contact with this negro but did not learn his name. The witness was also in contact with Maurillo Rodriguez, a nephew of Gen. Carranza, who was a friend of Gen. Pablo Gonzalez, and one of the leaders in the Plan of San Diego; that he was constantly at the office of Zuazua, where arms and ammunition were furnished him for the Texas revolution, and passes to Monterrey for himself and 25 men, including 7 or 8 Japanese, were issued to him by Gen. Juan Barragan, chief of staff of the Carranza army; that the witness came in touch with Mario Mendez, who, as has been testified to here, occupies a prominent position in the Carranza administration and was prominently identified with the Plan of San Diego. That the witness talked over with Mendez the details of the plan and was told of various matters by Mendez. Through Capt. Hanson's testimony of the statement of Witzke he was shown at this time to have been in the employ of the German Government. That the witness was directed to Gen. Candido Aguilar, minister of foreign affairs of the Mexican Government under Carranza, by Mendez; that he was taken by Mendez's secretary to see the private secretary of Gen. Carranza, Garzaya Ugarte; he came in connection at this time with Gen. Esteban Fierros, as he, Gen. Fierros, returned from Tampico accompanied by Gen. Luis de la Rosa; that he, de la Rosa, at the time of the witness's testimony very recently was occupied in some capacity at Chapultepec, that the passes of some of the men sent to the northern part of the Republic from the City of Mexico to accompany Gen. Zuazua in carrying out the Plan of San Diego were furnished by Gen. Juan Barragan, of the Carranza army, chief of staff.

The witness talked to de la Rosa and Fierros about the futility of their attempts on Texas, and was assured by de la Rosa that he had been able to keep 5,000 United States soldiers busy along the border with 50 men; that when de la Rosa went to Monterrey that Agustin Garza, or Leon Caballo, also left Mexico City for Monterrey, and that the office at No. 17 Avenida Independencia was then closed. That the Jap mentioned, Pablo Nago, informed the witness that Mario Mendez had instructed him to proceed to Monterrey with money to pay off the men under Garza. Witness knows that Nago went to Monterrey for such purpose. The witness was in Mexico when the Japanese who had accompanied Col. Maurillo Rodriguez to the border returned. He had a conversation with Nago, who informed him that they had come back because the Japanese minister had ordered them to do so under the penalty of forfeiting their rank. These two of them were officers in the Japanese army. One of them had attended officially the jubilee of Queen Victoria; another was an engineer; all were Japanese officers.

Various other matters of interest along this line will be shown by the documents, if we are unable to secure the presence of the witness to testify fully.

(Thereupon the session at 12.30 o'clock p. m. recessed until 2.30 o'clock p. m. of the same day.)

• AFTER RECESS.

Senator FALL. Continuing the statement as to what the committee will prove later—the committee has in its possession, in addition to the letter from Mr. Carranza which was read into the record, and which letter is dated June 14, 1919, another letter, dated in August, 1919, signed by V. Carranza, directing Aguirre Berlanga, minister of Gobernacion, to place upon the pay roll and afford all financial assistance to one Juan M. Garcia and two Americans from Texas, whom the committee will expect to show are the same two men referred to in the letter of June 14 as having the plan which was of benefit to Mexico and concerning which instructions were to be given to the frontier States of Mexico.

The committee has in its possession, and there is also on file with another department of this Government, the minutes of a meeting of Lodge 23, of the City of Mexico, held on October 15, 1919. Lodge 23 appears to be an association of extreme radical anarchistic elements in the City of Mexico.

The committee expects to show that the two men referred to in the two letters from Carranza, accompanied by Lino Caballo—Agustin Garza—were present at the meeting of this lodge, and that at this meeting, with these three delegates present, two being Americans who had arrived from the United States, these men claimed that the "Society," as they called it, would be able at the beginning of November—that is, November of this past year, 1919—to call a general strike of all miners and metal workers in the United States; that they had 3,000,000 adherents in this country, where they expected to seize one western and two Atlantic ports; that a large number of American soldiers were preparing to take sides with them; and that they proposed to establish a capital of a reformed government of the United States in the State of Colorado, and that when such revolution was successful, the Mexicans having rendered their assistance, the border States which were acquired by the United States under the treaty of 1848 would be returned to Mexico.

The committee will introduce this verbatim copy of the minutes of these proceedings later, for the purpose of connecting up with the original plan of San Diego, which has been testified to, the resuscitated plan as announced in the Zimmerman note, and the plan which was approved by Mr. Carranza, as by photographic copies of his letters now in our possession under date of June 14 and August, 1919.

DR. PAUL FERNARDO ALTENDORF.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

The CHAIRMAN. State your full name in the record?

Dr. ALTENDORF. Paul Bernardo Altendorf.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what country are you a citizen?

Dr. ALTENDORF. Of this country.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what country are you—you are a citizen of this country?

Dr. ALTENDORF. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Speak a little louder, Doctor?

Dr. ALTENDORF. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what country are you a native?

Dr. ALTENDORF. Poland.

The CHAIRMAN. Doctor, what has been your business during the recent war, and where have you been for a greater portion of the time?

Dr. ALTENDORF. I have been in south Mexico, in 1914, before the war broke out, Senator—I was practicing medicine there.

Senator SMITH. What—I can not hear you.

Dr. ALTENDORF. I have been practicing medicine there.

The CHAIRMAN. Practicing medicine in southern Mexico in 1914?

Dr. ALTENDORF. Yes, sir; at Merida.

The CHAIRMAN. After the war broke out what was your business, if any?

Dr. ALTENDORF. When the United States declared war on Germany I knew all the interests that the Germans were doing with the Mexican Government in Mexico City, and I saw also some of this German spy system in Merida, receiving the beer from Milwaukee, and on the labels inside written in invisible ink, and I got hold of information through the German club in Merida, and I knew some Americans down there at the hotel in Merida and told them about it.

The CHAIRMAN. Merida is in Yucatan?

Dr. ALTENDORF. Yes, sir; in Yucatan. So I wanted to go to the United States, but none of the American steamships would take me as an alien name, so I made up my mind to go by land. I intended to go at that time, but I was in trouble with Alvarado on account he was making a little propaganda down there in this Bolshiviki, so-called, so he told me I had 24 hours to leave Merida.

The CHAIRMAN. This was Salvador Alvarado?

Dr. ALTENDORF. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. At that time the governor of Yucatan?

Dr. ALTENDORF. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the Carranza government?

Dr. ALTENDORF. Yes, sir. So I had to leave Merida that time in a great hurry; so I took a little boat from Campeche and went up to Frontera. On my arrival at Frontera there was an order from Alvarado that every citizen there, every American, must receive these "bilimbiques"—this paper money—that all silver must be turned in and gold. I went to the American consul there, and I had to be very careful because there was a lot of falsification going on there and we had to accept the paper. One of Alvarado's officers by name of Dominguez, he found me out, and they had been tracing me, so I took a boat quick the same night and went to Puerto Mexico, and from there fighting my way through with the rebels to Mexico City. There were some agents on the train to ask for such as were going into the hotels, and one of the agents that I saw was a Russian—I could speak Russian also, so I addressed him in Russian there, and he said there was a very fine German hotel there by the name of Juarez on Calle de Cuba in Mexico City, and I said, "Who is the proprietor?" He said, "The proprietor is Mr. Otto Paglash, a German." The next morning I looked up this man there, Mr. Paglash, and I introduced myself to him. He asked me a few questions, what I was doing there; I said, "I am coming in to buy some medicines and going back to Merida."

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Doctor, let me suggest to you that at the present time the committee does not desire to develop into that story.

Dr. ALTENDORF. Yes. I was just going to tell about this man. And he introduced me to this man Mendez; there were three brothers living in the hotel, paid by the German Government—board and lodging—and receiving at that time $600 American money salary, which means 1,200 pesos Mexican money, from the German ambassador, Von Eckhardt, a month.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what Mendez?

Dr. ALTENDORF. Mario Mendez. He used to meet a man by the name of Kettenbach, down there—a criminal—and hand him over the wires that used to come from the United States to the American ambassador, and all kinds of communications from the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. That was Mario Mendez?

Dr. ALTENDORF. Yes, sir; that was Mario Mendez.

The CHAIRMAN. He was minister of telegraph?

Dr. ALTENDORF. Yes, sir; that is right.

The CHAIRMAN. And he would turn over to Von Eckhardt, the German ambassador—

Dr. ALTENDORF. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The messages coming from the United States?

Dr. ALTENDORF. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And he was in the employ of the German ambassador there?

Dr. ALTENDORF. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Receiving $600 a month?

Dr. ALTENDORF. Yes, sir; $600 a month.

The CHAIRMAN. Doctor, were you afterwards identified with the Intelligence Department of the United States Army?

Dr. ALTENDORF. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In Mexico?

Dr. ALTENDORF. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have anything to do with this man Witsche?

Dr. ALTENDORF. Yes, sir; I was responsible for his arrest.

The CHAIRMAN. You were sent by the United States into Mexico to get Witsche out?

Dr. ALTENDORF. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And it was through your evidence and that which you obtained that Witsche was sentenced to death?

Dr. ALTENDORF. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Doctor, the committee desires to reserve your further testimony to a further hearing. At this point we simply wanted to identify Mendez through you. Thank you very much.

Dr. ALTENDORF. Yes, sir.

TESTIMONY OF MAJ. R. L. BARNES.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

The CHAIRMAN. What is your present occupation?

Maj. BARNES. I am with the claim department of the Travelers' Insurance Co., Hartford, Conn.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a citizen of the United States, Major?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you born?

Maj. BARNES. Prentiss, Ky.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you on or about February 14, 1912?

Maj. BARNES. I was residing in Washington at that time; was appointed special agent of the Department of Justice and assigned to the border.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you come to the border?

Maj. BARNES. I left Washington on the evening of the 14th of February.

Senator SMITH. What year?

Maj. BARNES. 1912, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you on December 13, 1913?

Maj. BARNES. That was the date I was placed in charge of the work of the San Antonio division of the bureau of investigation of the Department of Justice.

The CHAIRMAN. With your headquarters in this city?

Maj. BARNES. San Antonio; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. San Antonio?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was your district?

Maj. BARNES. Including the States of Texas, Arizona, and New Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. In connection with your—or later, I will ask you first, did you hold a commission in the Army or in the War Department?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir; I was commissioned a major in the Army and—

The CHAIRMAN. About what date—October 28?

Maj. BARNES. October 28.

The CHAIRMAN. 1917?

Maj. BARNES. 1917. And was designated intelligence officer for the Southern Department on—and commenced the duties on November 9, 1917, for the purpose of organizing the military intelligence division forces to combat the German system in Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir. During the course of your official investigations, in the discharge of your duties, did you come in contact with what is known as the plan of San Diego?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir; I first came in contact with that while I was with the Department of Justice.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have anything to do with the investigation of that plan and those connected with it?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir; the special agents operating under me investigated it so far as it pertained to the Federal Government, and then I went to Brownsville and spent about three weeks or a month myself personally.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir. Are you familiar with any of the raids—

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Which occurred about that time?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about the Brownsville raids?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir; I used to be very familiar with them; I don't know that I can recall the dates exactly now, but I know in a general way all the information.

The CHAIRMAN. The Webb County raids?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Big Bend raids?

Maj. BARNES. San Igancio and Big Bend raids; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know who gave, if anyone—who gave from Mexico, among the officials in Mexico, aid and assistance to this plan—in support of this plan and these raids?

Maj. BARNES. Gen. Nafarrate, who was in command of the district opposite Brownsville, was very active; one of his assistants, Col. Rodrigues, and Niceforo Zambrano, Gen. Zuazua, and there was some man connected with the railroad, I think, with headquarters at Monterrey—I don't recall his name; it might have been Fierros, or something of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN. Col. Fierros?

Maj. BARNES. I think that was the name; he was very active.

The CHAIRMAN. These men were all in the employ or associated with the Carranza Government?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir; they were the Carranza people.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know any of the positions that have been held by Niceforo Zambrano?

Maj. BARNES. He was at that time Treasurer General of Mexico, I think, and later became governor of—

The CHAIRMAN. Nuevo Leon?

Maj. BARNES. Nuevo Leon; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Gen. Nafarrate?

Maj. BARNES. Gen. Nafarrate was in command of that district there opposite Brownsville, I don't know just—he had headquarters at that time opposite Brownsville, later he was in Tampico, and at one time—I don't know—he was moved back from the border at one time on account of a protest from Americans, and—I don't know just what his position was then.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know Luis de la Rosa, or did you investigate him?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir; I knew of him very well—I didn't know him personally, but I had his photograph turned over to me by the authorities.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know Aniceto Pizana?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir; he was the leader of those two raids, they were associated as leaders in the Brownsville raids.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the occupation of those two men, do you know?

Maj. BARNES. Prior?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; and about that time?

Maj. BARNES. If I recall correctly, de la Rosa was a butcher at a little town there on this side of the border—or grocery keeper, I don't know which—I think he was a butcher, though; Pizana, I think, had a little ranch.

The CHAIRMAN. Were they the active leaders on this side in those raids?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And do you know where they were received after their raids were over?

Maj. BARNES. Well, they were in Brownsville quite a while—I mean in Matamoros on the other side of the river, after the raids they used to be there, our men would report they were seen over there in uniforms, and later became a part of and were incorporated into the Mexican army.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, in these raids do you know where there were physical evidences of the fact that Carrancista soldiers were engaged in the raids?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir; we frequently found uniforms—Carranza uniforms with the usual epaulets, etc., and buttons and commissions.

The CHAIRMAN. Commissions?

Maj. BARNES. Commissions, and things of that nature, and letters and sometimes passes signed by some Carranza official.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that equally true of the Brownsville, Laredo, and Big Bend districts?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. As an official of this Government did you make any appeal or representations to the Carranza officials on the other side with reference to these raids at any time?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir; I had conferences with the Carranza officials with the idea of trying to cooperate with them to prevent the raids.

They represented to me that they were not—they would do the best they could, but they were not hardly strong enough to handle the situation. Then we—on account of that condition and for the purpose of protecting the citizens in this country, we tried to secure advance information as when these raids would in the future take place, and in doing that we sent a number under cover of uniforms into Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Men in the employment of the Secret Service of the United States?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir; yes, sir, in our employment.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course you do not care to mention their names?

Maj. BARNES. No, sir; I do not care to mention their names.

The CHAIRMAN. You sent them into Mexico?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. To convey to you advance information of the dates of the raids?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Because the Carrancista officers say they would do what they could but were not able to stop them?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what did your men discover and report to you as to the character of the actions of the Carrancista officials?

Maj. BARNES. Well; they soon reported that evidence was to the effect that the raids were actually supported and assisted by the Carranza officials.

The CHAIRMAN. And among them they also reported to you as supporting and assisting the raids were the names that you have given?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Niceforo Zambrano?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Gen. Nafarrate?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Gen. Zuazua?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Maurillo Rodriguez and others?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about the attitude of Venustiano Carranza during the recent war between the United States and Germany?

Maj. BARNES. Decidedly pro-German and anti-American.

The CHAIRMAN. You know that from your investigations?

Maj. BARNES. I am very positive of it; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Made in pursuance of your official duties?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, did he render any—did his officials render assistance to the Germans in Mexico?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the nature of such assistance?

Maj. BARNES. Well, the—they would, in the first place their telegraph and wireless were available for getting messages from various officials in—

The CHAIRMAN. You say they were available. Were they actually used by the Germans?

Maj. BARNES. Oh, they were used; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. For the delivery of code messages?

Maj. BARNES. For the delivery of code messages. They were also given passes on the railroads.

The CHAIRMAN. Free passes on the railroads?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir; free passes. The officials in the various States were frequently instructed to render them assistance in any manner they could.

The CHAIRMAN. Could you mention any names of any prominent parties in Mexico—I mean Germans—connected with this German propaganda?

Maj. BARNES. Von Eckhardt was the German minister, but the German espionage system was in charge of a man named Jahnke—Kurt Jahnke.

The CHAIRMAN. Kurt Jahnke?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir. He also had under him, probably his best man, I guess, was Lathar Witsche, or this man Wabirski.

The CHAIRMAN. Is this the same man, Witsche, who is now under sentence of death, now in charge of the military?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir; I believe he is probably the same man.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever learn anything of Zeferino Martinez, now the governor of San Luis Potosi, in connection with the plan of San Diego, or did your investigations—

Maj. BARNES. I can not recall that name, sir; there are so many details, I have been out of touch with that situation for the last six or seven months, that I don't know.

The CHAIRMAN. What as to the official controlled press of Mexico, what was its attitude during the war toward the United States?

Maj. BARNES. Pro-German and very anti-American.

The CHAIRMAN. Pro-German?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir. El Democrata—there was a string of papers known as "El Democrata" that were particularly antagonistic.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was in charge of those papers, do you know?

Maj. BARNES. Rip Rip Martinez. I think he was later appointed ambassador to Japan.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the attitude of the Carranza government with reference to English papers that might display any feelings toward the United States or the Allies during the war?

Maj. BARNES. Antagonistic, sir. One of the most notable instances was probably the paper El Universal, was probably one of the most important papers that supported the United States during the war. Palavicini, who was the editor, was expelled.

The CHAIRMAN. Was this situation brought to the attention of the officials at Washington?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What did Washington do, if anything, with reference to the attitude of the newspapers in Mexico?

Maj. BARNES. We tried to combat the German propaganda by cutting off their supply of newsprint so that they would not have anything to print papers on. Then, there was a decree issued by Carranza requiring that the import duties on this newsprint paper should be paid in kind, and the newsprint thus secured later be turned over to these official pro-German papers.

The CHAIRMAN. It was turned over to the pro-German papers?

Maj. BARNES. That was the report given; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there any protection and assistance given by the Carranza authorities to American slackers during the war, if you know?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Give an instance.

Maj. BARNES. Well, the most conspicuous instance is probably Lynn Gale, who published Gale's Magazine.

The CHAIRMAN. He is still publishing that magazine in Mexico?

Maj. BARNES. He is still publishing that in Mexico City. There were always slackers crossing the border, and they were always received with open arms, given all the assistance they needed, and they could go wherever they desired.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you investigate the case of Lynn Gale?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir. We gathered a great deal of information about Gale; we received a great deal of information through intercepted letters.

The CHAIRMAN. You did intercept letters from him to this country?

Maj. BARNES. Through the censorship; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you recall either of those letters—any of those letters, to whom they were addressed?

Maj. BARNES. Well, I can't recall. A great many of them were addressed to his family, and then some of them were addressed to other radicals in this country.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you had your attention called to the activities of a man by the name of Martens in New York?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir; the Russian so-called soviet ambassador.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; who has recently been arrested by the United States Government for his activities?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether any of these letters addressed by Gale was addressed to Martens, or did one of those come under your notice?

Maj. BARNES. I don't recall of ever having seen one addressed to Martens at that time, although there were so many of them I do not recall whether there was or not.

The CHAIRMAN. You have seen copies of Gale's Magazine, have you?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It is avowedly engaged in bolshevik propaganda in Mexico, isn't it?

Maj. BARNES. Decidedly so; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee have here a copy of a letter under date of May 3, 1919, purporting to be written on the letter head of Gale's Magazine. I am going to read you the letter for the purpose of ascertaining whether this is along the general tenor of the letters which Mr. Gale was sending out.

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN (reading). "Journal of the New Civilization. Lynn A. E. Gale, editor and publisher, P. O. box 518, Mexico City, D. F., Mexico." Is that the address of this man?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Addressed to Mr. J. I. A. K. Martens, 299 Broadway, New York City. Dated May 8, 1919. [Reading:]

DEAR SIR: Knowing you are the financial agent of the Russian Soviet Government in New York, I take the liberty to write you and ask you if you can give me financial aid in my propaganda in Mexico. I have already sent you copies of Gale's Magazine. No doubt you are already familiar with it, or at least read the articles in the New York World and other papers, accusing me of being the leader of Bolshevik propaganda in Mexico, and other dire crimes.

Gale's Magazine was published a year in the United States, and resumed here in 1918, after Mrs. Gale and I moved here. It originally had 80,000 circulation in the United States, but lost most of those after we came here, for the censor would not let it circulate in the mails (when he was able to prevent it). However, a small number of copies have reached the United States each month, and a circulation of 10,000 has been gained in Mexico.

I wish now to publish another edition in Spanish, for it will be much more effective than the English edition, as the large majority of the people read and speak Spanish. I am about making expenses on the edition in English, and can do so on the Spanish edition with substantial profit if I can get funds for the original financing of the enterprise. If you could advance $10,000, I would be able to develop a tremendous circulation here in a few weeks, covering all Mexico and much of Central and South America.

On a separate sheet I have pasted clippings of some references to my honesty and ability. Suffice it to say, I was originally a Democrat, and as such was in the employ of the New York State Government under Govs. Sulzer and Glynn. The present governor, Al Smith, knows me well, and I was a legislative official when he was speaker of the assembly. I became an independent Democrat and finally a Socialist. When the war came I was drafted, but being opposed to war I left the United States and came to Mexico and made my home in this city. Since my arrival I have established very close relations with the Mexican Government, which I have urged to Bolshevickize the country, and which will, I believe, do so. I have been extended unusual help in various ways by President Carranza and his prime minister, Secretary Berlanga.

The two following paragraphs I shall not read; one of them is an enemy and the other contains the name of his correspondent in the United States through whom return mail is to be sent to him, and I do not care to give publicity to the name of that correspondent. This is signed "Yours for the Red Dawn," signed "Lynn A. E. Gale." In the correspondence which you intercepted from Gale were any of the names which were mentioned here given by him as reference?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir; very frequently. That is his history in New York—we investigated that, and that checks up with it very closely.

The CHAIRMAN. But you were investigating him because he had been drafted and escaped to Mexico?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. To avoid the draft?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What have you to say, if anything, with reference to his statement that he was particularly close to the Carranza government?

Maj. BARNES. That is undoubtedly true, sir, because we have received numerous other reports that seemed to confirm that.

The CHAIRMAN. Some of the references, some of the parties to whom Mr. Gale—whose names he has mentioned here and to whom he has referred, have explained their indorsements of Mr. Gale, have they not—for instance, Gov. Glynn; do you remember any explanation made by him?

Maj. BARNES. I don't remember. At the time I left our service there had been no explanation requested at all.

The CHAIRMAN. There had been no publicity given to this?

Maj. BARNES. No, sir. I know a number of times he would use, insert advertisements in his magazine in Mexico—for instance, the La Salle Extension University; we would call that to the attention of reputable firms in this country, and they would say they had not authorized him—had not advertised in his magazine, never authorized him to use it at all, and we would frequently find he was sailing under false colors in reference to his claims.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. What effort, if any, was made by this Government to secure the friendship of Mexico after we entered the war, if you know?

Maj. BARNES. We made a very earnest effort to retain the friendship of Mexico, as we had done before that. In that connection, practically every branch of the service, I guess, received instructions to endeavor to be cordial in their relations with those on the opposite side of the river where they happened to be located, and we also endeavored to be very energetic in the suppression of any—any activities of any Mexican refugees on this side whose action might be antagonistic toward the Mexican Government. Then Gen. Pershing at one time made an appeal to the business men along the frontier—the hardware dealers particularly, and asked them not to handle arms and ammunition except under the supervision of the military service. All of the dealers very patriotically responded to that request, and arms and ammunition were not even accepted for shipment on the railroad without permit from the military authorities.

The CHAIRMAN. From your information, to what is due more than anything else, the maintenance by Carranza of his government in Mexico during the last two or three years?

Maj. BARNES. Well, I think the American Government—to the support given it by the American Government is very largely due the fact that they have been able to stand up.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose that the American Government allowed arms and ammunition exported across the river, and suppose that Gen. Pershing had not made the request which has been so patriotically complied with and carried out by the American citizens, what, in your opinion, would have been the result with reference to Mr. Carranza?

Maj. BARNES. It is my belief that the Carranza government would have fallen some time ago; sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you at any time have any conference with any official of the Carranza government or any prominent representative of Carranza—

Major BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In trying to carry out your instructions?

Major BARNES. Along that—along those lines, Mr. Pat O'Hay, who was a very efficient—proved to be a very efficient man at that period of time, induced Don Manuel Amaya, who was official introducer at that time, but commonly referred to as the "official house of Mexico." was induced to make a trip to San Antonio, where we entertained him and showed him through our training camps—Camp Travis and Kelly Field, and did everything we could to make his visit pleasant. Thereafter you recall that the editors of the Mexican newspapers were escorted through the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. This was a part of the purpose of the United States?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. To draw the Mexican Government, if possible, closer to the United States?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. To create a friendly feeling?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What if anything did Mr. Amaya tell you with reference to the success, or probable success, of your efforts?

Maj. BARNES. Well, while Mr. Amaya was here I had a conference with him at the Menger Hotel; he assured me that Carranza was not pro-German. He said it with a great deal of force, and he said it with such force that it really had some effect. But thereafter he returned to Mexico, and I corresponded with him. He first wrote me a letter thanking me for the courtesies extended him while he was here, and then I took advantage of that opportunity to place on paper the assistance that the officials of this Government had rendered to his Government, and to in that way see, if possible, if we could not get some reciprocal action; but I never received any response to that letter. I wrote that, of course, more or less as a personal letter, and not as an official letter.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you, during these investigations, satisfy yourself as to whether Carranza was a friend to the United States, or whether he and those surrounding him were acting under the influence of some other government and its representatives?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir. I happened to know a number of friends of Carranza's in Texas—men who had been responsible for his success in the revolution—and through them I endeavored to have them use their influence to cause him to support the United States, or at least not be actively against us; and one effort I remember, I appealed to a very close friend of Carranza, and he told me that he had already made efforts along that line, and that a friend of his had just returned from Mexico City, and that Carranza was surrounded by a coterie there who had flattered him, and also through the flattery of Von Eckhardt he had been made to believe that he was destined to be the future Bismarck of America, and that it was absolutely hopeless to endeavor to win him to the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Von Eckhardt was at that time ambassador of the German Empire—

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. To Mexico?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you become convinced as to the truth of these statements?

Maj. BARNES. Absolutely convinced; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. From your official investigation?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have any information as to any Mexican officials gathering information for the Germans along the border?

Maj. BARNES. That was reported to us on several different occasions, but I can not just recall at this time just how positive the proof was; but I think in one or two instances that it was ample to assure any reasonable man that such was the case.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, when the draft was put in effect in the United States, what efforts, if any, did you make to explain to the people along the border, and particularly those of Spanish descent, as to the effect of the draft?

Maj. BARNES. Well, when the draft—even the first draft had caused considerable consternation among the Mexican citizens, as well as many—a great many native Texans of Mexican descent, due largely to the fact of false information about the provisions of the draft being circulated among ignorant people.

The CHAIRMAN. Where was the source, do you know, of that false information?

Maj. BARNES. German propaganda.

The CHAIRMAN. German propaganda?

Maj. BARNES. We—the first efforts—I mean, during the first draft we endeavored to solicit the influence of the Mexican consul, but so far as I was able to see, no active assistance was ever rendered. Then, when the draft limit was raised, there was another exodus, even worse than the first, and we took even more active steps the second time, at this period, than we did before. We printed circulars and distributed them among the Mexican population; we organized a meeting and had speakers of Mexican origin address these people, and endeavored to have the Mexican consuls send out some of these circulars and also state our true attitude in the situation. Very little, in fact, no assistance of that kind was rendered, but as a matter of fact—

The CHAIRMAN. That is, rendered by the Mexican officials?

Maj. BARNES. Rendered by the Mexican officials; and one consul general here at that time whose name I can not recall, but he succeeded Seguin—a French name—it has just slipped my memory at present.

Mr. JACKSON. Frezieres—T. Frezieres.

Maj. BARNES. I remember him; Frezieres, that is the name; I remember him. I had made a visit two or three days before to his office, and I assured him of our sincere friendship and asked him if he could do anything along that line we would very much appreciate it, and he promised me he would. The next day, after we had one of these meetings at the market here, he phoned up to my office and asked me if I would come down, stating that he was too busy to come to my office, and when I arrived at his office he was very much excited and positively insulted me, so much so that under any other conditions I would have forcibly resented it, but I let it pass by at that time and didn't say anything.

Senator SMITH. What was the cause of his indignation?

Maj. BARNES. Because we had had this meeting over there and at that meeting some unfavorable comments had been directed toward Carranza men.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you received no assistance or cooperation from the Mexican authorities?

Maj. BARNES. None whatever. As a matter of fact, the information frequently reached us that the Mexican consuls assisted in the circulation of this false propaganda. We were at that time not just sure whether it was on account of pro-German feeling or whether it was on account of the fee they were getting for passports; but I know,

I remember clearly, very distinctly, that down here at the Mexican consul all his building there was full—the Book Building—and the Mexicans extended down Houston Street about a block.

The CHAIRMAN. People getting their passports?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And he had a fee from that?

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. So you do not know whether his antagonism toward you and your efforts was created by his love for the Germans or love for the money he was getting for the passports?

Maj. BARNES. Well, in Frezieres's case I was positive it was both, whereas in the other case I was not so positive which it was, because we had other reports of Frezieres's pro-German activities.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, Major, I won't ask you the details of these raids, as we have other witnesses. Many of them were engaged actively in the combating there.

Maj. BARNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

TESTIMONY OF HENRY FORRES—Recalled.

(Witness was reminded by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, that he was still under oath.)

Senator SMITH. Mr. Forres, you were on the stand yesterday. Have you or not seen the Mexican consul stationed at this city in regard to the visé of your passport?

Mr. FORRES. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Did you present it to him?

Mr. FORRES. I presented my passport to his chief clerk, and before presenting the passport the chief clerk handed me a form of application for a visé and told me that I would have to have another photograph taken in connection with it. I told him all right. In the mean time he asked to see my passport. I gave him my passport and he immediately took it into the consul's office, because they have three offices, and in less than half a minute he was back with it—handed it to me and told me they would not visé it, and I asked him why, and he gave absolutely no reason whatever.

Senator SMITH. No explanation?

Mr. FORRES. None; absolutely.

Senator SMITH. He positively refused to visé it?

Mr. FORRES. Absolutely.

Senator SMITH. Do you know whether or not it was by reason of your having appeared as a witness before this committee?

Mr. FORRES. I see no other reason because you can see by the passport it has been viséd a great many, many times by different consuls—here by the consul at Piedras Negras, and here by the consuls in Matamoros and Laredo, and different cities.

Senator SMITH. This is the first refusal?

Mr. FORRES. This is the first refusal.

Senator SMITH. And this come after your appearance as a witness before the committee?

Mr. FORRES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you go to the consul?

Mr. FORRES. I went to the consul this morning, just about an hour ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was with you, if anyone, Mr. Mayfield?

Mr. FORRES. Mr. Mayfield; yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. That's all.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. S. C. KILE.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Capt. KILE. I am, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what State are you a native?

Capt. KILE. Native of the State of Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your occupation?

Capt. KILE. Military intelligence officer.

The CHAIRMAN. Now in the service of the United States?

Capt. KILE. I am, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. With the rank of captain?

Capt. KILE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where are you stationed?

Capt. KILE. At department headquarters at Fort Sam Houston.

The CHAIRMAN. Captain, we have here a little volume entitled "A Brief History of the Lower Rio Grande Valley," which purports to give an account of the various raids occurring since 1915 along the Mexican border and Texas border, numbering a total, I believe, of some forty-six or more, and we are informed that the author of this volume is now dead. Have you ever read the book or any part of it?

Capt. KILE. I have, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you had your attention called to the statement contained in the book as to each of those different raids?

Capt. KILE. Particularly as to those set forth in Chapter X.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you take the book and examine Chapter X and state if those are the particular raids which you have had your attention called to [handing book to witness]?

Capt. KILE (after examining book). Yes, sir; these are the ones which I have had occasion to particularly verify.

The CHAIRMAN. I am not going to ask you, Captain, to read this into the record nor take up the time at present to have it read. We will instruct the reporters at this point, however, to embrace in their report of the day's proceedings the account as given by the author of these different raids. The question which I desired to ask you, having read this and having had your attention called to it, whether you have checked up the accuracy of the statements made by the author with reference to these raids?

Capt. KILE. I have in this way: By my direction and under my supervision, my sergeant major checked these movements and troop activities as reported in Chapter X from the official records kept in the office of The Adjutant General as to troop movements and operation, and it was found to be accurate, with a very few minor exceptions, which were noted on the margin of the book at the time the check was made.

The CHAIRMAN. Were they typographical or were they errors in material statements?

Capt. KILE. Why, the inferences I would get from the text of the subject were that they were typographical errors rather than ones of fact.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know of—from other sources of the Webb station raid, which the committee is informed is not detailed in this book—do you know there was such a raid?

Capt. KILE. Yes, sir; from official reports and the files of our office.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you regard the statements as contained in Chapter X, with reference to these raids, as so substantially correct that the committee is warranted in placing them in the official records of this hearing?

Capt. KILE. I do, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much. I think that is all just at this point.

Chapter X of the book entitled "A Brief History of the Lower Rio Grande Valley," by Frank Cushman Pierce, of Brownsville, Tex., authenticated by the witness, Capt. S. C. Kile, and ordered by the committee to be incorporated in the record, is as follows, to wit:)

CHAPTER X.—LOWER RIO GRANDE VALLEY.

On March 27, 1915, Gen. Jose Rodriguez, a Villista commander, began an attack on the city of Matamoros, Tamaulipas, with about 700 men. The city was defended by Gen. Emiliano P. Nafarrate and Col. Procopio Elizondo. The Villistas attempted to charge the trenches which encircle the city of Matamoros. They charged across an open-cleared flat and were mowed down by machine guns, suffering a loss of at least 250 killed and many wounded. In fact, 232 wounded men were allowed to cross the river at Las Rucias ranch, 5 miles west of Brownsville, and were housed and cared for by the American citizens, men and women, of Brownsville, who attended them until their recovery when they were sent by this Government to Laredo and there delivered to the Villistas.

Not more than 12 of the defenders were killed and not more than 10 wounded.

Rodriguez gave up the fight and afterwards boarded the train with his men and went to Monterey, where the Villistas were then in charge.

Gen. Navarro, one of the Villista commanders, was killed in one of the sallies against Matamoros.

During the month of May, 1915, a band of Mexicans, estimated to be from 20 to 30 men, were seen by various persons in the vicinity of Rancho Los Indios, about 8 or 9 miles east of Sebastian, Cameron County, Tex., and 35 miles north of Brownsville. Thirty deputy sheriffs, and many citizens joined in the chase, but could never get in contact with the Mexicans. American and Mexican farmers and ranchmen would report, almost daily, the loss of cattle, saddles, etc.

On July 17, 1915, Bernard Boley, a young American, was killed near the north line of the county, supposedly by bandits of the party which had been reported.

On July 12, 1915, 11 Mexicans, heavily armed, forced Nils Peterson, a farmer living about 4 miles south of Lyford, 40 miles north of Brownsville, to open his store and to supply them with food and ammunition.

On July 23, 1915, two brothers, Lorenzo and Gorgonio Manriquez, were killed by deputy sheriffs at the Mercedes headgates and in the town of Mercedes, respectively. They had been denounced as two of four who had robbed a store at Progreso (44 miles west from Brownsville, on the Rio Grande), the year before. It is alleged they resisted arrest.

On July 25, 1915, bandits set fire to and burned a bridge of the St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Railway, just south of Sebastian.

On July 28, 1915, Deputy Sheriffs Frank Carr and Daniel Hinojosa, of San Benito, at 10 o'clock at night, while transporting Adolfo Muniz in an automobile from San Benito to Brownsville to be placed in the county jail, were stopped 2 miles south of San Benito, where their prisoner was taken from them by men in another automobile. The man, Muniz, was hung and shot. It was alleged that he tried to commit rape on a young girl of the vicinity, and that he was under indictment for theft.

On July 31, 1915, bandits raided Los Indios ranch and killed Joe Maria Benavides, a Mexican.

On August 2, 1915, 10 soldiers from Troop A, Twelfth United States Cavalry, accompanied by deputy sheriffs and civilians, rushed Rancho Tule, about 25 miles north of Brownsville, in quest of bandits. Pvt. G. W. McGuire, Twelfth Cavalry, was killed, and Deputy Sheriff Monohan and Joe Longoria and a civilian were wounded.

On August 3, 1915, rangers and deputy sheriffs attacked a ranch near Paso Real, about 32 miles north of Brownsville, and killed Desiderio Flores and his two sons, Mexicans, alleged to be bandits.

On August 6, 1915, a band of 14 heavily armed Mexicans appeared at Sebastian. After robbing Alexander's store of various articles, they proceeded to the granary near the railroad track, and there picked out A. L. Austin and his son, Charles Austin. After taking these to their home, they transported them in a wagon, driven by a lad named Millard, whom they had also taken prisoner, and at some short distance from the house, made the two Austins get out of the wagon and then stood them up and shot them, killing both. Millard was released.

On August 8, 1915, a band of Mexicans shot at and wounded one Charles Jensen, night watchman, at the gin at Lyford, Tex.

On the 6th of August, a band of Mexicans shot at an automobile near Los Fresnos, 12 miles from Brownsville, wounding Sunny Huff.

On August 8, 1915, a party of bandits, estimated to be about 60, attacked Las Norias, flag station, about 70 miles north of Brownsville, on the St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Railway. In the battle which ensued, 5 outlaws were killed and found on the ground. Others were badly wounded and it was afterwards learned several had died as a result of their wounds. Reports having been received that a band was operating in that vicinity and had been seen thereabouts, 8 cavalrymen from Harlingen, Adj. Gen. Henry Hutchings, State troops; Capt. J. M. Fox and 10 rangers; Sheriff Vann and Capt. H. L. Ransom and his rangers had gone to Las Norias to overtake them.

While the rangers and others went into the brush to find the bandits, the 8 cavalrymen were left at the station. Two civilians, Frank Martin and an old ranger, and a Mr. Forbes lived there. The Mexicans attacked the ranch apparently not knowing of the presence of the troops. Martin and Forbes were badly wounded. During the battle Gordon Hill, Sam Robertson, and three other civilians arrived on a gasoline truck from Harlingen, just in time to assist in the battle.

August 9, 1915, after dark, at Mercedes Pump, Mexicans fired on a United States Cavalry patrol. One Mexican was killed.

August 10, 1915, Mexicans fired on Cavalry patrol at Palm Garden, just west from Mercedes, killing Pvt. L. C. Waterfield.

On August 15, 1915, a Cavalry patrol was fired on by Mexicans near Progreso, about 1 mile north of the Rio Grande. No one hurt.

On August 17, 1915, the patrol at Progreso having received information that some bandits were in the vicinity, made its way to the river. While on its banks Mexicans fired on the Americans and Corpl. Wellman, Troop C, Twelfth Cavalry, was killed. Lieut. Roy C. Henry and Pvt. Jackson were wounded.

On August 20, 1915, it was reported that a party of nine deserters from the Carranza army in Mexico had crossed to the Texas side above Hidalgo. The sheriff and deputies of Hidalgo County gave chase and reported that they had killed nine of them, and that the remaining four recrossed into Mexico at Madera (about 62 miles west from Brownsville).

On August 25, 1915, late in the afternoon, at Progreso, Tex., Mexicans on the Mexican side fired on the patrol of Americans on the Texas side. Two American horses were killed. The Mexicans had dug trenches at nighttime and fired from these. Five Mexicans were wounded.

On August 26, 1915, it was reported that 20 heavily armed Mexicans had crossed into Texas a short distance west of Progreso. Immediately a chase began, but the Mexicans succeeded in recrossing without encounter.

On August 30, 1915, a bridge on the St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Railway just 12 miles north from Brownsville was set on fire and destroyed.

On September 1, 1915, a band of about 30 armed Mexicans appeared at the second lift pumping plant of the Fresnos Canal Co., about 14 miles north from Brownsville and 6 miles east from San Benito. They set fire to the buildings and destroyed them. They then took as prisoners Mr. Dodd, Mr. Smith, and two Mexicans.

They started toward the little village called Fresnos, where a few American farmers had settled. En route they met Mr. Donaldson. They took these men to a resaca (old river bed) at the end of one of the lateral canals and there executed Smith and Donaldson by shooting them through the head and body. Mr. Dodd was also taken out to be shot, but through the earnest pleadings of the two Mexican prisoners and the fact that at one time in the past he had favored a wounded Villista soldier who had been wounded in the Battle of Matamoros in March preceding, he was spared. When the wounded Villistas were being brought from Las Ruclias to Brownsville, Dodd noticed this man walking and transported him to Brownsville in his automobile. The Mexican remembered it.

Immediately deputy sheriffs, civilians, from San Benito and Brownsville, and several detachments of United States Cavalry were rushed to the scene. Just east of Los Fresnos they came across the camp of the Mexicans and in a skirmish which took place in the heavy chaparral killed one Mexican, the others escaping.

On September 3, 1915, at Cavazos Crossing, just south of Mission, a party of Mexicans crossed into Texas, looting the village of Ojo de Agua. Capt. Frank R. McCoy with detachments of Troops H and G, Third United States Cavalry, then stationed at Mission, and Sheriff A. Y. Baker and deputies struck the trail and followed the Mexicans to the crossing. On September 4, the Mexicans fired from the Mexican side of the Rio Grande onto the Americans on the Texas side. In the battle which ensued, 1 American soldier was wounded and 11 Mexicans killed and 40 wounded.

On September 10, 1915, bandits attacked some Americans near Lyford, but were repulsed, the bandits leaving two dead on the field.

On September 13, 1915, just before daylight, Mexicans surrounded the Galveston Ranch, about 24 miles west from Brownsville. They fired on the nine sleeping soldiers, killing Pvt. Anthony Kraft, of the Third United States Cavalry, and wounding two others. The Americans, unable to locate their assailants on account of the dark, nevertheless drove them off.

During that day the soldiers arrested five Mexicans living at the ranch. They were taken to San Benito, turned over to the deputy sheriff, and placed in jail. That night at about 9.30 the deputy sheriffs took three of them out of jail and started on the Harlingen Road. Next morning these three Mexicans were found dead, having been executed.

On September 17, 1915, while reconnoitering the river bank within the Brownsville city limits, western extreme, with his troop of the Third United States Cavalry, Lieut. E. L. N. Glass was fired upon by Carranzistas from the Mexican side of the river. No casualties.

On September 17, 1915, near Donna, at the "Red House" crossing of the Rio Grande, a patrol of United States soldiers was fired upon by Mexicans. Sergt. Llewellyn maintained his ground until Lieut. Milton G. Holliday arrived with reinforcements. Quite a battle ensued, 17 Mexicans being killed or wounded.

On September 23, 1915, 12 mounted and armed Mexicans visited the La Talpa Ranch, about 20 miles north of Mission, Hidalgo County, at about 8 a. m., and stole ranch property, horses, mules, rifles, and ammunition.

On September 24, 1915, the same band referred to above attempted to raid the ranch of J. B. McAllen, San Juanito, Hidalgo County, Tex. Mr. McAllen happened to be the only man in the house. With his Mexican woman cook to assist in loading the guns, he fired on the 12 men, killing 2 and wounding 3. Of the three wounded, two afterwards died. The fight lasted more than an hour. McAllen's house was riddled with bullet holes.

On September 24, 1915, Lieut. W. King, of the Twenty-sixth Infantry, returning to the Saenz store at Progreso, Hidalgo County, at about 7.30 a. m., was shocked to find Pvt. Henry Stubblefield dead and Pvt. Kennedy wounded. The alarm was given and Pvt. Kennedy of the company of soldiers rushed to Mercedes Canal head gates for reinforcements. Lieut. King with his nine men opened fire on a party of Mexicans who were discovered on the American side, estimated to be about 75 men. Four American cavalry horses were killed while en route for reinforcements. At about 8 o'clock a. m., Capt. Anderson and Troop B, Eighth United States Cavalry, appeared at Progreso. In the battle, which lasted from 8 to 10 a. m., Capt. Anderson was wounded. After the battle it was found that of the 10 men on guard at Progreso crossing, Pvt. Richard J. Johnson was missing. Johnson, with his horse and equipment, was taken prisoner by the Mexicans, carried across the river, his ears first cut off, then he was decapitated, his head being displayed on a pike. Pvt. Stubblefield and Pvt. Kennedy had arrived at the Saenz store simultaneously, and after Stubblefield was shot down, Kennedy shielding himself behind a little monument in front of the little church, alone and unaided fought desperately against the bandits until the first reinforcements arrived. His assailants numbered more than 50 men. It was afterwards learned that Stubblefield unsuspectingly ran into the Mexicans as they were setting fire to the Saenz house, intending to destroy it. As he entered the door he was riddled with bullets and found dead.

On September 23, 1915, an outpost of Troop M, Sixth United States Cavalry, was fired upon near the La Feria pumping plant, 28 miles west of Brownsville. No casualties.

On September 28, 1915, a lady living near Harlingen was attacked by two Mexicans and wounded in her forearm.

On October 9, 1915, Mexicans fired from the Mexican side on United States troops of Sixth Cavalry at the Mercedes pumping plant, 40 miles west from Brownsville. No casualties.

On October 18, 1915, the southbound St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Railway passenger train was derailed 6 miles north of Brownsville. The Mexican bandits, some 60 in number, had drawn all the spikes and fish plates connecting two parallel rails. With a wire attached to the rail on the west side, just as the train dashed by at a speed of about 30 miles an hour, they pulled the rail from under the moving engine. The engine was ditched, lying at right angles from the main line. The baggage and mail cars were turned on their sides. In the smoker were seated four soldiers without arms, boys on a trip of recreation; Dr. E. S. McCain, State health officer stationed at Brownsville; Harry Wallis, formerly a ranger; John Klieber, district attorney of the State court for the district, and several others. As soon as the train had come to a complete stop four unmasked Mexicans entered and began shooting at the citizens, and then, seeing the soldiers, turned their fire on them. Corpl. ——— McBee, Pvt. Claud J. Brashear, and Corpl. C. H. Laymond, the three of the Third United States Cavalry, were fired upon. McBee, just as he was rising from the floor, being shot and instantly killed. Brashear was approached by the leader and after several words was shot in the face just to the right of the nose, the ball coming out in the neck. He survived. Laymond was shot in the leg and neck. He survived. Dr. McCain and Wallis sought refuge in the toilet. The bandits fired through the toilet door, one of the shots striking McCain in the abdomen. He died next day. Wallis was shot in the arm and hand, but has recovered.

The engineer, H. H. Kendall, was pinned beneath his cab and killed, his hand on the throttle. A great many shots were fired from the brush into the train, but other than as stated none took effect. R. Woodall, fireman, was painfully burned by escaping steam.

By 10 o'clock next morning seven suspects had been captured, and later, that same day, the rangers executed four of these for alleged complicity in the wreck.

On October 24, 1915, the Sunday following the wreck, a band of Mexicans attacked the soldier camp at the oil well, about 300 yards from the scene of the wreck. They approached just about dusk and fired into the camp. One soldier, Herman C. Moore, Fourth United States Cavalry, was shot and died from his wounds several days later.

On October 21, 1915, a party of Mexicans attacked the soldiers at Ojo de Agua ranch, about 1 mile north of the Rio Grande, and about 1 mile south of what is known as Chihuahua, branch line of the St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Railway, 74 miles west from Brownsville. At the time of the attack there were eight or nine men of the Signal Corps and seven or eight of Troop G, Third United States Cavalry, at the ranch. Without the slightest intimation that anything might happen, the soldiers had retired and were sound asleep. Suddenly, at about 1 o'clock, a terrific volley was fired upon the sleeping men and into the little wooden shack occupied by them. The soldiers soon rallied, and, although the Signal Corps possessed only pistols, a stubborn resistance was made. The shooting was heard in the vicinity and reported to Capt. Frank R. McCoy, who ordered all troops in the vicinity to the scene. The wireless plant being out of commission at the hour designated for reports, 1.30 a. m., Capt. Frank R. McCoy and Capt. W. J. Scott, with a company of Third United States Cavalry, started from Mission, about 8 miles distant, and arrived on the scene just as it was about over.

Capt. Scott was in bivouac at Penitas, 2 miles west of Ojo de Agua, and with a small detachment of 12 recruits hastened to the sound of the firing and attacked from the west and was largely responsible for driving the raiders off.

In this battle the Americans lost: Killed—Sergt. Shaffer, Troop G, Third United States Cavalry; First-class Pvt. Joyce, Company G, United States Signal Corps; and First-class Pvt. McConnell, Company D, United States Signal Corps. Wounded—Pvts. Fred Behr, Paul Langland, Ben Hallenbeck, of the Third United States Cavalry, Troop G; and First-class Sergt. H. R. Smith, Corpl. Lewis Candalla, and Pvt. L. T. Stewart, United States Signal Corps. Two others were slightly wounded.

The Mexicans lost five men killed and found within 50 feet of the ranch house, and nine wounded, two of whom died afterwards.

On November 1, 1915, a patrol of Company L, Twenty-eighth United States Infantry, was fired upon at the crossing known as McConnells, 68 miles west from Brownsville. One Mexican was killed.

On November 4, 1915, a patrol of Capt. Hanson's company, Sixth United States Cavalry, was fired upon from across Rio Grande at Mercedes Canal head gates. No casualties.

On November 12, 1915, a Mexican scout in United States service at Pedernal Ranch, fired upon five Mexicans. No casualties.

On January 26, 1916, Pvts. W. P. Wheeler and Biggo Pederson, Battery D, Fourth United States Field Artillery, while in swimming in the Rio Grande just south of Progreso, swam to the Mexican side. There they were taken prisoners by the Mexicans and carried back from the river. As soon as it was reported to the officers in charge of the commands, believing that it was the intention of the Mexicans to abuse the two soldiers, Lieut. John E. Mort, Second Lieut. Bernard R. Peyton, and Lieut. Albert W. Waldron, all of Battery D, Fourth United States Field Artillery, with about 20 men, started across by fording and swimming. All but Sergt. Owen L. Clements, Corpl. Michael F. Ring, Pvt. Perry M. Rhode, and Pvt. Chas. D. Wilton Best landed safely, but those named were drowned, their bodies being recovered about three days later.

This detachment was unable to find the two soldiers, though they searched many houses. Being informed that Carranza soldiers had taken them and would not maltreat them, the expedition return to the Texas side. On January 27, 1916, the Carranzista commander at Matamoras turned the two men over to United States Consul Johnson and they were soon back on Texas soil. A court-martial was convened to try the offending officers, who received some minor reprimand, and were detailed for more onerous duties elsewhere.

February 16, 1916, patrol of Company L, Twenty-eighth United States Infantry, at Penitas, 75 miles west from Brownsville and not far from Ojo de Agua, was fired on. No casualties.

June 15, 1916, patrol, Troop M, Third United States Cavalry, was fired upon between Roma and Arroyo del Tigre (about 125 miles west from Brownsville). No casualties.

From the date of the killing of Donaldson and Smith, in September, thousands of Mexicans and Mexican-Texans crossed from the Texas side to Mexico seeking safety and refuge. Many of these joined the raiders and bandits, and organization along the Mexican river front was constant and open. Until, finally, about the 20th day of October, the bandits had organized a substantial army of from 250 to 400 men and, with impunity, they paraded the river front between Reynosa and Matamoras, the commander of the Mexican Army feeling unable to cooperate with the Americans in suppressing the lawless bands or feeling helpless to deal with the Mexicans, or being indifferent.

In October Gen. Alfredo Ricaut assumed command at Matamoras and promised that there should be no further invasions of American territory from the Mexican side on the lower border. During his stay at Matamoras, from that date until June 14, 1916, there was a total cessation of hostilities on the part of the raiders, though several anticipated expeditions were nipped in the bud by Ricaut.

On June 14, 1916, a band of about 24 Mexican crossed into Texas 9 miles west from Brownsville at the place called Rancito, a ranch on the opposite side just opposite to Rancho Tahuachal on the Mexican side. They were discovered about 9 miles northeast of San Benito by Capt. Watson and a detachment of the United States Army, who fired into them. One Mexican was afterwards found dead. Immediately upon receiving information at Fort Brown Gen. James Parker, who on May 18, 1916, had taken command of the district of Brownsville, ordered Lieut. A. D. Newman, with 50 soldiers, or Troop II, Third

United States Cavalry, to go after the marauders. At 12 o'clock midnight on the 16th Newman and troop left Brownsville; at 4 o'clock on the morning of the 17th, coming onto tracks of the bandits and following them to the Rio Grande; at 9 a. m. the Americans crossed the river by swimming their horses. They followed tracks of the Mexicans, and at Pedernal Ranch, about a mile from the river, near the crossing, had a skirmish with some of them, killing two of the Mexicans. No casualties among the Americans.

On the 17th, at 1.30 p. m., Maj. Edward A. Anderson, with Troops E, Capt. John Read, jr., and Lieut. George H. Peabody; F, Lieut. E. C. McGuire; G, Capt. William S. Wells, and with Machine Gun Troop of the Third Cavalry, Capt. Oscar Foley, left Fort Brown, accompanied by 20 men of the Fourth United States Infantry; Lieut. Floyd R. Waltz, with two small boats loaded on motor trucks; and Lieut. J. H. Muncaster, with a complete wireless outfit. At about 6 p. m. the cavalry and machine gun troops crossed over at the Tahuachal Ranch crossing (longitude 97° 38', latitude 26°) and marched eastward toward Matamoros, encamping for the night at Ranch Pascualo, 3 miles east of the crossing and 7 miles west from Matamoros. Next morning, Sunday the 18th, orders from Washington recalled the American troops from Mexico.

After the machine gun troop and all but Capt. Read's troop of cavalry had crossed back to the American side, Carranzistas fired on the rear guard of the Americans. Upon orders from Col. Bullard, then at the scene, but on the American side in command of his regiment of the Twenty-sixth Infantry, the cavalry chased the Carranzistas eastward until the dust thrown up by their horses' hoofs shielded them so that it was impossible to locate them. In this encounter two Carranzistas were killed, one a subaltern officer. No casualties suffered by the Americans.

On the morning of the 18th, Col. Bullard, then at Harlingen, dispatched a battalion of the Twenty-sixth to Fort Brown and with the other battalions proceeded to protect Maj. Anderson's crossing. One boatload of his anxious Twenty-sixth Infantry had already reached the Mexican shore when the wireless conveyed the orders of withdrawal.

During the 24 hours' occupancy of Mexican territory by the Americans the city of Matamoros was thrown into a tumult of fear. Gen. Ricaut evacuated with his entire garrison and ordered every woman and child out of the city. By 1 o'clock, Tuesday, excepting a few pickets and a number of citizens who preferred to risk an American bombardment to the loss of their small savings at the hands of thieves and looters, the city of Matamoros for the first time in its history was almost completely deserted. Gen. Parker assured Gen. Ricaut that the Americans would under no circumstances bombard the city as long as women and children might remain in it, and that in any event due notice would be given in time to allow an evacuation. But he also insisted that these invasions must be stopped or there would be a likelihood of American invasion of Mexico; that the Americans were getting a little petulant over these persistent annoyances. Gen. Ricaut assured Gen. Parker that not a man should pass to the American side excepting at regular crossings, and that he would execute any caught in the acts of banditti. Since then peace has reigned supreme in the lower Rio Grande Valley.

The author believes that to the prompt act of Gen. Parker in showing the Mexican authorities that he was here to act, and the elimination of note-writing protests may be attributed the complete change in feelings of the Mexicans along the lower border; he believes that if such a crossing had been undertaken at the outset of the troubles when Blanco assassinated Alaula at Rio Bravo, the American people, American property, and the American flag would always have been respected.

On June 15, 1916, about one hundred Mexicans crossed from Mexico into Texas at San Ignacio, 40 miles south of Laredo, Tex., and about 180 miles west of Brownsville at 2 o'clock a. m., and fired upon two troops of the Fourteenth United States Cavalry as they lay asleep. The Americans lost three killed: Pvts. Chas. Flowers, Edward Katonsh and James Minaden. Wounded: Pvts. Thomas H. Swing, James E. Rouch, Tony Havelya, Henry Matasoff, P. W. Minnette, and Corp. William Oberllen. Troop M was fired upon, and then Troop I, a short distance up the river, dashed to its rescue. Maj. Gray was in command. Cpt. Edgar A. Sirmeyer and Capt. Kyle Rucker, company commanders. Lieut. J. B. Coulter, Troop M. The bodies of 6 Mexicans were found. No account as to number of escaped wounded.

During the bandit troubles between August 4, 1915, and June 17, 1916, 100 Mexicans have been executed by the Texas Rangers and deputy sheriffs without process of law. Some place the figures at 300. Most of these executions, it has been asserted, were by reason of data furnished the Rangers, implicating the particular Mexicans in the raids which were occurring.

On Sunday, June 18, 1916, the Washington Administration issued a statement referring to the disturbed conditions along the Mexican border, adding that in order to insure complete protection for all Americans, substantially all the militia organizations throughout the United States had been called out and would be sent to the border whenever and wherever Gen. Frederick Funston might determine.

On June 21, 1916, the attack on the Tenth United States Cavalry at Carrizal, Chihuahua, Mexico, by Gen. Gomez, took place. Immediately matters assumed a serious aspect. Excitement reigned throughout the Republic of Mexico, where the more ignorant broke out in hostile demonstrations against the Americans, in some places going so far as to order them to leave the Republic entirely. Rumors of the killing of Americans residing in Mexico became common. Carranza demanded the immediate withdrawal of Pershing's troops from Mexican soil. The Washington Administration flatly refused to heed this demand.

On the Lower Valley border, Gen. Parker demanded of Gen. Ricout that he arrest and punish the bandits who had attempted to violate our laws on the 15th of June and whose names were furnished by the former. On the 22d, Gen. Ricout answered that he would endeavor at once to arrest them; that he would cooperate with them (the Americans) and that he would punish any who might be guilty.

On June 23, 1916, the first body of Militia troops began to arrive in the Valley when Battery A, Dallas Field Artillery, Capt. Frederick A. Logan, arrived at Hurlington and proceeded to Ringgold Barracks.

On June 24, Gen. Parker ordered traffic over the International bridge at Brownsville suspended.

On June 26, 1916, the Washington Administration demanded the delivery to the representatives of the United States Government, of the 17 troopers of the Tenth United States Cavalry who had been captured at Carrizal by the Carranzistas when they attacked the Americans.

On June 27, 1916, there were stationed along the Lower Rio Grande border under command of Gen. James Parker the following soldiers: Fourth United States Infantry, Col. E. E. Hatch; Twenty-sixth United States Infantry, Col. R. L. Bullard; Second Texas Infantry, Col. B. F. Delamater; Third Texas Infantry, Col. George P. Rains; Third United States Cavalry, Col. A. P. Blockson, commanding. Col. Blockson had been commanding officer of the lower valley from June, 1914; Battery A, Fourth United States Field Artillery; Battery A, Dallas Field Artillery.

Immediately State Militia from Virginia, Iowa, Illinois, South Dakota, Minnesota, Indiana, Nebraska, North Dakota, Louisiana, and Oklahoma began to pour into the valley. (See personnels under "Military movements in the valley.")

On July 12, 1916, the organization of the Thirty-sixth United States Infantry, which had been authorized during April, 1916, was begun at a point in Brownsville between West Brownsville and Brownsville proper contiguous to the main line of the St. L. B. & M. Ry. Officers: Col. Almon L. Parmenter, commanding; Lieut. Col. Paul A. Wolfe, Maj. H. B. Fiske, Maj. James V. Heidt, Maj. Edward A. Roche. Captains: Charles A. Thuis, Thomas C. Musgrave, Jesse Caston, David P. Wood, Roderick Dew, R. B. Hewitt, H. H. Bissell, M. E. Malloy, Fred H. Baird, W. C. Whitener, M. H. Shute, Fred A. Cook, G. H. Huddleston, E. L. Field. First Lieutenants: W. C. Langwill, G. C. Whiting, C. W. Elliott, C. M. Everitt, J. G. Thornell, A. W. Wilson, C. F. McKinney, E. G. Sherbourne, M. F. Davis, C. L. Richtel, N. R. Randolph, and Arthur L. White. First Lieutenants: W. J. McConnell and Harry Kalman Leow, surgeons, and later Lieut. R. R. D. McCullough was attached.

On July 13, 1916, Lieut. Col. Edward A. Anderson, recently promoted; Capt. Oscar Foley and Capt. John V. Spring, jr., recently promoted, left for San Antonio with 125 men to help form a new regiment, the Sixteenth United States Cavalry.

On July 31, 1916, the following troops were in the valley:

At Brownsville: Fourth United States Infantry; Third United States Cavalry; First Virginia Infantry; Second Virginia Infantry; First Iowa Infantry; Second Iowa Infantry; Third Iowa Infantry; First Illinois Cavalry; battalion Virginia Field Artillery; battalion Iowa Field Artillery; Thirty-sixth United States Infantry, organizing.

At Mercedes and Llano Grande: First Indiana Infantry; One hundred and sixty-second Indiana Infantry; One hundred and sixty-third Infantry (Indiana); Fourth Nebraska Infantry; Fifth Nebraska Infantry; First Minnesota Infantry; Third Minnesota Infantry; North Dakota Infantry; battalion Louisiana Field Artillery; battalion Indiana Field Artillery; Minnesota Field Artillery; squadron Iowa Cavalry; troop Louisiana Cavalry; two troops Oklahoma Cavalry.

At San Benito: South Dakota Infantry; Louisiana Infantry; Oklahoma Infantry.

At Harlingen: Second Texas Infantry; Third Texas Infantry.

Gen. Edward H. Plummer, formerly of Twenty-eighth United States Infantry, was designated on March 17 to command all forces at Llano Grande.

Gen. James Parker, in command of the Brownsville district, with Capt. Frank R. McCoy, chief of staff, Capt. Cortlandt Parker, aid-de-camp, Lieut. W. O. Crittenburg, aid-de-camp, Lieut. Paul Raborg, aid-de-camp, Capt. Alfred Aloe, depot quartermaster; Lieut. Col. Fred D. Evans, adjutant general; Capts. A. L. Conger and A. Moreno, assistants to adjutant; Lieut. Col. J. T. Kirkpatrick, district surgeon; Lieut. Col. Frank Reynolds, sanitary inspector; Maj. F. E. Hopkins, district signal officer; Lieut. Col. George Howells, district engineer; Capt. L. D. Gasser, depot quartermaster.

TESTIMONY OF S. S. DODDS.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

The CHAIRMAN. Give your full name, please?

Mr. DODDS. S. S. Dodds.

The CHAIRMAN. Citizen of the United States?

Mr. DODDS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Native born?

Mr. DODDS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what State?

Mr. DODDS. Vermont.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you been in Texas?

Mr. DODDS. About eight years.

The CHAIRMAN. Where have you lived in Texas?

Mr. DODDS. San Benito.

The CHAIRMAN. On the border or near the border?

Mr. DODDS. Near the border; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. During the last few years have you come in contact with any disturbances along the border?

Mr. DODDS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you mention any in particular which attracted your attention?

Mr. DODDS. Yes, sir; the one at what is known as Fresno's pump attracted my attention very much.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the date, do you remember?

Mr. DODDS. I do not remember; I think it was either the 1st or 2d day of September.

The CHAIRMAN. What year?

Mr. DODDS. Four years ago, last September, 1915, I guess.

The CHAIRMAN. What occurred, if anything, at that time, that impressed itself upon your memory—in the first place, what were you doing there?

Mr. DODDS. I had the contract for the construction of a pumping plant at a point about eight miles from the border, and just had the work well under way, and one morning about 9 o'clock we were held up by a band of armed men.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did they come from, if you know?

Mr. DODDS. Why, subsequently I found out they came from Matamoros.

The CHAIRMAN. Then they were Mexicans?

Mr. DODDS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mean they came from Matamoros, Mexico?

Mr. DODDS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What did they do—you say you were held up?

Mr. DODDS. Well, I was actively letting out some construction work, construction details, and the first I knew they threw a gun on me, threw a rifle on me, two men threw a rifle on me, and afterwards others congregated from the brush, and it was a very brushy country, just the raw chaparral country.

The CHAIRMAN. How many were there all together?

Mr. DODDS. About 25 armed men.

The CHAIRMAN. How many men, if any, were with you?

Mr. DODDS. Of my employees?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; or others around in that vicinity?

Mr. DODDS. There were none others except my employees right there, probably 10 or 12 men.

The CHAIRMAN. Among them were Americans?

Mr. DODDS. Yes, sir; one by the name of Smith.

The CHAIRMAN. A man by the name of Donaldson with you?

Mr. DODDS. No, sir; he came up later.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, just tell us what occurred there at that time, after these men threw their guns on you?

Mr. DODDS. Why, we were in a deep excavation and we came out and they took our valuables and lined us up—we thought to shoot us—and one of this bunch had worked for me at one time or other, and would not stand for them executing us at that time, and we waited around a little while, and they burned the house that I had there and destroyed more or less property and an automobile.

The CHAIRMAN. An automobile?

Mr. DODDS. Yes, sir; and we were down between two levees of a new irrigation canal, most of the gang, and Donaldson drove up on a farm wagon going to town for a load of lumber; he was a new-comer down in the country, possibly two or three weeks, and they surrounded him and cut his team loose and drove us down the canal right of way; we marched down the canal right of way for a couple of miles and milled around more or less to about noon—I think I was captured about 9 o'clock. I did not have a watch; I do not know exactly to the minute or hour, but about noon Smith and Donaldson were executed and—

The CHAIRMAN. By whom?

Mr. DODDS. By four of the gang—four of the bunch. From there we went into a little clearing, a little resaca, a clearing or depression in the ground, and a steer was tied there and a bunch of jerked beef, and an oat sack full of tortillas, and we had lunch, and I was treated very considerably, and we stayed around there two or three hours and started out in the general direction of the coast on the old Alice road, and at that point a posse of civilians and soldiers intercepted this gang as we were crossing the clearing, and during the fight that ensued I escaped.

The CHAIRMAN. Any casualties during the fight?

Mr. DODDS. I understand that one Mexican was killed during the fight. I was busy getting away.

The CHAIRMAN. What were the circumstances in the execution of Smith and Donaldson?

Mr. DODDS. There were no circumstances; they just were out of luck and had no friends. They happened to be Americans.

The CHAIRMAN. They just lined them up and shot them?

Mr. DODDS. They took them out in the brush, probably 30 feet from the edge of the clearing, and shot them.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know who any of these men were?

Mr. DODDS. Yes, sir; I know the man in command was Aniceto Pizana.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you understand that you learned later they were from Matamoros, Mexico; do you know whether any of them were Carrancista soldiers or officers?

Mr. DODDS. Why this man Pizana was dressed in a uniform that is sometimes worn by Mexican soldiers or officers, they were armed with Mauser rifles, about half of them, and the other half with the typical American sporting rifle, 30.30, or similar weapons.

The CHAIRMAN. You are familiar with the Mauser rifle, are you?

Mr. DODDS. Why, I know one when I see it; I never used one.

The CHAIRMAN. So you know the old Mauser rifle?

Mr. DODDS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You were not in any other difficulties down there, were you; or do you know the general conditions along the border?

Mr. DODDS. I know the general conditions. I was not mixed up in any bandit raids there after that chasing around trying to intercept them. It may be of interest to this committee to know that before these men were shot they were asked if they were Germans.

The CHAIRMAN. They were?

Mr. DODDS. No, sir; they were not. The Mexicans asked them if they were "Alemanes."

The CHAIRMAN. The Mexicans asked them if they were Germans?

Mr. DODDS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. By Pizana?

Mr. DODDS. No; by some of the men.

The CHAIRMAN. And their answer was what?

Mr. DODDS. No; they did not know at the time that it might have saved their lives.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they tell what nationality they were?

Mr. DODDS. No, sir; they did not make any answer; they just shook their heads.

The CHAIRMAN. And then they were shot?

Mr. DODDS. Yes, sir. There is no question but what these men came from Matamoros.

The CHAIRMAN. Mexico?

Mr. DODDS. Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know of any effort on the part of the Carranza Government on the other side to prevent these raids?

Mr. DODDS. No, sir; I do not suppose any effort was ever made during the time that Gen. Nafarrate was on the border; I do not think any effort was ever made to stop them; in fact, I think they were assisted from over there; the Mauser rifles were right new, they were carried more or less, and these dynamite pipe bombs, they were used along the border, bombs made of an inch and a half piece of pipe with a stick of dynamite inside.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe that is all, Mr. Dodds, unless you have something further.

TESTIMONY OF LON C. HILL.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

The CHAIRMAN. Give your full name to the reporters, please?

Mr. HILL. Lon C. Hill.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. HILL. I am.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what State are you a native?

Mr. HILL. I was born in Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. Lived in Texas practically all your life?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; practically so.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live?

Mr. HILL. Harlingen, in Cameron County.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you familiar with the conditions along the border between Mexico and Texas during the last few years, principally from 1913 to the present time?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you ever known of any raids from the other side—that is, from the Mexican border to the American side?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the first raid of which you have any knowledge?

Mr. HILL. Well, Senator, there were bunches of men came over there along—you might say along in April or May, along in that time, and stealing cattle and supplies and a lot of stuff, oh, there were numerous of them, but the first time that a good big crowd came over and done any real depredations was when they robbed Peterson's store out west of Lyford about 8 or 9 miles from where I live—west of Lyford or Sebastian, in that country there.

The CHAIRMAN. About what date?

Mr. HILL. Really, I do not know; really, I could not tell you the exact date, it was somewhere along in June, about that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Then after that?

Mr. HILL. Then after that at intervals they were coming all the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about a band of Mexicans being seen in the month of May, 1915, in the vicinity of Rancho de los Indios west of Sebastian, Cameron County, and north of Brownsville?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether any effort was made by the citizens or officers to overtake and interrogate or talk to these people?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; Mr. Vann, the sheriff, and he had quite a lot of deputies, and they heard of these bands—these bands being out there and doing a lot of stealing—and they went out there and went all over this country there and they tried to find them there for quite a bit.

The CHAIRMAN. And were not able to overtake them?

Mr. HILL. No; they found out afterwards why they could not overtake them.

The CHAIRMAN. Why?

Mr. HILL. Well, every Mexican in the country was in sympathy with them, for them; and Mexicans that we would get to guide, of course, they would just take you around somewhere else, and they never did catch anybody until we let the Mexicans alone, and then we got to catching them.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know anything of the death of Bernard Boley about July 17, 1915?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir. Bernard Boley was killed at Raymondville, east of Raymondville, there on what is known as San Francisco Ranch, owned by Gano.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there any investigation made as to the cause of his death?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; the officers and the people went out there and investigated it, and he was shot down there.

The CHAIRMAN. By whom?

Mr. HILL. He was killed by Mexicans.

The CHAIRMAN. From the other side of the river?

Mr. HILL. Well, all these bands—numbers of these bands.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about an occurrence at the store of Nels Peterson on or about July 12, 1915?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; that was the one I referred to a little while ago.

The CHAIRMAN. What occurred there?

Mr. HILL. Well, they just went up there to Peterson's store and robbed the post office and went in there and just got what they wanted and loaded up with sacks and took everything in the world they wanted and went on off.

The CHAIRMAN. Any investigation made to ascertain where these people were from?

Mr. HILL. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the result?

Mr. HILL. Well, they were just these bandits.

Senator SMITH. Where were they coming from?

Mr. HILL. From the other side, from the other side of the river; they claim that was their headquarters.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about the burning of a bridge on the railroad just south of Sebastian, in July, 1915?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Any investigation made as to who burned it, if anyone?

Mr. HILL. That bridge was burned in the morning, the train was right there, and that bridge was—the train went up, and I saw the train back back, and I went up there and we asked them what was the matter, and they said the bridge was on fire, and we went up there and it was, too. It was about 2 miles from where I live, and of course there was not anybody there, but you could see where there was a crowd down there, you could see the horse tracks. and see where they had come in and see the foot tracks, and see there were about, I suppose, 30 or 40 head of horse tracks.

The CHAIRMAN. Any attempt made to trail them to see where they went?

Mr. HILL. Oh, yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Which direction did they go?

Mr. HILL. Well they went to the east—went down toward the arroyo.

The CHAIRMAN. They were never overtaken?

Mr. HILL. No, no; they were never overtaken. They burned those bridges down there, Senator; out there three different times, right in that same neighborhood.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about a conflict—armed conflict between soldiers and citizens and bandits on or about August 2, 1915, near or at Rancho Tule?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is Rancho Tule?

Mr. HILL. Well, that is a ranch down north of Brownsville about 22 miles. That ranch is one of my ranches.

The CHAIRMAN. On the American side of the line?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, what occurred there on that ranch at that time, if anything?

Mr. HILL. Well, there was a Mexican living there by the name of Aniceto Pizana; he was living there on this ranch of mine about 12 or 15 years, and the officers and people had heard of these people coming in there and congregating in that country, and they had located a band the evening before—quite a band of them—right there close to his place, and they came in and reported that they were there at this ranch; so soon the next morning a detachment of soldiers under Lieut. Lutz, and I think Mike Monahan was in the crowd, and Joe Taylor, and Jess Scrivner, and several others of them; and they rode up to that ranch about a little before sun up and these bandits were there and some of them were across the resaca and some of them were in the house and some of them were in the stock pens—in the cow pens—and when they saw these soldiers and citizens and officers come up there they just opened fire on them and they killed McGuire, a young man who lived at San Benito, and shot one or two others.

The CHAIRMAN. Was Deputy Sheriff Monahan there, you say?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he receive any injuries in that fight?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; they shot Mike.

The CHAIRMAN. Was a man by the name of Longoria in the posse, Joe Longoria?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; Joe Longoria; he was a deputy sheriff.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he receive any injuries in that fight?

Mr. HILL. Really, Senator, I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. Pvt. McGuire that you referred to was a private in the Twelfth Cavalry, was he not?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; he had just joined the Army and he was killed.

The CHAIRMAN. What became of Pizana and his band?

Mr. HILL. Why, just as soon as they got those fellows back, they just backed off in the brush, and just went on—they just went on in the brush.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not know where they went to?

Mr. HILL. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about the robbery of Alexander's store on August 6, 1915?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That was at San Sebastian?

Mr. HILL. Yes; that was at Sebastian; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there any attempt made, or do you know whether they captured anybody of the band that robbed the store?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; there was a band of 25 or 30 went in there, and they first went into a beer saloon out there and robbed that and took what they wanted, and then they went into Alexander's store, and the post office across the track, and got what they wanted out of there, and then several went up to where Mr. Austin and his son and several other people were fixing up a corn sheller, and they took Mr. Austin and his son captives and went away with them.

The CHAIRMAN. What did they do with them, what became of this Mr. Austin and his son, if you know?

Mr. HILL. Well, they went out southeast of town there, of this store, about a mile and a half, where Mr. Austin's family lived, right on Mr. Austin's place where his wife and family and children were and there they executed Mr. Austin and his son.

The CHAIRMAN. Was a young man by the name of Millard, or some such name along with them?

Mr. HILL. Well, there was another man or two, I forgot that.

The CHAIRMAN. And the same band, you say, killed the two Austins?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Were they ever discovered—that is, do you know—do people know who this band were?

Mr. HILL. Oh, yes; there were several of them identified there, they soon found who the biggest number of them were; that is, those that lived on this side of the river.

The CHAIRMAN. Some of them were identified as living on this side of the river?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was Pizana along with them?

Mr. HILL. I really could not say, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about an attack on the night watchman at a gin at Lyford, Tex., on or about August 7, 1915, the day after this occurrence?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; that was after—I was right there near by when they shot at him that night.

The CHAIRMAN. Was the name of the night watchman Jensen—Charles Jensen?

Mr. HILL. I think that was the name.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he wounded?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; they shot this fellow.

The CHAIRMAN. On the same date; that is, about August 6, 1915, do you know anything about an attack on an automobile near Los Fresnos, 12 miles from Brownsville?

Mr. HILL. Yes; I think they attacked several automobiles out there; I think this was one that Conrad was in.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about an attack upon an automobile at that time that was occupied by Sonny Huff, or did you hear of that?

Mr. HILL. I heard of it, but I didn't know—

The CHAIRMAN. Didn't know about that?

Mr. HILL. No, sir; I was not out there in that part of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. You were not out there, Mr. Hill?

Mr. HILL. No; I was not out there.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about an attack on or about August 8 at Las Norias flag station, about 75 miles north of Brownsville?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What occurred there?

Mr. HILL. Well, there was a band of Mexicans, this same band, a lot of this band that had shot up Conrad, they had all collected down there on the Arroyo Paso Real, and they had heard of them being out in that country, and they went over there north, and went by the Nopal ranch and captured a Mexican or two there, and—

The CHAIRMAN. Who went?

Mr. HILL. This band of Mexicans who captured a Mexican or two there and carried them with them, and then they went on, still going north or northwest, and there was some people out there looking for them, and Sunday evening about three hours by sun there was five or six or seven or eight men in this ranch at Norias and they were attacked by about, I don't know, there were 60 or 70 or 80 bandits horseback.

The CHAIRMAN. What occurred; were any of the Americans killed that Sunday?

Mr. HILL. No; they were not.

The CHAIRMAN. Any of the other fellows get hurt?

Mr. HILL. Well, I got there just about dark, and Jim Forbes was shot and Frank Martin he was wounded, and they were the only two that were seriously wounded.

The CHAIRMAN. Were there any of the outlaws killed?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; there was a few of them killed. I saw all of them that were killed; only one of them that I recognized; only one of them that I knew that was killed.

The CHAIRMAN. The others were strangers?

Mr. HILL. They were strangers.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Hill, as a matter of fact you practically knew most of the Mexicans in that neighborhood that lived on this side?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; I have lived there and been working them by the thousands and thousands, and I think I knew every Mexican in Cameron County—that is, the lower part of it. I do not know, there was five or six or seven or eight killed there, and the one I recognized was Jesus Garcia; he lived at the Cortillo ranch, near San Benito.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about the firing on a patrol of soldiers at Palm Garden, west of Mercedes, on or about August 10, 1915?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was one of the soldiers killed there? Waterfield, do you remember?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; this one soldier killed there, and afterwards—a day or two after that—right in that same neighborhood they killed a young American there, one that went out to get a bucket of water out of the canal one morning, and they killed him. I have forgotten just what his name was.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything of the destruction of a bridge by fire—well, that is the same bridge, I presume, about 12 miles north of Brownsville? You said one had been destroyed about three times?

Mr. HILL. No; I said above Harlingen they burned about three bridges. This bridge you are talking about is north of Brownsville.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; they burned two bridges north of Brownsville, between Brownsville and San Benito.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about any occurrence at the second pump, the lift pump plant of the Fresnos Canal Co., about 12 miles north of Brownsville, on or about September 1, 1915?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. About how many bandits were in that bunch?

Mr. HILL. I thought there was about 35 or 40.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they destroy buildings there by fire?

Mr. HILL. Well, they burned up two bridges there and some works—some construction works.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know Mr. Dodds?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And Mr. Smith?

Mr. HILL. John Smith; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether they were taken prisoners by this band?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; they took Dodd and John Smith and a young man by the name of Donaldson.

The CHAIRMAN. And two Mexicans?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; they took some Mexicans with them.

The CHAIRMAN. The statement which the committee have says that they started toward the little village called Los Fresnos, where a few American farmers had settled, and en route they met Mr. Donaldson.

Mr. HILL. Well, they did; they took Donaldson and those fellows and went off down east of there and stopped and ate dinner, and they executed John Smith and Donaldson.

The CHAIRMAN. This is the same—you heard Mr. Dodds's testimony, didn't you?

Mr. HILL. No, sir; I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not?

Mr. HILL. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. At any rate, he testified to this occurrence. Do you know anything about an attack on Americans near Lyford on September 10, 1915, and the killing of two of the bandits?

Mr. HILL. I don't remember that particularly—

The CHAIRMAN. You do not remember the date?

Mr. HILL. I don't remember that particular case.

The CHAIRMAN. This is one of the cases that has been identified here, the statement as being correct, being identified by Capt. Kile. Do you remember about an attack upon the Galveston ranch on or about September 15?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; I remember that.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know where the Galveston ranch is—about 24 miles west of Brownsville, something like that?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir—yes, sir; within about a mile of my property there; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What occurred there?

Mr. HILL. Well, they had a troop of either Infantry or Cavalry, I believe—it wasn't a troop either, but a few of them—I forget what it was.

The CHAIRMAN. About nine?

Mr. HILL. I forget what they called it, but they had a few—8 or 10 or 12—soldiers there, and those Mexicans just came there and attacked them, shot a lot of them—I think maybe killed two of them if my recollection serves me right.

The CHAIRMAN. You heard of the killing of Private Anthony Kraft, of the Third Cavalry, at that time?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir—I didn't hear of it; I was there a little while after it happened.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about an attack upon a lady living near Harlingen about September 28, 1915?

Mr. HILL. Well, along about that time there were three or four Mexicans straggling through the country there a few miles east of Harlingen, that went there to her house, and they did something; I think stabbed her or cut her two or three times with a knife. I suppose that is the same occurrence you are talking about.

The CHAIRMAN. I presume so. I am endeavoring to follow along the statements that we already have, as having been checked up by the Intelligence Department here.

Mr. HILL. Oh, yes. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know about the derailing of the train north of Brownsville on or about October 18, 1915?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. About how many were there in the—was the train attacked?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir. They derailed that southbound passenger train at night and wrecked it, and the engine went off in the ditch, and then they shot into the train and went through the train and shot a lot of passengers.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know Dr. E. S. McCain?

Mr. HILL. The health officer? Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What happened to him at that time?

Mr. HILL. Well, they just shot him up two or three times, and he died the next day.

The CHAIRMAN. Killed him?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know Harris Wallis?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Former Ranger?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What, if anything, happened to him at that time?

Mr. HILL. Well, they shot Harris three or four times, all up and down the left side and in the arm.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know John Kleiber, the district attorney?

Mr. HILL. John Kleiber? John R. Kleiber?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he there about that time?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; he was there. They took John's shoes off of him, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they shoot him up?

Mr. HILL. No—no.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what happened to Corpl. McBee, who was on the train?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir. He was a soldier, went up to Corpus, I think, on a few days' trip, and on his return he was on the train, and they shot his brains out and killed him.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know of any other soldiers who were shot at that time—Brashear?

Mr. HILL. Well, I don't know them personally, I just knew—

The CHAIRMAN. You knew they were shot?

Mr. HILL. Oh, yes; yes, sir; I knew they were shot. And I knew the engineer who was killed there, too. He was a very warm personal friend of mine.

The CHAIRMAN. That was Kendall?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know about an attack on the soldiers' camp at the oil well, a few days after the wrecking of this train?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir. They had some soldiers there, guarding that bridge—they had burned it and rebuilt it, and they had some soldiers there, and they came up there and shot them up a lot.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they wound one of them so that he died?

Mr. HILL. I don't particularly recollect about that, but—

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, we have the evidence as to that killing. Do you know anything about a band of 24 Mexicans crossing into Texas on or about June 14, 1916, nine miles west of Brownsville at a place called Ranchito?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The statement which the committee have had testified to is to the effect that they were discovered northeast of San Benito by Capt. Watson, and a detachment from the United States Army fired into them, and that one Mexican was afterwards found dead; that Gen. Parker, who had then taken command of the district, ordered Lieut. Newman, with 50 soldiers, to go after the marauders; that Newman left Brownsville about 12 o'clock midnight on the 16th; do you know where he followed those raiders to?

Mr. HILL. Why, Senator, we knew that those people were going to come across the river, before this happened, and we were all sitting there waiting for them.

The CHAIRMAN. Coming across the international boundary?

Mr. HILL. Yes, we knew they were coming, and they were going—they were going to meet at this ranch, the Cortillo ranch, where this Mexican, Juan Garcia, was killed, that was killed at Norias.

There were several—three or four—men there at that ranch, including Col. Bullard, who was then in command of the Twenty-sixth; and this Lieut. Watson—he was instructed to go up to this ranch, but instead of his going to this ranch, he stopped up there at another place for some reason or other, where a man by the name of Scott Brown lived, and as he was going on down to this Cortillo ranch he ran into this bunch of Mexicans and had this fight, and they shot one of them as soon as they hit there, and they ran—they went down the resaca. We got after them, and they went down the resaca, and we followed them down to Los Fresnos. They scattered out there. We captured a great deal of their equipment, their horses, and the like of that.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you capture any arms?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; we captured quite a lot of arms and ammunition. And then, after they found them out there, then Col. Bullard notified Gen. Parker, and then they crossed that Ranchito. Some of them went back that way, and a lot of them went into Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the American soldiers, under Lieut. Newman, crossed over into Mexico after them?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; and a whole lot more of them went over. I went with them.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you find them?

Mr. HILL. Well, we found lots of Mexicans over there?

The CHAIRMAN. Did any skirmish at any time take place about the Pedernal ranch between these American soldiers and Mexicans?

Mr. HILL. Do you mean, across the river?

The CHAIRMAN. Across the river?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; they were shooting all day and all night long around in that country there.

The CHAIRMAN. Maj. Anderson, Capt. Read, Lieut. George H. Peabody, Lieut. McGuire, Capt. Wells?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Machine gun troop, Capt. Oscar Foley, all of them joined in them?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir. Maj. Anderson, he went across with the Cavalry.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. HILL. And so, that night. Col. Bullard loaded up and took a company of his regiment, machine-gun platoon, down there, and hospital corps, and signal corps, and got in there about 3 o'clock in the morning and began shooting in there—over there all night long—they stayed over there; the next morning—

The CHAIRMAN. That was Sunday?

Mr. HILL. I don't recollect what day it was, now, Senator, but I know the next morning they fixed up the machine gun there and Bullard was—they had put up the wireless—and Bullard was crossing his infantry. I think he notified Gen. Parker that he was there and that was what he was doing, and what Anderson was doing, and what Newman was doing, and all like that; then Parker—or not Parker—but Frank McCoy, wired him to withdraw out of Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, now, after they received their orders to withdraw, and when they were crossing and all, and Capt. Read's troops had reached the American side, were they fired on?

Mr. HILL. Oh, yes; yes—what they term, what they call in military affairs—he covered the retreat.

The CHAIRMAN. Did any of Capt. Read's men turn back and return the fire of the Carrancistas?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In this encounter, the statement which we have says that two Carrancistas were killed; one of them being a subaltern officer.

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; there were some of them killed.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what was the general condition about that time among the citizens on the border down there—did they feel safe under the protection of their flag?

Mr. HILL. No, sir; no. They were just in this fix, gentlemen: All the Americans down in that country, the biggest part of them, they were going this way [indicating].

The CHAIRMAN. Which way?

Mr. HILL. Up north, up the railroad, getting out of that country. And all the Mexicans were going that way [indicating toward Mexico], and the people, they came into town and lived—the people that lived out in the country.

The CHAIRMAN. They brought their women and children into town?

Mr. HILL. They brought their women and children into town, and a great many just got on the train, left their chickens and hogs and cows, and everything else, and just went to Corpus and San Antonio, and went from there to Canada—just scattered all over the country; there were some places there just absolutely depopulated—wasn't anybody there.

The CHAIRMAN. And this was all on the American side?

Mr. HILL. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. In the State of Texas?

Mr. HILL. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have any losses there in property to any extent yourself?

Mr. HILL. Well, yes. I had a sugar mill there, I built a few years before that, and it was burned up; cost me about—my loss was about a half million dollars; no insurance. We were in a pretty bad fix down there, Senator; the life insurance companies wanted to cancel our life insurance and the fire insurance companies would cancel all they had.

The CHAIRMAN. What were the objects of those raids? Do you know?

Mr. HILL. Well, Senator, I will tell you, that is a question that bothered us down there for a good little while. What were they up to? Now, when the thing first started we couldn't understand—we couldn't understand why those fellows there would want to come over there and steal a few cows, and things like that, and run across the river; but when we found out that there was 25 or 30—and those Mexicans in that country were well to do Mexicans, and they were affiliated by marriage and by blood relation to some of the most prominent people in that country—they were what we called a lot of honorable, high-class Mexicans, that we all had confidence in and whom we believed to be good citizens. We got to investigating this proposition, and we found out that they had been sending off a lot of money through the post office and other ways—men like Pizana, and all those fellows—that Mexican Pizana, he was looked upon—I knew him intimately—I looked upon him as an honorable, and a high-class and as straight a Mexican citizen as there was in that country. He was a man that was unusually well fixed. Now, they would go and send money from Bay City, and they sent a world of money to Los Angeles, Calif., to—some of that money went to a firm known as the Magnon Bros.—

The CHAIRMAN. Magon Bros.

Mr. HILL. What?

The CHAIRMAN. Magon.

Mr. HILL. I think it was Magon or Magnon; something like that.

The CHAIRMAN. Ricardo Magon.

Mr. HILL. I think he is the fellow. Well, they sent worlds of money over there, and they had all kinds of literature from California on this I. W. W. stuff.

The CHAIRMAN. You are familiar with the Spanish language?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever see any copies of the paper known as or called Regeneracion Publica in circulation down there?

Mr. HILL. I can not identify, but we used to get that stuff by the sackful, you know. Well, now, they would send this money off, and then they would order guns and ammunition—now, I know three or four occasions that there were 351 automatic Winchesters and other ammunition—lots of it, you know—and it kind of got noised around, you know; they found out that they were trying to take that country, you know, and they said they were going to run all of the Gringos out of there, you know. Well, to my mind and to the other fellows', that was absolutely inconceivable, you know, how a bunch of Mexicans would take a fool idea in their heads that they were going to kill all those Americans and take all that country, you know; it was just laughable to us, you know, that they really meant it. But they were coming over there—they would tell us—well, they were coming over here in bunches and take your horses and burn up your houses and kill you and then, after a while, they were just going to come over in a great big army and take the whole country.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, come over from Mexico?

Mr. HILL. Well, they just talked about coming over; that is the way they talked. Well, of course, the inside dope, you know, we could never get it from the leaders, you know, because we could never get in touch with them—get our hands on them, you know; but we would get hold of some fellow, and they would tell us, and there was no two ways about it but what they had gone into the minutest details with all these folks in sympathy with them; what their object was and what they were going to do—because there were so many of them that would practically tell the same facts, and there is no doubt, either, but what the majority of Mexicans on this side of the river in Texas sympathize with them and rendered them every aid and comfort within their power; and you catch some of those fellows and ask them what in the name of goodness is the matter with you Mexicans; are you all going crazy here? Well, what are you up to; what are you going to do? "Well," they said, "we have organized, and we have got some foreigners going to help us, and we are going to take all the land back that you Gringos stole from us before the constitution of 1857."

The CHAIRMAN. What terms did they use to describe these foreigners?

Mr. HILL. Well, "enrejados"—something like that.

The CHAIRMAN. Extranjeros?

Mr. HILL. That is it; that is the name.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, now, you are familiar with the Mexicans as a race. Do the Mexicans with whom you are acquainted, by the term "extranjeros," do they mean Mexican citizens?

Mr. HILL. No; they don't.

The CHAIRMAN. Do they mean Americans?

Mr. HILL. No; they don't; them fellows didn't; they meant Alemans, to come out and tell you the right of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Aleman means a German?

Mr. HILL. Aleman means a German. They would tell you they had instruction not to kill any Germans and not to molest any Germans and they would tell us—there was a whole lot of Germans in that country and there were about—there was a whole raft of Germans came down there and lived down there, and on both sides of that river, too. Now, when a Mexican uses that term he didn't mean a local Mexican there, nor did he mean a gringo, nor did he mean a Mexican on the other side of the river.

The CHAIRMAN. No; the term "gringo" is applied to the Americans?

Mr. HILL. Absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. And they did not use the term "extranjeros" for Americans?

Mr. HILL. No; they did not mean it, nor didn't mean it for Mexicans on the other side of the river, but they mean "Alemans."

The CHAIRMAN. Germans.

Mr. HILL. Because they said they had instructions not to kill any Germans nor molest any Germans.

The CHAIRMAN. They call a German an Aleman?

Mr. HILL. An Aleman; yes, sir. They—well, some others would say that they were going to take the country between the Rio Grande and the Nueces, and they had it all framed up, had their state organizations, they would tell you who they were—the governors, lieutenant governors, and who were going to be the generals, judges, and all those things.

The CHAIRMAN. There was a little dispute about 1848 concerning the Nueces and the Rio Grande?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. About the boundary between this country and Mexico?

Mr. HILL. They would just sit right down and tell you about it, that it was stolen—that is the way they feel about it.

The CHAIRMAN. And they were going to take it back?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; and the Aleman was going to help them, furnish them ammunition, money, and everything.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Hill, I think that just for the present—the committee may desire to recall you, but just for the present we thank you very much.

Mr. HILL. Well, Senator, I would like to get out of here by 11 o'clock, if possible.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, we will let you know in plenty of time.

Mr. HILL. All right, I thank you very much.

TESTIMONY OF MIKE MONOHAN.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized.)

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Monohan, where do you live?

Mr. MONOHAN. Brownsville.

The CHAIRMAN. In this State?

Mr. MONOHAN. Brownsville, Tex.; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a native citizen of this country, the United States?

Mr. MONOHAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what State?

Mr. MONOHAN. Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you living around Brownsville in 1915?

Mr. MONOHAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What official position, if any, did you hold?

Mr. MONOHAN. I was first deputy sheriff of the county at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the condition with reference to lawlessness or violence in and around Brownsville and the district in which you were an officer in the year 1915?

Mr. MONOHAN. Well, it was very bad, we were having bandit raids, murders, and robberies, and so on.

The CHAIRMAN. You investigated these bandit raids officially, did you?

Mr. MONOHAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. From time to time?

Mr. MONOHAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were those bandit raids from—where did they originate.

Mr. MONOHAN. Why, from Mexico, the best that we could ever determine.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have, in the course of your official duties, any personal contact with any of these raiders?

Mr. MONOHAN. Yes, sir; I was in one battle with them.

The CHAIRMAN. Where was that?

Mr. MONOHAN. Los Tulitos ranch. Aniceto Pizana's home.

The CHAIRMAN. What occurred there at that time, Mr. Monohan; in your own words, just state.

Mr. MONOHAN. What occurred there? Why, we were in pursuit of a bunch of bandits that had crossed the river at Brownsville and were going in that direction.

The CHAIRMAN. Pardon me just a moment. When you say "crossed the river," you mean the Rio Grande, the national boundary?

Mr. MONOHAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They came from Mexico to this side?

Mr. MONOHAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, we all understand that, but are getting it for the record, for people who do not understand it.

Mr. MONOHAN. Yes, sir. If I remember right, it was Sunday morning—or Monday morning—we had this report about sunup, how they robbed some milkmen, etc., and we ran in pursuit of them, and we really ran right upon them, and there were only four of us in our party and we withdrew from that pursuit and went away to San Benito and got a detachment of soldiers, a lieutenant and 40 soldiers, and I was piloting these men across the country; I thought I would take them a short cut, and the next morning about sunup we got in the neighborhood of where they were; we rode up to the Tulitos ranch, saw three or four men jump up and run into the house with rifles in their hands, and so there was an opening, and we circled around the house, and it was kind of brushy, and we ran into a wire fence, but we surrounded the house and they opened fire on us from the house; they killed Private McGuire in the first volley of shots, one of the first shots, and a few minutes later I was wounded.

The CHAIRMAN. Seriously wounded?

Mr. MONOHAN. No, sir; I had a flesh wound through the thigh. In this band right there at that time there was only 12 or 15 men; we were chasing 40 or 50 men. We came to the ranch house the day before, as I say, where we ran into them, and they had just finished their meal, and had released these two milkmen—we met the milkmen just before we got to this little goat ranch, having breakfast, and rode off just ahead of them. We got ahead of them, and they fired into an automobile when we were within a few hundred yards of them; there was a civil engineer in the automobile, and Sonny Huff, B. L. Conrads; they wounded Sonny Huff in the car.

The CHAIRMAN. They were not waiting to be attacked then?

Mr. MONOHAN. No, sir; they attacked these people, believing it was our car; they knew we were chasing them in an automobile, and I suppose that was their intentions.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, did you ascertain the character of any of these men who had crossed from the other side—that is, as to whether they were Carrancista soldiers or just a band made up of bandits?

Mr. MONOHAN. Well, now, these men that I saw, I couldn't tell, of course, it was just daylight in the morning, the sun was just coming up and I couldn't tell just exactly who they were—the uniform is hard to tell, and everybody most wore khaki clothes in the brush out there, most of the bandits you ran across had on khaki clothes; I never was able to ascertain whether they were Mexican soldiers or not or anything of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN. What were the general conditions along the border about that time and later with reference to disturbances?

Mr. MONOHAN. Why, it was very bad indeed, the people felt unsafe in places except right in our best towns and biggest towns, all the little towns were being crowded by soldiers and by civilian posses that had been made up and guards that we had organized, and so on, all along the border there, all along the valley; people were moving, and dissatisfied and it was about as fierce as you could expect.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was in control on the Mexican side?

Mr. MONOHAN. Gen. Nafarrate.

The CHAIRMAN. Gen. Nafarrate, Carrancista general?

Mr. MONOHAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there any attempt of which you know of the Mexican authorities to prevent these raids from Mexico into the State of Texas?

Mr. MONOHAN. None whatever that I know of, and I had a great deal of dealings with Nafarrate at that time—tried to have, but I never could get any assistance from him at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have any reason to believe that the bandits themselves received assistance from the other side?

Mr. MONOHAN. Yes, sir; later on I knew they did; at that time I was ignorant of it, at the beginning of this bandit trouble I was assisting them, but it soon developed that it was known that he was assisting them.

The CHAIRMAN. Nafarrate himself?

Mr. MONOHAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You were not in any other armed encounters with these bandits?

Mr. MONOHAN. No, sir. I was right in behind lots of them but that is the only engagement I ever had.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did they make for, where did they generally go when you were in behind them, as you say?

Mr. MONOHAN. Well, most always to the river.

The CHAIRMAN. To the national boundary?

Mr. MONOHAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. To get across?

Mr. MONOHAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the American soldiers who were along the border attempting to assist in guarding American homes, did they cross the river after these bandits?

Mr. MONOHAN. No, not until 1916—I believe we had an expedition in 1915.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they have more than one expedition in 1915?

Mr. MONOHAN. In our locality I don't recall any if there was.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the expedition under Maj. Anderson?

Mr. MONOHAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And they were recalled by their superior officers?

Mr. MONOHAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Much obliged; that is all, unless you have something.

Mr. MONOHAN. I—Mr. Hill, you asked him about the Galveston ranch raid up there. I had written information from a Mexican who said that that raid was to be pulled off and Col. Blocksom gave me permission to conduct the guard on the river on Saturday after I told him what I had, he ordered a guard or detachment of soldiers from the Twelfth Cavalry from the head gates of San Benito to the ranch and also a detachment from the Sixth Cavalry from Harlingen to go across there, and I suggested to him that I knew the country well and would like to put that guard out there, I knew how to do it, and I told him if you will let me I may catch some one, otherwise you will just put a guard along there to prevent these men crossing and they wouldn't see them do it, and he agreed with the idea and gave me three soldiers to go with me for road protection.

The CHAIRMAN. Soldiers?

Mr. MONOHAN. Soldiers for road protection, however, no one traveled the roads at nights those days. And I got there ahead of the Twelfth Cavalry, I told them I would be there, and I had no idea that the Sixth was ahead of me. We went to the ranch house at Salacino Crossing, just where they would cross—that station was just above the ranch house; my information was that they would cross, but would not cross any men but guns and ammunition—they would cross guns and ammunition, but the men were on this side, and the Twelfth Cavalry detachment were dismounting, unsaddling, and getting ready—we were going to sneak across quietly and get on guard at this crossing; and the troop came down the road and en route to report to the guard, with Lieut.—some one in command of this Sixth Cavalry—had fired on a raft coming across the river, that was 2 o'clock Saturday morning, that was the very thing that we had gone up there to prevent, so he got everything balled up; and I went down to see this lieutenant, he told me it was dark, he had fired across the river, said he heard a raft coming across and hollered to them but they didn't stop, and he opened fire. Well, I thought I had done all I could do, that we had all done all we could and I went back. And Monday morning about 5 o'clock before day, they opened fire, on this detachment left at the ranch house and killed two or three outright—I don't know whether this Sergt. McGrath ever got well or not—that wasn't his name, I can't recall his name, but I know his name, too, but I can't recall it for sure. That was the information I got from a man I had working on the other side of the river. That is all I know.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

(Thereupon at 4.30 o'clock p. m., the committee recessed until Friday January 23, 1920, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.)

FRIDAY, JANUARY 23, 1920.

SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
UNITED STATES SENATE.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to the call of the chairman, at 10.30 o'clock a. m. in the pink room of the Gunter Hotel in San Antonio, Tex., Senator Albert B. Fall presiding.

Present: Senators Fall (chairman) and Smith; Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee.

TESTIMONY OF JOHN I. KLEIBER.

The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized.

The CHAIRMAN. Judge, you are a citizen of the United States?

Mr. KLEIBER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you reside?

Mr. KLEIBER. At Brownsville, Cameron County, Tex.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what State are you a native?

Mr. KLEIBER. I am a native of the city of Matamoros, Mexico. My paternal grandfather came to this country from Strassburg, Alsace, France, or Germany, many years ago. He became a citizen in Galveston during my father's early minority, and my mother was a native of the city of New Orleans, La. Thus, of course, the citizenship of my father and grandfather was acquired long prior to my birth.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. Judge, how long have you known Judge Valls, who testified yesterday?

Mr. KLEIBER. Judge Valls was also born on the Mexican side of the river a few months later, I think, than I. We were raised together in Brownsville, Tex., and he went to Spring Mills, while I went to Notre Dame for our literary course. He went to the University of Virginia a year before I did for our law course. I took my law course afterwards. A few years afterwards he moved to Laredo to begin his practice, but I have kept in touch with him since then always.

The CHAIRMAN. What official position, if any, do you hold now?

Mr. KLEIBER. I am district attorney of the twenty-eighth judicial district of Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you occupied that?

Mr. KLEIBER. Twenty-six years.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you known anything of disturbances along the border during the last 10 or 11 years—10 years—along the international line between Mexico and Texas—the United States?

Mr. KLEIBER. I have.

The CHAIRMAN. What have been the general conditions since 19—the latter part of 1910 and 1911?

Mr. KLEIBER. Prior to 1911 and prior to Mr. Diaz's fall I will say that the conditions had been—that is, after Mr. Diaz went in in 1876 or 1877 I was quite a large boy then, a pretty big boy—conditions had been very bad, but during Mr. Diaz's long administration for 35 or 36 years, he, so far as possible, cleaned up matters along that Mexican border. The enforcement of law and order was as successfully accomplished by him as could be, taking into consideration the character of the country at that time, sparsely settled, and the fact of its being an international boundary.

The CHAIRMAN. What were the conditions generally during that time on the American side of the border, as compared with the conditions since the Diaz régime or since the fall of Diaz?

Mr. KLEIBER. Well, very naturally there was, owing to the cooperation between the Mexican and American authorities during Diaz régime, we mutually profited by the joint enforcement of law and order. Since Mr. Diaz, or shortly after Mr. Diaz went out, matters began to grow steadily worse until they reached their climax in the raids, we call them, of the summer and fall of 1915, and continued until our Government sent those large numbers of troops—sent first the Regulars and then the National Guard of the several States. They have improved somewhat since then, but still there has been and is going on a good deal of stealing, matters have settled, the raids have ceased; in other words, no organized effort is being made now to destroy our Government or to put us out of business.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you a personal participant in any of the disturbances in 1915 or 1916 in any acts of violence—I do not mean yourself taking any part in the violence, but were you present on any occasion?

Mr. KLEIBER. On one occasion.

The CHAIRMAN. When was that?

Mr. KLEIBER. That was on the night of October 18, 1915.

The CHAIRMAN. Where?

Mr. KLEIBER. On a southbound passenger train of the St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Railway, about 4 or 5 miles north of Brownsville, just north of what is called the Tandy station or Tandy bridge.

The CHAIRMAN. What occurred at that time, just state?

Mr. KLEIBER. As I stated, I was a passenger on that train returning to Brownsville from Corpus Christi, Nueces County, where I had been attending court for a month or so.

The CHAIRMAN. Attending court in your official capacity?

Mr. KLEIBER. Yes, sir; in my official capacity, as district attorney, and we were, as I stated, within a very few miles of Brownsville, due about 11 o'clock, if I remember right, and we were a few minutes late. The train consisted—the train equipment, besides the engine and tender and express car, of two passenger coaches. The forward coach was divided into two compartments, the forward compartment being the negro compartment, and the rear compartment the smoker; and the second coach is what we called the day coach, or ladies coach, in which there was no partition, as there was in the first. I was seated in the smoker on the west side of the car which would be the right-hand side going south—the side of the train going south at the time. Just ahead of me were two drummers, Mr. Wright, and I forgot the other gentleman's name, occupied a double seat, they facing me. Across from them were seated three soldiers, or rather I should say two soldiers and an ex-soldier. The two soldiers were in uniform—do you wish these particulars?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; yes, sir.

Mr. KLEIBER. I do not want to bore the committee, I only want to give such testimony as is relevant. The two soldiers in uniform were Corpl. Laymon of the Sixth Cavalry and Corpl. McBee, likewise of the Sixth Cavalry, and with them seated, talking with them, was a man who I learned was one Sword—John W. Sword—he had either been discharged from the service in the same regiment or was on furlough, or sick, we was in "cits"—citizens clothes. Immediately back of them, across the aisle from me, was Pvt. Brashear, likewise of the Sixth Cavalry, in uniform. Back of them on a double seat was a Mexican family, an elderly man and wife and another woman, and a young boy perhaps some 16 or 18 years of age. Those people I know at the time were seated in those seats.

I knew they were on the train, but I do not know whether they were seated just there, but right back of them, almost across from the corner, was seated Mr. Harry Wallace—H. J. Wallace, an ex-ranger, a stockman—and Dr. Edgar S. McCain, the State quarantine officer stationed at Brownsville. I noticed that the train began to bump sort of, and slow up. Well, I felt it slacken speed and began to bump on the train quite violently, and listed—to use the nautical term—it listed to my side. That will explain something that I shall state later on in my testimony, in a way very relevant. At that moment the train stopped. Scattering shots and then irregular volleys broke out and increased in volume; and cries, shouts—"Viva Carranza," they cried. "Viva Luis de la Rosa." "Viva Aniceto Pizana." I remember that distinctly, and shortly afterwards I spoke of it to others who were on the train and they heard exactly the same cry. They were not cheers for anybody else, and they repeated again the "Viva Carranza" a number of times. It was a warm night and the windows were up, as well as the sashes, the curtains, and everyone went to the floor—went in between the seats. You could hear bullets whistling through the car. Excepting Dr. McCain, I think—as I afterwards learned Dr. McCain and Mr. Wallace, and, I think, the boy, I understood, took refuge in the toilet. I could hear them getting aboard the train and passing to and fro. I had only been lying there a very few minutes when I saw corporal—or not corporal, but Brashear, the man across from me—stick his head out into the aisle; and as he stuck his head out into the aisle I saw a look of intense terror come into his face—I was only a short distance from him. He threw his hands up and his eyes became set and he gasped. Just then I saw the mouth of a rifle go by, and I saw the flash, and I saw the blood spurt, and he fell. This listing, as I say, of this car, continued, and I laid there; and the firing continued.

Finally, by that time the blood from Brashear had come down in a pool and I was covered with blood. I had on a light suit like, a blue serge coat and a pair of summer trousers, linen trousers, and the next thing I knew a large man with a bandana handkerchief—this common Mexican bandana handkerchief, made into a mask. that is, in a rough way—there were holes in it for his eyes, covered the upper part of his face down to his mouth, came to where I was lying and stuck his gun a number of times into my arm; upper arm, punched me with the gun and said, "Give me money; give me money." He doubtless thought I was grievously wounded, else I am satisfied that he would have shot me. I reached and gave him my purse from my pocket, and he saw a fob and he said, "Give me watch," and I handed him my watch. By that time the leader, evidently—I could hear his voice; he was evidently standing at the rear door of the coach at the toilet where Dr. McCain was killed—and he kept calling to them, "Come on"—"Vengase," "Vengase," and he cursed them in Spanish, used a number of Spanish obscene terms, Mexican terms, rather, and this fellow by that time had observed my shoes. I had on a pair of tan shoes much the style of the service shoe worn by the military, practically a new pair. He said, "Give me shoes." I replied to him—whenever he spoke to me I would reply in Spanish. My experience in Mexico, although I had always been treated with utmost courtesy, when I went down there in the old days, was that whenever they found you spoke Spanish—it is but natural in any country—you are always accepted with a little more degree of frankness. I answered him in Spanish and I said, "Tome, tome," "Take it," and he laid his rifle to one side and started to unlace my shoes, when the leader became a little more urgent, and cursed him and said in Spanish, cursed him in Spanish, and I kicked off the shoe, I unlaced the other one and kicked it off and he picked up the shoes and picked up his rifle, and by that time I could hear the men retreating, hollering for one another to come on, that relief might arrive. They were very badly rattled, and they then left the train. I glanced over to this man Brashear; I thought he was dead up to that moment; he saw that I was alive and he began to move his finger, pointed to his mouth, and by that time you could hear moans.

Dr. McCain was in intense agony, and so was Wallace and the others, and the Mexican woman was excited. I pulled out my drinking cup. One of these men started back and I told him no, pull down the shades. We started down the car and the car was a perfect shambles, blood from one end to the other. I got down to the water cooler and as I did so I saw Dr. McCain right in the aisle on his back. He recognized me and called to me and said, "Mr. Kleiber, they have got me." I said, "Where?" He said, "They have got me in the abdomen," and he called for water, and I got him water, and Mr. Wallace also. By that time, two minutes, they had quieted down, and the conductor came back, and the brakeman had jumped off the train and was going north for relief; he was the one who went to Almita, or started to Almita, he got in touch with someone and sent word into town. Just ahead of Brashear in the car, as I stated, was Corpl. McBee. He was murdered. They shot him through the head. They took his shoes, and took the shoes of Brashear. In other words, they seemed to have a weakness for these military tan shoes, and those were the three whose shoes they took, the two soldiers and myself. Wallace was wounded, I discovered, in the shoulder, and also in the finger—one of the fingers was shot off. If you have him before you he can give you, first hand, just how Dr. McCain was killed. Of course, I know from what he stated to me at the time, and I can state it to you if you wish.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; just go ahead.

Mr. KLEIBER. Well, Wallace stated to me that he and Dr. McCain were seated, as I have just stated in the last seat across the aisle from the toilet, and when the train bumped and was about to stop, and the shots rang out, that Dr. McCain got out of the seat and looked around and they didn't see him, he had gone into the toilet. Wallace started to go into the toilet when the first man got in, got aboard and fired and wounded him—no, I do not think they wounded him, they fired and he went into the toilet and the young Mexican boy got into the toilet, as well, and closed the door, and Dr. McCain stood on the toilet seat. They came to the door and battered on. I heard that myself; I did not know where the battering was. Either the Mexican boy or Wallace opened the door partly opened it, and as they did so, they dragged the Mexican boy out, and the Mexican boy told them that he was a Mexican and that there were two gringos in there, and the minute he said there were two gringos—I will say gringos is a term for Americans that the Mexican uses in contempt just as many Americans do the greasers, I suppose you are familiar with it.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I understand it.

Mr. KLEIBER. It is a term of contempt. And they immediately fired into the toilet. As I understand it, Wallace was standing on the lavatory, and he was shot in the shoulder. The shot that struck Dr. McCain, who was standing on the toilet, went through the door. I examined that myself, and he evidently must have been standing, because it was quite high in the door. They killed McBee, as I told you. They wounded Brashear, as they thought mortally. They thought I was mortally wounded. They killed the engineer; that is, he was caught in the engine as it turned over in the ditch. Those are the facts immediately surrounding the transactions of which you have asked me. I will say this, also in regard to the robbery feature, if you wish. They took everything out of these two cars that was portable, in the way of baggage, luggage, etc., from every one on that train, except the Mexicans. I heard the Mexican woman and man pleading with them in our car, telling them that they were Mexicans, and their reply was, "Mexicanos no, Gringos no mas;" and as they came into the car I forgot to say that as they saw the soldiers in uniform it evidently enraged them because they began to cry, "Matenlos soldados, Americanos carbonos;" that is, "Kill the soldiers," using this obscene term. In the rear coach they robbed a gentleman from Chicago, a stranger, he gave me his name but it has passed out of my mind—of his watch and chain and jewelry, what jewelry he had on him, they took his ring and what jewelry he had on him and money, and were about to shoot him when Mr. Edelstein, a Jewish merchant from Brownsville said to them that this man was a German—he had already stated to them, by the way, that he was German, and they did not touch Edelstein, they didn't take anything from him. There was an American lady returning from San Antonio in an invalid condition at the time. They robbed her of a diamond ring or two and money and what jewelry she had. There was a Mexican lady whose husband is a merchant in Brownsville, Mexican people. I noticed when I went into the car afterwards that she had on considerable jewelry. They did not take a thing from her at all, and in fact stated to her that she need have no fear, they were only going to rob Americans, she told me that and expressed indignation, I will say that for the lady.

The CHAIRMAN. They did not harm Edelstein?

Mr. KLEIBER. In no manner whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, they did not harm this American from Chicago when Edelstein told them that he was a German?

Mr. KLEIBER. No, sir; they had already robbed him, though, before that—before they knew that and before they were told that.

The CHAIRMAN. They were going to kill him?

Mr. KLEIBER. Yes, sir; he so stated to me, as did Edelstein.

The CHAIRMAN. Edelstein then interfered and told them that this Chicago man was a German, and then they desisted?

Mr. KLEIBER. Yes, sir; let him off.

The CHAIRMAN. What effort, if any, if you know, was made to apprehend these bandits—murderers?

Mr. KLEIBER. The first line that we got as to the identity of the man, except for the fact that Wallace stated that Luis de la Rosa was on the train; he knew him very well; he spoke of him and he made that statement to me that night, and he has since testified to it as matter of record, too; aside from that, the first line that we got in the way of testimony was that Sheriff Vann and the officers got hold of a young man by the name of Cheno Flores, who is here; I saw him here this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he in that raid?

Mr. KLEIBER. So he said, and it was in evidence; he testified on the examining trial of one or two parties that the band that robbed that train and murdered those people was organized on the Mexican side of the river. He was working at a little place called Las Rucias, a short distance—3 or 4 miles—from the city of Matamoros. He claimed that these people had practically kidnapped him and had him under duress; that of the sixty odd men that attacked the train about 55 of them were organized in the city of Matamoros.

The CHAIRMAN. Mexico?

Mr. KLEIBER. Yes, sir. The commanding officer at that time was Gen. Emiliano Nafarrate, but, as he put it, about 20 or 30—about half and half—20 or 30 of them were infantry, dismounted, and the others mounted, all armed and equipped; that they crossed the Rio Grande on the morning of Monday, the 15th of October, 1919—

The CHAIRMAN. 1915?

Mr. KLEIBER. Did I say October 15—I meant October 18, 1915, that they reached the scene of the wreck about sundown; that they were there joined by about four or five men from this side, from the northern part of Cameron County; that they then made camp and then prepared to wreck the train; that they loosened one of the rails on the west side, took out the fishplates and spikes and tied a stout wire to the rail and fastened the other end of the wire around a crowbar, which they drove into the ground, for leverage, and as the train approached they pulled the lever and there was a wreck; that they disbanded immediately thereafter; and that all of these men from Matamoros, or from the other side rather, excepting himself, went back to Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there any effort of which you know to secure any assistance from the Mexican authorities in apprehending any of these men?

Mr. KLEIBER. You mean by way of extradition proceedings?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; or any other proceedings?

Mr. KLEIBER. I will say, by way of extradition proceedings, that so far as extradition is concerned, up to that time and since, with one exception, it is something that does not exist; it is a lost art—you might use the term a lost art; and I will say right here—I might as well as later on in this testimony—that up to the time of Mr. Diaz's fall my experience in the lower Rio Grande district had been exactly that of Valls; we often compared notes when we met, and we never had any trouble in securing a man where we tracked the treaty and furnished our proof. In fact, I had the most cordial support, and they particularly never raised, as they could have done, the question of citizenship. In other words, if we asked for a man and he was a Mexican citizen, it made no difference to them if we furnished them with the proper quantum of proof. After Mr. Diaz went out of office, why, I made one or two or more attempts, and I was treated just as Valls was, except they simply did not pay any attention to me at all. So that in this train matter, and in fact in regard to all of these raids in 1915, we didn't ask for any of these people, because there was nothing doing.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you say that these Mexicans were greeting, "Que viva Carranza! Que viva de la Rosa!"?

Mr. KLEIBER. Luis de la Rosa and Aniceto Pizana.

The CHAIRMAN. And Aniceto Pizana. Do you know where Aniceto Pizana is?

Mr. KLEIBER. You asked a minute ago if we made any effort to get any cooperation with the Mexican authorities. It was a matter of notoriety down there that Pizana and de la Rosa went right back to Matamoros; they were back and forth down there so far as that is concerned. In other words, they would come over and commit one of these depredations and go right back. The day after the train wreck these men were seen on the streets in Matamoros, and were there for quite a while. After that de la Rosa, I understand, drifted down to Monterrey, and afterwards got his commission as a general in the Carranza army. Pizana remained there and then went to Tampico. They made a bluff of Pizana and they claimed to have arrested him and then given him the freedom of the city. They mean where they give a fellow the freedom of the city he is simply under surveillance, under parole, they don't mean he is confined to the city alone. The last I heard of him he was at Tampico, I don't know his present whereabouts, although I understood that he had gone down to the southern part of the Republic—that I don't know.

The CHAIRMAN. Neither the States authorities nor the United States Government, had, so far as you know, been able to obtain extradition or been able to mete out punishment to either de la Rosa or Pizana?

Mr. KLEIBER. They have not been able to do it; no sir; they have never been able to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether either of these parties is under indictment for murder on this side of the river?

Mr. KLEIBER. These parties?

The CHAIRMAN. Either Pizana or de la Rosa?

Mr. KLEIBER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Both the—

Mr. KLEIBER. They are both under indictment for a number of these raids. The testimony that we had in the investigation of these several murders disclosed this fact: That wherever it was possible for them to operate in company with one another they did so, but where it was not—in other words, if two raids were planned for about the same time at points so far distant from one another as to prevent the presence of both of them together, one would take command of one raid and the other would take command of the other particular raid. We have parties under indictment for the Tulitos killing. That was the killing at the Pizana ranch. Pizana, I know, was under indictment for that, together with a couple of his cousins. De la Rosa I do not think was, because I think he was off at another place engaged in some other raid. They are also under indictment for the Norias raid up in Willacy County. You may have heard of that, the Norias raid.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KLEIBER. De la Rosa is under indictment for that, and the testimony of an aged Mexican, a very good man and reliable, an employee for many years of Mrs. H. N. King, who was captured by these men when they started out on this Norias raid the ranch showed unquestionably that this band were likewise organized in Mexico, well equipped, armed, and maintained a military discipline, for they had their check roll—their roll call at stated times during the day, and de la Rosa and Pizana were both there, and de la Rosa in command of these troops. There is an indictment for that. Also under indictment—de la Rosa, I am not sure that Pizana was; and de la Rosa is under indictment for the murders of the Austins at Sebastian, and the robbery of the Alexander post office, that was the post office of which Mr. Alexander was the postmaster. I referred to the Austins, father and son, at or near Sebastian.

The CHAIRMAN. Was this Gen. Flores there; was he present at the murder of the Austins?

Mr. KLEIBER. I do not know. I have no reason to believe he was. Now, in the Austin murder—it also developed in the Austin double murder and the robbery by firearms of Mr. Alexander, the postmaster—that this band was also organized in Mexico, and consisted of some 20-odd men. Only 2 men of that band were from this side of the river, and we captured them and we tried them and gave them the death penalty and they were hung. That was Jose Buenrostro, and his codefendant was Melquiades Diaz, I think; I am not quite positive now.

The CHAIRMAN. There were various raids—

Mr. KLEIBER. Pardon me. Another fact, if you wish, while we are on that.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. KLEIBER. This is relevant. Another circumstance, and a very potent one to my mind, and I think it will so prove to yours. I was informed by Maj. Gen. Blocksom—Augustus P. Blocksom, now retired—

The CHAIRMAN. United States Army?

Mr. KLEIBER. United States Army; then colonel commanding the Third Cavalry, Brownsville district, stationed at Fort Brown—the day after the wreck that the guard, the military guard that had been stationed for two months or more at that Tandy Bridge, just south of where we were wrecked, and which was set fire that night, by the way, before the train was wrecked, had been withdrawn on Saturday night. The testimony of Flores shows that their plans were laid in Matamoros on Sunday, or they were formed Sunday, and that they crossed Monday morning, thus showing that the people over there—Nafarrate and the people over there—were kept in touch by some "grapevine route" or other as to the physical conditions here, and once they saw this opportunity they took advantage of it. Up to that time the military had maintained a guard at every bridge, every station, and, in other words, every point of possible attack along the lines of the St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Railway for two months or more, and this guard had been withdrawn on Saturday night for the reason, as stated to me by Col. Blocksom, that it had been six weeks or more since we had had any trouble; the thing had sort of died down, and the Tandy Bridge being in such close proximity to the station of Brownsville, or Fort Brown, the headquarters of that entire military district, the military considered it was not necessary; that was the idea, and yet, notwithstanding that fact, no one knew this except the colonel and his adjutant—I suppose these people over the river knew it by daylight the next morning and took advantage of it. But it is a circumstance that goes to show that the heart and head and brains of the whole thing was right in Matamoros.

The CHAIRMAN. Mexico?

Mr. KLEIBER. Yes, sir; its headquarters, Gen. Nafarrate.

The CHAIRMAN. Judge, how many Americans more or less in that district have been assassinated or murdered from 1911 up to the date by men from Mexico?

Mr. KLEIBER. Murdered? Well, I will say that during all of the murders that I spoke of, during that period, rather, say during 1915, well, let me see, there was the Austins, two of them, and Mr. Smith, and Mr. Donaldson, and the Fresnos fight—I forgot to mention that Pizana, I know, was under indictment for that, he was in command of that fight, and the testimony unquestionably shows that, that people who knew him saw him. Corp. McQuire of the Army, he was killed at the Tulitos fight. At Las Norias they grievously wounded Frank Martin, left him for dead, he recovered and was murdered since then by two Mexicans—not from the other side, however. I judge down in that county there were a dozen or more, approximately.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the officers of the law and the soldiers on this side received some assistance?

Mr. KLEIBER. Oh, I have mentioned already Dr. McCain and the soldier, and Kendall, that would make it about a dozen, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The officers, the peace officers and the military forces on this side of the river received assistance from the residents on this side, did they, from the native residents, that is of Spanish descent, Mexicans?

Mr. KLEIBER. Will you permit me to make a little statement about that to show you, without being prolix?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; sir.

Mr. KLEIBER. As I have stated, I was born and raised in that country and my people were pioneers in that country. My paternal grandfather came there in 1848 and my father came there in his youth; my wife's father, came there after that time, and our people have lived there ever since. My parents lived there for many years, and died in that country. My father and my grandfather and all of his people did business with those Mexicans. I was raised amongst them, and have lived amongst them, and I can say without boasting that no one knows the Mexican any better than I do, and few know them as well. Without boasting, but an actual fact, and I also know them, I think, to a great extent better than they do themselves. The Mexican, the ordinary Mexican, if treated properly by those who know how to treat him, know how to handle him, is a law-respecting and a law-fearing man, and it is only when he is misled by those in whom he unfortunately has confidence and he should not have confidence, and also by his own patriotism. They are an intensely patriotic people, and if any of these Mexicans, I am speaking of the Mexicans that reside on this side, that were born and raised here, were misled in this thing or went astray, it was because they were deceived by people of their own kind that had what I call a superficial education, whose head was educated and not his heart. That is the trouble to-day in Mexico, that of the 15,000,000 people down there, 13,500,000 of them are absolutely illiterate, and the other 1,500,000 are what we call educated, or the ruling class in Mexico, they are educated in their brains and not in their heart. These poor people down there, these Mexicans, when these raids started, were, I am satisfied, as much astounded and were as much against it in heart as I, or any law-abiding citizen.

I will say this for them, that where they could aid us or were in a position to help us without putting themselves or their wife and little children in fear of life, that they did so. If the average Mexican—speaking of my district—if the average Mexican down in Cameron County or in Willacy County, in my district, failed to do what we considered he should have done affirmatively to aid the officers of the law throughout that awful period, I am satisfied it was for fear of his own life and those that he had around his little house. I have known of instances and instances, and I am satisfied that other officers will tell you the same thing, that Mexicans helped us perhaps not a great deal, but helped us all that they could help us, because it was in their heart. I think that answers your question.

The CHAIRMAN. Has there been any feeling displayed toward those Mexicans that did help you by others of their race from the other side of the river or this side?

Mr. KLEIBER. Why, any Mexican from this side of the river who was known to have helped us in any of these matters to enforce law and order, and is even suspected over the river that they had done so, why, they are proscribed, there is no question about that.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the result among the settlers and citizens of this country of which you have been speaking due to the raids, did the people become excited, did they leave their homes?

Mr. KLEIBER. Oh, yes, sir. That was due to a species of propaganda, if I can use the worn-out term. I say these people—Mexicans of the lower class especially—were very much frightened and wrought up, and I am satisfied, due not only to fear they may have had because of their nationality and race they might suffer at the hands of the Americans for what other fellow citizens of theirs had done, but I am satisfied that they were also told by means of this propaganda that such would be the case, and advised to get out, and there was an exodus—there is no other word for it. They left the State—they left Cameron County by the thousands. I saw them and everyone in Brownsville saw them, come through in their wagons with their little belongings. They sold what they had—that is, what they could not carry with them—for a mere nothing, to get out of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. Judge, I suppose that due to the conditions which you have been relating and the fact that many of the good Mexican people and citizens from this side were in fear of their lives from people of their own blood, and due to the murders and outrages committed by these bands to whom you have referred, naturally a feeling grew up between the American citizens as distinguished from the citizens on this side of native descent, which has manifested itself in occurrences of a violent nature probably since that time?

Mr. KLEIBER. Yes; since that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, one of the unfortunate—

Mr. KLEIBER. In other words—pardon me—you mentioned that as a result of these troubles there has been a certain amount of race feeling engendered?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. KLEIBER. Yes, sir; that is true to some extent.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, one of the unfortunate results of these violent occurrences—that is, murders and raids, etc.—from the other side of the river has been an estrangement between the two races on this side, and doubtless innocent people on this side have suffered because of the raids from the other side?

Mr. KLEIBER. That is correct, and if you will pardon me for injecting right there, that is one of the things that men like myself and Mr. Valls and others who were born and raised right there among these people have had to contend with, and our every effort has been and will continue to be as long as I live, whether I am an officer or not, no matter where I live, will be to bring back the not only harmonious but almost affectionate relations that existed between the two races in that lower country. For I have traveled that country for years, after I grew to manhood, up to the time that the road came in there 10 or 15 years ago, in my business as a lawyer, by every mode of conveyance known, traveled over that country when it was sparsely settled, and you would travel miles before you met anyone at all, and when you did strike a place it was some little Mexican jacal, no matter where you went, when you went, or how you went, armed or unarmed, whether you carried food with you or whether you did not, whether you had money with you or whether you had not, those people would take you in, sir, and share the last tortilla with you, or a cup of coffee if they had it, and if you offered them money they would almost with dignity but with the grace that is peculiar to that race decline it. I have traveled all over that country without even a copper.

The CHAIRMAN. And that spirit of comradeship, as you say, practically of affection, was not broken until these bandit raids from the other side—the responsibility for which has been traced to the Carranza government or at least some of the high officers of that Government—took place. I ask you, because the committee has information to the effect that either Mr. Carranza directly, or some Carranza propagandists have been engaged in an attempt to secure the names of Mexicans upon this side who have received injuries at the hands of the Americans upon this side to offset the claims made by citizens upon this side that the Carrancistas had murdered Americans?

Mr. KLEIBER. Preparing to bring his cross action?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; as we would explain it. So that if there have been hardships worked upon innocent Mexican people on this side of the river since 1915, in your judgment such occurrences have been due to the actions of the Carrancistas themselves in creating a breach of friendship and good will and understanding between the Mexicans and the Americans on this side of the river?

Mr. KLEIBER. Unquestionably so, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Judge, the committee thank you, sir.

Mr. KLEIBER. I want to say, sir, pardon me, about that matter of extradition. Will you pardon me coming back to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. KLEIBER. You asked me about it a while ago, I believe, and I did not like to break the line of testimony with regard to the wreck; but as Mr. Valls said yesterday, and as I started to state a moment ago, up to the time that Mr. Diaz went out of office we not only had no trouble in securing the extradition of fugitives from justice from this side, but we had the heartiest cooperation.

Senator SMITH. Regardless of nationality?

Mr. KLEIBER. Yes, sir. Pardon me, Senator, I made that statement a while ago. They never, Senator Smith, in any instance, provided we tracked the treaty or complied with the due form of law, ever refused to give us a man upon the grounds that he was a Mexican citizen, even though they could have done so—had demanded their "pound of flesh." Now, I had a case that peculiarly showed by contrast the difference between the—well, before I go on, since the fall of Diaz, as I stated to the committee briefly, a short while ago, I made several efforts, the first year or two after that, to secure the extradition of fugitives from justice, and my experiences were parallel to that of Johnny Valls. They not only refused, but they simply ignored us, paid no attention to it.

A glaring instance of that was in 1906. Judge Stanly Welsh, who was then judge of the twenty-eighth judicial district, was murdered in the room next to me in Rio Grande City, Tex., while we were attending court. We secured positive proof that the shot was fired by one Jose Sandoval, that he was accompanied to Judge Welsh's bedroom window by Alberto Cabrera, who had been ex-deputy sheriff there the year before that; he knew the judge well and knew where he slept; had been in the room many, many times. Cabrera's part in the commission of the murder was to take Sandoval to the window and point out the exact place, and he was armed at the time and walked to the door of my room and stood there evidently, and had I went there, come to that door, he would have shot me. We asked for his extradition. We located him, however, several months later in the City of Mexico. That was under Diaz. We asked for his extradition, and I went to the City of Mexico and spent several
