weeks there. Mr. D. E. Thompson, as you undoubtedly know, was ambassador there at the time and assisted me, as did Mr. Coledge, the secretary. We had every reason to believe the extradition would be granted. We knew that Cabrera had friends and that he would fight his case through the courts. I had consulted with the governor of the district, Dr. Guillermo Escandon. The president and Gen. Felix Diaz, the president's nephew, who was commander of the police force in Mexico City, the chief of police, had suggested that we had better see the attorney general, Mr. Miramon. I went to see Mr. Miramon, and he stated to me that in the event Cabrera fought his extradition that he would see to it through his office that the Government of Mexico, through the department of justice, would fight the case through and help us, and he did so. Cabrera took his case to "amparo," as they call it, a habeas corpus, to the supreme court of Mexico. I think Mr. de la Barra was chief justice then. They refused to grant it and ordered him turned over to the American authorities, which was done, and he received a fair trial. The judge changed his venue of his own motion from Starr County to the interior of the State in order that he might get a fair and impartial trial in a community where the events were not known, where there was no facts known against him. He was tried at Cuero, De Witt County. He was found guilty of murder in the first degree and given a life sentence in the penitentiary. He appealed his case to the court of criminal appeals, the supreme court in criminal matters.

The court of criminal appeals in a very elaborate opinion decided every point in the case in accordance with the State's contention. He was sent to the penitentiary. He had only been there a few months when we were satisfied he was bought out by these same influential friends, who bribed the guard and he escaped, and we learned shortly afterwards that he went to the city of Monterrey and was given a place on the police force—no; we did not hear from him for a long time, that is right; we did not hear of him for a long time. Finally, about the time that Madero went in, or shortly after, we located him. That was the first case after the fall of Diaz where I made an effort and was refused an extradition. I tracked the treaty on that case, as I did before; not only sent certified copies of the judgment and the sentences of the different courts and the bill of indictment properly certified to by the district judge and the clerk of the court, and if I mistake not I went further and sent either the record or a resumé of the record. They had it, however, in the City of Mexico and no attention was paid to it. We learned that he continued on the police force, and the next we heard he was in the Carranza army. The next we heard he was down at Tampico. I had this from a gentleman of standing in Brownsville, whose word is beyond reproach—that he saw him in Tampico with Nafarrate several years ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Nafarrate was the Carranza general?

Mr. KLEBER. Nafarrate is the same Emiliano Nafarrate that was commanding in Matamoros at the time of this train wreck and afterwards transferred to Tampico, where subsequently we heard that he was killed. Next he came to Matamoros, Cabrera did, and here in the past two weeks—I have it from a young man in Brownsville, likewise whose standing and word are beyond reproach and knew him well and had known him for many years—that he talked with him on the plaza in Matamoros, and that he was then a captain on the staff of Gen. Cesar Lopez de Lara, who is at present a candidate for the governorship of Tamaulipas. I quote this because it is a glaring instance by comparison of what the Diaz government did and what the Carranza government does not do—rather what the Diaz government did to enforce law and order and what the Carranza government does to encourage crime.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a very striking comparison.

Mr. KLEIBER. Yes, sir; a very good harbor and haven.

The CHAIRMAN. And promotion.

Mr. KLEIBER. And promotion; yes, sir; and continued recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. Judge, we are under obligations to you, sir, for your very clear and interesting statement.

TESTIMONY OF CAESAR KLEBERG.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a citizen of the United States, Mr. Kleberg?

Mr. KLEBERG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what State a native?

Mr. KLEBERG. Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live?

Mr. KLEBERG. I live at Kingsville; I spend most of my time at Norias.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your business?

Mr. KLEBERG. Stockman.

The CHAIRMAN. Where are you in business as a stockman?

Mr. KLEBERG. At Norias, Tex.; at one of Mrs. King's lower ranches.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is that ranch with reference to the international border between the United States and Mexico?

Mr. KLEBERG. I judge it is about 65 or 70 miles north.

The CHAIRMAN. Of the border?

Mr. KLEBERG. Yes, sir. The ranch, however, runs within about 32 or 33 miles of the border—the lower end of it.

The CHAIRMAN. You are in charge of the Norias ranch, you say?

Mr. KLEBERG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What were you doing in the early part of 1911, and during that year?

Mr. KLEBERG. Well, in 1911 I spent most of my time in the upper ranch, which was known as the Santa Gertrudes ranch. I was not down in the lower ranch much.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is that ranch with reference to the international border?

Mr. KLEBERG. I judge it is about 100 miles; I guess about 100 miles north.

The CHAIRMAN. How close does it extend to the border?

Mr. KLEBERG. Well, about that distance, I judge.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the condition in 1911, from early in the year, during the year—through 1911—where were you in 1915?

Mr. KLEBERG. Well, I was spending a good deal of my time, as I stated, at the lower ranch; I was in charge all the time.

The CHAIRMAN. On the Norias ranch?

Mr. KLEBERG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What were the conditions on the border on the American side in 1915 and 1916 with reference to law and order, or violent attacks and occurrences?

Mr. KLEBERG. Well, it was very unsettled—conditions grew worse from time to time, and we did not know what the trouble was; we never had any trouble there before to amount to anything, and it was about the time that Madero, I believe, was assassinated and Carranza and Villa were having their time that these conditions began; and we could not account for it. As Judge Kleiber told you here before, conditions were absolutely quiet; we had no trouble there outside of a few thefts, a little cattle stealing, and stealing cows; we never was bothered much about them getting together, Mexicans banding together there. They had been there all this time, and they never did anything until they began pulling off these raids. Neither could the Mexicans that were working there; they could not understand it any more than we could until we got into the thing a little bit further; until they began pulling off these raids.

The CHAIRMAN. You were interested in investigating not only these occurrences themselves, but the causes which led up to them?

Mr. KLEBERG. Absolutely; I could not see what they were up to.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you first begin to get an insight into causes of the raids?

Mr. KLEBERG. Well, the first real insight that I got into it—of course they had been pulling off these other raids at these different places, but of course I was more interested in the raid that had taken place at my headquarters. It was from the statement that one of my old Mexicans made when he was captured, when he went and told the story that they had a roll call, and whenever the secretary would wind up, why, he would say this was done at the instance of the Carranza government, and then we commenced to put things together, and I think in his statement there was another part of it in which he stated that a great many of these Mexicans were from the other side and some from this side.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the name of this old Mexican you speak of?

Mr. KLEBERG. Manuel Rincones.

The CHAIRMAN. Was his statement reduced to writing?

Mr. KLEBERG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. By whom, Mr. Kleberg?

Mr. KLEBERG. I believe the first statement he made was made to Capt. Anderson; I was not there at the time he made it, but you have a witness here who was in my employ at the time, Mr. Winn; I mean Deputy Sheriff Winn, from Brownsville; I think he was there at the time he made this statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have this statement or a copy of it in your possession?

Mr. KLEBERG. Yes, sir; they gave it to me the next day.

The CHAIRMAN. And it was from the statement of this man that you first got an inkling of the true conditions?

Mr. KLEBERG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you examine this paper and see whether you can identify it? [Handing paper to witness for examination.]

Senator SMITH. What became of him?

Mr. KLEBERG. I still have him there, and I would have brought him along but the old fellow is getting very old and feeble, and I want to keep him as long as I can. Yes, sir; this is it, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, will you please read this statement for the record?

(Thereupon the secretary read into the record the statement of Manuel Rincones, as identified by the witness, as follows:)

STATEMENT OF MANUEL RINCONES.

My name is Manuel Rincones. On the 7th instant while working on the King estate, eight or nine Mexicans approached me and asked me if I was in charge of Nopal. Upon replying in the affirmative they directed me to accompany them. They took me to a camp near by; there was 50 in the entire band, officers and soldiers. This was about 9 a. m. The following are the general movements of the band: At Nopal 9 a. m. to 2 p. m. Departed for Tenerias, which was reached about 5 p. m. Horses were collected at this point. About 7.30 p. m. proceeded in direction of Canecitos and traveled until midnight when we reached Camitas, near the San Francisco Ranch. Here we camped in the brush until daybreak of the 8th, when we changed camp about one-fourth mile and stayed until about 11 a. m. Leaving camp at Camitas, proceeded to Auritas and entered the Iturria pasture, where eight horses were secured. We proceeded thence to Norias. Here no reconnaissance was made, but an attack was ordered immediately. There was a fight lasting about two hours. The leaders were gallant, but the soldiers failed to respond and a withdrawal was ordered. The men scattered, but soon reassembled and the first sergeant called the roll. After assembling the band went into the brush and rested until daybreak of the 9th, thence the Divisadero Ranch, where a cowboy joined us. I am confident that the act was voluntary. Then to the Ranch Jesus Maria, which was reached at 11 a. m. Here one Teodoro de la Fuente guided us into a thicket of cactus and mesquite. He secured water and a cow. The brush was so dense it was necessary to roll the barrel of water in. Here we remained until 2 p. m. of the 10th instant, when we marched in the direction of the Rio Grande. I was liberated at midnight of the same date about three hours' walk on foot from San Jose Ranch. I do not know the locality. The band consisted of a chief, a major, a captain, and 25 soldiers from Mexico; the balance were picked up on this side of the Rio Grande. At Nopal the major took a paper from his pocket and directed the first sergeant to read it. It stated that the object of the expedition was to reclaim the land that had been taken by the United States from Mexico. It was ordered in the name of Carranza, and the officer stated it emanated from him. From conversation overheard I gathered that officers and soldiers from Mexico had been fighting during the revolution first on one side and then on the other. The chief was called Luis; the major, Miguel; the captain, Gabriel.

There was also a commander named Ricardo Gomez Pizana, from Rancho Viejo, which is south of the Arroyo Colorado, but near Paso Real. The attack on Norias was for the purpose of securing tools from the section house, with which to remove a rail and wreck a train. This was the scheme of Ricardo Gomez Pizana. In the fight at Norias five men were killed and two wounded. Of the killed one was badly wounded, and the captain, Miguel, finished him. Of the wounded one was Miguel, who was hit in the hands and ribs. The bullet which wounded him killed a soldier behind him. At the roll call after the fight at Norias there were missing in addition to the killed four men, who were carried thereafter as deserters. One other man later on dropped out as his horse went under, but beyond those mentioned the entire original band was intact when I left them. The object in heading for the Rio Grande was to secure reinforcements and a new supply of ammunition when the operations were to be continued. The man killed by the captain was named Ricardo, and he came from Sebastian. The officers were very gallant at Norias, but the men would not follow their leadership. As a result of conversation overheard one Ancieto Pizana was credited with having killed Pvt. McGuire, of Troop A. He was left south of the Arroyo Colorado, commissioned to gather more men; he lived on Tullitos Ranch, owned by his father. Evaristo Ramos, of Sebastian, is a member of the gang. When the others headed for Mexico I heard him say that he did not care to go. Other members Jose Benavides, from the Bonita Ranch, near Canitas has recently been married; Juan Romero, who has recently been employed at Los Lipanes; Darío Mercado, who worked as a laborer at the Pie Ranch near Sebastian; Antonio Rocha, an old employee of the King Ranch; Juan Romero, whose horse played out; Teodoro de la Fuente, who furnished supplies and tobacco at the Jesus Maria Ranch, and who guided the band through the dense brush about the place. The man Ricardo Gomez Pizana was in the fight with Troop A and guided the band from the south to Nopal. Up to midnight of 9th and 10 instant there had been but four desertions; one man dropped out on account of his horse and five killed, otherwise the original band was absolutely complete. The Ricardo Gomez Pizana above mentioned was one of the deserters. I do not know where they crossed either the Arroyo Colorado or the Rio Grande.

I have the man whose statement is above set forth incommunicado and will probably secure further information.

A. V. P. ANDERSON,
Captain Twelfth Cavalry.

HARLINGEN, August 12, 1915.

To commanding general Southern Department, Fort Sam Houston, Tex.:

Forwarded to civil officers. Brought this man to Raymondville to-day, where I interviewed him. He has been a fence rider on the King Ranch at Sauz. The officer who brought him over to Raymondville states that he knows this man and that he is a very reliable man. He is about 75 years old and appeared to me to be speaking the truth. I did not know at the time that Capt. Anderson had forwarded a lengthy report and so took down one myself, which I am also forwarding to Edward Anderson, major, Twelfth Cavalry, commanding.

I, Manuel Rincones, hereby certify that the foregoing statement is a true copy of my statement to Capt. Anderson.

His MANUEL X RINCONES.

G. P. DURHAM, Jr.
CAESAR KLEBERG.

STATE OF TEXAS,

Willacy County, ss:

Sworn to and subscribed, before, me, Robert Maxwell, justice of the peace, by Manuel Rincones, who is personally known to me.

[SEAL.]

ROBT. MAXWELL,

J. P., Ex Officio Notary Public, Precinct 4, Willacy County.

The CHAIRMAN. This old man was about 75 years old at that time.

Mr. KLEBERG. Yes, sir; he was about 78 or 79 years old. Judge Kleiber there is well acquainted with him, and he in fact made that same statement to him.

The CHAIRMAN. And up to the time that you received this statement, as I understand, you did not know who, if anyone, was behind these band of raiders?

Mr. KLEBERG. No, we were at an absolute loss to understand it. These statements that have been made by the gentlemen preceding me, and all these little runs, you never could see anybody, and it was not until we had this fight at Norias that the whole band was together that we know of.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, after receiving this information that is contained in this statement, and from your subsequent investigations, did you become convinced that there was a concerted effort behind these raids and these disturbances?

Mr. KLEBERG. Unquestionably so. There was no reason for us to think that way, because these Mexicans had been with us and they had never made a move of this kind. It was some outside influence.

The CHAIRMAN. From all the evidence secured by you, whom did you learn was back of and supporting these murders, robberies, and disturbances upon this side of the river?

Mr. KLEBERG. Well, my information—the information that I got, that is, that came to me, was that Nafarrate was the man that was planning all this business.

The CHAIRMAN. Gen. Nafarrate?

Mr. KLEBERG. Gen. Nafarrate.

The CHAIRMAN. To what faction in Mexico did Nafarrate owe adhesion?

Mr. KLEBERG. I understand the Carranza faction.

The CHAIRMAN. A general in the Carranza army?

Mr. KLEBERG. That is my understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. At one time in Monterrey?

Mr. KLEBERG. Of course, I do not know his movements, but I knew that at that time he was in Matamoros.

The CHAIRMAN. During the time these raids were going on?

Mr. KLEBERG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that is all, thank you.

Senator SMITH. You were born in Texas?

Mr. KLEBERG. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Who was your father?

Mr. KLEBERG. Rudolph Kleberg.

Senator SMITH. The Kleberg that served in the Congress of the United States for many years?

Mr. KLEBERG. Yes, sir; he was there from 1896 to 1902, I think.

Senator SMITH. That is all. I just wanted to identify you.

TESTIMONY OF JOHN A. KLEIBER—Recalled.

(The witness was warned by the clerk of the subcommittee that he had been sworn and was still under oath.)

Mr. KLEIBER. I want to explain one of the matters about that extradition.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. KLEIBER. Yes, sir; I overlooked it. I made the statement that I had never asked for the return of any fugitive with the exception of one or two or several efforts we made several years ago. Some years ago there was a man by the name of Toribio Rodriguez, a Mexican citizen, on this side, that was murdered at a ranch called Encantada or Ranchito about 15 miles above Brownsville, and the testimony was that the murder was committed by a man named Pedro Paz and Antonio Rocha. Both of them are unquestionably members of these bandit forces, and the sheriff, Mr. Vann, suggested that we ask for their extradition. I told him I did not think we could do much good in the light of our past experiences, but we did so, and I signed the papers for him and asked that he be made extradition agent, the party to receive the man. They were arrested, I understand, and placed in jail at Matamoros three or four months ago, last fall, and he went to Matamoros to see them, he went to the bridge—

The CHAIRMAN. That is Sheriff Vann, as extradition agent?

Mr. KLEIBER. Yes, sir. And he was notified by the commanding officer at Matamoros that he would have to go up the river, that he would not deliver them at Matamoros. So he went up to the town of Hidalgo, opposite the Mexican town of Reynosa. They turned over Pedro Paz, but they did not deliver Antonio Rocha. They said they had killed him, that he had escaped—what they call the “ley fuga.” Well, Rocha really was the king bee, the man that we wanted; they did not deliver him. Afterwards they gave us Paz, but did not give us Rocha. I wanted to correct that in my statement, that we had made no effort since the early part of the revolution. As to the testimony of this man Rincones, the Mexican awhile ago, I had forgotten of the particulars of it until I heard the statement read, and I now recall that he not only said that they had a military discipline, that they called the roll, but also that they read this plan under which they were operating, this plan to come over here and take back the lands that the Americans had robbed them of, that was really their ultimate object, and in that regard the statement bears me out in my statement that de la Rosa was the leader of the band and that Pizana had conducted or was just about to conduct the raid at Tulitos, where they had killed Corpl. McGuire. Furthermore, this Ricardo Gomez Pizana mentioned in that statement is a nephew of Aniceto Pizana. Ricardo Gomez Pizana is a notorious criminal. I convicted him in the district court of Nueces County. I tried him once at Brownsville before that, but he got away. We tried him again on another charge of theft of horses or mules, and he went to the penitentiary. He came back to Brownsville and got into trouble again and fled over the river, and if I mistake not, he is under indictment down there now for perjury. He was de la Rosa’s lieutenant in the Norias raids. He was a nephew of Pizana, the leader of the bandits.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

TESTIMONY OF TOM MAYFIELD.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized.)

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Pharr, Hidalgo County.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Native born?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what State?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. What official position, if any, were you holding in 1915 and 1916?

Mr. MAYFIELD. I was actively with the sheriff’s department, and I also held a special ranger commission.

The CHAIRMAN. What sheriff were you under?

Mr. MAYFIELD. A. Y. Baker, the sheriff of Hidalgo County.

The CHAIRMAN. What were the conditions existing in your district, or where you were familiar on the American side of the line during 1915, particularly as to violence or law and order and peace?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Well, it was a continuous raiding about most—that is, most every day in one of the two or three counties.

Senator SMITH. Raiding from where?

Mr. MAYFIELD. From Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. In your official position as a peace officer did you come in—did you gain any personal knowledge of these raids and were you present at any time during the raids, or did you come in conflict with the raiders at any time?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir—that is, I was actually engaged in pursuing these raiders; in fact, I left my work for two or three months, and that was all that I did for two or three months' time, was to help ferret out these raids and catch them, if possible. I did not participate in any raid.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean participate in defeating any raid, but in the pursuit of the raiders?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, in pursuit of these raiders, where did they go, if you know?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Well, most all of them would go back to Mexico each time. Of course, most usually these raids, these raiding parties that would come over, they would pick up one or two scouts or guides for them, all Mexicans who lived on this side, to help them through the country and show them roads and different localities, different ranches, that way, that they were not familiar with; but the most of the parties consisted of Mexicans from the other side of the river, on the Mexican side.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you mention any of these raids specifically and with the approximate dates?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Well, the raid at Progreso, some time in October, I captured—me and my partner captured a Mexican that participated in that raid.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that in October, 1915?

Mr. MAYFIELD. 1915. Capt. McCoy, in charge of the Third Cavalry at the time, I turned the Mexican over to him, and he made a sworn statement before Capt. McCoy and told the way the raid was planned on the Mexican side by the two Carrancista garrisons coming together and making this raid on this store, and some property was taken back as well as some Government horses, and one soldier was captured and taken across the river and his ears were cut off as souvenirs for the officers, and his head was cut off, and they paraded back and forth with his head on a pole, as his statement shows.

The CHAIRMAN. Was this a Mexican soldier captured and his head cut off and his ears cut off?

Mr. MAYFIELD. No, sir; an American.

The CHAIRMAN. An American?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what command he was attached to?

Mr. MAYFIELD. I do not remember just now the name of the command.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know his name?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Johnson, I understand, was his name.

The CHAIRMAN. He was captured on the American side of the river, was he?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And taken by his captors to the Mexican side of the river?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. To any town or settlement there?

Mr. MAYFIELD. He was taken to a station they called Las Peladas, that is a fort on the Mexican side.

The CHAIRMAN. Were there any Carrancistas there at that place?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then what was done with him?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Well, his ears were cut off as souvenirs, and this Mexican statement was that each commanding officer of the two garrisons on the Mexican side kept an ear for a souvenir. I have his statement, if you would like to have it.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, I would like very well to have his statement. You have it there as you wrote it down from notes at the time?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Capt. McCoy, I was only a witness with Capt. McCoy, under oath before a notary public. It is not in very good form.

The CHAIRMAN. You assisted, yourself, in the capture of Cuellar?

Mr. MAYFIELD. I captured him.

The CHAIRMAN (to Mr. Jackson). Read that Cuellar statement.

Mr. JACKSON (reading):

The STATE OF TEXAS, County of Hidalgo:

Before me, Lee Walsh, a notary public in and for Hidalgo County, Tex., now comes Cuadalupe Cuellar, who, after being duly sworn, on oath, states that he has resided on the American side of the Rio Grande River for about eight years.

Cuellar says that he was within sound of the firing of the fight between American soldiers and Mexicans at or near Progreso on Friday, September 24, 1915, in which three American soldiers were killed and one taken prisoner.

Cuellar says that Capt. Vargas, who has been in charge of the Carrancista soldiers at the fort known as Las Peladas but had been recalled and had been replaced by Carrancista troops from Matamoros.

Cuellar says that the Carrancista leader had given orders for every one on the Mexican side (some being without arms) to cross to the American side to assist in carrying off any loot which might be taken on the American side of the river.

Cuellar states that after the firing had almost ceased, some Carrancista soldiers came up on an American soldier in a clump of bushes; he surrendered and was taken prisoner to the other side of the river. On reaching there the Carrancista soldiers shot him four or five times, cut off his ears and then his head as souvenirs, and threw his remains into the river.

He states that the Carrancista soldiers crossed the river in three boats held there for that purpose.

He is unable to give the name of the captain in charge of the soldiers, but had heard it.

He was given this information by a Mexican named Francisco Gamez and also had information from a number of Carrancista soldiers, who came back after the fight, having their saddlebags and wallets filled with loot from the robbery of the store on the American side of the river.

He also states that the horses and arms taken back across the river were turned over to the Carrancista officer in charge of Las Peladas,

GUADALUPE (his x mark) CUELLAR.

Witnesses:

Capt. McCoy,
T. S. MAYFIELD.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this the 29th day of September, 1915.

[SEAL.]

LEE WALSH.

Notary Public, Hidalgo County, Tex.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Mayfield, do you know whether the body of this soldier was ever discovered?

Mr. MAYFIELD. It was afterwards recovered.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the condition, if you know?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Why, the head was cut off just as he stated.

The CHAIRMAN. Were there any bullet wounds in the body, do you recall?

Mr. MAYFIELD. I did not see the body. I only knew this information through Capt. McCoy and Maj. Anderson, who was in charge of the troops.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, in these raids, or following the raids, or in pursuit of the raiders, were there any arms or munitions taken by yourself or the other peace officers or soldiers?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir; at times we—in different raids we would get maybe some ammunition and maybe one or two guns that would be—that they would run off and leave, or maybe one of the bandits was killed, or something that way.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any form of deadly weapon, that you know of, used by any of these raiders, bombs or hand grenades, or instruments of death, of that character?

Mr. MAYFIELD. I never saw any of the bombs, but when De la Rosa was camped opposite where I had some cattle pastured we sent a number of different Mexicans into his camp to get information, and he had four Japs there making hand grenades out of green cowhides for him. We had quite a few witnesses who told us about those hand grenades.

The CHAIRMAN. They would place the explosives in the cowhide while it was green and then let the cowhide dry afterwards?

Mr. MAYFIELD. To dry afterwards; yes, sir; and they would put bolts or any piece of iron in this hand grenade with the explosive, and sew this green hide on with a green hide as sewing and as it dried it made a—I never saw one of those bombs but we had quite a few witnesses to tell us about the making of them.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, every Texan knows what a green cowhide will do when it gets dry?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir; they would also make signals—these Japs were also making signals that was something like a turkey calling, for De la Rosa. These four Japs were employed all the time they were in camp there making these hand grenades, or these "pitos," they call them.

The CHAIRMAN. Could you identify any of the arms or instruments which were taken from the raiders during those raids, or which they had left behind?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir; quite a few.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever see a flag in connection with those raids?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir; I saw two or three different flags.

The CHAIRMAN. We have here before us some guns. Do you know anything about them?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir. These guns were some that I captured at different times.

The CHAIRMAN. What are the guns, are they all of one kind, or are they of different kinds?

Mr. MAYFIELD. They are mostly the German Mauser, the different kinds—that is, the infantry and the carbine Mauser.

The CHAIRMAN. I can not see them there. Will you give me one?

Mr. MAYFIELD (exhibiting gun to committee). This is——

The CHAIRMAN. There are none of them loaded, I presume?

Mr. MAYFIELD. No, sir. This is a German infantry Mauser.

Mr. JACKSON. Talk a little louder.

Mr. MAYFIELD. I say, this is a German infantry Mauser.

The CHAIRMAN. The one that you have in your hand?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the difference between that and the cavalry, simply a shorter barrel?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir. [Exhibiting another gun to the committee.] This is the cavalry Mauser.

The CHAIRMAN. A shorter barrel gun?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do they use the same ammunition?

Mr. MAYFIELD. These two do, yes, sir. There is the six, seven, and eight millimeter, this is the eight, and I have also some six millimeter.

The CHAIRMAN. You have also some six millimeter Mauser rifles?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you discover any ammunition for these different guns?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir. I have some of the three different kinds.

The CHAIRMAN. What is this box that I hand you?

Mr. MAYFIELD. That is some eight millimeter ammunition, German ammunition, which was being smuggled over to the Mexicans that was captured.

The CHAIRMAN. How much of it did you capture of this particular kind?

Mr. MAYFIELD. I personally did not capture that, but the officers in that vicinity did capture it.

The CHAIRMAN. It came into your possession from the officers there?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir. There is three or four or five thousand rounds in that.

The CHAIRMAN. I can not, unfortunately, read German, but I am familiar enough with the language to see that it would be German that I notice printed upon the box. Probably my colleague can. I also notice on the side of the box the legend, "Made in Germany."

Senator SMITH. That is German.

The CHAIRMAN. This box has printed German upon the outside and also the German description of the ammunition printed in German on the inside of the lid of the box?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Well, each cartridge is stamped eight millimeter. It is stamped on each.

The CHAIRMAN. You found ammunition also for the six and the other millimeter guns?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Well, I have it in these bandoleers here. [Indicating bandoleers lying on table.] This was taken in the Ojo de Agua raid.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the belt with the clips containing the cartridges in it?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How was it taken; was it found lying on the ground?

Mr. MAYFIELD. On one of the dead bandits.

The CHAIRMAN. Taken from his body?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I notice this is a web belt?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir; a hand-made web belt. He also had a German iron cross on that belt.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what became of the cross?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir; I have it. [Producing cross.]

The CHAIRMAN. This article which you hand to the committee is a German iron cross taken from the body of this bandit?

Mr. MAYFIELD. It was taken from the body of this bandit, and I understand it is a German iron cross. It has a German soldier on it and an Austrian soldier on it.

The CHAIRMAN. We have here a leather belt. Do you know where that came from? It has ammunition in it.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir; that was taken from the Mexican killed at the McAllen ranch the day they attacked Mr. McAllen.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the character of the ammunition in this leather belt?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Why, it is seven millimeter.

The CHAIRMAN. Seven millimeter ammunition?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. German ammunition?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I have here a pistol of some kind; what is that, do you know?

Mr. MAYFIELD. I understand it is a German automatic; I do not know; it has some inscription on it.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know where that came from?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir. I arrested the Mexican who had that gun on.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you arrest him?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Hidalgo County, Pharr.

The CHAIRMAN. In what language is the inscription, if you can tell?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Why, I do not know; I think German.

Senator SMITH. I can not read it, it is too dim for my glasses. Anyhow, it is not American.

Mr. MAYFIELD. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a Belgian-made gun. What are these clubs that are lying on the desk?

Mr. MAYFIELD. They are a homemade billy, that in searching for some ammunition I got six of those out of one Mexican's house. It just shows the crude form of fighting.

The CHAIRMAN. Something in the nature of a policeman's club?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Mexican was not a policeman, was he?

Mr. MAYFIELD. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did this saber come from?

Mr. MAYFIELD. I had information that there was a Mexican officer staying in my town, and my partner and I searched the place about daylight one morning to see if it was so—that he was staying there—and I got this saber and a belt—a web belt that holds 100 rounds of ammunition—and the commission out of this place. He was a lieutenant colonel, but I did not find him.

The CHAIRMAN. By whom was the commission signed, if you know?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Carrancista; that is, it was issued by the Carrancista government.

The CHAIRMAN. The man for whom you were searching got away, but you found the belt and the saber there and the commission, also?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir; it is stamped a Mexican saber.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did this machete come from?

Mr. MAYFIELD. That was a saddle machete that was lost by 10 of those raiders that crossed over at Granjeno ranch sometime in October. They used these machetes to cut the wire fences with. In this raid they cut 47 fences on their trip from the river out through the ranches and back, and we were trailing them, and this was lost on the trail.

The CHAIRMAN. What is this old pistol—what is this old pistol that I hand you; do you know where it came from?

Mr. MAYFIELD. I do not really know just where that came from. That has been with—

The CHAIRMAN. This instrument that I hand you here, do you know what that is?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir. That is what is known as a brass knuck.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did that come from; do you know?

Mr. MAYFIELD. I arrested a Mexican with that at Mercedes; he had it in his pocket.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that during the time of these raids and disturbances?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you happen to arrest him?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Well, we had some information as to some gambling that was going on, and some disorder.

(Capt. Hanson exhibited a flag to the witness.)

Mr. MAYFIELD. I know that; I saw another flag with the same inscription on it as that.

The CHAIRMAN. With reference to these bombs that you testified the Japs were making, from your information where were the Japs making these bombs?

Mr. MAYFIELD. It was a place they called Garania, it was about 8 miles east of Reynosa, Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Were there Carrancista soldiers there at the time at that place?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Well; I do not know. It was de la Rosa's camp. De la Rosa was staying in the garrison at Reynosa. He would go to Reynosa each night to stay, but he had this particular camp out there.

The CHAIRMAN. In his own command?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And the Japs were in his own command?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You say de la Rosa would go to the Carranza camps. Do you know whether he ever spent the night there?

Mr. MAYFIELD. He spent the night at the garrison, at the Carranza garrison, that was the information that we had from a number of witnesses, the Carranza garrison at Reynosa.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about the Ojo de Agua raid?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Well, nothing more than I knew of it, I did not go there. I was detained on some other business.

The CHAIRMAN. From your information gathered in pursuit of and in attempts to apprehend the raiders, you ascertained as I understand you that they rendezvoused upon the Mexican side of the river generally and came across to this side and committed their depredations.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What, if any, attempt was made, to your knowledge, by any of the Carrancista soldiers or officers to apprehend these raiders and to assist in preventing the raids?

Mr. MAYFIELD. None whatever. We repeatedly asked for some few of the people that we knew. I had one occasion at one time, this Antonio Rocha, who was indicted in three cases of murder, and we had asked for Antonio Rocha several times, and one time Capt. McCoy phoned me and asked me to go to Brownsville and meet the Mexican officials with Gen. Parker and see if we could get Antonio Rocha over. I went there and they questioned me as to whether we had Rocha indicted or not and I assured them that we could get three warrants for him, and the Mexican officials answered by saying that if I would bring the testimony and evidence at Matamoros that they would give Rocha a fair and impartial trial in Matamoros but they would not deliver him to us on this side to be tried.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you make any further attempt to secure his delivery?

Mr. MAYFIELD. No, sir; I did not because I knew that there were other officers who had asked for different people that way, and we found that it was almost impossible or we never got any results.

The CHAIRMAN. From the information which you have obtained in your official business in pursuance of your duties with reference to these raids, what did you learn, if anything, as to who on the other side, if any one, was assisting the raiders?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Well, Gen. Nafarrate was in charge of the garrison at Matamoros, and all the information we had, why, the different raids were planned by him and De la Rosa to this side.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you been in this city now, Mr. Mayfield, in this city, San Antonio, I mean, on this occasion?

Mr. MAYFIELD. I came here Tuesday morning.

The CHAIRMAN. You have remained here ever since, have you?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you still an officer?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What position now?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Deputy sheriff of Hidalgo County.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know Mr. Forres, one of the witnesses who testified a few days ago—Henry Forres?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir; I have just met him a few days ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know the Mexican consul? Have you ever been to his office?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Well, I have never been to his office until yesterday, and I went with Mr. Forres to the Mexican consul's office.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you accompany Mr. Forres to the Mexican consul's office yesterday?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you speak Spanish?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You understood what was said there with reference to Mr. Forres's request for the visé of his passport?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the answer which he received?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Well, they refused to visé the passport, and I asked them in Spanish why, what reason they gave, and he only shrugged his shoulders and said, "Son las ordenes," those were the orders, and this clerk went back in the consul's office and I spoke to the clerk in the reception room and asked him if he could give me some reason, and he said no, he had no reason, that they would not issue the passport.

The CHAIRMAN. You knew that Mr. Forres had previous to this time given testimony before this committee?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any other statement that you can think of that you care to make, without being interrogated?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Unless it is in regard to the plan of San Diego. I arrested this man who had this original plan of San Diego on him.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was he?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Basilio Ramos.

The CHAIRMAN. Basilio Ramos; his name is mentioned in the plan of San Diego, is it not?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir; he is one of the signers.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you arrest him?

Mr. MAYFIELD. McAllen, Hidalgo County.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know where he is now?

Mr. MAYFIELD. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You got a copy of the original plan of San Diego from the person of Ramos when you arrested him?

Mr. MAYFIELD. When I arrested him I took the original copy off of him; yes, sir; and his code and pass through the Carrancista lines.

The CHAIRMAN. He had a pass through the Carrancista lines?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Who were they signed by?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Nafarrate.

The CHAIRMAN. Gen. Emiliano Nafarrate?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you present here when the copy of the plan of San Diego was read by the secretary?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that identical with the original plan which you took from Ramos?

Mr. MAYFIELD. As far as I remember; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you do not know where Ramos is. Do you know what became of him; was he placed under bond or in custody?

Mr. MAYFIELD. He was placed under bond, and his bond was forfeited, and the information I had was that he returned to Mexico through Laredo.

The CHAIRMAN. You don't know where he is now?

Mr. MAYFIELD. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, sir, Mr. Mayfield.

(Thereupon, at 12.35 o'clock p. m., the committee recessed until 2.30 o'clock p. m. of the same day.)

AFTER RECESS.

TESTIMONY OF W. E. VANN.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a citizen of this country?

Mr. VANN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Native of what State?

Mr. VANN. Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your official position?

Mr. VANN. Sheriff of Cameron County at present.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you occupied that position?

Mr. VANN. In Cameron County six years—near about six.

The CHAIRMAN. Is Cameron County on or near the international boundary?

Mr. VANN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Between this country and Mexico?

Mr. VANN. Yes, sir; on the border.

The CHAIRMAN. What have been the conditions in your county, Mr. Sheriff, as to law and order or violence, during your term of office or any part of it?

Mr. VANN. Well, at first everything was very quiet over there a few months in 1914—I was elected in 1914, and along in 1915 it got pretty rough—1915 and 1916; but since that time it has been a little more quiet.

The CHAIRMAN. To what were the disturbed conditions due in 1915 and 1916?

Mr. VANN. Due to the bandit troubles we had down there—what we always called the bandit troubles.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were these bandits from, if you know, generally?

Mr. VANN. Well, the most of them were from Mexico. There were some Mexicans, however, on our side of the river that joined in with them.

The CHAIRMAN. Among whom—can you mention the names of the more prominent from this side of the river?

Mr. VANN. Well, there was Luis de la Rosa and Aniceto Pizana, and Pedro Paz and Antonio Rocha—Joe Benavidez was a pretty good, real noted Mexican, and a pretty good man—that were on this side, and quite a few.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever have any communication concerning these raids with the Mexican general in command on the other side of the river?

Mr. VANN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was his name?

Mr. VANN. Nafarrate—Gen. Nafarrate.

The CHAIRMAN. You personally had communication with him as sheriff?

Mr. VANN. Yes, sir; I went across the river and talked with him on three different occasions, I believe—two or three times I talked to Gen. Nafarrate up in his office.

The CHAIRMAN. Along what line was the conversation?

Mr. VANN. On the line of the bandits. We had come to the conclusion that Nafarrate was backing up the bandits, and the Carranza Government—rather, the soldiers over there, the army, was kind of backing up the bandit troubles, and I went over to see Nafarrate about it. He always denied it very strongly to me, and promised very faithfully every time I ever saw him that he would do everything he could to assist us.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he do it?

Mr. VANN. He did not.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have any evidence to justify you in the belief that the other Carrancistas were lending aid and assistance or comfort to the bandits?

Mr. VANN. Yes. There were two bandits killed on this side of the river that had on Carranza soldier uniforms, and I mentioned that to Gen. Nafarrate—or Col. Nafarrate, what we called him—and his excuse was for that that sometimes they were a little more or less negligent, and that possibly those boys could get a uniform, and it would be unbeknownst to them, they wouldn't know it, and that was about the excuse they gave me for that.

The CHAIRMAN. His attempt was to make you believe that somebody else had secured their uniforms?

Mr. VANN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And were wearing them?

Mr. VANN. Yes, sir. But it was so plain, we knew, of course—we were right there, Nafarrate on one side of the river and us on the other, and soldiers—and all we could hear about from people that came across—we captured quite a few, and they told us about it, that the military authorities were in with them—one Mexican in particular said that, young Flores, after we captured him, he said that De la Rosa and Pizana both were in the Carrancista army and were pretty high officers in the army—and they were the leaders of these bandit forces.

The CHAIRMAN. That was Cheno Flores?

Mr. VANN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. He is here—

Mr. VANN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In attendance upon this hearing?

Mr. VANN. Yes, sir. And he gave us the names of quite a few. The only one we connected Cheno Flores with, the main one, was the train wreck—we caught Cheno two days after the train wreck, and he told us all about it, he wanted—

The CHAIRMAN. He admitted his part in the wreck?

Mr. VANN. He was with them, and they were right across from the Las Rucias ranch on the other side and had been there for a couple of days to plan this raid, and were led by Luis de la Rosa and Pizana.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he say where they came from?

Mr. VANN. No; he said that he hadn't been over there but a few days, Senator, and that they were there then—in that part of the neighborhood when he went over—it seems that he and Guajardo and three or four Mexicans on this saide went over—I don't know, they didn't volunteer—

The CHAIRMAN. Who?

Mr. VANN. Guajardo.

The CHAIRMAN. His story was that he had been compelled to go over?

Mr. VANN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. He had been captured and compelled to go over?

Mr. VANN. No, I don't think that he had been captured and compelled—Pedro Paz said that before a notary, he didn't say he was compelled to go there—I don't remember just how his statement came in, but he wasn't there but a couple of days, and I think he said they were to come there, and had their headquarters there when he went with them, Senator; and after we went back we found some facts, where the rail had been pulled up by a big wire, and they had some of those hand grenades that were made out of inch and a half pipe with a tap screwed on them, with wire—picked up some of them at the ranch.

The CHAIRMAN. What were they loaded with, do you know?

Mr. VANN. Yes; I unloaded one, it had little iron bullets and one thing and another, you may say.

The CHAIRMAN. Dynamite or powder?

Mr. VANN. Yes, sir;—it was powder. And then they had some spades, they had a couple of spades I think on this occasion, and they had crowbars and had big wrenches to take the taps off of these plates that goes on these railroad tracks—fishplates; and they were pretty well equipped, with two or three—these kinds of things left at the wreck, that we got the next morning. But we got him the next morning, and he said, "Now, captain, I want to tell you the truth, I want you to know that I am telling you the truth about it. We did not go back toward the river that morning"—or "that night, but went across the Paso Real and came back 5 or 6 miles and went back across to Sebastian and back in the lower part of the county;" he said, "we crossed the Paso Real," which was 25 miles from the train wreck—"just right about daylight the next morning," he said, "we have a regular path-crossing place we cross, we have a boat there that is sunk there,"—the water I suppose is 15 or 20 feet deep—"and we would get in that boat and go across, sometimes it takes two or three loads." And I asked him how many were in the bunch, he said about 60, he didn't know them all, but he named de la Rosa and Pizana, Benavidez, and several of those boys. And we asked where this boat was, and he showed us where it was and we pulled it up with wire, we poured the water out of the boat, and went across to Paso Real. And he said, "I left my gun with six shells cartridges here," across Paso Real, and he showed us those and we got those—a 30-30 Winchester and six shells; and then of course I knew he had been with them, because he showed us the road, and we knew he had been telling the truth about it.

The CHAIRMAN. Were there any Carranza soldiers in that vicinity?

Mr. VANN. No, sir; not upon that Paso Real.

The CHAIRMAN. How far from there?

Mr. VANN. There were Carranza soldiers up the river; lots of them at Matamoros.

The CHAIRMAN. How far were the Carranza soldiers from Paso Real where they crossed the river?

Mr. VANN. Possibly 30 miles.

The CHAIRMAN. At that time?

Mr. VANN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have any experience in attempting to secure the return to this country of any fugitives from justice whom you desired to bring over?

Mr. VANN. Yes, sir; I think I made requisition for extradition for 10, possibly 11, on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. What has been your experience?

Mr. VANN. Well, I was ignored in every case except the last requisition I ever made, last year, in 1919, I made requisition for Pedro Paz and Antonio Rocha, and they were attempted to be delivered to me, and one of them was delivered, but the other was killed before he was delivered to me. But others prior to that, they ignored every requisition I ever sent in.

The CHAIRMAN. What was your experience with reference to that requisition which was granted?

Mr. VANN. Well, I think on Tuesday—they notified me Tuesday morning or Monday afternoon late—that the governor of the State of Tamaulipas had ordered the two prisoners turned over to me.

The CHAIRMAN. That was Gov. Osuna?

Mr. VANN. That was Gov. Osuna over at Victoria, Mexico. And they were to deliver these two parties to me Tuesday morning at the international bridge if I would come up, and Mr. Fred Winn and I went up to the bridge, but they didn't show up, and I think they came over sometime that day and told us they couldn't get by with them, but would come up the next morning at daylight, so we went back again the second morning by daylight and they sent a letter down to me, written in Spanish—Mr. Winn read it to me—in which they said that the city marshal of Matamoros was sick and could not make the trip that morning, and so they wanted to put it off until the next morning. We said all right, we would put it off until Thursday morning.

Thursday they didn't show up and didn't send us any message at all, so I went over in the afternoon to see them about it, and Thursday, during the day, I wired the governor at Victoria, Mexico, myself that they had promised me on two or three different occasions to bring them over and wouldn't do it—I was getting a little leary about it; and so he wired me back and told me to go over and see the colonel and demand them at Matamoros, and so I did. I got his wire, went over and saw the colonel, and he turned this message over to the—to another—what do they call them? The deputy district judge, I think; I think the district judge is at Laredo, and this fellow that was acting down there, was at that time district judge, so he tried to explain to me, the judge said I was entitled to them and should have them. Col. Bermillo said he didn't think I ought to take them out in the afternoon, and the judge says: "Well, I am going to turn them over to him right here, you can take them at any time you want to." Well, I said: "Well, I am ready to take them." Mr. Winn and I were together, and I said: "I am ready to take them." But the colonel sent out about 15 or 20 soldiers and told us not to take them; so we didn't take them. And the next morning I was at old Hidalgo, about 60 or 70 miles from Brownsville, and all on the train from there crossed over the river and went over to Reynosa, I suppose a half a mile from the river—we had a light, a little light, and went back down the river possibly a half a mile; we heard the train whistle and the smoke puffing, and directly—I was standing by the customs office down at the river, and it wasn't but a few minutes until I saw them coming down the hill, and I suppose there were 20 soldiers with those two parties; the district judge came up with them and some other party of his—one or two parties—and they got in a bus over there, or carriage, and came right down to the office, and was standing there, so there were about 20 Mexican soldiers that were sort of behind these boys and gathered behind them on each side of the road and around them, and had those two boys in front, just walking them down.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what was the character of the country there?

Mr. VANN. Oh, it was open; you could see them a quarter of a mile; there wasn't a stick of timber around there—

The CHAIRMAN. Did it have a fence?

Mr. VANN. Yes; a fence ran up to the left and the river to the right, where they were going to cross, the river made a sort of bend as it came down—and they had these boys, and had a rope tied around their arms, and jerked down like that [illustrating] the rope tied behind them, their hands tied behind them; and it looked like as they got within about 100 yards of the ferry which was there—and there was other Mexicans, three or four Mexicans and myself, three or four standing around there, and this man Rocha attempted to run, kind of sort dodged; it looked to me like he jumped to the right, came toward me; it looked to me like he jumped to the right 5 or 10 feet, and these soldiers shot him.

The CHAIRMAN. Shot him, you say?

Mr. VANN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Killed him?

Mr. VANN. Killed him. I couldn't hear anything, of course; I saw the gun smoke and heard the sound of the gun, but I couldn't hear anything that was said at all; I was too far away.

The CHAIRMAN. Was Rocha an American citizen, or a Mexican citizen?

Mr. VANN. He was an American citizen, and I think also Paz—I am not sure, but I think Paz was.

The CHAIRMAN. Which of the two men, if either, were you more anxious to extradite, to get across?

Mr. VANN. Rocha; we knew he was the bandit leader, and we had information from Mexico on several different occasions from which we knew he was the leader of this bandit gang; and at the time we didn't know that Paz was with the bandits at all—except we knew that Mr. Taylor and Mr. Scribner sent him out from San Sebastian to get a couple of horses, and he stole the horses and sent them across the river, or carried them across the river, and he afterwards acknowledged to me, while in jail—he is still in jail—he admitted that Rocha and Aniceto Pizana made him go with them on this raid.

The CHAIRMAN. Rocha was the man you wanted?

Mr. VANN. Rocha was the man I wanted. We knew on several occasions he had been on this side in these raids?

The CHAIRMAN. What was the charge upon which his extradition was demanded—his extradition at that time?

Mr. VANN. I demanded at that time his extradition on account of a charge of murder across the river on the 17th of January.

The CHAIRMAN. What year?

Mr. VANN. 1919. He and Pedro Paz came across the river and killed Toribio Rodriguez. I never did understand the thing or exactly know what they did kill him for, but they went up the river and killed him, and when we were notified in the afternoon, they went across the river, and we notified Col. Bermillo.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, in securing or seeking the extradition of these men, were you compelled to submit to the Mexican authorities evidence in the case?

Mr. VANN. Yes, sir; I submitted—we had really an inquest proceeding—we submitted this testimony to them, and they demanded later, a few days, the witnesses in person, and so I went up the river and summoned them, the witnesses in person, to go across the river and testify in the case, which they did, and on the—possibly 30 days later they had them back over there the second time and had them testify the second time, testify twice, the witnesses in the case, and they brought out these prisoners, more than they had the first time; they brought out a bunch of prisoners, possibly 30 or 40 in the bunch, and Antonio Rocha denied that he crossed the river, and they took—had all these prisoners out, and they identified them, these two men.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, in submitting the evidence on which you asked the extradition—in submitting this evidence to the Mexican authorities—was there any evidence showing Rocha's connection with the bandits that had committed these depredations?

Mr. VANN. I called their attention to the fact; he acknowledged the fact that I had three or four indictments against him for murder in connection with bandit troubles, in addition to this time that I demanded in the requisition.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, now, when he was shot, you say there were 20 armed men around him?

Mr. VANN. Yes, sir; I think there were 21; to be accurate, Senator, I think there was 21.

The CHAIRMAN. And he was coming down, within about 100 yards of you and facing you?

Mr. VANN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. With those men behind him, and his arms were tied?

Mr. VANN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. If a man had tried to escape, would he have attempted to get off of the road or out of the road on the side this man was at the time he got off, or on the other side?

Mr. VANN. He would have jumped on the other side; he could have run 30 steps and jumped off the bank into the river and possibly had some chance to get away in the water; but he couldn't possibly get away on the other side; it was a wire fence.

The CHAIRMAN. A wire fence?

Mr. VANN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How far would he have to run to run into that wire fence?

Mr. VANN. About 30 steps.

The CHAIRMAN. And his hands and arms were tied with a rope?

Mr. VANN. Yes, sir. The prisoners were not tied together.

The CHAIRMAN. The prisoners were not tied together?

Mr. VANN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Each was tied, with his arms tied to the rope?

Mr. VANN. On Saturday morning while I was in Matamoros talking to Col. Bermillo and the district judge about this business, I had my handcuffs in my pocket and offered them my handcuffs—I didn't know whether they had any or not—and told them to cuff them together, that then they couldn't possibly give any trouble, and they refused to take them; they said they had always tied them; and they tied them with that little rope.

The CHAIRMAN. But each tied separately?

Mr. VANN. Yes, sir; each was tied separately. And when the gun was fired the judge and I walked up to where they were—I hadn't seen Rocha for quite a little while—I walked up; they turned him over on his back and put his hat over his face, but I pulled his hat off, and the judge says, "Is that Rocha?" I says, "Yes, sir; that is him." And then I took my knife myself and cut his arms loose and pulled his hat off his face; and he kind of shrugged his shoulders after I told him I knew him, that I knew it was Rocha; so I walked on down with him, with the bunch of soldiers with Paz, and they delivered him to me at the river, I receipted for him—in fact, Senator, the judge came on down, and he wrote the receipt himself in Spanish for me to sign for both of them—he walked out of this little office, and we saw them coming down the road and when they shot Rocha, why, he tore this receipt up and wrote it for one man then—this other man had been killed.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not worth while, Mr. Sheriff, to detain you, to ask that you go into the details of the raids, and your experiences there as a peace officer, as we have had various other witnesses on the stand. We thank you very much for your statement. That is all.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. EVERETTE ANGLIN.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized.)

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live, Captain?

Capt. ANGLIN. McAllen.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a native of this country?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What State?

Capt. ANGLIN. Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. What official position, if any, do you hold?

Capt. ANGLIN. At present I am city marshal of McAllen.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you hold any official position in 1915 and 1916?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What?

Capt. ANGLIN. I was mounted inspector of customs, also deputy United States marshal.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have any experience during those years in the border troubles on this side of the river?

Capt. ANGLIN. Some; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you lived on the border?

Capt. ANGLIN. About 16 years.

The CHAIRMAN. During the period of 1915 and 1916 did you know Basilio Ramos?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know or learn of the plan of San Diego?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything of the connection of Ramos with that plan and the uprisings following it—bandit raids?

Capt. ANGLIN. Well, there was a Mexican staying in the hotel at McAllen by the name of Dr. Andres Villareal; he came to me one night and told me that Basilio Ramos had been to see him in his room and had laid this plan of San Diego before him, told him he had been sent there to confer with him, and wanted him to join him. He told me about what was in the plan, and I made arrangements with him to meet Ramos the next morning at 9 o'clock and to carry him to Teodoro Guerra's store in McAllen; I was to meet him there.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you meet them?

Capt. ANGLIN. I did not. He failed to get there until about an hour late; I had gone when he came, and Mr. Mayfield was there and arrested him.

The CHAIRMAN. Arrested Ramos?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That was Tom Mayfield?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The witness who has just testified?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir. We got his grips and searched them and found the plan of San Diego in them.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you find any other papers of any importance?

Capt. ANGLIN. Well, I didn't examine the papers; they were turned over to the deputy U. S. marshal, and Ramos was taken to Edinburg and put in jail.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about a raid at Ojo de Agua in 1915?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir. We arrived about daylight. The raid took place about 3 o'clock in the morning.

The CHAIRMAN. You arrived a short time after the raid?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What were the circumstances of that raid? How many people—bandits—were in the raid, if you know?

Capt. ANGLIN. When we got there there were three dead bandits laying out in the road in front of the house, where a detachment of Cavalry was stationed—12 soldiers stationed there. I think there were three dead soldiers—American soldiers.

The CHAIRMAN. Three dead American soldiers?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir; and four wounded soldiers laying in the house and under the house. There were 10 dead cavalry horses and some mules; I forget how many.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you learn the approximate number of the attacking forces?

Capt. ANGLIN. Estimated to be about 65, and we followed them to the river, we trailed them to the river and they crossed, and we could see them on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. You could see them?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not cross after them?

Capt. ANGLIN. No, sir. Among those that were killed there was one Japanese and two soldiers, Carranza soldiers.

The CHAIRMAN. Were any of these men ever apprehended by the Mexican officials on the other side and returned to you—to this side?

Capt. ANGLIN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was any effort ever made by the Mexican officials, Carranza soldiers, or others upon the other side to apprehend them, to your knowledge?

Capt. ANGLIN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In coming to the national boundary to make this attack, if they came from the other side, what point did they leave, if you know, on the Mexican side?

Capt. ANGLIN. Reynosa Vieja is the name of the place.

The CHAIRMAN. How far was it from Reynosa Vieja to any of the Mexican authorities or soldiers?

Capt. ANGLIN. Well, there was a Carranza station at Reynosa Vieja, a detachment of soldiers stationed there.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, when these people crossed back, where did they cross?

Capt. ANGLIN. Well, they crossed the river right—right near where the road was—about 2 miles farther down the river, and they went direct to the river and crossed.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know where they went when they reached the other side?

Capt. ANGLIN. No, sir; I don't.

The CHAIRMAN. Which direction were they headed?

Capt. ANGLIN. When we saw them there were several of them afoot and several on horseback and they were headed toward Reynosa Vieja, the direction they were traveling.

The CHAIRMAN. Toward the place from whence they had come—

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. To make the attack?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And there was a Carranza garrison there?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there any other damage done at Ojo de Agua besides the mere killing of a few soldiers—American soldiers?

Capt. ANGLIN. They burned a residence there belonging to Mr. Dillon, robbed the post office and a store.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about any trouble at a crossing near Mission?

Capt. ANGLIN. Sir?

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about any trouble at a crossing near Mission and a fight which ensued there?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir. That is known as the Cavazos Crossing.

The CHAIRMAN. Cavazos Crossing?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was that trouble?

Capt. ANGLIN. Well, we—a few days after the raid at Ojo de Agua, I went in company with six other peace officers—we had some information that some of this loot that had been taken out of the stores was hid down there in the brush in the bend of the river, so we went down there to make an investigation, and while we were there the soldiers were on the other side—there was a little immigration office over there, customhouse, on the Mexican side, and there was a troop of cavalry there; some of them were mounted and some dismounted, had their horses down to the edge of the river, bathing them.

The CHAIRMAN. Carranza cavalry?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir. We stood under cover there quite a while to see what we could see, and Mr. Baker, the sheriff of the county, walked out upon a levee that had been thrown up, and they saw him, and when they did they commenced shooting at him.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, Mr. A. Y. Baker?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir; we returned the fire and we fought there about an hour, I guess, and finally we ran them off; and so there was a kind of horseshoe in the bend of the river there, and they would get around and kind of cross-fire on us; and we thought it was about time to move, and we went out to Mission and got two troops of Cavalry. Capt. Frank McCoy was stationed there, and Capt. Wells. We got back there and reported to them what we had run into, and they returned to the river with us. As soon as we reached—got back to where we had to fight, there had been some Mexicans killed; we didn't any of us get hurt.

The CHAIRMAN. You say there had been some Mexicans killed?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir; in this fight.

The CHAIRMAN. In the fight with your posse?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. About how many do you know?

Capt. ANGLIN. We never did learn; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Those who were killed on the Mexican side?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You were shooting across the border?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right now; when you arrived with the soldiers—

Capt. ANGLIN. There was one soldier wounded; he didn't die.

The CHAIRMAN. And there was one soldier wounded among the American forces in the fight that took place then between the American soldiers and the Carranza soldiers?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir; they started the fight about 9 o'clock and it lasted until 4.30 that afternoon, when they withdrew. They were all in hiding behind trees and rocks on the other side of the river. It is rough country there, and it was very seldom we could get to see one of them; they just kept up continued fire all day, and they had a bugler with them, and withdrew about 4.30.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you go over that battle field any time or visit the scene thereafter?

Capt. ANGLIN. We returned there the next morning at daylight with the cavalry; they had run a train up from Reynosa and unloaded another troop of cavalry there.

The CHAIRMAN. The Mexicans had?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir; there were two troops there when we arrived on this side; they had taken all their stuff on the other side of the river; we could see them, but there was not any fighting taking place that next day.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you see any dead bodies there—any evidence of anybody having been hurt?

Capt. ANGLIN. Not the next morning.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you at any time after the—

Capt. ANGLIN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And there was one soldier wounded among the American forces in the fight?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. None killed?

Capt. ANGLIN. None killed.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about a raid upon the Las Norias ranch?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir; we—Mr. Baker phoned me the day following the raid, asked me if I would meet him out at Mr. Sprague's ranch; that he was going to try to get this bunch of bandits that—that raided the Las Norias ranch. So we went out there in cars—there were ten of us in the party—and got some horses there and went to the Jesus Maria ranch, owned by Amado Cavazos, who is deputy sheriff. These bandits had been there and had just left. They had butchered a cow there and ate, and Cavazos told us who was in the party and gave us some literature—some circulars—that they had left there.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the character of this literature?

Capt. ANGLIN. Well, it stated—I forget just how it was worded—anyway, there was going to be a general uprising; they were going to kill all the Americans, especially the rangers, soldiers, and officers; said it was an order from Carranza. They had left several of those circulars and he gave them to us. He also knew some of the people that were in the party.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, to return a moment to this raid upon Ojo de Agua—you say that in addition to the killing, that the Dillon store and residence were burned and the post office was robbed? Was there a wireless station there at that time?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Had been?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the condition of the wireless station after this raid?

Capt. ANGLIN. Why, it was pretty badly shot up; these soldiers were camped in a little frame house, and I am satisfied there were 500 bullet holes in the house—I never counted them, but it had been estimated there were fully that many.

The CHAIRMAN. This was a military wireless station, was it?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the general condition around McAllen, and in all that vicinity during the years of 1915 and 1916 as to the safety of the peaceable, law-abiding citizens of that community?

Capt. ANGLIN. Well, lots of our citizens left and moved away from the country; them that didn't, most of the farmers that lived out in the country, brought their families to town and they organized a home guard and patrolled the town every night—kept the ladies—women and children inside of the city limits. Lots of people moved, went away.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you ever at Rio Bravo, Mexico?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever see anything unusual in that vicinity on any of your trips there?

Capt. ANGLIN. I was in the customs service, stationed at Hidalgo, when the Carranza forces, under Gen. Lucio Blanco, marched onto—they taken Raynosa and marched down the river to Rio Bravo and camped; they seized a bunch of horses that belonged to Mitchell & Jennings, on the Saltena ranch, in Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Mitchell & Jennings were American citizens, were they?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir. They had bought the live stock off of this Saltena's ranch; the collector of customs rang me up and asked me to go to Rio Bravo and see Gen. Blanco and see if he would deliver these horses to Mr. Jennings at Rio Bravo, and asked him if he would allow him to cross them over. I went over there and talked to Gen. Blanco about the horses, and he told me he needed those horses and had to have them; he had taken them from the Saltena ranch. I told him I had been sent there; that the horses belonged to an American citizen; to an American, and he would like to get them; and he told me that he had an American citizen hanging in a mesquite tree down there; I could go down and look at him if I wanted to; and so I did—I went and looked at him.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was it; do you know?

Capt. ANGLIN. It was Juan Alamia.

The CHAIRMAN. An American citizen?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir; brother of the tax collector of Hidalgo County.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not get the horses?

Capt. ANGLIN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you learn why this American citizen was hung?

Capt. ANGLIN. No, sir. I didn't ask any questions. There were two other men hanging with him.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know who they were?

Capt. ANGLIN. I did not. I knew Juan Alamia very well; had known him for years.

The CHAIRMAN. But you did not know the other two?

Capt. ANGLIN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you did not seek to satisfy your curiosity any further?

Capt. ANGLIN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever cross into Mexico before or since that?

Capt. ANGLIN. I did before; I haven't since.

The CHAIRMAN. On any of your trips into Mexico did you ever have any personal experience with the Carrancista soldiers?

Capt. ANGLIN. Just a few days before this—well, a day or two after Gen. Blanco had taken Reynosa—I was in charge of the customhouse at Hidalgo, and had crossed live stock there, cattle and goats, and we had to have the Government veterinarian from Brownsville to come up there and inspect this stock which was crossed; he had phoned Brownsville and asked for the veterinarian to be sent up, he had a bunch of goats there to be crossed, and he asked me if I would make sure that these goats were ready to be crossed; so I sent a note across the river to the man in charge, to know if he was going to allow these goats to be crossed; he sent a note back to me and told me he would come down to the bank of the river on the Mexican side and asked me if I would come over and talk to him, so—

The CHAIRMAN. Who was this man that sent you this invitation?

Capt. ANGLIN. Capt. Ortiz.

The CHAIRMAN. Of the Carranza army?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir. I went over and met him there. He came down to the bank of the river, and he told me that he thought that I was interfering with Mexican affairs and that he was going to take me up and put me in jail; that he had orders from his commanding general to execute anybody that meddled with his business.

The CHAIRMAN. His commanding general was Lucio Blanco?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir. I tried to argue the question with him, but the more I argued the worse he got; so he said he would take me up and put me in jail and send the sentence down to Gen. Blanco, and if he confirmed it, why, I would be shot at 12 o'clock that night; and there was a lieutenant there—that is, captain or lieutenant—whom I knew; he had been in the old Federal army. He interceded for me, and finally he threw his gun down on this captain and held him until I got in a boat and crossed the river; so the captain ordered him shot, but he jumped in the river and swam across in front of the customhouse, and they shot at him—fired 16 shots at him—but didn't hit him.

The CHAIRMAN. And he got across on this side?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you made your escape into Texas?

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. After this experience, and learning from this captain what Blanco's orders were, when he told you that you could find this American hanging down in there, why, you did not pursue the inquiries any further?

Capt. ANGLIN. Oh, no, sir.

Senator SMITH. Did this party whom you met there know that you were holding an official position under the United States Government?

Capt. ANGLIN. This captain?

Senator SMITH. Yes.

Capt. ANGLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe that is all, Captain. I am very much obliged to you, sir.

TESTIMONY OF MARCUS HINES.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized.)

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you reside, Mr. Hines?

Mr. HINES. In Santa Maria, Tex.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your occupation?

Mr. HINES. Customs inspector.

The CHAIRMAN. A little louder, please.

Mr. HINES. Mounted customs inspector.

The CHAIRMAN. On the border?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you been mounted customs inspector?

Mr. HINES. About six years.

The CHAIRMAN. In the pursuance of your official duties as mounted customs inspector, did you have any experience along the border with bandits or raiders from Mexico upon this side?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you remember how many raids you learned of, or knew of personally, during your experience there; did any of them particularly much impress themselves upon your mind?

Mr. HINES. Well, I have had about 8 or 10 of them, I was in 2 of them; and then I got there after the others had happened.

Mr. JACKSON. They can not understand you, Mr. Hines—you will have to speak more distinctly and louder.

The CHAIRMAN. You were in two, I understand, and you were there shortly after several others occurred?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about the Las Norias raid?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you at that time?

Mr. HINES. I was at the ranch.

The CHAIRMAN. At the Las Norias ranch?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What occurred there?

Mr. HINES. Well, there was a bunch of Mexicans surrounded the ranchhouse, and we had a fight with them.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you in that fight?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you are a mounted inspector. In the service of the United States Government, were you?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was anybody hurt in that fight?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Who?

Mr. HINES. Old man Martin, and a fellow by the name of Forbes, three United States soldiers.

The CHAIRMAN. Was anyone else?

Mr. HINES. There were some Mexicans.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean Mexicans of the attacking force?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir. There were four Mexicans killed there; then they killed a woman there that lived on the ranch—the bandits did; the attacking party—the bandits killed a woman.

The CHAIRMAN. A Mexican woman?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir; old Antonio Rocha killed her; killed the woman.

The CHAIRMAN. Antonio Rocha?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you heard the testimony of these witnesses who have immediately preceded you—Sheriff Vann?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir; I heard Vann.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that the same Antonio Rocha of whom he spoke?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you take part in any other fights between bandits?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where?

Mr. HINES. About 5 or 6 miles east of San Benito, the day they captured Dodds and killed two men.

The CHAIRMAN. The two men who were killed were the Austins—father and son?

Mr. HINES. The Austins—father and son? No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Smith and Donaldson?

Mr. HINES. No, sir. They hadn't been there but a little while; I don't know the gentlemen's names.

The CHAIRMAN. You didn't know them?

Mr. HINES. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They were two Americans, were they?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you see the bodies?

Mr. HINES. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they have a fight there?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir; we had a fight that evening. We ran into them; we got into them that evening.

The CHAIRMAN. Where?

Mr. HINES. About 2 miles from where they captured Dodds.

The CHAIRMAN. What kind of fight did you have?

Mr. HINES. Well, we were in the road, and they were on each side of the road shooting at us; we were just shooting at them in the brush, and we killed a Mexican there in the brush.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know where these men who you were fighting, where they went?

Mr. HINES. Not all of them.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know where any of them went?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where?

Mr. HINES. Some of them were killed.

Senator SMITH. Do you know where they went?

Mr. HINES. No, sir; I don't. They told me they went back into Mexico, but then I don't know that of my own knowledge—it was afterwards, you know.

The CHAIRMAN. In any of these raids, do you know whether there were any Carranza soldiers identified?

Mr. HINES. Not that know of.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not know this?

Mr. HINES. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not know yourself of the identification of Carranza soldiers?

Mr. HINES. I thought that some of them were Carranza soldiers, but then I didn't know.

The CHAIRMAN. From what you learned there in the pursuit of your official duties, did you ascertain whether these disturbances and raids were a part of a preconceived and worked-out plan, or whether they were simply sporadic outbreaks of bandits?

Mr. HINES. Well, right at the time, when the bandits first broke loose there, why, we—I didn't know what was the cause of it, but naturally, of course, working in it all the time we got onto it pretty well.

The CHAIRMAN. You did?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, what did you get onto?

Mr. HINES. Well, it was planned to take Texas and that country and give it back to Mexico, it was—to be plain with you about it, I think the Germans were back of the whole thing.

The CHAIRMAN. From information which you secured, it made the impression on you that the plan was backed by the Germans?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, now, did you ever have any talk with any Germans in that country about it?

Mr. HINES. No, sir. I had on one occasion, that when we were out after these bandits, I came up to a house that had a German flag over it.

The CHAIRMAN. The German flag flying over it?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, who lived there?

Mr. HINES. It was a farmer there. He had been there about a year or so. He had two or three Mexicans working for him. I took down the flag and asked him what it was for. He told me that these Mexicans told him if he would put that up anybody coming along wouldn't hurt him, and he was scared to death, and I let him go.

The CHAIRMAN. What did you do with that flag?

Mr. HINES. I gave it back to him and told him to be sure not to put it up again, and he said he wouldn't.

The CHAIRMAN. His excuse for having that German flag was these Mexican bandits told him to put it up?

Mr. HINES. No, sir; the Mexicans working for him.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, the Mexicans working for him.

Mr. HINES. I am sure he didn't do it only to secure protection.

The CHAIRMAN. To secure protection?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir. The Mexicans working for him told him.

The CHAIRMAN. He was assured that it would secure him protection?

Mr. HINES. The Mexicans working for him told him to put that up and they wouldn't hurt him.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know where he got it?

Mr. HINES. No, sir; I never asked him. I told him to be careful and not put it up any more.

The CHAIRMAN. You told him to be careful and not put it up any more?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir; I told him I didn't want it up there. The people were pretty fairly excited them times out in the back country, and nearly all of them left, you know.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, the residents of the country—the citizens?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They were liable—did you think that the people themselves were liable to resent this German flag being exhibited?

Mr. HINES. Who—the American people?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. HINES. Why, there were three or four of the boys with me, and they were pretty sore about it. I talked them out of it and told them that man was scared to death.

The CHAIRMAN. You talked them out of what?

Mr. HINES. Tearing that flag up.

The CHAIRMAN. They were pretty sore?

Mr. HINES. Well, they didn't care much about seeing one of these flags flying over Texas, our country, I suppose. They were mad about it, but after we talked about it, why, we let it go.

The CHAIRMAN. Let it go with a warning?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. With a warning if he put it up again?

Mr. HINES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all, Mr. Hines. I am very much obliged to you.

TESTIMONY OF MRS. NELLIE F. AUSTIN.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized.)

The CHAIRMAN. Are you an American citizen, Mrs. Austin?

Mrs. AUSTIN. Well, I was born in Montreal.

The CHAIRMAN. You were born in Montreal?

Mrs. AUSTIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was your husband?

Mrs. AUSTIN. A. L. Austin.

The CHAIRMAN. A. L. Austin?

Mrs. AUSTIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he an American citizen?

Mrs. AUSTIN. Surely.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what State was he a native, if you know?

Mrs. AUSTIN. Vermont.

The CHAIRMAN. Vermont. How long have you lived in Texas, Mrs. Austin?

Mrs. AUSTIN. Ten years last September.

The CHAIRMAN. Was your husband alive when you came here?

Mrs. AUSTIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. When did he die?

Mrs. AUSTIN. The 6th of August, 1915.

The CHAIRMAN. Where?

Mrs. AUSTIN. At Sebastian, Tex.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have any children?

Mrs. AUSTIN. Two. Charley they murdered when they killed his father; my youngest son, Louis, was at Balboa Heights, Canal Zone.

The CHAIRMAN. How old was your son Charles?

Mrs. AUSTIN. Just 30.

The CHAIRMAN. What happened at that time when you say your husband was killed—who killed him?

Mrs. AUSTIN. Why, Mexicans; I couldn't tell you who they were, as I don't know them.

The CHAIRMAN. At what time did the Mexicans come to your house?

Mrs. AUSTIN. Well, you know, I have never been certain about the hour, but it was, I should suppose, 9 in the morning as nearly as I can think.

The CHAIRMAN. Just what were the circumstances, what occurred there?

Mrs. AUSTIN. Well, I was—hadn't commenced to do my work, I had been very ill and was only able to get around slowly, and sat there—I sat there resting, and I heard leather creaking, and chains rattling; I looked up and, as I supposed, there were a number of Mexicans on horseback, with guns; I immediately knew they were bandits from knowing they were in the neighborhood a few nights before. I didn't know anything more than for a minute, for I closed my eyes. When I came to I saw them again, and there were only five; my fright made me suppose there was a great number; they crowded as they came toward the house and there was a little two-wheeled gig drawn up, was right behind them, with my husband, son, and Elmer Millard, who worked on the sheller with them. I didn't remember any more.

When I opened my eyes again one bandit was in the room where I was, with my son standing in front of him; he had a gun right up at his stomach, and I said, "Why, Charley, what do they want, what do they mean, my son?" When he spoke to me I saw he was very excited and he said, "Keep quiet, mother, everything is all right, don't worry." When I first looked I didn't notice the gun, but in a minute, noticing it, I got up to go over there and push it away, and Charley told me, in as cross a voice as he could, to go and sit down and keep quiet. I then noticed that there were two other Mexicans, one just about two feet behind the other at my kitchen door, one with a gun right on my boy, and right outside of the door was another one, his gun pointed at him. I went then and sat down on a couch, where I could see my husband as he sat out in the car. I asked him what was meant, and he told me in the same way not to worry, everything was all right. They then—the fellow who was in front of Charlie wanted to know if we had any firearms; Charlie told them yes, we had two guns, and he went to get them for him, they were over in the corner, not far from where he was standing. He got the guns, and I can't remember whether that man took them or not—that gun. They then wanted ammunition, and I had to tell my son where the ammunition was—I believe I hid it, knowing that bandits were around. They asked for more, and I thinking, when Charlie answered them, that perhaps they might believe me, told them no, we had no more. One of those guns was a shot gun, and the other one was an old army rifle that had been loaned to my husband and son to kill deer. Then they wanted to know if we didn't have a pistol; Charlie told them no, and I thinking perhaps they might believe me, also told them that we never had owned one. Well, I don't remember anything more; when I opened my eyes again they had left the house. When I came to I could see the horse being slowly turned around; Charlie was sitting in the middle, driving it. I ran to the table, and I asked my husband wasn't he coming in to me before he went, never thinking there was anything up but just robbery. My husband says, "Don't worry, Mother, I will be back in a moment—I will be back in a minute."

They had taken the guns out, and one of the men sitting on horseback, in front of the window, took this old army rifle and threw it on the ground; some one picked it up and handed it to him, and he threw it again—they seemed greatly displeased with it. They then turned and went away; I watched them until they turned to go down toward the country—there were quite a number of very good houses, and I could see them until they turned down this direction, then the wall of the house hid them from view until they went through the gate. After they had gone through the gate they closed it very carefully after them, and I could see our horses plunge and jump, and I wondered what was the matter, but not thinking about it, I was so pleased to think they had gone. After a while—well, it wasn't but a few seconds—I stood up—I had been writing a letter to my son and I thought I would add a postscript and tell him the bandits had been there and robbed the house—I stood up to go to the table to write, and, I heard this volley.

The CHAIRMAN. Firing?

Mrs. AUSTIN. It was—yes, just that once—it seemed as though one gun might have lagged, but they fired at the same time. I knew what it was—and I think for a moment I must have gone crazy. When I came to I was standing at the same place; my dog had come into the house and was jumping up in my face, lapping it with his moist tongue, brought me to. I knew enough to get my hat and to start after them to find them—and I kept feeling my heart give out, and I got but a short distance from the house when I saw that I would not be able to go farther. As I turned to come back and sit down until I was able to breathe again, I saw Elmer Millard coming back, he had almost reached my gate; I waited for him to come up, and I asked him where my boys were. He said, "They have shot them, Mrs. Austin." I wanted to go—I told him I was going down to get them and he begged me not to; he said the bandits were probably there yet, and I told him a shot would not hurt me any more than it had them, and so I started alone; I went down, and there were two roads, both led through the woods, one toward the village, the other south of the 40 that we were working, and when I got to that, I didn't know where to go, which road to take, and I thought I never would be able to get to the house again; I turned around to go and see if I could get Elmer—get to Elmer, and he had followed me down and was coming through the gate; he motioned for me, which way to go, but I misunderstood him, and on account of my misunderstanding him I was going the wrong road, and he hollered to me; he told me to go the other way.

I got but a few feet in the other road when I could see my husband's feet in the roadway. He wore white trousers and I could see him plainly; I had to pass. Charley was lying nearest, more under the bush, and I got to my husband first, picked him up—tried to pick him up first—I turned him over, and as I passed Charley I saw that Charley was dead; one of his eyes that I could see was open; then I picked my husband up and turned him over; blood was flowing from his mouth, but there was no other mark on his face. I talked to him and talked to him; I knew he was alive for his eye-lashes moved—or eyelids—but he couldn't speak. When I put him down I went to Charley, and I couldn't move him for he was like a piece of stone; he was lying in a pool of blood. Elmer got to me by that time and I thought that if I could get to a physician we could save my husband. Elmer said, "Oh, no; Mrs. Austin, they are dead." I told him I knew my husband wasn't. I stayed with him, and I think it must have been a half hour afterwards when I knew my husband was dead. I could hear—I said it was two hours, others said it was about an hour and three-quarters—I could hear an auto coming, and thinking it was coming east of the road, which, if it did, it would pass me, I waited, but it went the other road and went directly to our home. Coyotes were howling not very far away and I was afraid to leave my dead and go and try to let them know where I was; but after a while I went, and I had gotten almost to my gate when Mr. Smith, the man who was helping my husband run the sheller, saw me and hollered for me to wait. I turned to go back to my dead and he caught up with me. We got to where my husband and son were lying and another auto came; they carried us into the village. Me they kept in town, but my husband and son, although I thought they were going to leave them in town, carried out to Lyford.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know of any reason why your husband and son should have been killed by those people?

Mrs. AUSTIN. No reason whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. Had there ever been any trouble between your husband and son, or any of your family, and any of the bandits or Mexicans?

Mrs. AUSTIN. Oh, no; not a bit of trouble. You see, we didn't hire very many of them, and I don't know of any of those ever having worked for my husband.

The CHAIRMAN. You could not identify any of them?

Mrs. AUSTIN. Oh, no; no.

The CHAIRMAN. They were not natives?

Mrs. AUSTIN. One of them had borrowed money from my husband to hire help to pick his cotton; he was amongst those that came—that said, when I described the fellow who was standing in front of Charley—they said that that was Alberto Mejia; he was one of the men who had borrowed $10 from them; but others said no, that he wasn't amongst that five; so I don't know.

The CHAIRMAN. We will not detain you any longer, Mrs. Austin. Thank you very much.

TESTIMONY OF JOE TAYLOR.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized.)

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live?

Mr. TAYLOR. San Benito, Tex.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a native of this country?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What State?

Mr. TAYLOR. Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your business?

Mr. TAYLOR. Customs inspector.

The CHAIRMAN. United States service?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you been customs inspector?

Mr. TAYLOR. Something over five years.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about what is known as the Las Norias raid near the—in your part of Texas in 1915?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you there—

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN (continuing). At the time of the raid?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What were you doing?

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, I was there at the ranch when the fight took place.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you in that fight?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How many Mexicans were there in the attacking force, more or less?

Mr. TAYLOR. I think between 50 and 60; something like that.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did the fight last?

Mr. TAYLOR. I think about an hour, maybe more.

The CHAIRMAN. Some United States soldiers were engaged in it, were they?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What were the casualties, if you know, in that fight?

Mr. TAYLOR. I think there were four or five Mexicans killed.

The CHAIRMAN. And some Americans?

Mr. TAYLOR. One United States soldier, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. Others were wounded?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know of any other raids, disturbances, killings?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In 1915 and 1916? Did you know a man by the name of Smith and a man by the name of Donaldson?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You knew them when they were alive?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you see them dead?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir; I think I did.

The CHAIRMAN. Where was it?

Mr. TAYLOR. It was out from San Benito, about 10 or 12 miles east of San Benito.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you happen to see their bodies?

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, after they were killed they were—a party went out there to try to get those Mexicans that killed them and I was with that crowd.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you notice the condition of their bodies?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the condition?

Mr. TAYLOR. I think they had their trousers off, and it seems like their feet were hacked up, or something.

The CHAIRMAN. Their shoes off?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. About how many raids, more or less, occurred to your knowledge?

Mr. TAYLOR. I don't remember, Senator; there was a lot of them.

The CHAIRMAN. What were the general conditions as to peace and order, or violence, along the border for two years?

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, it was bad; in 1915, during the raids, it was awful bad, lots of people left there.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know a man by the name of de la Rosa—Luis de la Rosa?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know anything about his activities during this time or before?

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, I knew him before the time, I arrested him when I was in the ranger service, for he was supposed to be killing cows out there, stealing cattle, but I couldn't get enough evidence for my case against him, and we had to let him go.

The CHAIRMAN. You knew of his being in these different raids, did you?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about the objects of these raids from any Mexican source or otherwise? Did you have any talk with any of the raiders at any time?

Mr. TAYLOR. No, sir; I don't think I did.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not have any talk with the Mexicans in that vicinity as to the objects of the raids?

Mr. TAYLOR. No, sir; I didn't—I don't remember of any.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did the raiders go after committing depredations on this side, if you know?

Mr. TAYLOR. They would go back across the river.

The CHAIRMAN. In to Mexico?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you rendered any assistance in apprehending them, or any of them, by the Mexican officials upon the other side?

Mr. TAYLOR. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was any obstacle thrown in your way by such officials on the other side that you know of?

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, they would seem to be protected, and they were in with them over on the other side; they wouldn't bother them; they would go right back over there.

The CHAIRMAN. They would not interfere with them when they would attempt a raid?

Mr. TAYLOR. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Nor when they had concluded a raid?

Mr. TAYLOR. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. From your general information, who did you understand, if any, among the Carrancista officials was responsible for or supporting these raids?

Mr. TAYLOR. Gen. Nafarrate.

The CHAIRMAN. Nafarrate, of the Carranza Mexican Army?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all, I believe, Mr. Taylor. Much obliged to you, sir.

TESTIMONY OF JACOBO C. GUERRA.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized.)

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Guerra, of what country are you a native?

Mr. GUERRA. Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Mexico?

Mr. GUERRA. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you an American citizen?

Mr. GUERRA. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Naturalized citizen?

Mr. GUERRA. Naturalized citizen (producing papers).

The CHAIRMAN. You have your papers? What official position, if any, have you held in the United States at any time?

Mr. GUERRA. First, I was county treasurer for about eight years, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. County treasurer?

Mr. GUERRA. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what county?

Mr. GUERRA. Starr County.

The CHAIRMAN. Starr County, Tex.?

Mr. GUERRA. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Any other official positions?

Mr. GUERRA. Sheriff and tax collector.

The CHAIRMAN. Sheriff and tax collector of Starr County?

Mr. GUERRA. Of Starr County.

The CHAIRMAN. During what years were you sheriff and tax collector; do you recall?

Mr. GUERRA. From 1914 to 1918.

The CHAIRMAN. From 1914 to 1918?

Mr. GUERRA. To December, 1918.

The CHAIRMAN. From 1914 to December, 1918, you were sheriff of Starr County?

Mr. GUERRA. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. During the years 1915 and 1916, particularly, what Mexican factions, if any, were in control of the Mexican side of the river from Starr County?

Mr. GUERRA. The Carrancistas.

The CHAIRMAN. The Carrancistas? Do you know anything about any troubles or disturbances on this side—raids, murders, or attacks—during your incumbency of the office of sheriff?

Mr. GUERRA. Well, it was in 1915—I think it was; yes—there were some raids that occurred by some soldiers that came from the other side of the river—Carrancista soldiers—a bunch of about 16; they crossed at the Escaballo ranch, about 10 miles from Rio Grande city.

The CHAIRMAN. They were Carranza soldiers?

Mr. GUERRA. Yes, sir; they were Carranza soldiers.

The CHAIRMAN. Came over on this side?

Mr. GUERRA. Came over on this side and crossed, and amongst that bunch there was a lieutenant.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know his name?

Mr. GUERRA. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was it?

Mr. GUERRA. Silvestre Castillo.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did they go after arriving upon this side, if you know?

Mr. GUERRA. Well, I was notified about 1 o'clock in the morning by phone; I started right away to the place and I met this fellow, Castillo, at the ranch and he crossed his horse, saddle, and gun—pistol—and he told me that he had crossed; that he proposed going up to Rio Grande City and paying duty on that horse and saddle. Of course, I knew pretty well from the way that he talked that he was not telling the truth; I was there and I left him in charge of one of my deputies and went out; I went right to some of my neighbors there, some of the mounted inspectors, and we went out scouting and found some guns way out in the brush, and—

The CHAIRMAN. What kind of guns were they, Mr. Guerra?

Mr. GUERRA. Winchesters.

The CHAIRMAN. Winchesters?

Mr. GUERRA. Yes, sir; we got three soldiers and a woman, that makes with the lieutenant five in all; and that woman told us—she was dressed as a soldier.

The CHAIRMAN. The woman was dressed in men's clothing?

Mr. GUERRA. The woman was dressed in men's clothing; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In a uniform?

Mr. GUERRA. Yes, sir; man's coat and pants. And I took her apart, and she told me the whole truth; she said that 12 of these men had gone back to Mexico; that they intended to go and rob the store at Saenz's ranch.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that on this side?

Mr. GUERRA. That was on this side; yes, sir. It is pretty close to Roma, about 3 miles from Roma, I think. I found that they had cut the telephone wires as soon as they got to this side; they stole a mare and a hammer; they used them for cutting the wire, you know.

The CHAIRMAN. They were cutting the wire fence?

Mr. GUERRA. Sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They were cutting the wire fence?

Mr. GUERRA. No, sir; telephone wires.

The CHAIRMAN. Telephone wires?

Mr. GUERRA. Telephone wires; yes, sir. We brought those four men and this woman and locked them in jail and we used the woman as a witness when they were tried—turned her loose and used her as a witness.

The CHAIRMAN. You released the woman and used her as a witness in this trial of the men?

Mr. GUERRA. Yes, sir; and they were sentenced to five years in the pen.

The CHAIRMAN. What did the other band do, if you know, the other 12—did they rob the store?

Mr. GUERRA. No, sir; they did not.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know where they went; did you ever learn?

Mr. GUERRA. They went back to Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. They went back to Mexico?

Mr. GUERRA. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about the store at Salineno being robbed?

Mr. GUERRA. Yes, sir; twice during the time I was sheriff.

The CHAIRMAN. Twice?

Mr. GUERRA. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. By whom was it robbed, do you know?

Mr. GUERRA. By Mexican people who came over from the other side, came down the river to Mier—coming and going back.

The CHAIRMAN. How far was it from there to where there was any Carranza garrison?

Mr. GUERRA. It must be about 12 or 15 miles.

The CHAIRMAN. At Mier?

Mr. GUERRA. At Mier; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know Maximiano Garcia?

Mr. GUERRA. Yes, sir; I knew Maximiano Garcia very well.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is he now?

Mr. GUERRA. He is dead.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he an American citizen?

Mr. GUERRA. He was born and raised here in this country.

The CHAIRMAN. You say he is dead?

Mr. GUERRA. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the occasion of his death, if you know?

Mr. GUERRA. He was murdered by some people that came from the other side—some Mexicans that came from the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know the cause of his murder, why they murdered him?

Mr. GUERRA. They robbed him.

The CHAIRMAN. They murdered him in committing the robbery?

Mr. GUERRA. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What year was that?

Mr. GUERRA. That was the 3rd day of June, 1918.

The CHAIRMAN. Were his murderers ever apprehended?

Mr. GUERRA. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did they go after the murder, do you know?

Mr. GUERRA. They went back to Mexico; and I went to Mexico and reported the murder to the Mexican civil authorities—I went over there myself—and to the military commander.

The CHAIRMAN. To the Mexican civil authorities and the military commander?

Mr. GUERRA. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was done, if anything, to apprehend them?

Mr. GUERRA. They didn't do anything.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about the killing of an American citizen by the name of Gonzales?

Mr. GUERRA. Gonzales? Yes, sir; I heard a few days ago about that case.

The CHAIRMAN. Where was he killed, if you know?

Mr. GUERRA. He was killed in Camargo, Mexico, right in front of the quarters, in front of the soldiers' quarters.

The CHAIRMAN. In front of the soldiers' quarters or barracks?

Mr. GUERRA. In front of the soldiers' quarters or barracks; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. By whom was he killed, if you know?

Mr. GUERRA. By a captain by the name—I don't recollect his name—Cortina.

The CHAIRMAN. Cortina, of the Carranza army?

Mr. GUERRA. Yes, sir; of the Carranza army?

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know why he was killed?

Mr. GUERRA. No, sir; I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. You don't know anything about the reason?

Mr. GUERRA. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. During your administration of the preceding years, 1911, and subsequent years, what was the condition in that same neighborhood as to peace and quiet, or violence?

Mr. GUERRA. It was pretty good, pretty pleasant always.

The CHAIRMAN. Prior, I say, before 1911.

Mr. GUERRA. Oh, before.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the condition during Diaz's régime?

Mr. GUERRA. It was very quiet.

The CHAIRMAN. It was very quiet?

Mr. GUERRA. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Since and subsequent to that time what has been the condition in your county with reference to disturbances and violence?

Mr. GUERRA. It has been the reverse.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been the reverse?

Mr. GUERRA. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. With reference to the attempt of the officers on this side to enforce law and order—have you been able to secure assistance from the Mexican authorities on the other side?

Mr. GUERRA. No, sir; and I have tried many times.

The CHAIRMAN. You have tried many times?

Mr. GUERRA. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You have not been able to secure assistance either from the civil or military authorities?

Mr. GUERRA. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, Mr. Guerra. Thank you very much.

TESTIMONY OF TOM MAYFIELD—Recalled.

(The witness was warned by the clerk of the subcommittee that he had been sworn and was still under oath.)

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Mayfield, in the performance of your official duties, did you become acquainted at any time with a man by the name of Lawrence, calling himself Lawrence or Lorenz?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Under what circumstances?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Well, I had the information that this man was—was making threatening remarks in reference to our Government, and I was working on those cases, enforcing what is known as the Hobby loyalty act in the State of Texas, and I put a man by the name of Chaney with him to secure this information, and he has his affidavit in his, in Chaney's report to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Had this man Lawrence been arrested?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he under bond or in jail?

Mr. MAYFIELD. He was under bond.

The CHAIRMAN. You sent a man by the name of Chaney, and a man that you knew you could depend on?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. To obtain information from him?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what was Lawrence suspected? You say you had heard that he was making some remarks derogatory to our country, concerning us?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Different people had told me at times that Lawrence had said that the German people had officers in Mexico training the Mexican soldiers, and that any time that they saw fit to come over to the American side they, the German people, would give them all the help and support necessary, and blow up our pumping plants—destroy the pumping plants, destroy all the foodstuffs possible; so I put Chaney with him then to secure this information, as I was working under instructions of Capt. Anderson at the time, and that was his instructions, to get two affidavits before I made a complaint.

The CHAIRMAN. This paper which you have handed the committee is a copy of a summary of the affidavit made by Chaney in the nature of a report to you?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes; that is Chaney's report.

The CHAIRMAN. As to what he learned from Lawrence?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Chaney's statement was corroborative, then, of what you had learned by general rumor and report concerning Lawrence's statement?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir; and on the examining trial, why, Lawrence admitted to that statement, too, which the court records at Brownsville, of the Federal court, will show, before United States Commissioner Goodrich.

The CHAIRMAN. What became of Lawrence?

Mr. MAYFIELD. He was placed on trial and I don't know what disposition has been made of the case since.

The CHAIRMAN. In the examining trial he admitted that he made these statements here?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. As reported to you by Chaney?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. To the effect that there were officers on the other side and men—he was a German citizen, wasn't he?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir. That they had German officers.

The CHAIRMAN (reading):

That they have men and officers on the other side training the troops. We can blow up these river pumps whenever we like, because we can come over here; we won't leave here, but will join them here. We have already blown up a bunch of ships in New York Bay. We are going to win this war. We will show the God damned bone heads who we are. Gen. G. has more sense than all the Americans have.

Do you know whom he meant by "Gen. G."; did he explain that?

Mr. MAYFIELD. He told me, but I didn't—General—I don't remember now; it was some German general—he explained it on the examining trial, but I don't remember it now.

The CHAIRMAN (reading):

You are helping out the Red Cross, but I helped them the first time they came around, but I'll never have any more money to help them with. And he said the Government was assuming the food situation; a poor institution for the working man at home. * * * There are not a half a million men going over there, for the German submarines have got at least half of them.

Where was this man Lawrence operating?

Mr. MAYFIELD. He owned a little piece of property on what is known as the Alamo tract or Alamo subdivision, in Hidalgo County.

The CHAIRMAN (reading):

And he stated that they—

The Germans—

had German spies in San Juan and McAllen, Tex.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And all over the country?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And he made this corroborating statement?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir; to Capt. Stevens, and also to Judge Goodrich.

The CHAIRMAN. He was living near the border—

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir; within 8 miles of the border.

The CHAIRMAN (continuing). Where he could come in contact with the Mexican bandits and others?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all. Thank you.

The committee will now go into executive session, and after the executive session is over, the committee will be in recess until tomorrow until half past 10.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 24, 1920.

SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
UNITED STATES SENATE.

The subcommittee met pursuant to the call of the chairman at 2.30 o'clock p. m., in the pink room of the Gunter Hotel, in San Antonio, Tex., Senator A. B. Fall presiding.

Present: Senators Fall (chairman), Smith; and Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee have no other witnesses to examine, I believe, but I think that possibly there is some gentleman who desires to make a statement before the committee, and who has so notified the secretary or special agent for the committee, and we would be glad to hear him now.

Mr. JACKSON. Gentlemen, is there anybody who desires to make a statement before the committee?

TESTIMONY OF JAMES W. SULLIVAN.

The CHAIRMAN. If you desire to make a statement, you can make it provided it is pertinent. You understand, Mr. Sullivan, what this committee is doing, and under what instructions it is acting, do you?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No; I do not, Senator—you are Senator Fall?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; and this is Senator Smith.

Mr. SULLIVAN. No; I couldn't say I exactly know the instructions the committee have got at all. All I know is through the newspapers. I know this committee are here for the purpose of holding an investigation to find, out as I understand, conditions in Mexico; and after a number of days going over the matter, I thought, as I was a property holder in Mexico and have lived there for a long number of years, something over 20 years, and knew the country pretty well, that I wrote here to the House Rules Committee in August, I believe it was, a letter in regard to my views on the situation down there, and I thought I would come to express those view to this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the committee will be very glad to hear any views, and your views as to what particular point.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Well, in regard to—did Mr. Hanson give you the article?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I have it here, a copy of the San Antonio Light of August 17, 1919, containing an article or referring to and embracing, I believe, a letter from you directed to the House Committee on Rules with reference to Mexican matters, headed, it says, "Certain interests seek intervention," and I believe this contains your—

Mr. SULLIVAN. Yes, sir. Well, the—

The CHAIRMAN. Now, if you have any information upon any facts showing that any interests in the United States are seeking intervention—you referred to armed intervention, war with Mexico—if you have any statement to make concerning that, based upon the facts within your knowledge, we would be glad to hear you, and of course there may be 1 or 10,000,000 theories about Mexican matters. We would not have time to hear the theories, but anything based upon facts we would be glad to hear you.

Mr. SULLIVAN. That is exactly the idea. In my communication it looked as though that time intervention was a very serious matter; things were at a white heat.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your conception of intervention?

Mr. SULLIVAN. I thought we were going to have armed intervention in Mexico, and my object was to avert, if possible, armed intervention. I realize, which we all do, that there has been a great many atrocities committed during the revolution in Mexico, and I realize, furthermore, that the people in this country, and there as well, of the better class and those who understood could not help but sympathize with whoever were unfortunate enough to meet with those calamities. They were horrible things, and I believe the Mexican people themselves are very sorry to see such things ever take place. And I thought going down the line over the matter, as these things were beginning to grow very rapidly, intervention looked for a while as though it was going to take place, that there was another remedy which possibly could be adopted for the welfare of Mexico and the foreigners and Americans and all those who had interests in the country; that there was another method that could be pursued to fetch about peace down there instead of armed intervention, because it looked to me, from my experience, that the Mexican people are a proud people and are very resentful of anything that would in any way jeopardize their sovereignty.

Now, I thought if we could overcome the enormous expense, etc., which would be coupled with it by giving the present administration of Mexico—and I wish to state specifically I have no friendship whatever with any government in Mexico or any of their people so far as Mr. Carranza is concerned; I have never met the man, I don't believe there is a man in the Carranza Government to-day I know personally. When the first trouble broke out I was very much in favor of the Diaz people. I want to see peace. I knew what the results would be, because Madero was a friend of mine; I used to buy his cotton seed in former years. I regretted to see that step taken at that time. I was for anything to keep things harmonized and keep Diaz's administration in office was my theory. It looks to me—I am not thoroughly posted in these things, I am taking it from a humanitarian point of view. As it looked to me afterwards, when Huerta was turned down by our Government, De la Barra was also eliminated from the field, Carranza was put in office, and it is generally understood by we people of the United States that he was sustained by President Wilson, he was established as the established Government of Mexico, and I believe upon that theory, if such was the case, that the Government in all due justice should be given a fair chance. I believe the man should have been given a fair chance, in my argument there with the house rules committee, if they needed financial assistance in Mexico, that we authorize the stated Government as it is to-day, should have been given that assistance to the extent of allowing them to reestablish their railroads and their military forces in to fetch about peace, which is two of the essential things in any country, which is necessary to fetch about peace. You must have railroads and you must have military force to do so. I thought Carranza would be able to do that along them lines if he was given the necessary moral and financial aid from this country, as it was our next door neighbor, and as we had loaned millions of money and billions of money to foreign European countries that are far away. It seemed to me the great rich country she is, her assets, her wonderful natural resources, there would be no chance whatever as I could see of running a risk in lending money. I thought Mexico was a nation that was able to settle an enormous debt. I also laid stress upon the matter that I thought that it looked to me from what I could find from the daily newspapers, which was a great deal of my source of information in regard to certain things, in regard to ammunition runners, the smugglers of ammunition, and the supplying of the discontented factions from this side with all of the necessary and sinews of war to carry on all these revolutions and banditry that was going on down there, and harrassing the stated Government. That is the principal contention, Senator, which I have been taking. Now, whether I am right, I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, now, upon what information, in your position, do you base your statements, for instance, as to furnishing arms and munitions and supplies necessary to the revolutionists against the stated Government?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Through the public press, principally, and through the observation which I had through the public press.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not endeavor to ascertain officially?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No, sir; I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, can you recall, Mr. Sullivan, any statement, any particular statement with reference to our furnishing or allowing to be furnished, supplies and arms and ammunition to the revolutionists?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Well, I couldn't say that I know of any particular statement outside of what I would see from day to day, or more or less, through the different weeks I have stated, in the San Antonio public press, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Including approximately what dates?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Well, that would be along about, oh, that would be ever since the time of the Madero revolution up to a short time ago; I have noticed in the last few months—five or six months, maybe—I might say that there seems to be somewhat of an energetic move by the Department of Justice in this country, or some of the departments of the Government, in regard to those classes of disorderly gun-runners, and so on. There seems to be a more energetic accord to what the press will say to the action taken in running down and putting an end to that class of traffic which I am very glad to see.

Senator SMITH. Do you know of any specific instance where the United States Government has permitted or encouraged the furnishing of arms to any rebellion against the Carranza Government?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No; I can't say that I know of the Government.

Senator SMITH. Do you know of any specific instance, then, where the Government is at fault in the matters of which you complain?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No, sir; not the Government. It is only through the smugglers, you know, and through those underhanded methods of getting stuff across the border.

Senator SMITH. How long have you lived in Mexico?

Mr. SULLIVAN. About 20 years, 1888 up until the forepart of 1910.

Senator SMITH. Whereabouts?

Mr. SULLIVAN. I lived in Gomez Palacio, State of Durango, about 15 years, and then in Torreon, Coahuila, about 5 years.

Senator SMITH. What first took you to Mexico?

Mr. SULLIVAN. I went there in the interests of the cotton seed oil mills and soap factories, that is the line I have been in in Mexico exclusively, altogether.

Senator SMITH. Ever since?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Yes, sir. When I moved out of there—I have been out for some few years, but I made a little money, like some of them did, because the field was ripe, you know, the field was new in supply, and being an expert on those lines myself, the people that I was connected with, Mr. Belden of Monterrey, and the Terrazas, of Chihuahua City—Mr. Belden of Monterrey, and the Terrazas people of Chihuahua—so I made a little money, and I invested down there in properties, like a great many people, a part of my savings, etc., and they are there to-day, and I feel the effects very much, as well as other people, notwithstanding my great desire was to see if we could not do something to give the present people an opportunity to re-establish peace.

Senator SMITH. I understand you had property there and that you desired, like everybody else in any country, having an interest in it either financially or a moral, psychological interest, that you wanted peace in the country?

Mr. SULLIVAN. That is, of course, what all law-abiding citizens naturally should want.

Senator SMITH. You naturally feel that. And your property is still there?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. What is it?

Mr. SULLIVAN. It is real estate.

Senator SMITH. Is it city or country?

Mr. SULLIVAN. City property at the present time. I have had some properties, had stock in some of the companies, I had some stock in an oil company but I disposed of that years ago.

Senator SMITH. Why did you leave Mexico?

Mr. SULLIVAN. I was getting up in years, and I had a family of small children on my hands, and I thought San Antonio was a good place to take them. I was manager of the Lowe Union Works, in Durango, and superintendent 15 years of another works in Gomez. I moved here for the purpose of educating my children. I looked upon it in as bright a light as I could, wanted it fair and square, and

I would like to see, as I stated, my idea was, after Mr. Wilson, as I understood it, had recognized the Carranza government, I believe in giving him a chance to do what they could in order to reestablish peace in Mexico. I think that Carranza, personally——

Senator SMITH. I think we all coincide with you in that.

Mr. SULLIVAN. I think Carranza, personally, is a man of undoubted patriotic character; of a high ideal.

Senator SMITH. You do not know him personally?

Mr. SULLIVAN. You will understand that——

Senator SMITH. Then you do not know him personally?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Only to see him; I have never spoken to him.

Senator SMITH. Your opinion of Mr. Carranza's character is not a matter for the committee to take much note of.

The CHAIRMAN. I, as one of the members, would be very glad to have it.

Senator SMITH. You will pardon me, mine was merely to get an insight into your relations there, and how long you had been there, and the purpose of your leaving, and I intruded on my colleague's examination for the purpose of gratifying my own curiosity in that particular.

The CHAIRMAN. And your colleague is under obligations to you.

Mr. SULLIVAN. I desire to state, Mr. Fall, I have known of Mr. Fall for a great number of years, in Mexico, I knew his brother Phil, a very fine boy in those days, I have not seen him for a long number of years, he was a very good friend of mine in Chihuahua, I have not seen him for a great many years, I have some very pleasant recollections of him, however.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Sullivan, this committee of course proceeds upon the theory that every man who appears before it, is either under subpoena, or voluntarily, and we are glad to have all who may help us in our investigation, particularly when we proceed upon the theory that every man is in perfect good faith, and in the questions which may be propounded to you—which already have been propounded and which may be propounded to you, we are proceeding upon the good faith and upon the assumption that you are in perfectly good faith.

Mr. SULLIVAN. I hope to be; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. At times it may appear that the committee is rather resentful of some intimations that the committee may not be proceeding in good faith. Now, you do not know then that upon the declination, the official declination of President Wilson to recognize the Huerta government, that he issued a proclamation prohibiting the exportation of arms and ammunition to that government?

Mr. SULLIVAN. I have read, Senator, on, I think, several times where there has been orders issued by some of the departments of the Government, I don't know whether it was Mr. Wilson or not, where the prohibition of the importation of arms to Mexico had been prohibited.

The CHAIRMAN. I mean to Huerta?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Huerta government?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know at that time, that by the same proclamation and orders issued to the military and other authorities that this Government allowed arms and ammunition to go across the border to Carranza and his revolutionary forces?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Well; I could not just exactly say, but I am under the impression they did allow them to go across.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, have you ever heard of any order allowing arms and ammunition to go to Mexico since October 19, 1915?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Well; since October, 1915, that is a different government.

The CHAIRMAN. That was, this date Mr. Carranza was notified he would likely be recognized by this Government as the de facto chief of Mexico.

Mr. SULLIVAN. No; I couldn't say—that is, as coming from the Government I couldn't say.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, it is not my purpose to go into details, but I may inform you that it is a matter of record which you can easily ascertain from the offices here, the collector of the port, and Army Intelligence, and others here in San Antonio, that the policy of this Government generally, until very recently, has been to allow Mr. Carranza, at least from time to time, to secure arms and munitions and supplies, necessary supplies, from across the border, from this country, but has universally and absolutely deprived any one else in Mexico of such facilities; that the Government has in fact assisted up until recent date Mr. Carranza in securing arms and munitions and necessary supplies, and has prohibited the exportation of arms and ammunition or necessary supplies to any one in revolution against Mr. Carranza.

Mr. SULLIVAN. The Government has done that?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; that is a matter of public record you can ascertain from the Army officials, intelligence department, the customs officers, collector of port, and other officials.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Of course, that wasn't my contention, Senator. The idea was this: As I say, there was a great deal of lawlessness on both sides among the irresponsible classes on both sides of the river, trafficking in ammunition and supplies of that sort. My idea was that the Government ought to use more vigilance, more strenuous laws, even though it would cause possibly a struggle.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what military forces the Government of the United States has maintained along this border now for years, and is maintaining at present?

Mr. SULLIVAN. I couldn't say, Senator. I know at the present moment it has considerable; to what extent I don't know, but at the present moment it is considerable. A few years ago, though, I don't think it was very strong.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what instructions the military authorities and the military forces along this border have had from this Government with reference to the exportation of arms and munitions?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No; I am not posted on that.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any idea what the cost has been, the approximate cost of the maintenance of the military forces along this border, to this Government?

Mr. SULLIVAN. I presume it is very heavy.

The CHAIRMAN. What would be your guess about the amount?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Well, I presume it would be, along the border, it would be probably a couple of million dollars a year.

The CHAIRMAN. And that in, say, five years, $2,000,000 a year, would amount to about $10,000,000.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Yes, sir; it would.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you be surprised if you were informed now that from as accurate sources as we have been able to reach, I mean governmental records, that the cost has been $1,500,000,000 to the taxpayers of the United States?

Mr. SULLIVAN. To maintain the force on the frontier?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SULLIVAN. In 10 years, did you say?

The CHAIRMAN. During the revolution, since we first placed the forces here.

Mr. SULLIVAN. How much was that?

The CHAIRMAN. One billion and a half, approximately $1,500,000,000, which the people, the taxpayers, of the United States had to pay.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Well, that is a pretty good sum.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, provided the purpose was largely, in addition to protecting our citizens from raids across the border, was largely to prohibit the very things which you have referred to—that is, aid and assistance going to the revolutionary forces in Mexico—if that was the purpose, would you not consider that rather a substantial contribution by Mr. Wilson to the Carranza government?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Well, that would be, in that light, it would be a very strong effort indeed to overcome the troubles.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Sullivan, I think that I stated to you that you can ascertain these facts from the records and from the border. I think possibly Gen. Dickman and Gen. Howard at El Paso might give you some information. I have reason to think that they would not hesitate to give you any reasonable information along those lines, and that the collector of the port here, and other officials, would be glad to give you information which would possibly correct some of the impressions under which you were laboring when you wrote this letter.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Of course, as I say, the idea of mine was to eliminate those troubles, if there was some legitimate way to do it, because I believed that the Mexican people themselves, as I stated, are a proud people, and that they would resent any move, you know.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your idea about the American people do you think they have any pride?

Mr. SULLIVAN. They generally always had quite a lot of pride. I mean—I was figuring on, as I stated in my article, about the intervention, that the San Diego raids down here and those border raids, I believe, was along about the time our soldiers went into Mexico at Vera Cruz, and I believe the people in that country at the time were strongly of the impression that their country was going to be grabbed from them; they naturally flew to pieces and thought possibly that the aid of a lot of ambitious malcontents helped to urge them along.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us see whether your opinion is correct. Do you remember the date of the landing at Vera Cruz?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No; I don't, Senator, just exactly. I can't say I do remember the date; I never kept much track of dates of things.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you be surprised to know that it was approximately a year before the first raids or before the plan of San Diego was mentioned?

Mr. SULLIVAN. That our soldiers went to Vera Cruz?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. SULLIVAN. I thought it was along about that time.

The CHAIRMAN. You were writing in August about the conditions, the constant improvement of conditions in Mexico, and you learned of Mexico largely around Torreon, your experience there?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was your information as to the general conditions in and around Torreon and the district north of Torreon and accessible to Torreon by the railroad at that time and a few months prior thereto, as to law and order and as to improvements in conditions?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Prior to—

The CHAIRMAN. Before your letter here in August?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Oh, I see, in August, well along about that time, that would be the last of August, conditions in that laguna country, from all the sources of information I could find through our daily press of here and persons I saw coming out of Mexico, some of my American friends, things were picking up rapidly, and the dependency seemed to be among the best people that conditions were readjusting themselves very rapidly; in fact, they were anxious to see them readjusted; people were more than anxious; it was on their minds to help them along, to see that the readjustments were made, that was along the latter part of July, and there was some, a couple of my friends were up here; Mr. Fletcher, from Torreon; he is in Torreon now in the lumber business, I believe, and he spoke of things picking up very well.

The CHAIRMAN. And it was upon such information that you so stated in your letter to the House committee?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know, or did you know at that time, the American consul at Torreon?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No; I don't know him, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know the acting consul, consular agent at Torreon in the absence of the American consul?

Mr. SULLIVAN. The only one there that was important—that was George Carruthers.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; he was consular agent prior to the Madero régime.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know Mr. Lathrop, the American vice consul?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No, sir; I didn't know him.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know it was the custom of the Federal agents of the American Government in Mexico to report directly to the State Department at regular periods as to the conditions in their district?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Well, I presume it is.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Sullivan, here is the point: You have given your impression upon the information coming to you and you have sent it directly to the committee of the House, in Congress—the Rules Committee—which at that time was conducting certain hearings. Now, suppose that the departments of the Government and the House committee had information officially that led them to believe that the statements you made were possibly, of course, made in good faith, but were possibly made without understanding exactly the circumstances, then you would not criticize the House committee for not inviting you before them?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No; naturally I couldn't.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, I want to call your attention to the report from Mr. Lathrop, the American vice consul at Torreon, Coahuila, Mexico, of June 23, 1919, from the American consulate, made to the honorable the Secretary of State, Washington, D. C., who, as you know, is Mr. Lansing, speaking of the political conditions in the Torreon district. As I say, we presume the good faith of everyone coming before the committee and certainly we presume good faith of the American officials—naturally that seems to be in the minds of some people a very violent presumption—this committee still has the temerity to engage in it. I am only going to call your attention to some of the portions of this letter, and some others I am not; ordinarily I would not make public the report at all.

In the northern part of the State of Zacatecas—

there is only two American properties of note. One a mining property at Chalchihuites and the other a large ranch of the Continental Mexican Rubber Co., located at Cedros. Both of these properties have been raided several times within this year and the latter company has repeatedly requested that the Mexican Government afford at least a degree of protection. So far only many unfulfilled promises have been made. The topography of this State is very much like that of Durango. The banditti in this State have been very active recently, they having approached to about 40 miles south of Torreon, where they have succeeded in cutting the railroad line between here and Mexico City twice within the month.

The consulate does not consider that Torreon is in any immediate danger; and even in the case of an attack it believes that the Americans could be easily transported to points of safety, owing to the many lines of transportation that concentrate at this point. The great danger in Torreon is that any American venturing on the streets at night is subjected to the worst of insults and possible physical harm at the hands of any armed Mexican made bold by a good charge of "tequila." With reference to conditions in Torreon, reference is respectfully made to dispatch No. 85, dated April 27, from this office, and as a result of the Juarez incident it must be said that conditions have been aggravated.

A résumé may be stated in a few words: That the conditions under which Americans are laboring in this consular district are worse than they have been since 1915. The position held by American women at present in this district is respectfully recommended to the department's most earnest consideration.

The average Carrancista, from the grade of major general down, is extremely ignorant and probably more than 95 per cent of the present army are illiterate; and this ignorance is more than equaled by their proverbial cowardice, which is, perhaps, unequaled in the world. This is perhaps better proven by the consistency with which they avoid danger. No Carrancista officer ever thinks of wearing his uniform when traveling, except upon a military train. The present Government claims to have 21,000 men in the State of Chihuahua at present, a greater part of which are to be used against Villa, and the greatest proof of their cowardice is the fact that Villa is still alive and very active and his consistent successes at each and every point at which he strikes. The con-sulate has had exceptional opportunity to observe the troop movements north since the revival of Villa's activity in the north, and this coupled with other sources of information would tend to show that there are at present only about 0,000 men bearing arms. These forces are composed of very old men and very young boys and are very low in morale. They are not serving in the army from any act of patriotism, but only because their laziness and ignorance bars them from any other line of endeavor in which they might earn an existence. This all points to the fact that no matter what guard may be stationed at any point it would not afford any commensurate degree of safety for Americans that might be resident at that point.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,

ED LATHROP,
American Vice Consul in Charge.

Now, you had no idea that the Government of the United States was receiving such official reports as this when you wrote this letter to the committee, had you?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No, sir; I didn't have any idea of that, Senator. It was only written from this which I got from those that were coming out, some of my friends that were there in business.

The CHAIRMAN. And they are still there?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Yes; they are still there.

The CHAIRMAN. And you find every American who comes out of Mexico, who is doing business in Mexico, is inclined either to suppress the facts, or to put as good face upon it as possible, isn't that your experience?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Of course, naturally a man would want to.

The CHAIRMAN. I hope the committee have not jeopardized the safety of the acting consul, as the safety of one who has recently been jeopardized in Mexico, by giving his official report to the committee. Matters are being possibly expressed on the one hand by the committee and other matters may be exaggerated before the committee; that is our only excuse. Now, Mr. Sullivan, you don't—with reference to de la Barra, you stated that Huerta had been eliminated and de la Barra also eliminated. You don't mean to say that the Government of the United States had anything to do with the elimination of de la Barra?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Nor aid in the revolution?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. He simply by common consent of Madero and his associates and the other Mexicans, was president ad interim, from the abdication of Diaz until the subsequent election and inauguration of Madero?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Of Madero; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, then, in view of what has been stated to you here, and of your own statements, did you not think that this Government has given Mr. Carranza a fair chance in Mexico?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Well, Senator, you know I would not be in a position to say that right now, I want to be fair about it.

The CHAIRMAN. And positive, of course?

Mr. SULLIVAN. And positive. All my desires in the world was that the stated government as it exists to-day would be given every facility to make good. If they could not make good, then it was time to take action in order to overcome every other trouble and every other delusion—if there was any possibility to get things readjusted.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you have said that in your judgment Mr. Carranza was a patriotic man and was a man of high ideals?

Mr. SULLIVAN. From all that I ever saw through the papers in regard to his utterances, a man of his age and a man of his experience, and what I have seen, certain statements he made, or written or said in the newspapers, led me to believe Mr. Carranza was a man of a serious nature; a man, I believed—I thought at the time he was a man you could approach if you had a case, if you were unjustly treated, he was a man who would give you every fair consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, do you not think that that character of man would feel some degree of gratitude to the country which had through its expenditure of blood, and at Vera Cruz, through its expenditure of millions of dollars, through its expenditure of a billion and a half in first getting him in and recognizing him in the office he held as President, then keeping him there at an enormous expense to themselves, do you not think a man of the character whom you mentioned would have some little feeling of gratitude to the people of this country, or at least, to the President of this country?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Naturally, I should think so.

The CHAIRMAN. What would you think if you knew that that man was now and had been persistently engaged in the effort in his own country, and particularly throughout other Latin-American countries, persistently engaged in an effort to make those people look with contempt upon the President of the United States, the man who placed him in office?

Mr. SULLIVAN. It doesn't hardly look reasonable.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you accept Mr. Carranza's denial that he had been engaged in such efforts, in the face of the statements of this committee that they have official, accurate, photostatic, photographic copies and originals of Mr. Carranza's letters to that effect?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Well, recognized by Mr. Carranza, you say, himself?

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir; I say, if he denied that we had such evidence, will you accept his denial rather than the statement of this committee that they have in their possession, and the departments of this Government have in their possession, such evidence as I have stated?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Well, I hardly know how to proceed upon that; that is a kind of a complicated question with me.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, that has been a matter of publicity, also, Mr. Sullivan; for example, one of the Mexico City daily papers has within the last 30 days called upon Mr. Carranza to make denials of the authenticity of a letter which I am going to read to you, which is one of the letters along the line that I have discussed with you.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In so far as this committee is informed, Mr. Berlanga shrugged his shoulders, and the question was then propounded by the paper directly to Miss Hermila Galindo, to know whether the letter I am going to read to you was authentic. [Reading:]

MEXICO, D. F., June 29, 1919.

MISS HERMILA GALINDO,

Ignacio Ramirez Street, No. 6, City.

ESTEEMED YOUNG LADY: It is necessary that your book, The Carranza Doctrine, be finished in a short time, since I desire that you immediately proceed to write a second part of it, for which purpose I shall shortly send you a Blue-book, which we are about to publish, and which will serve to justify the attitude of my Government in its systematic hostility toward foreign speculators, especially Americans and English.

Do not forget my injunction to describe in lively colors the tortuosity of the American policy with relation to our country, causing the figure of Wilson to stand well out as the director of that policy. I also enjoin you to be very careful about the corrections which I have made in the original (manuscript) which you brought me.

I salute you affectionately,

V. CARRANZA.

Do you not think that is an evidence of the proper meaning or feeling from Mr. Carranza to Mr. Wilson?

Mr. SULLIVAN. It doesn't hardly seem possible that Carranza would be so indiscreet.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you would only criticize him for his indiscretion and not for the sentiment he uses?

Mr. SULLIVAN. It looks to me impossible for him to be so indiscreet, for him to write an article of that kind, in view of the fact that he would be writing it against a power like ourselves; it would only be a breakfast for our country; you see, of course, Mexico is only a child; it wouldn't be a baby.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you think there might be some reasonable doubt as to the authenticity?

Mr. SULLIVAN. I wouldn't want to state on that.

The CHAIRMAN. I may say to you, sir, positively, from my own information, that the President of the United States has no doubt of the authenticity of the letter—he has received it—he knows it. I am not going to call your attention at this time to other letters along the line, but I may say to you, sir, that this blue book which Mr. Carranza refers to, is in the possession of the committee, although when transmitting it to Miss Galindo he states it must not go out of her hands, and it is only for very private circulation. That blue book was for anti-American doctrines in so far as to justify his action in all matters, and showing he is the one man in Latin America who stands against the United States Government and dares to offer them only affronteries of every character between this Government and his Government. He has successfully pulled the wool over the eyes of the Mexicans. That is the general purpose of it. I may say to you, sir, that this letter is only one of a series, the authenticity of which you, nor no other man could doubt at all, if you are an American; you would be simply taking the bare word of the writer, of the letter, or those receiving it, as against the absolute, uncontrollable record facts.

You left Mexico at the time of the outbreak of the Madero troubles?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You took out what money you could get, sold your stocks and what property you could, and left your real estate and came out?

Mr. SULLIVAN. In fact, I left most of it down there. I have got my home here in San Antonio.

The CHAIRMAN. You left your real estate?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You state you made money there, and sold your stocks and other property, sold all but your real estate?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You left that there?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You came out with the balance?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You haven't returned to live there since that?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know the Mexican Consul here?

Mr. SULLIVAN. I called on him in July or August at the time I wrote this thing, to ask him for certain information in regard to it.

The CHAIRMAN. You haven't seen him since?

Mr. SULLIVAN. I saw him a few days ago, I called on him again.

The CHAIRMAN. Just a very few days ago?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have a conversation with him at that time with reference to what this committee was doing?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Didn't mention the committee, or the effect of the committee's work?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he mention to you at that time his impression that this committee was attempting to suppress facts with reference to Mexico in its investigation?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No, sir; he didn't, Senator; he never even mentioned the committee. When I called on him some days ago it was in connection with this earthquake in Vera Cruz, oh, several days after the earthquake took place. There didn't seem to be any action, and I thought it was a sort of a humane act to make contributions to those more unfortunate down there, and I called upon him and asked him what his opinion was, and he said it was all right, and he said in his official capacity he couldn't take any action.

The CHAIRMAN. You had then no conversation with him in which either you or he or any of his employees or anyone else in the presence of the two of you mentioned or discussed the fact that the San Antonio Express, and the San Antonio Light, or the San Antonio papers here might be interested in their publication of news by the activities of this committee in any way?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No, sir; never mentioned anything like that whatever at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you say that Mexico, in your judgment, could repay the United States any amount of money, reasonable amount, which we might advance to Mexico for her financial recuperation?

Mr. SULLIVAN. In this way, I say that under the—through the constituted government of that country, and through the federal rights, through their federal mineral rights, as per their constitution, I understand the old constitution and the new—they could give a guarantee for the redemption of the money they would borrow.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; about how much guarantee do you think they could give?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Well, it would all depend, of course, upon the natural resources of the country, just as you might—

The CHAIRMAN. You must have, in view of this statement, you must have some idea of the national debt which Mexico could assume and upon which it could pay interest, and for the final repayment of which it could use a sinking fund out of which it could be paid.

Mr. SULLIVAN. It possibly could, but other than what I would figure—I was under the impression that $500,000,000 would be amply sufficient to cover the requirements to do the work that could be done, if it was done.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think that would be about the amount Mexico could reasonably assume and pay?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you happen to know what the present external debt of Mexico is?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No; I couldn't say; I think it is about five or six hundred millions, maybe seven hundred millions.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, she is about up to her limit, isn't she, without five hundred millions additional?

Mr. SULLIVAN. I am figuring upon the natural resources over and above that, what the indemnities would be to persons—

The CHAIRMAN. I am not referring to indemnities at all; I have not mentioned indemnities.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Oh, I thought you were referring to that; that is what I was determining my estimate on—was about five hundred millions over her present obligations.

The CHAIRMAN. Five hundred millions in addition?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, you would say, in your judgment, Mexico could assume and discharge an indebtedness of over a billion dollars?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You haven't read the hearings before this committee, have you, as they have been printed and sent out?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You have never had your attention called to the testimony of Mr. Lill, who was the financial expert, testifying that he went to Mexico and audited the books and established a system of auditing which has been in force up to a short time since—went there from the United States for that purpose?

Mr. SULLIVAN. For the Government there?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SULLIVAN. No, sir; I have not. I did see a short time ago—about a week or 10 days ago I saw in the evening paper here, I believe, there was some auditor sent from Washington, or some place in the country, was down in Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. You didn't read his testimony?

Mr. SULLIVAN. I didn't read it.

The CHAIRMAN. You might secure it easily enough by writing to Washington, a copy of all of these hearings, including a copy of Mr. Lill's testimony upon that subject.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Who could I get that from?

The CHAIRMAN. By sending to my office at Washington, D. C.

Mr. SULLIVAN. No; the only thing was I say, was simply to try to give everybody a square deal, those who have suffered and everybody else.

The CHAIRMAN. Presuming, of course, as we do, that your statement is entirely correct, upon what do you found, upon what information do you found your assertion, as contained in this letter, of certain special interests in the United States seeking to bring about armed intervention and war with Mexico?

Mr. SULLIVAN. That was from the general talk among what you hear on the street, from Mexicans and Americans and everybody alike, the prevailing impression was that it was the oil interests, the Tampico oil interests, it was desirous to fetch about a condition there of intervention in order to eliminate a great amount of their taxes, I presume, or to get control of more territory, under the general assumption that the oil companies were the ones that were agitating the intervention question.

The CHAIRMAN. You state that is your information upon that subject, was from street talk?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Yes, sir; it is generally.

The CHAIRMAN. In your letter to the Committee on Rules you set out the fact, "I have seen some agitation started for some interests in the United States, and that your honorable committee is now making an investigation in reference thereto, in regard to conditions in Mexico." Then you go on to speak of special interests who desire intervention in Mexico. Now, it is just upon such information that you base your statement?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And nothing else?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Nothing else.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to say to you, Mr. Sullivan, the committee expect to leave here to-night. We proceed to El Paso, where we will stop and resume our hearings within three or four days; that we expect to proceed from El Paso to other points along the international border before returning to Washington.

The committee will be under everlasting obligations to you if you will furnish them with any information of any kind, not street talk, but any possible information which may lead to any special interests or interest of any kind, oil or otherwise, who are agitating or seeking to have the people of the United States to intervene with armed force in Mexico for their special benefit. Now, you can reach us at any time, and if we have departed from the border, you can reach us at any time in Washington, and if you can get any such information as that I assure you it will be welcome and treated with exactly the same respect and in exactly the same way as any information to the contrary.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Well, anything that I can possibly find I shall be only too pleased to advise you at your office in Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to ask you, having heard read the instructions under which this committee is acting, residing in San Antonio, having obtained the knowledge in Mexico which you have obtained during the last 12 years, from reading the papers, presumably having read the reports, the papers containing the activities of this committee, do you think that the committee is exceeding in any way its authority?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No, no, no; I think the committee, as a committee, is along legitimate lines.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think the committee is proceeding along the lines—along proper lines; have you heard of the committee attempting to suppress or refusing any testimony which has been offered?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No; none whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think that the committee has displayed any prejudice or bias in its hearings in any way?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Not with me they have not.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you—

Mr. SULLIVAN (interrupting). Not with anybody.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you gather from the press that the committee has been proceeding fairly and impartially under their instructions?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No, sir; that is all right.

Senator SMITH. There is a question or two that I want to ask. I am speaking now from knowledge. Do you know of any act of our Government at any time or place that was calculated to be or was in aid of any rebellion against the Carranza Government?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No; I could not say that, Senator. I haven't—as I just stated to Senator Fall—I have no knowledge whether the Government has done anything like that whatsoever.

Senator SMITH. Do you know of any particular case where the Government of the United States has failed to aid the Carranza Government in establishing and maintaining law and order?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No; I couldn't say that I know of any case where they have failed to do it; I couldn't say that. My contention was in regard to using greater effort in order to overcome the smuggling of ammunition across.

Senator SMITH. Do you know whether or not steps have been taken by the Carranza government to forfeit these oil properties of which you speak, and the many of the American landed estates in the Republic of Mexico?

Mr. SULLIVAN. To forfeit those properties, you say?

Senator SMITH. Yes.

Mr. SULLIVAN. No; I could not say that I do. The only thing I saw in the papers was in regard to—the dispute seemed to always range along the question of taxation.

Senator SMITH. I don't care so much about the papers now; I am trying to get away from the reports of the newspapers, down to what you actually know. Do you know whether or not the Carranza government has issued certain orders under what they call article 27, and under the constitution it is tantamount to the absolute forfeiture of these American estates.

Mr. SULLIVAN. I saw something in print the other day; I believe was the first time I ever saw it.

Senator SMITH. Then, you knew of none of these acts after the action of our Government toward Mexico; you knew of none of the acts to which I have alluded on the part of Mexico showing any animosity against the United States, its citizens, or the purpose to confiscate the properties of American citizens?

Mr. SULLIVAN. I didn't catch that, quite, Senator.

Senator SMITH. Read it, Mr. Stenographer.

(Thereupon the reporter read the question, as follows:)

Senator SMITH. Then, you knew of none of these acts after the action of our Government toward Mexico; you knew of none of the acts to which I have alluded on the part of Mexico showing any animosity against the United States, its citizens, or the purpose to confiscate the properties of American citizens?

Mr. SULLIVAN. I have no knowledge, no official knowledge, of any attitude whatever.

Senator SMITH. That will do.

The CHAIRMAN. Just one other question touching your impression as to Mr. Carranza. I presume from your statement as to your judgment as to his high idealistic character and patriotic motives you believe that he led the revolution against Huerta purely from such motives?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You have not had your attention called to an official report as to his attitude, made on February 21, to the Department of State of the United States Government—made on the 21st day of February, 1913, by the official representative of the United States Government in Mexico, from Saltillo, to the Department of State with reference to his attitude toward Huerta?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Only what I saw in print in the last couple of weeks, that he was put in to get the recognition of the Huerta government, I believe; something to that effect.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you see what purported to be a copy of the telegram which I will now read to you, dated Saltillo, February 21, 1913; marked "Received February 22, 1.22 p. m."?

FEBRUARY 21—1 P. M.

SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, D. C.:

Gov. Carranza has just announced to me officially that he will conform with the new administration at Mexico City. All opposition here abandoned. Railroads will be opened at once. Perfect quiet prevails. Embassy advised.

HOLLAND.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mexico City?

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir; it is from Saltillo, where Mr. Carranza was at that time.

Mr. SULLIVAN. He was then governor of Coahuila, was he?

The CHAIRMAN. I just asked if you had had your attention called to this telegram in official report to the Department of State?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You have not had your attention called to a telegram, the original of which I have a copy; duplicate copy of which is in the possession of the committee; the translation of which reads as follows:

MARCH 1, 1913.

Received in Saltillo from Gov. V. Carranza. You are directed to advise us for what purpose you took 50,000 pesos from the bank, in view of the fact that this Government is not informed of this matter.

VICTORIANO HUERTA.

SALTILLO, February 22.

Mr. SULLIVAN. In Saltillo?

The CHAIRMAN. I want to ask whether, in view of these telegrams and the authenticity of these telegrams, whether you might not judge that the telegram of March 1 from Victoriano Huerta, calling Carranza to account for the 50,000 pesos which he took from the bank, possibly influenced him in adopting a different course from that which he assumed to the officials of the United States, from that which he had announced he would adopt?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Well, I don't know.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all.

TESTIMONY OF H. J. WALLIS.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what State are you a native, Mr. Wallis?

Mr. WALLIS. Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. Texas?

Mr. WALLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you in 1915?

Mr. WALLIS. I was on the train going to Brownsville.

The CHAIRMAN. And about what was the date of that trip of yours?

Mr. WALLIS. On the 18th day of October.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you recognize anyone else on the train at that time, Mr. Wallis?

Mr. WALLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Who were on the train with you?

Mr. WALLIS. A drummer by the name of Wright and John Kleiber, district attorney and Dr. McCain, and there were some more on there, but I can not recall their names that I know of.

The CHAIRMAN. Any soldiers there?

Mr. WALLIS. Yes, sir; three soldiers possibly; I heard their names since, but I did not know them personally at the time.

The CHAIRMAN. What, if anything, out of the ordinary, occurred on that train at that time?

Mr. WALLIS. Why, the bandits held it up and wrecked the engine, came in and robbed the passengers and killed some of them, killed Dr. McCain and a soldier, and the engineer was killed by the engine, and several wounded.

The CHAIRMAN. Anything happen to you?

Mr. WALLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What?

Mr. WALLIS. I was shot. I was hit five times.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any evidences of your wounds now?

Mr. WALLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What are they?

Mr. WALLIS. They shot one finger off here, broke my arm up here, shot me across this finger here, just a little flesh wound here where the bullet went across. He shot me twice in the leg.

The CHAIRMAN. The principal injury was in your left arm?

Mr. WALLIS. Yes, sir; you see I can't use it hardly.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the condition of it such now that it is practically useless to you?

Mr. WALLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you when you were shot?

Mr. WALLIS. When the first shots were fired, when the Mexicans came in and peeped in the door, I didn't see the Mexicans come to the door when the train stopped, and he came in, and he would jerk his head back again, and I was standing right straight in the aisle with this hand up on the seat [indicating] and this hand down by my side [indicating]. About the first shot that was fired when they came in, they hit this finger.

The CHAIRMAN. That was your left finger?

Mr. WALLIS. That was my left hand; yes, sir. Then three more fellows came in behind that fellow that rushed in the car; then they went to shooting, and two more fellows went to shooting at me, and one bullet went across this finger.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the middle right finger?

Mr. WALLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you armed?

Mr. WALLIS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you make any demonstration toward defending yourself in any way?

Mr. WALLIS. No, sir; I just asked the second fellow, I says, "Don't do this," I says, "we are friends, we have been friends." He was a Mexican that I knew.

The CHAIRMAN. You knew him.

Mr. WALLIS. Yes, sir. And he didn't pay any attention to me, and he hollered to the first fellow that was in front of him to look out for the soldiers. I fell down—then they shot this other fellow. There was two more fellows behind him, and they shot at me, and hit me in the leg.

The CHAIRMAN. That was your right leg?

Mr. WALLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you fell?

Mr. WALLIS. I fell and they went on over me. I laid down in the aisle and they went right on over me shooting at the soldier boys. A soldier was down on his knees in the aisle. As I looked back he had both hands up this way, and I saw him fall over.

The CHAIRMAN. Was this soldier armed?

Mr. WALLIS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Had neither rifle or side arms?

Mr. WALLIS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Were either of the other soldiers armed?

Mr. WALLIS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you see Dr. McCain?

Mr. WALLIS. Yes, sir; Dr. McCain and I was sitting together at first, and Dr. McCain got up and, I guess, went to the toilet, and when they went over me I jumped up and opened the door and gets into the toilet with him.

The CHAIRMAN. That was after you had been shot three or four times?

Mr. WALLIS. Yes, sir; this finger was shot off and this shot across here [indicating], and shot twice in the leg. And after they got through ransacking the train, I could hear them, in Spanish, you know, throwing the grips out and talking to themselves out there. They came back and knocked on this door, they had the door shut, and there was a Mexican boy in there standing upon the lavatory, and as he knocked again the door kind of opened, and there was a light shown in there on this Mexican and they saw this boy on the lavatory, he couldn't see Dr. McCain and myself, and he reached up and catches this Mexican boy in the collar, and says, "What are you doing?" He said, "I am a Mexican; I am a friend of yours." He says, "Well, what are you afraid of?" He says, "We are not looking for anybody but the Gringoes, the Americans," and the boy was scared, he was down on his knees then, and he says,

"Well, there is two behind the door." And I slammed the door to, and put the latch on with my right hand. Then he hit it again with the gun barrel and he couldn't knock it open. He fired two shots through the door, one hit Dr. McCain in the stomach and one hit me in the arm and broke my arm.

The CHAIRMAN. After robbing the train and doing this killing, wounding you and others, they left?

Mr. WALLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that is all, Mr. Wallis. Very much obliged to you.

The committee understand that this is all of the evidence which will be taken at the present hearing. Therefore the committee will take an adjournment subject to the call of the Chair.

(Thereupon, at 3.50 o'clock p. m. the committee adjourned to meet at the call of the chairman.)

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 14, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., January 14, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

TESTIMONY OF EDWARD FIELD HARVEY.

(The witness was sworn.)

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you please give your full name?

Mr. HARVEY. Edward Field Harvey.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your place of residence?

Mr. HARVEY. My temporary residence in the United States is Philadelphia.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your address in Philadelphia?

Mr. HARVEY. Susquehanna Road, Abington, Pa.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your citizenship?

Mr. HARVEY. I am a Newfoundlander; I am a British subject, born in Newfoundland, and residing on this side of the Atlantic.

Mr. KEARFUL. What opportunities have you had to study conditions in Mexico?

Mr. HARVEY. During the last 12 years I have spent about five years in Mexico, divided fairly evenly throughout the 12 years. The longest period I spent in Mexico was one year; the shortest period about three months.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what business were you engaged in Mexico?

Mr. HARVEY. My first interest in Mexico was in mining. That was in 1908 and 1909. I dropped that and went into plantation and lumber business and railroad building in the tropical country, in the State of Campeche.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the name of the company with which you are connected?

Mr. HARVEY. The Laguna Corporation, of Delaware.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what was the business of this company?

Mr. HARVEY. The business was the production of mahogany, chicle gum, rubber, cattle, and to some extent colonization.

Mr. KEARFUL. How many acres of land did this company have?

Mr. HARVEY. Approximately 650,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. About how many square miles would that be?

Mr. HARVEY. It is very nearly a thousand square miles; just about 1,000 square miles.

Mr. KEARFUL. How was this land held? By what sort of title?

Mr. HARVEY. It was purchased for cash from various owners, original titleholders who had come by their titles mainly through heredity, I think; at least some of our titles dated back to the original grants of land.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did the company hold absolute fee simple title?

Mr. HARVEY. Absolute fee simple, and the titles were all registered in Mexico. We have a carefully arranged schedule of titles.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you had occasion to observe the conditions existing under the different governments of Porfirio Diaz, Francisco Madero, Victoriano Huerta and Venustiano Carranza?

Mr. HARVEY. I think I have.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did you find conditions of the country as to economical and industrial situation in the time of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. HARVEY. Industrially the country was growing very rapidly, developing very rapidly. At the time that I was in Mexico it seemed that a very large industrial boom was beginning and there was a great deal of new capital coming in. There was an undercurrent of lack of confidence through the age of Porfirio Diaz and the knowledge that he was becoming rather weak. And the question was frequently asked what would happen after Diaz passed away, and it was expected that he would die; that he would not be driven out.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the attitude of the Mexicans toward Americans and other foreigners during that time?

Mr. HARVEY. Very favorable indeed. I think there was a great deal of respect and liking. What I saw of the relations were always pleasant. There was a good deal of friendship and good feeling. I heard at times of local jealousies and dislikes, but they never broke out at all, never showed themselves; and as far as my personal knowledge went I never saw anything that was not perfectly satisfactory. Sometimes Americans made themselves unpopular by being too aggressive. Mexicans do not like aggressiveness in their relations with other people. They like to conduct their business quietly. But otherwise everything was very satisfactory.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean aggressive in their business methods?

Mr. HARVEY. Yes; their business methods, and especially in their attitude toward the Mexican workman, that he did not do work enough; that he was slow and was not able to do the work they would expect Americans to do. On the other hand, there were a great many men, probably a large number of men, who understood the Mexicans, and who did not criticize them to that extent. But when that situation did arise it caused a good deal of bad feeling.

Mr. KEARFUL. I suppose you have heard, as we have often, that the Americans and other foreigners are not entitled to consideration on account of injuries they have suffered in Mexico because they were engaged in exploiting the Mexican people to their own benefit and to the detriment of those people. What do you say about that?

Mr. HARVEY. Well, to be frank, I should say it was nonsense.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you observe as to the effect upon Mexican people of the operations of foreign enterprise?

Mr. HARVEY. With the exception of some promotion projects which were in themselves unsound the general effect of American enterprise was to immensely improve the condition of the working people.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what way did it improve their condition?

Mr. HARVEY. Well, it tended to draw them away from the agricultural pursuits when they were working with their old Spanish and Mexican taskmasters, who kept them in a state of peonage and debt, and placed them in a position to earn wages which were paid them in cash and enabled them to realize the value of money and to expend their money and gave them that independence which regular wages always will give.

Mr. KEARFUL. And did this enable them to escape the system of peonage?

Mr. HARVEY. It did, and very large numbers escaped. In fact, peonage was not very rife except in the strictly agricultural districts. In the mining districts there was no peonage practically; in the municipalities there was practically no peonage; and in the industrial sections, cotton districts, there was no peonage. In my own case, when I first went to Mexico we had some peonage, but the first thing we did was to educate our people out of it. Many of them did not want to get out of it. They had inherited the idea of peonage and wanted to remain, but in the course of five or six years we had practically eliminated peonage. At the time Madero made his proclamation eliminating peonage we practically had none in our district at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember about how many workmen you had employed in your enterprises at that time?

Mr. HARVEY. We employed about 800. We had about 1,500 population altogether on our property. Our average was about 800 men.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say that the attitude of the Mexicans toward American operators was favorable during the time of Diaz. Did that continue through the régime of Madero?

Mr. HARVEY. That continued through the régime of Madero and in the early stages of the Madero Government there was a distinct effort made to eliminate some of the abuses that existed under the Diaz régime. There was a tendency to very arbitrary control of certain public utilities during the Diaz régime which Madero certainly made an effort to eliminate and I think did eliminate. I know in one or two cases where I myself had occasion to protest against arbitrary rulings from Mexico City. After Madero came to power a fair point of view was adopted and we got a better ruling.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the condition in the time of Huerta?

Mr. HARVEY. Practically the same attitude, as far as the liberal policy was concerned, was carried on by Huerta, which was initiated by Madero.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did this attitude change, if you noticed the change?

Mr. HARVEY. I can not say that the attitude did change. There was a change of friendliness toward foreigners.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is what I mean.

Mr. HARVEY. That began with the—or, the first sign of that was at the time of the occupation of Vera Cruz. That was the first outbreak.

Mr. KEARFUL. What, if any, effect did the general policy of the American administration in Mexican affairs have upon the attitude of Mexicans toward Americans?

Mr. HARVEY. During the time that Mr. Henry Lane Wilson was ambassador there the attitude was all that could be desired. There was a great deal of confidence felt by Mexicans in Mr. Wilson's steadying influence over the new Mexican administration, and I recall very distinctly the confidence that was felt at the time Huerta first accepted the presidency at the hands of the Mexican Congress. He was at the time, I think, not widely accused of Madero's death, and I never did think he had a great deal to do with it. I have reasons for believing that he did not have a great deal to do with that. But even if he had, it was more or less natural under existing conditions in Mexico that he had been brought up under. But he made a very striking address at the time he accepted the presidency before the Mexican Congress, which had been elected as a Congress under Madero, in which he gave his promise that he would call a general election as soon as the country had been pacified, and he called upon every member of that Congress to assist him in bringing about that condition. He stated categorically his own lack of confidence in his ability as a diplomat and statesman, and he asked to be relieved as soon as possible, and it was after that that he was unable to carry those policies out, owing to lack of support, I think, from outside, principally the United States, although all the foreign elements of all nationalities and all the educated Mexicans, as far as I have been able to find out, supported him very strongly.

Mr. KEARFUL. How about the diplomatic corps in Mexico City?

Mr. HARVEY. I understand that they were absolutely unanimously behind him and behind Henry Lane Wilson, and it was realized that Henry Lane Wilson had a very strong influence over Huerta. I also had opportunity of gauging that, and my contention is that had that combination remained in existence neither the Vera Cruz intervention or any of the subsequent horrible occurrences in Mexico would have occurred. I think Mexico would have been tied to the United States in bonds of friendship, and I think Mexico itself would have risen out of its trouble to a comparative state of civilization and sound democratic government.

Mr. KEARFUL. To what do you principally attribute the failure of Huerta to pacify the country?

Mr. HARVEY. Absolutely nonsupport by the United States and a rather antagonistic policy to him and the withdrawal of Henry Lane Wilson.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say nonsupport. Do you not mean interference?

Mr. HARVEY. And interference. And, of course, there was a great deal of what one might call personal baiting of Huerta which acted upon his temper very disadvantageously, and when Henry Lane Wilson's steadying influence was withdrawn the old man just got sulky and it was not possible to do anything with him; purely a natural and logical effect that would happen to any human being, I think, under the circumstances.

Mr. KEARFUL. To what do you principally attribute the success of the Carranza revolution?

Mr. HARVEY. The support of the United States and the antagonism that was shown to Huerta. That was the cause of his downfall. There is not any question about that.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the general feeling in Mexico at the time of the downfall of Madero and the accession of Huerta as to confidence in the pacification of the country and the permanency of the Government?

Mr. HARVEY. As far as I was able to catch the feeling toward the end of the Madero régime, amongst people outside of Mexico City, it was that Madero, as a practical administrator, was a complete failure and that some strong man would have to take his place; and it was only a question of time when someone would eliminate Madero. Then came the revolt of Felix Diaz at a time when Huerta was on leave in Mexico City, resting from his campaigns in the north, where he had been attempting to pacify the northern revolutionists for Madero. That condition in Mexico City was so terrible that he was approached by the best Mexicans and also by the best elements of the foreigners and asked to do something to put a stop to the trouble, and virtually he was, I think—I can say with certainty that it was not his own idea to do what he did in eliminating Madero, but it was forced upon him by the conditions in Mexico City, and at the request of those prominent foreigners and Mexicans who felt that some strong action must be taken, and he took the step of arresting Madero.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the condition as to the security of life and property and business enterprises up to the time of the beginning of the Carranza revolution?

Mr. HARVEY. Up to the time of the Vera Cruz intervention everything was perfectly satisfactory. In fact, it was better during the six or seven months prior to that Vera Cruz occupation than it had been at any time before; but after that things got very uncomfortable for everybody, and for a time it was absolutely unsafe, because the Americans all had to leave. Then it quieted down again and while the antagonism which was aroused by that act never did disappear, conditions were tolerable for most of those whom I came in contact with until the Columbus raid, when a similar condition again occurred.

Mr. KEARFUL. What has been the condition from the time of the occupation of Vera Cruz to now?

Mr. HARVEY. Well, it has fluctuated. There were times when there seemed to be diplomatic tension, such as might occur through some of the troubles in the Tampico oil fields, and conditions got very unsafe. Foreigners, Americans especially, felt themselves extremely unsafe; I know I did. I was through a great deal of that and there were weeks at a time when I could not tell whether some mob would not get hold of me and stick me up against the wall and shoot me.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have conditions improved?

Mr. HARVEY. After that then things would quiet down again; things would get less tense and we would be able to continue; but it was a slow process of disintegration which made business thoroughly impossible. At the same time that this was going on the value of the currency was being practically destroyed by indiscriminate issues of paper currency without any security behind them, and that tended to unrest, of course.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have the conditions as to security for life and property improved or grown worse from that time to now?

Mr. HARVEY. From my knowledge, and judging from my personal interests in Mexico, I think they have grown very much worse steadily.

Mr. KEARFUL. How is that illustrated with reference to the property interests of your company?

Mr. HARVEY. Well, it is virtually impossible now to maintain a reliable commercial organization with Americans at the head of it in Mexico, and we, none of us, feel it safe to attempt any large operations because of the danger of the antagonism that has been aroused in Mexico toward our people and the fact that at any moment that may burst into flame and cause serious trouble.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you observed any depredations or destruction of property?

Mr. HARVEY. I have seen, in traveling through the parts of Mexico that I have been in, a good deal of destruction of property and also cases of destruction of human beings as well, but I won't say that I could distinguish between the destruction of foreign property and the destruction of Mexican property. It has been rather indiscriminate in that respect.

Mr. KEARFUL. Speaking generally of property?

Mr. HARVEY. Yes; speaking generally of property. As far as our own interests are concerned we have been very well treated by Mexicans always, by all classes. I have a very great liking and a very great respect for the average Mexican. It is the lawless minority and the overambitious minority that is causing all this trouble.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say minority. What percentage of the entire population?

Mr. HARVEY. That is a difficult question to answer, but if there are half a million people who are actually destructive in Mexico it is as many as there are out of a population of 15,000,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say that you have been well treated by all factions of the Mexicans. Has that been to such an extent that you are able to continue with the projects that you had formed in the time of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. HARVEY. No; because financial and commercial conditions and the Government control is not sufficient sound in Mexico to warrant anything of that sort, and nobody can go to Mexico today without feeling that they are taking a risk, because however friendly you may be with the bulk of Mexicans every man has some enemies and it usually happens that those enemies are the people who have the capacity for doing the most harm.

Mr. KEARFUL. At the present time and for some years past your company has been able to go forward with its projects; has it?

Mr. HARVEY. No; just marking time; maintaining a small organization and marking time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Notwithstanding you have been treated especially well, your company has suffered injuries for which it has made a claim?

Mr. HARVEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. To what amount?

Mr. HARVEY. To an amount in actual physical loss—the only claim has been $10,000 gold, but, of course, if one estimates the gross loss extending over a period of years through the destruction of business and the deterioration of property it would be 20 or 30 times that amount. But the only claim we made was for actual loss through military movements on our property which took place in 1915.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the general feeling in Mexico, as you observed it, among Mexicans as to the possibility of the problem being worked out under present conditions by themselves?

Mr. HARVEY. I have absolutely no confidence that the Mexicans as they stand to-day can work the problem out without some outside assistance.

Mr. KEARFUL. What have you found to be the opinions of the intelligent, educated, high-class Mexicans on that subject?

Mr. HARVEY. I have found that a very great many of those whom I have personally talked with hold the same opinion that I do. A great many others feel that they can not face—their national pride will not permit them to face—accepting assistance from outside, and then others are entirely irreconcilable and state that they can and will work out their own salvation.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you not believe that the pride of those who can not reconcile themselves to outside assistance influences what they may say on the subject?

Mr. HARVEY. That may be; I think that may be. I think that in the event of modified intervention of some sort being undertaken the large majority of Mexicans would very soon accept the inevitable and feel that it was the best thing for the country, provided they were absolutely convinced of the sincerity of the United States in endeavoring to help them and in her determination to retire as soon as sound government was established.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do they say with respect to the course of the United States during the last few years as affecting the question of the sincerity of the United States to assist them?

Mr. HARVEY. That is a question I would find it very difficult to answer. I think that the feelings and opinions of the Mexicans on that would be very much divided, very conglomerate, indeed. But I doubt whether—I think that the effect of the policy has been to create in the minds of a very great many Mexicans a contempt, which they did not feel before, for the United States, for they doubtless had a very sincere respect for the United States, and to-day, while there may be a fear of the United States, there is very little respect felt for the United States in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think the course pursued by the United States has created doubts in their minds as to our sincerity?

Mr. HARVEY. I think it has created great doubts in their minds as to the sincerity of the policy of the United States toward regenerating Mexico. I think that they think the United States is afraid to tackle the problem in the first place, and yet is anxious to get control of Mexico in the second. I think that would be one of the great difficulties to overcome, that feeling that I have just expressed which has sprung up in the last three years.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you regard as the first essential element in the reestablishment of stable government and the permanent security of Mexico?

Mr. HARVEY. I feel that the Mexican Government should be given the opportunity to refund and make good the claims by foreign powers, including the United States, of course; but that a definite time limit should be put upon that opportunity and if that opportunity is not satisfactorily availed of steps should be taken to blockade Mexico, to occupy Mexico City, without a military campaign throughout the country, but merely a limited expeditionary force to open communication with Vera Cruz and establish sound conditions in Mexico City, where the Mexicans of every shade of opinion can return with absolute confidence and safety.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe that under such conditions the better class of Mexicans would cooperate with the United States in establishing a stable government throughout Mexico?

Mr. HARVEY. I feel sure that a very large number of them would, and I feel sure that the number would constantly increase as evidence of the sincerity of the United States in its policy was established. Of course, the first step after Mexico City would be occupied by the United States troops would be to assemble a constitutional convention. The Congress elected under the Madero régime might be called together, and it might be put up to them to select a leader—select a provisional President and, with the help of American departmental officers, a financial agent and authorities on education—help them to reorganize their Government and to make it impossible for any disgruntled or dissatisfied elements to break away and start hostilities, which has been the bane of all Mexican efforts to get together politically and agree upon a definite policy for the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you an idea that the main thing toward the pacification of Mexico would be to eliminate the possibility of the success of a revolutionary movement?

Mr. HARVEY. I do not quite understand that question.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it your idea that the main thing would be to eliminate the possibility of revolutions?

Mr. HARVEY. The main thing is to convince everybody that there is no use starting sporadic revolutions.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is, that such revolutions would never get anywhere?

Mr. HARVEY. Exactly. That is the first thing to do.

Mr. KEARFUL. How large a force would you think would be necessary to carry out such a project?

Mr. HARVEY. Judging from previous campaigns in Mexico and the knowledge that has been gained by the United States in the European war, a thoroughly well-equipped column of 25,000 men, acting as a sort of arrowhead, should be sufficient to reach Mexico City with very little serious loss, providing it was fully supported by railroad units and sufficient troops to guard the railroad and keep communication open with Vera Cruz. The only part of Mexico that should be touched by a foreign military power should be Mexico City and the Vera Cruz railroad and the blockading of the ports and the closing of the Mexican border.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that the accomplishment of such a plan would be more difficult now than it would have been at the time of the occupation of Vera Cruz?

Mr. HARVEY. Very much more so, because, I think, Mexican opinion is more bitter than it was then. On the other hand, the United States is far better equipped to undertake such an enterprise, and Mexico herself is very much less well equipped to oppose it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that the accomplishment of such a plan will become easier as time goes on, or more difficult?

Mr. HARVEY. I do not think from a military standpoint it would probably be more difficult, unless some foreign power was able to bring sufficient influence to bear in Mexico to organize a stronger opposition; but I think that the cost and expense of regenerating Mexico and the difficulty of doing so, and assuring the United States of a satisfactory independent neighbor would be very much increased by allowing matters to drag along.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you say as to the increasing hostility or friendship of the Mexicans toward the United States as time goes on?

Mr. HARVEY. I think the hostility will go on increasing, and I do not like to use the word contempt, but I am afraid there is a great deal of contempt mixed up with the hostility, due to the fact that the United States has not insisted upon proper respect being paid to her diplomatic exchanges with the Mexican Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it not a necessary element in the beginning of such a plan that the Mexican Government should be able to obtain foreign loans of money?

Mr. HARVEY. The first essential, after some definite action was taken toward establishing a firm government in Mexico City, of course, would be to organize the finances of the country, so they could pay back such advances as would have to be made to it, to establish its police force, establish its educational system and general machinery of government, restore its railroads and banking institutions to their original condition; but Mexico is so immensely productive and the attraction of capital to the country is so tremendous, that under such conditions I think Mexico would very rapidly pay back such financial support as it might get.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that any capital would be attracted toward investment in Mexico without the absolute assurance of permanent and stable government?

Mr. HARVEY. No; I do not think any sound capital investments would be attracted toward Mexico. Some highly speculative ventures might be undertaken there. I think there is some money going into Mexico to-day.

Mr. KEARFUL. But the investments you speak of as being sufficient to enable Mexico to rehabilitate herself, would such investments be attracted to Mexico without the positive assurance of a stable and permanent government?

Mr. HARVEY. You mean to say without a guarantee from the United States that they would maintain order in Mexico?

Mr. KEARFUL. I do not undertake to say what sort of guarantee, but I mean such assurances as would be satisfactory to those who have the capital to invest.

Mr. HARVEY. I think that some such assurance would be necessary, but that as the situation developed toward sound conditions, of course, the capital would become more confident. It would take a little time without some definite report to establish confidence.

Mr. KEARFUL. I presume that you are aware that the present Mexican Government has taken all of the metallic reserves from the banks of issue to the extent of over 50,000,000 pesos?

Mr. HARVEY. Yes; I am.

Mr. KEARFUL. That the same Government has taken over the railroads and collected all of the revenues since the time of the success of the Carranza revolution?

Mr. HARVEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And of the express companies?

Mr. HARVEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And that nothing has been paid either by way of payments to noteholders, depositors, creditors, stockholders, bondholders, or any interest paid on the national debt of Mexico to the extent of possibly a billion pesos of capital?

Mr. HARVEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that any plan could succeed without first arranging to discharge those obligations?

Mr. HARVEY. I think that would be practically the first step to take; one of several simultaneous steps. I assume that the only way that that could be done would be by having control of the customhouses and controlling the export duties.

Mr. KEARFUL. If that could not be done by agreement with the Mexican authorities it would have to be done by force, would it not?

Mr. HARVEY. It would have to be done by force; yes. But my own feeling is that the position would be so strong and the reasonableness of the demand would be so great that the Mexican Government would consent, because it would be their road to freedom. That is the most important item to remember.

Mr. KEARFUL. The sensible view for them to take in their own interest.

Mr. HARVEY. Assigning part of their revenues would be their road to freedom and independence.

Mr. KEARFUL. And the sensible view to take would be that that would be for their best interest?

Mr. HARVEY. Best interest.

Mr. KEARFUL. And the only solution of their difficulties?

Mr. HARVEY. The only solution.

Mr. KEARFUL. Would you be in favor of the United States Government taking over Mexico and retaining it as territory of the United States?

Mr. HARVEY. Most certainly not. I would like to say here I have always been most strongly opposed to any sort of military intervention in Mexico, and it is only since things have gotten to the point they have reached that I felt that a limited and friendly intervention was the only course open. Such military intervention as has been talked about, where 450,000 or 500,000 men would be thrown into Mexico and conquer the country and subdue it, would be, in my opinion, a fatal error in every way. Apart from the effect on Mexico itself, I think that the effect on the whole South and Central America would be very injurious to the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that the opinion of foreigners generally in Mexico?

Mr. HARVEY. I believe that is; I think that the feelings on the whole of Spanish-America must be taken into account.

Mr. KEARFUL. It is sometimes heard in this country that large foreign interests in Mexico have engaged in a conspiracy to force this Government into military occupation of the country and annexation. Is that the feeling of your company, which has a very large interest there?

Mr. HARVEY. No, sir; I have never heard of any such idea mooted amongst business people in a business way. I have seen it in the papers, I have seen it suggested, but I have never heard of anything of the sort. I think that up to the present time the foreign interests have felt it was a moral obligation of the United States and that there was no necessity of conspiracy or anything of that sort.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you believe is the basis or reason for propaganda of that sort?

Mr. HARVEY. The wish is father to the thought, I think, very largely, and it may be political, to embarrass the United States. I would not attempt to answer that question, because my own feeling would be that a group of speculators in Chicago, who have large interests in Mexico, might think it would be a good thing to start an agitation of this sort and suggest it was being done, or they might actually do it. I would not be surprised if Mexican leaders, like Villa, have close touch with financial interests in the United States. I do not mean with the big financial interests, responsible financial interests, but with limited financial interests in the United States or in England or France. I think a certain amount of money might very readily go into Mexico to keep everything in a ferment.

Mr. KEARFUL. What would be the basis of such propaganda emanating from Mexico? What effect does such propaganda have upon the present government of Carranza? That is, the spreading of stories that the Americans and other foreigners interested in Mexico are fomenting intervention?

Mr. HARVEY. Of course, Carranza's supporters might very readily start rumors and a propaganda of that sort in the United States in order to strengthen their own position. That is, I think, a natural and quite probable condition. I did not quite catch the drift of your question at first. But it is not at all unlikely that, in these days, when everybody seems to resort to propaganda, that it should be resorted to on the other side of the border.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you had occasion to observe the movements of radical labor elements in Mexico, if so, what, if any, danger do you see in permitting that condition to continue?

Mr. HARVEY. Well, I have had the opportunity of seeing something of the sindicato, or syndicalist movement, in Mexico. It started sometime before the Russian revolution, or before we began to hear anything at all about Bolshevism. It got considerable hold in Yucatan and in Vera Cruz, and it penetrated to the Yusumacinta River, in Tabasco, where there are large banana interests. It practically eliminated the banana interests on that river, owing to the exorbitant demands the laborers were induced to make. The leaders of that movement came from Vera Cruz. They were a very unprepossessing type of Mexican of Spanish extraction. I saw some of them, and they were men who never did any physical work at all, but they had great influence in talking these crazy theories into the Mexican peons, and they virtually destroyed, with the help of the revolutionary conditions that had been created, on the Yusumacinta River, a very valuable fruit industry that had sprung up in the last 10 years in which both Americans and Mexicans were largely interested.

We had in our own part of the Laguna de la Carmen something of the same sort amongst the longshoremen and they did attempt to visit our property. The trouble on our property started with an American who came down as a boilermaker and immediately joined by a young German. Why the German came I have not any idea, except it has always been the belief that he was connected with some radical organizations, and he started in to try to syndicalize the laborers on our property and they managed to get an organization of about 50 men together, but our manager is a very able and popular man, and by using his diplomatic skill he completely routed these people and we got rid of them. But all along that coast from Vera Cruz to Progreso there is that element, which started before the revolution and it has shown me that the Mexican mind is very fertile soil for radical ideas, and it is impossible for me to think that the very able organizers of the present radical movement are not going to make use of that condition in Mexico for all they are worth, and what that will mean to the United States if they are successful—and I am absolutely confident they will be successful so long as Carranza carries on the form of government he is doing—no greater menace to the welfare of the industrial prosperity of the United States could possibly arise. That is another reason why I feel no possible time should be lost at all in cleaning up Mexico and giving the Mexicans a chance to attend to their own affairs in a decent and Christian way.

Mr. KEARFUL. Returning to one of the previous questions, what have you observed to be the influence of foreign enterprise upon the condition of the laborers in Mexico—I mean during peaceful times and stable conditions?

Mr. HARVEY. Why, foreign enterprise has a tremendous effect in improving the state of Mexican workmen. That is noticeable everywhere. And in the city of Puebla, for instance, which is a great cotton spinning center, industrial center, the people before the revolution were in a splendid condition. They were earning regular wages and they were on a par and their organizations were on a par with very many industrial centers in the United States.

The Mexican is an intelligent man; he is only more of a sentimentalist, he has more of the Celtic characteristics in him than we have on this side of the border, and in dealings with Mexicans we have to remember that fact.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your belief as to the necessity for a material advancement as the first step toward education of the peons? Is it not true that a workman must have food and clothes before he can entertain higher ambitions?

Mr. HARVEY. Most certainly. The first thing I expressed in that memorandum that Mr. Williams sent you was to rehabilitate the financial condition, and the industrial condition and growth of the industrial situation will rehabilitate itself when the railroads or the means of communication and the banking facilities are reestablished, because the Mexicans have plenty of enterprise and there is a very large section of middle-class business people and foreigners who will get right down to business at once, and in a very short time Mexico will show the results of an orderly condition of affairs in the country, so that while this condition is being brought about—this improved industrial condition is being brought about there will be time to study the educational condition and create educators. because the work would have to be carried out simultaneously, because educators have to be created in Mexico before any education can be introduced into the country, any widespread system of education, any common school system. Our own experience in that connection is interesting, because quite shortly before I left Mexico one of the Carranza decrees was to the effect—it was not legislation, mind you, but it was a decree direct from Carranza and had no indorsement of any congress of any sort.

Carranza does not act by Congress; he acts by decree. That decree was to the effect that every property owner who had any number of employees should establish a school, pay a school-teacher, and engage the school-teacher, and under the law, I think, subject to fine; he had to find a school-teacher. And we were only too glad to carry out that decree, although our plans for education had been knocked on the head by the fact that revolutionary conditions had upset all our organization. However, we set to work to try to find capable teachers for the school, and we were not able to do it. There was not a living soul available who could possibly take charge of that school. We sent as far as Merida, we sent entirely out of the State of Campeche to Yucatan, to try to find teachers and there was none to be found. We had had a school conducted by the daughter of one of our foremen, a Mexican, but she, I think, got in ill health, or something, and when our organization was broken up that all fell through.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you apply to Gen. Salvador Alvarado, the governor of Yucatan?

Mr. HARVEY. I do not know what steps were taken in that respect. The manager had charge of it. But I know from his reports he was entirely unable to secure anyone. He had two or three people there who came as ostensible school teachers, but they were absolutely incompetent. worse than incompetent in one case; the scholars could not be trusted with them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Michael Smith testified upon that subject in regard to Yucatan and to the effect that the teachers in that State were furnished by Gen. Alvarado and that many of them could not read or write and their teachings were of the sort that you have just mentioned concerning syndicalism.

Mr. HARVEY. I think that is very probably true. In fact, I would be prepared to indorse it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did Carranza undertake to furnish any teachers for the purpose of carrying out his decree?

Mr. HARVEY. No; they put it up to us to find our own teachers. There was no Federal or State organization to produce teachers, and they knew that. That is the reason they put it up to us. In other words, they "passed the buck."

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there anything further of interest that has not already been referred to that you have in mind?

Mr. HARVEY. I feel that I would like to say something about the relative positions of Madero, Huerta, and Carranza in regard to the history that we have been discussing, because I do not think that the true story of Huerta has really been ever understood, and this is the story as I know it, and I feel sure that it is very near the truth:

Huerta was educated at the military college at Chapultepec. He was an Indian boy and joined some forces just as a drummer boy, I think, in Mexico. but he showed considerable ability and was pushed on and was put into the Chapultepec college, passed with very high honors, and served as one of the colonels of Diaz under the old Mexican constitution. He was always a strong constitutionalist. When Madero finally took the reins over from Diaz, Huerta, following the dictates of the constitution, acknowledged Madero as president. He went to the north and he fought a series of campaigns to establish Madero's power. During that time his health broke down; he got leave of absence; he had pretty nearly quieted that northern country.

Mr. KEARFUL. You refer to Orozco?

Mr. HARVEY. Orozco. He came back and was residing in Mexico City when Felix Diaz broke out, and he was called on by foreigners and residents alike to try to do something, because he was known to be the strongest military commander available, and he took the steps to force Madero's resignation. After that congress, Madero's congress, the majority of whom had realized that Madero's unfortunate temperament was leading the country into perdition, unanimously—I think absolutely unanimously—appointed Huerta provisional President and accepted his action in demanding the resignation of Madero.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that in accordance with the form established by the constitution?

Mr. HARVEY. Yes; that was in accordance with the form established by the constitution, as I understand it, Provisional President. The day he was inaugurated as Provisional President—this was published in the official account of the proceedings of the Mexican Congress—President Huerta stepped off the presidential desk onto the floor of the house and, if my memory serves me—the speech is written in my memory, because it struck me as being a very fine thing—he said, "Brother Mexicans, I am not going to speak to you from the seat of the President of Mexico; I am going to speak to you from the floor of this chamber on the same level as you." He said: "I am a soldier. I realize my absolute incompetence as a diplomat and as a statesman." He said: "I have taken this position at the request of you and all others, because I felt that it was the only course for me to quiet Mexico. I appeal for your assistance to do so, and when I have pacified Mexico I promise you that an election will be held and that I will retire, because I do not wish the presidential chair. I do not wish the responsibility, for which I am totally unfitted."

Now, that was not called for—that speech was absolutely spontaneous. I think it surprised the chamber. I think the record of that speech and those transactions can be found; I think they are of record.

He went back and became a very close friend of Henry Lane Wilson, and I know from my personal connections who were at the same time in touch with Mr. Wilson and Huerta, that Mr. Wilson's influence with Huerta was tremendous, and if that influence had been used simply to remind Huerta of the undertaking he had given his own congress I do not believe any of the subsequent history of Mexico would have been written. I think that Huerta was the most patriotic constitutionalist of any leader that they ever had, not excluding Diaz.

He was an Indian—he had an Indian mind. He was in some ways a very rough diamond, but he was very able, he was very strong, and he believed in the constitution, which he had learned through his military education. He stated that over and over and over again.

And then Carranza started up claiming constitutionalism as his battle cry, and at the same time forced, or tried to force, his plan of Guadalupe down the throats of the Aguascalientes convention. That Guadalupe plan was nothing more or less than appointing Carranza first chief of the constitutionalists, a thing that Huerta had never done.

Huerta's record and Carranza's record can not be written side by side because the one was a constitutionalist and the other was a dictator. Huerta finally became a dictator and he became a dictator because he was not allowed to undertake the plan he had laid before his own Congress to carry out.

I do not like to take up your time by talking like this, judge, but I think it is a point that ought to get more publicity, because Huerta had his faults, but he has been awfully maligned. There is no question about that.

Mr. KEARFUL. What truth is there in the constant report that Huerta was addicted to drunkenness and immorality?

Mr. HARVEY. Well, if he were not addicted to some drunkenness and some other things, being as he was and living in the country he was, would be a very astonishing thing. It would be a very bad sign. He would not be a true Mexican.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think he was conspicuous in that among Mexicans?

Mr. HARVEY. He was not at first; it was not until he got ugly. When he got ugly, seeing that he was not allowed to have a free hand, I think then he did go to the dogs altogether. He simply got ugly.

Mr. KEARFUL. He did not get ugly until after the occupation of Vera Cruz, did he?

Mr. HARVEY. No; I think he began to get ugly at the time of the flag—you remember the conditions at the time that brought about the conditions at Vera Cruz.

Mr. KEARFUL. The Tampico flag incident.

Mr. HARVEY. When he refused to salute the American flag. I think that was the first public illustration we had of Huerta turning ugly, but he did that; there was no question about that. He got so ugly nobody could do anything with him, and being an Indian it is quite natural; it is what you would expect. If I treated an Indian like that I would expect him to get ugly.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there anything further, Mr. Harvey?

Mr. HARVEY. I do not think so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Thank you.

(Witness excused.)

FRIDAY, JANUARY 23, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., January 23, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

TESTIMONY OF MANUEL A. ESTEVA.

(The witness was duly sworn.)

Mr. KEARFUL. Please state your full name.

Mr. ESTEVA. Manuel A. Esteva.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where do you live?

Mr. ESTEVA. New York.

Mr. KEARFUL. What address?

Mr. ESTEVA. 12 Broadway. That is my business address. I am in a hotel now.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your citizenship?

Mr. ESTEVA. Mexican.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what business are you engaged?

Mr. ESTEVA. In the importing and exporting.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long have you been away from Mexico?

Mr. ESTEVA. From the first time that I came to this country.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long since you have been there?

Mr. ESTEVA. Since April, 1914.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was your profession before you entered into your present business?

Mr. ESTEVA. I was in the Mexican consular service.

Mr. KEARFUL. Through what period of years?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, I came here to this country for the first time to the New York consulate in September, 1900.

Mr. KEARFUL. What offices did you occupy at different points in the United States since that time?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, I was in New York, Philadelphia, back to New York, San Antonio, Tex., then to Cuba, and back to New York.

Mr. KEARFUL. What positions did you occupy?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, I was clerk, you might say, in the consulate here, then consul in Philadelphia, then inspector of general consulates, in charge of the consulate at San Antonio; then I went as consul general to Habana, Cuba—no; I came from Philadelphia back as consul to New York; then I went to San Antonio, Tex.; then I went as consul general to Habana, Cuba, and then as consul general to New York.

Mr. KEARFUL. That service covered a period extending over a large portion of the rule of Porfirio Diaz, the time of Madero, and Carbajal, and Huerta?

Mr. ESTEVA. De la Barra was between Diaz and Huerta; De la Barra, then Madero, and then Huerta, and, of course, Carbajal was only a few days.

Mr. KEARFUL. Upon what event did you leave the consular service?

Mr. ESTEVA. When the present Government got in office.

Mr. KEARFUL. When Huerta abdicated?

Mr. ESTEVA. Not exactly, because Huerta abdicated before the service was suppressed by the Carranza Government, and I left the consular service in New York in August, 1913. Huerta was already gone from Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. During your consular service, did you have occasion to become familiar with the operations of the various revolutionary activities of Mexicans in the United States?

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes; because you see, outside of my consular service I filled several diplomatic missions for Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were those?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, when here in Washington, I was first secretary to the special embassy that came to Washington for participation in the centenary in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you regard as the beginning of the present revolutionary troubles in Mexico?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, I regard the beginning of the revolution the articles of Turner "Barbarous Mexico." I think they were written in 1908. I am not sure exactly the year, but I think so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Those articles were supposed to have been written by John Kenneth Turner.

Mr. ESTEVA. John Kenneth Turner; yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know who actually wrote them?

Mr. ESTEVA. I know he wrote part of them. I know also several articles were written by Lazaro Gutierrez de Lara.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were his politics?

Mr. ESTEVA. He was a Socialist.

Mr. KEARFUL. The articles were written by him in Spanish?

Mr. ESTEVA. Written in Spanish, and they were sent to New York, and they were given to a Mexican who was at the time in New York and he translated them into English.

Mr. KEARFUL. You got this information from the Mexican you mention?

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes; I got it exactly from the man who was making the translations.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know who paid for those translations?

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes; he told me once that an oil company.

Mr. KEARFUL. An oil company?

Mr. ESTEVA. An oil company here was paying for those translations.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the oil company?

Mr. ESTEVA. He said the Standard Oil Co.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he give you any evidence of payment by the Standard Oil Co.

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes; while he was talking to me he showed me a check.

Mr. KEARFUL. In your capacity as consul did you have occasion to learn of the operations of John Lind when he was in Vera Cruz?

Mr. ESTEVA. John Lind?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes; I know a great deal about that part over there, because you know in my connection with the State Department I was told many things that really happened, and I was told not only by them but some of the Americans that Mr. Hale was in Mexico working in the same capacity.

Mr. KEARFUL. William Bayard Hale?

Mr. ESTEVA. William Bayard Hale, and it would seem that Mr. Hale was already going a little toward Huerta, and then Mr. Lind was sent to supersede him. Mr. Lind arrived in Mexico, and it seemed like he expected to be received with the honors of a special ambassador, and he was very much hurt when Huerta did not pay any attention to him, so he left Mexico indignant and came to Vera Cruz, and there in Vera Cruz he started work practically against Huerta personally, and even holding political meetings there in Vera Cruz, and I was told they were in the American consulate, some of those meetings. What I mean political meetings, I mean Mexican political meetings.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean revolutionary meetings?

Mr. ESTEVA. Revolutionary meetings.

Mr. KEARFUL. While he was living there under the protection of the Huerta Government?

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes; because Huerta was the president; that is true.

Mr. KEARFUL. And do you know anything about a letter he wrote to Bryan in reference to the City of Mexico?

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes; I saw that letter. I knew about the letter he had written to Mr. Bryan to Washington, and then afterwards I was surprised to see it published in the Hearst papers in New York. Of course I don't know how Mr. Hearst got the letter, but it was very interesting, because he said that the only way to get things in Mexico right was to humble the city; that it was very proud.

Mr. KEARFUL. Humble the city?

Mr. ESTEVA. Humble the City of Mexico; that the people there were very proud.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the idea expressed as to the method of humbling the city?

Mr. ESTEVA. The method was to bring Villa to Mexico City and make Villa humble the Mexicans there, and from the date, really, of that letter Villa was receiving ample support in Washington. I knew of an incident which was assured to me by some Americans that there was an order to write the biography of Villa.

Mr. KEARFUL. An order given by whom?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, I was told by Mr. Bryan, and they made a moving picture out of that biography, and that moving picture was exhibited in New York.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what year?

Mr. ESTEVA. I think that was in 1914.

Mr. KEARFUL. Before Mexico City had been humbled?

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes; before Mexico City was humbled.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you see that picture?

Mr. ESTEVA. I saw that picture myself. I think it was the Lyric Theater. I am not exactly sure, but it was on Forty-second Street in New York. It was exhibited there for several weeks. It was a very romantic and pathetic story. It showed that Villa had two sisters, and one was a very young one and was assaulted by a Mexican officer of the army, and she died, and then the other sister died also of broken heart, and Villa came before the grave and swore vengeance.

Mr. KEARFUL. Swore vengeance over the grave?

Mr. ESTEVA. Swore vengeance over the grave, and it was pointed out that was really the reason and the cause why Villa had gone into the field to be a bandit.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there any truth in that story?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, according to what I know, no; nothing at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any connection with the Niagara conference?

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes; I was appointed assistant delegate to that conference.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where were you located then?

Mr. ESTEVA. I was in New York as consul general at the time.

Mr. KEARFUL. In connection with that conference was there an agreement entered into by this Government with the Mexican delegates to prevent the shipment of arms and ammunition?

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes. That was one of the things they did there. You see I was not very familiar with that conference because I stayed there about a week or so and had to come back to New York, but, of course, I knew a great deal of what happened in that conference.

Mr. KEARFUL. How was that agreement carried out on the part of this Government in regard to the shipment of arms and ammunitions?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, I do not think it was carried out at all, because at that time there was a boat in New York called the Antilles, which was to sail the next few days, and it seemed to me it was purposely put under the Cuban flag to avoid the responsibility of the American Government, and they loaded up with arms and ammunition and munitions in New York, and I was in New York at the time, and then I called up on the telephone to the Spanish ambassador here in Washington, Mr. Riano, who was at the time in charge of the Mexican affairs here, and notified him of the fact that the boat was being loaded with arms and munitions, and ready to sail to Mexico, and he promised to take the matter up with the State Department, which he did, and called me back and said that the State Department was going to look into the matter and probably stop it if they could.

Then I went to the customhouse in New York and I was confidentially told there that they had received instructions from the State Department or from the Treasury Department here to facilitate the sailing of the boat. Then the day I knew the boat was sailing I called up on the telephone again to the Spanish ambassador to tell him that the boat was sailing, and then I received the answer later by the ambassador saying that he had gone to tell Mr. Bryan that the boat had already sailed from New York, and Mr. Bryan told him that he did not know that the boat had sailed and that he could not stop it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then subsequently when the boat attempted to land at Vera Cruz was any action contemplated to stop it?

Mr. ESTEVA. You mean from the Mexican Government?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. ESTEVA. I think they tried to do it; but I think the American Government said they would send a cruiser to protect the boat so they could land the arms and munitions at Tampico.

Mr. KEARFUL. And subsequently to the sailing of the Antilles was there another shipment from other ports?

Mr. ESTEVA. None that I know of, but I know of one incident before that; from Galveston a boat sailed with arms and ammunition and with false manifests, clearing for another port, and then changed her course and went to land the cargo in Mexico, and I understand when the port authorities found out the deviation of the boat they fined the boat $500 for false entry or false manifests.

Mr. KEARFUL. The port of Tampico was then in the hands of the Carrancistas, was it?

Mr. ESTEVA. You mean at the time of the Antilles incident?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes; it was already in the hands of the Carrancista revolutionists.

Mr. KEARFUL. And that was the port where the landing was made?

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes; where they landed the arms.

Mr. KEARFUL. During the time of Porfirio Diaz and Madero and De la Barra and Huerta were there any such things known as concessions granted by the Mexican Government for the free import of articles?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, not in a general way. Of course, there were some new enterprises or new developments that could be given concessions to bring machinery in or something free of duty.

Mr. KEARFUL. But were there any such things as concessions for building material in general?

Mr. ESTEVA. Oh, no.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know of such concessions having been made by the Carranza Government?

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes; I know one, I understand, that was given to Mr. Barrios Gomez, and it seemed that he tried to work that concession with some hardware stores in Mexico, and then afterwards I think he passed it to somebody else. I am told Mr. Nieto.

Mr. KEARFUL. Nieto was subsecretary of the treasury.

Mr. ESTEVA. Nieto was subsecretary of the treasury at the time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was secretary of the treasury?

Mr. ESTEVA. He was secretary while Mr. Cabrera was away.

Mr. KEARFUL. Luis Cabrera was secretary?

Mr. ESTEVA. Luis Cabrera was the secretary.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the method of exploiting concessions of that kind?

Mr. ESTEVA. You mean again by the Carranza Government?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, the one who got the concessions, they came to the United States and tried to sell those concessions for half of the duty that really would have been paid.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know anything about a firm that used to be at Vera Cruz called Agencia La Garda?

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes; I knew the Agencia La Garda was really an agency working in connection with the treasury department in Mexico, and that was a public fact, because they even came out in the papers, and I think Mr. Cabrera went over there to reorganize the treasury department, and they severed entirely connections with the La Garda Agency. The La Garda Agency was buying and selling articles for Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was their method of doing business?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, it was a general importing and exporting house.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who were the individuals who profited by the operations of that concern?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, I do not know exactly, but I suppose the treasury department must have received something for it.

Mr. KEARFUL. The officers of the treasury department?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, the officers or the office.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they engage in the buying and shipment of hides?

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes. Well, all Mexican raw materials. You see they were buying it there and exporting it to the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know anything about a concession to import Cuban cigarettes free of duty?

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes; I was told by a man who seems to be very familiar with those dealings—well, I don't remember the name of the man in Vera Cruz, he got a concession for importing 1,000,000 boxes of Cuban cigarettes free of duty into Mexico, and he assured me they got a Mexican dollar profit on each box.

Mr. KEARFUL. Those concessions were granted by the head of the treasury department?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, not necessarily, but by the department itself.

Mr. KEARFUL. By the department?

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you know about an operation of the shipment and coinage in this country of Mexican gold and silver.

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, what I know about that is that the Mexican Government sent here some bars of silver and gold and they were trying to make an arrangement with Islin & Co., in New York, to have the money coined in Philadelphia in the mint, and they were going to get the difference in the actual value of the silver in the market and the value of the Mexican coin, and I understand it made a difference of about $5,000,000, and I understand also that the deal could not be carried through because the American Government stopped it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was the attorney for Islin & Co.?

Mr. ESTEVA. At that time?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, I don't know at that time, but I know the attorney for Mexican affairs was David Reyes Retana.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is he a resident of New York City?

Mr. ESTEVA. He lives in New York City, having lived there since 1915, I think.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is Mr. Retana a partner of Mr. Manuel Lopez Figueroa?

Mr. ESTEVA. I believe so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Lopez Figueroa testified before the committee some time ago?

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What changes have been made in the consular charges since you were connected with the office in New York?

Mr. ESTEVA. You mean for fees for consular invoices?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, when I was connected with the consulate there was a nominal fee for each $100, and usually after $500 was about 50 cents or $1 fee for each additional $100, and since the Carranza Government has been in power they charge now 3 per cent of the value of the consular invoice.

Mr. KEARFUL. What change has been made in regard to excess charges for invoices outside of office hours with reference to fixing office hours?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, with the previous Government there was a fee that was called double duties that could not exceed more than $4, and to-day I understand they charge regular double fees regardless of the amount.

Mr. ESTEVA. That is, when business is transacted outside of office hours?

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And have the office hours been reduced?

Mr. ESTEVA. I understand they have been reduced about one hour.

Mr. KEARFUL. You, of course, kept in touch with the American policy and the operation of the American policy toward Mexico during the time that you were consular officer?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, I had to. You see, I have been here working specially from the time of the revolution of Madero and subsequent events, and I have been seeing how really all the revolutions, even starting with the Madero revolution, have been more or less helped in this country.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think it is possible to start a revolution in Mexico without assistance in this country?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, it would be almost impossible, because you see Mexico can not produce any arms and ammunition, and if they have to bring them from European countries they have to come from a boat, but when they come from this country it is very easy to smuggle them in across the border. I do not know whether the American people at large really realize the moral responsibility that the country has assumed with the protection or help that the Government has been giving to the latest revolution, because when they undertook to take out Huerta from Mexico, practically they assumed the responsibility of Mexico with the European powers.

Mr. KEARFUL. You believe because of the action of this Government in eliminating Huerta and imposing Carranza the American Government is responsible to foreigners for damages done to them by the revolution?

Mr. ESTEVA. I think so. If any investigation comes naturally to clear up the responsibility of Mexico for the debts it would come out that Mexico is in the position that practically it is to-day, due to the attitude of the administration in Washington.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you regard as the inevitable tendency of the policy of the Washington administration? To what end do you think it must lead eventually?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, I will tell you; I started seeing the effects of the policy, if you can call it policy, that has been followed at Washington from the latter part of 1915 and the beginning of 1916. I have told some friends of mine that instead of avoiding intervention that policy was bringing intervention into Mexico. The Mexicans themselves are not wanting intervention in Mexico, but it is the policy of the United States that is bringing intervention into Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean the policy or lack of policy that has been followed by the administration?

Mr. ESTEVA. That had been followed so far is bringing the country into chaos, and finally, sooner or later, there will be intervention which will be a necessity. I think the worst thing to come would be armed intervention in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you mean you think it would be a bad thing for Mexico?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, I think it would be bad for both countries, because the Mexicans have some characteristics—they have the physical courage that they don't care who they fight, and even knowing they will lose, they will fight, and that would destroy the country. And more for the United States, because it would take years to get back on the same standard they were before this revolution, in the eyes of Mexicans and of all Latin-American countries.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean there would be a sentiment of hostility engendered?

Mr. ESTEVA. There would be a sentiment of distrust and hostility. If Mexico had been left alone to work out her own salvation maybe things would be entirely different to-day, and I think the time is to aid Mexico in some way to work it out. If the United States would be absolutely friendly, the way they should be, being so close together—the two republics—and help Mexico as a friend, Mexico would come out of what it is to-day very easily.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your opinion as to how the United States could help Mexico effectively and in a friendly way now?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, to begin with, I believe that Carranza could have been absolutely helped, not only being recognized, but left alone, and perhaps even Carranza could bring the country to the front. But the way the thing was done, under the recognition and no help at all, he was in desperate straits for lack of money and confidence of the people. The people that were originally against Carranza would always help him if they saw there was no help to come from Washington, outside of recognition, and that kept the rebels in the field. But if Washington helped somebody down there, that would give guaranties, even if Carranza could give guaranties and receive practical help, I think the country could come back to what it was.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean financial help?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, financial help, and not only financial, but all kinds of help Mexico needs to-day.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, is not financial help the principal help?

Mr. ESTEVA. The principal help; yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. You know, of course, the present sentiment of bankers who are able to give financial help is absolutely that they will not lend a dollar to the present Government of Mexico without guaranty from the Government of the United States that the money will be properly used, and not only that, but that there will be established and maintained a stable Government?

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes; I know that. But I know also that the bankers will not give the money to Carranza himself, because they are not even sure that Carranza will stay there, because the Administration in Washington may go back on Carranza. I know in New York if they will only be sure that the policy in Washington will be to keep Carranza there they might help Carranza.

Mr. KEARFUL. How would it be possible for the American Government to give the proper assurance to the bankers and to maintain that assurance without being prepared to use armed forces? Do you think that would be possible?

Mr. ESTEVA. You mean to give a guaranty to the bankers that the money they will invest there will be safe?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, of course, a guaranty Washington might have on Mexico would be more moral than anything else, but if Washington makes the Mexican Government whatever it is, understand that they mean business, and if they will keep their promises and the guaranties that it will give for good and stable government, I believe the Mexican Government, or the Mexicans themselves, will fulfill those obligations.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you not think it would be very difficult now to make the Mexicans believe that the American Government meant what it said, in view of the many ultimatums that have been sent and receded from?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, perhaps, but if they will take a firm attitude without vacillating I think the Mexicans are sensible enough to realize it is probably the last chance they have to put the country on a good basis and they will try to do it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where is the better class of Mexicans living at the present time?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, they are out of Mexico. Practically all the brains and all the cultured men are away from Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where are they living, mostly?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, many are in the United States. There are some in Cuba too, and then there are some in Europe.

Mr. KEARFUL. About what number would you estimate of those Mexicans?

Mr. ESTEVA. Of that class of Mexicans?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, no less than 500,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know about what was known as the Pan American Conference, which was a conference called by six South American countries at the instigation of Washington, for the purpose of attempting to get the different Mexican factions together in 1915?

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes; and I think they even sent invitations to them to do it, and I understand also that they offered President Wilson the permission of the Government using one of the former secretaries of President Madero as president, getting a very good cabinet, and President Wilson offered to consider it, but I think he never acted on that.

Mr. KEARFUL. You remember that the result of that conference was the recognition of Carranza as de facto head of the Mexican Government?

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes; I did not think what you were meaning. Yes; I know they were discussing over there in Washington the recognition of somebody in Mexico, and it was indicated at the time that the best man was Mr. Carranza, and I think the only one in favor of the recognition of Carranza of the Latin American countries was the Argentine ambassador.

Mr. KEARFUL. He was the only one?

Mr. ESTEVA. He was the only one who recommended him strongly.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what was the reason given by him for favoring the recognition of Carranza?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, I was told—I only know that through the man who told me, who knew about it—he said if Carranza got the responsibility of the Government in his hands he might fall out in six months.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember at the time of the recognition of Carranza it was announced by this Government that the action was taken on the unanimous recommendation of the six southern republics?

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes; but I understand, as I say, that really the only one who advocated it strongly was the Argentine ambassador.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Naon?

Mr. ESTEVA. Mr. Naon; but I understood that it was opposed by the Brazilian ambassador.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your information as to what happened to Mr. Naon politically because of the attitude he took in favor of Carranza at that time?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, I was told by some Argentinians who came from there that he was a candidate of the Young Men's Party in Argentina, and after the investigation they made of his mixing up in these Mexican affairs they nominated the one who is president of Argentina to-day.

Mr. KEARFUL. They turned him down?

Mr. ESTEVA. Turned Mr. Naon down.

I want to say that I know of things not in my capacity as consul but as an individual, so I am not giving away any secrets of the service.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there any statement that you would like to add, Mr. Esteva, in regard to the matters you have been discussing?

Mr. ESTEVA. Well, the only thing is my hope that the United States will see they are responsible for what is really going on in Mexico and that they will do their best to straighten out the things in the best way possible, and then the people in this country will realize the people of Mexico are not cutthroats and bloodthirsty people; that they have always been peaceful, that the peons there are really peace-loving people, and they are, of course, like anybody else; people come around and rouse them only with promises. You can not get Mexicans to raise an army just to go and plunder, but they always appeal to some fine sentiment of the people. So the material is there. If those people had good leaders, they would be very good. I think that has been proven in the past in the time of Gen. Diaz, that those people can be very honest and worthy. In that time you could go from one side of the country to the other with gold in your hands and nobody would touch it.

There are some of the people, you know, who are partially educated that have an ambition to get somewhere and they go and arouse some Indians, but they have to go and appeal to some fine instinct in that Indian, as they have done in the past, promising them some land, or the restoration of their own property, and it seems an Indian there never forgets that the land was once his, and that is the one promise that always appeals to him.

Mr. KEARFUL. Which never has been fulfilled, however?

Mr. ESTEVA. Which never has been fulfilled.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think it is susceptible of fulfillment?

Mr. ESTEVA. You mean the delivery of the lands to the Indians?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. ESTEVA. No; not immediately, but I think it is easy to have it done, there are so many lands belonging to the Government and so many lands can be developed; and not to take it away, but to buy it from some of the landowners when they have more than they can put to use, and it can be sold to the low class of Mexicans and the Indians similar to the way it is done in the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. But you believe that those promises that are made to the Indians to provoke them to join a revolution are purely visionary and dishonest promises?

Mr. ESTEVA. In most of the cases, sir. I suppose there are a few that are in good faith, but in most of the cases it is just an excuse to raise an army.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you really and sincerely believe that there is any hope for the rehabilitation of Mexico without the assistance of the United States or some other outside power?

Mr. ESTEVA. No; Mexico has to have assistance to come back to the front, but I do not believe, as I say, that the assistance has to come with armed intervention. I think, on the contrary, if armed intervention comes it will set Mexico back many years. But assistance has to come. Mexico is in such shape to-day it can not come back of itself.

Mr. KEARFUL. I am not able to follow you. I do not understand how the United States could assist the real Mexicans to institute and maintain a Government without using armed force. You have stated that there are approximately 500,000, including practically all the best people in Mexico, who are living in exile, who are not able to go back and live in Mexico. Is it possible to put those people back in Mexico and give them a chance?

Mr. ESTEVA. Yes; it is.

Mr. KEARFUL. Without armed force?

Mr. ESTEVA. Without armed force.

Mr. KEARFUL. How can that be done?

Mr. ESTEVA. If Washington will assist, as I said before even Carranza, but assist practically by the backing up of a good man that they will absolutely consider reliable, to form a stable Government, with a good cabinet, and if the Mexican people are convinced that is the last chance Mexico has to rehabilitate itself without armed intervention, I think Mexico would come to the front, and all the Mexicans that are away from Mexico would go back and help Mexico, and I think if there is fairness in the Washington Government that chance would be given to Mexico before there is recourse to armed intervention.

Mr. KEARFUL. But, as I understand you, such assistance, in order to be effective, must be accompanied by the firm declaration that if a straight line is not pursued then Mexico must expect armed intervention.

Mr. ESTEVA. Armed intervention. You know if the bankers only knew Washington was going to help a man and help him decidedly and firmly they would come to the assistance of that Government, but I know positively the bankers are not assisting the Carranza government because they are not sure themselves that Carranza will be helped to the limit. I have had several talks myself with bankers in New York and I have been told that they have not absolute confidence in their own Government about a firm policy toward Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there any difference of opinion among them about that point?

Mr. ESTEVA. Practically none.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there anything further, Mr. Esteva?

Mr. ESTEVA. No, sir; unless you have something else to ask me.

Mr. KEARFUL. No. Thank you, very much. You will be excused.

(Witness excused.)

(Whereupon, at 11.40 o'clock a. m. a recess was taken until 1.00 o'clock p. m.)

AFTER RECESS.

The hearing was resumed at 1.30 o'clock p. m.

TESTIMONY OF J. H. DICKMAN.

(The witness was duly sworn.)

Mr. KEARFUL. Please state your full name.

Mr. DICKMAN. J. H. Dickman.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your place of residence?

Mr. DICKMAN. Mountain Lake, Minn.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you connected with a company that has been operating in Mexico?

Mr. DICKMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the name of it?

Mr. DICKMAN. It is the Associated Tropical Plantation Co.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of operations did that company have in Mexico?

Mr. DICKMAN. Operating a banana plantation.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what State.

Mr. DICKMAN. Vera Cruz.

Mr. KEARFUL. How many acres was in the plantation?

Mr. DICKMAN. The whole estate comprised about 24,000 and there were about 4,500 acres planted to bananas.

Mr. KEARFUL. Does the company own the title to this land?

Mr. DICKMAN. Under a contract.

Mr. KEARFUL. What amount of money was invested in this plantation?

Mr. DICKMAN. About $3,000,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it fully equipped and stocked and in full operation?

Mr. DICKMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Up to what time?

Mr. DICKMAN. About 1916.

Mr. KEARFUL. What happened to it at that time?

Mr. DICKMAN. Well, we were driven away. The rebels drove our management away from the plantation.

Mr. KEARFUL. How many men were employed by the company on the plantation?

Mr. DICKMAN. At that time possibly about 80. I think prior to that time we used to employ around 300.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is this a close corporation or is the stock of it held pretty generally by people in the United States?

Mr. DICKMAN. Held pretty generally.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what portion of the country?

Mr. DICKMAN. All over the United States and Canada from coast to coast.

Mr. KEARFUL. What method of transportation was used by the company from the plantation to the coast?

Mr. DICKMAN. Boats.

Mr. KEARFUL. How far was it?

Mr. DICKMAN. Well, approximately about to Galveston—

Mr. KEARFUL. No; to the Pacific coast?

Mr. DICKMAN. Forty-seven miles.

Mr. KEARFUL. What means of transportation—by boat or barges?

Mr. DICKMAN. By boat. The river afforded transportation for a boat that we used that was 220 feet long and it could turn right around in the river and swing right up to the banks and load the bananas.

Mr. KEARFUL. How many boats did you have?

Mr. DICKMAN. We had one.

Mr. KEARFUL. What became of the boat?

Mr. DICKMAN. That has been sold. I might explain that probably a little further. The Gulf Coast Plantation Co. and the Associated Tropical Plantation Co. were very closely related to each other in having stockholders of either company interested in both of the plantations, and the Gulf Coast Plantation Co. was the older of the two, and that company purchased a steamer and in connection with that the Associated Tropical Plantation Co. made a contract with the Gulf Coast Plantation Co. to haul its bananas, you know, for so much a bunch or so much a hundredweight to the market, and our bananas were a little farther in and they would load what we had at Filasola and then go to Tabasqueña.

Mr. KEARFUL. What happened to the plantation when the men were driven away?

Mr. DICKMAN. All the buildings have been destroyed and the plantation has gone back to jungle.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long has it been since it has been possible to conduct any operations there?

Mr. DICKMAN. Some time in 1916 is my best recollection of that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Has any attempt been made by the manager of your company to return to the plantation recently?

Mr. DICKMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Has he been able to do so?

Mr. DICKMAN. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. For what reason?

Mr. DICKMAN. He was warned by the Carranza authorities at the port of Mexico not to attempt to go there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then, I understand that the plantation and the money invested, amounting to $1,000,000, is now a total loss?

Mr. DICKMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. With the exception of the land itself?

Mr. DICKMAN. The land itself.

Mr. KEARFUL. Which has practically returned to a jungle condition?

Mr. DICKMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. When do you expect to be able to resume operations there?

Mr. DICKMAN. We could not expect to resume operations there before the Mexican Government would be in shape to insure us protection. Just when that will be I do not know. It may be a long time hence.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you any indication that such protection will be given in any reasonable period?

Mr. DICKMAN. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have any promises been made you now by the Mexican Government in that respect?

Mr. DICKMAN. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. At the time of the destruction of this property was any effort made to get protection from the Carranza government?

Mr. DICKMAN. No, sir; I do not believe so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you make any effort to get protection from this Government?

Mr. DICKMAN. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. This is an American corporation, is it?

Mr. DICKMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were not personally on the ground when the destruction of this property occurred, were you?

Mr. DICKMAN. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are testifying from reports that were made by your manager?

Mr. DICKMAN. My manager; yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where is he? Is he available?

Mr. DICKMAN. At the present time I believe he could be reached at Houston; that is his home.

Mr. KEARFUL. Houston, Tex.?

Mr. DICKMAN. Yes, sir; but he is about to sail to Minatitlan about the 27th of this month. I think he has transportation for that date.

Mr. KEARFUL. He is engaged in some other business now?

Mr. DICKMAN. Since he had to leave our plantation he has been working for Pierson & Sons, the oil refinery.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you filed your claims against the Mexican Government with the State Department?

Mr. DICKMAN. I have not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there any other statement in connection with this matter that you desire to make?

Mr. DICKMAN. No; I do not know of anything that has any bearing on the case here. We had about 200 head of cattle there and some horses and everything was taken away, if that has anything to do with it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Any money stolen?

Mr. DICKMAN. No; I don't think so.

Mr. KEARFUL. The ranch supplies—were they taken away?

Mr. DICKMAN. Everything.

Mr. KEARFUL. And the buildings were destroyed?

Mr. DICKMAN. Every building.

Mr. KEARFUL. That will be all, I think. Thank you, sir.

(Witness excused.)

TESTIMONY OF W. B. LOUCKS.

(The witness was duly sworn.)

Mr. KEARFUL. Please give your full name.

Mr. LOUCKS. Walter B. Loucks.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where do you live?

Mr. LOUCKS. Minneapolis, Minn.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is your post-office address?

Mr. LOUCKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are an American citizen?

Mr. LOUCKS. Yes, sir; born in this country.

Mr. KEARFUL. What connection have you had with operations in Mexico?

Mr. LOUCKS. You mean with relation to my company?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOUCKS. I have been the chief executive since the year 1912.

Mr. KEARFUL. Of what company?

Mr. LOUCKS. Tabasco Plantation Co.

Mr. KEARFUL. Operating where?

Mr. LOUCKS. In the States of Tabasco and Vera Cruz in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the capital of the company?

Mr. LOUCKS. An authorized capital of $5,000,000; about $2,000,000 of which was invested in our properties in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of properties were they?

Mr. LOUCKS. We have what is known as plantation San Miguel Juarez, situated in the State of Tabasco. This consists of 7,300 acres and was formerly devoted to the raising of bananas, cacao, rubber, and cattle.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is the stock of your company widely held?

Mr. LOUCKS. Yes. We have on our records a little better than 2,600 stockholders. They are scattered throughout the various States of the Union, and about $500,000 of the stock is held in Canada.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the name of the plantation?

Mr. LOUCKS. The second one is known as Plantation La Oaxaquena, which is situated in the State of Vera Cruz, the southwestern part on the ——— River. The nearest town is Santa Lucrecia.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is composed of how many acres?

Mr. LOUCKS. Twenty-four thousand eight hundred.

Mr. KEARFUL. How are the titles to those properties held by the company?

Mr. LOUCKS. They are held by the Tabasco Plantation Co. Originally there was what was known as the Tabasco Land & Development Co., which originally purchased the property. The title was held in escrow by the Chicago Title & Trust Co. until the year 1909, when the contract for development purposes with the development company expired, at which time the property was deeded to the Tabasco Plantation Co. and so held.

Mr. KEARFUL. Held by what sort of title?

Mr. LOUCKS. Warranty deed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where did the title originate?

Mr. LOUCKS. With us it originated with the purchase from one Pedro Ruiz—I am speaking now of the La Oaxaquena, because that is our major investment. It was purchased in the year 1903 from Pedro Ruiz, a Spaniard in Mexico. The property was deeded by him to the Tabasco Land & Development Co. and, as I said before, in the year 1909 was by the Chicago Title & Trust Co. deeded to the Tabasco Plantation Co.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of business was conducted on this plantation?

Mr. LOUCKS. We are employed in the growing of sugar cane and the manufacture of sugar.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you describe in a general way the extent of the plant established for that purpose?

Mr. LOUCKS. We have a mill with a capacity of 1,000 tons of cane daily, capable of being increased to the point where it could handle 3,000 tons of cane daily; an entire establishment, including sugar factory, warehouses, and all that would go with a modern plant.

Mr. KEARFUL. All sorts of modern machinery installed?

Mr. LOUCKS. At the time it was installed it was the most modern that could be purchased.

Mr. KEARFUL. Railway tracks and cars?

Mr. LOUCKS. We have something like 35 kilometers of railway track on the plantation and had under cultivation 4,000 acres of cane.

Mr. KEARFUL. How many men were employed?

Mr. DICKMAN. That varied with the season. During the grinding period we employed from 1,500 to 2,000 men; in the dull season we employed around 600 men.

Mr. KEARFUL. What accommodations did you provide for the employees?

Mr. LOUCKS. We had a complete camp with between 150 and 200 houses for the employees, and running water to each and every one of the houses, and it was as near modern as we could furnish under the circumstances we were working under in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the wages paid to the employees?

Mr. LOUCKS. I have a schedule here of not only the number but the nationality and the amounts paid to the various nationalities going back to the year 1913. Taking the month of April I think there were 1,536. There appears to be an error in your copy. It is 1,553. This shows that we were paying the Japanese at that time—we had some 35 in number—an average of $2.01; that is in Mexican money. We were paying the natives $1.73; we were paying another set of natives 1 peso and rations, which was equivalent to about $1.60, and another set $1.50; another set of Koreans $1.56. We were paying in salaries to our storemen—we had 10 at that time—an average of $262.50 per month.

Mr. KEARFUL. These storemen, were they natives?

Mr. LOUCKS. They were with the exception of the manager.

Mr. KEARFUL. How does that scale of wages compare, if you know, with that which was earned by the Mexican natives before your enterprise was started there?

Mr. LOUCKS. Before the Americans went to the Isthmus the Mexicans were working for anything from 16 centavos up.

Mr. KEARFUL. Up to what point?

Mr. LOUCKS. There was no established wage, because there was no labor. Just back of us in the State of Oaxaca they were paying 37 centavos a day in the mines and that was the maximum.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then would you say that the scale ranged from 16 centavos to 37 centavos?

Mr. LOUCKS. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. During the rule of Porfirio Diaz and Madero and Huerta, was there ever any trouble?

Mr. LOUCKS. We had trouble under the Madero administration. We had none except the usual difficulties that go with an enterprise of that kind in Mexico up until the time of Madero.

Our first difficulty with Madero was in connection with a certain class of labor which we were employing. It was called the enganche labor, a certain form of servitude. They were the criminal class which were gathered together in groups in various towns and were by the officials of the Government farmed out to various enterprises for a consideration.

The Madero government, as its first step of gratitude to the Mexican people, liberated all the prisoners including all classes, such as the enganche labor I have mentioned. That was the first step of the Mexican Government in liberating the Mexican people.

We had prior to this made individual contracts with all these men, all this class of men which we had on the plantation and the men were prepared to remain and willing to remain. The officials of the Madero government came to us and demanded that we release them, and not only demanded that we release them, but that they leave the place and that we appear at Santa Lucrecia and liquidate them. That was the first real trouble in the labor way.

Mr. KEARFUL. The men themselves were willing to remain?

Mr. LOUCKS. We had no trouble with them.

Mr. KEARFUL. They were under contract?

Mr. LOUCKS. They were under contract originally and then they were under individual contracts that we had made specifically with them.

Mr. KEARFUL. And they were willing to remain?

Mr. LOUCKS. They were willing to remain.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there any hostility shown by the laborers against you or other Americans operating there up to the time of the fall of Huerta?

Mr. LOUCKS. None whatever.

Mr. KEARFUL. How many Americans did you employ on the plantation?

Mr. LOUCKS. We had something like 60—something like 50, I would say, at the time the Huerta difficulty took shape.

Mr. KEARFUL. What things were provided for the welfare and education of the people employed on the plantation?

Mr. LOUCKS. We had on the plantation a school and sometimes two; we had a hospital and an American physician with assistants; all medicines and supplies of that kind were furnished. Prior to the Madero administration we charged all of our employees, including the manager, 2 per cent for medicine and hospital services. After that it was all free to the natives, or free to all of our employees as a matter of fact. The houses were also free and all of the accommodations furnished by the company. They were of no expense whatever to the natives.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the relative importance of the Tabasco Plantation Co. compared with other companies operating in that locality?

Mr. LOUCKS. I think I am justified in saying we were looked upon as the one of most importance on the Isthmus. We produced as high as 11,000,000 pounds of sugar for the crop year of 1911-12, which was our banner year.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you operate under special privileges or concessions granted by the Mexican Government?

Mr. LOUCKS. We had no concessions and were asking none.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you comply with the laws of the country in every respect?

Mr. LOUCKS. We complied with the laws and kept out of politics at all times.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever take side with any faction or promote any revolution?

Mr. LOUCKS. None whatever. We kept ourselves very free and our instructions to our managers were always to have nothing whatever to do with the political side of the case.

Mr. KEARFUL. How much in money did your investment represent?

Mr. LOUCKS. The La Oaxaquena represents nearly $2,000,000, and in addition to that we had an accumulation of nearly $500,000 in working capital. Our property was paid for and, therefore, that should be added to our total investment.

Mr. KEARFUL. With respect to your outstanding obligations?

Mr. LOUCKS. We had none whatever except for current bills which were always liable to be for purposes for the store and small amounts like that, but no obligations of any kind.

Mr. KEARFUL. Which were liquidated—

Mr. LOUCKS. Whenever the bill matured.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it a successful and profitable business?

Mr. LOUCKS. It was just coming to the point where it was profitable and we were to the point where we had hoped to pay quarterly dividends in 1912, and did so declare the first dividend in the year 1912 of 1½ per cent.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did your first trouble begin—with what event?

Mr. LOUCKS. Our real troubles, aside from what I have just enumerated, started about the 22d day of April, 1914, on the occasion of the American forces taking the city of Vera Cruz.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was your output of sugar at that time?

Mr. LOUCKS. We had just removed a crop of, I think it was, 62,000 tons for that season. We had the crop harvested and almost the entire product was stored in the warehouse, about 38,000 bags of sugar of 220 to 250 pounds each, besides the alcohol which was manufactured from the by-product of molasses.

With the occupation of the city of Vera Cruz by American forces we were immediately waited upon by officials of the Mexican Government and the first step on their part was to deprive us of our arms and munitions which had been granted up to this time. That was the beginning of our real difficulties.

Mr. KEARFUL. Before going into the description of your difficulties I will ask you if this is a tabulated statement showing the amounts of production from the year 1912 to 1918?

Mr. LOUCKS. Yes, sir; that is taken from the scale weights at the mill. It ranges from 72,525 tons for the year 1912 to 8,306.

Mr. KEARFUL. Let that be inserted in the record.

Year.	Finished grinding cane.	Total tons cane.	Total bags sugar sacked.
1912.....	June 8	72,525	50,733
1913.....	May 15	60,391	38,473
1914.....	Apr. 1	61,496	33,364
1915.....	July 12	44,331	26,164
1916.....	June 21	39,374	17,055
1918.....	May 22	8,306

The above figures show the decline in production, year by year, since 1912, due to revolutionary conditions.

Mr. KEARFUL. I notice that the amount of cane is given for the year 1918 as 8,306 tons, as against 72,525 tons for the year 1912, and that the figure for the total bags of sugar sacked for the year 1918 is left blank. Does that indicate there was no production?

Mr. LOUCKS. Very little sugar was made in that year, and of such a nature that you could hardly call it sugar. Seventy-two thousand tons hardly represents our production for that year, owing to the fact that our men were partly taken from us.

Mr. KEARFUL. For the year 1912?

Mr. LOUCKS. 1912, and we failed to harvest nearly 600 acres which was ready for harvesting on account of having the labor taken from us by the Madero Government. We should have harvested that year approximately 100,000 tons.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did that compare with the year 1911?

Mr. LOUCKS. The year 1911 we harvested 60,000 tons. In the meantime we had put into crop about 1,300 extra acres, which was the reason for the larger crop of the next year, when that came into bearing for the first time.

Mr. KEARFUL. What production have you had since the year 1918?

Mr. LOUCKS. Relatively nothing. We are simply keeping a seed bed alive in order that we may have something to start the fields again if opportunity presents itself.

Mr. KEARFUL. Now, will you proceed in your own way to describe the difficulties that you encountered, beginning with the landing of the American forces at Vera Cruz.

Mr. LOUCKS. Our people were first ordered—our American employees were first ordered to the Port of Mexico by officials of the American Government as well as the officials of the Mexican Government. They proceeded to the Port of Mexico, were told to get on board a ship which was in the harbor, with the understanding that they would be landed again the next morning. Instead of being landed the next morning they were brought to Vera Cruz, and with the exception of our manager, our field superintendent and engineer, the balance of the party were brought to New Orleans by the American Government. They were landed there, and we were advised in Minneapolis that our employees were there.

Our manager, through his influence, or, rather, his acquaintance with some of the officers who were sent to Vera Cruz, got permission to land at Vera Cruz, and with him his field superintendent and engineer. He remained there for a period of about four months and tried through correspondence to take charge of the operations of the plantation. After several weeks he finally succeeded in getting our engineer back to the place under the British flag. I think it was about the 1st of October that our engineer considered it was safe for himself and his field superintendent to return.

Mr. KEARFUL. 1914?

Mr. LOUCKS. Yes. I want to say right here that our native employees were quite loyal to the company during this difficult time, and when we got back the only loss or destruction we could discover was in the administration houses, and that had been caused by the forces of the Government. Our employees had remained faithfully at work and were willing to stay and work.

Mr. KEARFUL. Without any American overseer?

Mr. LOUCKS. Without any American overseer, notwithstanding our Government was at war with Mexico. That will give you an idea of the relations between the company and its native employees.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever have any difficulty in getting protection from Huerta while he remained in power?

Mr. LOUCKS. None whatever; and we were protected in every sense of the word, so much so that we had no complaints whatever to offer, and we carried on the operations at the plantation in absolute peace and security.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of any hostility by Huerta or his Government toward any Americans before the taking of Vera Cruz?

Mr. LOUCKS. I do not, any more than that, I do not recall that a single American lost his life in Mexico during the Huerta administration for 15 months. I don't recall any.

Mr. KEARFUL. Even with the taking of Vera Cruz, Huerta protected the Americans?

Mr. LOUCKS. Absolutely. The officers who came to the place to remove the ammunition were as courteous to us as we could ask. They said they were doing it for our own good, because no one knew what might happen with the state of affairs going on, and what might happen if it continued to get worse. They regretted to do so, but were compelled by orders to carry out the plan.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please proceed to describe your operations from that time on.

Mr. LOUCKS. It would be a very difficult matter to describe what happened to us after that. I think it would make a story longer than I would care to tell or you would care to listen to, because it was continual. We could not do anything, seemingly, to satisfy the officials of the Carranza Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did the officials of the Carranza Government commence their operations in your locality?

Mr. LOUCKS. We began to feel the effects of them in August or September of the year 1914. At that time we were trying to ship some raw sugar to New York. Our first obstacle was when we assembled a cargo of sugar at the port of Mexico. It was raw sugar, and we asked for permission to ship it to New York. We were told by an official who represented the Carranza faction that he would not permit the sugar to go. He wrote us a very disagreeable letter stating his reasons, and we later took the sugar back to the plantation. That was the beginning of real hostilities.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the reasons given for not permitting the sugar to go?

Mr. LOUCKS. He stated that we were raising the price of our sugar and that the native employees were being robbed. Until we came to the point where we were willing to reduce the price he would not permit us to ship any sugar abroad, notwithstanding all our sugar had been sold under contract, and we could not raise the price if we wanted to. As a matter of fact, all the sugar I just mentioned was sold by myself before leaving the plantation, with the exception of this little raw sugar—was sold under contract before I left the plantation. The price was agreed upon and the fact that the price rose in New York had nothing whatever to do with ours. I might add that some of the Yucatan merchants to whom I had sold took some of that sugar and reshipped it to New York at a profit, but we were not responsible. We sold that sugar in the month of April.

Mr. KEARFUL. What Government was operating in Yucatan?

Mr. LOUCKS. I am not prepared to state. Most of our product went to Yucatan.

Mr. KEARFUL. It was Carrancista?

Mr. LOUCKS. It was Carrancista.

Mr. KEARFUL. There was absolutely no truth, then, in the position?

Mr. LOUCKS. Absolutely no truth or justice. We had absolutely no sugar to sell at that time except some raw sugar that you could not use without it being refined, and that was being sent to New York.

Mr. KEARFUL. When were the first depredations committed on your plantation?

Mr. LOUCKS. In 1917 the first raid took place.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that by the Carrancistas?

Mr. LOUCKS. It is hardly fair to say that the first was then. I have a schedule here showing when we had visits of other elements in the district which were called by the Carrancista forces bandits. It is very difficult to consider our position without taking these matters together.

April 24. This happens to be a deposition by our assistant manager, Mr. F. W. Moore, now deceased, who was with the company for many years and had charge of all confidential matters. This shows that on April 24, 1916, or two days after the American forces had landed in Vera Cruz, there were 1,164 cases of alcohol, of 84 liters each, confiscated by one Maj. Jose M. Figueroa, chief of garrison at Santa Lucrecia. That appears to be the first loss.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that a Carranza garrison?

Mr. LOUCKS. That was under Huerta. That was shortly after Huerta started out.

Then there is the taking of the guns. I have a detailed list here of the amounts taken.

Mr. KEARFUL. I had reference to actual depredations by bandits.

Mr. LOUCKS. I want to take these in their order, but we will come to that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Very well.

Mr. LOUCKS. On October 31 was apparently the first clash in a dollars-and-cents way with the Mexican Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. What year?

Mr. LOUCKS. 1914. We had purchased about 20,000 pesos of stamps which have to be attached to the bills of lading; we had purchased them from the Government in the regular way, paid for them, when we were advised by the officials in Mexico City that there was a new issue of stamps and we would have to exchange what we had on hand for those that were to be used from then on. This involved about 6,000 pesos. We asked that they be good enough to make the exchange for new ones, and they told us no. Considerable correspondence took place, and they finally told us they would give us 10 days, I think it was, to return the stamps or be fined in the sum of 15,000 pesos, as I recollect it.

I took the manager and the stamps and visited the City of Mexico and presented the entire matter to the Brazilian minister, who was then acting for our interests in Mexico. That appears to be the first loss. I might add that we never got anything out of it.

Now, we come to 1915, June 30, cash for the bandit Alor. That was before any Government was recognized. The first was for 500 pesos on the 30th of the same month.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that tribute exacted?

Mr. LOUCKS. That is payment to them, as they claim, for the protection of our shipping up and down the river. These bandits were in control of the river and the river was our only means of transportation. They stated to us if we would assist them in their military organization they would protect our shipments. There was very little left for us to do but comply.

On June 30, 2,000 pesos; on August 6, 10, 14, 24, 26, 27, 28, 30, 31—twice on the 31st—they appeared at the plantation taking various articles, a list of which I have here, and all of which was receipted for by them. Again in September of the same year, October, November, December, at various times they appeared at the place and took from the store goods amounting in all to 9,136.76 pesos.

In December of the same year I find a charge for Carrancista soldiers at the plantation of 799.98 pesos.

Mr. KEARFUL. That represents the garrison?

Mr. LOUCKS. That represents the garrison which we were supplying with food. In June to December, 1915, estimated value of bedding and other articles stolen from plantation clubhouse by Alor's bandits, 1,262 pesos.

February, 1915, to fine imposed by civil judge at Minatitlan for violation of labor law, 500 pesos. I might add in that connection that after much controversy the judge told us that we were not culpable, but the fine was never returned.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the charge? With what crime were you charged?

Mr. LOUCKS. I do not recall. It was some violation of the new labor law; I don't recall just exactly what that charge was, but it later proved that it had nothing to do with our men but with some of the contractors' men who were on the plantation. We employed several contractors and they had under their jurisdiction their own particular body of men. The matter was taken up with the military authorities at Vera Cruz and was finally adjusted in this fashion, that while the company was not culpable and should not be fined the 500 pesos, in view of the fact the law had been violated on our place by the contractors the contractors should be fined 200 pesos each—I think it was five of them—and that the company should see that the fine was paid. So we got further into trouble by talking about it.

On August 13, 1915, Mr. E. F. Wells, our auditor, was returning from Vera Cruz to the plantation, bringing with him money belonging to the plantation to the amount of ₧10,000. His train was assaulted by bandits and Mr. Wells killed and the money carried away by the bandits. On leaving the plantation for Vera Cruz a few days before Mr. Wells took with him a draft belonging to the plantation to collect same, which he did, but as he could not report the disposition of the money it was lost to the plantation. The amount of this draft was ₧1,008. That is in excess of the ₧10,000.

I think I will read the balance here, because it will give you an idea of the difficulties we were encountering.

January 14, 1916, Amduring & Co., of Vera Cruz, reported they had attempted to resell the sum of $460 in bank bills which Mr. Fouche, our employee, had left with them for that purpose; that $325 of the amount was rejected as counterfeit, but not returned to the company. Whether the bills were bad or not I do not know, but they were in forcible circulation and it was a crime to refuse to accept the money in circulation.

That will give you an idea of the difficulties. We were compelled to bring money of one kind or another to certain places to have it revalidated. We would hand it to an official and he would tell you to come back at 2 o'clock. Perhaps he would be there when you came back and perhaps he would not, and he would hand you whatever he saw fit and no questions were to be asked.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was any question raised as to whether the money was counterfeit?

Mr. LOUCKS. There were no questions answered or asked by the officials. It was simply handed to you; nothing whatever said about their being counterfeit.

Mr. KEARFUL. Would they exchange the actual amount?

Mr. LOUCKS. Oh, no; nothing was given in return. They simply handed you back what they saw fit.

Mr. KEARFUL. Would that be considerably less—

Mr. LOUCKS. Always less.

Mr. KEARFUL. No reason was given for that?

Mr. LOUCKS. No; in this country we would call it plain stealing. March 18, 1916, another fine for violation of labor law imposed by Civil Judge Luis Selana, of Santa Lucrecia, Vera Cruz, amount deposited. Appeal demanded to the governor of the State. No decision up to date, April 29, 1916.

I just want to say a word of explanation. Shortly after the Carranza force came into power we were visited by a labor inspector, who immediately set about to discourage the men and disorganize the work at the plantation, and he was very successful. He got the men to the point where they did not consider they had any obligation to the company, where they did not have to work if they did not wish to; and he went so far as to tell them that they could not be ejected from the houses if they did not work.

Mr. KEARFUL. Houses that belong to the company?

Mr. LOUCKS. Houses that belonged to the company.

Mr. KEARFUL. And that they were occupying free of charge?

Mr. LOUCKS. That they were occupying free of charge, which placed us in a position where it was next to impossible for us to operate, because there was a certain element there that was willing to take advantage of that situation. This fine that I am speaking of was the result of another visit of—I think the man's name was Llano. He came to the place, accepting our hospitality, even borrowed P200 from the manager, stayed there several weeks. We tried to show him how we were endeavoring to operate and make work for the natives. We did all we could to satisfy him and them. He left the place.

A few days later our manager was ordered to appear at Santa Lucrecia, and this 1,000 pesos of fine was imposed as a result of this man's visit, and these were the charges: They fined us 200 pesos because some laborer reported that he had worked after 6 o'clock; 200 pesos because we did not have separate schools on the plantation where the boys and girls could go separately; 200 pesos because in his judgment the hospital was not up to legal requirements.

Mr. KEARFUL. There were schools and hospitals that were maintained by the company free of charge?

Mr. LOUCKS. By the company, and that we furnished at a cost of probably 5,000 pesos a month.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was voluntary on your part?

Mr. LOUCKS. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. There was no law requiring you to do it?

Mr. LOUCKS. Yes; there was a law at this time. You had to furnish the hospital free. The new law of Mexico, I think, provides that any plantation employing more than 200 men must provide all this, and we came under that law.

Mr. KEARFUL. But you had established those things before the law was passed?

Mr. LOUCKS. Oh, yes; long before that.

Two hundred pesos because some employees had appeared at the plantation with nothing to eat, unfit to work, and before going to work our manager had given them an order on the store to get something in order to keep them alive. Two hundred pesos because we were liquidating the men, or paying the men, rather, every 10 days instead of every 7 days, as the new law required, notwithstanding we had the written consent of the previous governor of the State of Vera Cruz to pay every 10 days, owing to the fact it was almost impossible to get the money to the plantation.

That will give a good idea of the assistance the Carranza Government was trying to give us in those parlous times. I learned later that this inspector received 40 per cent of the fines, and that showed where his interests lay.

June 15 to January, damage caused by losing our steamer and time lost when boat was detained, 3,146.17 pesos.

To damages since January to April 6, 1916, by boat not running on account of danger to be incurred, he still dominating the river, 8,506.74 pesos.

I might say that during this period the Carranza Government had sent a general to the plantation for the avowed purpose of cleaning out the bandits down the river. His name was Col. Silva. He had a detachment of about 40 or 50 men. He requisitioned our steamboat and our barges and started down the river. They got in sight of where the bandits ought to have been, turned around, and came back to the plantation. Now, to give you a better idea of the way things were going in that district, that same Col. Silva wound up by using our boats and barges to transport hides and stuff which the bandits were furnishing him to sell at, I presume, a divvy, and instead of cleaning up the bandits they were cleaning up the farmers in that particular district. The last I knew the Carranza Government had Col. Silva in jail.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do not know what they did with him?

Mr. LOUCKS. No; I do not know what they did with him. They then sent a fellow by the name of Villamar. He is the only man I ever saw in the Carranza army who looked like a soldier. He was an old Chapultepec man and apparently a fine fellow. He was taken by another Carranza officer and invited to dine with him and wine with him and taken on the hill and shot. Now, his chief offense was, so far as I can learn, that he was an old Porfirio Diaz man.

I am telling these instances of what happened up and down the river so you will get this connection, that the Carranza government, instead of exterminating the bandits, was only stirring up antagonism for our company. We, at that time, were in perfect good standing with the bandits who were operating up and down the river, but when they saw our boats being used by the Government soldiers to come down and shoot their men—and, I believe, as a matter of fact, there were three or four men killed, they then swore vengeance on the Tabasco Plantation Co. for allowing their boats to be used for that purpose. You will now see how we found ourselves between the two millstones to be ground out of existence.

Mr. KEARFUL. You had a garrison of Carranza soldiers on the estate?

Mr. LOUCKS. That appears to be the next item: Rations issued to soldiers who were garrisoned on plantation La Oaxaquena, 5,778 pesos.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was a direct payment made for special protection?

Mr. LOUCKS. That was rations given to them for protection.

Mr. KEARFUL. What protection did they afford?

Mr. LOUCKS. They got us into more trouble than they ever got us out of. They were the chief cause of our trouble. They could neither protect us or prevent us from getting into conflict with others.

Mr. KEARFUL. What operations they conducted against the revolutionists resulted, as I understand you, in further reprisals on the part of the rebels.

Mr. LOUCKS. Antagonism and reprisals.

Mr. KEARFUL. And reprisals by the rebels would result in further incursions by the Carranza soldiers?

Mr. LOUCKS. Further nonsense. Put it that way. In fact, the rebels demanded of us that we get the soldiers off the plantation and they stated to us at the same time, "We will give you ample protection." And I might say, in passing, so long as the friendly relations existed the only loss to the company was the matter of a few pesos now and then.

Mr. KEARFUL. The rebels did afford you protection so long as the Carranza soldiers stayed away?

Mr. LOUCKS. So long as the Carranza soldiers stayed away. That later became our reason for being obliged to close down because it was impossible to operate, situated as we were on the river with our only means of transportation going up and down the line which was controlled by the bandits. This made it impossible to operate successfully without the consent of the Carranza government.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did you finally close down?

Mr. LOUCKS. The 1st of May, 1917.

Mr. KEARFUL. What action was subsequently taken with reference to an attack upon your titles by the Carranza government?

Mr. LOUCKS. During the month of September, 1918, we were notified by our representative in Mexico City by wire that the original concession from which our property was derived had been declared canceled by the Carranza government and we were given until the first day of October of the same year in which to appear before the Department of Fomento and take up the matter of revalidation; failing to do so the property would revert to the Mexican Government. That came to Minneapolis by wire about the 20th of September, 1918.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was it necessary for you to do in order to revalidate your titles?

Mr. LOUCKS. The first thing I did was wire the substance of the letter to the State Department at Washington and request a night-letter reply. That was the first step. I then wrote our representative in Mexico City to await the advice from Washington.

I might say that I wired—as soon as the reply came—I wired the substance of the reply to our representative in Mexico City and sent a confirmation in a closed envelope. In the course of time I received a reply stating that the letter came but the wire never reached them; it had been intercepted by the Mexican Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the requirement of the Mexican Government with reference to revalidation?

Mr. LOUCKS. They asked that we must waive our nationality right and prove title to the property. We corresponded back and forth for months. They finally asked for the deeds, every bit of evidence having to do with the purchase of the property, and while doing this they took up the matter with our local representative at the plantation and submitted a set of questions which they requested that he answer categorically. As soon as I discovered what was going on I wired and stopped that information coming from that end. One of the questions they wanted answered from him was when we closed down operations and why we closed down operation, how many employees we had on the plantation, what was the nature of our operations and the magnitude of our investment, stating as they did that they wanted this information in order to give a firm reply to an inquiry which had come from the State Department at Washington, D. C.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you understand was meant by a waiver of national rights?

Mr. LOUCKS. Agree to comply with the provisions of article 27, which states that no foreigner can ask for assistance from his Government in case of trouble with the Mexican officials upon penalty of losing his property in case of violation.

Mr. KEARFUL. If your property was taken or destroyed you would have no recourse to your own Government?

Mr. LOUCKS. Absolutely.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the outcome of that?

Mr. LOUCKS. Eventually the Carranza government issued a manifesto in the Diario Oficial, a paper which is published in an official way, stating that the Tabasco Plantation Co. was the present owner of the property La Oaxaquena; that all officials would take due note of that fact. I might add that we did not waive our nationality rights.

Mr. KEARFUL. While this negotiation was pending was there any proposition made by third parties as to fixing the matter up by the payment of a sum of money?

Mr. LOUCKS. The suggestion was made that for 10,000 pesos they thought the matter could be settled or handled.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you accede to that proposition or entertain it?

Mr. LOUCKS. None whatever.

Mr. KEARFUL. You did not pay any money?

Mr. LOUCKS. None whatever excepting the costs and attorney's fees and necessary expense; considerable money, but none for tribute. I could not say that that came from the head of the Mexican Government. Matters of that kind are handled in such fashion in Mexico that you never can get to the real source. But that was the suggestion that was made to us.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever encounter Luis Cabrera in connection with any proposition to extort money from your company?

Mr. LOUCKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. When was that?

Mr. LOUCKS. That was the first extorting.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who is Luis Cabrera?

Mr. LOUCKS. At the present time I think he is minister Fomento. He was at that time, I believe, minister or acting minister of finance, or the treasury, of the Mexican Government when they were stationed at Vera Cruz. It happened in the latter part of the year 1914 we had shipped a small consignment of raw sugar to New York, there being no export duty at that time. A few days or weeks after the shipment was made the Carranza organization imposed an export duty on raw sugar. Mr. Cabrera as acting minister, wrote us that we would have to send at once the sum of $2,500 in United States gold as duty on the last consignment which we had sent. This led to much controversy and corresponding, and he finally wrote us in January following that in view of the fact there seemed to be misunderstanding he would modify that to the extent of making it $1,800 United States gold and demanded that the money be sent at once under the pain of having the law applied in case we refused.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you understand him to mean by that?

Mr. LOUCKS. I turned to our assistant manager, happening to be at the plantation, and I asked him what that meant. He said he assumed it meant the gun.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you comply with that demand?

Mr. LOUCKS. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what resulted?

Mr. LOUCKS. I think in about 30 days we were advised the debt had been pardoned. Hardly was that out of the way when we were approached from another angle by another set of officials who demanded we pay the Mexican Government a very large sum for a transaction that grew out of a government decree of 1906 by the terms of which Porfirio Diaz's government sent quite a number of Yaqui Indians from the State of Sonora to the Isthmus. Among our employees we finally made arrangements to have about, I think there were 260 all told, including men, women, and children of this group sent to our plantation. This was all handled through the office of Casanus, who was our legal adviser at that time and handled in a perfectly legitimate way directly with the Mexican Government. That demand grew until it finally assumed a proportion of between 200,000 and 300,000 pesos.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the nature of the demand?

Mr. LOUCKS. It seems at the time those Yaquis were sent to us they were prisoners of war and the arrangement was that we should take them, and correspondence shows that the first thing we should do was to doctor them, get them back into shape where they were able to work. They were mostly diseased. And then they should work for us for a small consideration as wards of the Government. It cost us about 15,000 pesos transportation and for payment of the heads of the families to get them to the place. Many of them died, most of them ran away, and but few of them remained to do much active service. The official representing the Carranza government discovered that some of those Yaquis were still at our plantation, the very young, I think about seven of the next generation or some of the younger fellows; they finally made their demand in the form of one peso a day for every man, woman, and child for the entire 365 days of the year plus 6 per cent interest from the time they had arrived at the plantation until the Madero government came into being. The sum total was between 200,000 and 300,000 pesos and this demand was made on us, that we pay at once to avoid serious consequences. We had and we have yet no way of knowing whether the Carranza government was responsible for this demand, but the demand was made just the same.

Mr. KEARFUL. By Carranza officials?

Mr. LOUCKS. By Carranza officials.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that demand scaled down when they found they could not collect the full amount?

Mr. LOUCKS. That was reduced until we were finally presented with the suggestion that 37,000 pesos would settle the entire deal.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you pay it?

Mr. LOUCKS. No portion of it. We got the information in the hands of the State Department at Washington and a copy of it in the hands of the Carranza government as soon as possible, and from the correspondence I have it would seem the State Department inquired of the Mexican Government what law they were applying in our case, and there the matter dropped.

I cite this to show you the antagonism that seemed to be from the very beginning. As a matter of fact, we were told by one of the minor officials who visited the place in 1916 that if it were not for the fact that we were working under concessions of the Porfirio Diaz government they would feel more like giving us protection.

Mr. KEARFUL. What concessions did you have from the Porfirio Diaz government?

Mr. LOUCKS. I never knew to this day. The only thing that I can discover that was in the nature of a concession was the fact that by stipulation of law we were not required to pay any tax on the machinery we used in the buildings. That was exempt by law from tax.

When the Carranza government came into power they taxed our buildings, the machinery, and everything that went with it, and added 1,000,000 to the tax list.

Mr. KEARFUL. That exemption from taxation, as I understand it, was extended as an inducement to start the enterprise and build it up?

Mr. LOUCKS. That was it exactly, and it is now admitted by the present officials, because we are still in controversy over our tax and a few days ago we had a letter from one of the minor officials calling the attention of the others to the fact that the discrepancy was that we had apparently been overtaxed; that according to the law of eighteen hundred and eighty-something, I believe it was, the machinery should not have been taxed for the reasons which you have just stated; neither were the buildings to be taxed, because they were given to the employees at no cost to them—the buildings on the plantation. That is the only concession I have in mind or could ever think of that they referred to, but they seemed to be under the impression that we were favorites in some way of the Porfirio Diaz government.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have any of the buildings on your plantation been destroyed?

Mr. LOUCKS. Many of them have been.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you able to conduct any operations there now?

Mr. LOUCKS. No, sir; we have a caretaker, a few employees and watchmen to look after the buildings; that is all.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you know about instances of graft on the part of Carranza generals in reference to shipments of cattle and other commodities out of Mexico?

Mr. LOUCKS. Our attention was called to matters of that kind in various ways. In the year 1915 there was an officer appeared at the plantation with a few soldiers and stated that it was his purpose to remain at the plantation and recruit men for the service. We tried to explain to him that it was the only time we had for harvesting the crop, and as we only had about one-third of a crew it would be very serious not only to us but the men. He relieved himself by saying "To hell with your plantation. I am here for myself." That was about the beginning of our knowledge of what was going on inside of the Carranza organization. He then perfectly frankly stated to us that he was there for the purpose of getting our men, and he further stated that for every man he got to enlist he would get so many pesos and for every certain number of men he got he was to get an addition to his shoulder straps.

Now, he was willing to take his pay in Carranza money. He recruited about 100 men. He further stated to us, and that might be of interest to note right here, because it will give the scheme of the Carranza organization at that time. He said, "The purpose of my government is to get 100,000 people assembled and we are then going to demand recognition by the United States Government, and my part of it is to get as much out of it as I can." He told the young men that he induced to go—he said, "There will be no fighting; that is not the intention. You can ride up and down the trains; you will have your wife with you, you will have occasion to take part in what is going on if there is any looting going on, and you will generally have a good time."

I saw boys that had been with us from almost their childhood leave with their wives and babies to join the Carranza army. A few days after they were back at the place.

A short time after that we were notified by an official that no native foodstuffs, such as rice, corn, and beans, could be shipped from one canton to another without permission from the officials. We then discovered that it was for the purpose of the military organization having control of the State of Vera Cruz to assemble those foodstuffs for themselves, which they did in large quantities, both at Puerto Mexico and Vera Cruz. At that time the country as a whole was at the point of starvation and there was an embargo by the Carranza organization that no foodstuffs should be shipped out of the country. Notwithstanding that fact, I personally saw large consignments of beans and corn, rice, and hides sent to the city of Vera Cruz and landed at Habana by permission of the Carranza officials. The cattle were gathered together in large groups at Vera Cruz and were taken by the shipload to Habana, Galveston, Texas City, and New Orleans. Now, they were not stolen by the Carrancista officials; they were paid for according to the amounts which the parties at Vera Cruz that had concessions for doing this were willing to give.

I recall at that time they were paying about 40 pesos for Carrancista money, which had small value, if any, for the cattle. I do not know what they paid for the beans, but I know they gathered them up in large quantities under the pretext that the Carrancista Government was in need of them for the soldiers. Carranza's son-in-law was the military governor of Vera Cruz at that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Candido Aguilar?

Mr. LOUCKS. Aguilar, and had full charge of the operations.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of money was paid for the food products?

Mr. LOUCKS. The paper money issued by Carranza. I was in Mexico just a short time after that and talked with an American, a planter, whose name I do not care to disclose, who happened to have charge of the relief work for the City of Mexico. He told me that the American colony raised a fund of several thousand dollars, hired a man to go to one of the adjoining States to gather up several carloads of corn and bring it to Mexico to relieve the destitute there. After assembling the corn every bit of it was taken by Obregon, who was Carranza's chief general.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of money was received for those products by the authorities who shipped them?

Mr. LOUCKS. I presume they received good money; they were sold in Habana and in the United States of America. There were tens of thousands of heads of cattle sent out of the city of Vera Cruz by the same officials and sold for American gold at the very time when the people in Mexico were starving for the want of meat and at the very time when our own Government was asking the people of the United States to send food to the starving in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What particular thing was resorted to in reference to the gathering up and shipment of hides?

Mr. LOUCKS. The first step taken by the company in Vera Cruz which had the concessions for the State of Vera Cruz—and, by the way, they were relatives of the Carranza government—was to get control of all the salt. It being very warm in that country, it is impossible to keep a hide for but a few days without salt immediately. There was an embargo placed upon the exportation of hides. The agent of this Reguladora was then sent out to gather up all the hides of the natives, who were obliged to sell at anything they were willing to offer for them rather than to have them spoil on their hands. As soon as a cargo of hides was gathered at the port of Mexico or Vera Cruz the embargo was lifted for a period of 10 to 15 days until the hides were shipped out, and the embargo was on again. By this process the people were robbed of their hides as well as they had been robbed of their corn and their beans, and their good money had been taken by practically the same process. It was a crime punishable by death to have real good money in our possession at the plantation.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you mean by real good money?

Mr. LOUCKS. I mean silver or hildalgos, or gold that had formerly been in circulation in Mexico during the time the paper money was in vogue.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say it was a crime punishable by death to have it in your possession?

Mr. LOUCKS. To hoard real money.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were you supposed to do with it if you had it?

Mr. LOUCKS. Turn it over to the Government in exchange for money in circulation then.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, that money in circulation, while it passed current at some value for a time, finally became absolutely worthless?

Mr. LOUCKS. It became absolutely worthless. We were left with 172,000 pesos on our hands.

Mr. KEARFUL. Which you had been forced to take?

Mr. LOUCKS. Which we had been forced to take in payment for our products.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the penalty for refusing to take that sort of money?

Mr. LOUCKS. The same penalty. Imagine, if you can, people in the City of Mexico hiding in cellars and wells to keep from accepting paper money in payment of legitimate obligations. I personally was told by a foreigner in the City of Mexico that he had retired an obligation on his plant of 25,000 pesos for about $1,700. He further told me that he had purchased a home that belonged to Mexicans and originally cost 45,000 pesos for 8,700 by the process of turning over Carranza money, which was later declared of no value whatever.

Mr. KEARFUL. Upon what class of the people in Mexico did the burden of this fiat money mostly fall?

Mr. LOUCKS. Upon the working people and the small merchants and the small farmers who owned a little farm and had anywhere from 500 to 10,000 pesos in property. They were literally cleaned out.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you perceive any distinction between taking a man's labor for nothing or stealing his merchandise or property and the exacting of such labor, merchandise or property in exchange for money that subsequently becomes worthless?

Mr. LOUCKS. I see no difference whatever. I can see no difference whatever. We had so many different kinds of money that it took an expert, and we had a man in the office who was practically reading the money continually to know what to accept and at what price. With an organization such as we had there, being obliged by the requirements of the labor law to pay the men individually and every Saturday night, you can readily appreciate what it meant to us trying to find actual money to pay the men. It was a simple matter to get a $1,000 bill, and it was just as easy to make a $1,000 bill as a $1 bill, because it did not cost any more for the paper or to print it, but we were bound to split those up and compelled to pay a bonus in order to get the small bills. Mr. Wells before he was murdered put in practically all his time scurrying around the country trying to gather up small bills in one, two, and five peso denomination, and in all the time we had absolutely no assistance from the Mexican Government. They would not let us pay the men out of the store and keep them that way, but compelled us to pay them every Saturday night, and for violation fined us, as I just reported to you.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were all your trials and tribulations reported to the State Department?

Mr. LOUCKS. They were not categorically, but most of them were. We kept the State Department in touch at all times with our situation and reported exactly what was going on.

Mr. KEARFUL. What advice did you receive as to how to proceed?

Mr. LOUCKS. We did not receive any advice. The only advice we received was that the letter had been received and would be passed on.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you receive advice more than once to get out of the country?

Mr. LOUCKS. Oh, yes; and up to this day we have never had that rescinded, although I have asked the State Department if they were prepared to rescind that order. And I might add here that the last time our manager left the country he was obliged to sign a waiver that if he returned to Mexico the Government of the United States would not protect him any further.

Mr. KEARFUL. He was obliged to sign that waiver in order to get a passport from this country as an American citizen?

Mr. LOUCKS. No; he wanted to return to Mexico and in order to return he was obliged to sign that waiver.

Mr. KEARFUL. He was an American citizen?

Mr. LOUCKS. He was an American citizen.

Mr. KEARFUL. Advised by the State Department to sign that waiver?

Mr. LOUCKS. I do not know whether it was the State Department; it was through the consul.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did the State Department make any representations upon the rights of Americans to go back to Mexico to attend to their business without signing such a waiver?

Mr. LOUCKS. That I do not know. The only relations I have personally had with the Government was to get a passport on the occasion of my last visit to Mexico. I received a passport after going through the usual process. I went to Mexico and returned to Minneapolis, and since then I have not asked the State Department for any suggestions.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of a waiver did you have to make in order to get that?

Mr. LOUCKS. I made none, except to state what my business was and how long I intended to be there and when I would return.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did the Mexican consul require you to sign a waiver?

Mr. LOUCKS. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. From your experience in Mexico, what do you consider to be the basis of the present Mexican Government—what is it founded on?

Mr. LOUCKS. Personally, I believe it goes back to the remark made by Secretary Bryan when he was Secretary of State shortly after the inauguration of the present administration. He made this statement: "The Government of the United States will not lift its finger on behalf of Americans or their money invested in Mexico."

That was known in Mexico inside of 24 hours. The next step was when the President of the United States in one of his noble speeches referred to the Americans in Mexico as a mere handful of promoters who had gone to Mexico for the purpose of exploiting the people and the resources of the country.

Those two things in themselves were quite enough to bring about the present situation so far as the Americans are concerned.

Mr. KEARFUL. So far as the Mexican people are concerned, what is the basis of the Mexican Government?

Mr. LOUCKS. The basis?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. LOUCKS. What it is founded on, do you mean?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes; what enables the ruling body to remain in power aside from the operations of this Government?

Mr. LOUCKS. It was brought together by promise of loot; it is held together by graft. It has as its fundamental principle the punishment of any and everybody that ever had anything to do with the Porfirio Diaz government or is opposed to the present administration.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of other sugar plantations in Mexico besides your own that are in similar condition?

Mr. LOUCKS. I know of others that have been put out of business completely.

Mr. KEARFUL. Some worse off than yourself?

Mr. LOUCKS. Well, it would be difficult to be much worse off than we; but some who have not attempted to operate for several years; some who had abandoned them entirely.

Mr. KEARFUL. During the time that these plantations have not operated what has been the necessity for sugar in Mexico?

Mr. LOUCKS. Mexico has for the past four years been pleading for sugar. For the past three years they have almost been on their knees begging for sugar. Two years ago, while we were being put out of business, the Government of the United States exported to Mexico a little more than 18,000 tons of sugar; Cuba at the same time exported to Mexico between 6,000 and 7,000 tons, or a total of 20,000 tons.

Mr. KEARFUL. Normally—

Mr. LOUCKS. Normally, Mexico was exporting thousands of tons of sugar. The State of Vera Cruz alone produced a maximum of 52,000 tons in normal days, and the State of Morelos 48,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have been aware of very stringent shortages of sugar in this country recently?

Mr. LOUCKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that would be affected if the sugar was allowed to be produced in Mexico as it was under Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. LOUCKS. Quite naturally; quite naturally. I want to add right now that the sugar that was purchased by the Mexicans and sent from the United States was paid for very largely by money extorted or robbed from the Americans in Mexico, for the Government has been very, very close to all of these transactions.

Mr. KEARFUL. You knew John Lind, did you not?

Mr. LOUCKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. He was a representative sent to Mexico by President Wilson to eliminate Huerta?

Mr. LOUCKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where did you know him?

Mr. LOUCKS. I knew him first as the governor of the State of Minnesota; later as a fellow townsman of the city of Minneapolis.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you meet him in Vera Cruz?

Mr. LOUCKS. I never met him in Vera Cruz; some of our people have, but personally I never took the pains to call on him.

Mr. KEARFUL. You did not advise with him about your troubles while you were at Vera Cruz?

Mr. LOUCKS. Others of our company did.

Mr. KEARFUL. Your company did?

Mr. LOUCKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know what advice he gave your company in regard to what you should do?

Mr. LOUCKS. His advice was that we support Carranza.

Mr. KEARFUL. At all events?

Mr. LOUCKS. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know when the great sisal monopoly of Yucatan was formed?

Mr. LOUCKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. When was that?

Mr. LOUCKS. I believe it was in the year 1915. I am not certain whether it was in 1915 or 1916. I believe it was in the month of September. I recall distinctly when it was, but I would not say as to those two years. It is a matter of record, anyway. It was while Mr. Lind was in Mexico, whenever that period was. That would be 1915.

Mr. KEARFUL. 1914.

Mr. LOUCKS. 1914. Well, it was whenever he was in Mexico, you can fix it from that.

Mr. KEARFUL. What connection, if any, did Lind have with that transaction?

Mr. LOUCKS. Personally, I could not say.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do know that his son was given an important position at the time of their organization, do you not?

Mr. LOUCKS. It has been so stated and published in our local papers on several occasions since then.

Mr. KEARFUL. He has not denied it, has he?

Mr. LOUCKS. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. You know something about the operations of that monopoly, do you not?

Mr. LOUCKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you describe them as far as you know? They have been given here in evidence to some extent before.

Mr. LOUCKS. So far as the American end of the proposition was concerned, I have been advised that the first step was the creation of a fund of $10,000,000 which was to be for the purpose of protecting shipments and bills of lading, etc., a guaranty, as it were. The money, I believe, was furnished by bankers of New Orleans. I was further advised that the first $5,000,000 of this money was paid to Mr. Carranza personally for the privilege of pulling off the deal.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know the name of the general who was operating in Yucatan then under Carranza—Salvador Alvarado?

Mr. LOUCKS. I do not know the man personally; I know he was the man in charge, and I have talked at various times with people who were there, but personally I was never in Merida. I do know that was the beginning of the sisal trust.

Mr. KEARFUL. But the monopoly was operated under the directions and for the benefit of Salvador Alvarado?

Mr. LOUCKS. That is my understanding.

Mr. KEARFUL. A Carranza general?

Mr. LOUCKS. Yes, sir. I do not wish to cast any aspersions, but there seems to be somehow a connection between the events which have just been enumerated.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever see a booklet published by John Lind entitled "The Mexican People"?

Mr. LOUCKS. I don't recall; I have seen much of his sayings, but I don't recall that particular book.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was published in this country about December, 1914, after Mr. Lind returned from Mexico.

Mr. LOUCKS. I recall, and I remember some of our people went to call on him in the city of Minneapolis and talked with him and his opinion then was exactly the same as when he was in Mexico; there was nothing to do except to stand by Carranza. My personal conviction is that Judge Douglas and John Lind were largely responsible for the recognition of Carranza. I never thought any different.

Mr. KEARFUL. By Judge Douglas you mean Charles A. Douglas?

Mr. LOUCKS. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Attorney for Carranza?

Mr. LOUCKS. Attorney for Carranza.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you been informed that after Mr. Lind returned from Mexico and about the time of Carranza's recognition by this country Lind was on the pay roll of the Carranza government?

Mr. LOUCKS. No, sir; I know of ways of doing things in Mexico, and I can readily understand how that might have been the case.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your view about the truth of the statement emanating from high official sources that American citizens in Mexico are not entitled to consideration because they were engaged in exploiting the Mexican people?

Mr. LOUCKS. I have pointed out as in the matter of our employment, our treatment of the labor, the amount that we were paying them for their daily wage, that there is absolutely no truth in that so far as our company is concerned, and I want to answer that I know of no Americans in Mexico that have treated their Mexican employees badly. I know of many cases where stockholders have been defrauded, but they were stockholders in the United States. In the olden days when I first began going to Mexico Americans I believe were respected above all other foreign nationalities. I know that from the peon to the newsboys they looked on Americans with respect for the simple reason that the Americans were not only fair, but they were just.

Mr. KEARFUL. They were generous, were they not?

Mr. LOUCKS. Yes; generous. A newsboy in the city of Vera Cruz would select an American newcomer to get his shoes shined because he knew he would get his shoes shined. I know some nationalities they refused to talk to because they knew they would not shine their shoes.

I remember the first friction was a matter you bring to my mind by the question the Americans were going down there for the reason they were paying to the natives too much, causing trouble to the old Spaniards. The old Spaniards with their enormous haciendas and innumerable employees, were paying the lowest wage the people could live on. They had a contract system which you know about, the hacienda store, and a man was in perpetual slavery. The only way a man could get relief was by stealing and getting dismissed or by having somebody come along and buy his contract, pay the amount to the owner and get relieved. The Americans did not like that way of doing business. They immediately began to advance the price of labor, with the natural consequences; it offended this old class of Spaniards who were doing business the other way. That was the first friction we discovered in connection with our business.

Mr. KEARFUL. And did these operations of Americans enable the enslaved classes to escape from that condition?

Mr. LOUCKS. It did to the extent that slavery was abolished from the State of Vera Cruz before the revolution came into being by a process of evolution, which shows there was no need for revolution.

I have seen young men growing up from boyhood to young manhood occupying positions of importance and trust. I have in mind to-day a family of five boys. Four of them turned out well and the other turned out bandit. Two of those boys are in Cuba occupying very responsible positions, lifted up by the Americans and the opportunity for work. I remember a little peon boy that the manager and I brought to the States one time and for the first time in his life he saw the city of New York. He was nothing but a poor barefoot boy. The last time I visited our plantation when it was in operation I noticed one of the engines going by and the man at the throttle was this same little barefoot boy and he was pleased to tip his hat to the presidente. That is what we did for them. If that is exploiting I will answer your question the way.

Mr. KEARFUL. I think that the committee would be very much interested in having your opinion as to what ought to be done to put Mexico on its feet?

Mr. LOUCKS. A candid answer to that question might not work to the advantage of anybody with present holdings in Mexico, because naturally it is going to run counter to the present administration. I realize that the committee appointed by the Senate is for two purposes; one is to make an investigation, which is a very simple matter, but the other is to make recommendations of what to do for Mexico. I have my own opinions based upon due deliberation and my experience in the past in Mexico.

I do not believe that the Mexican people can give themselves a stable government. I have thought so for a long, long time. When the Carranza government came into power nobody hoped for his success more than we did. We had no choice. We never played favorites. All we wanted was the opportunity, as I have stated, not only to their officials but to our officials in Washington—was the opportunity of carrying on operations in conformity to the laws governing the country, but with the understanding that we should be protected. That is all we ever asked. That is all we ask at the present time.

I do not believe the present government in Mexico can ever succeed for several reasons: First, I do not believe it came into being honestly. I never thought so. Next, it has no due regard for the rights of others. If there was ever anything that made the Porfirio Diaz government strong was that he used that as a guiding thought always, that they must always recognize the rights of others.

I can not find in the new constitution of Mexico or the treatment that we have received that they have ever thought of adopting that principle. If that be true, I do not believe that any Government could ever succeed for any length of time in this new and enlightened day.

assistance from the outside?

Mr. LOUCKS. Yes; and of more than one kind. I stated to a friend of mine the other day that the Mexican vocabulary had narrowed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that it is necessary for Mexico to have itself down to two words—hate and revenge. Those two words mean more than anything in Mexico at the present time, and for that reason alone it is impossible to hope for a stable government, for most of the people that are opposed to Carranza have a deep-seated dislike for him for the reasons I have just enumerated. They have a real grievance. I am not thinking just now of the investments of foreigners in Mexico. I would go so far as to say that I would be willing to see our entire property sacrificed if the Mexican people—I mean the good people who wanted to work—could be given the right and opportunity to work under peace as they have a right to expect.

Mr. KEARFUL. Right there, what proportion of the population of Mexico do you consider good people, that is, potentially worthy citizens if they were given a chance?

Mr. LOUCKS. Until they were taught by their superiors other and worse things I would have said from 80 to 90 per cent were actually honest people—from 80 to 90 per cent. We had men there by the hundreds that we would trust not only to work but with any possession you might place with them. And I will go so far as to say they would defend that to the point of giving their lives, just so you gave them your confidence. That was the condition of affairs before the present revolution got to the point that they were taught, as I say, by their superiors that there were other and easier ways of getting a living than by work.

We always impressed upon our manager this: You can not expect the morals and morale at the plantation to be higher than those of our manager and we always sought to have men who were honest and clean, and we were successful.

If the present administration is honeycombed with fraud it is natural to believe many people would follow that way of getting a living. It is going to take some time to put them back, but I believe to-day there is more than 50 per cent of the people of Mexico who are absolutely honest—yes; more than 50 per cent who would be glad to work for an honest living. They do not want us to send down food. They want us to come down and establish a stable Government that will permit them to get a living wage.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think the good people of Mexico would be favorable to the United States going down to Mexico and putting the country in order?

Mr. LOUCKS. I said yes, but I would qualify it by saying not with the present administration in Washington.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do they distrust the present administration in Washington?

Mr. LOUCKS. There are two classes in Mexico having to do with that thought—one is a class that hates Washington and the other is a class that fears Washington—and there are very few who are to be found not in one or the other of those classes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the particular fear that they have?

Mr. LOUCKS. Two kinds of fear: First, we have had two or three punitive expeditions in Mexico. The average Mexican who could not see through the workings—and they were like many of us in this country—were suspicious as to what were the aims and objects of the American Government, whether they were really there to help them or whether they were really there to hurt them. After some little time they discovered that they were not going to be harmed; they immediately turned in to assist both the American soldiers and the American administration, hoping that they were there for keeps. I know this because I have been told.

Mr. KEARFUL. By the Mexicans themselves?

Mr. LOUCKS. Yes; only to find that after they had placed their confidence in the Americans coming there and establishing a government for them they pulled out and left them to the wrath and hate of the Carranza administration. That class of people have been burned twice, and they fear anything that may happen from this time on.

The next is a little better educated class, which fear after all that what the Germans have told them down there may be true, that the Government of the United States by assisting first one faction and then another and getting them to fight among themselves until they are exhausted will go down and take the country by force and keep it. Those are the two kinds of fear there are in Mexico. That is why I say the present administration in Washington can do nothing in Mexico, according to my views.

Mr. KEARFUL. If the present administration should honestly and firmly in good faith desire to help the Mexican people it would be met by those conditions?

Mr. LOUCKS. If you could convince the Mexican people that you were there for honest purposes I believe 90 per cent would welcome you to-day. When I say 90 per cent, I mean the laboring people, I mean the merchants, I mean the farmers, I mean everybody but the politicians.

Mr. KEARFUL. What form do you think such assistance should take when it does come?

Mr. LOUCKS. I think it means the establishment of a government in Mexico City. I believe it means a sufficient force to give their people a chance to get back on their feet without fear of persecutions; I believe it means financial assistance to put their industries back into operation; I believe it means the return peaceably of the good people who were forced out of Mexico by the present administration.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean mostly Mexicans?

Mr. LOUCKS. Mexicans. When those things are brought to pass it will take but a very short time until you have got an entirely new order of things. There is no confidence in Mexico at the present time; they have no confidence in anything; they have no confidence in their own Government; they have no confidence in this Government; they are just waiting and hoping and, I might say, praying that something might happen. Now, in saying this, I am not thinking of myself, I am not thinking of our investment; I am thinking of Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you think about the statement that has been made, also emanating from high official sources, that there is a conspiracy among capitalists operating in Mexico to force intervention on that country for the purpose of taking it over?

Mr. LOUCKS. It is childish; it is simply childish. I have never heard a Mexican with large interests in Mexico express an opinion very much different from what I have just expressed.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say Mexican—you mean American?

Mr. LOUCKS. I mean American. I have never heard an American with large interests in Mexico but has the kindest feeling for Mexico.

I want to say, further, there is absolutely no reason in this day, 1920, that there should be friction between these two countries—absolutely no reason. We are neighbors; we have got to be so whether we want to be or not. Now, in saying that the officials of Mexico hate us, I am not using my expression; I am taking it from the lips of one who was very, very close to the present administration in Washington, and I asked the question for the simple reason that I wanted to know.

Mr. KEARFUL. What effect has the policy pursued by this administration had upon the feeling of friendship of Mexicans toward Americans?

Mr. LOUCKS. Some wonder, some distrust, and, as I said, some hate. That is what it resolves itself into. They simply wonder. I think it was in 1915—I don't know what Government was in power at that time—but a very intelligent man was down at our plantation and I talked with him, and this is what he said, "If only your Government would select somebody—I don't care whether it is Villa, Carranza, or Huerta, or whoever it might be—but if it selects somebody and gives him its whole-hearted support, that is all there is to it; the others will submit." We didn't get that support, and there was evidently a conflict in Washington as to whom to support.

Now, you may wonder why the present administration in Mexico City dislikes Washington. You should not forget that at the time of the split with Villa, Carranza lay flat on his back; he could not get out, the American forces at Vera Cruz, Villa in the North, and I am told that very material assistance went from this country to Villa. You can easily wonder where Carranza got his antipathy if he did not have it before.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe that the Carranza Government would have been a success if this Government had supported him whole-heartedly in every way that you think that a good Mexican should now be supported?

Mr. LOUCKS. No, sir; I think he would temporarily; I think he would for a time. If it could have succeeded under the way in which it came into being it would give the lie to modern civilization, according to my way of thinking, because it was founded on fraud. It could not succeed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there anything further you think of?

Mr. LOUCKS. No, sir; I do not think of anything for the moment, unless you want to go into the matter of some things I have here on various subjects. I think of nothing that would add to what has been said.

Mr. KEARFUL. Very well, then, you may be excused.

(Whereupon, at 3.50 o'clock, p. m., the committee adjourned.)

FRIDAY, JANUARY 30, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., January 30, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

TESTIMONY OF FRANCIS W. BLACKFORD.

Mr. KEARFUL. State your full name, please.

Mr. BLACKFORD. Francis W. Blackford.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your business?

Mr. BLACKFORD. I am a civil and mining engineer.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your present place of residence?

Mr. BLACKFORD. Columbus, Ohio. Do you want the address?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. BLACKFORD. 86 East Eighth Avenue.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you in Mexico during the time of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. BLACKFORD. Yes, sir; I was.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what business were you engaged there?

Mr. BLACKFORD. I was part of the time the engineer and manager of the Railway Constructing Co., and later on I was a member of the contracting firm of Ball, Sims & Blackford, and I also did consulting civil and mechanical engineering work; made reports upon projects, etc.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of construction work were you engaged in?

Mr. BLACKFORD. Actually engaged in building railroads, and I also made engineering reports on projections of different railway lines and upon harbor work.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the condition in the time of Porfirio Diaz before the Madero revolution as to order and safety in Mexico?

Mr. BLACKFORD. The conditions were very good, indeed. Everybody was protected in the conduct of their business.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it safe to travel about through the country?

Mr. BLACKFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Without guards?

Mr. BLACKFORD. Yes, sir; I traveled a great deal myself in all sorts of ways.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the effect upon the laboring classes of the construction work in which you were engaged?

Mr. BLACKFORD. I think the effect was beneficial to the Mexican people of all classes, and especially to the laboring class, because we paid from two to three times as much wages as was prevalent in the country for agricultural work and all sorts of laboring work.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what physical condition did you find the Mexicans when you employed them?

Mr. BLACKFORD. Well, that differed somewhat in different sections and at different times. Sometimes we found them in normal condition, strong and healthy; other times we found them very poor. One time in particular we found the laboring people in the district where we were very much emaciated from lack of sufficient sustenance due in part to a failure of the corn crop and the scarcity of corn locally.

Mr. KEARFUL. And you had to advance them food in order to get them in condition to work?

Mr. BLACKFORD. Yes, sir; we bought corn and brought it in, corn and beans, and issued them to them on their prospective labor in order to get them in proper physical condition to do our work.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did you leave Mexico?

Mr. BLACKFORD. I left there in June, 1911, at that time with my family and my personal effects. I returned again in September and remained until about the 1st of November, as near as I remember.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you quit Mexico on account of the revolutionary disorders?

Mr. BLACKFORD. Yes, sir; entirely so, because I loved that country and should have liked to remain there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you or your associates been able to do any construction work since that time or do you know of any construction work having been done since that time in Mexico?

Mr. BLACKFORD. One of my associates died soon after I left. I do not think the other one has done anything of any consequence since. I have not really heard very much from him except that when I was in the country of San Salvador in Central America in 1912, 1913, and 1914, I had some correspondence with him and he was exceedingly anxious to come to Salvador to engage in the construction of some railroads which I was at that time surveying.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of any construction work having been done in Mexico since the outbreak of the Madero revolution—railroad construction work?

Mr. BLACKFORD. I do not think any railroad construction has been done since that time. I have not heard of it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was any of the work upon which you were engaged left uncompleted?

Mr. BLACKFORD. One contract which we had in the State of Chihuahua never was even started. It was unsafe for life and property and we never succeeded in getting onto the work in order to do it. In fact, we never tried to get onto it. Conditions were such that we were afraid to venture.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have some mining properties in Mexico?

Mr. BLACKFORD. Yes, sir; I had mining properties in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what became of them?

Mr. BLACKFORD. I allowed the titles to lapse; that is, I ceased to pay taxes upon this property because my agent there informed me that the government had recently passed an act requiring owners of mines to work them. It was impossible for me to work the mines because it was not safe to travel in the country. I would not have attempted to reach them for four times their value.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was the law that you were required to work the properties under penalty of forfeiture?

Mr. BLACKFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what year was it that you quit paying taxes?

Mr. BLACKFORD. I think it was the year 1916. I paid taxes until that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Previous to this law you speak of it was sufficient that certain amounts be paid in order to hold the title without working the mine?

Mr. BLACKFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. This requirement was made that the mining properties should be worked at a time when it was impossible to get to them to work them?

Mr. BLACKFORD. It was practically impossible; yes; it was dangerous.

Mr. KEARFUL. I think that is all, unless you have some further statement to make, Mr. Blackford.

Mr. BLACKFORD. Well, I might state further that it is very difficult, indeed, for me to get information about my property in Mexico, even my mining property or my bank stocks. The mail is censored, and I have not written to my acquaintances and my friends there, as I would write to them if that were not the case; and I think that they have failed to give me information such as I should like to have because of the censorship which exists.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have not any proposition to offer, have you, as a remedy for the conditions down there?

Mr. BLACKFORD. Well, a more vigorous protection of the lives of Americans—their lives and their property—by our Nation.

That the State Department demand of Mexico that she pay interest on her bonds and the bonds of the railways which she controls and all other just obligations, and that she protect the lives and property of all American citizens within her boundaries.

Furthermore, so long as our Government interprets the Monroe Doctrine as at present and says "hands off" to all European countries, it is incumbent upon her to demand in behalf of them the same that she demands for herself.

Should Mexico fail within a reasonable time to accede to these demands, I should suggest the seizure of her ports of entry and an invasion of the country and the collection of all export and import duties and internal revenues. Same to be applied to the discharge of her obligations as above stated.

Mexico is one of our best, if not our best markets. Her railroads have American equipment and their employees know no other and will naturally continue to use it. The same may be said of mining and largely electric machinery and supplies and many other classes of American manufactured products.

It is a market which our commercial interests can not well afford to neglect and in its development they should be amply protected by our Government.

If Mexico desires to stay in the family of civilized nations and to be benefited by such privileges, she should be just and decent, and if she fails in these things as she has for the past 10 years she injures herself as well as others and should be held strictly to account by force of arms if necessary.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have read about some of the notes that have been sent and, of course, you know that they were very vigorous.

Mr. BLACKFORD. I know of the notes; yes; I know that they have been ineffective altogether.

Mr. KEARFUL. What more vigorous policy could be adopted than sending a vigorous note?

Mr. BLACKFORD. Well, I think that that would be going into matters that I would not like offhand to say anything about.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you not think that a vigorous note should not be sent except with the intention of backing it up in case it is rejected?

Mr. BLACKFORD. I certainly do; yes. I think we are the laughing-stock of the diplomats of the world. People of Latin America think that we are afraid of Mexico. I was in Salvador, in Central America, when negotiations were going on between Huerta and our administration, and I think it was the prevailing opinion among, you might say the middle class of people in Salvador, that we were afraid of Mexico—the United States was afraid of Mexico. We backed down always whenever an international question came up.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that all, Mr. Blackford?

Mr. BLACKFORD. I do not think of anything. Do you care to have me mention about these railway projects and the money that was paid for concessions and never has been realized upon at all?

Mr. KEARFUL. You may proceed to state that.

Mr. BLACKFORD. I might say that I was the chief engineer of a project called the Puebla & Pacific Railway in the years 1910 and 1911. This railroad was projected from Puebla southward to the Pacific Ocean, with branches north and south from there, a distance more or less of 600 kilometers. The projectors of this enterprise paid 60,000 pesos into the Mexican treasury for this concession, of which practically nothing has resulted because of the disturbed condition of the country. I do not know of anything more.

Mr. KEARFUL. Very well, you will be excused. Thank you, sir.

(Witness excused.)

TESTIMONY OF DR. JAMES M. TAYLOR.

Mr. KEARFUL. Doctor, please state your full name.

Dr. TAYLOR. James M. Taylor.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your profession?

Dr. TAYLOR. One of the secretaries of the board of foreign relations of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your present place of residence and address?

Dr. TAYLOR. I live on the Jersey side. Shall I give my home or office?

Mr. KEARFUL. Your office address.

Dr. TAYLOR. One hundred and fifty Fifth Avenue, New York City.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you had occasion to visit Mexico recently?

Dr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was your object in going to Mexico?

Dr. TAYLOR. Well, to do some evangelistic work and investigate conditions regarding missionary and educational work.

Mr. KEARFUL. The prospects for continuing that sort of work in Mexico?

Dr. TAYLOR. Yes; investigating conditions regarding future work so that I might come home and give these facts to the church. I may say that I do that same work throughout the world, visit the different mission fields.

Mr. KEARFUL. What points in Mexico did you visit?

Dr. TAYLOR. The principal points were Monterrey, Tampico, San Luis Potosi, Guanajuato, Mexico City, Puebla, Pachuca, and Vera Cruz. Of course, dozens of other places, small places.

Mr. KEARFUL. Intermediate points?

Dr. TAYLOR. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have occasion to observe the operation of foreign enterprise?

Dr. TAYLOR. To a greater or less extent: yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What has been the effect of the operations of the foreign capitalists in Mexico, especially Americans?

Dr. TAYLOR. My judgment is that it has been decidedly a blessing rather than otherwise.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you agree with the statements that have been made from high official sources that Americans operating in Mexico are not entitled to consideration because they have been exploiting the Mexican people?

Dr. TAYLOR. I might say in answering that that I went down there with more or less of that feeling and came back with the belief it is absolutely untrue. I have said to people since I have been back in the States that some of the American companies operating in Mexico I consider are really doing missionary work because of the way they are teaching them sanitation and better modes of living, compelling the children to go to school, and things of that kind.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe it is possible to do spiritual and educational and religious work without first giving ignorant people the material benefits?

Dr. TAYLOR. I do not know that I could answer you affirmatively just the way you put the question. I do not know that I would say it is not possible to do spiritual work without this, but it is not practical and it is not possible to render 100 per cent.

Mr. KEARFUL. Your organization does not proceed upon the lines that it is practical to do education and religious work without first advancing ignorant peoples in a material way, do you?

Dr. TAYLOR. Absolutely not. We are taking steps now along lines of industrial schools and things of that kind.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you think would happen to the common people in Mexico if all of the foreign capital were withdrawn from the country?

Dr. TAYLOR. Judging from some facts that I know and what I observed generally and gathered from both Americans and Mexicans I should say that in 90 days or 6 months at the very furthest it would produce one of the greatest famines that was ever known in a country of 15,000,000 people.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you describe some of the benefits that have been derived by the employees of American capitalists in Mexico?

Dr. TAYLOR. Why, I have in mind one place across—I am mixed up on the rivers and bays there at Tampico.

Mr. KEARFUL. The Panuco River?

Dr. TAYLOR. Yes. The place I want to speak of is a place across the river. I think it is the terminal of one of the oil companies that I visited traveling throughout the little city, and I found them with sanitation officers, with closed garbage cans, the lids always having to be found on the cans, the homes inspected to see that the garbage has been put regularly in the garbage cans, and it was hauled off, my understanding was, twice a day. I found that there was a school that the company had built and furnished the four teachers for and were preparing to put in two more teachers. I found they had truant officers compelling the children to go to school. I found in the school a new piano they had just had two days. I asked the head master if they had not raised the money for it by giving entertainments. He said they did raise money for that purpose, but when he went over to Tampico the day before to get it he started to give the manager of the company the money for the piano and the manager gave back the money and gave them the piano that cost 1,200 or 1,500 pesos.

I found they had put out regular parks, were setting out palms along the streets. The best meal I had in Mexico I had in their dining room and ate with a Mexican sitting to my left and an American to my right and found that that was for the American and Mexican men who were working there at the terminal without their families.

I visited the dormitories and found they had the same room for the Mexican men that they had for the Americans. I visited and photographed the residential sections and found they had the same dwellings for Americans and Mexicans and they are living side by side.

Mr. KEARFUL. And at whose expense were the school and the sanitary equipment provided?

Dr. TAYLOR. The company that operated there. Should I give that particular company?

Mr. KEARFUL. No; it is not necessary.

Dr. TAYLOR. One of the oil companies that operate and has that as their terminal where they load their ships, and it was the manager of that oil company that gave the piano.

Mr. KEARFUL. The employees themselves are not assessed for the expenses of any of these benefits?

Dr. TAYLOR. They are not assessed for room rent or house rent and they get their meals free also, and the young man, a southern boy from Macon, Ga., who is in charge of that particular end of the work, told me that the meals cost the company—I think he said, as well as I remember, about $1.50 gold per meal; that that was what the food meant.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you find similar conditions in any other section of Mexico?

Mr. TAYLOR. Do you mean where there is foreign capital invested?

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, under any other circumstances?

Dr. TAYLOR. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you find—

Dr. TAYLOR. Now, I found conditions more or less along that line wherever good, substantial foreign or American, I think particularly American, companies were operating, like Panuco, where they have baths and everything of that kind for their men, but I did not find anything at all approaching such as that except where such work was being carried on.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you find to be the general character of the Americans in business in Mexico?

Dr. TAYLOR. I found them on the whole to be what I would call a good crowd of Americans.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did they compare with Americans in this country in any given locality?

Dr. TAYLOR. You take the Americans in this country and remove the strictly religious element that is found here, and nothing of that kind being carried on there, I would say they compare very favorably.

Mr. KEARFUL. What class of people are they? What is their business? What is their standing as a class? What do they do?

Dr. TAYLOR. Their business, you mean?

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think they are there because they can not live in this country?

Dr. TAYLOR. No; I found them on the whole to be what I would consider lawabiding, highminded, and to a very large extent cultured American people with a high standing in a general way regarding morals, and their actions toward other people. I do not mean by that that I found a crowd of Sunday school fellows—not in that sense at all. But, for instance, when I was out in the oil fields I was in places where they had to go to the general of the Army who had taken over certain of their properties, and they would have to go to him and ask the privilege of running an engine in order to take me to some other point or in order to move the train to some other point, and I saw properties of that kind taken over by the Government, the Army, where they were not permitted to use their warehouses or their other houses, and the sick soldiers and the women and children under the buildings, out in the yards, lying around on the platforms, some of them. I saw, for instance, a woman lying under one of the warehouses on a pile of iron pipes. I do not think from the pipes up to the floor it could have been more than 30 inches. I think there is no question but what she would be dead before the next morning. I think 90 per cent of them were diseased, dying like flies. And I found these American fellows when they did not know I was watching them at all slipping around to these sick soldiers and sick women and slip one or two dollars in American money to them. And in talking to me and in my discussion with them I found them not anti-Mexican or hating the Mexicans, but with a feeling of interest in them, wanting to do that which would help them rather than hurt them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you find that in general to be the treatment of Mexicans by the Americans who are operating in Mexico?

Mr. TAYLOR. I should say on the whole I did. I found, for instance, at one place way up in the interior, that is, up in the oil fields, between 30 and 40 boys—the school was out and these boys were out with their machetes cutting the grass around near the pump station and commissary and rooming houses, and I asked what they were paying them, and I found they were getting, if I remember correctly, 1½ pesos a day for the work, work that if I had been there myself I do not think I would have had done at all. I asked why they were having it done and they said the boys were idle, and they had to be employed and their families needed what they could earn, and they simply had them do it for that purpose.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have occasion to meet Consular Agent William O. Jenkins in Puebla?

Dr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir; I was with him more than once, and I was entertained in his home on the Thursday before they kidnapped him on Sunday. I met him and Mrs. Jenkins, their children, and Mrs. Jenkins's sister.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you learn something of his business operations there?

Dr. TAYLOR. Yes; quite a little. I found that Mr. and Mrs. Jenkins are both interested in religious work to start with. I think they are both members of the church. And I found him with large holdings and haciendas, apartment houses, building new apartment houses, in addition to his work with his factory, his knitting mills. I found his work, so far as I could learn from others, to be of the very highest type and his interests in the Mexican people I found to be very great. In fact, I went through the hospital and the major part of which, I understand, he gave to Dr. Conwell, of the Baptist Church, not only giving the property, but bearing the expense of renovating it. And while I was with him I was taking up the matter of trying to get him to give one of the haciendas to the Methodist Episcopal Church for an industrial school for boys.

Mr. KEARFUL. Native boys?

Dr. TAYLOR. Native Mexican boys.

Mr. KEARFUL. And this hospital, is it used exclusively for foreigners?

Dr. TAYLOR. Foreigners, of course, patronize it. It is the only hospital in Puebla, and they patronize it; but it is in the main for the Mexican people.

Mr. KEARFUL. It is open to the Mexican public?

Dr. TAYLOR. They come to it whether they have money or not.

Mr. KEARFUL. It is a charitable institution?

Dr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you find Mr. Jenkins in his business engaged in oppressing and exploiting the Mexican peons.

Dr. TAYLOR. From what I learned of his business, I would personally consider that it was a blessing to the Mexican people.

Mr. KEARFUL. How do the Mexican people regard Mr. Jenkins?

Dr. TAYLOR. I found them regarding him very highly. I found his children in school with Mexican children, in the mission school of the Baptist Church; that is, one of them, I guess. I found one of his children in school. And the Mexican people I found regarded him very highly, esteemed him highly.

Mr. KEARFUL. You found no antagonism of the Mexican people against him?

Dr. TAYLOR. I found none whatever.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were in that vicinity at the time when Mr. Jenkins was kidnapped, were you?

Dr. TAYLOR. Yes; I left there I think on Friday, and they kidnapped him on Saturday. That is, I left Puebla, but I was in the immediate vicinity, either at Mexico City or Guanajuato, when they kidnapped him.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have occasion to learn what method of communication was used between Mr. Jenkins while he was in captivity and his wife and his friends?

Dr. TAYLOR. I am personally acquainted with the people by whom the letters were carried or transferred back and forth between Mr. and Mrs. Jenkins.

Mr. KEARFUL. What does that indicate with reference to the facility with which the Government officials could have found the abductors of Jenkins if they had wanted to?

Dr. TAYLOR. The parties who were carrying the letters, to whom the letters were delivered for Mrs. Jenkins by the woman who carried most of them and by others, who carried the remainder, and to whom the letters were delivered by Mrs. Jenkins, to be sent on to him, told me that on one occasion a letter was received in the early morning from Mrs. Jenkins with an accompanying note that said, "This letter should have been delivered last night, but it reached our place of business after we had closed, all except the office, and our servants were gone, but we have sent it to you the first thing this morning after opening our business." Which seemed to indicate to me that much of the operations and negotiations regarding the ransom were carried on right in the City of Puebla.

Mr. KEARFUL. The question was whether these operations indicated that the Government officials could have found Jenkins's abductors if they wanted to?

Dr. TAYLOR. Well, I was merely answering that by giving this concrete example of the facts that the thing was carried on to a large extent right there under their own eyes, and to my mind there is no question—of course, I can not speak with knowledge—but I understood that he was never at any time more than 10 or 12, or maybe 15, miles away from the City of Puebla, and when they brought him back they brought him to the car line.

Mr. KEARFUL. Puebla is a very large city, is it not?

Dr. TAYLOR. A city of about 125,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. It is the second city in Mexico, is it not?

Dr. TAYLOR. Well, I think it ranks next to Mexico City.

Regarding Mr. Jenkins, I would like of my own accord to say that, concerning the question of his being implicated in the kidnapping and getting an interest in part of the money, for one to know Mr. Jenkins, know his business, the millions he is worth, and the way he is making money, and his interest in Mexican people, and the money he is giving for benevolent work among them, and the treatment he had while he was held in custody, makes such charges utterly ridiculous.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you judge was the reason why the Government officials did not undertake to capture the abductors of Jenkins?

Dr. TAYLOR. I, of course, could only answer that by giving my opinion, but I might answer it by quoting a conversation with a railroad conductor. I ought not to tell on what railroad it was, as I might get the poor fellow in trouble.

Mr. KEARFUL. It is not necessary.

Dr. TAYLOR. I might answer it by quoting a conversation with a railroad conductor on a train on which I traveled, who spoke English. I asked him about a certain railroad being open and whether it was as safe as the one I was traveling on with him. He said that one was not a damned bit safe. He said, "Look at the trains, engines, and oil tanks down here in the gorge, if you think it is safe." I asked him if he had had any wrecks of his own trains. As well as I remember he said not since last week. I asked him if he thought there was any danger of one that day. He said, "If they know we have any money on here or find that we have very many soldiers there will be, for it is generally the soldiers they are after." I asked him then if we did not have soldiers enough on to protect us. He said, "Mister, I'm a good runner myself. I have proved it since they have been blowing up the trains, but there isn't a soldier on this train but what can outrun me and they will prove it to you if our train is blown up." I said, "The bands are not very large, are they, when they blow up a train?" As well as I remember, he said not over 25 or 50, and I suggested that we had more soldiers than that; that they would, therefore, be able to capture the bandits, and asked him if they did not always do that. He said, "Stranger, are you a fool? Don't you know that the general in charge of this section has possibly 500 or 1,000 men and draws a salary for 2,000 or 2,500! Why does he want to lose his job by capturing the bandits, so that he will have nothing to do and not be able to pad his list and draw a large salary on it?"

This, in my judgment, and in the judgment of this Mexican gentleman who, of course, is a Government official, in that he is a conductor on a Government-operated road, is the explanation of why many of the bandits are not captured.

Mr. KEARFUL. In a propaganda pamphlet recently issued by the League of Free Nations Association there was a letter to the Evening Post, in which it was stated that the writer had been in Mexico recently, in October. That is the same time you were there, is it not?

Dr. TAYLOR. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. He said, "I spent this recent October in Mexico. The country is prosperous and at peace." And again he says, "On the basis of personal knowledge I assert again that Mexico is prosperous and except in a few retired and unimportant sections peaceful." Is that a true statement as you found it at that time?

Dr. TAYLOR. I went to Mexico the 1st of October, I think the very first day, and left there the last days of November, and from what I saw and heard I would not at all consider that the conditions as I found them.

Mr. KEARFUL. About the same time Mr. Charles A. Douglas, personal counsel for the Mexican Government, was in Mexico City and gave out an interview in which he stated that Mexican affairs have been much misrepresented in this country—that is, in the United States—and that he had found the people to be busy, well dressed and contented. Is that a true statement of what you found there at that time?

Dr. TAYLOR. Well, I saw busy, well dressed, and contented people in Mexico, but that did not represent what I found to be the average or common condition in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you find that to be the general condition of the masses of the people in Mexico?

Dr. TAYLOR. I did not. I could give extreme cases regarding poverty in Mexico, such, for instance, as having gone along a principal street in Mexico City where I found three old women, two of them with white heads, and one little boy sitting on the sidewalk with burlap spread out on which several pails of garbage had been poured, and I found them in the early morning sticking their hands in this garbage up above their wrists, picking out particles of putrid flesh, vegetables, and bread and eating it. I saw a little boy run his hand down in the garbage and pull out a chicken bone and ravenously eat the putrid flesh from it. But I would not consider that a picture of the masses. I only bring that up as the opposite extreme of what you just quoted.

Although I found conditions like this I would not say that Mexico is in that condition as a whole, and while there are well dressed, contented, and busy people there that is certainly not in any manner the general condition as I saw it.

Mr. KEARFUL. The generals of the army and the government officials are well dressed, of course?

Dr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir; they seem to be prosperous.

Mr. KEARFUL. And some of them are fairly busy and all of them contented, are they not?

Dr. TAYLOR. Very well contented with their present position, because I was told by Mexican people, as well as by Americans, that there were generals there now worth a few million dollars who only a few years ago were peons, bare-foot peons.

Mr. KEARFUL. In traveling in Mexico what protection was afforded to the trains on which you traveled?

Dr. TAYLOR. Practically all the trains I traveled on carried one or more, I suppose they were steel cars, filled with soldiers, with holes in the side for them to shoot out through, and in some cases they had an exploring train go ahead of our train, and that also loaded with soldiers.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were in Mexico at the time when President Carranza made a trip up to his home place in the State of Coahuila, were you?

Dr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of any railroad accidents that happened along the line of travel that he took at that time?

Dr. TAYLOR. I was told the president was at his old home when I was on my way from Neuvo Laredo to Mexico City, and when we left Nuevo Laredo at about 9 o'clock in the morning the train due there the night before about 11 o'clock had not arrived, and they had had no word from it. When we reached Saltillo we were told that it was not safe to travel any farther that night and our train was switched off, and we stayed there until the next morning. We had only gone a few hours that morning when our train stopped and we found that some one—they told me it was the bandits—had gone to a heavy fill which was on a curve and taken up a rail on the outside, laying it back without the spikes being driven, so that the train just ahead of the one I was on on striking this curve had gone off the embankment, possibly 25 or 30 feet, causing one of the worst wrecks I ever saw.

When we arrived they told me that they had already taken 40 dead people and there were still 104 others.

Now I may say that I have heard all kinds of statements about it, but that was the statement that was made to me there that morning. I have seen different statements in the papers. Those who were able to speak and read Spanish told me that the wreck we saw was the fourth one in 24 hours in that section. They told me that this was the country through which President Carranza was traveling and that some of the bandits had even expressed themselves regarding their determination to "get" him. I was also told that on one of his trips he was scheduled to go out on a train following the regular one, but at the last moment his train was put onto the first section. The second section, which was supposed to have been his, I was told was blown up, but it proved to be the passenger train instead of the one on which the President was traveling.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you ascertain in Tampico about the robbery of pay rolls of oil companies?

Dr. TAYLOR. I talked with many Americans, asking them how many times they had been held up, etc., and found it quite a joke among them as to who had been held up the most often. Some of them had even had their shoes and stockings taken off of them, and I talked also with some men who had been held up and even shot while the pay roll they were carrying was being taken from them.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the general expression among them as to who committed these robberies?

Dr. TAYLOR. In some case they offered to go and show me—identify Carranza soldiers who, not being in uniform, had gone out at night and held them up. One American from Montana showed me a coat he was wearing and offered to carry the coat and go with me down to the barracks and show me a soldier wearing the vest to that coat, which was taken off of him when they also took his shoes and other clothing.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do the Government soldiers at that place ordinarily wear uniforms?

Dr. TAYLOR. I was told that practically all the soldiers in that section refused to wear a uniform, since they said it would be easy to identify them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have a demonstration of the fact that they did not wear uniforms that were issued to them?

Dr. TAYLOR. I visited one place up in the oil fields where I was told at the tables that the soldiers had all been issued uniforms and caps, and some of the American boys offered to bet me that by the next day there would not be a uniform nor a dozen caps on any of the soldiers in that barracks. About two days later I went up to the barracks and the general gave me permission to take some pictures. In this way I was allowed among the soldiers, and I do not remember to have seen a uniform on any of them except the officers, and I doubt if I saw half a dozen caps on them.

I traveled some with an American who, in company with another American and a Mexican boy, was carrying a small pay roll of, I think, $10,000, in a Ford. They were held up, both of the Americans shot, the money taken from them, and the tires of the machine chopped off with their machetes even after they had taken the money. I had both of these American boys open up their clothing that I might see where they were shot, and later on I visited the place of the holdup, photographed the clump of bushes, and went in and examined the holes that had been dug and evidently occupied for days and perhaps for weeks in waiting for them.

When they called the boys to halt, instead of waiting for them to stop the machine, they opened fire, and they told me that possibly about 35 shots were fired. I heard numbers of stories of the same kind.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any interesting experiences of your own while you were down there?

Dr. TAYLOR. Well, up in the Tampico oil fields we were preparing to cross the river one morning and I was taking some pictures of properties belonging to one of the oil companies; some soldiers who had been sleeping on the ground in their little trash-covered huts the night before, saw me and one fellow, bare foot and ragged, so drunk that he could not walk straight, rushed up to me, ran his gun against my breast and told me to give him the film. I proceeded to give him a film, but by that time at least a dozen or 15 more soldiers rushed up with their guns and told me I had to give up my camera and go to the general in charge. They took me to him and after a few words with him he withdrew to another room and sent word by one of his men that he must have $500 gold to release me.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there any charge of an offense made against you?

Dr. TAYLOR. There was no charge whatever.

Mr. KEARFUL. No trial of any kind?

Dr. TAYLOR. No trial of any kind.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you pay the amount?

Dr. TAYLOR. Let me go just a little further with that. He did not mention any offense except that I had taken pictures and the photographer traveling with me showed his permit to photograph all public buildings and parks, including the national palace and the Chapultepec palace, but the general said that didn't apply to his territory, that he was handling things there. He did not mention, however, any crime that I had committed should be punished by a certain fine or imprisonment, but simply said he must have $500 gold.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were not brought before any judge?

Dr. TAYLOR. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you pay the amount demanded?

Dr. TAYLOR. They finally reduced it to $200.

Mr. KEARFUL. You negotiated a reduction to $200 and finally paid that?

Dr. TAYLOR. Yes; others paid it. They finally sent me away and carried the negotiations on and it was paid.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you find a large population in Mexico City?

Dr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir; they told me it was abnormally large.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the reason for that?

Dr. TAYLOR. That people had come in from the haciendas and villages around and where they could not get any protection.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were there a number of hacendados and large farmers from the haciendas?

Dr. TAYLOR. I was told there were large numbers of them in Mexico City.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you talk with any of them in regard to conditions in Mexico?

Dr. TAYLOR. Not with very many. I talked with one on the train as he went back to hacienda after having been away, he said, for three years; the soldiers having taken charge of his property and he not allowed to return. He wept as he told me he was eager to go to work and do something.

I had letters of introduction to other men in Mexico City who were driven from their haciendas whom I did not call on, but was told if I would call on them I would find them actually in a state of poverty, not having really sufficient food to eat.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you learn the opinion of those people in regard to what should be done for Mexico?

Dr. TAYLOR. Large numbers. I had men of that station in life, also of the peon class, say to me, "Our troubles can never be settled by the Mexicans. Some help will come from without. In the name of God, since you will have to do it, why don't you Americans come on and do it, so we will have peace and our business will begin to prosper?"

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you learn about the schools in Mexico City?

Dr. TAYLOR. I was told that large numbers of them were closed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you learn the opinion of the teachers of those schools about conditions in Mexico and what should be done about it?

Dr. TAYLOR. I did not talk with any teachers of the schools that were closed. I talked with teachers of schools whose schools were in operation—open—and they were very frank to say that the present Government was not succeeding and never would, and that there were not more than 25 per cent of the children in the schools now that were in school when Diaz was at the head of the Government, and that it would be absolutely necessary to have some kind of outside help to get things running as they should in Mexico. Those were not disgruntled teachers who had lost their positions, but are now teaching in Government schools.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you visit Guanajuato?

Dr. TAYLOR. I did.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what condition did you find that city?

Dr. TAYLOR. They told me that prosperity was beginning—that business was beginning to be resumed, and Dr. Salmons, in charge of the hospital of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Guanajuato, told me that the population of the city and villages around about that got their mail there was about 98,000 when the mines had to close and Americans leave, when he also had to close his hospital and get out. He said the exodus began immediately, and that 28,000 passes for entire families were issued by the Government, and that even after he went back to the city the exodus continued until the population was reduced to about 5,000.

The statement that is generally made about that is 10,000, but Dr. Salmons told me 5,000, and it might create less criticism to put it 10,000. But he told me that half of the entire population died either before they got out of the city or on the roads as they were leaving.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the cause of the deaths?

Dr. TAYLOR. I understood that, on account of malnutrition, when disease struck them they were swept away like flies.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your remedy for conditions in Mexico?

Dr. TAYLOR. I think, as I said to Consular Agent Jenkins, that the only final hope of a real established condition in Mexico is to lift up the moral standing for them; put in schools, hospitals, and give them Jesus Christ as a moral anchorage, enabling them to measure up to a decent standard. This, of course, will mean 15 or 25 years, but during that interim, or for immediate help, much as I would hate to see it, I fear there is very little hope except by some kind of help from without. I have hoped, however, that there might be something done either by the Allied nations or by America, Great Britain, and France, approaching Mexico in concerted action.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that Mexico can be saved by preaching the Gospel of Jesus Christ without any other measures for the establishment of a government?

Dr. TAYLOR. No; I do not think that can be done to any large extent without the establishment of the government. In other words, I think missionary work will be carried on in a very small degree until there is something more established in the way of government.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it your opinion that the missionaries should go into Mexico with a sword in one hand and the Bible in the other?

Dr. TAYLOR. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that anything can be done to rehabilitate Mexico without first establishing a Government that can maintain peace and order permanently?

Dr. TAYLOR. I do not. I think that is the only thing for Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that can be done except from the outside?

Dr. TAYLOR. I am very much afraid it can not be.

Mr. KEARFUL. That will be all unless you have a further statement to make.

Dr. TAYLOR. No; I think not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Thank you very much, Doctor.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., February 3, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

TESTIMONY OF MR. HENRY HOBART KNOX.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please state your full name.

Mr. KNOX. Henry Hobart Knox.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where do you live?

Mr. KNOX. 68 East Eighty-sixth Street, New York.

Mr. KEARFUL. What have been your operations in Mexico?

Mr. KNOX. As a consulting engineer since about 20 years ago; consulting mining engineer.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are familiar with the conditions in Mexico under the rule of Porfirio Diaz.

Mr. KNOX. Under the rule of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. KEARFUL. And subsequently of Madero and Huerta and Carranza?

Mr. KNOX. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the conditions under Diaz as to security and protection for property and enterprises?

Mr. KNOX. Under Porfirio Diaz I consider the Republic of Mexico to have been as safe and secure a country as any I have been acquainted with. We could go in any part of the country far remote with a feeling of perfect security.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did you find the first difficulties beginning?

Mr. KNOX. The first difficulties I encountered were under Madero, during the Orozco revolution. I was in Parral at the time of the defeat of Orozco by Gen. Huerta at Conejos. Orozco was in retreat at the time I was leaving the Parral district, and I left with the retreating insurgents northward. I may add to that, that at the time there seemed to be little danger, personally; that I was open to capture in two or three places at the time, but the foreigners seemed to be in no personal danger, as there was no animus at the time against Americans; no disposition to do the stranger violence, or hold him for ransom or anything of that kind, all of which manifested itself somewhat later.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did that condition first begin?

Mr. KNOX. That condition first began, I should say, during Huerta's régime as president.

Mr. KEARFUL. That would be what year; 1913 or 1914?

Mr. KNOX. 1914, is my impression.

Mr. KEARFUL. Huerta resigned, I think, in June, 1914, or July?

Mr. KNOX. July, 1914?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. KNOX. Well, I would amend that, then; I would strike out "in Huerta's régime," and make it the year 1914.

Mr. KEARFUL. About the end of Huerta's régime, was it?

Mr. KNOX. Yes; it would be—well, some time during 1914.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you proceed to describe the conditions as you observed them with reference to security for business operations from that time on?

Mr. KNOX. From that time onward, in the State of Chihuahua, as far as I know it, most of the smaller outlying mining properties have been closed down for the reason that they could not continue to operate with security to life. I would cite as an example the copper property at Terrazas, which, as far as I know, has never made a serious attempt to resume, although directly on the Mexican Central Railway. Garrisons have been sent out there and chased away.

The mines situated near the larger cities have continued to operate, with interruptions. I am speaking now of such camps as Santa Eulalia, Parral, and Cusi. They have all been at times interrupted, sometimes for very long periods. In the Parral district the reasons have not always been because of actual violence, but for considerable periods also because of interruptions in railway traffic between Parral and Jimenez. Last year the tunnel between these two towns was blown up and the traffic interrupted for several months.

In many cases under Gen. Murguia garrisons were asked for and sent out to outlying mines, but in all of those cases of which I have any knowledge their withdrawal was asked for by the mine owners for the reason that they gave no military protection, on the one hand as they invariably deserted at the first sign of an attack, while on the other hand they were an actual danger to life and property of the people at the mines. They robbed and looted, and in the evening, when they were usually drunk, they would shoot up the place and make it dangerous.

Mr. KEARFUL. Soldiers of Murguia?

Mr. KNOX. Regulars.

Mr. KEARFUL. Going back a little to the time of the Orozco revolution against Madero, what character of operations were conducted by Orozco?

Mr. KNOX. Regular military operations were conducted by Orozco, with large forces that would properly be called armies.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he perpetrate outrages and robberies on the people?

Mr. KNOX. I have not been informed of any such. It was not a matter of general information, at all events, in those parts where I was at the time. I do know we went about freely at the time without hearing of such disturbances.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then, later in the revolution against Huerta conducted by Villa, under Carranza, what was the nature of his operations?

Mr. KNOX. I can not say from my own information, because there was a period at that time when I was not in Mexico. I was in Europe during the full period of those operations.

Mr. KEARFUL. Murguia, whom you mentioned, was one of Carranza's generals operating in that region?

Mr. KNOX. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the nature of his operations?

Mr. KNOX. Murguia was Carranza's military governor of the northern district. It is commonly reported that Gen. Murguia owns two large ranches, one in the State of Durango and one in Chihuahua, but he gathers cattle in Chihuahua, levying on the peons or ranchers, or wherever he can get them, and ships them to his Durango ranch, whence they are sold. On his Durango ranch he uses his authority to imprison the peons on various charges and ship them up to Chihuahua ranch to work as forced labor.

He also would levy contributions on all produce carried into the cities and towns by the neighboring ranchers on the pretext of supplying his troops.

Mr. KEARFUL. These ranches were acquired after he became prominent in the Government of Carranza?

Mr. KNOX. That I can not say positively. My impression is that Murguia, since the beginning of Carranza's present revolution, rose from very humble beginnings.

Mr. KEARFUL. Rose to what point?

Mr. KNOX. Rose to high military rank, and the post of military governor of the north.

Mr. KEARFUL. I mean financially.

Mr. KNOX. He is reported to be a multimillionaire, and I was told, on authority which I myself accepted, that his monthly deposit for the month of October, 1917, at an El Paso bank was somewhat over $200,000. This was not reported as an exceptional deposit for the month.

Mr. KEARFUL. What have been the operations of your company? I believe you are connected with some company down there.

Mr. KNOX. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What have been the operations of your company during the times you have mentioned?

Mr. KNOX. Since 1914 they have been able to operate about 12 months—not over 12 months in all.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there any difficulty in operating before that time?

Mr. KNOX. The first difficulty in operation encountered was occasioned by the retreat of the Orozco forces in 1912, the reason being that Orozco destroyed the railway between Chihuahua and Juarez almost completely. I believe very nearly 200 miles of that railway was destroyed by rolling up the rails, and it took many months to reestablish traffic.

Mr. KEARFUL. What have been the reasons for your failure to operate more than 12 months during this whole period since 1914?

Mr. KNOX. As an example, in the latter part of 1915 the State Department ordered American citizens to leave the country. That meant the suspension of smelting operations, which forced the closing down of the mines tributary to the smelters, even though they were willing to take the risk of remaining where they were. Another long suspension was the consequence of the blowing up of the tunnel between Parral and Chihuahua. On other occasions actual military operations between the Carranza forces and the insurgent forces in that district compelled the closing down of operations because traffic could not be carried on, supplies could not be brought in.

Mr. KEARFUL. From your observation of conditions, what is the prospect for improvement?

Mr. KNOX. I see no prospect whatever for improvement, under present conditions, simply because the same conditions prevail to-day, so far as I can see them, as have prevailed for several years past.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there a prospect that the disorders will be discontinued, that the Carranza forces will be able and willing to establish order?

Mr. KNOX. There has been, for the last few months, an improvement in the maintenance of order in the State of Chihuahua. There has been a lull in the outbreaks, but personally, I do not see that the conditions have changed sufficient to insure permanence to this state of affairs.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the ground of your apprehension about that?

Mr. KNOX. Merely that I see no change in the circumstances. A certain set of conditions have prevailed for several years past in Mexico, a set of conditions which have been unfavorable to peace and order. I see no change in those conditions which would insure permanent peace and order.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the attitude of the Carranza generals toward that condition?

Mr. KNOX. Gen. Dieguez is now military governor of Chihuahua. His assurances and protestations are favorable, as, indeed, have been the assurances of all his predecessors.

Mr. KEARFUL. From the operations of his predecessors, did it appear that it was their desire to put down disorders and create a state of law and order?

Mr. KNOX. They manifested it only by word of mouth. They took no action looking to order.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your conclusion as to whether Carranza generals really desire the discontinuance of the disorders.

Mr. KNOX. I can not speak of Gen. Dieguez's intentions from my own experience, as he assumed his office subsequent to any visit of mine to the country. That is, within the past few months. So, I really can not express a personal opinion.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, as to his predecessors.

Mr. KNOX. As to his predecessors, they have been, one and all, men who have fattened on the country, by thievery and looting and graft; they have oppressed the people to the last degree in order to enrich themselves. The burden of their misgovernment and tyranny seems to have fallen more upon the poorer people than anybody else. They have been unable to save themselves or help themselves, and have had to accept the conditions that were imposed upon them, until to-day they are in the most abject misery and poverty, amounting to hunger and nakedness.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do the present improved conditions of which you speak extend to the point of eliminating Villa from the situation?

Mr. KNOX. I only know that Villa's position has not changed at all from what it has been in the past. He is still able to go and come as he chooses.

Mr. KEARFUL. How is he considered by the people of that region?

Mr. KNOX. Villa is generally considered by the people of that region as the only person who will give them order and a certain primitive, rudimentary justice when he is in charge. When Villa is in charge, he takes charge of a place or a district, and the immediate consequence is suppression of looting, robbery, and drunkenness, his first act being always to close the saloons. All the looting and robbery he reserves for himself. He will not allow his men to indulge in that on their own account.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is he moderate in that respect? Does he leave anything or does he make a clean sweep?

Mr. KNOX. He is moderate in that respect. He makes a levy of what he calls a tax to his cause, his government, on those citizens who are able to pay, and he taxes them in accordance with their ability to pay, and gives them a receipt for it, and that payment exempts them for a certain period from another levy of that kind. They apparently pay that willingly, for the reason that it carries with it finality.

Mr. KEARFUL. How does that compare with the operations of the Carranza generals?

Mr. KNOX. The general feeling is that there is no finality about their levies. If they pay to-day they are not exempt from paying again to-morrow, and still again the day after to-morrow. They do it quite politely. The man in authority under the Carranza régime invites the surrounding people of consequence to meet him at a council to determine a basis to restore order and prosperity to the country. Of course, that can never be accomplished without funds to carry it on, and those funds must be subscribed by citizens of means.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do the operations of Villa fall most heavily on the poor classes, or on those who are most able to pay?

Mr. KNOX. They fall on those most able to pay.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where does Villa get his munitions of war?

Mr. KNOX. Villa seems to get a certain amount of his supplies from the Texas border, around Presidio. He also takes it by capture from the Carranza forces, and provisions and supplies of that kind he gets in part from captured trains.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you observed the condition of the rolling stock in the region with which you are familiar along the railroad? If you have, please describe it.

Mr. KNOX. The privately-owned railroad stock, such as that of the American Smelting and Refining Co., is well kept up. The rolling stock of the railway is distinctly dilapidated. The passenger coaches are without window glass, without lamps.

Mr. KEARFUL. The private trains of which you speak are freight trains?

Mr. KNOX. Those are freight trains exclusively.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say they are operated by the American Smelting and Refining Co.?

Mr. KNOX. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Owned by that company?

Mr. KNOX. Owned by them.

Mr. KEARFUL. And kept in condition by them?

Mr. KNOX. And kept in condition by them.

Mr. KEARFUL. What arrangement is made for operating those trains?

Mr. KNOX. I understand that the arrangement is that the private owners shall furnish the rolling stock and pay for the train crews, and at the same time they pay to the railway administration the regular freight tariff per ton of cargo carried.

Mr. KEARFUL. The same tariff that would be exacted in case the rolling stock were furnished by the railroad?

Mr. KNOX. By the railroad.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the condition of the roadbed in that region?

Mr. KNOX. The roadbed is rough, but still passable at the ordinary speed of a freight train, save where the bridges have been burned out—which most of them have—and shoo-flies substituted.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the shoo-fly to which you refer?

Mr. KNOX. When a bridge is blown up, the line is carried down into the gulch, and if there is water running in the gulch ties are piled up and the rails laid on the ties. It is carried across in that way, and then up the opposite bank by a grade of perhaps one in eight or ten, or one in ten or twelve.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that the condition now of the roadbed?

Mr. KNOX. It was a year ago; there were many such. That makes transportation possible during the dry season, but when the rains come these temporary crossings are washed out.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you familiar with the various acts of this Government in reference to ordering Americans out of Mexico and sending expeditions into Mexico?

Mr. KNOX. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What has been the effect upon the Mexicans of the pursuit of that policy?

Mr. KNOX. It has been to destroy all prestige for Americans in the eyes of the Mexicans, and to bring the United States Government into contempt.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there any particular expression that the Mexicans use in reference to Americans in order to express their contempt?

Mr. KNOX. For several years Americans have been called "white Chinamen" amongst the Mexicans, meaning thereby that when Americans are attacked they endure it without retaliation.

Mr. KEARFUL. Does that mean that they are classed as white-livered cowards?

Mr. KNOX. Exactly.

Mr. KEARFUL. Due to the operation of the policy that has been pursued by this administration in Mexico?

Mr. KNOX. Yes; the general feeling is that when the Mexicans come into contact with Americans that the Mexican dominates—he defeats them; he wrecks them. They cite Columbus and Carrizal especially in proof.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you yourself have personal experiences in getting out of Mexico which illustrated that point? When was it that you came out of Mexico?

Mr. KNOX. I came out of Mexico last the first of December, 1917. I have been told that when Martin Lopez attacks a train—or, rather, I was informed that when Martin Lopez attacked the train—he made it a practice to inquire of the conductor whether he had any Americans amongst the passengers. The conductor who related this to me said that at no time had he happened to have Americans on the train when it had been attacked by Lopez.

Mr. KEARFUL. Lopez was the man who was in command of the Mexican forces that perpetuated the massacre at Santa Isabel?

Mr. KNOX. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. At which some 19 Americans were slaughtered?

Mr. KNOX. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was your experience?

Mr. KNOX. In June, 1917, I was at the Naica mine in Chihuahua and was attacked by a band and driven underground for 24 hours. I was attacked in the night, and held off the band long enough to take refuge underground and escaped in the interval between the time of their riding away to get reinforcements and the arrival of the reinforcements.

Again, in the latter part of November, 1918, I was traveling from Chihuahua City to El Paso when about half way the train came to a stop because the wires were down ahead. In the course of time it developed that Villa had captured Villa Ahumada that morning, had detached 200 men under Martin Lopez to ride southward and attack the north-bound train. This train had been delayed about two hours, and under that circumstance escaped. Lopez had his men drawn up on either side of the track, intending to shoot the train to pieces on its arrival at a certain bridge. Becoming impatient, however, he burned the bridge and returned to Villa Ahumada.

After a wait of 24 hours at Moctezuma station my train returned to Chihuahua City and traffic was interrupted for a week until the line could be repaired and the troops sent out to guard it.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are an American citizen, are you?

Mr. KNOX. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you had occasion to deny your American citizenship in order to escape from danger in Mexico?

Mr. KNOX. I never have. I hope I should never have done so, but it was done for me and without my knowledge on one occasion.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the occasion?

Mr. KNOX. It was the case previously referred to when attacked at Naica. On my way out I had engaged a box car for the transportation of myself and party, in which party was a native Mexican, who made all the arrangements. After reaching El Paso he told me that whenever inquiry as to who we were he always replied that we were a party of German engineers; did that in order to avoid any trouble with the natives.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was at a time when we were at war with Germany?

Mr. KNOX. We were at that time at war with Germany.

Mr. KEARFUL. How are the Germans generally treated by the Mexicans?

Mr. KNOX. The Germans were always well treated by the Mexicans and were in good relations with them.

Mr. KEARFUL. They did not consider them as "white Chinamen?"

Mr. KNOX. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your idea as to what ought to be done to rehabilitate Mexico?

Mr. KNOX. The only salvation of Mexico that I myself see is in the reestablishment of the rural guard.

Mr. KEARFUL. As it was in the time of Diaz?

Mr. KNOX. As it was in the time of Porfirio Diaz, when it was commonly considered to be one of the most efficient constabulary forces in the world.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you see any indications of an intention of the Mexicans to reestablish that guard?

Mr. KNOX. There are none whatever visible at the present time. It is very doubtful whether it could be done under present conditions. Such a man as Felipe Angeles could undoubtedly have established such a force if he had been given an opportunity.

Mr. KEARFUL. He was a man recently executed?

Mr. KNOX. Recently executed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe that order can be established under that or some other adequate system without assistance from the outside of Mexico?

Mr. KNOX. It is difficult to believe that it can be done without outside assistance, any more than it could have been done in the Philippines or in Cuba. Down in Cuba it does, I believe, remain an efficient force, or at all events was so, as I know, for several years after the close of the Spanish War. Such a force once established, with anything like such a government as I believe Mexicans to be capable of, would, in my opinion, remain permanent.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say that the Mexicans are capable of maintaining a government. Do you mean the class of Mexicans who are now in charge of the Government?

Mr. KNOX. Not that class of Mexicans who are now in charge of the Government. I am speaking of such Mexicans who have been in charge of the Government in times past.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know where that class of Mexicans are living at the present time?

Mr. KNOX. Yes; in foreign parts.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you had occasion to learn the attitude of Mexicans of the intelligent and better class toward intervention by this country for the purpose of enabling them to establish a government in Mexico?

Mr. KNOX. I can not say that I have. I have in recent years met very few men of that class in Mexico—intelligent natives. Those that I happen to know in this country—those resident in New York—are, as far as my knowledge extends, in favor of intervention, believing it to be the only salvation for their country.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the attitude of the laboring classes, if you know?

Mr. KNOX. The attitude of the laboring classes is one of absolute indifference as to who governs them as long as they be given the opportunity of earning their living without molestation.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are they a bloodthirsty, fighting class of people, or are they a docile and working class?

Mr. KNOX. They are a docile, peaceable class of people who long for the restoration of law and order in order that they may go about their business without being robbed and abused.

Mr. KEARFUL. What percentage of the population does that class comprise?

Mr. KNOX. I should say, roughly, 90 per cent.

Mr. KEARFUL. What percentage of the population would you say comprised that class which has been engaged in looting the country for personal benefit of the commanding officers?

Mr. KNOX. Well, it is very hard to say. It is a very small proportion of the whole. The matter is complicated by the large number of bandits and robbers who are not so naturally, but are driven to it through sheer want. The regular soldiers would probably behave themselves under ordinary discipline if they were paid and fed, but not being so, are driven to take what they require where they can get it.

That is so, to a considerable extent, of the peons themselves, the peasantry. When they get hungry and cold and feel the necessity strong upon them, they take what they need from other people, when they get the chance. I know it to be the practice of people to go about their business in a motor car, and go about the country driving with a cocked revolver in one hand. They are not afraid of organized bandits of any kind, but of the native who is seeking every opportunity to get something that he needs.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is all I care to ask, Mr. Knox. Is there anything further you would like to state?

Mr. KNOX. There is nothing further save this: Since you have asked me my opinion of the only possible remedy, I feel it necessary to say that if armed intervention is undertaken by this country it must, in order to avoid great difficulty and unnecessary bloodshed, be of such a nature as to make it unmistakable to the Mexican people that this country means business; that it is not another Tampico incident, and above all things, not another Pershing expedition.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that because of those incidents it would be more difficult to convince the Mexicans that we would mean business than it would be if those incidents had not occurred?

Mr. KNOX. I believe that, and those incidents are regrettable as furnishing the arguments which are used in Mexico that Americans will not fight. When making that statement they point to those two incidents.

Mr. KEARFUL. So that in your opinion any strong policy that might be adopted would have to be strongly enforced in order to show them that we mean business?

Mr. KNOX. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And you think that a very much greater demonstration than would have been necessary but for those two incidents?

Mr. KNOX. I do not know that it would have to be numerically stronger than otherwise, but it will have to be more vigorous than otherwise. It must be so vigorous as to be absolutely unmistakable to them as to what is intended.

Mr. KEARFUL. In other words, you believe that whatever we might say at the present time, on account of those incidents, it would be considered a bluff until it is made good?

Mr. KNOX. Until it is made good.

Mr. KEARFUL. I believe that is all, thank you.

(Witness excused.)

TESTIMONY OF NILS OLAF BAGGE.

Mr. KEARFUL. State your full name.

Mr. BAGGE. Nils Olaf Bagge.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your business?

Mr. BAGGE. Consulting engineer, 38 Park Row, New York.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long have you been in Mexico?

Mr. BAGGE. I went to Mexico in 1898, making examination of mines in Sonora.

Mr. KEARFUL. How many years have you spent in Mexico since that time?

Mr. BAGGE. On and off, 16 years.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you acquainted with the conditions in Mexico under Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. BAGGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were they as to law and order?

Mr. BAGGE. They were splendid.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there any difficulty about transacting business or traveling in any part of the Republic of Mexico?

Mr. BAGGE. None at all. I have traveled on mule back from the Atlantic slope to the Pacific slope several times without any gun or any protection of any kind.

Mr. KEARFUL. Could you do that now?

Mr. BAGGE. Oh, no.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did the conditions change?

Mr. BAGGE. They changed in 1913 and 1914. That is, as far as it affected anything against the Americans. We, of course, were in more or less difficulties between the two conflicting factions, but not as Americans. But in 1913 or 1914 that feeling against Americans commenced to develop.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say in 1913 or 1914. Can you place the date at the happening of some event?

Mr. BAGGE. Yes; at the time that Ordzco began fighting as a red flagger, I think they call them; fighting Villa, who was then fighting under Carranza.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was in 1914, was it not?

Mr. BAGGE. It may possibly have been. I have not the date with me. It seemed to me, though, it was in 1913.

Mr. KEARFUL. The American forces landed at Vera Cruz in April, 1914, and Huerta abdicated in July, 1914.

Mr. BAGGE. Yes; but Huerta disposed of Madero in 1913, was it not?

Mr. KEARFUL. In February, 1913.

Mr. BAGGE. And then Orozco fought under Huerta.

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. BAGGE. At that time a good many outrages had been committed against the Americans, and no retaliation had been attempted, or at least had not been accomplished, and regard for American life had been growing less and less, and that was in 1913.

Mr. KEARFUL. And how have the conditions been since that time? Have they been better or worse?

Mr. BAGGE. They have been particularly bad since Carranza gained control.

Mr. KEARFUL. When was that?

Mr. BAGGE. That was in the early part of 1915.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the feeling toward the Americans under Diaz and Madero and Huerta?

Mr. BAGGE. The very best, and particularly well in Mexico City; treated as well as we deserved if we acted decently.

Mr. KEARFUL. What have you to say about the statement that has been made often in this country, sometimes emanating from high official sources, that Americans operating in Mexico are not entitled to consideration because they were engaged in exploiting the Mexicans.

Mr. BAGGE. That is mendacity, I think. Most Americans went into Mexico to examine the resources, and they found mines dormant, exhausted, unprofitable. I will give you a few data as to that.

In the years 1872 and 1873, Mexico's gold production was $976,000; the silver production was $21,441,000. This was the period before the advent of American-built railways.

In the years 1882-83—that is one decade afterwards—the Mexican gold production was $956,000, and the silver production was $29,565,000.

Ten years after, in the year 1900-1901, at the time when the cyanide method was introduced into Mexico by Americans, the gold production was $8,848,000 and the silver production was $72,868,795.

Now, that shows that when the Americans built the railroads and opened arteries of trade, and also more ores to be moved, that material benefits came to Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the condition of mining properties in Mexico generally when the Americans went in there? Did the Americans, when they went in, find rich, profitable mines, which they took away from the Mexicans for the purpose of exploitation?

Mr. BAGGE. They did not. They found, as I said, the industry dormant, the mines virtually exhausted. They brought their organization ability and industry and their application of up-to-date methods and applied them to that industry, and, as I show by the statistics given you, increased the output. They found that the old bonanza, which had, in years covering centuries, produced these hundreds of millions on which Mexico is exploited as a marvelously rich country, were all worked out, the Mexican had taken the cream and the American got the skimmed milk, but he took the skimmed milk and made it profitable by his ability.

But, before that, I want to say that the Mexican asks and receives a better price from the American than the American would receive from one similarly situated. The reason for that is, in my judgment, that Mexico had been the land of promise; it had been very well advertised, and the cheap labor, of course, was an incentive, which enabled the Americans, with their better knowledge of working on a large scale, to work these properties.

Mr. KEARFUL. What effect did the operations of Americans have upon the conditions of labor in the mines?

Mr. BAGGE. Well, the Americans found that the Mexican mine owner, in all cases, practically, kept the store, known as the tienda; that the peon, who got very low wages, would be allowed credit, and eventually was in debt to the store. The result was he never had a chance to either take care of himself or his family, or do anything for them.

Mr. KEARFUL. What effect did the American operations have upon that system?

Mr. BAGGE. Well, Americans raised the wages, not because they wanted to compete with the Mexicans, but because their larger-sized operations required more men. That, of course, gave rise to a feeling against the Americans amongst the well-to-do Mexicans, because they raised the wages of the peons. The Americans never ran stores, unless the property was so far away from the railroad that it would be a help to the Mexicans.

Mr. KEARFUL. What about the actual working conditions in the mine? Were they better?

Mr. BAGGE. The Mexican works his mine different from the way we do. He is an excellent miner, a wonderful prospector, but he knows nothing about sanitation. He has no ventilating system, and he works by manual labor where we will apply machinery to lessen the labor, and we installed ventilating systems, something the Mexican had never before had. We put in hoists and cages, where a Mexican would have to carry his ore to the surface on his back, sweating blood all the way for a few centavos a day; there could not be any more of a beast of burden than an ordinary Mexican in the ordinary Mexican mine.

Mr. KEARFUL. How was that condition under the American operations?

Mr. BAGGE. We have applied the same methods we have applied here; sanitation, ventilation, safer system of stopping, whereby we have less accidents from caves; we do not rob the pillars of the mine, like the Mexican has done. After he had taken his bonanza, he would cave his property. That we would not permit. An American would not go into a Mexican mine to work under those conditions, so, of course, we could not expect the Mexican to work where an American would not go in.

Mr. KEARFUL. You worked the Mexicans under the same conditions that you worked the Americans?

Mr. BAGGE. Yes. I will say this, the Mexicans themselves, the mine owners, have improved their methods very much in that regard since they had the example of the American methods, and, at the same time, their methods are still very crude.

Mr. KEARFUL. So that the operation of the American miners has been to improve not only the conditions in their own mines, but those in the Mexican mines themselves?

Mr. BAGGE. Yes; that is so.

Mr. KEARFUL. And with respect to the payment of wages; did the Americans continue the payment from the tiendas?

Mr. BAGGE. No. In the first place you can not apply that the same as the Mexican. It is a little way of doing business. An American does not do it in that way. It is too much difficulty.

I will give you an illustration: A Mexican peon is proverbially improvident. He will not buy a week's supply, probably because he has not the money, so he buys it three times a day. His lard or sugar, he would buy his day's supply three times a day; and the result is that it is a little, picayune amount of business that an American could not bother with. If they tried to run a store, they would always run it at a great loss. If they had run a store, it would have been a financial loss to the company. That is something we learned in this country, but a good many Mexican mines in the early days obtained their only profit from the stores, and none from the mines.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you personally connected with a mining company?

Mr. BAGGE. I am president of the Almoloya Mining Co.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where is that company operating?

Mr. BAGGE. In Chihuahua, between Jiminez and Parral.

Mr. KEARFUL. With what success have your operations been conducted?

Mr. BAGGE. A total loss of about $450,000 to date.

Mr. KEARFUL. What amount of money has been invested in that operation?

Mr. BAGGE. Altogether I have been instrumental in bringing ... about $1,500,000 of American money into Mexico. We have taken out possible $250,000 in profits.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who contributed that money?

Mr. BAGGE. Most of it myself, and investors in smaller and larger sums.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who purchased the shares of stock in your company?

Mr. BAGGE. Yes. And I would say this, which is hardly understood here, that most of the mining operations of Mexico, and the people living there, are only employees or hired help. Those are the ones who have suffered; also the stockholders in these different companies. Like all American companies, capital is raised by a few men getting together a syndicate and arranging the preliminaries and then raising the money from a number of investors.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did you begin operations?

Mr. BAGGE. Our company, in 1902.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did your difficulties begin?

Mr. BAGGE. At the start of the Madero revolution, 1909, I think it was.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please describe what happened then with reference to contributions and depredations, etc.

Mr. BAGGE. Well, at that time I was president of a company known as the Compania Minera Rio de Plata, over on the western side of the State of Chihuahua, at the junction with the State of Sonora and Sinaloa, 18 miles from the railroad. At that time we had about 300 mules packing in machinery and supplies and bringing out bullion and concentrates, and one of the best packers we had was a man named Orozco.

Mr. KEARFUL. Pascual?

Mr. BAGGE. Pascual Orozco. I brought in six .30-.30 Winchester for the use of the mine, because it is a pretty rich property, and in that property and all other properties in Mexico we paid full value for every dollar in sight in that mine, which was $350,000 gold. We put in a mill costing about $500,000 gold.

There is one thing about the exploitation claimed against Americans in taking out these millions from Mexico, and that is seldom considered, but it costs from 70 to 85 per cent of what you obtain to produce the silver bullion, and that money is applied to wages and supplies which go to Mexico, so, if you take out $1,000,000 in bullion, about $850,000 of that stays in Mexico. The price of producing an ounce of silver varies, of course, in some cases up to over 50 cents an ounce. It possibly is higher now because other things have gone up, though present silver is higher than it has been since 1873.

Mr. KEARFUL. But you are not able to take advantage of that under present conditions, are you?

Mr. BAGGE. Not at all. We have quite a lot of ore too low grade for us to work at the time the revolution started, and which we could make money on to-day, but we can not get at it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you have any special concessions from the Mexican authorities which gave you advantages over the Mexicans in that locality in operating mines?

Mr. BAGGE. None at all. I could have gotten what they call concessions, which means practically licenses, but the duties and obligations that they bring with them are such that it is not worth while to bother with them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please proceed to describe the troubles that you encountered at the beginning of the Madero revolution.

Mr. BAGGE. We had no particular difficulty with Orozco, because he was a friend of ours, and respected Americans, I think, considerably.

Villa at that time appeared, and he used to make his headquarters south of Allende.

Mr. KEARFUL. What year was that?

Mr. BAGGE. That was in 1910; but he was not very formidable at that time. That is, we never took him very seriously. Our real trouble started in 1913 and 1914, after the administration ordered us out of Mexico. That forced us to abandon the mine, and fungus grew up on the timbers and quickly rotted them, and we had much difficulty to operate, and we were robbed occasionally; that is, had to give something to the cause, gasoline or dynamite, or corn, beans, and clothes, and occasionally a little money.

Mr. KEARFUL. By whom were these exactions made?

Mr. BAGGE. Well; they were so many I can not remember offhand, but there were Urbina and Villa—

Mr. KEARFUL. Urbina was under Villa?

Mr. BAGGE. He was under Villa in Durango; Herrera, Hernandez—

Mr. KEARFUL. Who is he?

Mr. BAGGE. He is under Carranza.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who else?

Mr. BAGGE. De la Fuente.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was he?

Mr. BAGGE. He was not a bandit, but he was an engineer, really, that tried to become president of Mexico for a little time, but I think he was one of the adventurers of Madero against Huerta. He did not last very long. It was Herrera came up and took our superintendent, who was an American, and he took the two superintendents of the adjoining mines, both Mexicans, and very fine Mexicans at that, and he held all three of them for a ransom.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who did this?

Mr. BAGGE. Herrera, under Carranza, and he got a check for 5,000 pesos from one of the superintendents and they let him escape. The other Mexican could not give any check or promises. I think his company was too poor, so they took him down to a pumping station about a mile and had our superintendent look on while they shot him. He was a very fine young fellow.

Then, they took our superintendent to the railroad station, and the train came along and they searched the train and found four Mexicans on there, made them get off the train and told them to run, and the whole bunch then shot at them, and thought it great sport. Then they took our superintendent eventually and marched him about 60 kilometers behind the mounted troops, only one man guarding him, eating their dust, and they had then impressed him as a soldier of the cause, and by promising to pay 750 pesos to Herrera's brother, who was operating at Parral at that time, and which we did eventually pay, he got back in a few days in bad physical condition, and we had no further trouble with Herrera.

Mr. KEARFUL. Your superintendent was an American citizen?

Mr. BAGGE. An American citizen; yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you report this incident as to ransom and payment of 750 pesos to American authorities?

Mr. BAGGE. Oh, no.

Mr. KEARFUL. Why not?

Mr. BAGGE. What was the use? We got over that some time before.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the reason for your attitude?

Mr. BAGGE. Because other people had tried that and found that they got no satisfaction. The general feeling among the Americans was that the best thing to do was to take their medicine.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the feeling of the Mexicans toward Americans up to the time of the resignation of Huerta?

Mr. BAGGE. Well, previous to the Madero revolution, I distinctly remember there was quite some agitation in Mexico which claimed "Mexico for Mexicans." That was backed by the middle class of Mexicans, the school teachers and the notaries and the middle-class people. They saw one mine after another that was a failure under the Mexicans become prosperous under the Americans, and I think it raised a little bit of jealousy, and at that time there was a lot of labor agitation in Mexico, and these agitators would go and try to form labor unions, not exactly as we have them here, but on that line. They also agitated at that time to eliminate the American railroadmen from operating the Mexican trains, and, of course, eventually the American railroad men were withdrawn as train conductors and engineers as soon as the Mexicans were capable of running them.

themselves. I think Madero was partly responsible for that agitation; at least, he never did suppress it, but there was no feeling against individual Americans. There was the very best kind of feeling.

Mr. KEARFUL. Up to what time?

Mr. BAGGE. Up to 1918 and 1914.

Mr. KEARFUL. Up to the time when the Americans were ordered out of Mexico by this Government?

Mr. BAGGE. At that time, when no reprisals were made for raping of American women and children, and we quit. Up to that time I think the Mexicans did respect us.

Mr. KEARFUL. You heard the testimony of Mr. Knox, of the attitude which took the form of denominating Americans as "white Chinamen"?

Mr. BAGGE. Oh, yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that correct?

Mr. BAGGE. That is very common. You will hear Mexicans say, "What kind of people are you, anyhow? We have raped your women; we have spit on your flag, and insulted your Government, and killed your men, and still you will not fight."

That is a common thing in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the attitude of Villa towards Americans?

Mr. BAGGE. Villa was rather fair to Americans. I remember in 1915, after we had been ordered out, Villa got control of Chihuahua and we started to work. I spent quite some time there during that period under Villa. We had, so far as Americans were concerned, reasonable law and order. A number of murders occurred amongst the Mexicans, but not of the Americans. He put the railroads in fair condition, considering what they had been, and he started a number of industries; the smelter started up, and we were doing very well until Villa got into difficulty with his fiat money, and then his trouble started; and then Obregon defeated him, and infiltration of Carranza soldiers would occur, and it got too uncomfortable for us.

Mr. KEARFUL. You spoke of contributions levied by different parties. In what way would those contributions be exacted?

Mr. BAGGE. Well, they would come up and ask for five cases of gasoline for their automobiles, or five cases of dynamite, fuses, and caps, and they would give you a receipt for it and promise to pay at some future time. but when Carranza came in there, Obregon being the chief, they would take a carload of gasoline and you go to them and ask for receipts they would shrug their shoulders; you could get nothing out of them. Just simply came and took it and laughed at you; spit at you if you showed any spunk, but we could not show any spunk. They took our guns away from us; we were absolutely defenseless then.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you appeal to your Government for protection?

Mr. BAGGE. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. At no time?

Mr. BAGGE. I did not, but lots of other people did, I know.

Mr. KEARFUL. The reason you did not was because you saw the result of their efforts?

Mr. BAGGE. I know that I was a member of a little defense society in El Paso amongst the mining men, and they sent a delegation up here to see the Government—the heads of the Government—and they reported they were insulted and called renegades and a few other choice things, and I thought, "What is the use"?

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the reason given by the authorities here for insulting them and calling them renegades?

Mr. BAGGE. Well, at that time they were saying that Americans that went beyond their own borders for profit expected greater interest on their money than what they would get in the United States, and they should take the risk. That was one of the reasons given. Of course, that was the attitude toward the beginning. Now, the stand is a little different.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think they have taken a different stand in regard to protecting Americans in Mexico?

Mr. BAGGE. Not at all in Mexico; but I think eventually we will have a policy on account of the greatly increased merchant marine, which will demand the protection of Americans all over the world—similar to England.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think it is possible for any country to extend its foreign trade without its citizens going into foreign countries?

Mr. BAGGE. That is impossible.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think it is possible for citizens of a country to go into foreign countries to extend operations without receiving protection from their own Government in case it is not given by the foreign Government?

Mr. BAGGE. An American might take a big risk in going into a foreign country, but he can not obtain the capital to expand his trade unless protection is given to him.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, was it true that you and your associates, who, you say, sent a delegation to Washington, were engaged in making any fancy profits from large bonanzas in Mexico?

Mr. BAGGE. I know of no American mining men who found a bonanza in Mexico that he did not pay 100 per cent, value received. As a matter of fact, I feel that bonanzas found for the the picking up is a myth. The Mexican is a splendid prospector. Every foot of ground in the Sierras has been prospected and shows ore, and you can not beat him in operating on a small scale, for a small mine. The only place you can do it is where you have combined large capital; you can not get a Mexican to put in any amount of capital into a proposition that involves such a risk that an American would consider good business judgment.

Mr. KEARFUL. What has been the secret of Villa's power and success and ability to escape capture?

Mr. BAGGE. Well, there are two reasons for it. The first is that the peon believes in Villa. He is one of their own, and he has a good deal of their confidence. If not, of course, he would have been captured long ago. The other reason is, the Carranza generals would lose the best part of their profits if they captured many of the bandits.

Mr. KEARFUL. You think it is the policy of the Carranza generals to keep banditry alive in order to enrich themselves?

Mr. BAGGE. Oh, there is no argument on that at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. You think that is the fact?

Mr. BAGGE. That is undoubtedly the fact. That you can see very easily. You can see Federal troops within three miles of so-called bandits, and they go and sit down and take lunch, and the bandits are not attacked.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where does Villa get his munitions of war?

Mr. BAGGE. The information that I have on that subject is, of course, from people who have been down there lately, and they say he gets most of the ammunition from the Carranza troops, or from the women. That is, the women camp followers.

Mr. KEARFUL. Women camp followers of the Carranza troops?

Mr. BAGGE. Of the Carranza troops; yes. That is the usual practice among Mexicans, to sell ammunition to them.

Mr. KEARFUL. How do the actions of the Carranza troops compare with those of the so-called bandits headed by Villa and others?

Mr. BAGGE. Well, many citizens say that the Carranza troops were more ruthless than Villa's. The only time that they were really vicious was at the time Orozco and Villa fought. Then Villa would kill every prisoner of the red flag under Orozco. They do that, I believe, to a less extent at present. I think Villa, while he shoots a good many prisoners, he accepts a good many of the Federals, because most of the Federals are not free volunteers to the Carranza forces.

Mr. KEARFUL. What about the acts of the various factions in reference to prominent women of the towns they capture?

Mr. BAGGE. Well, I was in Jimenez after one of those raids, and the usual practice is to take the wife and daughters of any of the prominent men they could get and turn them over to quarters where the houses of prostitution are located and let the soldiers in there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that the practice followed by the Carranza forces?

Mr. BAGGE. Why, I think that is the general practice of both forces. I was at the mine one day when an old blind woman was brought to me, and she said, "For the love of the Mother of God, give me some help." I asked her what was the matter, and she said her daughter had been looking after her, but "the revolution had taken her." That is the way she expressed it, and that they had taken everything she had, even her underclothes. This old woman lived in a hole in a side of an arroyo, where a cave had been dug out and an old sack served as a door, and that was rather typical of the heartlessness of Carranza troops, I think. You see girls 10 years old and you will swear they are 30 years old, from their faces.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you in Mexico at the time of the Pershing expedition?

Mr. BAGGE. No; I was in Arizona at that time. I was on the railroad, I think, a few hours away from Columbus, at the time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever have any conversation with any officers of the Pershing expedition in reference to their getting Villa?

Mr. BAGGE. Yes; I talked with a captain, had a long conversation with him. I told him I could not understand how he could get so many Mexicans into Columbus without being noticed, and he told me that that was rather simple, that the orders from Washington were that if a Mexican soldier would leave his arms on the other side of the fence—you see the United States and Mexico are divided by a hog-proof wire fence all along the line—and if they would leave their arms on the other side of the fence they could come in, while our troops, if they went over to the Mexican side, merely for a visit, unarmed, they would be arrested on the Mexican side and court-martialed on our side, so there were no doubt a great many Villa bandits within the town of Columbus before the attack, and he told me that he started with 85 men within an hour after they had repulsed the attack, but he had started without orders, and realized he had to return, but within a day or two they went down en masse, down to Satevo, I think it was he told me, and they could have gotten Villa within three or four hours' ride without any trouble if they had been permitted to go ahead. I understood that Pershing was notified by Gen. Trevino that if he advanced south, east, or west he would be attacked and Pershing said that if he decided to go east, south, or west, he would go, but he did not.

Mr. KEARFUL. He also said if he were attacked he would use his whole forces?

Mr. BAGGE. Whole forces, yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. He was attacked, was he not?

Mr. BAGGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And did not use his forces?

Mr. BAGGE. And did not use his forces.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the situation at Parral?

Mr. BAGGE. Our troops had arrived as far down as Dorado, or Boca station—that is about 250 miles from our border—when they ran into a bunch of Mexicans which they thought were Villistas, but it seems they were Carrancistas, and they killed and wounded a few, and these troops then went into Parral; I think most of our troops came in there on a visit, buying fruit, and some of the men were run out. The men were attacked, one or two killed, and they got an order to retreat. I believe they ran about 80 miles—not because of fear, but that was the orders.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, was not Villa then in the vicinity of Parral, wounded and unable to travel?

Mr. BAGGE. I think Villa was at a place called Allende. That is a few miles from Parral.

Mr. KEARFUL. And was it not the opinion of the officers of the Pershing expedition that if they had been permitted to proceed they could have gotten Villa there?

Mr. BAGGE. Oh, yes; they could have gotten Villa in two ways. They could have gotten him if they were permitted to go ahead, as they were anxious to do, or if they had been permitted to go down on the Mexican Central Railroad. They had all of the trains and equipment ready, and going on the railroad they could have cut across the country and headed him off without any trouble.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you find to be the sentiment of the Mexican people, that is, the laboring classes, as to what ought to be done to remedy the conditions?

Mr. BAGGE. The laboring classes?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. BAGGE. Oh, I do not think they have any opinion. All they want is to be left alone and given a chance to earn their living.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do they constitute a large percentage of the Mexican population?

Mr. BAGGE. Oh, 90 per cent, I should say.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do they hope for, if anything?

Mr. BAGGE. I think they have no hope. I think the Mexican peon is absolutely without hope.

Mr. KEARFUL. What have you found the opinion of the intelligent Mexicans in regard to what ought to be done to remedy the conditions?

Mr. BAGGE. Well, the fine type of Mexican that we used to know in the olden days, and who is now a refugee, is appreciative of what America has done for Mexico. He is also friendly disposed to America. He has no illusions about the difficulty of bringing the peon to a plane that he thinks he wants to reach, and those better kind of Mexicans are discouraged with the outlook.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say that class of Mexicans are now living outside of Mexico?

Mr. BAGGE. Very few of the high-type Mexicans live in Mexico to-day.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the reason they are outside of Mexico?

Mr. BAGGE. Persecution from every side.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that the class of Mexicans which, in your opinion, it is necessary to rely upon to reestablish good government in Mexico?

Mr. BAGGE. He is the only one that can do it, if he can do it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think they can do it without assistance from the outside, they themselves being on the outside?

Mr. BAGGE. I doubt it. I can not conceive how they could do it without help.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you talked with any of them about their hopes in that respect?

Mr. BAGGE. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did they say?

Mr. BAGGE. As a rule, the better type of Mexican does not wish to put himself on record as wishing this country to do anything. They have a peculiar notion and they can not agree amongst themselves. They would take a man and then get him help in some matter, either money or munitions and freedom of import duty, and they think they could rally around the man, but when you analyze their talk you find that eight of that type of Mexicans going to pick a leader, they will pick eight leaders. A South American told me sometime ago that "We Latin-Americans are so different from you, in that you are willing to pick a leader and back him after election, while we all want to be major-domos." I think that expresses the situation in reference to the difficulty of the Mexicans to stand for a principle and not for a man.

Mr. KEARFUL. You think their politics is personal rather than on principle?

Mr. BAGGE. Oh, yes; entirely so; and the peon will fight for his jefe, or captain, but he does not know what he is fighting for; he can not tell you; nor can any man tell you why they have had this revolution. At least, I have never been able to find one.

Mr. KEARFUL. Generally the leader in a revolution starts with a manifesto, in which he promises the peons that they will have restored to them the land that has been taken away from them.

Mr. BAGGE. Oh, yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is always the case, is it not?

Mr. BAGGE. Always the case; wonderful when it comes to manifestos; beautiful language. Carranza had a very clever scheme. He promised the Mexicans, of course, not only the land, but he was going to do a lot for the miners. He did a lot to them but not much for them. One of his schemes was—and I suppose it is still the law, for all I know— was that if a man was discharged for incapacity because he got drunk or anything else, you had to pay him three months' wages. Another thing was if a man got the stomach ache, or claimed he had one, and reported sick, you had to support his family. His family, of course, usually was composed of one or two women and a number of children, and all the relatives, and a few hundred dogs.

That is only one or two of the difficulties that my managers had to contend with under Carranza. There were so many other restrictions that unless you wanted to break the law every day and subject yourself to different kinds of fines, which you could overcome by paying blackmail, it was difficult to operate.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you think of the favorite promise of dividing up the land amongst the peons? Is that practicable?

Mr. BAGGE. Well, I found that wherever there is any land that is suitable for irrigation in Chihuahua you find a great many small landowners there. Gov. Terrazas has, of course, a tremendously big ranch; I think they claim many millions of acres, but outside of the grazing land, I do not see much possibilities of that land being suitable for cultivation without irrigation. I know down at Conchos, at the Conchos River, there is a large Canadian and English irrigation project, a wonderful one, which covers some 200,000 acres, and that land is poor, desert-like, and unless there is invested a large amount of capital, which those projects require, and which they have not got, that land is unfit for any other purpose but possibly poor grazing, say one cow to 50 or 60 acres.

Mr. KEARFUL. Would it be impossible for a peon to support himself upon a small tract of that land by agriculture?

Mr. BAGGE. I do not know if any peon really does support himself from the land. He usually works a few months cultivating the tract of land he has, and then works in the mines or on the railroads, or some other place during the balance of the season. It is only the planting season and the harvesting season that he really sticks to his land.

Mr. KEARFUL. You think that those fair sounding promises that are made in the revolution manifestos are honest, as a rule?

Mr. BAGGE. No; I do not. There is one thing about this Mexican land question that I had occasion to test. During Villa's time we had quite a little trouble getting corn and beans to our men on account of the low value of his money, and before the rainy season started, which starts, I think, in June, San Juan Day, the 26th of June—it usually starts in officially, we got a bunch of these fellows together and said, "Here, we will fix it up with the men that own the land down here, owning many thousands of acres of land, that you can use this land out here and we will supply you with food and half pay if you will cultivate that land in corn and beans and be ready for the rainy season, and then we will pay you full price for the corn and beans, so we can sell it to you fellows while working here at the mine."

Of course it would cost us quite a little money to do it, but they started breaking the land, which is very easily broken, but before a month they all wanted to quit: they all wanted to go back to work at the mine, because they said the miner, he is getting more money than we do. They were not so land hungry that they would try that experiment.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your opinion about what ought to be done to remedy the conditions in Mexico?

Mr. BAGGE. That is the last question, I suppose.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is the question that troubles us.

Mr. BAGGE. Well, fundamentally, that is a question that our administration should have answered. That is what they have been hired to do. I can see no solution to the Mexican situation without active assistance from our people.

Mr. KEARFUL. What form should that assistance take, in your opinion?

Mr. BAGGE. Two plans. One is withdraw recognition from Carranza, blockade the ports, possibly take the shipping ports, and thereby drive Carranza and his gang of thieves from Mexico, and then back the decent Mexicans with ammunition and funds and exact from them certain binding agreements which our State Department ought to be able to formulate, and the other is to take charge of it alone, go in there, and establish a constabulary, the same as we did in the Philippines and Cuba, and let the Mexicans run the country, the same as we are taking charge of the Philippines or backing Cuba. That is the only solution I can see. Either one is a painful one, but we have to face it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Which one do you prefer?

Mr. BAGGE. Well, naturally, I prefer the first one, because the second one would mean both of my boys would go in that, as they did in the late war.

Mr. KEARFUL. You believe the first thing would be for this Government to withdraw recognition from Carranza?

Mr. BAGGE. That is the first thing, under any condition.

Mr. KEARFUL. And support with arms and finances the decent class of Mexicans who are now exiled from the country?

Mr. BAGGE. Yes, sir; and those decent Mexicans which we know are friendly to America living in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. How do you think that project would be received generally in Mexico, outside of those who are now making money out of the government operation there?

Mr. BAGGE. I think favorably. The peon would certainly welcome it. I think, within a very short time, we would have a very efficient organization of Mexican troops who could put down the banditry, if they were backed by American officers, put in charge of American officers.

Mr. KEARFUL. I believe that is all I wanted to ask. Is there any further statement you would like to make?

Mr. BAGGE. No, sir; I can not think of anything right now.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, you may be excused; we are very much obliged to you.

We will take a recess at this time until 2 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 1 o'clock p. m. a recess was taken until 2 o'clock p. m.)

AFTER RECESS.

The hearing was resumed at the expiration of the recess.

TESTIMONY OF MR. VICENTE SANCHEZ GAVITO.

(The witness was duly sworn.)

Mr. BENNETT. As attorney for Mr. Gavito, I wish to state that Mr. Gavito is a citizen of the Republic of Mexico. When he received your subpoena he came to me and asked if a citizen of Mexico could be compelled to come here under that process, stating he had no desire to appear. I, of course, advised him that he had to obey your subpoena, and I wish it distinctly understood that he is here pursuant to a due and lawful subpoena which requires his presence before this committee.

Mr. KEARFUL. In response to the statement made by Mr. Bennett, I wish to say that the committee fully appreciates the delicate position that a Mexican citizen is placed in by being called on to testify, but at the same time, it is believed that the opinions of the class of Mexican citizens who are called here are of great benefit to the committee in the recommendations which it will have to make, and believes that however embarrassing it may be to such witnesses, that it is really a great opportunity for them to perform a patriotic service for their own country, and as the law of this country does not exempt the attendance of witnesses on committees of Congress because of alien citizenship, the testimony will proceed.

Will you please state your full name?

Mr. GAVITO. Vicente Sanchez Gavito.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your citizenship?

Mr. GAVITO. Mexican citizen.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where do you live at the present time?

Mr. GAVITO. 1807 Broadway, New York.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your business?

Mr. GAVITO. I am in the export and import business. I am president of a company and counsel for some Mexican matters.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was your profession in Mexico?

Mr. GAVITO. A doctor and lawyer.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you practice both of those professions?

Mr. GAVITO. No; lately I only practiced law.

Mr. KEARFUL. What official positions have you held in the Mexican Government?

Mr. GAVITO. I only was elected to the Senate in 1912, and I stayed in the Senate until October 15, when it broke up.

Mr. KEARFUL. It was dissolved?

Mr. GAVITO. The Congress was dissolved.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did you leave Mexico?

Mr. GAVITO. I left Mexico City August 4, 1914.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was about the time of the entry of Carranza into Mexico City?

Mr. GAVITO. A little before.

Mr. KEARFUL. From Mexico City to what border point did you go?

Mr. GAVITO. I went to Vera Cruz.

Mr. KEARFUL. Vera Cruz was then in the hands of the American forces?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Under whose command?

Mr. GAVITO. Under the command of Gen. Funston?

Mr. KEARFUL. How were you received by Gen. Funston?

Mr. GAVITO. I never met him.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did your party have anything to do with the American forces there in reference to accommodations, or leaving the country?

Mr. GAVITO. Not except we were advised to leave the country, because the American troops were going to be in control.

Mr. KEARFUL. What information did you receive as to the attitude of Gen. Funston with respect to Mexican refugees coming through Vera Cruz?

Mr. GAVITO. It was a very fair one.

Mr. KEARFUL. What action did he take in their favor?

Mr. GAVITO. I think, according to the rumors among the Mexican refugees in Vera Cruz, he had been ordered to withdraw the American forces in three or four days. He did not obey the orders, because he wanted to let the Mexican families have a chance to get a boat. By that time almost all of the steamers which rendered usual service between Mexican and American ports had stopped because the war had broke out, and it was a very difficult thing to get any accommodations.

Mr. KEARFUL. You understood that Gen. Funston took that action for the protection of Mexican refugees who wanted to leave the country, without orders from his Government, and, in fact, contrary to the orders he had received?

Mr. GAVITO. I really thought that it was contrary to the orders given to him, but I can not be very emphatic in this matter, because, of course, I do not know. I think he was actuated by high humanitarian purposes, because our families would have been handed over to the mercies of the revolutionary group.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the reason for the families of certain Mexicans leaving Mexico at that time?

Mr. GAVITO. There were two reasons. Some Mexicans had all kinds of reason to think that the revolutionary group would exercise some revenge or reprisals on them, and another group, to which I belonged, left the City of Mexico only not to be present at the looting and disorders that we feared would follow.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you acquainted with Manuel Calero?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where is he living now.

Mr. GAVITO. In New York.

Mr. KEARFUL. What official positions did he hold in the Mexican Government?

Mr. GAVITO. I think, during the whole of Gen. Huerta's régime, he had the office of under secretary of fomento. Afterwards he was elected as representative in the house. Then, under the Madero régime, he was secretary of justice and, I think, secretary of fomento.

Mr. KEARFUL. Of foreign relations?

Mr. GAVITO. Of foreign relations, and afterwards ambassador from Mexico to the United States, and afterwards he went to the senate at the same time I was there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you familiar with the book written by Mr. Calero, about September, 1916, entitled "The Mexican Policy of President Wilson as it Appears to the Mexican"?

Mr. GAVITO. I read it about that time, but I do not remember it very well.

Mr. KEARFUL. On page 26 of Mr. Calero's book is this statement:

The revolutionists signalized themselves by the most cruel manifestations of savagery, by a ferocity without limits. It is true that Huerta is as responsible as Carranza for the inhuman act of sacrificing prisoners of war, whom both contending parties put to death without mercy; but the forces of Carranza committed other excesses, such as the sacking of towns, attacks against the honor of women, profanation of temples, the assassination of pacific inhabitants, the expulsion en masse of foreigners, and destruction by fire and dynamite.

Do you recognize that as a true picture of the operations of the revolutionists under Carranza?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes; I think it was common talk; it was known by everybody. However, I have not first-hand information, because I never stayed in any city during the time it was occupied by the revolutionists.

Mr. KEARFUL. On page 31 of his book Mr. Calero gives an account of the surrender of Mexico City to Carranza by temporary President Carbajal. According to Mr. Calero, Carranza demanded unconditional surrender of the city. Carbajal, who had been called to occupy the presidency because of his position on the Supreme Court, and knowing the excesses that had been committed at other places, such as San Luis Potosi, asked, as a condition of surrender, that the lives and property of the people be protected, but Carranza refused to admit any condition, and in that position, Carranza having been supported by the American Government, Carbajal was forced to acquiesce, and the city was unconditionally surrendered.

Do you remember whether that was a true statement of the conditions? Were you there at the time?

Mr. GAVITO. No; I was not; because, as I said before, I left the town on the 4th of August, and the revolutionists went into Mexico City the 14th or 15th, but the news that we got in Vera Cruz in regard to all these facts substantiate what Mr. Calero says.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Calero then goes on to state, on page 31, as follows:

What happened then is something that the American Government has not dared to publish. The few honorable constitutionalists shudder to recall it. The Department of State has in its archives the official information of the outrages committed by the so-called constitutionalists in the great capital of Mexico. Never had the city suffered such indignities, not even in the blackest days of our revolutionary life. Even the diplomatic representatives of the foreign governments were robbed by Carranza "generals" and by the mob of ravenous politicians that followed Carranza; even the Brazilian minister, official representative of the United States, was robbed.

And again on page 78, speaking on the same subject, Mr. Calero says:

The revolutionists entered a place, and the inhabitants, terrorized, shut themselves up in their houses, concealed their wives and their daughters to save them from the lust of those ferocious beasts, and concealed their properties to save them from pillage.

Do you recognize those statements as being true, to the best of your information at that time?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes. I would have to give the same answer I gave to the former questions. I have not first-hand information, but I think it is true.

Mr. KEARFUL. What became of the house in which you and your father were living at the time the Carranza forces entered Mexico City in August, 1914?

Mr. GAVITO. It was twice occupied, once by the Zapatistas, and then for the Carrancistas, and the general who went into our dwelling and occupied it against our will was Bonillas.

Mr. KEARFUL. Ignacio Bonillas? The man who is now Mexican ambassador to this country?

Mr. GAVITO. Exactly.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know, from information you have received, about what happened to the contents of the houses that were occupied?

Mr. GAVITO. The houses that they occupied?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. GAVITO. I think the majority were stolen by them, and another part was destroyed, and some personal belongings were left in the houses.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, shortly stated, they were looted, were they not?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes. I ought to say that our house was not looted, except valuable books in our library, and small things.

Mr. KEARFUL. Some personal belongings?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know Francisco Bulnes?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was he a prominent man in Mexico?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes, sir a very prominent man: was one of our best men, and a very learned writer.

Mr. KEARFUL. He is recognized as quite an illustrious historian. is he not?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes; although it is generally admitted that he is a one-sided man. In other words, he is too passionate in his judgments.

Mr. KEARFUL. He makes a statement in a book which he published entitled, "The whole truth about Mexico," on page 295, about the acts of the so-called constitutionalists, and says, speaking about the agrarian problem, as follows:

And the land holdings, the great land holdings, what of them? The greatest among them passed into the hands of the constitutionalist chiefs, to be enjoyed with the rights of absolute ownership. What had constituted the great offense against the poor had become the great plum of the conquest. All the personal property of the wealthy was appropriated by the constitutionalists. Handsome residences, automobiles, jewelry, furniture, money, clothes, everything possessed by the aristocrats, and even those who were not aristocrats, was taken by the revolutionists.

Do you think that is too passionate a statement?

Mr. GAVITO. No; it is perfectly correct. But I should say that was done not only by the Carrancistas, but also by the other revolutionists, the Zapataistas and the Villistas.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are aware of the fact that since the beginning of the late revolutionary troubles in Mexico the American Government has not afforded any protection whatever to American citizens or their property in Mexico? You are aware of that fact?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have also heard, I suppose, as a justification for that policy, that the Americans who had been and were operating in Mexico were a class of speculators engaged in exploiting the Mexican people under special concessions that had been granted to them by the government officials? You have heard that also, have you not?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes, sir; I have seen that in the press.

Mr. KEARFUL. What can you say about the truth of that statement, that the Americans operating in Mexico were a class of speculators and exploiters?

Mr. GAVITO. Of course, I believe that when they went to Mexico they were actuated by the purpose of getting benefits.

Mr. KEARFUL. Naturally.

Mr. GAVITO. They did not go for utilitarian purposes, but I think it would not be fair to say they have been exploiting the country. They have invested money—

Mr. KEARFUL. First, as to the character of Americans operating in Mexico, you came in contact with them a good deal, did you not?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of people did you find them to be?

Mr. GAVITO. Very good people; they deal with the peons very fairly. They respected the laws of our country, and they were highly esteemed by us.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they comply with the laws generally?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes; law-abiding always.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were they professional and business men, such as mining engineers?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes; lots of them; and lawyers and bankers.

Mr. KEARFUL. And doctors?

Mr. GAVITO. Doctors, yes; and all of them of fine character, and afterwards they have associated with the Mexicans in the progress of the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe the operations of American capitalists under American professional men and business men in Mexico has been for the benefit or detriment of Mexico?

Mr. GAVITO. I should say for the benefit. We have only one exception. The oil interests, because I really have no knowledge about them. I could not state anything because I do not know what is the oil situation.

Mr. KEARFUL. But aside from the oil situation?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What form did the benefits take that you observed as flowing from these enterprises?

Mr. GAVITO. Because they imported capital; they raised the standard of living of laborers and they opened new fields for the development of the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the truth about this bugaboo of enormously rich concessions that are said to have been acquired by means of bribery of government officials?

Mr. GAVITO. Oh, it is absolutely untrue.

Mr. KEARFUL. What can you say about the operation of those concessions?

Mr. GAVITO. As a matter of fact, almost all of the concessions of the old régime were given to Mexicans, and they afterwards sold or transferred their rights to British or to American capitalists, and my own experience as a lawyer is that in a majority of those cases the first or second company that tried to operate on those concessions failed. They made big investments and they did not get their money back, only after many years. The development was successful, of course, through big investment and big effort.

Mr. KEARFUL. And even then, were there rich profits?

Mr. GAVITO. No; not so much as people seemed to think.

Mr. KEARFUL. What form did these concessions take? What were they?

Mr. GAVITO. Some times they were for the development of national lands. The Government gave the lands under some conditions, the price to be paid in installments with Mexican bonds and cash, and some colonization to be established. In the majority of the cases the difficulties were so hard that the grantees could not comply, and, of course, the Government, many times would have to grant more time, and delays to get more facilities in order to facilitate the accomplishment.

Mr. KEARFUL. What favors were granted?

Mr. GAVITO. To the concessionaire.

Mr. KEARFUL. To the concessionaire?

Mr. GAVITO. Just to import machinery and tools free of taxes; some times to exempt from taxes the properties during 10 years, or something like that.

Mr. KEARFUL. And then the concessionaire would be compelled to deposit Government bonds?

Mr. GAVITO. Always.

Mr. KEARFUL. As security for the performance of the conditions?

Mr. GAVITO. Exactly.

Mr. KEARFUL. In case of failure to perform, unless an extension of time were granted—

Mr. GAVITO. They would be forfeited.

Mr. KEARFUL. The security would be forfeited?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And those concessions, according to your observations, were not very profitable to begin with?

Mr. GAVITO. No. Of course, when the country became prosperous and the business took a better turn, the concessionaire's profit increased.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Calero, in his book, on page 83, makes the following statement in regard to concessions:

To develop her great resources, Mexico, a country without capital, needed to resort to foreign capital, and the Government of General Diaz had to employ certain stimuli to induce capitalists to invest their money in a country which, on account of its turbulent past, inspired little confidence. Therefore, the following system was adopted: Any one who would oblige himself to invest a certain amount of capital in an enterprise was exempted for a certain number of years from certain kinds of taxes, and was permitted for a limited time to import free of customs duties the machinery and tools which he needed for his industry. This contractor—the concessionaire as he was called—signed a contract that imposed upon him the obligation of expending in his enterprise a stated amount, and guaranteed his obligation by a deposit of Government bonds. In exchange for this, in consideration of the advantages which his industry afforded to the country, the Government conceded the exemptions above pointed out. On the other hand, if the concessionaire defaulted in complying with the obligations which the contract imposed upon him, he lost the deposit of guaranty and the exemptions that were granted him thereby ceased.

Is that a fair statement of the matter?

Mr. GAVITO. I think so. It coincides with my answer to the former questions.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are acquainted personally with a large number of Mexicans living outside of Mexico at the present time, are you?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Some of them are living in New York?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And other parts of the United States?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Why is it that these gentlemen and their families find it necessary to live outside of their own country?

Mr. GAVITO. Some of them because they fear the persecutions, and others because they prefer to live here and to educate their children out of this atmosphere of rivalry and hatred in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. They are not able to live as well or as comfortably, or follow their professions as profitably here as in Mexico?

Mr. GAVITO. Oh, no; we have all kinds of hardships here.

Mr. KEARFUL. Yet they prefer those hardships to the prospect of returning to their native country?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes. At least, that is my own feeling.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you have any idea of the number of such Mexicans who are living exiled from Mexico?

Mr. GAVITO. No; I could not give any figure, but I should say 80 per cent of the well educated class.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it not your firm belief that these whom you say constitute 80 per cent of the well educated class are needed in their own country to establish and maintain a government of laws?

Mr. GAVITO. I think so. Of course, as a matter of truth, the Government has always been in the hands of the educated people.

Mr. KEARFUL. Naturally you have talked with them about the prospect of returning to Mexico?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the prospect, as they view it, of returning to Mexico and participating in the Governmental affairs of that country?

Mr. GAVITO. Most of them do not contemplate returning, because they think that the conditions are practically the same as they were when they left the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is their hope for returning at some future time?

Mr. GAVITO. Well, I could not say anything in regard to even the majority of them, because they differ very much in opinions, and most of them are discouraged; have no hopes.

Mr. KEARFUL. They have no definite hope?

Mr. GAVITO. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your own hope?

Mr. GAVITO. I always hope in the strength of my country and justice sooner or later, but besides this general opinion, I have no opinion on it.

Mr. KEARFUL. The strength of a country rests with its intelligent class, does it not?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. That class is very largely outside of the country?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then, it follows absolutely that the establishment of a government of laws in Mexico must come from the outside, is not that so?

Mr. GAVITO. I should like to be excused from answering this question, because that should place me in a position of saying that we are indispensable, and I do not feel that any group is indispensable.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do not think that the intelligent class of the country is indispensable to good government?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes; but at the same time it is possible that the intelligent people in Mexico, the minority who have to stay down there, can help the establishment of some better order.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you refer to such intelligent persons as Luis Cabrera and others of his kind? He is an intelligent man, is he not?

Mr. GAVITO. I think so.

Mr. KEARFUL. And there are quite a number like him, are there not, connected with the Carranza Government?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes; but they are obsessed with the idea of the revolution, only working in his way.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think the intelligent class represented by such men as Mr. Cabrera is likely to bring to Mexico a government of laws?

Mr. GAVITO. No; because we see the experience of the past years.

Mr. KEARFUL. What other intelligent class in Mexico can be depended upon?

Mr. GAVITO. A few of the expatriated going back, because the people will not stand for the sufferings and the difficulties of living abroad.

Mr. KEARFUL. Those who have gone back necessarily have done so under condition that they will support the group to which Luis Cabrera belongs?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And they necessarily have to align themselves with the present régime in order to return and do business there?

Mr. GAVITO. Not exactly, because they can keep themselves in the shadow, from becoming prominent, or leading very modest lives.

Mr. KEARFUL. If they take any part in public affairs, they must ally themselves with the ruling régime?

Mr. GAVITO. Of course, they would not be tolerated otherwise.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then, what could they accomplish? If they simply keep themselves in the shadow, as you say?

Mr. GAVITO. Really nothing of great importance.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then, is it not true that the only hope for a real government of laws in Mexico must come from the outside?

Mr. GAVITO. If you mean from the Mexicans that are expatriated, I should say yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. I do mean the Mexicans that are expatriated, but I want to ask you how they can accomplish anything from the outside.

Mr. GAVITO. I think that the Mexicans are able to work out their own destinies, and find the solution if they are left alone.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, now, just what do you mean by the statement if they are left alone?

Mr. GAVITO. We do not need any foreign intervention. That is what I mean.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what way do you expect they will be able to do that?

Mr. GAVITO. I can not outline any definite scheme, but as I think the present situation has been brought about by the policy of the United States toward Mexico, naturally I am led to believe that when this policy is stopped, the feeling of security will come after a while.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, what do you think the American Government ought to do to make right the wrong that it has done toward Mexico?

Mr. GAVITO. Of course, I could not answer this question, because it would be necessary for me to know what were the motives and reasons for this wrong policy.

Mr. KEARFUL. The reasons and motives have been stated at various times in addresses and in publications by the President of the United States and it appears that he thought it was incumbent upon him to eliminate Huerta because he had reached power through force, and upon eliminating Huerta, he thought it was incumbent upon him to impose Carranza upon the Mexican people because he thought Carranza stood for law and justice and constitutional principles. Evidently you think he made a very serious mistake.

Mr. GAVITO. Oh, yes; I think so. I should never have expected Huerta considering his arts to reach power to hold power.

Mr. KEARFUL. Notwithstanding that sentiment on your part, do you agree that it was the function of President Wilson to take it upon himself to eliminate Huerta from the Mexican Government?

Mr. GAVITO. I think, first of all, that President Wilson has no knowledge of the Mexican problems; he does not know anything about Mexico, and therefore any intervention on his part had to be what it has been, a failure.

Mr. KEARFUL. The purpose of this committee is to find out the truth, so that any action that may be taken hereafter may be intelligent action, based upon the actual facts. Assuming it to be true that Carranza and his revolution did not represent the liberty of the people and law and constitutional principles, but represented what Mr. Calero and Mr. Bulnes denominate it—that is, looting and graft and personal advancement of revolutionary generals and violation of women and desecration of churches, etc., what, then, do you think the American Government ought to do to make right the wrong it has done?

Mr. GAVITO. At present?

Mr. KEARFUL. At present.

Mr. GAVITO. Of course, as you will appreciate, I can not take the American point of view. I have to take the Mexican point of view.

Mr. KEARFUL. Certainly: that is what we want.

Mr. GAVITO. And it is a very difficult matter to correct the mistake, particularly when four or five years have elapsed with his régime in power. But I insist that the policy of nonintervention—hands off—as you call it, should be more than enough to bring the Mexican problem to a good solution, if not pretty soon, in a little while.

Mr. KEARFUL. It is in evidence before the committee, and undoubtedly true, that Mexico has a bonded debt of over one billion pesos, upon which no interest or other charges have been paid since the abdication of Huerta in 1914; that the Carranza Government has taken over and operated the railroads of Mexico, collected all of the revenues, allowed the roads to deteriorate and the rolling stock to become worthless, and has paid not a dollar of interest on the federal bonds or to the railroad creditors; that the various banks of issue of Mexico have been taken over by the Carranza Government, and the entire amount of their metallic reserve, to the extent of over 50,000,000 pesos in gold and silver has been appropriated, and the assets of those banks are being collected and the collections appropriated, and not one dollar has been paid to note holders, depositor, or stockholders of those banks; that the taxes upon petroleum have been raised to substantially 50 per cent of its value; that large contributions have been levied upon mines and other industries to the fullest extent that they can bear, and that the present Government is not able to collect enough money from those sources to pay its current expenses, after satisfying the cupidity of the generals, and has been compelled to pay school-teachers, after having closed a number of schools, only portions of their salaries.

That is a state of affairs that I ask you whether you think can long continue without something being done from the outside?

Mr. GAVITO. I should like to be excused from replying to that. That involves many international questions that perhaps would be to my country so difficult, I would not like to discuss it.

Mr. KEARFUL. I ask you that question because you say with a policy of absolute nonintervention the Mexicans in time can work out their own salvation, and I ask you the question because it must occur to you that a crisis is imminent; the foreign countries whose nationals have suffered from these operations are not likely to remain quiescent and await the convenient time for the intelligent class who are now expatriated and exiled from Mexico to work out the salvation of their country, and I want your opinion as to whether, under those conditions, a sufficient time is likely to be available for the purpose of working out a satisfactory solution.

Mr. GAVITO. I think that any foreign intervention should put things worse than they are at present; instead of shortening the time for rehabilitation of the country, it would work in the opposite way, and therefore a business man will find it is better to abstain from intervening in Mexico and not to make it any worse.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that matter can be worked out without foreign intervention during your lifetime?

Mr. GAVITO. Time for a country is a different thing than for the life of a man. You know the life of a man is pretty short in comparison with the life of the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. Precisely; and the lives of the nationals and foreigners of every nation are likely to become extinct long before justice is done to them on account of the depredations that have been committed in Mexico unless something is done to put Mexico in a stable condition.

Mr. GAVITO. I would tell you that in our history we see that the English creditors for our first national debt waited 70 years until a government was established which was willing to take it up and give the proper allowance. I do not see why the conditions have changed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you not think that it would be better for a certain amount of interference to occur to the extent of enabling the intelligent class now exiled from Mexico to return to their country and establish a permanent and orderly government than it would be to allow that condition to continue and those exiles to die, or to remain expatriated, and their children to become citizens of other countries?

Mr. GAVITO. I frankly believe that it is useless to discuss the theoretical scheme, because the most important part of it is the way in which it should be applied. In other words, if everybody agrees in the necessity of some help, it is so difficult that the help starts in the right point that nothing can be advanced by discussion of the principle.

Mr. KEARFUL. I think we all agree that it would be well for Mexico if its affairs could be placed in the hands of the intelligent class who are now largely exiled from the country; is not that true?

Mr. GAVITO. I think so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Would it not, then, be wise for some action to be taken for the purpose of putting the affairs of the Government into the hands of that class, and would it not be better to do it sooner than later?

Mr. GAVITO. First of all, the danger would be to give to that group the popularity that could be very, very favorable to the present controllers of the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean that for this Government, or a combination of both Governments, to undertake to assist the intelligent class of Mexicans, would be to make that class unpopular with the people of Mexico?

Mr. GAVITO. I think so.

Mr. KEARFUL. With what class of people would it be unpopular?

Mr. GAVITO. With the great majority of people who make the revolutions and start the troubles down there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe that the people who make the revolutions and start the troubles in Mexico are entitled to any consideration? Who are the class of people who make the trouble and make the revolutions in Mexico?

Mr. GAVITO. The agitators.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it not true that a very large percentage of the inhabitants of Mexico would welcome a government formed and maintained by the intelligent classes now exiled from Mexico?

Mr. GAVITO. Of course; yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And do you believe that the peon classes would have any feeling of hostility toward such a government?

Mr. GAVITO. No; they do not care. At present they are awfully tired of revolution and disorder.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then, the only class that would be antagonized would be that class which is now in control?

Mr. GAVITO. Yes; but, individually, they are the most active part of the people in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, what would there be to prevent the intelligent class from becoming active, if they had an opportunity; if they had assistance; if they had the chance?

Mr. GAVITO. There should be nothing.

Mr. KEARFUL. I believe that is all I want to ask you. Is there any further statement you would like to make?

Mr. GAVITO. No; I think not, thank you.

Mr. KEARFUL. Thank you very much.

(Witness excused.)

TESTIMONY OF DR. BRUCE BAKER CORBIN.

(The witness was duly sworn.)

Mr. KEARFUL. Please state your full name.

Dr. CORBIN. Bruce Baker Corbin, 66 Lenox Avenue, East Orange, N. J.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your business?

Dr. CORBIN. I am a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and one of the secretaries of the interchurch world movement.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have occasion to make an extended visit to Mexico recently in connection with matters in which you are interested?

Dr. CORBIN. I went into Mexico, I think, on the 19th of August, and left on the 22d of September. During those weeks I visited Monterrey, Tampico, San Luis Potosi, Mexico City, and Guanajuato. My trip extended as far as to those places and also Irapuato, Silao, and Puebla, and a number of other smaller places, less extended visits.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know D. B. Winton, a minister of the gospel?

Dr. CORBIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. He was in Mexico at the same time you were, and on November 26, 1919, he wrote a letter to the Evening Post, which was afterwards incorporated in a propaganda pamphlet issued by the League of Free Nations Association. In that letter he made this statement:

"I spent this recent October in Mexico. The country is prosperous and at peace," and again, he says: "On the basis of personal knowledge I assert again, Mexico is prosperous, except in a few retired and unimportant sections."

Do you think that condition existed at that time in Mexico?

Dr. CORBIN. I should dislike to be in the position of contradicting Dr. Winton, but from my observation I can not say that Mexico was prosperous, especially in certain centers which have been prosperous in the past, very evidently so from the nature of the commercial buildings and institutions that are standing idle, the shutters down and everything dead around them, there has been a prosperity that is not to be noticed at the present time.

Mr. KEARFUL. To what particular places do you refer?

Dr. CORBIN. I was speaking particularly then of Monterrey and San Luis Potosi.

Mr. KEARFUL. Just describe the conditions which you found there.

Dr. CORBIN. Well, at Monterrey, I think one of the smelters was operating at the time; there were not more than a third of the usual number of foreigners there, and the smelter that was running was, as I remember rightly, only using two or three of the furnaces—I do not know the technical name for them; their condition seemed to be very slow, and yet they said they were better than they had been. At San Luis Potosi I found things as dead as in any graveyard you would want to find, and the market places were very scantily provided, especially the native markets; hardly any traffic on the street except a hack driving people going from place to place; no commercial traffic and I saw one residence or building being constructed, and I asked to whom that belonged; they said it was a general. A very elegant structure, and I found the same condition existing in Monterrey. The only building that had been built recently was a very fine residence; I asked a hack driver to whom it belonged, and he said a general.

I may say so far as Mexico City and Puebla were concerned, the markets seemed to be supplied and yet there was every evidence manifested by the number of people that were constantly appealing to you for help, and on their faces and general conditions that they were suffering.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you find a condition of general destitution in these places?

Dr. CORBIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what did you find as to disease?

Dr. CORBIN. I am not a skilled observer in that respect. In the background, however, the fact that I have been in India and have seen the conditions there, and as is well known there is considerable destitution and poverty, and in the same length of time, with the average visitor, the population as I beheld them in India, I saw more suffering in Mexico than I had ever seen in the same length of time in India. There was every evidence of venereal diseases; I saw scores of little children less than 12 years old who were blind. I saw—well, in every period of life, on through to old age, very evident manifestations of social disease, and on the faces and persons of the people I came in contact with.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you find anybody afflicted with leprosy?

Dr. CORBIN. I am familiar with leprosy; I have seen a large number of cases in India. I was going up the line toward Irapuato and looked out of the window and saw a man whose hands were fingerless. I suspected it was leprosy and afterwards I asked a physician with whom I was acquainted, and who has been practicing medicine in the State of Irapuato, if I was mistaken in judging it a case of leprosy. He said, "Doubtless you did see a case of leprosy," and he said in his judgment there was a minimum of one out of every 5,000 in the State of Irapuato who is leprosy, and he said his judgment would put it nearer to one out of every 2,000.

I saw the worst case of leprosy I ever saw, not excepting the worst in India, and I have been close to many, I think, in the City of Irapuato, and I was close enough to drop a coin in his hand.

Mr. KEARFUL. Remaining at large?

Dr. CORBIN. Yes; out on the street, a beggar. They were begging at the station; I saw numbers of them.

Then, as to the suffering of the children, evidently the children are the worst sufferers. Coming up from Tampico to San Luis Potosi, we were eating our lunch at Cardenas, and threw some orange and banana skins out of the window without giving a thought to the fact, and there was some scrambling and a commotion outside, and looking out the window the children were scrambling around after them, most of them were naked and diseased, and most of them were puffed out from eating food they had picked up. I was told afterwards that was one of the cities that had been sacked by Carranza because of the refusal of the population to join his army, and the men and women had been impressed into service and the children left to shift for themselves.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you find the attitude of the population toward the Carranza Government?

Dr. CORBIN. I have a statement here I think I can give in just a minute and I would like to give it in this form.

I will say this: I take it to be very significant that I did not find but one person in all Mexico who had any pronounced confidence in the sincerity or ability of Carranza, and that was a young man who is secretary of agriculture in the State of Tlaxcala.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is a Government position?

Dr. CORBIN. Yes. He declared that President Carranza is a sincere patriot, but that in order to placate several factions he had given their leaders places in his government, and that he found it exceedingly difficult to control them, is at present very much aware of the corrupt practices of many of his officials, but is not in position to stop them. He also stated that enemies of Carranza within the Government were constantly seeking opportunities to discredit his administration in the eyes of the Mexican people, and the world, in order to further their own personal political ambitions. He thought Carranza had not had a fair opportunity to make good his pledges and put into effect his policies.

That was the only person I found in Mexico who had a good word to say for Carranza and that was the extent of it.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you find to be the general feeling?

Dr. CORBIN. The people are worn out and worried and seemingly discouraged and helpless, hoping against hope there may be some chance of relief in the future. They are not able to give any suggestion as to how it will come about from any source within the borders of Mexico. I got it very clearly from talking with all classes that the trouble in Mexico is that it is Mexico, and that the source of the trouble is from within Mexico, and until the Mexican people themselves are changed, lifted to a higher moral and intellectual plane, there can not be a permanent basis of prosperity.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think they are themselves capable of lifting themselves to that plane?

Dr. CORBIN. I was very favorably impressed with the educated classes, with their ability, and was convinced that if the men of ability were able to get into the ascendancy of the Government, there might be found a way out of the present difficulties, but talking with those that were willing to talk, I gained the impression that the men who were now in charge of affairs in Mexico were either rascals or ignoramuses. I was told that at least three members of the cabinet could not sign their own names. Whether that be true or not I do not know.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you find to be the attitude of Americans in Mexico toward the American Government on account of the policy that has been pursued?

Dr. CORBIN. Well, it depended upon the temperament of the person who was relating the experiences through which he had passed. Some of them were broken hearted, and felt that they had gone into Mexico as they had under a treaty made with their own Government, and with the understanding that they would be protected in their life and property, and a feeling that they had been deserted. Many of them were deeply chagrined and humiliated; others were vindictive, and in an angry and sullen mood, and yet I found most of them fair-minded. There is a bitter spirit; you can see the bitterness rather than hear it; they do not talk so much.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the general opinion of Americans in Mexico with respect to what should be done to put Mexico in orderly condition?

Dr. CORBIN. I heard men in the lobbies of the hotels and on the railroad trains speaking rather frankly, but they were not the type of men upon whom I would place very great reliance. Those men spoke very frankly, out and out, in no uncertain terms that the United States Government should intervene. And by that they meant military intervention, but as I talked with the more solid men—the university men and business men with large interests in Mexico—I found that they were very careful in expressing their opinions, and if I were to represent them in a general way, I would say that they feel that the United States Government should find some way to redress their ills, and to express itself emphatically, but they are leaving it for the Government to find that way, and they are not suggesting what it should do.

I heard one man in Mexico City, a business man—I will put it this way: He blurted it out with a question as to when I thought the Government would wake up and come down and do something about affairs down there. I spoke to him quietly, and I said, "Do you dare talk like that before your Mexican clerks, and before a general audience, as happens to be in this place at this time?" And he says, "I don't care." I said, "What would there be to it if the United States Government did assert itself, as you suggest? What would be the cost to you?" He said, "Oh, that would be some immediate loss." He said, "There would not be much to it, and it has got to be done, sooner or later, and we are all preparing ourselves for it."

That man did not hesitate at all to express himself, and did it publicly. He was the only man who seemed to have anything at stake who expressed himself in that way.

Mr. KEARFUL. How were conditions that prevailed while you were in Mexico with reference to military protection?

Dr. CORBIN. Why, I traveled on no trains that had less than two carloads of soldiers, and I noticed from that to 15 carloads. Going down from Mexico City to Vera Cruz we had a train running about a half a mile ahead of us with, I think, 4 carloads of soldiers with swivel guns, and our train had a sleeper to it, about a half a mile in the rear, and 6 or 7 soldiers went into the train; every hilltop has wire entanglements on it, and guards concentrated along there, especially where you go down the ravine from the table land into the plains. When we came up from Tampico to San Luis Potosi we were expecting to take a train at midnight, and we waited until 5 o'clock in the morning, when the train arrived just in time to turn around and go back. We asked what was the matter, and they said the bandits were after them, and said a military train would go ahead and clear the way. That was on Monday. The military authorities were in control until the latter part of the week, when we were taken out. The same train the next Wednesday was blown up and one of the military guards and at least one of the passengers killed outright and a number of others wounded. That was while I was in Mexico and not very far from there. It just happened to be their train instead of ours.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is the condition of peace that Dr. Winton speaks about.

Dr. CORBIN. There was not a great amount of peace. A friend of mine who was to have been a member of our party and was delayed, and who was down a week later, and his train was blown up, and he had to pay $200 for his freedom, and in talking with a railroad man afterwards I asked why the military guards did not intervene, or at least follow up the bandits, and he was informed that the leader of the military forces in that particular force was a very close friend of the leader of the bandits who had attacked the train. He said doubtless in two days they would meet somewhere and whack up, and he said that was the condition under which the bandits were working; that they were hand in glove; if the military forces cut out the bandits they would both lose out, and there seemed to be an agreement among them. That was the impression I gathered everywhere I went.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you observe as to the destruction of property at different points where you were?

Dr. CORBIN. There were no railway stations standing except the station at San Luis Potosi, that was standing before the war. By that way, that is a very fine station. In Monterrey, one day, I was passing along the street and there happened to be an opening in a fence around the building, and I was attracted by the beautiful interior, and stepping into what I thought to be the lobby of a hotel that had been under construction at the time of the Carranza occupation of the city of Monterrey. We were taken by the caretaker up into the third and fourth floors, and I found rooms furnished as nicely as any of the hotels in this city or New York City, but the lower floors had been completely wrecked. The Carranza soldiers had shot away the glass dome in the office and had amused themselves by smashing the very fine chandeliers, and I was told that the structure had cost $800,000; that they had $400,000 worth of fixtures and equipment for that hotel in 20 cars standing at the station when Carranza attacked the city, and they were all destroyed.

I noticed in almost every city of any size through which we passed large numbers of steel box cars and rusted engines and roundhouses destroyed by fire, and it was reported that only eight engines were operating between Mexico City and Vera Cruz, and probably less than that between Vera Cruz and Tampico. There were other evidences of destruction.

I was impressed with the nature of the treatment accorded to the women. In a visit to the school of the Southern Methodist Episcopal Society and the hospital, Dr. Frost told us that every time any Carranza troops were expected the sister in charge of the convent came to him and asked if he would put a ladder by the convent so it would be possible for her girls to come over into the hospital for protection; that she thought the worst would happen to them if the Carranza troops discovered that the building was full of women, but for some reason they were not troubled, and that was an interesting sidelight to me on conditions, and I found that in some places they were not as safe as they were in Monterrey.

Going down to Tampico I think we probably traveled over the most dangerous section of the railroad we went over. Two days before two stations had been blown up or torn down on the road; we expected that, perhaps, something might happen that day, but we got through without incident, except that the rolling stock was filthy and unkempt and very unsatisfactory, and we were mighty lucky and glad to get through without accident. We did not complain very much on account of the accommodations.

At Queretaro I went into a monastery coupled with one of the old churches or cathedrals, and the sister superior there had had 40 orphan children and was trying to take care of them; seemed to be very grateful for the contributions we were able to make, and said that the most she could do was to keep a little something on the children's backs and keep them from actual starvation. She was not giving them enough to keep them in health and strength. She showed us around through the building and pointed out the service stations of the Carranza soldiers. The building had been wrecked, and the marks of the fire were very evident; and then she took us through and showed us where they had torn up the piles and inserted the treasure. They had stripped the church of everything of any value, and I went back into the sacristy and found a large number of images had been taken out and broken into pieces, and I asked her what that meant, and she took me out into the court and she said they stood those images up and got across the court and shot their eyes out. The images showed they did not miss. And that showed that even though those men were normally Catholic, they had lost all respect for their sacred sanctuaries, and I took that to be an indication of the moral degradation of the men composing those military forces.

As to the economic conditions I met a young man who was a graduate of the university here in America, managing a hacienda—I had better not mention too particularly where it was—but he was coming out of the country on his way to America to buy motor machinery, and he said the military forces had requisitioned his horses and his mules and taken his stock until he had too few to cultivate his soil, and he was going to come to America and buy motor machinery and learn how to operate it and go back and teach his men and see if it would be possible for him to cultivate his farm in that way. And then he turned in a whimsical sort of way and said, "But, what is the use? As soon as I cultivate some of the soil and get a crop, if it is worth anything, they will be around with some more requisitions." But, he said, "I am going to carry on, though, and do my best, but it is very discouraging," and that seemed to be the feeling on the part of the Mexicans whom I met, who were trying to carry on their work.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do they hope for?

Dr. CORBIN. They are without hope; they are disappointed, broken hearted, many of them. I describe it with that term. Are broken hearted. They see no way out. I met a lady, for a Mexican as refined a lady as you might wish to meet among American women of education; her husband and her father had been killed during the revolution; I think her home was in Durango. She is now in New York City. She said, "Why does not the United States Government take action? It will have to eventually and inevitably," and then she said, with a break in her voice, "But why don't you, while there is something to save, and before it has all been devastated and ruined," and I find that to be the general attitude of the intelligent Mexicans with whom I talked. The feeling is that they are helpless themselves, they have confidence in the United States, if we would pursue the same sort of policy we did in Cuba, and a way could be found to bring about better conditions. I found on every hand the people were appreciative of what we have done; we have given them railroads, electric lights, and tramways, and developed the natural resources of the country, and made a beginning in industries. I was in Puebla and visited the plant of Mr. Jenkins. He did not happen to be home, but his mother took us through. He has a very modern factory of cement and steel construction, well lighted and sanitary. We found them taking the cotton as it comes from the bale and spinning the thread and making stockings, and I judge he is supplying labor and subsistence for at least 500 families in the city of Puebla.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the attitude of the Mexicans in that locality toward Mr. Jenkins?

Dr. CORBIN. I did not have an opportunity to interview them as I only made about a 36-hour stop there. I wish that I might have had, but we were on our way to Vera Cruz to get our boat, and did not stop there. So far as Mr. Jenkins himself is concerned, in the opinion of those with whom I had time to talk—I talked with Dr. Connell, a nephew of Dr. Russell H. Connell, of Philadelphia, who is in charge of one of the finest equipped hospitals, as well equipped as any I have ever seen in America. Mr. Jenkins furnished the property and buildings for that hospital, and is a great benefactor of the Mexican people in a philanthropic way.

So far as the Mexican people are concerned, the people working for him, they seem to be well clothed and well fed, and happy and contented. I think he is doing a great work for the Mexican people. No doubt he is making money, but he is entitled to what he gets. He has been doing it honorably. He is held in the highest regard by the missionaries and Canadian and English business men in the city of Puebla.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it the opinion of the missionaries that anything can be done for the advancement of the ignorant people without furnishing them work and food and clothes and material advancement generally?

Dr. CORBIN. If you will let me answer that a little more extensively I will be glad to do it.

We found the missionaries, while the missionaries were willing to talk to us—while every member of our commission visiting Mexico had been a former missionary, and we were received perhaps in that way rather than as a delegation, they were very frank to tell us what experiences they had passed through, and their suffering, and the conditions as they knew them, yet they were very careful to avoid touching upon anything that would savor of the political. They were naturally neutral in what they are doing there, and are teaching patriotism, as we know it, the real article, to the children, and trying to inculcate in them those principles upon which a safe and sane citizenship will be based in the coming years, but through forces which are present we felt it was their opinion, and it became ours, that it is going to be a long, slow process to prepare any considerable portion of the Mexican people to an extent where they will be competent to govern themselves.

I am not sure that I have covered all of your question.

Mr. KEARFUL. No; the question particularly was whether or not it was not an essential element of the intellectual and spiritual advancement of an ignorant people that they should first have material advancement in the way of clothes and food and opportunity to work.

Dr. CORBIN. My understanding of the situation in Mexico is that before anything permanent can be done along philanthropic or moral lines the people have to have work and a chance to work in peace, and I think if they had a chance to earn a livelihood and I will put it even stronger than that; many of them are going to starve to death and are starving to death at the present time—they want a chance to earn a living, and then until the actual physical suffering has been alleviated there is no use, on any large scale, to give them moral instruction or education.

On the other hand where a people that are suffering are within reach of these institutions they are being administered to. That is one of the hopeful things, the extent of the ability of these institutions to administer to them, and they are overwhelmed with the demands and the necessities of the Mexican people.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, do you think the Mexican people contain material upon which to build a capable government?

Dr. CORBIN. Of course, when you think of the people as a whole, you are face to face in Mexico with the same sort of problem you have in India. I had not been in India very long before I began to discover that the people you meet on the street represent many different languages and races, and I had not been in Mexico very long before I began to discern it there, that the people were not of the same type; that they are not of the same language; while they may have the same underlying racial characteristics and perhaps racial psychology may be common, there are perplexities and problems which you will have to meet if you go down to the Mexican people as a whole with any kind of program, and it is going to be a long and difficult task. And, still, I met a considerable number of those who have had educational advantages; for instance, I met at Queretaro a man of the peon class who said that he had no education whatever; that the most he knew in the line of learning was that he could keep tally in weighing out cotton or products from the ranch over which he was placed, but he was sending his two children to the mission school in that city, and I saw those boys and they were likely chaps, and it is my firm conviction that, taking the Mexican youth as they run, even from the Indians and those from the class that would seem to promise the least, that with proper training and opportunity they will rise to great heights, and that the root stem is such that it can be built on, but it will take perhaps generations to make a strong, civilized, progressive people.

The immediate solution is not through education.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you any further statement that you desire to make?

Dr. CORBIN. I would like to say something of what I observed the Americans were doing for the Mexican people; some thing along the line of what I said about Mr. Jenkins.

Mr. KEARFUL. We should like to hear it.

Dr. CORBIN. I was greatly interested in looking over the living quarters provided by the American Smelting and Refining Co. at Monterrey for its laborers. I observed the type of men that they had employed, and the clothing they wore and their general physical condition. They were well fed and well clothed. The employees were housed in substantial brick quarters while people of the same class over the fence from them were in mud huts and shanties made out of slabs and tin cans and brush, with no floors. Down at Tampico, the morning after my arrival, I started out independently and went up the river about nine miles and passed by the loading stations of three or four of the oil companies, and I was quite impressed with the well-built, nicely painted cottages along the fence. I first thought they might be the homes of American workmen. I asked, through the workman who was with me and who understood Spanish, the question as to who lived in those houses and he informed me they were the Mexican workmen of different oil companies, and I asked if they were well treated, and he said that they received very satisfactory wages, were furnished with the electric light and running water and ice and are provided with supplies practically at cost, and he said when they were sick there was a doctor to look after them and a hospital to which they could go.

That was volunteered, in that off-hand way.

Mr. KEARFUL. There were schools also, were there not?

Dr. CORBIN. I went over to the Huasteca Oil Co.'s plant later on, and had a chance to inquire more particularly into the housing conditions and to observe what was being done, and I was simply amazed in going over the plant to discover that in the woodworking, steel, and machine shops and foundries there were hundreds of Mexican workmen turning out as fine results in manual work as could be achieved by Americans; patterns, copper, and brass work of the very finest type. I made inquiry and found there was only one American in each department, and he was more of an instructor than a boss, and that these workmen had been taken absolutely raw from among the peon class, had received instruction, and under that instruction had been brought to a place where they were doing the very finest of work. We saw them repairing tankers there, and we were told by the superintendent that during the war the tankers would put in, and within 36 to 48 hours be ready to go back to sea, thoroughly repaired, and Mexican workmen did it all.

These plants are practically manual training schools for the Mexican people. Their homes were very substantial and clean and evidently inspected, for the Mexican people, in their native way, naturally would not be overly clean about the premises, but they were absolutely clean everywhere I visited. We went into the slaughterhouse and that was immaculate. The market place we found they were giving the people two exhibitions of moving pictures a week, and we found a school with four grades, and I think there were five teachers in charge, as up to date as any rural school you can find anywhere in America of its size, and we were taken through the artificial ice plant, and I went out to the waterworks and pumping station, from which they supply the water to the homes of the workmen, and I came away with this impression: That the Mexican people are distinctly the better off for the occupation of the oil regions, at least, by the foreign interests.

At Guanajuato I found the conditions were not equal to those in the oil section, but that the people were delighted when the Americans came back and opened up the mines, and whereas the population was normally about 100,000 and had dropped down to below 20,000, they had gotten back to 60,000, and I was told by Dr. Salmons, who had been in the city for years—and this is interesting—that some time ago there was a strike against the mining interests in Guanajuato, probably started by the I. W. W., and quite a general walkout; that the strikers organized their forces and funds and sought to support the families of the men who were striking by a corn fund. The Government intervened and offered to administer the fund for them, but the Mexicans, evidently from past experience, said "Not on your life," and they went to the managers of the mines there in Guanajuato and asked them if they would form a committee to administer the corn fund for them, even though they were striking against them, in the belief that they would get a square deal and an honest accounting for their money.

And I found, from questioning, that that is the feeling of the Mexican laborer everywhere I went in his attitude toward the American employer of labor. They feel that they will get a square deal every time. And I did not find prosperity where foreign capital was not invested and being directed by foreign management.

Mr. KEARFUL. Anything further?

Dr. CORBIN. May I use my figure of speech in closing?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Dr. CORBIN. If I were to sum up, I would state the situation as I see it in the form of a conclusion in the following figure: Mexico to-day is in need of a more or less serious surgical operation, followed by a period of prolonged convalescence under skillful nursing.

Mr. KEARFUL. Thank you, sir.

Whereupon, at 4.10 p. m., the committee adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE, SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
*Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., February 5, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the Subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

TESTIMONY OF MR. KIRBY THOMAS.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have been subpoenaed to testify before the committee. Will you please state your full name?

Mr. THOMAS. Kirby Thomas.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where do you live?

Mr. THOMAS. New York.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your address?

Mr. THOMAS. 70 Central Park West.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your profession?

Mr. THOMAS. Mining engineer.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you connected with the mining business in Mexico?

Mr. THOMAS. I am.

Mr. KEARFUL. What opportunities have you had to study the condition and progress of mining in Mexico?

Mr. THOMAS. I first went to Mexico in 1904, in mine examination work. Since that time I have made many trips to Mexico and in different parts of Mexico, and have been in practically every mining district in Mexico. I went to live in Mexico City about 1908 and lived there for two years. After that I moved to New York, but continued to go into Mexico in connection with business until about 1914. I think in 1915 was the last time I was in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you made a study of the conditions of mining in Mexico?

Mr. THOMAS. I have. When I first went to Mexico I made some investigations that took me over the Republic quite generally in connection with mining matters, and subsequently I undertook to write a review of the mining in Mexico for the Mining World, of Chicago. This was published, I think, in 1905, and again in 1908 I wrote quite extensively on Mexico, and subsequently have written a number of articles on Mexico.

When I was in Mexico first I was editor of the Mexican Mining Journal, a paper devoted to mining in Mexico, published in English and Spanish, and I was also the organizing secretary of the American Institute of Mining and Metallurgy—that was the English name of it—which took in the mining men of Mexico of all nationalities. The preponderant membership, of course, was American, but we had quite a large number of Mexicans and, of course, the other nationalities were represented.

Mr. KEARFUL. If you are able to do so, we should like to have you give us a statement of the development of mining in Mexico from the earliest times up to the present, in your own way.

Mr. THOMAS. I can do that in general terms, of course; the dates I have not in mind.

It is not necessary, I presume, to refer to the activities of the Spanish and Mexican mining, although their activities were much more extensive than is ordinarily believed, and were much more effective. The early Spanish pioneers, with great courage, and a great deal of skill, penetrated into all parts of what is now Mexico, also parts of the Mexican territory which has since been acquired by the United States, and undertook very substantial and profitable mining operations. This work was quite effective, as far as results were concerned, as we judge even by our present day standards.

These Mexican operators had the assistance of cheap labor, some of it slave labor, but nevertheless they were able to apply engineering methods to the operations in a way that creates admiration of the results as we see them now.

This mining industry, of course, subsided during the period of the revolution in Mexico which separated that country from Spain. However, mining operations were early resumed, as early as 1824. The British, through responsible engineering and financial houses, and organizations, undertook mining in Mexico, and operated in widely scattered parts of the Republic, the principal operators being in Pachuca, another in Teloloapam, and another at Zacatecas, and another at Bolaños, and operations in the northern part of Chihuahua. These operations continued on down until the late forties, and were discontinued partly because of political difficulties, but chiefly because of the enormous physical obstacles in connection with transportation and the handling of such operations as mining in the country at that time.

The English interests again revived after the Maximilian incident, and were quite active until along in the late eighties.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did the Americans begin operating mines in Mexico?

Mr. THOMAS. There were practically no American operations in there, except, I think, in the early eighties, Gen. Frisbie, of California, came into El Oro to undertake some developments there. He had been in Mexico and had become familiar with the situation. He was associated with the British interests in the early El Oro undertakings, and in the late eighties, and I think ex-Senator Teller of Colorado sent men into Chihuahua who took up some properties there. There was no general attempt on the part of Americans to participate in Mexican mining until the inception of the Mexican Central Railroad, which must have been in the late eighties. I think it was in the late eighties. Then, of course, a great many Americans came into Northern Mexico and came to the camps along the Mexican Central Railroad.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the condition of the mines in Mexico at the time of the beginning of operations by Americans, as to their being rich and easy or difficult?

Mr. THOMAS. The mines were practically all abandoned at that time, all mining operations, at the time the Americans began to come in. The mines had been allowed to fill with water. The only operations were by the Mexican prospectors, who worked over the dumps, and when the Americans came there the mines were quite uncertain as to value. There were no adequate reports about them; traditions of large production, we soon found, did not mean anything, and it was necessary to make expensive examinations and to undertake expensive investigations of the mines to ascertain their value. There was, of course, no equipment in connection with any of the mining properties in Mexico that was of any advantage to present-day operators.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you proceed, now, to describe the operations conducted by Americans in Mexican mines?

Mr. THOMAS. The first contract of the Americans was in the negotiation stage when these old abandoned properties were successfully sought out by American promoters or engineers or representatives of American companies, and negotiations were then entered into with the then Mexican owners for these properties. Practically all of the mines that had a record or had been operated extensively were owned by Mexicans. The only exception was the remnant of the British operations in Mexico, which were important mines.

These negotiations were direct with the Mexican owners; frequently it was quite difficult to arrive at terms, and generally the Mexican owners required practically cash payment, or very substantial payment, for their property. They very seldom retained an interest in the properties, and very seldom invested any capital in the mining enterprises, either on their own account or in association with new American interests that were coming in at that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they as a rule receive good prices for their property?

Mr. THOMAS. They received very substantial prices for the properties. At first they were glad to accept more liberal prices, but since the demand was active, the Mexican was quite shrewd enough to drive a good bargain. In fact, many times they drove bargains that were quite to their credit, from that standpoint.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were the conditions of the mining properties in Mexico such that they could be worked without large capital?

Mr. THOMAS. Practically none of these abandoned mines could be operated at all without large investment for mining development and a still larger investment for mining and mill equipment.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the effect upon the population of Mexico as to their economic conditions resulting from the operations of the mines by Americans?

Mr. THOMAS. The development of mining in the different old camps in Mexico immediately created a demand for labor, and this resulted in a great economic benefit to the Mexican working classes.

and a very substantial benefit to the business interests by reason of the large amount of general business created incidentally to mining.

At first, the old scale of wages, of course, was offered to the men. This was as low as perhaps 50 centavos—25 cents a day, but the price soon began to increase, particularly in the northern part of the country, and in fact all over Mexico, so that in a few years the Mexican miners were receiving from two to five times as much wages as had ever been paid before, and they were receiving it in money and without any restriction as regards the payment to them or their employment in the mines.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of precious metals were mined?

Mr. THOMAS. The principal output at first was silver, with a minor amount of gold. Subsequently, it led into copper and zinc, which became quite an important production.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you at hand a statement of the aggregate amount of those metals in value that were taken out by Americans in these operations up to 1914?

Mr. THOMAS. No; I can not give you that. I have no statistics on that. I can give you the proportion of American interest in mining, and then give you the total figures.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please do that.

Mr. THOMAS. Along in 1909 and 1910 the American interests were decidedly preponderant in the Mexican mining industry. This was to such an extent that the industry was recognized as distinctly American.

Mr. KEARFUL. About what percentage American?

Mr. THOMAS. We made a calculation, I think, about 1909, that 90 per cent of the active mining in Mexico was in the hands of Americans. This was controverted by one of the Government departments, and perhaps it was a little high, because we calculated the British-owned or partly British-owned properties operated by American engineers, and some investments in which there was Mexican capital as well. I feel quite sure that the Americans had substantially over three-fourths of the developed and operating mines in Mexico in 1910.

Mr. KEARFUL. What proportion of the actual amount in value that was taken out of the mines remained in Mexico, and what proportion was derived by way of profits?

Mr. THOMAS. Much the larger portion of the value remained in Mexico, necessarily. This is especially true in connection with the low-grade operations, which represented the great bulk of the operations which were under way during this period. To illustrate, in one important operation at Guanajuato, the total value in silver, in the ore, was $5.50. Ninety per cent of this was recovered, and the profit in it, which represented potential dividends to the American capital, was 50 cents a ton. The rest of it was all expended in Mexico for labor, materials, and supplies.

I might say in this connection this operation treated 3,000 tons a day, so the earnings were substantial at that, and proportionately the expenditure in Mexico was enormously greater than the earnings.

Mr. KEARFUL. What have you to say about the statement which has been made in this country to the effect that American capitalists have gone into Mexico under special concessions and have exploited the Mexican people?

Mr. THOMAS. As far as the mining investments and the mining activities are concerned, the American interests has no special concessions of any importance. New undertakings were frequently granted a remission of taxes for a period of years, or the free importation of material for mills or smelters, or some beneficial concession of that kind.

Mr. KEARFUL. That would be upon very onerous conditions, would it not?

Mr. THOMAS. Well, under strict conditions, yes; it was a favor to the mining industry.

Mr. KEARFUL. What conditions were attached to those concessions?

Mr. THOMAS. The conditions were that the undertaking should be carried out on a substantially effective scale, which involved investment of many millions of dollars, frequently in one enterprise.

Mr. KEARFUL. What security would have to be given for the fulfillment of those conditions?

Mr. THOMAS. The Mexican Government always required a bond be executed, and carefully scrutinized the application of these concessions.

In this connection so-called concessions should not be regarded as any sweeping grants of natural resources or other rights to Americans, for there was none of that in connection with mining. Americans had the same rights to apply for the Government-owned mines as the Mexicans did, and under equal conditions.

Mr. KEARFUL. The operation of mines was under general laws, which made it open to anybody on equal terms?

Mr. THOMAS. That is true. The laws were quite fair and equitably applied.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you information as to the number of Americans in Mexico at the time of the fall of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. THOMAS. We had some estimates made about 1910 that there were 75,000 Americans living in Mexico. Some claimed as high as 100,000. I think probably 75,000 is a fair figure. That included the families of Americans who were employed there in various industries.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the character of these Americans that were operating in Mexico at that time, amounting to 75,000?

Mr. THOMAS. The Americans that were in Mexico at that time were of a particularly high class. They represented men in responsible positions, and most of them were there as managers, engineers, specialists, and accountants, and in positions of a character that would require men of above the ordinary experience and ability, and certainly men of character and responsibility.

Mr. KEARFUL. They were not speculators engaged in defrauding the Mexican people of their rights?

Mr. THOMAS. Not at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was not true to any extent, was it?

Mr. THOMAS. That was not true to any extent whatever.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the attitude of the Mexicans toward those Americans who were operating in Mexico?

Mr. THOMAS. The official class was generally quite friendly, and were willing to assist in any way that they could. The Government undertook to keep in pretty close touch with conditions, and in numerous instances went out of their way to see that the reputable American enterprises had their rights. The business people generally favored the Americans. There was some little friction in the smaller towns, and competition would come in between American stores and Mexican stores, but this was not serious, for the Americans had only special stores for newspapers and drugs and special groceries that the Americans wanted, and they bought largely from the Mexican merchants, and, of course, the labor all bought from Mexican merchants.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the attitude of the Mexican laboring class toward the Americans?

Mr. THOMAS. The Mexican laborer showed generally a good attitude toward the Americans. Of course, he was distinctly in a lower class, and at the same time the Mexican laborer was not unfriendly or hostile to the Americans in any way.

Mr. KEARFUL. How was he treated by the Americans with respect to his treatment by the Mexicans?

Mr. THOMAS. The Americans, as a rule, practically in all cases, were much more considerate of the workmen and of their interests than the Mexicans had been, and they undertook a great many things for the Mexican laborer which had never been done before, some of them on general grounds of public good and others simply as a matter of business, to secure the contentment and efficiency of labor.

Mr. KEARFUL. What classes of people made it possible for the economic development and the creation of property values that has taken place in Mexico?

Mr. THOMAS. Well, the new undertakings in connection with the railroads, mining and special agricultural developments, irrigation projects, were practically all in the hands of foreigners, the Americans preponderating in railroad and mining. Other nationalities were in other lines.

Mr. KEARFUL. What has been the bases of the revolutions in Mexico, as you have observed them?

Mr. THOMAS. Nearly always political ambitions.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean personal ambitions?

Mr. THOMAS. Personal ambitions.

Mr. KEARFUL. The manifestos issued by revolutionary leaders usually are in terms of high principle?

Mr. THOMAS. Generally very good reading, yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. But you think that nevertheless the real motives of revolutions have been something different from that?

Mr. THOMAS. Without any question. To get personal control, and to use that control for their own personal benefit.

Mr. KEARFUL. It has been common for revolutionary leaders to promise the natives restoration of lands and other property. Do you believe that it is practicable to divide up and distribute the lands among the native population?

Mr. THOMAS. I think it is practical to make a wider distribution of landowners, and it should be done, in Mexico, and could be done properly.

Mr. KEARFUL. Has any attempt to make such distribution been made by any of the revolutionary leaders after they came into power?

Mr. THOMAS. You are speaking of the present revolution?

Mr. KEARFUL. I mean since the time of Porfirio Diaz.

Mr. THOMAS. No. I was thinking of that time of some of Diaz's undertakings, where he sought to get the Indians on land and where he was fairly successful, in a small way, in that. Perhaps I should answer the question a little differently.

Mr. KEARFUL. What about the subsequent conditions?

Mr. THOMAS. The subsequent conditions in Mexico have not developed any successful movement toward a wider distribution of ownership in land.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it not true that most of the lands in Mexico are arid, and require irrigation?

Mr. THOMAS. That is true, in the northern part.

Mr. KEARFUL. And is it possible to divide such lands into small tracts, as an initial operation?

Mr. THOMAS. Not the arid lands, but there are large areas in the south that I think could be divided with good economic results, and it should be done.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of such operations since the time of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. THOMAS. No; I know of none, and in fact, I know it has not been done.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do know that during his time certain efforts were made to effect a large distribution of land?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What has been your experience and observation with reference to protection of Americans' rights and interests in Mexico by this Government since the time of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. THOMAS. There has been no effort to protect American rights, and, on the contrary, there has been a repudiation of distinct pledges that were made to us, officially and semiofficially, when we went into Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Can you relate some instances of delinquency on the part of this Government in that respect?

Mr. THOMAS. In respect to property rights?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes; and life also.

Mr. THOMAS. There are so many of them I do not know just what one to refer to. There has been absolutely no response to the appeal of Americans for the protection of their property or lives in Mexico since the time of the Diaz régime. Prior to that time, through a continued effort on the part of Washington to secure rights for Americans, it was successful in large degree.

Mr. KEARFUL. What has been the condition of mining operations since that time?

Mr. THOMAS. Mining operations were seriously hindered from time to time during the various revolutions, and after making attempts to resume, were practically put out of business entirely for a long period of time. More recently, operations have been carried on fairly aggressively in very limited areas, which were under special protection, and which were convenient to the large cities and the railroads. In these efforts the present government, the Carranza government, has practically directed that operations be carried on so as to provide labor for the large number of men dependent upon this industry. The industry has practically been confined to the railroad districts, as I have said, and has only been in camps where there has been equipped and developed mines ready for operation. There has been little or no attempt to develop new mines or install new equipment for operations except in these few favored and special localities.

Mr. KEARFUL. To what extent have the mining operations decreased since the time of Diaz?

Mr. THOMAS. Probably 90 per cent of the responsible active mining undertakings that were under way in the time of Diaz have been entirely suspended or have become financially involved and are thereby a loss to their American owners.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you an estimate of the number of Americans who are still operating in Mexico as against the 75,000 that were there in the time of Diaz?

Mr. THOMAS. I have had estimates that the number of Americans in Mexico now, outside of the officials, do not exceed 3,000 to 5,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know what has become of the remainder?

Mr. THOMAS. They all had to leave the country during the various periods of acute trouble, or under orders from Washington. Most of them have lost their positions and connections and their personal property and have been obliged to seek work elsewhere, either in the United States or South American countries. Most of them have had to practically start over in life.

Mr. KEARFUL. The committee has had some difficulty in securing mining men who are still operating in Mexico to testify. Do you understand the reason for that reluctance?

Mr. THOMAS. Mining men who are interested in Mexico now, or are expecting to become interested in the future operations, are very reluctant to appear before the committee for the reason that they feel that they may either jeopardize lives and interests in Mexico, or do injury to the interests of their companies and employers by reason of the public record which is made at these investigations.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you in mind some instances of outrages committed upon Americans which were reported to the State Department, and the action taken by the State Department, as illustrating its interest in Americans?

Mr. THOMAS. I have in mind a large number of cases, but I can cite one or two that come within my own personal knowledge and touch, because of the personal acquaintance with the unfortunates involved.

One case is the case of Howard L. Elton, who was a mining engineer from Montana, and a competent and effective man, too, who went to Oaxaca about 1900 to take charge of some American companies who were operating there. After the beginning of political troubles in Mexico these operations ceased and he undertook to continue his profession by doing assaying and buying ores. As I understand it, from correspondence and other information, he was arrested, charged with a technical offense of buying ore from the rebels, and was tried and condemned to be shot. Every effort was made on the part of his friends to reach the State Department and secure some intervention that would protect him from this severe and undue penalty. After a long delay the State Department did finally secure a hearing from the Mexican authorities and secured a promise of favorable action in the case. In the meanwhile, Elton was shot.

Mr. KEARFUL. What other cases have you in mind?

Mr. THOMAS. I have in mind Boris Gorow. Boris Gorow was a Russian who had become an American citizen and was engaged in mining in the south of Mexico. Subsequently he took charge of some American-owned property in Jalisco. This was attacked by rebels, and he and a couple of American employees drove them off. Subsequently the rebels returned to seize the property and succeeded in getting between the property and where Mr. Gorow was, and finally shot him. He was supposed to be dead, and the rebels, as is customary in such cases, noticed that he had gold-filled teeth and undertook to remove his teeth for the gold. It was reported to me by the surviving member of the party that Gorow was still alive at the time, and was able to bite the finger of one of the rebels, with the result, of course, that he was killed and his body thrown over a precipice. Together with friends of Mr. Gorow, the matter was taken up with the State Department by us, and after a long delay we were advised that the facts were substantially as we understood them. No other action was taken.

Mr. KEARFUL. No action was taken to secure redress?

Mr. THOMAS. So far as I know; I have not tried to find out.

Mr. KEARFUL. What year was that?

Mr. THOMAS. That was in 1915.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you in mind any other reports?

Mr. THOMAS. I have in mind reports coming to me from indirect sources in Sonora from teamsters at the station of La Colorada, near Hermosillo. This man was shot from ambush, and it was given out officially that he was shot by the Yaqui Indians. As a matter of fact, it was commonly understood, locally, that he was shot by some of the Carranza soldiers, who committed this act so as to afford an excuse for remaining inactive in Sonora instead of being sent to fight the Villistas at Juarez, who were then active at that place.

Mr. KEARFUL. The idea being that this man having been reported as killed by the Yaquis, it was necessary for them to stay to suppress the Yaqui Indians?

Mr. THOMAS. Wanted to raise a Yaqui scare, which was enough to set everybody going in that part of the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you know about notice given to the American authorities of the Columbus raid before it occurred?

Mr. THOMAS. My information is, from indirect sources, that the American authorities at El Paso were notified that Villa was in the hills within 2 days of Columbus, and they expressed disbelief in it. As a matter of fact, he was there or his party was there. It was also reported that he was there for the purpose of receiving a courier who was due to arrive from Yucatan, representing the rebel activities in that part of Mexico at that time. It was not uncommon for him to receive couriers from rebel chiefs, and they had to pass through American territory, and this was done with the consent of the American authorities, and it was done on numerous occasions. On this occasion Villa is reported to have notified the authorities that a courier was due to arrive, to be in New York and El Paso, from Yucatan. The courier was permitted to proceed to the Sheldor Hotel in El Paso, and was there arrested and his papers examined.

Villa, on learning of this, is said to have ordered the raid on Columbus.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember about the Carrizal incident, where a number of American soldiers were killed by Mexicans during the Pershing expedition?

Mr. THOMAS. I am quite familiar with the published information concerning it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember the correspondence that preceded that incident between the military commander and Gen. Pershing?

Mr. THOMAS. At the time; yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the substance of that?

Mr. THOMAS. It was an agreement between the military commander of that division and Gen. Pershing with reference to mutual rights of the two armies in that territory.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, you remember that Gen. Trevino notified Gen. Pershing that if he should move his forces south or east or west, or any other direction except north, he would be attacked?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I remember that distinctly.

Mr. KEARFUL. And Gen. Pershing answered that he would move his forces wherever he pleased, and that any attack upon them would be followed by the gravest consequences?

Mr. THOMAS. I remember that distinctly.

Mr. KEARFUL. And he would use his whole force?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And the Carrizal attack took place and a number of American soldiers were killed?

Mr. THOMAS. Nineteen, I think.

Mr. KEARFUL. And no action was taken. Did you have any conversation with any American officers with reference to their attitude on that action?

Mr. THOMAS. The attitude of the American officers and the American soldiers of the Pershing expedition who were in contact with this incident was distinctly in condemnation of the situation which was permitted to arise. The officers had great difficulty in preventing actual mutiny of the privates, who felt that their comrades and Lieut. Adair had been officially murdered, to use the expression which was given to me.

Mr. KEARFUL. Whom did they blame with the lack of action?

Mr. THOMAS. They blamed the authorities at Washington.

Mr. KEARFUL. They did not blame Gen. Pershing?

Mr. THOMAS. They did not, because he was under orders. I believe that Gen. Pershing could have captured Villa if he had been given a free hand at that time. In fact, it was generally known where Villa was, and Pershing must have known, of course.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that the general opinion of the officers familiar with the situation?

Mr. THOMAS. It was the opinion of Americans who were in that district at the time. They all knew where Villa was, approximately.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you know about an understanding between representatives of this Government and the allied governments at Paris with reference to Mexico at the time of the negotiation of the treaty?

Mr. THOMAS. The British interests in Mexico, for a time during the early part of the war, in 1914 and 1915, were disposed to make American connections in order to protect their American interests and secure their rights in Mexico. This was evidenced by a number of matters which came up in connection with mining negotiations during that period. However, when the peace conference was in session at Paris this attitude changed entirely, and direct instructions were sent from the representatives of large British interests in Mexico to their associates and representatives in this country not to cooperate or affiliate or become in any way involved in connection with any of the American financial interests in Mexico, or with the American Government policy with regard to Mexico.

It subsequently developed, as personal correspondence from England indicated, that the English interests were acting on the assumption that there had been an agreement between the principal parties to the peace conference that no action would be taken in regard to Mexico until after the peace treaty had been signed, and that then there would be a conference between the principal parties on the allied side preceding any action in regard to Mexico.

There has been direct information from London to this effect, conveyed to Canadian and British interests who are concerned in the Mexican situation.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you informed in a general way as to the amounts owing by Mexico, and the funded debt?

Mr. THOMAS. The public debt and railroad debt?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I have been over that information a number of times.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is all in the record here?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; and other places.

Mr. KEARFUL. I want to ask you whether you believe that under proper conditions Mexico would be able to pay its debts?

Mr. THOMAS. Mexico should, by no means, be considered a bankrupt nation. I feel quite sure that a scrutiny of the public finances of Mexico and a consideration of its natural resources and potential resources would present a very convincing result as regards the solvency of Mexico and the possibility of Mexico paying, under proper conditions, all of its public debts, and any reasonable, or even a very large, amount of claims for damages arising out of the revolution. This, of course, would have to be done through some bonding and financing arrangement, but it could be done in a way that would make no excessive tax burden on the Mexican people or the Mexican nation. In fact, I think Mexico, under proper financing and efficient financial management, would soon take its place with a better financial rating and credit than most of the European countries, and probably along the line of our own country.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that result can be accomplished by the present Mexican authorities?

Mr. THOMAS. It can not.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you think is the first essential thing that must be kept in view in accomplishing that result?

Mr. THOMAS. The essential thing is a change in the policy of the Mexican Government and a change in the personnel of the men to come into control under the new order of things.

Mr. KEARFUL. In order to arrive at a result where Mexico would be on a sound financial basis, is it not essential that there should be established in Mexico a Government upon which foreign creditors could rely as permanent?

Mr. THOMAS. It is essential there should be established a permanent government, and it should be along lines which would lead to the development of the natural and latent resources of the republic.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe that such a government can be established without outside assistance?

Mr. THOMAS. I believe not, under the present conditions.

Mr. KEARFUL. What form do you think such assistance should take?

Mr. THOMAS. I believe it is necessary for the American Government, acting in accord, as far as it possibly can, with the leading nations of Europe that are interested in Mexico, to definitely set forth some constructive general program for Mexico, and at least to give the Mexicans an opportunity to conform to it, and to give them substantial assistance in conforming to this plan. If they do not, as they probably will not, do this of their own initiative, as long as the present Government is in control, then it will lead to the necessity of some pressure being brought to bear upon the Government of Mexico as it exists to-day and upon the controlling influences of that Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. What form do you think it should take?

Mr. THOMAS. I think moral pressure and general presentation of a firm front would do a great deal toward preparing the way for a change in conditions, and then, as an alternative, some firm, definite and vigorous plans of enforcement should be announced and carried out. The plan of armed intervention to conquer the country should be held in abeyance as the last resort, and probably would not be required at all if such a policy were promptly announced and a means to carry out were made evident along with the announcement of the intention to do so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe it would be sufficient to send an ultimatum announcing just what Mexico would be required to do?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think it would be sufficient, but it would probably be a wise first step.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that step should be taken without the intention of following it up with force?

Mr. THOMAS. By no means. We have already fumbled too many times with regard to Mexico, and the psychology of the Mexican people, and particularly the Mexican leaders, is such that unless they know we mean it, and not only mean it but are prepared to effectively carry out any program or plan, they will only be amused at the effort and make light of it.

Mr. KEARFUL. In view of the many forcible notes which have already been sent, do you believe it would be possible to convince them we meant business without using force?

Mr. THOMAS. It probably would not, if these notes came from the same administration that the others have come from. A change of administration might make a change of attitude toward the note from the State Department in Washington.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you think would be the effect upon the sentiment of South Americans toward us of a firm and forceful Mexican policy?

Mr. THOMAS. The effect would certainly not be harmful, and probably would be beneficial by way of precedent and example. The South American countries have no particular community of interest with Mexico, notwithstanding the bond of common origin and of common language. In fact, Mexico is very little understood by the ordinary South American, and the sympathies, at least in the more important countries in South America, are certainly more favorable to the American policy and the American people than they are to the Mexican people.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe that we would lose any prestige with the South American people by adopting a forceful policy toward Mexico and backing it up by force, and using force if necessary?

Mr. THOMAS. We would certainly not lose, assuming that our policy were based on proper motives and for good justification. I feel very sure that the Venezuela incident in the Cleveland administration and the Rasuli incident in Morocco were not only beneficial with regard to their influence on South American ideas, but were distinctly approved by most of the South American statesmen and publishers.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you think has been the effect upon our prestige in South America of the policy that has been followed toward Mexico?

Mr. THOMAS. My own experience in Brazil in 1917 indicated, first, that the American policy toward Mexico was looked upon with bewilderment, complete lack of understanding, and the general conclusion was that we had made a mistake in not taking a definite, firm stand, irrespective of what the results might have been. I think such a stand would have been both understood and approved.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember the circumstances of President Taft visiting President Diaz on the boundary line at El Paso?

Mr. THOMAS. That was in 1909, was it not?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes; or 1910.

Mr. THOMAS. I am familiar with that; I was in Mexico at the time.

Mr. KEARFUL. And the circumstance that the photograph of Taft and Diaz was taken together?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you please describe the effect of that upon the Mexicans in Mexico?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Taft good naturedly permitted himself to be photographed standing alongside Porfirio Diaz, I think on the international bridge; at least, on the Mexican side. This photograph was immediately rephotographed, by order of the Mexican Government, and copies were sent to all parts of the Republic, and under it was labeled, the "Two Great Presidents of the Two Great Republics of North America."

Those of us who were in Mexico at the time considered this incident trivial, as it seems, but it was a very serious one as affecting the influence and standing of Americans in Mexico, for it gave the Mexican masses and the Mexican people an opportunity to place their own Government and their own country on at least an equal plane with the United States, which, of course, was not a fact in any way, and it was harmful to the interests of both people.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there not something in the photograph itself which indicated that Mexicans or the Mexican President was on something more than an equal plane?

Mr. THOMAS. The uniform and distinctive military appearance of Porfirio Diaz, of course, was in contrast to Mr. Taft's democratic attitude. This, naturally, was misinterpreted by the Mexican people.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there any further statement you have in mind you would like to make?

Mr. THOMAS. I feel very sure it is impossible for any solution of the Mexican situation to be worked out with the Carranza Government. The Government is distinctly hostile to Americans and American politics, and has no fear or respect or consideration for the present American Government. The Carranza government has not the confidence of the substantial Mexican interests, and simply maintains itself in power through corrupt and improper means and by military force, and it does this simply because of the disordered and distraught condition of Mexico. The recognition of Carranza by this Government was a mistake, and there was no excuse for it at the time. This has been amply demonstrated by the repeated instances that have happened, and the relations between the two administrations, and it is also demonstrated by the avowed policy of the Carranza government and the crowd that directs the policies of his administration in their open disregard to American interests and their shameless attempt to create prejudice against Americans in Mexico and to misrepresent the relation and attitude of Americans and the American people and the American Government toward Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there an element in Mexico that can be relied upon to maintain a permanent government of laws with the assistance of some competent outside power?

Mr. THOMAS. There is a sufficient number of Mexicans who are interested in the establishing and maintaining of a sound and permanent government in Mexico to take over and manage the affairs of that country, if they are given a chance.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are not the members of that class at present residing outside of Mexico?

Mr. THOMAS. Many of the more competent men in political life and in business life are residing outside of Mexico, or, if they are still remaining in Mexico, are entirely inactive in public affairs. There are a number of people, Mexicans, still remaining in Mexico, but they keep absolutely still, and only ask to be let alone.

Mr. KEARFUL. Can you say something about the Mexican people themselves?

Mr. THOMAS. The great mass of the Mexican people, while illiterate, are not degenerate, nor are they vicious or criminal, and while they have not the capacity for self-government up to the standards that we have, or that are expected of this day, yet they have a general spirit of acquiescence to authority, and respect for authority, which, properly directed, would make for the basis of a satisfactory government. In fact, it would be easier to control them and control them for their own good and for the good of the country than it would perhaps some other people with more education and with more independent ideas. The Mexican peon is a good workman, and is not troublesome, except in small ways, and could be made a very substantial basis for citizenship and development of industry and business in the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is the Mexican peon, as a rule, faithful and loyal?

Mr. THOMAS. The Mexican peon is, as a rule, faithful and loyal, and generally satisfactory to the American employer.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is he by nature quarrelsome and turbulent?

Mr. THOMAS. He is not quarrelsome, nor turbulent, and he is generally quite appreciative of fair treatment.

Mr. KEARFUL. What percentage of the population is comprised of that class?

Mr. THOMAS. The population estimates in 1910 were about 15,000,000 and about 4,000,000 of these were estimated to be Indians—not peons, but Indians, absolutely unaffiliated with the race of the Mexican people and untouched by modern civilization. Many of these Indians do not even speak the Spanish language.

Of the remaining 11,000,000 from 2,000,000 to 3,000,000 were supposed to be able to read and write. Practically all of the remaining population was in the peon class, which represented mostly Indian blood with some small admixture of Spanish blood.

Mr. KEARFUL. And it is that class that you regard as worthy, industrious, and capable of improvement?

Mr. THOMAS. It is the great peon class that is certainly deserving, and they are capable of rising to a much higher plane, socially and economically. They are not ambitious in themselves, but they are adaptable to conditions. A distinct advance was made in the peon class due to the contact and influence of the American interests in Mexico. This was readily recognized in any of the mining centers, and the advance was appreciable during the latter years of American activities in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think the activities of foreign enterprise in Mexico is necessary to the welfare and advancement of this class of people?

Mr. THOMAS. There is no question but what the foreign influence in Mexico is beneficial to the lower classes, and it was necessary in order to permit of opportunity for them to have broader employment and for them to have an opportunity to develop in educational ways and in industrial efficiency.

Mr. KEARFUL. I believe you said it was true, according to your observation, that nearly all of the economic development of Mexico has been carried on by foreigners?

Mr. THOMAS. Practically all of it has been carried on by foreigners. There have been no great undertakings that were financed by Mexicans, either railroad building, irrigation, mining, or general industrial and economic enterprises of that character.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you think would be the effect upon Mexico of the entire elimination of all foreigners and foreign enterprises?

Mr. THOMAS. It would be stagnation and poverty.

Mr. KEARFUL. I believe that is all, unless you have something further.

Mr. THOMAS. I have nothing directly in line.

Mr. KEARFUL. We are very much obliged to you, sir.

(Whereupon, at 12.45 o'clock p. m., the committee adjourned.)

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
El Paso, Tex.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to the call of the chairman, at 10.30 a. m., in the county court room, courthouse, El Paso, Tex., Senator Marcus A. Smith presiding.

Present: Senator Smith and Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee.

Senator SMITH. Before opening the proceedings this morning, I deem it appropriate to allay, if I can, the prejudice that has been created in some portions of the public mind by false, and, in my judgment, premeditated false statements as to the purposes and objects of the investigation by this committee of the Senate. A resolution was introduced in the Senate of the United States looking to an investigation of the conditions existing in Mexico and along the border; in that there was no hostility to Mexico, either thought of or suggested. That was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which Senator Fall, chairman of the subcommittee, and I, are the present members. He is, unfortunately, absent this morning, but I expect him to be here with me to-day. I understand, and I am very glad to see that the Mexican consul has a reporter with me, and this has led me to say what I am now attempting to place before the public. I come with no animosity against Mexico; I know of no man that does not regret conditions there, and of no true man that would not help them in any way they could to get out of their present awful condition.

In that light, I take advantage, speaking for myself, and I have no doubt it is the sentiment of my colleagues on the committee, to extend an invitation to anybody, to the Mexican Government if needs be, to its consular agents in this country, and to any man of any nationality in the Republic of Mexico that can state to this committee facts in the purview of our resolution that will lead us to report the actual facts to the Senate of the United States. We welcome any testimony from any source that is responsive to this resolution, and instead of laying a penalty on anyone who happens to appear before the committee to testify, it would be more in the spirit of the committee's purpose itself to invite everyone who knows the facts to come and testify instead of laying an embargo, feeling as the committee does, that they are very glad to exhibit this friendly desire to give us an absolute insight into these conditions. Acting on that, I can say that the committee will welcome testimony responsive to this resolution, no matter with whom he is connected; providing, always, he is giving the facts upon which the committee can hope to rely.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. S. H. VEATER.

(The witness, being duly sworn, testified as follows:)

Senator SMITH. Capt. Veater, where do you live?

Capt. VEATER. At the present time, 2616 San Diego Street, city of El Paso.

Senator SMITH. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. How long have you lived in El Paso?

Capt. VEATER. I have been registered in El Paso for the past 16 years.

Senator SMITH. What positions, if any, have you held in the city at different times?

Capt. VEATER. I have held the position of captain of police and captain of detectives and peace officer here for about six years and am still in the employ of the city.

Senator SMITH. Did you have occasion at any time to go to the Republic of Mexico?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. When?

Capt. VEATER. In 1901, I made my first trip.

Senator SMITH. Where to?

Capt. VEATER. I came through the State of Sonora into Chihuahua and made a little investment there at that time, and returned a year later.

Senator SMITH. From there did you go anywhere, or did you go to the settlement of Americans in Mexico?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Where was that?

Capt. VEATER. In 1902, I went to a little settlement known as Colonia Chuichupa, in the State of Chihuahua, District of Guerrero.

Senator SMITH. How many Americans in this colony?

Capt. VEATER. There were perhaps 200 people there, more or less.

Senator SMITH. Under what concessions, if any, did they go?

Capt. VEATER. I can not say as to the concessions, the colony was in there but as to just what the arrangements were and what the concession was, I do not know.

Senator SMITH. You don't know the particularities under which the concession was made then?

Capt. VEATER. No, sir.

Senator SMITH. How long did you live there?

Capt. VEATER. I ranched there for about 13 years.

Senator SMITH. What were the conditions there during the time of your first—I mean as to peace and order, from the time of your first settlement, up to say the starting of the revolution in Mexico?

Capt. VEATER. It was absolutely first-class.

Senator SMITH. Safe in every particular?

Capt. VEATER. Safe in every particular.

Senator SMITH. When did the first trouble happen down there?

Capt. VEATER. As I remember it, the first trouble that came to me was along in 1909 or 1910; about that time the revolution commenced to take effect there.

Senator SMITH. Well, what was the nature of that?

Capt. VEATER. Well, the condition was that the revolutionists in the country commenced to demand the resources in the way of first-saddle horses, saddles, and provisions and that was met to quite an extent until the time they demanded the guns and ammunition that the colonists and American citizens there were in possession of, and the people there had kind of a conference and took under consideration what the results might be if guns and ammunition were delivered to the revolutionists, and leaving the women and children and families in the country without any protection; we had none from the Government at that time, and none only what we might furnish ourselves. Gen. Inez Salazar, at the time, was in command of Colonia Garcia and Colonia Pacheco, and that district, and he demanded that guns and ammunition be surrendered, and if they were not surrendered, they would be forcibly taken.

Senator SMITH. Who was this?

Capt. VEATER. Inez Salazar.

Senator SMITH. Was he a revolutionist against the Government of Mexico at the time, or was he in consort with the Government?

Capt. VEATER. He was looked upon as a representative of the Government when the revolution was started in the State of Chihuahua where I was well acquainted. There were three divisions; there was one under Salazar, one under Pascual Orozco, and there were four, one under Jose de la Luz Blanco and one under Inez Salazar. When the Diaz Government was overthrown, they came in power, and so far as we were then able to find out they were in full charge of Government affairs and we were compelled to deal with them and look upon them as such as we had no other representatives of the Government but those at that time.

Senator SMITH. Do you remember at that particular time who was the head of the Mexican Government?

Capt. VEATER. Well, at that particular time when it started, President Porfirio Diaz was at the head and later Madero, and just about the time of President Madero's execution, while the Government was in such a confusion that these same people were in power, but we were unable to learn definitely what the consequences were going to be; they had killed one President, another had temporarily taken charge, they were on the ground at present and there was no other authority there as far as we were able to establish the condition.

Senator SMITH. At this particular unsettled time, I understand you, they had demanded of you saddles, horses, etc.?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Then when they made demand for all the guns in the American settlement, what did you do?

Capt. VEATER. We told them, the representatives of the American people, the American colony, which were Americans that were there, they were Americans, and there was no distinction among the American colonies, we had two or three consultations with them and we agreed to give them partly our guns and ammunition, but we would ship immediately the women and children out of the colonies to the United States, and arrangements were made to that effect. I happened to be in charge of the colony of Chuichupa, as representative of the American people there—a good many of the people were farmers and ranchers—to make arrangements for the delivery of the guns and transportation of the families to the United States. This was the fore part of July. The families from that particular colony—Chuichupa—were loaded in the train at Chuichupa, on the Northwestern Railroad. They were given the guns and ammunition to turn over to Inez Salazar at Pearson, Chihuahua, because we had received a message stating that if when the train arrived that was carrying the refugees, that if they did not deliver the guns and ammunition they would not be permitted to continue their journey. They were loaded on the train at Chuichupa and delivered the guns and ammunition, and we have receipts for them, and they came out to the United States.

In that particular bunch of people there were 42 of us remained, and the second day after the families left we had some scouts out kind of looking around and there was a bunch of revolutionists under a man by the name of Lino Frias that were camped beyond about 8 miles of this colony that night and were being joined there by some more people coming from Madera. Back beyond him, about 40 miles north, was Inez Salazar with a bunch of 400 more—soldiers—and we saw they were coming into the town and we vacated the town, taking such horses and saddles as we could immediately get hold of and we went out into the hills, and I remained on the outside of the town about a mile and a half, and from that point I had a good view with field glasses and watched the troops coming into town. Dark came on and I could not see anything more that night. There was a great confusion in the city that night and the next day. I had a large dairy and a boy was watching my cows. He came out of the field and I went out on the field where he was and asked him what the condition was, and he told me that the people had come in, amounting to about 200, and broke all the windows and ransacked the town and carried off all the bedding and rounded up all the horses and saddles and provisions and everything they could put their hands on, and there were about 15 Mexican citizens, 15 families in all that remained in the colony.

Senator SMITH. What was the purpose—could you understand the reason for taking your guns and ammunition and horses in war time? What had been done to cause the breaking of the windows and the looting of the houses?

Capt. VEATER. There seemed to be a jealousy that existed as near as I could ascertain by the Mexican people, especially under the command of Inez Salazar, having had openly made statements that the time had come when the Mexican citizens were going to live in good houses and American citizens were no longer to be allowed to live in good places and Mexicans live in out-of-the-way places. There seemed to be a jealousy existing there, or desire to destroy property; in many cases it was burned and it was wasted and given away. Beef cattle that was slaughtered in the city, they only used about a quarter of them, and there seemed to be a desire of the troops, what they could not use they destroyed.

Senator SMITH. Underlying that, you concluded, I presume, they intended to drive the Americans out?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir. On different occasions when I was a prisoner of war, five different times they gave me all the chances to escape, and I knew they wanted me to escape because they felt after I was gone they would have freer access to what I had left. They oftentimes left me by myself, and demand was made on me for money, property, beef cattle, saddle horses, and equipment. It seemed to be indifferent to them whether I stayed with them or ran off.

Senator SMITH. Let me go back a little.

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. At the time that your first trouble started, what was the condition of that colony of Americans down there as to their homes, crops, stock, etc.?

Capt. VEATER. They were extremely successful there and prosperous. Their colony was producing a good deal of corn, potatoes, and farm products for the market. They had two sawmills, a good many cattle and horses and stock was quite extensive there. The machinery was very extensive; all modern machinery for farming and dairying and the colony was absolutely up to date in every respect so far as modern instruments for agriculture and ranching were concerned; good homes and farming under the modern way of agriculture.

Senator SMITH. How many colonies do you know of down there in that country similar to this one?

Capt. VEATER. I knew personally of six in the State of Chihuahua.

Senator SMITH. Among those, was that colony of Juarez one of them?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir; Colonia Juarez.

Senator SMITH. About how many people in that do you know?

Capt. VEATER. There was somewhere in the neighborhood of 300.

Senator SMITH. Garcia?

Capt. VEATER. Garcia has somewhere in the neighborhood of 150.

Senator SMITH. Do you know of the colony of Pacheco?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir; the colony of Pacheco was located there in the mountains and had about 150 citizens.

Senator SMITH. Do you know the Diaz colony?

Capt. VEATER. Colonia Diaz. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Colonia Diaz—Colonia Diaz, I think they called it.

Capt. VEATER. Colonia Diaz was located in Chihuahua, in the northwestern part and probably had about 300 citizens.

Senator SMITH. And Dublan?

Capt. VEATER. Dublan was located close to Casas Grandes at that time and had somewhere in the neighborhood of 250 or 300 citizens.

Senator SMITH. Any other you remember, Chuichupa?

Capt. VEATER. There was Colonia Chuichupa, the Colony of Chuichupa, Colonia Garcia, Colonia Pacheco, Colonia Dublan, and Colonia Porfirio Diaz; six in all in the State of Chihuahua that I was personally acquainted with.

Senator SMITH. Did you personally know the general conditions of those colonies?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir; absolutely.

Senator SMITH. Will you tell the committee whether or not the same general conditions prevailed in all of them as you have described as to the first up to the time the trouble commenced in Mexico?

Capt. VEATER. The same conditions existed in all of the colonies. In Colonia Diaz there was a subbank that was used for the deposits of the American citizens in that neighborhood. I had a little better than $4,000 on deposit there. It was robbed, ransacked, and looted, and after looting everything was lost. In the other colonies there were no Americans left at all. In the houses the windows were all broke out, pianos and organs were broken open, the floors all torn up, some of the buildings were burned, some of the mattresses, feather beds, and things like that were ripped wide open and feathers scattered all over the house; in many cases pigs had been turned out and they were using the houses for pig pens and the schoolhouse was used as a stable for horses.

Senator SMITH. Were there no Americans left at all?

Capt. VEATER. At that time, in the month of July, 1912, there was no American left in the colonies at all; all the American families had left; once in a while you would strike an American colonist, rancher, just keeping out of the way, laying around to see if he could save some of his property.

Senator SMITH. That was true of the one you had first testified about?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. That was the general condition of all of them?

Capt. VEATER. All of them.

Senator SMITH. Prosperity up to the time the revolution started; after that devastation of the property of which you spoke?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Has any of that property, that you know of, been reclaimed and reestablished and the citizens back in possession of it since they were driven out?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir. In some of those colonies at this time there are a few citizens in all of them, except in Colonia Dublan.

Senator SMITH. A few citizens; what do you mean by that?

Capt. VEATER. A few colonists that have returned there to take care of what little they could accumulate and get together, and staying more for the sake of protecting their property and trying to claim it. They are afraid if they leave it they will lose it entirely.

Senator SMITH. Do you know whether or not it has already been turned over to the citizens of the Mexican Republic on the ground that it has been abandoned property and they had left it and abandoned it, and therefore under the laws it was turned over to these other people?

Capt. VEATER. No, sir; I don't know anything; only just a few cases where the Mexican generals have told the Mexican people that they may take possession as they are there temporarily in possession of some of the property there now.

Senator SMITH. Do you know whether or not any of the irrigation dams were blown up?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir; I know one in Colonia Garcia was blown, and I am told by people who visited one in Sonora the dam was blown up on Colonia Morales. I have not seen that myself, but the citizens who left there told me it had been blown out and absolutely destroyed.

Senator SMITH. Do you know whether or not any claims have been filed as to the amount of damages by any of these colonists of which you have spoken with the State Department or the Mexican authorities?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir; I know some of them have been filed with the State Department, and in many instances several requests have been made to the Mexican Government to see what they could do about remuneration for property lost by American citizens.

Senator SMITH. As to the filing of the claims, you don't know whether they have all been filed or not?

Capt. VEATER. No, sir; I don't know.

Senator SMITH. About what was the amount of loss, would you estimate, in that colony of which you have spoken, as to the destruction of houses, etc.?

Capt. VEATER. About $500,000.

Senator SMITH. In that one colony alone?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Now, the men that were employed by you—what I mean, by the people there—what nationalities did they belong to?

Capt. VEATER. They were all Mexican citizens that were employed and doing the labor there at a wage proposition.

Senator SMITH. What about the wages paid as compared to the wages formerly being paid to laborers in Mexico?

Capt. VEATER. The first year I operated in the State, as well as the neighborhood there, we were paying Mexican laborers 50 cents a day, Mexican money—silver; the last year we operated there, in 1910, when we used any men at all we were paying $2 per day, and the wage had year by year raised little by little from 50 cents to $2 in the duration of about 10 years.

Senator SMITH. What was the condition of those people who left—you were ordered to give up your guns, you say, and you all concluded the women and children should be moved out of the country, inasmuch as you had no protection either from the American or the Mexican Government—where did those people go to?

Capt. VEATER. Those people came across the port here at El Paso.

Senator SMITH. In what condition did they arrive, as to property and clothing, etc.?

Capt. VEATER. They were absolutely broke—without money; did not have anything but clothes and very light baggage, owing to the fact that the order came so sudden the people had to move out so fast that the Mexican Northwestern Railroad could not furnish cars; bridges being burned out, equipment being in bad shape, they were unable to furnish any baggage cars, and each person was allowed more or less 50 pounds of baggage, and each person got out with just a grip or trunk.

Senator SMITH. Do you know whether or not their condition was such on their arrival here that the United States Government made appropriations for their food and clothes?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir; they did. I visited them after they were here in camp and they were furnished provisions, and clothing, and such things as were necessary, and later on transportation to different parts of the United States where they could get employment, and they were given such financial assistance as they absolutely had to have by the United States Government.

Senator SMITH. What has become of the individual members of those colonies, if you know?

Capt. VEATER. There are a few, probably 10 per cent of them, that have returned to Mexico and 90 per cent of them still remain scattered over the United States, in every State of the Union, now working for a living and getting along as best they can.

Senator SMITH. Do you know anything about what was done with a good deal of the property there, turned over, I believe—or was it turned over to a man named Rojas?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Please tell about that instance.

Capt. VEATER. In March, 1913—on the 3d day of March—Antonio Gomez, with a brigade of troops, you may call it, of probably 300 or 400 men, came into the colony of Chuichupa, and I was there at the time, and two of the Williams boys were also there; we were just looking after our property there as best we could. He sent in a bunch of scouts, about a day ahead of time, and notified us he was coming over to give us a call by authority of the Government, and he would be there to see us.

Senator SMITH. What Government was that?

Capt. VEATER. The Mexican Government.

Senator SMITH. Who was at the head of it?

Capt. VEATER. At that time I think Huerta was at the head of the Government; it was immediately after the execution of Madero. When he arrived, I think March 5, he immediately gave orders to his men to round up all of the horses that were in the corrals that belonged to the American people, but not to round up anything that belonged to any Mexican people there. There were a few American ranchers there; I was placed under arrest and Mr. Williams also.

Senator SMITH. What for?

Capt. VEATER. He said he wanted to know what we were doing in the country and what we were able to do for the Government, which had been in a state of revolution, but now things were settled again and the Government was more or less bankrupt, and as representative of the Government he had been sent to that particular place to gather up and get some property in the way of stock and horses to be utilized for different purposes by the Government that the Government had to have it for, and asked Mr. Williams and myself how many head of good dairy cows we could turn over for some of the widows and orphans scattered around the country that the Government had to help in the State of Sonora where he was being sent to reinforce some Mexican general down there. I explained to him that we had been very heavily drawn on and had but little left and did not feel like we ought to be forced to turn over anything. We were kept prisoners three days, and during that time a constant round-up was made in town, round-ups of the horses and cattle, etc. After he had gathered all of the horses in the corral he called all of the Mexican citizens together and made them a little talk and told them he was now representing the Government and he was going to be a general of the State and he wanted to show his sympathy and friendship toward them, and he would make them all a present of a good horse or team. The round-up was practically over and to go down to the corrals and pick them out a horse and what was left he would carry on, which he did, and probably three-fourths of the Mexican citizens went down to the corral and took them a horse or two; the rest of the horses were rounded up and sent down by his men in Sonora and turned over to a man by the name of Francisco Portillo, a rancher in the State of Sonora, known as Rio Chico, and he continued to round up the cattle, holding both Mr. Williams and myself prisoners, and during that time I sent a messenger over to Cumbre and Madera, where there were some federal troops, telling them what was going on and what the condition was, and asking them for some assistance, and they returned word by my messenger, who was Mr. Jess Williams, saying that Antonio Gomez was a representative of the Government, so if he needed any property and was forced to use it on his march it would be paid for by the Government and they could not do anything further about it. He went on then about 10 miles across from town where Mr. Williams and myself had our cattle in a little bunch there, and gathered them up, rounded them all up and took 130 head, and broke into my blacksmith shop and took all of my branding irons, and took every cow and calf that belonged to every widow, woman, and child, and person in the country; he did not leave anything—just rounded them all up, and also took them down to Refugio Portillo and turned them over.

Senator SMITH. That was the last you heard of the stock?

Capt. VEATER. No.

Senator SMITH. What became of them?

Capt. VEATER. I made application through Gen. Calles in Sonora through Jess Williams, who is now in Douglas, bookkeeper of the Sonora Mercantile Co., who had some stock in the bunch. I had taken it up with officials of the State of Chihuahua to see if the stock could not be reclaimed and they told me they were in the State of Sonora and absolutely in the hands of the Sonora officials and I asked Mr. Williams to look into this again over there and to get an order, after which he took it up with Gen. Calles and one or two other officials of the State of Sonora, who kept promising him from time to time that they would do something about it. I sent a Mexican down to see Nemesio Miramontes, who lives now at Madera, and he reported to me that the day before he got in there, the State officials at Supre, in the State of Sonora, had come there and rounded up everything that was on the Portillo Ranch, all the American stuff, and taken it over to the town of Supre. I notified Mr. Williams again that the stuff at Supre, in the hands of those officials, and from time to time he has been working on it until his information showed me that it had all been disposed of, used up in one way or another at Supre and nothing was left.

Senator SMITH. Was any pay ever tendered for any of this stock?

Capt. VEATER. I have never received a cent from the Mexican Government for anything taken from me in any way, shape, or form.

Senator SMITH. What, if anything, had you done; I mean, what, if anything, had you done, or your colony, that would cause the antagonism against you that would appear from the way this property was treated?

Capt. VEATER. That is a question I can not answer. The people were never arrested, or charged or found guilty of any offense.

Senator SMITH. Did you ever know of any of them committing any offense against the Government?

Capt. VEATER. The records show they were clean, law-abiding citizens; they were never arraigned for any violation of Mexican laws for the duration I was in that colony—12 years—there never was but one citizen arrested and charged with violation of the law.

Senator SMITH. A good many of those people down there were Mormons, were they not?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir; probably 90 per cent of the people there were Mormon.

Senator SMITH. You are not of that faith?

Capt. VEATER. No, sir; I am not a Mormon; I lived among Mormon people and came out of the State of Utah with them, but I do not practice their religion at all.

Senator SMITH. Do you know a man by the name of Johnnie Brooks?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. What became of him?

Capt. VEATER. Johnnie Brooks came to Colonia Chuichupa along in the spring of 1913, in April, to receive a bunch of beef cattle; he was at that time running a little butcher shop at Madera; he came over and negotiated with myself and Mr. Williams and a man named Farnsworth for a bunch of beef cattle. Mr. Williams and his brother-in-law, by the name of Burges, and another man by the name of Wells and one or two Mexican cow punchers arrived in Chuichupa and asked us if the cattle were together, and we told him we dare not put the cattle together right in the corral, that we would have to deliver them right outside of the little town, there were only five or six Americans there; he said "All right," he would stop the next evening and receive the cattle and pay for them. At that time there was a man there, with 10 or 15 soldiers, by the name of Francisco Portillo; he claimed he was there representing the Government, and had been there in town for probably six or eight months with a little bunch of men. Soon after Mr. Brooks arrived, about 4 o'clock in the afternoon—5 o'clock in the afternoon Francisco Portillo sent one of his men up to ask him who he was and what he was doing; he sent word back by one of his soldiers by the name of Nicolas, telling him that he had come over there to receive a little bunch of beef stock; he was not looking for trouble and did not want any trouble; he could come up and talk to him; he had not come to violate the law in any way; if he wanted to see him come up and call on him. In about 30 minutes Francisco Portillo rode up to the gate with 10 or 15 soldiers and tied their horses at the front gate, and came into a little frame house where there were five or six Americans, maybe eight, of Brooks' men; he asked Mr. Brooks who he was; Mr. Brooks told him who he was and what his business was in coming up there.

For a time, temporarily he stood directly on the floor, he made the remark to Mr. Brooks; he says: "Don't you know I am in charge of this district, and it is a violation of our regulations for you to come over here with a bunch of men armed?" Mr. Brooks says: "Don't you know these mountains are full of renegades and bandits, and people who have come over here to get any cattle, passing through here, have in some cases had their horses taken away, and saddles, and robbed, and in some cases been killed; that is the reputation the country has around here; for that reason I brought a few of my own men working for me, and my arms to protect my life and what little I had with me." Capt. Portillo says: "You mean to tell me you came over here to pay for those cuttle, and have money with you," and Mr. Brooks says: "I always have a little money to pay my bills." He says: "I want your arms and ammunition." Mr. Brooks says: "I have never given up my arms and ammunition to anybody." From then on the conversation went on a little bit quiet. Capt. Portillo asked Johnnie Brooks when he came over from Madera, he asked him what the condition of the revolution was, and what the condition was until it led up to the execution of Madero, and what the sentiment of the people was at that time.

Capt. Portillo had taken a seat right in the middle of the house; his men were standing behind him, and right in the middle of the conversation he broke him off, and Capt. Portillo got his rifle and cocked it, and says: "I have come for your guns and ammunition, and I am going to have them." Brooks had just passed a box of cigars around the house, and some of the men lighted them. When Capt. Portillo made his talk Brooks raised up and the two men shot about the same time. The shot out of Brooks's gun hit the sight on the rifle of Portillo and knocked the sight out of it, and it dropped to the floor. Capt. Portillo pulled his gun and shot Brooks right in the neck, the bullet coming out right between the shoulders. About the same time some of the boys, either Brooks or some of the American boys there, shot Portillo right in the stomach. It was a small house about 16 by 16, and the smoke became so thick in there you could not tell who was who. They ran out of the house, and Brooks fell over on the floor, and died; died the next morning about sunrise, and Portillo died just outside of the door. We taken Mr. Brooks the next morning, taken him over to Madera, and turned him over to his wife. I think his wife is in the city now; she was some time ago. He was buried at Madera. I knew him for years. Then we were frequently called on and had to keep out of the way. They figured the captain was killed, so we had no right to take any part in the shooting; self-defense we called it.

Senator SMITH. Do you know anything about the execution of one Ben Griffith?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir; about two or three months later, maybe, Ben Griffith was a stranger at the time to me, but he came over to Colonia Chuichupa from Madera with a man named Smith, and came to the same house where Brooks was killed, and said he thought the Madero revolution was going to quiet down, and the mills had closed at Madera, he thought he would come over and take some of that vacant ground around there the Americans would let him have and plant a few beans and do a little farming, while the mills were commencing operation. We explained to him the country was full of bandits, and it was dangerous to farm there. He did not seem to think so. He had only been there three or four days when a bunch of men came in from Colonia Garcia, commanded by a man named Manuel Gutierrez. He rode up to the house and arrested Griffith and this man Smith and tried to get them to tell them where myself and Mr. Williams, and some of the rest were, and Mr. Griffith explained he knew us and knew we were out in the hills some place, but did not know where. They kept him arrested overnight, and the next morning he told them he was a stranger in the country. They then took him right in the same house and shot him because he would not tell. As a matter of fact we did not tell him where we were going because he was more or less a stranger in the country, and he did not know where he was.

Senator SMITH. What mutilation of the body occurred?

Capt. VEATER. After the body was shot the Mexicans that were there in town, the Mexican ranchers and citizens, dug a little hole there for to bury the body. After the body was put in the hole the face was turned up, and Mr. Griffith had one gold tooth. One of the men took a sword and knocked the gold tooth out of his mouth, picked it up and put it in his pocket, and let the body rest, and some of the others asked as to why it was done. Finally it came to an argument there, and they said he had better put it back in the grave, and he threw the tooth in the grave, and the body still remains there with one tooth knocked out.

Senator SMITH. Did you ever get any cattle out of there at all?

Capt. VEATER. I got a few cattle out of there. The remnants around the house; I think it amounted to something like 60 head. I finally got them over to a little station on the Hearst ranch, and shipped them out through the port of El Paso. I have a record of the number I shipped out, something like 60 head.

Senator SMITH. When you got them here what duty, if any, was charged on getting them out?

Capt. VEATER. Well, I went to make arrangements, and saw several of the customs officials at the port of El Paso here, and port of Ciudad Juarez to get them, I first explained to them my condition, I was broke, and lost nearly everything I had, and could not any longer remain there and take care of the remnants, and asked permission of them to let me bring the cattle out, and showed them my receipt for a good many cattle and property they had got off of me, and I asked them if they could not apply the account on the duty of the cattle, they were owing me several thousand dollars at the time. I did not have the money, and they told me no, they could not, that was another account under consideration and they could not do anything about it. I taken it up with them several different times and explained to them I absolutely did not have the money to pay the duty and would like to get out with the remainder of the stuff, they even charged me $10 on each of the calves 4 or 5 months old, and $20 on the cows. I borrowed the money from the American Trust & Savings Bank to pay the duty on them and shipped out the remnants I had left.

Senator SMITH. Do you remember an old man by the name of Stevens?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. What became of him?

Capt. VEATER. Stevens was a rancher just out of the suburbs of Colonia Pacheco, and when the American colonist left there he stated he had made his home there, and all he had was there, and he thought he would remain, and himself and a small boy and two daughters, I think his wife was dead. He was a widower and remained there some month or six weeks.

Senator SMITH. Where was this?

Capt. VEATER. This was a little ranch right close to Colonia Pacheco.

Senator SMITH. All right.

Capt. VEATER. Some bandits of some sort came to his ranch and his girls were out in the yard picking some blackberries, one of the little girls upstairs saw some Mexican in the shade between the girls and the house, and she went and told her father off in another direction; he went to see about what the Mexican was doing and became involved in trouble with the Mexican, he got killed there, they stabbed him and cut him all to pieces.

Senator SMITH. In Colonia Juarez did you know a man down there by the name of George Redd?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Please give what you know of his history there?

Capt. VEATER. George Redd was a citizen of the colony of Colonia Juarez. One evening he heard a fuss out at his corral, and some Mexicans were out there and he sent out to see what they were doing, and they were in his corral taking some of his horses, he got in a discussion with them and they shot him, shot him in the leg, and a couple of days afterwards he died. His wife is now in Colonia Juarez.

Senator SMITH. Do you know a man by the name of Cain?

Capt. VEATER. Mr. Cain, bookkeeper for the Lavaca—I knew a man by the name of Cain, bookkeeper at the Lavaca ranch; he was arrested and carried off there by a bunch of revolutionists and never has been found since, so far as I know. The report is from some people in the gang he was executed, but as far as I know his body has never been recovered; he has never been heard of since, however.

Senator SMITH. How about a man by the name of Roy Cramer?

Capt. VEATER. Mr. Cramer was the son of John Cramer, who lived at Guerrero, about 3 miles below the town; he was a rancher there and farmer. I did not see what happened, but I met his father and two sons a couple of weeks afterwards and understood they had had some trouble; the father and son told me one of the sons was killed, and they went out in the hills and kept out of the way, and they surprised them one night and commenced shooting at them when they were around a camp fire, and one son was killed, and one son got away. They live in Isleta now.

Senator SMITH. Do you know anything of what became of Hays and John Henry?

Capt. VEATER. All I know there was an American and negro by that name killed in Madera. As to who killed them, or under what circumstances, I do not know, but I know they were killed there; many different people told me they were killed in Madera; I was not personally acquainted with them.

Senator SMITH. You have no personal knowledge of the circumstances?

Capt. VEATER. No, sir.

Senator SMITH. You frequently speak of bandits and revolutionists, and all this. During all this trouble what was the recognized government of Mexico over these districts of which you have been speaking?

Capt. VEATER. What was the condition of them?

Senator SMITH. No; what was the recognized government at that time you speak of, bandits and revolutionists, etc., I am trying to get at?

Capt. VEATER. We have always been of the opinion that the government was the man who was in charge of the presidential chair in the city of Mexico. Many times we have been governed by troops and brigades that seemed to be in revolution against him, and by force of arms compelled us people who had property in the country to be governed and controlled and pay our taxes, and do our business with whoever was in charge of the president's office in the district where we were, so we recognized him as in power.

Senator SMITH. What efforts did you make with whoever was in power to protect yourself against such occurrences of which you speak?

Capt. VEATER. Made efforts through Huerta all the time he was in power, and Madero, first Madero, and then Huerta, and then Carranza.

Senator SMITH. What aid, if any, did you get in your effort to save your property from the recognized government at the time?

Capt. VEATER. Absolutely none, the last notification that I had of my property before it was burned up and destroyed, I received a telegram from Pedro Miramontes, who was in charge of my buildings and my farm. I had nothing left but an old rattletrap wagon and buildings and farm. I now have the telegram, I received it from him; they notified him from the president's office at Madera he would have to vacate that property. He wired me at the time I was in El Paso asking for orders what he should do. I have the original telegram and I immediately wrote him a letter and sent him a messenger to gather up what few traps he had in the way of blacksmith equipment, and a few mill things that were not carried off, what he could get together, and get some little furniture that had not been destroyed, and ship it to Colonia Dublan and store it in the storehouse of Farnsworth & Rumney, which was a large mercantile house. He shipped two carloads of stuff over. I sent a man down to receive it and store it by the name of Vance. He shipped two carloads of stuff which was the remainder of what little stuff was left. I told him anything that belonged to the Colonist people that was of any value to pick it up and ship it to Colonia Dublan and store it, and I arranged with the Northwestern Railroad for two cars to be spotted at Cumbre, which is about 12 or 15 miles from the ranch. Those cars were loaded and sent to Colonia Dublan and stored in the warehouse of Farnsworth & Rumney. Soon after it was broke into by the revolutionists and carried off. Nothing left, absolutely they made a wreck of it, mashed the door in—Villa's outfit was in charge—smashed the door in, they broke everything that was in there and there was nothing left but just broken boxes.

Senator SMITH. Now you say the revolutionists broke into that?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. And it was in the district that Carranza was supposed to have jurisdiction over?

Capt. VEATER. Yes; he was supposed to have jurisdiction over, and I left it there thinking I would get protection.

Senator SMITH. What protection was offered you there?

Capt. VEATER. Absolutely none.

Senator SMITH. How far from there was any Carranza troops that you know of?

Capt. VEATER. Well, Carranza had some troops that had temporarily been occupying Colonia Garcia, but when the Villistas came there they left.

Senator SMITH. Did you know Abelino Rascon?

Capt. VEATER. Abelino Rascon was a Mexican who was in my employ for nine years. I used him as foreman on my ranch and I sent for him to come out to El Paso to see me to get a little money that I was owing the natives down there that had been doing some farming. I was trying to keep up operation, making an effort to keep me a little feed on hand, and keep my equipment there and make enough to return to it and have some little something. He was using two or three men who ran short of funds, provisions, and clothing. He wired me what his condition was; I told him that under the conditions I did not feel like going down there, I felt it was safer for him to come out, being a Mexican citizen instead of me going down, if he felt so disposed, did not feel like he was taking too much risk to come out to El Paso and I would furnish him what money and provisions he needed to pay off his account, so he did. He came to El Paso and in all he drew about $1,500, $700 in money and about that much in merchandise, and he went back over the Mexican Northwestern, and arrived at the Cumbre Tunnel, and the passenger train when in the Cumbre Tunnel, a large number of Americans were on it, and all of them died there in the wreck in the tunnel.

I was notified by Rascon's uncle, who is Pedro Miramontes, that Rascon had went into the tunnel, that the tunnel was on fire, and the train could not be found, and saying that he was one of the passengers on the train, and the Northwestern people sent a train over the road with a fire squad from Bisbee, Ariz., with fire equipment, feeling that they might be able to rescue some of the people. I went in with the party, but when we got there the tunnel was full of smoke and rocks caving in, and timbers, and smoke coming out at both ends so you could not get within 150 yards, because the gas and smoke was so bad, and rocks falling, and we were handicapped and could not do anything whatever.

Senator SMITH. This man, you say, was lost in that wreck?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir; his body was taken out some two months afterwards.

Senator SMITH. Do you remember of seeing Col. Del Arce and Maj. Tagle?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir; Col. Del Arce was the colonel in charge of the military at Ciudad Juarez.

Senator SMITH. In charge of what military?

Capt. VEATER. The Carranza Government. Maj. Tagle was a major and chief of staff at the time in Ciudad Juarez, and they had been during the past 18 months, say up to about six months ago. I think Del Arce is still in charge, and a colonel or general in the northern division, and Maj. Tagle is here in El Paso. I understand he has resigned. I personally knew them both when they were operating and in charge of Ciudad Juarez.

Senator SMITH. Do you know what was done in regard to Norwood Hall's cattle?

Capt. VEATER. Norwood Hall notified me one evening that his ranch had been raided on the border up this side of Canutillo by some renegades in some form; he sent out a bunch of men. In all they had taken some 40 head of cattle and had crossed the border into the State of Chihuahua out there about 8 miles, and his men had trailed the cattle up to the line and ascertained beyond a doubt they had went on into Chihuahua, and he did not feel like going over the line, and he asked me if I could not make some effort to do something to get the cattle. It was then late in the evening; I told him it would be impossible to get any assistance that evening; I would take it up the first thing next morning and see what could be done. The next morning I went over to Ciudad Juarez and took the matter up with Maj. Tagle and Col. Del Arce and explained to them the cattle had crossed the line, being driven by a bunch of bandits, and told them I was prepared to trail the cattle if they would give me a little squad of men that would actually go; I was prepared to go after the cattle and all I wanted was a little squad of men to go with me. They told me it would be impossible to furnish me any men before 1 o'clock. I reminded them of the fact that the time from 10 to 1 o'clock was quite a bit of time to elapse on a trail of a bunch of cattle, but if that was the best they could do I would report at 1 o'clock and be prepared to take up the trail.

I reported at 1 o'clock, and I constantly kept after them to furnish me those men and equip them to make a run of 100 or 150 miles at least; about 4 o'clock they told me the men were ready; they turned me over nine men in charge of a young fellow by the name of Ramon Valdez, who was then kind of head of the rurales over there—that is the mounted force—and of those nine men there was one man grown and the other seven were boys from the age of 12 years old to 16 or 18. Their mounts were little, old ponies; some of them had colts and little, old, poor mules. The man in charge of the party did not even have a rifle; he had a little, old, two-bit six shooter. When we got ready to go I asked them where their provisions were and what arrangements they were making for a day or two trip. They said they were accustomed to going out into the hills just like they were; and I says then: "Are you equipped for this hike?" and he says, "Yes; we don't need anything where we are going for three or four days." He says: "We are good for three or four days; we live off the resources of the country." I said all right. We went immediately where Mr. Hall told me these cattle had crossed the line and picked up this trail; it was very sandy there and distinct and plain. We followed these across to Flores Springs and were riding very fast; and it was just beginning to get dusk, and all the provisions they had was mescal; they had drank that up and were shooting at every grasshopper and rabbit that jumped out; it sounded like an army or something. I got a little out of patience firing so many shots, and when the trail was fresh I was not prepared to give any orders, and when we got to Flores Springs it had just got dark; and they watered their horses there and then wanted to return to Ciudad Juarez.

I tried to persuade them to stay there that night and pick up the trail the next morning. They said they would have to return and tell the major and colonel that the cattle was there all right. I said that it is consistent that we go on and get the men and cattle; that is what we went out for. They said they would have to return, and did return, and got back to Juarez about 2 o'clock. I went over the next morning and asked them if anything could be done. He told me about 2 o'clock two ranchers had come in from Mexico and told him the cattle were out there, and he had sent a bunch of men to get them and they were now getting them; along about 5 o'clock he notified me he had 19 head of those cattle. I had previously told him that Mr. Hall had offered $10 reward a head for them. He notified me he had 20 head, and I notified Mr. Hall and he gave me a check to pay the reward, and I asked Mr. Valdez for a receipt when he turned the cattle over the line. He gave a receipt and turned over 19 head, and I asked him where the rest of the cattle were and what became of the men. He stated that he did not know, but that is the end of trailing up those bandits so far as I know.

Senator SMITH. How long since you were down in that country where these colonies were located?

Capt. VEATER. I have not been there since the expedition of Gen. Pershing; I visited the country on two or three occasions during the time he was there.

Senator SMITH. The last time you saw it it was ruined, I believe you stated, as far as homes, farms, and stock, etc., are concerned?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir; the town of Colonia Pacheco is burned. I have a picture of my home; all other places there look like it. All I have is a picture; I have it in my grip; I would not mind showing it to you, of my home; all the other places look like it. All of Colonia Dublan was also burned, all but just a few scattered places that did not happen to burn.

Senator SMITH. What was the object of burning the houses?

Capt. VEATER. I can not say; my house and all of those houses were burned about three days after Gen. Pershing's expedition passed through that colony.

Senator SMITH. What did that house cost you?

Capt. VEATER. That house cost me about $5,000, the house and outbuildings.

Senator SMITH. They were all destroyed?

Capt. VEATER. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. And they were utterly destroyed by fire?

Capt. VEATER. Utterly destroyed by fire.

Senator SMITH. I believe that is all, unless there is something that you wish to say?

Capt. VEATER. I wish to explain one other thing that happened directly with a Carranza general, whose name is Manuel Gutierrez; he is now I understand still an official with the Carranza Government, and during the time I had my cattle in transit from up in the mountains; I held them for some time at Ciudad Juarez, trying to get them closer to protection; I only had a few of them left; I had a man in charge of the cattle who is now and worked for me about a year by the name of Gómez. Manuel Gutierrez went up there and rounded up those cattle and killed 11 of the best milk cows I had. After I made several efforts I got his receipt for them, trying to get some remuneration, inasmuch as the Carranza officers and a man in charge of the district gave his receipt in the name of the Carranza Government, absolutely, and can not get any returns from it, and there was no justification of his killing the cows in the beginning. There were a good many young steers in the bunch, the boys tried to induce him to take the steers and not kill the Durham cows. He said the cows were fat; he said he wanted to kill the cows. There was no necessity for killing the cows whatever; no necessity whatever, just pure meanness in him. The cows would cost me now $200 apiece. Just as well kill a $25 yearling or calf as to kill those valuable cows.

Senator SMITH. That was done by a Carranza official?

Capt. VEATER. That was done by Manuel Gutierrez in charge of Ciudad Juarez and is still a Carranza officer.

Senator SMITH. Did you ever have an opportunity to protest to any of the officials of the Carranza Government about it?

Capt. VEATER. I did, I took it up with Mr. Gonzales in charge of the customs men, and Col. Del Arce and asked them to assist me in getting remuneration for them or making some remuneration, and they absolutely done nothing about it. They just put me off, you can not go to the bottom of anything, you make requests and that is the last you ever hear of it.

Senator SMITH. Is there any signs of peace and order over there so you would feel justified in going back and reoccupying your property, if you could?

Capt. VEATER. No, sir; for this reason, even if the people in charge of the Mexican Government were in good faith, even if their intentions were good, the Mexican people in the state of revolution and every man practically connected with the Government troops or the bandits have been more or less engaged in looting, stealing and robbing, and they are unable and unqualified and unprepared, and it will be impossible for them to produce an organization to govern the conditions, even if they wanted to. Their equipment is of slow movement, you take conditions, even if they had the best desire they are unable to cooperate with their own soldiers.

Senator SMITH. I believe that is all, and we are much obliged.

(The committee then, at 12 o'clock, adjourned to meet at 2.30 o'clock p. m.)

TESTIMONY OF MR. W. A. SCHULTZ.

(The witness, being first duly sworn, testified as follows:)

Senator SMITH. Where do you live?

Mr. SCHULTZ. I live at 607 North Estrella Street, El Paso, Tex.

Senator SMITH. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. I believe you lost one of your sons in the service?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir; I had four sons in the United States service, three that went across on the other side, they were on the battle front the morning of the armistice.

Senator SMITH. When did you first go to Mexico, if you have ever been there?

Mr. SCHULTZ. I went to Mexico in 1907, in September, 1907.

Senator SMITH. Had you had any connection with the Comanche Land Co.?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir; I organized that company. I went down—in Mexico I had a friend that owns the Blalock Colony in the State of Tamaulipas, and also in the San Dieguito Colony in the State of San Luis Potosi, and I was in the country from September until Christmas, and during the time I found a piece of land that could be purchased in the Blalock Colony; in fact it adjoined the Blalock Colony land, and it was between the railroad and the Blalock Colony, and I came back and interested some of my friends in it and we went to Mexico in January, 1908, and we organized a company, incorporated under the laws of Mexico, and bought this tract of land.

Senator SMITH. From whom?

Mr. SCHULTZ. From one Don Mariano Guerra, and the land title was one of the oldest in that country.

Senator SMITH. That is what I am asking about.

Mr. SCHULTZ. The land had been patented to one of the Castillos, one of the ancestors of this man, in 1639, and my company got all of those original papers and the land was in the Guerra family until we bought out this one. Originally the grant consisted of 150,000 acres, but we bought about 11,000, a little better than 11,000, and on the property was a canal that had been constructed that would irrigate approximately 2,000 acres. This had been built before we bought the property, but it was sadly in need of repairs, and we improved the canal and went to clearing up the land that was under the canal subject to irrigation.

Approximately 2,000 acres under the canal, and we moved our families there in 1908, and we were there until just after the capture of Vera Cruz by American forces. When we went there we were permitted to take free all household goods and farming tools and farm animals, our cows, hogs, chickens, mules, and so on, and wagons, with duty free, and we were shown every courtesy and kindness and protection for the first two years that we were there.

Senator SMITH. You mean those courtesies were extended to you by the Mexican Government when you went down there?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir; and by the Mexican authorities of the country down there.

Senator SMITH. Well, how long did you rest there in security and peace?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Well, after—during the revolution—the Madero revolution, there were a number of both Federal and revolutionary soldiers that passed through our place. Our property was located right at the cross of two main public roads; one called the Mata-moros and Tula road that went on west from the Blalock Colony, and the other was the Monterrey and Vera Cruz road that crossed there, and there was an immense amount of travel even in peaceable times. Now, both Federal and revolutionary soldiers travel that road, and during that time the Federal soldiers that passed there I am sure that we fed of them 500, and they paid us for everything that they got and treated us kindly and courteously, and the revolutionary soldiers were kind to us in those times; more than that, they would take most anything they would take a notion to take, and against our protest frequently, but would pay us for the things.

Senator SMITH. That was during the Madero revolution?

Mr. SCHULTZ. That was during the Madero revolution; yes, sir. Then later after Huerta—after Madero was assassinated and Huerta seized the reins of government, his soldiers also frequently passed through that way and they treated us with the same kindness and courtesy that we were being treated with by the former Diazista soldiers, but the Carranza soldiers, the first ones that began to come our way demanded our horses and our guns and anything they took a notion to, and during those times, I can not begin to tell you how many soldiers we fed, but, making a rough estimate of it, at least 1,500. The Carrancista soldiers during his revolution against Huerta, they would frequently come up, 150 or 200 of them at a time, and ride into our yard and feed their horses in the yard, and we would demand pay for what they used, and sometimes they would pay us about half of what it was worth and tell us that they were due the rest of it for the protection they were giving; they were due something for what they were doing for us. Well, during those times they killed our cows and took 3 or 4 head of horses from me, and from the colony I suppose some 15 or 20 head of horses, killed our hogs in the pen and caught the chickens in the yard and killed them and ate them.

Senator SMITH. How many were in your colony down there, Mr. Schultz?

Mr. SCHULTZ. About 90 at most.

Senator SMITH. That 90 was on the 11,000 acres you spoke of?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. When did you finally leave there?

Mr. SCHULTZ. We left there just after the capture of Vera Cruz. I have not got the date in mind.

Senator SMITH. Was that at the time our Government warned the Americans?

Mr. SCHULTZ. They had been warning us before that repeatedly, and quite a number of Americans had come out before we did.

Senator SMITH. But the final exodus?

Mr. SCHULTZ. That was the time when practically all left the country.

Senator SMITH. How came they to leave, on the advice of our Government?

Mr. SCHULTZ. In addition to that, they felt that their lives were unsafe in the country.

Senator SMITH. Why?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Well, they were coming into the homes there. Those revolutionists were taking anything out of the houses, and one neighbor, a lady just across the street from us, was assaulted by a Mexican soldier—Mrs. W. T. Worley, she is now at McAllen, Tex.—and another soldier there interceded for her, and she got loose and fled over to our house. And then Mr. Pettus's house was invaded, and that was an every-day occurrence in the country.

Senator SMITH. That is what I mean.

Mr. SCHULTZ. And they would ride in my house; my house was adobe, built like many Mexican houses are in Mexico—around a court—and I ran a hotel there on the road, hundreds of Americans passing there going west and the better class of Mexicans frequently stopped with me and these soldiers thought it was a public place, I suppose, and just drove in there when they came. Another incident that occurred during this time just a while before we came out: There were about 90 Carrancista soldiers that came into our little village, and two of them rode down to my place and rode in and told me that the captain had sent them down there for corn and one of my sons and myself took hold of a sack of corn—a fanega we call it there, by which we measure and sell corn—and put it up on the saddle in front of him and the other one told us he wanted a sack of corn also. Well, we put him up a sack. He was drunk, or appeared to be. He started riding out and got to the gate and turned around and pulled his Winchester rifle out of the scabbard and threw it down on me and says "Diga Viva Carranza y Vasquez Gomez," meaning to holler "Hurrah for Carranza and Vasquez Gomez," and of course I did so, and when I did so, he said "Esta bueno," all right and turned and rode out.

Senator SMITH. When they came to your place would they require any cooking of your wife or you?

Mr. SCHULTZ. What?

Senator SMITH. When they would come to your place would they require you or your wife to do the cooking for them at any time?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes sir; and my wife—the officers would eat at my table and during that time we fed quite a number of them that were notable or became such during the revolution. Obregon was one of them and a man named Luis Cabrera and Manuel Pelaez, he is now a bandit in that country, has been to our place, and a fellow by name of Guerra, I have forgotten his first name, and Mondragon.

Senator SMITH. Were they all supposed to be with the Carranza government at that time?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir; all of those men were supposed to be back of Carranza at that time.

Senator SMITH. Do you know of a man by the name of Dawson that was robbed there?

Mr. SCHULTZ. No, sir; I don't know anything about him.

Senator SMITH. I was referring to a man that was robbed and killed down there.

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir; that occurred later than this. What I now tell all occurred before I brought my family out of the country. Then in 1916, on January 2, I returned to Mexico to look after my interests down there and during the time I was down there the Pershing expedition went into Mexico. Well, it was during that time this killing occurred. That was down at Columbus in the State of Tamaulipas. A man by the name of Sawyer, who had been a bachelor in that country, living a hermit's life, had accumulated some property and had come back to Oklahoma, I think, and had married and went back to Mexico there, and he was one that did not come out during the time we all came out. He remained down there. He had accumulated some property and had some Mexican laborers that worked for him and they found out he had money, and one Sunday morning they came to his house and demanded his money—so his wife tells me now—this is not of my personal knowledge; I saw his corpse later. Well he refused to give up the money and they shot him. They shot him in the stomach and she went to crying and begging that he give them the money that he had and he took the men out to a little outhouse and showed them where it was buried, and dug up a can, a 5-gallon oil can he had it in. He had about—if I remember correctly—$600 in American money and something like $1,500 or $1,800 in Carrancista currency, which was practically valueless at that time, so they took this money and he started back to his house and fell between this house and the main house, and his wife—they had threatened to kill her also—fled over to a neighbor by the name of Jeffreys, who lived about 200 yards away, and when she got over there Jeffreys was out of the house, looking after something in the field, and the children sent for him and he and his son took their guns and went over.

When he got over there these men were gone and Sawyer was dead in the yard. They had also threatened, so Mrs. Sawyer said, to kill all of the Americans in the country, and the women, if I remember right, there were only two Americans—three American women living in that section at that time—and she went into Tampico. I got there on Wednesday—this was Sunday morning—and the Mexican authorities would not permit the Americans to bury his dead body.

Senator SMITH. What reason did they assign, if any?

Mr. SCHULTZ. They said they had to have an inquest, and so on.

Senator SMITH. Was anybody ever punished for this killing, that you know of?

Mr. SCHULTZ. No, sir.

Senator SMITH. No one arrested for the killing?

Mr. SCHULTZ. No, sir. Now, on Wednesday, the day we buried this man, I was shown some Mexicans trading at a Mexican store whom Mr. Jeffreys assured me were the very men that had killed this man, and I went into Tampico and went to see Gen. Nafarrate and told him about what had occurred, and told him if he would furnish three or four men to go with us, with three or four of us American men, that we would take these outlaws in. He said, "We don't need your help." He said, "We are going to clean out on you damn Americans any way"; those were his words.

Senator SMITH. Who was he supposed to represent, the Carrancista government?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir; the Carrancista government. He was supposed to be the military governor of the State of Tamaulipas at that time, and his office was in a coach at Tampico, a railroad coach.

Senator SMITH. Instead of attempting then to arrest the murderers or aid you in trying to apprehend them, he made the response that you have just stated?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Did you ever receive any personal indignities at the hands of the Carrancista soldiers?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir; in the town of Xicotencatl, 12 miles east of me, between where I live and our railroad station; during this time I was going up to the Blalock Colony to assist some women and children out of the country. Conditions were then such that they looked like we would all be slaughtered, and Mexicans were just helping themselves to American property everywhere, and we were suffering, the people were, from indignities, and I was working to help get them out while I was in Xicotencatl, and passed by the jail—well, in Mexico they usually have soldiers' quarters with every jail. There was a bunch right alongside of the jail. Well, I suppose there were 25 or 30 Carrancista soldiers, or supposed to be, sitting on this bench. As I was walking by they began cursing the gringoes. When I got up right even with the first one they all arose and the first one spit on me, and the next one, and I passed right down the line, and, of course, I took it as a matter of course, and I spoke to them in as polite a manner as I knew how, and if there was one in the bunch that did not spit on me I did not see him. As I passed on a few steps small stones began to fall around me about the size of my thumb, and when I got further from the jail larger ones came, and when I got off about 40 yards they got as large as my fist and struck all around me, but fortunately none of them hit me.

Senator SMITH. Where were these stones coming from?

Mr. SCHULTZ. They were coming from this bunch of soldiers.

Senator SMITH. Being stoned by them?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir. And when I cast my eyes back these fellows were off the sidewalk out in the street, and they were engaged in quite a gale of laughter, and one man in the crowd, that I took to be an officer, I would not be sure about that—

Senator SMITH. What offense had you given these soldiers?

Mr. SCHULTZ. None at all; none at all.

Senator SMITH. It started, as you tell us, without you doing anything more than you have related?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Did you know a man named De la Rosa?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir; I knew him during the years I was first in Mexico. I met him frequently. Then when I was back in the country again in 1916 I met him in Victoria, the capital of the State of Tamaulipas, and I was on the drill ground and saw him. He was present when soldiers were being drilled and there was no mistake about his being De la Rosa, for I had known him before, and then a young man, an American that was raised in Victoria, whose father had been consular agent—his name was Evaristo Storms—knew him well, and we worked together.

Senator SMITH. Now what was he doing; what soldiers was he drilling?

Mr. SCHULTZ. He was drilling soldiers, I was told by a Mexican soldier, that they were drilling soldiers to invade the United States—Texas.

Senator SMITH. That was then after a good many raids had been made on the United States border?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir; a good many raids had been made the year before across the border.

Senator SMITH. Do you know anything about what was called the "Plan of San Diego"?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. And whether De la Rosa knew anything about it?

Mr. SCHULTZ. He was connected with it; he was connected with that plan.

Senator SMITH. Who was he supposed to be acting under at the time he was drilling these soldiers?

Mr. SCHULTZ. He was supposed to be acting under Nafarrate, and Nafarrate was Carranza's military governor of the State of Tamaulipas.

Senator SMITH. You saw him drilling these soldiers?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Did you ever have a conference with Mr. Nafarrate about the killing of this man you spoke about?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. You have already detailed what occurred and what he replied to you?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. As I understand you, Mr. Schultz, your conditions down there up to the revolution, or during the Diaz administration of Mexican affairs, that all these colonies, yours included, of which you had any knowledge, were living in security and peace?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Prosperous, most of them; I presume?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. What is the condition of all of those colonies so far as you know them now?

Mr. SCHULTZ. They are in devastation and ruin.

Senator SMITH. All of them?

Mr. SCHULTZ. All of them.

Senator SMITH. What has become of the people and their property?

Mr. SCHULTZ. They—the people that were interested with me—are nearly all in the United States. I can give you the address of some of them I know. W. B. Washburn lives at Lynndale, Tex., and William Lawler is at Blair, Okla., and the family of T. W. Worley is at McAllen, Tex., he is at work for an oil company at Tampico, and some of them I don't know what their present address is.

There are part of the parties that are dead. Let's see: Mr. and Mrs. Curry, J. H. Curry, they are at Blair, Okla., also, and their son-in-law, Barksdale, I have forgotten his first name, I think is at Blair, Okla., also.

Senator SMITH. As to the other colonists as far as you know?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Now in the Blalock colony—I was well acquainted with the people of the Blalock colony.

Senator SMITH. I know all about the Blalock colony. I was going to ask now about the Blalock colony before any trouble occurred.

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. You have known the condition of it since the trouble occurred?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Knew the condition of it in 1916 when I was back there.

Senator SMITH. What was it then?

Mr. SCHULTZ. The condition was bad at that time. Now, after the exodus of the Americans from the country, then when they went back many of them found their homes in ruin. My home was burned when I went back; it was in ashes; and a number of other homes were burned and stock stolen and practically nothing left. Those that did go back went back because we were assured both by the United States Government and by the Mexican Government that conditions were safe back there; that is what took them back, and what they had over there.

Try to get this picture in mind; people in that country had their homes and stock and that marvelous fertile land, raising everything they needed to eat and had everything in the world they desired; now to get a few days' notice to leave the country and to get together what they could get in a hand grip, notwithstanding the United States Government could not give them transportation out of the country. A number of people who were rich as kings over there to-day are paupers over here, and to-day are scratching out and eking out an existence.

Now, when conditions got so bad in 1916, and prowling bandits, prowling day and night, and Mexicans being killed, not only Americans, but Mexican people being killed and robbed, I went to Mr. Dawson, the American consul at Tampico, Clarence Dawson, and laid the situation before him and told him these people would have to have assistance to get out, and he said, "Are not these the same people that the United States sent out of here a few years ago," and I said "Yes," and he said, "What business have they back here," and I said, "Everything they got is here," and it took me and others repeatedly to prevail on him to give these people any assistance whatever to get out.

Senator SMITH. That was who?

Mr. SCHULTZ. The American representative down there.

Senator SMITH. The second exodus had gone back in the meantime?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. This was the second coming out; you had trouble getting transportation to get out?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir; and they were unable to get out without it. These people that had plenty down there, they went back to their places, had to put up little shacks they could live in until they could do better, and had planted crops, and cultivated crops, and had a little ahead to live, now came a second warning to get out of the country, and leave everything they had, and nothing to do on, which was a wretched condition of affairs, and some of these people, thinking that they could manage to get by, went to the hills and stayed awhile.

Senator SMITH. Hiding out?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. And watching their property the best they could?

Mr. SCHULTZ. The best they could.

Senator SMITH. Well, did you see any signs of returning peace in that particular country?

Mr. SCHULTZ. No, sir; none at all. Now, I look at it, while there are thousands of good Mexican people, and we were kindly treated by the people in the country—

Senator SMITH. Ordinary people?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Ordinary people of the country, but those that want stable government and peaceable conditions are powerless to achieve them, to obtain them in and of themselves. Now, one little point—Cesar Lopez de Lara, who was Carranza's commander in our section of the country, all the time before Carranza obtained the Presidency, and even afterward—he was the one that systematically robbed the Americans, foreigners, and all, he seemed to be no respecter of persons in that respect.

Senator SMITH. Robbery seemed to be his purpose.

Mr. SCHULTZ. Robbery seemed to be his purpose, and then after that he became president of the Federal district, I am told, of Mexico City.

Senator SMITH. Do you know anything about El Conejo?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir; I know about that ranch; that was over between where I live and the railroad. I would have to go by it. Mr. Hanson was the manager of it.

Senator SMITH. Capt. Hanson of the Texas Rangers?

Mr. SCHULTZ. He used to be, I think. I think that was the office he held. And then Mr. Merriman was manager after him. I am well acquainted with both of those gentlemen.

Senator SMITH. How about the orange grove they had there?

Mr. SCHULTZ. They had a beautiful orange grove of many hundreds of acres. I don't know how much. I have been over it, too. It is a big property, had irrigation canals and had hundreds of horses and mules and wagons on the place and employed hundreds of laborers. That was the condition when I was first in the country, and everything was prosperous. When I was back there the last time most of the orange trees had been destroyed; they had been pastured by the Mexican soldiers; the canal had been destroyed.

Senator SMITH. Fences destroyed?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Fences destroyed.

Senator SMITH. Were many of the orange trees destroyed by fire burning the grass?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Yes, sir; I noticed some grass had grown up between the trees and had been set on fire.

Senator SMITH. Now, that orange grove of which you speak, what sort of stock and farming implements of that character did the Americans take down there?

Mr. SCHULTZ. My colony?

Senator SMITH. Yes; and the one of which you spoke that Mr. Hanson was in charge of.

Mr. SCHULTZ. Mr. Hanson's people were better able financially to take in supplies that we were. It took about what means we had to buy our property. Why, they took down there good mules—I suppose 200 mules—I don't know the number—quite a number of good milk cows and hogs.

Senator SMITH. As to farming implements?

Mr. SCHULTZ. They took a number of wagons and cultivators, and then they took milling machinery for the making of sugar. We also took in a small outfit to make sugar, and when I was back there the last time I was over the ranch with Mr. Merriman and there were but very few orange trees living, and the banana orchard had been entirely destroyed, and most of the wagons Mr. Merriman told me had been carried away, and I only saw one wagon on the ranch the last time I was there in 1916, and I saw five or six carts, and Mr. Merriman informed me he had a Mexican carpenter there to make carts, as those soldiers would not carry off carts as they would wagons, and we did the same thing in 1916 when I was back there, and I employed Mexican carpenters to make carts and worked oxen to them because we could not keep horses or mules on the ranch.

TESTIMONY OF MR. B. H. ECK.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator SMITH. Mr. Eck, are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. ECK. I am.

Senator SMITH. What State were you born in?

Mr. ECK. Pennsylvania.

Senator SMITH. What is your business.

Mr. ECK. Contractor.

Senator SMITH. Railroad, do you mean?

Mr. ECK. I am a general contractor now. I have been a railroad contractor.

Senator SMITH. Have you had any experience as a railroad contractor in Mexico?

Mr. ECK. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. When?

Mr. ECK. In 1905, practically through to 1915. I am still a would-be contractor in Mexico; my contracts are there, but I am not.

Senator SMITH. Why is it you are not contracting in Mexico?

Mr. ECK. I have a contract with the Mexico Northwestern, but, owing to conditions, I am a resident of the United States now.

Senator SMITH. Do you know anything about that Cumbre disaster in 1914—February, I believe?

Mr. ECK. I do.

Senator SMITH. Please detail it.

Mr. ECK. The Cumbre disaster—Castillo, with 62 men, arrived at the base of the tunnel—the south end of the Cumbre tunnel—at about 10 o'clock in the morning—I forget the date; however, as a sort of revenge, he stated to those from whom I got the testimony. Gilmartin, superintendent of the road, had, according to his statement, promised him 8,000 pesos. He was not there to give it to him—could not get there to give it to him. Gilmartin and I were going there on a motor car. Gilmartin, the night before he left El Paso, stated to me he was going to give Castillo something to let the bridges alone. It so happened they completed the bridges, and that night the train got in and they started the passenger train the next morning.

I was packed and ready to go on the car; they came on ahead of me; I missed the Cumbre disaster two or three days afterwards when they found out about it, in charge of a rescue train. They had learned that the train and all of its occupants had been burned in the tunnel and all lost. Arriving there I learned the facts from about the only witness—real witness that was not interested in it—that this cattle train was backed in from the south end, and run back into the center of the tunnel. Both ends of the tunnel are masonry for about—in the north end—about 400 feet, and 200 feet the other end. Through some failure or other, or the intention of the engineer, they could not get that far enough to get to the timbers, and Castillo set it on fire. The timber is about 250 feet from the south end of the tunnel. The south end is masonry and the cars in there burned up and did no damage to it.

This passenger train, of which Castillo had no knowledge, came on, and about dusk reached the north end of the tunnel, and from the testimony of Able, a man whom I employed, and who was on that train, got off to go up to his home; he says he saw no smoke coming through the tunnel, and they entered the tunnel without there being any watchman there. However, when we arrived there we found that this train had run into this débris and fire, and presumably the material in front of them had set fire to the train. Evidently the wind had changed in current, and threw the smoke and gas the other way; and the whole 50 people were burned. When I arrived there with the fire apparatus it was impossible to get in there. We tried it for several days. The general superintendent then put me in charge of the work there, and I had four Americans.

We tried to get in there with tanks to put the fire out, and at last when we thought we could make the entry we four Americans got in there. When in about 3,200 feet we discovered the first body. In the center of that tunnel there is a rock space about 400 feet, without any masonry or timber. We found that some 20 people had grouped there—women and children—and we found the body of the road master; and the heat at that time was very intense. Finally we went in there and got those bodies; those bodies were laying there just cooked. Some of them were recognized. We got some of the Americans, and some we did not. Then our troops went in at Vera Cruz, and I was ordered out, and I came out on the rescue train.

Senator SMITH. What was the original cause of that disaster?

Mr. ECK. It was caused by desire of Castillo to get revenge on Gilmartin for not coming up with this amount of money.

Senator SMITH. That money was supposed to be given him for protection if he would protect the road?

Mr. ECK. If he would desist from burning the bridges. It had become necessary for the Northwestern and other companies there to pay out money to these bandits every once in awhile, to keep them from reburning the bridges, so they could run their trains.

Senator SMITH. That got to be a very common practice?

Mr. ECK. Yes, sir; I rebuilt bridges for a year. I would hardly get them built before they were burned again, and then they were rebuilt.

Senator SMITH. What was done at the mouth of this tunnel that caused this disaster?

Mr. ECK. The train was burned, you know; freight train, cattle train.

Senator SMITH. Burned in there?

Mr. ECK. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Set afire?

Mr. ECK. Yes, sir; set afire, and the passenger train ran into it.

Senator SMITH. What ever became of this man Castillo?

Mr. ECK. Why, he was brought over here and kept in custody at Fort Bliss for awhile and then released, I believe, by the immigration authorities.

Senator SMITH. Where is he now, do you know?

Mr. ECK. I don't know; but I understand from some of his friends, somewhere in New Mexico.

Senator SMITH. At this time?

Mr. ECK. At this time. I don't know that to be a fact.

Senator SMITH. Do you know anything about the execution of that 16—of this car of young men, including Bishop?

Mr. ECK. You mean the three, including my son?

Senator SMITH. Yes; how old was he?

Mr. ECK. Seventeen years of age.

Senator SMITH. Tell briefly how that occurred, and what was the cause of it.

Mr. ECK. Now, my son has been on a pleasure trip down in Galcana Valley, in September, and broke the car in passing through a stream. He came back to El Paso and reported to me that everything was clear down there, or apparently was. He had not had any trouble, and he asked me to take the little gears back, and put them in. I agreed he should do that if they would furnish him an American guide down there that could speak Spanish, as it was a trip about 75 or 100 miles horseback. They furnished him with a guide, a man named Bishop, a negro cook, and a Mexican mozo, named Cadena.

They started from Casas Grandes on the morning of the 19th, and camped at an oil point over beyond about 15 or 20 miles, right near the Chocolate Pass.

They left there on the morning of the 20th of October, and had gone about 8 miles, and met a gang in command of a man named Petrosino. It was a gang of ranchers and farmers, and two of the men had been in my employ for years, as I learned afterwards. They had then just been assaulting Chinamen, stealing cattle, and selling their hides, etc., and on this occasion they took them they notified them they were going to take up and execute them. My son seemed to have understood that from the statement of this Mozo, but Bishop told him no, he had been captured by them several times, and that they were not going to do anything, only just going to hold them for a ransom. They took them down to the end of the San Joaquin Valley, and passed up the canyon about 9 miles, and lined them up to execute them; at that time Bishop got scared and called Petrosino's attention to the fact that they must not do that; that my son had friends over in the railroad office over at Casas Grandes that would pay a ransom of $2,500 gold, and they talked the matter over, and they lined the Mexican up to shoot him, but the men would not.

The gang refused to shoot the Mexican; they said, "We are not paid to kill Mexicans." But when Bishop made this statement the answer from Petrosino was a bullet through the heart, and Karl attempted to get away and ran to the other side of the canyon to get on his horse, and they raced them with horses, and the evidence shown by his face, when I found him, he had been dragged perhaps a distance of 175 feet; his neck was broken, and the skin torn off the side of his head, and the negro had been handled in the same manner. They had not been shot; they evidently had been killed before they got them back there. He was stripped of all of his clothing and left there, and I found them afterwards on the 3d day of December.

Senator SMITH. Did you ever know what became of the parties that killed your son?

Mr. ECK. Yes, sir; I knew what became of part of them.

Senator SMITH. Were they ever arrested and held to account for it?

(The committee recessed until Wednesday morning, February 4, 1920, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.)

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
*El Paso, Tex.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to the call of the chairman, at 10.30 o'clock a. m., in the county courthouse, El Paso, Tex., Senator Marcus A. Smith presiding.

Present: Senator Smith and Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee.

TESTIMONY OF MRS. JAMES CARNEY.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator SMITH. What is your name?

Mrs. CARNEY. Mrs. James Carney.

Senator SMITH. Were you in the Republic of Mexico in the last few years?

Mrs. CARNEY. Yes, sir; I was in Mexico City altogether about 10 years; my husband was a contractor there.

Senator SMITH. Contractor in the City of Mexico?

Mrs. CARNEY. Yes, sir; he had stone quarries and paved streets; had contracts for paving streets and building material.

Senator SMITH. He got along very well and prosperous?

Mrs. CARNEY. Well, he made a fortune and lost it in about eight years in bank failures and mines; we lost $4,000 in mines in the State of Michoacan.

Senator SMITH. What became of your husband, Mrs. Carney?

Mrs. CARNEY. We came out and then went back in and he went over to Durango, went to a lumber company, superintendent of construction; the battle came on, then they were all ordered out, to get out of Durango to Mazatlan; they all walked overland, a hundred of them; they were divided in three groups. I was in Chihuahua at the time. They said they were overtaken by bandits and murdered. I did not get the true facts, and then they told me after he was taken off of the train—they told me he was mentally unbalanced from troubles, and from then on I have not heard a thing.

Senator SMITH. Your husband was where?

Mrs. CARNEY. In Durango.

Senator SMITH. When was that?

Mrs. CARNEY. That was in 1915, 1914-1915; I don't remember the date; it was in March. I got a letter from him about the 17th of March from Durango.

Senator SMITH. Maybe I can get the date if you can tell me who was President or claimed to be President at that time?

Mrs. CARNEY. Villa had taken Chihuahua and he was over in Durango fighting; I can not remember; I guess there was no President at that time—I mean proclaimed—I have had so many difficulties up and down I have forgotten.

Senator SMITH. What was your husband doing in Durango at the time you speak of?

Mrs. CARNEY. He went over there to be superintendent of construction of a lumber company, there in the city of Durango. They reached Durango all right, but had not gone to work. Then they had a battle and the Americans were all ordered out and there was no railroad, so they went on their way to Mazatlan.

Senator SMITH. How many Americans were there, do you know?

Mrs. CARNEY. I did not know the population. A number I know went out on the boat from Mazatlan to San Francisco. Of course, they were all robbed of everything they had. One young man was an Elk, and he telegraphed to his home, down in Virginia, and they sent him money, and he was the only one that escaped from that crowd. He is in Cuba at the present time.

Senator SMITH. How did your husband leave there; on foot, horseback, train, or how?

Mrs. CARNEY. On foot; they all went overland.

Senator SMITH. You don't know how many?

Mrs. CARNEY. No, sir.

Senator SMITH. Overland to where?

Mrs. CARNEY. Mazatlan.

Senator SMITH. How far was that?

Mrs. CARNEY. I think, 150 kilometers; I am not positive.

Senator SMITH. Did your husband get to Mazatlan?

Mrs. CARNEY. I don't think so; they say not.

Senator SMITH. Have you ever heard of him since?

Mrs. CARNEY. Not since I went to—I had transportation from that man in Juarez; what is his name; I have forgotten him.

Senator SMITH. Edwards?

Mrs. CARNEY. He was consul over at Juarez, and he gave me a note to the consul over at Douglas, but he was over at Nogales, and I did not get to see him; he referred me to Washington. I went to the west coast and could not hear anything. I came out through Chihuahua first, because the consul agent told me I had better come out and leave my name, and if anything happened he would inform me. I never did hear from my husband any more.

Senator SMITH. Then, so far as you know, after leaving Durango, he never got to Mazatlan at all?

Mrs. CARNEY. No; some of the others got out. They went in different groups, you know; went in different ways to Mazatlan. Some arrived all right and took the boat to San Francisco.

Senator SMITH. You say they left there because—why?

Mrs. CARNEY. They were ordered out, and the bandits had told them they would kill them if they did not leave, and there was no train out of there, and they all had to walk.

Senator SMITH. You say they were driven out by bandits. What bandits were they?

Mrs. CARNEY. Villistas. I went to the American consul in Chihuahua—I was there at the Hotel Robinson—and he told me there was no communication with Durango for 17 days, and my husband told me he was leaving Torreon on a hand car; the railroad was all cut out, and they were going on to Durango, and then the battle came on, and they went on west, and I never heard anything more.

Senator SMITH. Your husband, as long as he was living, was making yourself and him a good living and furnished you all you needed?

Mrs. CARNEY. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. What are you compelled to do now—what are you doing?

Mrs. CARNEY. I am working for the Western Union.

Senator SMITH. In what capacity?

Mrs. CARNEY. I collect and deliver messages for the Western Union.

Senator SMITH. You are compelled to do this for a living?

Mrs. CARNEY. Yes, sir; my money all ran out, and I could not get any more out of it, and I did not have any profession, anything like that, he always supported me.

TESTIMONY OF MR. CHRISTOPHER SEGGERSON:

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator SMITH. What is your name?

Mr. SEGGERSON. Christopher Seggerson.

Senator SMITH. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. SEGGERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Where were you born?

Mr. SEGGERSON. I was born in Chillicothe, Ohio.

Senator SMITH. Have you ever been in Mexico any?

Mr. SEGGERSON. Oh, yes; been a good deal in Mexico.

Senator SMITH. Where?

Mr. SEGGERSON. Oh, different places; I followed railroad work. I have been all over the country, in different places.

Senator SMITH. Did you have a son in Mexico in the last few years living there, working there?

Mr. SEGGERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Where was he?

Mr. SEGGERSON. Down in Chihuahua and different places about. He followed railroad work just the same as I did.

Senator SMITH. What became of him?

Mr. SEGGERSON. Why, he got killed over here at Juarez.

Senator SMITH. Over across the river here?

Mr. SEGGERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. How?

Mr. SEGGERSON. Villa's men, the revolutionists there, shot him.

Senator SMITH. Was he shot by these men intentionally, or was he shot in a battle that was raging?

Mr. SEGGERSON. No; he was shot in a battle, I guess, when the Villa bandits were taking Juarez, and he was shot in that battle; I suppose you would call it a battle; I don't know what else you would call it.

Senator SMITH. Anyhow he was killed there?

Mr. SEGGERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. You don't know by whom?

Mr. SEGGERSON. No; all I know was Mr. Villa's bandits when they went to take Juarez they killed him.

Senator SMITH. That was at the time of the Villa assault on Juarez?

Mr. SEGGERSON. Yes, sir; that was the time.

Senator SMITH. What was he doing there; was he driving?

Mr. SEGGERSON. Yes, sir; he was driving an automobile; it seems like somebody had telephoned him from this side of the river to come over there and get some passengers to come on back, you know, and he went over there and they shot him just as he was coming back.

Senator SMITH. Do you know how he was killed, with what sort of guns?

Mr. SEGGERSON. No, sir.

Senator SMITH. Were they using machine guns?

Mr. SEGGERSON. No; it was not machine guns; no.

Senator SMITH. Which battle of Juarez was he killed at?

Mr. SEGGERSON. Why, the first one, when Villa took Juarez; I guess that was the first one.

Senator SMITH. What year was it, do you remember?

Mr. SEGGERSON. 1913, I think; I believe it was in November.

Senator SMITH. What is your son's name?

Mr. SEGGERSON. Charles Christopher Saggeron, that was his full name; we always called him Charles Seggeron.

TESTIMONY OF MR. E. W. NEVILL.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator SMITH. Where were you born?

Mr. NEVILL. I was born in Texas—Galveston.

Senator SMITH. You are still a citizen of the United States?

Mr. NEVILL. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Where do you live?

Mr. NEVILL. I live now at Marfa.

Senator SMITH. Do you remember a raid on our side where your boy was hurt—killed?

Mr. NEVILL. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Will you tell the committee, if you please, what occurred there at that time; how your boy was killed, who did it, if you know?

Mr. NEVILL. Well, Mr. John Wyatt and I, we owned a ranch in there, about 35 miles south of Van Horn, on the river, bordering right along the Rio Grande; I was in charge of the outfit and had my son there; he was helping also, and a Mexican family—man and wife and three children—were with me.

Senator SMITH. What sort of business were you carrying on there?

Mr. NEVILL. Stock raising—raising cattle. So on the 25th of March, 1918, I was uptown—had been three or four days—and there was a patrol of soldiers out there on what I call the upper ranch.

Senator SMITH. What town was this you refer to?

Mr. NEVILL. Van Horn. That was my post office at that time. I got to talk to them that morning. They told me that they had understood there was a bunch of Mexicans in the country somewhere; that they had heard that they were going to raid somebody. They were 9 miles above where we were camped. I was separating calves from cows at that time, feeding them, and trying to get some weans; that was the only place we had where I could fence off in that place. I had gone uptown to pay bills, as I did about once a month. I went uptown to pay all the bills. When I talked to these soldiers they told me there was a bunch of Mexicans in there, and they were going to raid. I told them, then, to come on; that they had better come on down to the ranch; that I would be there that evening late; I told them it would be late before I could get there; I still had a little business to do that morning before I could leave. I went up horseback that morning; it takes quite a little bit to ride that distance. They said they would. I never thought anything more about it. I left town, as near as I can remember, about 10.30, and I rode on down.

Senator SMITH. In the morning?

Mr. NEVILL. Ten-thirty in the morning. I gets to the ranch just before sundown, or just about sundown, then this Mexican woman who was staying on the ranch, she had supper ready. I unsaddled my horse, put him in a little pasture, where I had a number of other horses that were fed, went on in the house and we ate supper. After we had finished, my son and I, Glenn, went into our room and sat down. I asked him if he had seen anything of any Mexicans, and he said he had not. I then asked him what the report was that the patrol of soldiers had, he said he did not know, that they reported a bunch of bandits, or bunch of Mexicans, he said they were going up or down the river, he or they did not know which. So we sat there possibly 15 minutes, and we heard the tramp of feet outside, and I supposed that it was this patrol that was coming down from the upper ranch. However, I got up and went out in the hall and looked through the screen, I saw that it was Mexicans, and they all came in; came in with the exception of five; came in and got behind the hen house; all ran right in there and immediately came out; as soon as they came out went to shooting at the house.

Senator SMITH. Without any words at all.

Mr. NEVILL. Yes, sir; without saying a word; just began to shoot right into the house.

Senator SMITH. How many of them were there?

Mr. NEVILL. The best I could get, I stood there and looked at them, I guess they shot three or four shots apiece, trying to make an estimate of what they were, and there was something like 50 of them.

Senator SMITH. Sixty?

Mr. NEVILL. Fifty. About 50 in all. So then I walked across the room, and I walked across to this hall and saw five more standing over there on the other side of the house with guns in their hands this way, waiting, I suppose, for us to come out there; the others were shooting over here this way. They were waiting for us to come out this door so they could kill us; so instead of going out I just walked back to this partition door that is into our room.

picked up my Winchester, my boy picked up his, while I was picking up my Winchester there was two shots fired at me standing in that door. They came through, neither one hitting me. I walked back to this door, and three of those Mexicans had slipped in behind the end of the house. When I went in, they shot in; they were shooting in through this wall. When I went in there there was one on each side; so they had lined up near the corner of the house. They were both aiming to shoot. Well, they emptied their guns; one of them, I think one shot twice, and the other one he emptied his gun and never did touch me at all. He was trying to shoot me in the head. I was standing there looking at them; when he was going to pull the trigger I just ducked out of the way and missed it; when he emptied his gun I had mine in my hand all the time; while he was reloading I went to shooting at them.

Senator SMITH. Did you kill any of them?

Mr. NEVILL. I think I did.

Senator SMITH. Did your boy lose his life there?

Mr. NEVILL. Yes, sir; when I went to shooting at those Mexicans I only got the two shots, when both of them, one right after the other, jumped in the air as high as they could and fell right over behind the house. Each time I shot they jumped as high as they could and fell over. So I went outside and kind of looked around the corner as well as I could to see if there was any of them in sight; they were not, so I called to my son to come on. There was a ditch down there, I guess 250 or 300 yards. I was trying to get to that ditch; we could not stay in the house, because those bullets came in through the walls just like paper, and I was trying to get to that ditch. As I started off I glanced around this way and saw my son turn to the right; he did exactly what I wanted him to do; I went straight off; I never thought but what I was going to be killed, but by him turning to the right I knew I was drawing all the fire, giving him an opportunity to get away; I had not gone far until they saw me; they all began shooting; they shot my hat off, and shot my rifle out of my hand three times; the last time I left it laying there; I got down in this ditch and stopped and looked back; I could not see my son; then crawled back and got plumb back on top of the hill. I was at the ditch on top of the hill, and looked back up that way; I did not see him; I supposed he got away and ran down in the hills, so I got in the ditch and ran down to this open place; did not see him; then I did not hardly know what to do. I thought possibly he had gone off through the country and gotten in some bushes, and ran around the other way, so I ran straight across this level place; when I got over there I hunted around there and could not find him, so I supposed then he had hid himself, and as soon as everything was over he would come out, and we would get together. I did the same thing, I hid, and after they ransacked the house, there were three of them took my trail, they followed me up and they prowled around there, I don't know how long it was, something like a couple of hours.

I saw one of them once; I heard them three different times coming back. They trailed me so far; then could not trail me any further because I mussed up my trail before I hid; I went so many different directions, and crossed back so many times they did not know where I had gone, but I could see them and hear them three different times. I could not get out of there to go back to the house until 3.30, when G Troop of the 8th Cavalry came up.

Senator SMITH. Three thirty that night?

Mr. NEVILL. Yes, sir; the next morning.

Senator SMITH. Three thirty in the morning?

Mr. NEVILL. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Then the United States troops came up?

Mr. NEVILL. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. How about your son?

Mr. NEVILL. When I got back at 3.30 I found that he had been shot all to pieces, several times; there was a hole in his forehead; you could drop a hen egg through this hole in his forehead; in fact, like it had been shot out. He had been beat with rifles and a stick, and he was black and blue all over; that is, all over his face and head.

Senator SMITH. How far did you find his body from the house?

Mr. NEVILL. His body was right within four feet of the house and about twelve feet from the door.

Senator SMITH. So they killed him as soon as he came out?

Mr. NEVILL. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Had you had any difficulty with these men, or know anything to cause them to come and shoot your place up in that way?

Mr. NEVILL. Never. Never had had a bit of trouble in the world.

Senator SMITH. Now, what was the condition of your house when you got back to it?

Mr. NEVILL. Well, everything in it was torn upside down, scattered all over the country, and everything gone; nothing was there except some empty boxes, empty trunks, some old bedsteads; everything else was carried away.

Senator SMITH. What became of the Mexican woman that was there at the time?

Mr. NEVILL. She was dead in the kitchen.

Senator SMITH. Had been shot?

Mr. NEVILL. Had been shot three times.

Senator SMITH. What became of the babies; did you see them after you returned?

Mr. NEVILL. Yes, sir; the three children were there in the kitchen; they were all alive. They had not been hurt.

Senator SMITH. The mother was killed?

Mr. NEVILL. The mother was killed; yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. What happened there then? Who were they? Who were they representing; do you know?

Mr. NEVILL. The band was made up of a bunch of these people that hang out along this border. They were not Carrancistas, they were not Villistas, they were not anything; whoever is in charge, whoever is in charge on the border at that time they are with. However, at this time they were Carrancistas.

Senator SMITH. Whoever had control of the border at that time?

Mr. NEVILL. They belonged to that bunch.

Senator SMITH. They belonged to the faith of whoever was in charge of the border?

Mr. NEVILL. Yes, sir. Just a few days before this happened, something like a week, I suppose, I was talking to five of them across the river, and they told me that they were Carrancistas at the time I asked them.

Senator SMITH. What date was this?

Mr. NEVILL. That I had the conversation?

Senator SMITH. What date was the killing at your place, shooting of your house?

Mr. NEVILL. The night of the 25th of March, 1918.

Senator SMITH. What became of this band?

Mr. NEVILL. As soon as they got through they went back across the river and tried to evade the soldiers by going over around the mountains, through the roughest trails they could find, but Col. Langhorne put two troops in there, and we got four or five, I think five cow men to go with them to do the trailing, and they trailed them up all over, and had a fight with them at Pilares, and several of them, I think, were killed.

Senator SMITH. Did Col. Langhorne at that time cross the border and follow the trail?

Mr. NEVILL. His troops did.

Senator SMITH. I mean his troops?

Mr. NEVILL. Yes, sir; went across the river right there at the house.

Senator SMITH. And they were trailed across the river?

Mr. NEVILL. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. How far did they go, do you know?

Mr. NEVILL. They must have gone something like 40 miles.

Senator SMITH. You don't know whether they overtook them or not, personally, you were not with them?

Mr. NEVILL. No, sir.

Senator SMITH. Had you had any previous assaults on your house at any time before that?

Mr. NEVILL. Not on the house before that, it was, I think, about the 12th of—I would not be sure, positive about the date, but I think the 12th of November, 1917, why there was a bunch of Carrancista soldiers came down the river from Juarez going to Ojinaga, and the next morning—they camped that night right back of my house, I could see the camp fires—

Senator SMITH. On which side of the river?

Mr. NEVILL. They were on the Mexican side, and I got on my horse after night and went over there and sort of took a bird's-eye view of the outfit; there was a lieutenant there and three soldiers that came down there out of G Troop; I came back and told him about it and sent him over on the hill; he wanted to go himself; I went with him up on the hill in order that he could see the camp fire; the next morning we got on our horses, standing under the hill about 3 or 4 miles below the ranch, and they saw us, and this man—I don't remember his name, I was trying to think of that this morning—he was in command: he stopped his troops and called one of his officers to him and told him to take 50 men and go over there and get those gringos, so I told the lieutenant what they were going to do; he thought not. it was not long until he changed his mind; he saw they were coming across; I let them come all right up within 75 yards of us; they had a machine gun thrown on us, we were on a hill; I let these fellows come up to within 75 yards of us before I said anything, and when they got close enough I just threw up my hand and told them not to come any closer, and we talked to them awhile.

We had hot words; they tried to make us come to them; we would not go—would not let anybody come to us and would not let anybody go to them. There was but six of us, so, finally I told them—I asked them what they wanted and who they were. They said they were Carrancistas. I told them, "Why don't you stay on your own side of the river; what was they doing on the American side?" He said they were after us. I said, "What do you want with us?" He says, "You come down here." I says, "I won't do it." Finally he pretended he thought we were Villistas; he asked me if we were Villistas. I told him that we were American citizens, my son and I, and these soldiers were recognized as being United States soldiers; therefore we could not be Villistas.

Senator SMITH. How many in your party?

Mr. NEVILL. There were six of us.

Senator SMITH. How many in the Mexican party?

Mr. NEVILL. There were about 50 of them; there were 30-odd came up to where I was. I did know exactly; I have forgotten. I let them come within 75 yards of us; the others stopped back a little bit farther, and there was about 15 or 18 stopped back a little bit farther. However, when they went back they drove off seven head of our cows that evening, and me hollering at them all the time.

Senator SMITH. Do you still live on the ranch?

Mr. NEVILL. Now, sir; I am living at Marfa; we had to sell that ranch and get away from there. They kept stealing those cattle. They still do.

Senator SMITH. You knew your life was in absolute danger while you were there?

Mr. NEVILL. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. That was the cause of your leaving?

Mr. NEVILL. That was the cause of my leaving. Now, in that raid those fellows carried off nine head of horses, and every bit of grub, and everything in the world they could take with them, and after that they came back and killed the cattle. That was the condition also after the Carrancista soldiers came down there. They came down there and worked within three miles of the river, and everything they could not drive off they killed.

Senator SMITH. You had then to abandon your ranch?

Mr. NEVILL. We had to abandon it; yes, sir. We sold out to Mr. F. A. Spence here, and he had to do the same thing.

Senator SMITH. He had no more security there than you did?

Mr. NEVILL. No more; he had to get rid of every cow he had and just simply abandon it.

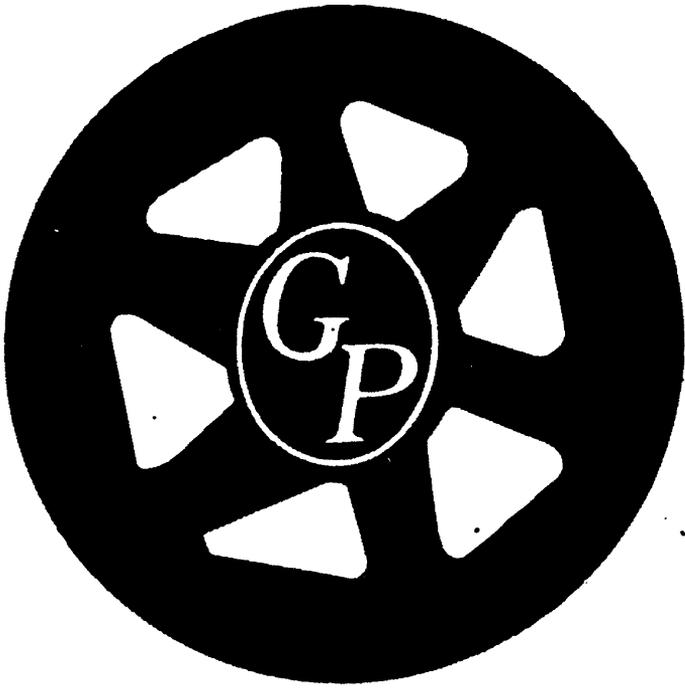

Senator SMITH. It is an abandoned ranch now, then?

Mr. NEVILL. It is to-day; yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. I believe that is all unless there is something else you want to say.

The committee finds itself this morning unable to proceed further on account of the absence of witnesses whom we feel should be introduced at this time in order to make a connecting story. I do not think we have any further witnesses to-day; therefore the committee will stand adjourned until to-morrow at 10.30 o'clock.

(The committee then, at 11.30 o'clock a. m., adjourned to meet at 10.30 o'clock a. m., Thursday, February 5, 1920.)

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
El Paso, Tex.

The subcommittee met pursuant to the call of the chairman at 10.30 o'clock a. m., in the county court room, courthouse, El Paso, Tex., Senator A. B. Fall presiding.

Present: Senator A. B. Fall and Senator Marcus A. Smith, and Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. C. D. WOOD.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Where do you live, Captain?

Mr. WOOD. Alpine, Tex.

Senator FALL. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. WOOD. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. A native of what State?

Mr. WOOD. Born in Tennessee.

Senator FALL. How long have you lived in Alpine?

Mr. WOOD. About eight years.

Senator FALL. Are you familiar with conditions along the border during the last eight years?

Mr. WOOD. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What has been the condition there in reference to law and order, or violence?

Mr. WOOD. I have been in the manufacturing business there for about seven years and down on the river country I never had any trouble until the Glenn Springs raid came on.

Senator FALL. General conditions had been quiet and peaceful?

Mr. WOOD. Yes, sir; so far as I am concerned.

Senator FALL. I mean conditions generally. I don't mean as to your personal experience.

Mr. WOOD. Oh, they have had stealing; cattle stealing.

Senator FALL. You speak of the Glenn Springs raid; when did that occur?

Mr. WOOD. The 6th of May, 1916.

Senator FALL. Were you present at Glenn Springs at that time?

Mr. WOOD. Not until about 2 o'clock in the morning.

Senator FALL. What occurred there?

Mr. WOOD. Why, I was at my ranch house until about 11 o'clock that night and I heard firing over at Glenn Springs; it woke me up.

Senator FALL. How far?

Mr. WOOD. About 3 miles by air line, about 4 miles by road.

Senator FALL. What did you do, if anything?

Mr. WOOD. I got up and went out on the gallery and listened for a few minutes; it sounded like quite a firing. I waited a little while; eventually I saw the lights of a big fire. There was a mountain between me and Glenn Springs, so then I decided it was a fire and I went over and woke up Mr. Montell. We armed ourselves and decided to go over there. Our idea was to get information and come back and give the alarm; but we went on over. It was a very dark night and we got lost, lost the trail, and it was about 2 o'clock when we got there.

By that time things were rather quiet. We heard Mexicans talking in the Mexican settlement, so we went on through that settlement and got down pretty close to the store and plant, light plant, I suppose about two or three hundred feet from it. We decided then that the soldiers had driven the bandits out. We went on, thinking everything was all right, so got about 100 feet from the store and I heard some horses eating corn. I said to Mr. Montell, I said, "They are horses." "No," he says, "I don't think so; I will go up and see." That was on a small hill about 30 or 40 feet away. He got up there and just as he got up to the top, why, a sentinel challenged him.

Senator FALL. In Spanish or English?

Mr. WOOD. In Spanish, "Quien vive." Mr. Montell says "Quien es." About that time the sentinel shot at him.

Senator FALL. "Quien es" means—who is it?

Mr. WOOD. That was his idea.

Senator FALL. That was in Spanish?

Mr. WOOD. Yes, sir; so he shot at him and he said, "Arriba muchachos;" in other words meaning for the other boys to get up, so we ran. The bullet the Mexican shot at us hit very close to me, so we ran up on the mountain about a quarter of a mile from camp and waited there until daylight and saw these bandits bring horses up to the store and pack them up.

Senator FALL. Packed them up with what?

Mr. WOOD. With the goods that were in the store that was operated by Mr. Montell; I had been a partner in the business. Along about 7 or 8 o'clock they went on down the road toward the Rio Grande to San Vicente.

Senator FALL. That is a little Mexican town on the Mexican side of the river?

Mr. WOOD. On both sides; well what is called Presidio is on the other side of the river.

Senator FALL. Were any Carrancista soldiers supposed to be at this town?

Mr. WOOD. At San Vicente?

Senator FALL. Yes.

Mr. WOOD. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Or on the other side?

Mr. WOOD. It was supposed to be Carrancista territory; it is known as Carrancista territory.

Senator FALL. These people crossed the river there?

Mr. WOOD. Yes, sir; they could not have remained in Glenn Springs.

Senator FALL. What did you do then; what occurred?

Mr. WOOD. After daylight we saw two men down below us. We motioned to them, they came up and they proved to be two soldiers; one of them had only his underclothes, no shoes, and his feet were badly torn.

Senator FALL. American soldiers?

Mr. WOOD. Yes, sir. He had taken his pants, I think, and wrapped his feet up. So we stayed there, the four of us, until we saw these Mexicans were going to leave and started back to Glenn Springs, down the valley, and we saw two more soldiers then; they were badly burned and one of them wounded.

Senator FALL. American soldiers?

Mr. WOOD. Yes, sir; so we six of us then went down into the light plant and we found Mr. Ellis there; he had just come in.

Senator FALL. Where had he been, if you know?

Mr. WOOD. He and his wife went to the hills; his house had been set on fire, the soldiers' quarters; he and his wife went back across this mountain and went to a neighboring ranch.

Senator FALL. They made their escape?

Mr. WOOD. Yes, sir. He left his wife there and got his car and took her to town. I met him there and we went on into town. We found three dead soldiers and the little dead Conklin boy. There was another little Conklin boy, deaf and dumb, that they did not hurt.

Senator FALL. Why did they not hurt that boy, if you know?

Mr. WOOD. I don't know; I understand they don't kill the deaf and dumb.

Senator FALL. They have something of the Indian superstition?

Mr. WOOD. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether these raiders were followed across the river?

Mr. WOOD. This was Friday night the attack occurred, and Saturday there was a relief of this detachment of soldiers, eight more came down in a truck, and this truck took the dead and wounded back to Alpine, the railroad station, and then Sunday civilians and two soldiers came in and then Monday a lot of civilians and a few soldiers went down to the Rio Grande and San Vincente, to Mr. Deemer's store. I came back Monday afternoon to the railroad and I met a troop of soldiers on the way down. I think they went down and crossed the river.

Senator FALL. You did not go with them?

Mr. WOOD. No. On Monday we found two dead Mexicans that had been thrown under the chaparral bushes. We took them and burned them; that is, I did. One of them held a commission—had a commission on his body as Jefe de Armas—a Constitucionalista's Government commission.

Senator FALL. Jefe de Armas, of the Consitucionalista's; you mean the Carranza Government?

Mr. WOOD. That is what the commission stated—Consticionalista's Government.

Senator FALL. Who was it signed by; do you know?

Mr. WOOD. I do not know.

Senator FALL. Do you remember the name on the commission?

Mr. WOOD. I did; but it was turned over to Capt. Cole, of the military authorities.

Senator FALL. Capt. Cole was in command of the troops that went in there?

Mr. WOOD. Yes, sir; the troop was stationed at Alpine.

Senator FALL. The only dead that you know of was the Conklin boy and the three soldiers?

Mr. WOOD. And the two Mexicans.

Senator FALL. One of the Mexicans had his commission on him?

Mr. WOOD. Yes, sir; he was supposed to have been a captain.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether there were ever any Mexicans arrested by the Mexican authorities or in any way punished for this raid?

Mr. WOOD. No, sir.

Senator FALL. You never heard of any such occurrence?

Mr. WOOD. No; a colonel—a Mexican colonel and three or four soldiers were captured by some Americans at the Boquillas mine—that is just right across the river in Mexico. This colonel and his squad fired on these Americans—about eight—that took this truck down into Mexico, and that night, about 15 or 20 miles from the border, they took charge of these Mexican soldiers, and disarmed them and put them back across the river.

Senator FALL. What became of them?

Mr. WOOD. They were sent to the penitentiary.

Senator FALL. In this State?

Mr. WOOD. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. But, so far as you know, the Mexican Government made no attempt to punish anyone for this raid, robbery, and murder up to this time?

Mr. WOOD. No, sir; I never heard of it.

Senator FALL. You would likely have heard of it, if it had occurred?

Mr. WOOD. Very likely. The American horses taken over there were returned.

Senator FALL. What about the other property—loot, taken from the store?

Mr. WOOD. I never heard of it.

Senator FALL. You spoke of going down to the Deemer store, did you not?

Mr. WOOD. Yes, sir; I did not go down; the soldiers and civilians went down.

Senator FALL. Do you know anything about what occurred at the Deemer store—who owned it?

Mr. WOOD. It was absolutely looted, I understood; nothing left in it. It belonged to Mr. Deemer.

Senator FALL. Where is Mr. Deemer?

Mr. WOOD. I don't know; I think he is in New Mexico, or Arizona, somewhere.

Senator FALL. Do you know anything about the killing of a man by the name of Deemer down there—a son of this man that owned the store, or a relative?

Mr. WOOD. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you know of any other occurrences along the border since that time in the nature of raids, attacks on soldiers, or our soldiers going across the border?

Mr. WOOD. Only by hearsay.

Senator FALL. You have heard of several occurrences?

Mr. WOOD. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Personally, you don't know anything about them?

Mr. WOOD. No, sir.

Senator FALL. From what you have heard, conditions along the border have not been very settled or peaceful?

Mr. WOOD. No, sir.

Senator FALL. They have been otherwise than settled and peaceful?

Mr. WOOD. Yes, sir; it is very dangerous to be there without soldiers, as a rule, if you have property.

Senator FALL. It is still dangerous to be there, unless you have a guard?

Mr. WOOD. I would so consider.

Senator FALL. You would not want to stay there without soldiers guarding you?

Mr. WOOD. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Those conditions exist at the present time?

Mr. WOOD. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. That is in the State of Texas, United States of America?

Mr. WOOD. Yes, sir.

TESTIMONY OF MR. CREED TAYLOR.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Where do you live Mr. Taylor?

Mr. TAYLOR. I live now at Marfa, Tex.

Senator FALL. What is your business?

Mr. TAYLOR. In the Customs Service.

Senator FALL. Do your duties compel you to be along the international boundary between Mexico and the United States in the vicinity of where you live?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What is your district?

Mr. TAYLOR. My district is the Big Bend district from Green River to the Pecos.

Senator FALL. How long have you been in that district?

Mr. TAYLOR. I have been there three years.

Senator FALL. What have been the conditions along the international boundary on this side during the last few years as to violence, or as to peace and quiet?

Mr. TAYLOR. It has been violent; very unsettled.

Senator FALL. Do you know of any particular instance of violence, raid, robbery, or disturbances occurring on this side of the river—boundary?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes; I know of some.

Senator FALL. Well, suppose you mention some you have in mind; some instances?

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, the Brite raid, I have heard of the Brite raid and also the Neville raid and also the Petit raid and the raid made at the Cleveland ranch in 1908.

Senator FALL. You speak of the Petit raid, about what time did that occur?

Mr. TAYLOR. That was along about the 13th of day of May, 1918.

Senator FALL. The Petit ranch is situated in the State of Texas on the American side of the international boundary?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What occurred at that place?

Mr. TAYLOR. The Mexicans came in there and drove off a bunch of cattle.

Senator FALL. Where did they go with the cattle?

Mr. TAYLOR. Why, they went in the direction of Las Vacas.

Senator FALL. Where is that?

Mr. TAYLOR. That is just across the river from Del Rio.

Senator FALL. Were they followed by anyone from this side, do you know?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir; the United States troops followed them.

Senator FALL. What troops?

Mr. TAYLOR. Col. Langhorne's troops.

Senator FALL. Where were you when these troops went across?

Mr. TAYLOR. I was with the troops and went across with them.

Senator FALL. Where did you go?

Mr. TAYLOR. We went to Picateria, about 40 miles into Mexico from the border.

Senator FALL. In the interior?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. How did you happen to go?

Mr. TAYLOR. We followed this trail where they had carried the stock.

Senator FALL. It was a plain trail; you could follow it?

Mr. TAYLOR. It was a plain trail; you could follow it.

Senator FALL. Did you overtake the raiders, or find any of the stolen property?

Mr. TAYLOR. No, sir; when we got to Picateria there was a big rain that washed out the trail; we could not follow it out any farther; we found we could not trace it any farther from Picateria and the troops turned back.

Senator FALL. In what jurisdiction is Picateria and Las Vacas; that is, what faction?

Mr. TAYLOR. That is Carrancista territory.

Senator FALL. Have they troops anywhere in that territory?

Mr. TAYLOR. Why, they have some troops there near Boquillas; that is above this place.

Senator FALL. That is above the Petit ranch?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. About how far?

Mr. TAYLOR. I suppose about 50 miles.

Senator FALL. Have they any other troops in that vicinity?

Mr. TAYLOR. None that I know of.

Senator FALL. Do you know of any effort being made by the Mexican authorities to return this stolen stock, or apprehend the robbers?

Mr. TAYLOR. No, sir; I do not.

Senator FALL. You have heard of none?

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, after they carried the stock to Las Vacas I understand they notified the owner of the cattle if they would come down there and identify the cattle and pay a bonus of $10 a head they would return the cattle to this side.

Senator FALL. Who notified them, do you know?

Mr. TAYLOR. Some of the Mexican authorities at Las Vacas.

Senator FALL. The civil authorities?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Notified Mr. Petit, the owner of this stock?

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Petit and Mr. Moore.

Senator FALL. If they would come down there and identify the cattle and pay $10 a head they would let them come back to this side?

Mr. TAYLOR. Let them come back to this side.

Senator FALL. State what occurred about their return; what did Petit do?

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Petit did not do anything. He figured that after he went down there and paid this penalty on the cattle, and passed them back to this side, and paid the freight on them back home it would be more than the cattle were worth, and thought it was best to just let it go as it was.

Senator FALL. Did anyone else get any cattle back, stolen during that raid?

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Cleveland; he paid the penalty of $50 on his cattle and got them released.

Senator FALL. How many were they?

Mr. TAYLOR. About five head.

Senator FALL. Paid $10 a head?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Gold or Mexican money?

Mr. TAYLOR. He gave them a check for $50.

Senator FALL. That meant $50 gold?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. He got his cattle back?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Who delivered them to him; do you know?

Mr. TAYLOR. These Mexicans that had driven the herd off.

Senator FALL. The Mexicans that drove them away?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did he give them a check?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir; he made a check out to this capitan, the man in authority.

Senator FALL. Who was this capitan, and what did he claim to be?

Mr. TAYLOR. Claimed to be river guard under the Carranza Government.

Senator FALL. River guard under the Carranza Government?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. He had the cattle?

Mr. TAYLOR. He had the cattle.

Senator FALL. You say he paid it to the men who had driven them away, or this river guard, for the stock?

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, this river guard is the man he gave the check to.

Senator FALL. And he had possession of the cattle?

Mr. TAYLOR. He had possession of the cattle, and also agreed to release Petit's cattle at the same price, but Petit offered to give him a check for his cattle; he would not accept the check, stating he could not handle any more checks; said he would accept cash.

Senator FALL. How far was that from Marfa?

Mr. TAYLOR. From Marfa it is about 130 or 140 miles.

Senator FALL. So this capitan who had possession of them—those stolen cattle—after accepting a check for $50, said he could not handle any more checks?

Mr. TAYLOR. No; could not accept any more checks.

Senator FALL. He wanted cash?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. So Mr. Petit let it go?

Mr. TAYLOR. He did not have the money, saying he would have to go to town to get the money to pay it, and by the time he would have gone and got back they would have been gone with the cattle. They did not agree to hold them until he got back.

Senator FALL. Has he ever gotten the cattle back?

Mr. TAYLOR. No, sir.

Senator FALL. They would not surrender them except on payment of the cash—$10 a head, gold?

Mr. TAYLOR. No, sir.

Senator FALL. About how many cattle were stolen from that ranch?

Mr. TAYLOR. Twenty-eight head.

Senator FALL. Now, you spoke of many disturbances. Do you know where the Granger brothers' ranch is?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir; their ranch is right next to the Petit ranch, farther out from the river, about 30 miles.

Senator FALL. Do you know anything that happened to them after the raid of the Petit ranch?

Mr. TAYLOR. They lost about 60 head of cattle.

Senator FALL. When was that?

Mr. TAYLOR. That was last year, about July or August.

Senator FALL. Where did the cattle go; do you know?

Mr. TAYLOR. No, sir; I do not. They went across the river. I don't know where they went to.

Senator FALL. You don't know whether the same Carrancista bunch got them or some one else got them?

Mr. TAYLOR. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Have you ever heard of them being returned?

Mr. TAYLOR. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you know of any effort being made by the Mexican authorities to return them?

Mr. TAYLOR. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Or arrest or punish those who stole them?

Mr. TAYLOR. No, sir.

Senator FALL. You spoke of something that occurred at the Cleveland ranch, as I understand; what occurred there?

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, the customs officers lost a bunch of horses.

Senator FALL. Do you mean the American customs officers?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir; September, 1918.

Senator FALL. 1918. What became of those horses?

Mr. TAYLOR. They were driven across the river into Mexico.

Senator FALL. Are they still there, do you know?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir; they are still there with the exception, I believe, of four head delivered back to this side.

Senator FALL. Who delivered them?

Mr. TAYLOR. There were two put across the river the next night after they were carried over; they appeared on this side. I don't know who released them. Then there was one horse delivered to Inspector Neill at Presidio last year.

Senator FALL. By whom?

Mr. TAYLOR. By the Mexican officials there at Ojinaga, and there was one horse that was ridden on this side by a Carrancista captain at Polvo, and captured by our customs inspectors.

Senator FALL. The others, you don't know where they are, I presume?

Mr. TAYLOR. No, sir; I do not.

Senator FALL. With the exception of returning the two horses, do you know of any effort being made by any Mexican authorities to apprehend the robbers or return any other horses?

Mr. TAYLOR. No, sir.

Senator FALL. They did not apprehend or punish any of the thieves?

Mr. TAYLOR. No, sir; not that I know of.

Senator FALL. But one of the horses was ridden on this side by a Carrancista officer?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. The horse was identified on this side?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And so was the officer?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Have you ever seen any of these horses since; or know anything about who is riding them or using them?

Mr. TAYLOR. No, sir; I have not.

Senator FALL. Do you know of your own personal knowledge, or by good hearsay, in that immediate vicinity of any other occurrence since 1910?

Mr. TAYLOR. No, sir. Nothing except little, petty thefts.

Senator FALL. What are the conditions there with reference to safety of homes, life, and property on this side?

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, it is unsafe.

Senator FALL. Still in that condition?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Why?

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, the Mexicans on the other side, they are coming across all the time carrying stock off and molesting property on this side.

Senator FALL. They come from the Carranza jurisdiction?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Territory?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. None of them have ever been punished for any depredations on this side?

Mr. TAYLOR. None that I know of.

Senator FALL. The secretary calls my attention to what is known as the Bill Russell raid in April, 1918, do you know anything about that?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir. Mr. Russell lost some cattle in April, 1918, below Presidio, that is cattle. I was with the military people when they trailed this stock to the river; where it crossed the river.

Senator FALL. You mean with the United States military forces?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did they attempt to cross the river?

Mr. TAYLOR. No, sir; they did not cross the river.

Senator FALL. Turned back?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Has any of that stock been recovered?

Mr. TAYLOR. None that I know of.

Senator FALL. Has anyone ever been punished for the offense?

Mr. TAYLOR. I don't think so.

Senator FALL. Has any attempt ever been made to capture and punish the thieves?

Mr. TAYLOR. None that I ever heard of.

Senator FALL. They followed the trail that went to the river where they would go into Carranza territory?

Mr. TAYLOR. Carranza territory; yes, sir.

TESTIMONY OF MR. GROVER WEBB.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Mr. Webb, are you an American citizen?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Of what State are you a native?

Mr. WEBB. Texas.

Senator FALL. What is your business?

Mr. WEBB. I am inspector of customs.

Senator FALL. What is your district?

Mr. WEBB. Big Bend district, twenty-fourth district.

Senator FALL. Where do you live, where do you stay?

Mr. WEBB. Presidio, Tex., station.

Senator FALL. You are in the United States service?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Does your business require you to be in the Big Bend district along the boundary, international boundary?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Between the United States and Mexico?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. How long have you been there?

Mr. WEBB. I have been in the Customs Service three years. Been in the Customs Service two years, and volunteered in the Army and served in the Army along in the Big Bend in the Corps of Intelligence police, and since I have been out I have been in the Customs Service again a year.

Senator FALL. Where did you live in 1915?

Mr. WEBB. Marfa, Presidio County, Tex.

Senator FALL. Then you have been familiar with this district at least since 1914?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. The greater portion of the time in the customs or military service?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What are the conditions in this district in the State of Texas—on the American side of the boundary line, of course—as to law and peace and order and safety, or violence and disturbances?

Mr. WEBB. It is violent, unsafe.

Senator FALL. The American citizens doing business in that district, do they have any assurance of safety unless guarded by the military or other armed forces?

Mr. WEBB. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Who or what faction of Mexicans are in control across the international boundary in Mexico?

Mr. WEBB. The Carrancistas.

Senator FALL. Have they any soldiers, customs guards, or other guards presumably there to preserve law and order?

Mr. WEBB. They have soldiers and customs guards over there.

Senator FALL. Well, do they preserve order, do you know?

Mr. WEBB. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Well, why don't they preserve order, do you know?

Mr. WEBB. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Do they try?

Mr. WEBB. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you know where Hancock's ranch is?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; above Alpine, Tex.

Senator FALL. Are you familiar with it?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; I know where the ranch is.

Senator FALL. Do you know anything about a raid on that ranch in 1915 or at any time?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; along about that time there were seven, I believe, seven head of horses stolen off that ranch.

Senator FALL. Do you know what went with them, whether they were stolen by people on this side; I mean, were they thieves from this side?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; I think they were stolen by Mexicans around Alpine and were carried to the other side of the river.

Senator FALL. Stolen by local thieves on this side?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; I think probably some of these Mexicans were formerly Mexican citizens over there, and when they got ready to go back they stole these horses and carried them back to the Mexican side.

Senator FALL. Were any of those horses ever recovered, so far as you know?

Mr. WEBB. No, sir.

Senator FALL. They were not followed across the river by any of our armed forces?

Mr. WEBB. No, sir.

Senator FALL. But they were followed to the international boundary?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You heard Mr. Taylor testify, did you, as to the loss of the inspector's horses?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Are you familiar with that?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; I was there.

Senator FALL. The circumstances are practically those which Mr. Taylor, the former witness, detailed?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Have you ever seen any of those inspectors's horses since they were stolen?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where?

Mr. WEBB. I have seen one of them in Ojinaga, and on the 1st day of January, this year, the customs inspector Spence and Lieut. Palmer they arrested Capt. Doroteo Aguilar, out of the Eighty-third Regiment; he came to Presidio with one of these horses.

Senator FALL. And came across the international boundary?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; came over armed with one Mexican soldier and one river guard; they were all three arrested and disarmed, this captain had one of these horses.

Senator FALL. He was riding him?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You say you saw one of these horses at Ojinaga?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Ojinaga is in the Republic of Mexico?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; military headquarters.

Senator FALL. Carranza's military headquarters?

Mr. WEBB. In his district.

Senator FALL. When was it you saw this horse there?

Mr. WEBB. The first time I saw him was some time in September.

Senator FALL. Of last year?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; I have seen him this year; about three weeks ago I saw the horse again.

Senator FALL. Has he any brand or marks on him by which you could identify him?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What are the brands or marks on him?

Mr. WEBB. He has an "O U" on the left side.

Senator FALL. Who had him? In whose possession is the horse?

Mr. WEBB. He is in possession of the commanding officer there, Gen. Joaquin Amaro.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether the general knows where that horse came from?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; I went over there and tried to get him to turn him over to me, and told him it was our horse, and we identified it. He refused to turn him over to me, he said he had bought the horse, said I might have him by paying 300 pesos for him, $150 gold.

Senator FALL. Whose property was this horse?

Mr. WEBB. He belonged to inspector Howard Allen.

Senator FALL. Personal property?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Now, this horse taken from this captain coming over on this side, what became of it?

Mr. WEBB. He was turned over to us, and he is being held at the present time by me to be returned to the inspector, who he belongs to.

Senator FALL. Being held by you?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir. I have him down there waiting to send him to the owner.

Senator FALL. Has any demand been made for his return to the other side of the river?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; they filed a claim for all three of the horses, this horse also.

Senator FALL. Who filed the claim?

Mr. WEBB. Gen. Cordona filed the claim through the Mexican consul at Presidio for him.

Senator FALL. So they not only retained the horse they have on the other side, but they filed a claim to get back those you were fortunate enough to recover on this side?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You have not given him back yet?

Mr. WEBB. No, sir; and do not intend to.

Senator FALL. What answer was made to this official demand by the Mexican consul for these horses; what answer was made by the Americans, if any?

Mr. WEBB. I referred the matter to the collector of customs here, he wrote me to see the Mexican consul down there and see if he would agree to turn the horse that they had in Ojinaga back in exchange for the two horses that really belonged to them, which the general refused to do.

Senator FALL. That is, when you seized this one horse from this captain, he had two soldiers along with him, who had Mexican horses?

Mr. WEBB. They had Mexican horses.

Senator FALL. So you took them all?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You made the proposition if the general in command would return the stolen horse you would return the two seized horses?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Was that suggestion acceptable?

Mr. WEBB. No, sir; he turned it down.

Senator FALL. Do you know anything about what is known as the Brite raid?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where were you at that time, or shortly after?

Mr. WEBB. In Marfa, Tex.

Senator FALL. Where did you go from Marfa?

Mr. WEBB. Col. Langhorne sent me out from Marfa, I was familiar with all of that country, and all the trails, as guide with the troop that went to this Brite ranch and followed this band into Mexico.

Senator FALL. How long after the raid was it before you reached the ranch?

Mr. WEBB. We reached the ranch just shortly after the bandits had left there; they were in sight of the ranch, just going off the rim rock.

Senator FALL. Did you follow them?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where to?

Mr. WEBB. We followed them into Mexico.

Senator FALL. Across the International boundary into Mexico?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. How many military troops?

Mr. WEBB. Along with me there was a troop, and then from Ruidosa one troop and from Candelaria one troop, there were two troops sent up the river, and also one above from what is known as Evett's ranch. They arrived at the river where these bandits crossed before we did, so they crossed ahead of us.

Senator FALL. Were the bandits overtaken?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Were you there?

Mr. WEBB. No, sir. The troops from Candelaria and Ruidosa got to the bandits before we did.

Senator FALL. Do you know in whose command those troops were that overtook the bandits?

Mr. WEBB. Col. Langhorne.

Senator FALL. Their captain or lieutenant?

Mr. WEBB. Capt. Sprinkle was in command.

Senator FALL. Did you follow the trail?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you reach the scene of the engagement?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; we got to where they had had this first engagement; when we got to where they had the first engagement we could hear them still firing up in the mountains; we went on to them; it was almost sundown when we got there, still firing.

Senator FALL. About how many Mexicans were there in this raid?

Mr. WEBB. I judge about 30 or 35, probably more.

Senator FALL. Were there any casualties during the engagement, on the other side?

Mr. WEBB. I did not see any dead Mexicans on the other side, but the party that engaged them, the soldiers that engaged them before we got to them, said there was about 18 dead; it was dark after I came back from the battlefield. I did not see any dead Mexicans.

Senator FALL. Looking over the ground around the Brite ranch, when you reached there, did you find any bodies there?

Mr. WEBB. There was one body found at Brite's ranch; there was a mail carrier, Mick Wells, killed in the store over at Brite's ranch; he was hung, and his throat cut in the store. About 400 yards beyond the ranch there were two dead Mexicans; been killed out of the mail coach approaching Brite's ranch; out about 2 miles there was a Mexican found partly buried; he was one of the raiders that had been killed.

Senator FALL. Could you identify him by his uniform or clothing?

Mr. WEBB. He had a coat on, part of a Carranza officer's uniform.

Senator FALL. The body had been partially buried?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; there was a gully there; they just laid him in this gully and caved the banks in on top of him.

Senator FALL. You saw the body of Wells?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You say his throat was cut?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where he had been hung?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; they just threw a rope over the rafters in the store, and it looked like one drew him up while the other one cut his throat, and wiped the blood off on his shirt, and let him fall right there in his own blood.

Senator FALL. What other evidences of a fight did you find there; was there any arms, swords, pistols, or guns—anything of the kind?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; where they came off what is known as the rim rock, it is pretty steep there, we followed them over this rim rock, down in the hollow, and practically made them drop all of their loot from their saddle horses and pack horses and there was a coat and sword found as if some Mexican had been shot off his horse, or seriously wounded; there was a coat there as that of a Carranza officer; also a sword I saw picked up.

Senator FALL. You say they made them drop their loot. What did the loot consist of, do you remember?

Mr. WEBB. Consisted of various things out of the store, dry goods, groceries.

Senator FALL. What was the date of that raid?

Mr. WEBB. December 25, 1918, Christmas Day.

Senator FALL. I neglected to ask you. You know Chico Cano?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir. I know of him, I have seen him.

Senator FALL. Where did you see him last?

Mr. WEBB. It has been about three years since I saw him last in San Antonio, Mexico. I was on this side of the river, I saw him just across the river.

Senator FALL. Have you any means of knowing what his official employment is, if any?

Mr. WEBB. At the present time is a captain of a bunch of scouts located in about Barrancas and San Jose.

Senator FALL. You say he is a captain, under whom? Who is he operating with?

Mr. WEBB. With the Carrancistas, that is the report.

Senator FALL. Do you know Ranger Cox?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Have you had any conversation with him recently about Chico Cano?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. In reference to Chico Cano's employment?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What did the ranger tell you?

Mr. WEBB. He was over in Ojinaga about two weeks ago, such a matter as that, and he saw Chico Cano, and his band there in Ojinaga, he said he was there for pay day, being paid off.

Senator FALL. That is in Ojinaga, and it is the military headquarters for Carranza in that district?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And the ranger says he saw Chico Cano there with his band being paid off?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. About two months ago?

Mr. WEBB. About two weeks ago.

TESTIMONY OF MR. E. M. WADSWORTH.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. You are a citizen of the United States?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where do you live?

Mr. WADSWORTH. El Paso at the present time.

Senator FALL. What is your business?

Mr. WADSWORTH. United States customs inspector.

Senator FALL. Are you familiar with the boundary line below El Paso, the international boundary between the United States and Mexico?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. How long have you known of it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was raised on it, 33 years.

Senator FALL. How long have you been in the United States service?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Seven years this month, the 22d day.

Senator FALL. Where have your duties been performed?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Big Bend district.

Senator FALL. Until you moved to El Paso?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. When did you come to El Paso?

Mr. WADSWORTH. October 5.

Senator FALL. This last year?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. During the last few years and up to the present time, if you know, or up to October of this year, what are the conditions in Texas, on this side; that is, the United States side of the boundary line in the Big Bend district, in reference to violence, or peace and safety?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, along the Rio Grande where I have been stationed it is mighty poor on account of Mexicans.

Senator FALL. These conditions have not been safe for American citizens?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Have not been safe.

Senator FALL. Either for their lives or property?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Both?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you know Inspector Sitters?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir; my first river guard was under Mr. Sitters; he was the inspector in charge.

Senator FALL. Did you know Ranger Hulen?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you know what has become of Sitters and Hulen? Are they alive or dead?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They are dead, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you know anything about the circumstances of their death?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, yes; I could tell you some. About May 24, 1916, they were waylaid by Mexicans from Mexico, at a point about 7 miles from Pilares, a little old place on the Texas border, and it is about 7 miles from the river where this killing happened. Sitters and Hulen were both killed there. There were five in the party; three of the party escaped unhurt.

Senator FALL. What was the circumstances of their killing, as you learned; you say they were waylaid?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir; I learned from the other boys that got away. There was Mr. Charlie Chaighead, Trollinger, and Sug Cummings, they camped within about 5 miles of the river at a water hole for the night. That night they heard some horses going by their camp; the colts were nickering. They could hear Mexicans talking. They sort of raised up to see what they could see, still afraid to get up; that is, to get out there and see what it was. They waited until daylight; at daylight they went up and looked over the ground. There were tracks of horses that went by their camp pretty close, with ropes dragging. Mr. Sitters being in charge ordered the men to saddle up, and had the mules packed up, and put their mules where they thought they were at safety, and they followed these tracks. These tracks finally led into a big, sharp canyon. Mr. Sitters put his field glasses on them in this canyon and saw some horses up against the bluff. Mr. Sitters he told Charlie Craighead, Trollinger, and Cummings to go straight into the canyon, and Mr. Hulen and himself would go up on top of a little hill, and look if anything was to happen they could see what happened.

When they separated a few minutes afterwards the firing began, the shooting started, and the boys there—that is, Charlie Craighead, and Trollinger, and Cummings—they never could see what had become of Mr. Sitters and Hulen any more; they had to hustle their way out of there the best way they could, and they walked back to where they left their pack mules, and they had to get on their mules' bare back, and rode to a ranch—the old Bill McGee ranch—from there they fixed up a note and sent it by a Mexican to John Poole's ranch. John Pool got in his car and came to Mr. Luke Brite's ranch and phoned to Marfa for help. I happened to be in Marfa at the time; there was a posse of 11 of us left Marfa in an automobile and came to Mr. Pool's that night. He had horses saddled; we got to the McGee ranch where the boys were that night about daylight. They told us all about how they were waylaid; they said Mr. Sitters and Hulen were both killed, they believed. So we started to where this waylaying happened, went in a round-about way to get into the canyon, afraid they were laying still another trap for us, and looked over and saw where the shooting happened, and finally found both bodies, Hulen and Sitters's bodies, and Mr. Sitters's horse dead. The other horses—saddle horses—the outlaws took them with them.

Senator FALL. In what condition was Sitters's body?

Mr. WADSWORTH. He was in very bad condition, looked like; it not only looked like, but he was. I was right there. I helped to put him on a pack mule myself. He was lying on his back in sort of a cramped position; looked like he died in great agony, his knees drawn up, cramped up, his hands and fingers like that, drawn up over his face; you could see where his flesh had been knocked off his knuckles with rocks; his left eye in his head had been caved in. The rock was laying a little bit to one side; I judge it weighed about 20 pounds. He had 11 bullet holes in his body; that is, we could find out he had 11 bullet holes in it for the simple reason the body was in very bad shape—about 34 hours from the time of his death until he was found.

Senator FALL. The body was mutilated?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Was the trail of these assassins followed?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir; they were followed to the Mexican line, not by the posse. We went after the bodies, however. Their clothes were off of them; they took their boots—the best part of their clothes they took with them, rifles, six-shooters, watches, all the money they had.

Senator FALL. You say when they passed camp they had colts nickering and ropes dragging; what was the object of the ropes dragging?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They knew the boys were camped there, the outlaws; they were afraid to do anything that night, afraid they could not win; by driving near by there with ropes dragging, they knew Mr. Sitters, being an old inspector there, he would get up the next morning and follow this trail into this canyon where the outlaws would have this trap laid for him to kill him.

Senator FALL. This impression made upon yourself, and the other officers, that it was a deliberate plan to assassinate these men?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. How many, if you can estimate, was in that gang?

Mr. WADSWORTH. According to the other inspectors that came out of the affair they said there must have been about 25 or 30, but according to the tracks that we saw there the next day there must have been 25 or 30.

Senator FALL. Now, do you know or have you any source of information as to who was in charge of that band of assassins?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, sir; only just from hearsay.

Senator FALL. What kind of hearsay?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Pretty good hearsay; people living right there on the border, such as Kilpatrick for one, and Jose Benton, that lived at Shafter, he was at Ojinaga about a month afterwards; he went over there to buy some cattle, and he met up with an old man named Zapata; he was one of these rāiders living across from Pilares; and old man Zapata made his brag over there. He had a family, his sons were in the bunch; he had about four sons working with the Cano ring, the Cano brothers there.

Senator FALL. What Canos?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Chico Cano, Jose Cano, Manuel Cano.

Senator FALL. Where is Chico Cano now?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Chico Cano is across from Pilares now, and Jose Cano—there are only two living.

Senator FALL. What is his business?

Mr. WADSWORTH. He is a thoroughbred outlaw.

Senator FALL. You don't know whether he holds or has held any official position on the Mexican side of the line?

Mr. WADSWORTH. He holds on one side—Villa side, and then he holds with the Carranza side. If one side won't have him, why he goes with the other side.

Senator FALL. Common rumor is that Chico was one of the raiders of this band of assassins?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir; and I know it from several pretty good Mexicans that live on the border there; he made his brag there that he would not be satisfied until he got Joe Sitters's scalp.

Senator FALL. Sitters was an officer?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Had he ever had trouble with Cano?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir; several times he was waylaid by the Cano outfit; one time he had Chico Cano a prisoner at the time he was waylaid, that was on the 23d day of January, 1913, and that is when Jack Howard was killed and Harvis was wounded.

Senator FALL. Did he lose his prisoner there?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir; they were all addled at the time Mr. Jack Howard was shot down, as well as when Mr. Sitters was shot also. He could not do anything, they were all addled, and Mr. Harvis was shot in the leg. Mr. Harvis was the only man that could hold the ground to keep from all three being murdered. Mr. Howard died the next evening at 7 o'clock. Mr. Harvis was in the hospital here in El Paso for 30 days.

TESTIMONY OF MR. A. J. KING.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Sergeant, are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Of what State are you a native?

Mr. KING. Illinois.

Senator FALL. Where do you live now—where are you located?

Mr. KING. Marfa, Tex.

Senator FALL. What is your business?

Mr. KING. Sergeant of the Ranger Force under Captain—

Senator FALL. How long have you been with the Ranger Force?

Mr. KING. It will be two years in June.

Senator FALL. Are you familiar with the conditions in Marfa, in the Big Bend district?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. How long have you been familiar with that district?

Mr. KING. I lived there in that district since 1897.

Senator FALL. What are the conditions that exist there at the present time, and what have they been for the last few years, with reference to law and order, violence, etc?

Mr. KING. It has been very unsafe for a period of years for Americans on the border to live there. Their ranch is liable to be robbed at any time, or they murdered.

Senator FALL. What is the reason for your unsafety; why is it that you or the Rangers can not maintain order there as you do at other places in Texas?

Mr. KING. It seems to me that the greatest trouble is that the so-called government, Mexican Government, employ Mexican outlaws to fill the official positions in Mexico, and, of course, they are the fellows that do most of the raiding and stealing and murdering on our side and we get no cooperation from the Mexican Government, nor with the local officials.

Senator FALL. The local officials on our side?

Mr. KING. No; on the Mexican side; and they do not cooperate at all.

Senator FALL. What becomes of parties who commit depredations on this side—where do they go?

Mr. KING. They go into Mexico.

Senator FALL. And when they get into Mexico, do you mean to say they are sanctuary with the Mexican Government, they won't arrest them or attempt to turn them over to you, or cooperate with you?

Mr. KING. Not at all.

Senator FALL. You have no authority to cross the boundary line?

Mr. KING. Only when United States soldiers go.

Senator FALL. They are only authorized to go on a hot trail?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. The Texas rangers have no authority themselves to go across?

Mr. KING. No, sir.

Senator FALL. You know of any recent depredations down there?

Mr. KING. There was a store looted at Ruidosa, called the Baldwin Ranch Store, last month. It belonged to Mr. T. D. Baldwin, I believe it is. I think they took about $80 worth of provisions and stuff from his store and threatened his life if he did not send them over some tobacco on the other side. It seems it was a little bunch of those Cano bandits that lived across from Ruidosa.

Senator FALL. You saw Cano, can you identify him in any other way?

Mr. KING. He is a captain under the Carranza reign and has a band of about 35 men under him, I understand.

Senator FALL. That Chico Cano?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir; Chico Cano. His men work with him; they came over and robbed the Baldwin store.

Senator FALL. Were they followed?

Mr. KING. They were not; no, sir. A few days later one came back and was standing outside of Mr. Baldwin's place armed with two 6-shooters and a rifle, trying to get Mr. Baldwin out of the store so he could kill him, when two of our men rode up and arrested this Mexican, and they started down the river with him and his crowd on the Mexican side saw it and five of them came across to the Baldwin store and talked with some of the folks there and found out what had happened to their friend and they said they were going down and kill the rangers and take the man away from them. They followed our men, and I think it was a few miles below the store they got into shooting range and they began to fire on them and this was the first they knew they were being followed. The prisoner was handcuffed on horseback and began to run on the horse and I think one of our rangers shot at him and thought he had killed the prisoner and whirled to fight off the Mexicans, and after firing 40 or 50 shots they ran the Mexicans off and went to find their supposed dead prisoner and he had gotten away. They had evidently shot close to the horse's ears and the horse threw him and he got into Mexico.

Senator FALL. What date was that?

Mr. KING. I think about the 20th of January or the 21st.

Senator FALL. This year?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir. This year.

Senator FALL. Who were these men, these five men that crossed the river from the Mexican side to this side and followed the rangers?

Mr. KING. I do not know their names.

Senator FALL. But the men themselves were identified.

Mr. KING. Yes, sir; absolutely identified by Mr. Baldwin, he knew every one of them and people that worked for him.

Senator FALL. Did they belong to any command which you know on the other side of the river?

Mr. KING. I think a number of them were in Chico Cano's band. They also robbed a threshing machine they had there and stripped it of everything. They even took the bolts and carried them off with them.

Senator FALL. Then the terror and the violence and murder, or attempted murder on this side of the river had not only continued for several years past, but has continued up to at least the 21st day of January of this present year?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And you say you received no cooperation from the Carranza authorities on the other side in attempting to apprehend the ones that do these things?

Mr. KING. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Have they ever turned over to you any man you demanded or any man you followed?

Mr. KING. Never have. They promised to turn over a man last year that had committed a killing down below Presidio and he ran across the river and went to Ojinaga and the commanding officer there finally agreed to turn him over to Capt. Gray and Gray went down there to get him and he stayed on the bank of the river all day long waiting for him and he never did deliver him and he is still over there.

Senator FALL. Have you ever, yourself, or have efforts ever been made by yourself and other officers of the law to secure cooperation?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you know of any efforts being made by yourself, you have made efforts to secure the cooperation of the Carranza officers?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. They have been unavailing entirely?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir; absolutely.

Senator FALL. I think that is all; very much obliged to you. What were the Rangers names that were in charge of this prisoner?

Mr. KING. Dykes and Woodland.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether or not they will be here?

Mr. KING. I have made arrangements for Mr. Dykes to come in this afternoon, or as soon as he can get here.

TESTIMONY OF MR. J. F. TIGNER.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. You are a citizen of the United States, Mr. Tigner?

Mr. TIGNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Of what State are you a native?

Mr. TIGNER. Louisiana.

Senator FALL. Where do you live now?

Mr. TIGNER. Marfa, Tex.

Senator FALL. Marfa, Tex.?

Mr. TIGNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Are you familiar with the Big Bend district near Marfa and along the international line—border?

Mr. TIGNER. Fairly well, Senator.

Senator FALL. What is your business?

Mr. TIGNER. Cattle raising business.

Senator FALL. Where is your ranch?

Mr. TIGNER. I have two places, one pasture near Marfa and another pasture near the river. I have owned this last place since 1909, until last August, when I sold it.

Senator FALL. What have been the conditions near the river, your river place, with reference to law and order?

Mr. TIGNER. Very little law and order there; considerable deprivations.

Senator FALL. Can you give us any instances of violence along the border around your place?

Mr. TIGNER. There has been considerable number of stock stolen and taken across the river.

Senator FALL. When was that, Mr. Tigner?

Mr. TIGNER. They began in 1917 and continued up until now.

Senator FALL. Have you ever been able to recover any of the stock?

Mr. TIGNER. No, sir; but I got pay for five head at one time.

Senator FALL. Who paid you?

Mr. TIGNER. That was paid through—I got that pay through Col. Langhorne, and it was paid by the Mexican consul, Mr. Garcia here.

Senator FALL. Col. Langhorne was the United States commander of the troops along the border until recently?

Mr. TIGNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. From whom you desired pay for five head?

Mr. TIGNER. Yes, sir. Five head taken out at one time.

Senator FALL. Who runs your ranch, who lived there and run the ranch?

Mr. TIGNER. At that time Mr. P. D. Dyke was foreman.

Senator FALL. Have you had any other foreman?

Mr. TIGNER. Yes, sir; shortly after that—a Mexican foreman I had from the time I owned the land until December 1, 1917, until he was killed, for a period of about nine years.

Senator FALL. How was this Mexican foreman killed—he was killed?

Mr. TIGNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Under what circumstances?

Mr. TIGNER. He and I and some soldiers from Troop K of the Eighth Cavalry followed a trail of some cattle across the river and we were close to some ranch houses——

Senator FALL. On the Mexican side?

Mr. TIGNER. Yes, sir; on the Mexican side, and we were ambushed right at this house; fired on from the bushes by a bunch of Mexicans just as we approached this building.

Senator FALL. What occurred—was anyone hurt by the firing?

Mr. TIGNER. Yes, sir; one soldier killed and another one wounded and I believe a second one slightly wounded.

Senator FALL. And this foreman of yours?

Mr. TIGNER. He was killed.

Senator FALL. At that time?

Mr. TIGNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What was his name?

Mr. TIGNER. Justo Gonzales.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether he was an American citizen or not?

Mr. TIGNER. I think he was.

Senator FALL. You had always known him on this side of the river?

Mr. TIGNER. Yes, sir. He was raised there in Indio; he was 58 or 59 years old when he was killed.

Senator FALL. Anything happen to you at that time during that firing?

Mr. TIGNER. Nothing in the way of violence. The horse I was riding I believe was killed—four horses were killed.

Senator FALL. You don't consider your horse being killed under you violence?

Mr. TIGNER. He was not killed from under me; he was shot near me. We were all on the ground at that time.

Senator FALL. Did you recover any of the cattle?

Mr. TIGNER. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you ever get any pay for them?

Mr. TIGNER. No pay for that—these cattle had been slaughtered. We were over there two different days. These cattle were stolen one night, and we crossed the river, and I happened to be down there at that time. I do not live on the ranch. I got the report at noon that the cattle had been taken out the night before, and I telephoned to Col. Langhorne at Marfa asking for assistance. He instructed me to go to Indio, about 8 miles from my ranch; that he would have some soldiers there all ready to go with me and follow the trail. I had my man to go with me, and we followed it down the river, as we had done it so many times.

Senator FALL. That wasn't the first time?

Mr. TIGNER. No, sir; not by any means. So I went to the river in my car and found Lieut. Matlack—at that time he was a lieutenant—he was in command of the troop. He had horses and a horse ready for me, and we immediately left and met my man at the bank of the river where we saw plainly where the cattle had gone across, as that was the first real warm trail I had found, and I told Capt. Matlack I would like to have him go across. Before that I had to be called from Marfa by telephone.

Senator FALL. The trail was cold?

Mr. TIGNER. Yes, sir. A few days before that, I think three days before, we had followed six head to the river that had been stolen out the night before, and I had some troops with me that time, but this was a different captain—a troop from Riudosa—and he told me he could not follow the trail across, as they did not appear they were fresh enough; for that reason he would not go across, but if I would go across and could find a trail and figure it out he would back me up.

Senator FALL. He would remain on this side for you to go across, and he would protect you?

Mr. TIGNER. Yes, sir. I went across with the Mexican foreman. We could not make it out very plain on the other side; they were then about three days old since we had followed them. We stayed there an hour or two, but there had been some goats and things that had gone across, and we came back, and that very night we followed the next bunch.

Senator FALL. You say you sold the ranch?

Mr. TIGNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. When?

Mr. TIGNER. August, last year.

Senator FALL. It was a good ranch?

Mr. TIGNER. Yes, sir; very good for the purposes it was used in that country.

Senator FALL. Have any particular reason for selling it?

Mr. TIGNER. Yes. We had so many depredations committed on it and it was hard to keep men out there, and they were stealing from us all the time and the people never knew when they would be overpowered and they would take all they had.

Senator FALL. And you was disgusted with it?

Mr. TIGNER. Yes, sir. They were getting worse all the time and they were getting bolder and taking more cattle.

Senator FALL. You thought if your Government could not protect you in peace and enforce the law, it was time you turned it over to somebody else?

Mr. TIGNER. I did not complain—I had no complaint to make of the Government, as far as the soldiers and State officers were concerned. They did the best they could.

Senator FALL. They did the best they could?

Mr. TIGNER. Yes, sir; they aided me the best they could.

Senator FALL. I meant no reflection on either the local officers or the military officers. That is all, I believe.

(The committee then, at 11.45 o'clock a. m., adjourned to meet at 2 o'clock p. m.)

AFTER RECESS.

The subcommittee met pursuant to recess.

Present: Senator A. B. Fall and Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee.

TESTIMONY OF MR. SAM H. NEILL.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Mr. Neill, are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Of what State are you a native?

Mr. NEILL. Texas.

Senator FALL. Where do you reside?

Mr. NEILL. Marfa.

Senator FALL. What is your business?

Mr. NEILL. In the ranger service.

Senator FALL. How long have you been in the ranger service?

Mr. NEILL. About two years now.

Senator FALL. What was your business prior to that?

Mr. NEILL. Customs Service.

Senator FALL. How long were you in the Customs Service?

Mr. NEILL. Pretty near four years.

Senator FALL. Where were you located in the performance of your duties in the Customs Service?

Mr. NEILL. Well, in the Big Bend district.

Senator FALL. Where have your duties as ranger carried you during the last two years principally?

Mr. NEILL. Why, it has been in the Big Bend District between—I have been lower down than Polvo, and up as far as what is known as Pilares.

Senator FALL. Do you know the country in the Big Bend District on this side of the international line, that is, in Texas, thoroughly?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you know the people living in that district?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir. On this side?

Senator FALL. Yes, sir; on this side.

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What has been the condition on this side during the last five or six years as to law and order, or violence and disorder?

Mr. NEILL. It has been mighty bad.

Senator FALL. In your official—in the performance of your official duties, have you, as a peace officer and as a customs inspector, have you had your attention called personally to specific instances of violence in that district?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. I will ask you if you know the Brite ranch?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where is the Brite ranch?

Mr. NEILL. Right south of Valentine, 18 miles, in Presidio County.

Senator FALL. Do you recall any act of violence at the Brite ranch within recent years?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. When was it?

Mr. NEILL. In 1917, on Christmas night.

Senator FALL. Where were you at that time?

Mr. NEILL. I was there at the ranch.

Senator FALL. How far is that ranch from the international boundary line?

Mr. NEILL. It is about 20 miles--25 miles.

Senator FALL. From the boundary?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What were you doing there at that time?

Mr. NEILL. I went out there to spend Christmas with my daughter-in-law and my son.

Senator FALL. What was your occupation at that particular time?

Mr. NEILL. Well, right at that very time I wasn't doing anything; I hadn't for four or five days. Mr. Jackson knows I came up about two days later and was sworn in the customs service.

Senator FALL. You had gotten out and went back?

Mr. NEILL. I was just out a few days.

Senator FALL. What occurred there on Christmas Day while you were there?

Mr. NEILL. Why, on Christmas morning the place was surrounded when we got up, by a bunch of bandits.

Senator FALL. Tell the story in your own way, go right ahead and tell us exactly what occurred in your own language, without my asking questions.

Mr. NEILL. Well, I got up that morning; the women folks claimed they wanted to get up early, so I have always been an early riser, and I got up and went into the kitchen for my coffee; my breakfast was always coffee, that is all I ever eat, and started me a pot of coffee, and I came back in his room, my son's room, to make a fire. They had no kindling—we were then surrounded by these fellows, but I didn't know—I take the basket and went to the woodpile, about 60 yards from the house, and got the kindling and made the fire. I went back to the woodpile again and got other kindling and made one in my wife's room.

Senator FALL. You were not disturbed?

Mr. NEILL. Not bothered at all; they allowed me to get out.

Senator FALL. You didn't see anyone?

Mr. NEILL. I didn't see no one; I was not dreaming of anything.

Senator FALL. You say the women told you they wanted to get up early; were there any children in the house?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. About how many?

Mr. NEILL. Five.

Senator FALL. They were going to celebrate Christmas Day?

Mr. NEILL. Christmas Day. They fixed up their little old Christmas tree that night.

Senator FALL. They had fixed up the Christmas tree the night before?

Mr. NEILL. The night before.

Senator FALL. And were going to celebrate Christmas Day with the children, and wanted an early start?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir. When I got back to the kitchen the coffee was ready, the cook had come in and fixed a cup of coffee. I turned from the stove and set in the window drinking the coffee, when I looked down the Candelaria Road, coming from the river, and I saw six men abreast, riding fast. I looked at them for a few seconds and I called her attention to it, and she looked and stepped back a moment and says, "What can that be?" I says, "I don't know." As they come around two big circular tanks, about 300 yards long—

Senator FALL. Dirt tanks?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir. As they come around below the lower tank I saw them reach and pull their guns. I dropped the cup and saucer and run through his room.

Senator FALL. Your son's?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir. He was still in bed; I hollered and says, "We are surrounded by bandits and have got to fight." I doubled in my wife's room and got a gun, a six-shooter—

Senator FALL. You mean your rifle?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir. And as I got out in the corner of the yard—this Mexican that hollered what he did—he hollered in Spanish, of course, he hollered to his men—that was the first I knew there were any others there—and jerked his horse up, and he hollered at his men to kill all the Americans. And as he said it, I shot, and he didn't, of course, holler no more.

Senator FALL. Did you shoot up in the air?

Mr. NEILL. No. They just rode up—

Senator FALL. You shot at him?

Mr. NEILL. I shot at him. When he hollered that they jumped from behind the walls and tank dumps like a bunch of quail flushed from behind adobe walls. Everything except a big shed is adobe walls, even the corrals.

Senator FALL. And from behind the tank embankments?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. About how many were there?

Mr. NEILL. The best I could figure, about 45. That is, we counted them as they rode away from the store and we counted 30 that rode off from the store. When the shot was fired it sounded like it busted, everyone shot.

Senator FALL. It sounded like the earth had burst?

Mr. NEILL. I thought so, at least from the way the bullets were whizzing. I fought them from the corner of the house. I only got in three shots until I was knocked down.

Senator FALL. How were you knocked down?

Mr. NEILL. By a bullet.

Senator FALL. Where did it hit you?

Mr. NEILL. Across the nose, you can see the sign of it. I didn't try to get to fight any more; I made a dive for the corner of the house and fought them from that corner until they finally was cutting off on me and I had to quit and I got inside. After we had whipped them to where we couldn't see nothing to shoot at any more; they wasn't shooting, of course, because they were afraid to stick their heads out from any place. There was two Mexicans that went out to milk when I went into the kitchen; they come in for vessels and went out to the cowpen to milk. There is an adobe house that made one corner of the fence—that is the wall they walked behind, this house—and these fellows were in there and this six hadn't made their appearance yet; they knew nothing about anybody there. They captured these two boys that milked and done the chores around the ranch and held them until after they seen that they couldn't whip us, or thought that, and they sent one of them in the house and asked us to surrender. We told them no, it was a fight to a finish. We knew or thought what they would do with us if we did surrender, and they said if we didn't surrender they would bomb the house. We told them to tell them to fly at it and we got all that jumped from behind the house.

Senator FALL. You told them to fly at it?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir. They sent word and told us, told him to tell us, if we wouldn't shoot more they wouldn't; all they wanted was the saddle horses and to get in the store. We wasn't going to do that. My wife put in and advised him—he was foreman of the ranch, had been for the last 16 or 17 years—she told him, "There ain't but two of you boys and lots of them, they will get you after a while; you better agree to that." He finally did, and no more shooting took place at the house. But during that time, while they were in the store, they had out sentinels, two Mexicans, that were behind a tank dump about a quarter of a mile from the house on the Candelaria Road, the way the stage run, and Mickey Welsh come along with two Mexican passengers and they shot at them.

Senator FALL. Two Mexicans?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. They killed the Mexicans?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir. They brought him to the store; he sat in the hack about two hours; they were there five and a half hours. They finally taken him inside, but we never dreamt of his being killed until after they had gone.

Senator FALL. How far was the store from where you were, and the house?

Mr. NEILL. About 150 yards. And they taken him inside and hung him and cut his throat. When we got help the Mexicans were about 2½ miles from the ranch.

Senator FALL. Leaving?

Mr. NEILL. Just hitting the foot of the mountains.

Senator FALL. Now, Mr. Neill, you say that—you used the word "we" several times, plural; who do you mean?

Mr. NEILL. Me and my son—only two there, Van Neill—T. T. Neill.

Senator FALL. Your son, T. T. Neill?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where was he while you were outside?

Mr. NEILL. He had three rooms to watch to keep them out of the house, and I had five—two on the south side and three on the north side. He was in this room with his family and mine; of course, most of his time fighting through the window.

Senator FALL. Shooting through the window?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. About how long did this shooting between your son and yourself, on the one side, and these Mexicans upon the other, continue?

Mr. NEILL. It lasted about 30 minutes; maybe longer.

Senator FALL. Now, was it during the firing—the shooting between yourself and the Mexicans—that this hack drove up, or after the armistice was declared?

Mr. NEILL. After we had done compromised with them, that the shooting took place on the road below the ranch.

Senator FALL. And they stayed around there four or five hours?

Mr. NEILL. They were there, from the time we knew anything about them being there, five and a half hours.

Senator FALL. What did they do, if anything, besides murder Welsh in his store?

Mr. NEILL. It was the worst tore up place you ever saw; they packed off everything they could. They packed out lots of stuff they never did get on the pack mules or horses at all.

Senator FALL. Why?

Mr. NEILL. They just couldn't pack all they got. I got it and put it in sacks. They just couldn't get it on the mules and horses they had.

Senator FALL. Were you wounded again at all during the fight?

Mr. NEILL. I was shot through this leg slightly.

Senator FALL. The right leg?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Was your son wounded?

Mr. NEILL. No, sir.

Senator FALL. What happened to any of these Mexicans?

Mr. NEILL. Well, we punished them all we could is all I can tell you.

Senator FALL. Well, about what did that punishment consist in, as near as you can figure it out?

Mr. NEILL. Well, I couldn't say. The first shot I shot I killed the one that I shot at. He was right agin the yard fence, and he was a Carrancista captain, recognized by half a dozen people in Marfa. They were whipped by the Villistas at the time at Ojinaga and taken to Marfa by the troops.

Senator FALL. By our troops?

Mr. NEILL. And transferred up here and put into Juarez. Part went through and into the outlaw bunch and made that raid.

Senator FALL. Let's see if we catch that. That was a Carrancista captain, and at least some of his men were Carranza soldiers, whipped out of Mexico by Villa at Ojinaga?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. They took refuge on this side to secure themselves from Villa?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir; when they came over they were whipped over.

Senator FALL. They took refuge with the American military forces, who protected them and brought them to El Paso?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And turned them loose here and allowed them to go across to Juarez, which was Carranza territory at that time?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And from there they made their way back toward Ojinaga, and the same people were those who made the attack, or some of the same people?

Mr. NEILL. Some of the same.

Senator FALL. Including the captain you killed, some of the same people brought through this country, released and turned back, and came back and killed Welsh and engaged in this fight with you?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Were there any other Mexicans killed, do you think?

Mr. NEILL. Why, I couldn't say. There was quite a number packed off; they might have been just wounded.

Senator FALL. How many were packed off?

Mr. NEILL. Well, there was four that—we had no time—the postmaster that was there—I said there were only two, which there was, because he never interfered at all; he said it looked more like a moving picture to him than anything else.

Senator FALL. Where was he?

Mr. NEILL. He was in a house built close to the store.

Senator FALL. He didn't engage in the fight?

Mr. NEILL. No, sir; he had a good rifle, and a good shot, and plenty of ammunition, and his wife and little boy in the house with him. They were with their backs to him and he could shoot in the bunch after we whipped them. He and his wife is the ones that was—that seen and told about how many were packed away.

Senator FALL. They said there were four?

Mr. NEILL. There were four packed off from there. And there was from one to two men with each man that was packed off, except one, he was just strapped on the horse like a dead hog; that is the man we found; the captain. He is the only one we did find.

Senator FALL. He was found how far from the ranch?

Mr. NEILL. About two miles and a half.

Senator FALL. Partly buried?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. He was the man that had on the Carranza coat?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir. They had their bugler with them.

Senator FALL. Did he sound the bugle?

Mr. NEILL. No; we didn't give him time.

Senator FALL. How is that?

Mr. NEILL. We didn't give him time to blow any bugle, after we found they were there.

Senator FALL. And this gentleman who saw it thought it was a kind of moving picture?

Mr. NEILL. Yes; he said it looked more like that than anything else he compared it to.

Senator FALL. How did it strike you during those 30 minutes?

Mr. NEILL. Well, it was pretty squally, the way I looked at it. That is a little bit the closest place I have ever been in.

Senator FALL. Well, now, when they finally left, this band finally left, where did they go?

Mr. NEILL. Right straight back over the mountain, as Webb testified this morning; right where they came over the mountain.

Senator FALL. Going back toward the international boundary line?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Were they followed?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Who followed them?

Mr. NEILL. Troops from Marfa. Mr. Webb, as he testified this morning, he was a guide and the trailer that followed. Several others, civilians that went with them, followed them across the river.

Senator FALL. You didn't go across the river?

Mr. NEILL. No, sir; I was a little bit sore; I didn't want to ride.

Senator FALL. What about their horses—did they get the horses?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Made you agree to let them have the horses?

Mr. NEILL. They took these Mexicans they had prisoners—they captured; that worked on the ranch—and made them go with them to get the horses.

Senator FALL. How many horses did they get?

Mr. NEILL. Twenty some odd.

Senator FALL. Mostly saddle horses, or stock horses?

Mr. NEILL. Saddle horses.

Senator FALL. Were the horses ever recovered?

Mr. NEILL. No, sir; the horses and mules. I saw one of the horses on the 1st.

Senator FALL. The 1st of this month?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What kind?

Mr. NEILL. A big white horse, one of Mr. Brite's main saddle horses.

Senator FALL. You knew the horse?

Mr. NEILL. I certainly did, I rode him two years. When the river is down, in the channel the water isn't over 25 steps wide, and on the 1st of each month at Candelaria, or Ruidosa, they open the port for the Mexicans to buy stuff, and at Candelaria on the 2d. This Mexican rode on the sandbar with a gun in his hand, riding this horse. I spoke to O. C. about it—O. C. Baldwin.

Senator FALL. He came on the other side?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. He didn't cross the 25 feet of water?

Mr. NEILL. No; I wish he had.

Senator FALL. Do you know of any other disturbances of any kind that occurred in that country at any time?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir. Mr. King testified this morning about that racket they had at Baldwin's.

Senator FALL. When was that?

Mr. NEILL. That was along last month.

Senator FALL. That was the testimony Mr. King gave as to the occurrence last month?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. They robbed the Baldwin's store?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did anybody follow them across the river?

Mr. NEILL. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Why, do you know?

Mr. NEILL. Why, the soldiers didn't go; there were only three of us.

Senator FALL. You had no authority to go?

Mr. NEILL. No authority to go; no, sir.

Senator FALL. Why didn't the soldiers go, do you know?

Mr. NEILL. Why, through orders from the colonel that they didn't go.

Senator FALL. Was the colonel approached by anyone upon the subject of their going?

Mr. NEILL. He was phoned to.

Senator FALL. Who was the colonel?

Mr. NEILL. Col. Hornbrook. I went down with Maj. Ringling and 10 men myself. They phoned us from Indio to come at once, and we went.

Senator FALL. You just got to the river?

Mr. NEILL. I am right on the bank of the river; I went right down. Mr. Baldwin's place is on the river.

Senator FALL. Is Maj. Ringling in the Regular Army?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. The 10 men were soldiers?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir; stationed at Ruidosa, 200 yards the camp is to our camp.

Senator FALL. That is, of the ranger camp?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And the major and his 10 men didn't cross the river?

Mr. NEILL. No, sir.

Senator FALL. You say the colonel was telephoned to for permission to cross?

Mr. NEILL. The major telephoned, and I think so did Capt. McCauley, from Indio. I think both were talking to him.

Senator FALL. Where were these men that had committed that robbery at that time; if you know?

Mr. NEILL. They were just across the river, not over 400 yards from us.

Senator FALL. Could you see them?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir; around some little jacals over there, Mexican shacks.

Senator FALL. There have been a good many occurrences of somewhat similar character, that is, robbery, looting, and driving off cattle, etc., for the last four years particularly; have there not?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you know any of the Mexican authorities on the other side of the river?

Mr. NEILL. No, sir. Oh, I know a few of them; yes.

Senator FALL. Do you know who claims jurisdiction of that country there?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Is it Villa?

Mr. NEILL. No; it is Carranza.

Senator FALL. And the soldiers who are over there on the Mexican side; are they Carranza soldiers?

Mr. NEILL. Now you have got me; I couldn't tell you whether they are Carranza or Villistas or a bunch of bandits; they are all just the same as one.

Senator FALL. They call themselves, however, what?

Mr. NEILL. Carrancistas.

Senator FALL. Have you ever had any assistance from the Carrancistas, either civil or military authorities, in preserving order along that border?

Mr. NEILL. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Have the rangers ever been able to secure the delivery to them of any men who were wanted on this side?

Mr. NEILL. Not a one.

Senator FALL. Have the stock which have been stolen been returned by the Carrancista authorities to their owners on this side, or to anyone?

Mr. NEILL. No, sir. They followed them several times and took them away from them.

Senator FALL. You mean people followed from this side to Mexico, and they took them away from them?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Who do you mean?

Mr. NEILL. The citizens and the people that lost them, and our soldiers.

Senator FALL. What soldiers were most active in following, or have followed Mexicans, in the Big Bend district, across the river?

Mr. NEILL. There hasn't been any following since Col. Langhorne was there.

Senator FALL. How long was Col. Langhorne there, about, do you know?

Mr. NEILL. No, I couldn't say.

Senator FALL. Do you know how many times he followed Mexicans across into Mexico to recover stolen property, at this time?

Mr. NEILL. I think as Mr. Tigner testified this morning about them going over, a bunch of Eulalió Nunez's cattle taken over that they followed and got back, and then the horses taken from Mr. Brite's ranch, they never were gotten back.

Senator FALL. Did the soldiers follow them?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir. Then the custom men's horses were taken.

Senator FALL. The soldiers followed them?

Mr. NEILL. No sir; nobody followed them.

Senator FALL. You spoke of the Eulalió Nunez theft; when did that occur?

Mr. NEILL. That has been about a year ago.

Senator FALL. The soldiers followed the trail and secured all or part of the cattle?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. As a matter of fact—

Mr. NEILL. They got all except one cow; they were butchering the cow, I think, when the boys came on them.

Senator FALL. As a matter of fact, Col. Langhorne's command had gone across the river, during the time he was occupying the Big Bend country, some seven times, had they not?

Mr. NEILL. They have crossed I couldn't say exactly how many times.

Senator FALL. Several times, at any rate?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did they ever fail to cross during that time, when the bandits who had committed the depredations were still in sight?

Mr. NEILL. Any time they done anything at all, they would follow them. All they wanted was a trail to follow on, and across the river they would go.

Senator FALL. You don't know why there has been any change of policy in that matter?

Mr. NEILL. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Who is the Carrancista commander, or the most active man down there, operating on the Mexican side of the river?

Mr. NEILL. Why, I couldn't say. The most noted man they have got is Chico Cano.

Senator FALL. You have heard of his activities a good many times?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, and I know him.

Senator FALL. He wasn't at the Brite raid, was he?

Mr. NEILL. I couldn't say. I never recognized but one man, and he hollered to me from the house after the shooting; his name was Calanche, a boy raised on this side.

Senator FALL. You understand Spanish, do you?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. How old are you, Mr. Neill?

Mr. NEILL. Well, sir, I am going on 65 years.

Senator FALL. Born in Texas?

Mr. NEILL. Born in Texas.

Senator FALL. Had some experience in Texas?

Mr. NEILL. Quite a lot; yes, sir. I landed on the border in 1873.

Senator FALL. The international border?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir. I am living now about as far from it as I have been since that time.

Senator FALL. You knew something about the conditions along the border from 1873 to 1878 and 1879, I presume?

Mr. NEILL. Oh, yes.

Senator FALL. That is before Diaz was recognized by this Government. Conditions were very much disturbed at that time?

Mr. NEILL. Well, it wasn't as bad as it is now.

Senator FALL. From your experience, 65 years in Texas, as a frontiersman and peace officer and in the service of the United States, how do the conditions in the Big Bend district or along the international border compare as to disturbances, or as to safety, we will say, of the lives and property of citizens on this side, with any other conditions you have ever known?

Mr. NEILL. They are just a whole lot worse.

Senator FALL. Worse?

Mr. NEILL. Worse now than when we used to contend with the Comanches every light moon. We knew what we were going up against when we seen a bunch of Comanches; there were two things to do, fight or run. You meet a bunch of Mexicans and you don't know what you are going up against; whether they are civilized or not. That is the way I look at it.

Senator FALL. From your experience, you can't distinguish, in so far as the liability to commit acts of violence or disturbance of the peace; you can't distinguish between the Carrancistas and members of any other Mexican faction?

Mr. NEILL. No, sir; I can't. They make any sort of promises. The stock on the opposite side of the river, like I seen this horse, they talked to Captain—a Mexican captain, Carrancista captain; Maj. Ringling sent for him and he came and talked to us.

Senator FALL. At this Baldwin—

Mr. NEILL. No; at the Ruidosa, where I am stationed.

Senator FALL. Prior to the Baldwin robbery?

Mr. NEILL. And made us all sorts of promises; that he was going to return that stock right back.

Senator FALL. American stock on the other side?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir. And we have never got it back yet or never got to talk to him since.

Senator FALL. Then, if conditions as to peace and order in the interior of Mexico have very materially improved recently, such improvement has not reached the border, in so far as you know?

Mr. NEILL. No, sir.

Senator FALL. It hasn't extended, at any rate, across the international border?

Mr. NEILL. No, sir. Now, Christmas night, this last Christmas night, myself and a scout for the Government there and Maj. Ringling and eight men went down; when we got near to a Mexican dance to be on this side, and as we got up to the house—we left our horses back—three Mexicans from yon side of the river come riding facing of us, everyone with his gun in his hand, his rifle.

Senator FALL. In his hand, not in the scabbard?

Mr. NEILL. No, sir; in his hand. Some little Mexican boys told us they had been riding around the house quite a little. They never got off the horses to go in; they whirled and run from us. The major split his men and sent four on one side and four on the other, and the major and myself and the scout went to the house, and as they seen us they broke to run. They didn't run over 15 steps, and there was four soldiers they hollered to them to halt, and they wouldn't. They begin to shoot and killed one horse and one man.

Senator FALL. That was on—

Mr. NEILL. Christmas night.

Senator FALL. December 25, 1919?

Mr. NEILL. 1920—1919; yes.

Senator FALL. So that you were compelled to be on guard or watch all the time to protect yourself and protect the American citizens in that district?

Mr. NEILL. Certainly.

Senator FALL. Suppose that United States troops were removed from there?

Mr. NEILL. Why, the people would have to leave there; that is all.

Senator FALL. The American citizens would have to leave?

Mr. NEILL. Leave or get together and go over and whip them, that is all. Run them out of the country, would be the only way they could stay.

Senator FALL. But the United States Government won't allow the citizens to go over?

Mr. NEILL. Just one time they let them go; that is the first time and chance they have had since Col. Hornbrook has been there.

Senator FALL. Do you know, Mr. Neill, that there has been an attempt on the part of some parties to show that American citizens from this side have been engaged in raiding and looting and robbing, etc., on the other side of the river?

Mr. NEILL. I haven't heard that.

Senator FALL. Now, as a matter of fact, in your experience, for the last 10 years particularly, as an officer or as an official along the border, have you ever known of an instance in which American citizens or others from this side have gone across the international boundary to commit any possible depredation or theft or act of violence on the other side?

Mr. NEILL. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Certainly, if anything of that kind had occurred in your district, you would have known something about it?

Mr. NEILL. I certainly would.

Senator FALL. And through your position as a Texas ranger, if such occurrence had happened at any other point along the border, you would have known of it?

Mr. NEILL. It looks like I would have heard of it; yes.

Senator FALL. Get back a moment to the Brits raid. When they drove off these horses, after they made the compromise with you, do you know whether any of those horses have been recovered in any way?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir; they brought back three or four after that fight; the next day after that raid, they brought them back. That is, the civilians and the soldiers that went across.

Senator FALL. But the Mexicans on the other side, have they ever restored those or any other cattle or horses, that you know of?

Mr. NEILL. No, sir.

Senator FALL. The secretary informs me that we have no other witness who desires to testify publicly to-day. The committee will be in recess until 10.30 to-morrow morning.

(The committee then, at 3.15 o'clock p. m., adjourned to meet at 10.30 o'clock a. m., Friday, Feb. 6, 1920.)

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
*El Paso, Tex.

The subcommittee met pursuant to the call of the chairman at 10.30 o'clock a. m., in the county courtroom, courthouse, El Paso, Tex., Senator A. B. Fall, presiding.

Present: Senator A. B. Fall and Senator Marcus A. Smith, and Dan M. Jackson, esq., clerk of the subcommittee.

Senator FALL. Mr. Secretary, attention has been called to what purports to be an Associated Press dispatch published in the Morning Times, following an account of the testimony taken by this committee yesterday, which I will ask you to read for the record.

(The secretary then read said statement, which is as follows:)

FALL AND SMITH THREATEN MEXICANS, PAPER CHARGES.

[By Associated Press.]

DOUGLAS, ARIZ., February 5.

Charges that Senators Fall and Smith of the Senate subcommittee investigating Mexican affairs are menacing Mexicans with jail unless they give testimony are made in a news message from Mexico City, published by Orientacion, a Hermosillo, Sonora, newspaper. The article says:

"Urgent telegrams received from San Antonio, Tex., make known the fact that Senators Fall and Smith are exercising extraordinary pressure against Mexican citizens, resident in that city, in order to get them to appear before the Senate subcommittee and menacing them with terms in the jail if they refuse to testify.

"The ex-colonels, Pedro Chapa and Manuel Rodriguez, have telegraphed that they, after weighing the menaces of the pressure that has been brought against them, have refused to testify. Our Government claims guaranties for Mexican citizens against such modes of annoyances as they are subjected to in the United States. Senator Fall insists upon declaring that President Carranza has formed a plot for an attack upon the United States."

Senator FALL. That last sentence is not denied by Senator Fall, containing statement in reference to Mr. Carranza.

No subpoenas have been issued by this committee for any Mexican witness or citizen. Various Mexican citizens have been notified that if they desired to appear before this committee they would be heard without reference to any facts which they might desire to present. In the hearing at San Antonio, or just prior to the hearing, two Mexicans notified the special officer of this committee that they desired to appear before the committee and make a statement as to their losses and outrages perpetrated upon them, etc., in Mexico. They were later notified by the special officer that if they desired to appear they might do so, and if they desired, for their protection, to have subpoenas issued for them, the committee would issue subpoenas. For one reason or another, which the committee can not explain, they stated they preferred not to make a statement, and they were not even brought to San Antonio. No subpoena was issued and no attempt was made to take such testimony.

As to this Col. Chapa, mentioned in the article, we have before us an article written by Col. Chapa, very abusive to the United States, and published in a Matamoros Spanish paper, under date of September 30, 1915, a translation of which the committee will have made and inserted in the record at this place.

(Said translation is as follows:)

[Translation from El Democrata, Matamoros, Sept. 30, 1915.]

The yellow gossip.—The American press was the creator of yellow journalism. Among the cultured nations of old Europe the development of the literary fraud has been an almost complete failure. The dailies of Paris, for example, which are noted for their seriousness, such as Le Temps, Figaro, Journal des Debats, etc., have watched the appearances among them as a leper such organs of American flavor as Le Matin and Le Journal, whose only goal is sensationalism at the price of truth and servility to money.

The newspaper men of Yankee Land are able masters in the handling of sensationalism and the canard and for that reason the American people, whose scant education is made up essentially of the juices of the daily papers, has such erroneous encyclopedic ideas.

Ask a Yankee about Mexico and its present situation and you will realize his superficial and false ideas. Add to this the superb attitude for contempt which they harbor for everything that is Mexican and you will be able to understand the point of view from which they consider us.

Some one has classified writers in three groups: Those who think before they write; those that think as they write; and those that think after they have written; now, a new group has appeared, those who write and think neither before, at the time, nor afterwards, and to this group belong the American editorial writers. The Brownsville Herald in its number of yesterday contained an editorial in which it attacks General of the Brigade Emiliano P. Nafarrate, commander of the border. It ascertains that he is the only person responsible for the skirmishes which have taken place on the banks of the Rio Bravo. No one better than the Herald knows how false and criminal its statements are, and if it had any honor, instead of this of calumnies which make up its editorial it would have presented the facts in their naked truth. The uprising of the State of Texas and the battles which it has fought are the results of an era of oppressions during which the citizens of that State, of Mexican origin, have suffered all manner of indignities. They have been humiliated, they have been robbed, and they have been assassinated in that country which they call "The Land of the Free." The Mexican authorities decided to remain neutral and respect international laws and to permit the passage of Texas revolutionists to our territory, and for that reason they accepted the suggestions of the American authorities and agreed to cooperate for the subservience of the frontier.

What has been the reward of this Mexican courtesy?

American soldiers have fired on our detachments and killed and wounded our soldiers, who in spite of this criminal attack, and obeying superior orders to fire on American territory under no circumstances, have held their position under the Yankee fire.

This is not a suspicion their unquestionable proofs against the country. On the 17th of this month Col. Pedro A. Chapa took the American consul of this city to make an inspection of the place where these things took place, and they arrived at the exact moment when the firing was suspended and when the American cavalry were retiring. They examined carbines of our soldiers and they were cold they hunted for the fired cartridges and there were none found; one of our men was picked up wounded from a pool of blood in the place where the first American volley was fired found him.

A few steps from the edge of the river there is an embankment against floods and had our soldiers been the assailants they would have intrenched themselves behind this improvised breastwork and the loss would have been on the American side. These and many other facts convinced the consulate that the fault lay with the soldiers of his country. The same instances have been repeated at intervals along the whole frontier. We have had to lament the death of our soldiers and this has been the reward for the good faith of Gen. Nafarrate when he compromised himself with the American authorities out of courtesy to collaborate with them in watching the frontier.

To-day Gen. Obregon, commander of the army of the north, has ordered Gen. Nafarrate to concentrate his troops in the towns and to abandon the patrol of the river, although this is injurious to us, since smuggling will enjoy an open field.

The American in view of our attitude states that in case the Texas revolutionists cross to Mexico they will pursue them on to our soil.

Has such uncommon insolence ever been seen before? How lightly they consider the violation of our territory! Have we ever attempted to pursue our enemy when he passed into foreign territory?

Let them come to this side to pursue our enemy and we will go to Fort Bliss to get Huerta, Raul Madero, and other traitors who have found refuge beyond the Bravo.

And let the American people discontinue to believe in our impotence. Let "the yellow press" go on with its awful task.

PEDRO DE ALVARADO.

(Editorial column of the same paper contains the following:)

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR.

The colonel and journalist, Don Pedro A. Chapa, whose celebrated nom de plume in the journalistic world is Pedro de Alvarado, is with us. Col. Chapa was the commander at Matamoros and afterwards deputy to the Congress of Union.

Senator FALL. The committee will have now inserted in the record, after this translation, a letter written from San Antonio, under date of January 27, 1920, to Col. Chapa, the man referred to, which the secretary will now read:

(Here the secretary read the following letter:)

SAN ANTONIO, TEX., January 27, 1920.

Col. PEDRO CHAPA,
Brotonsville, Tex.

My DEAR COLONEL: There has been forwarded me from Mexico a clipping from El Democrata under date of September 30, 1915, published in Matamoros, Mexico, entitled "El Galeoto Amarillo," and signed by Pedro de Alvarado, your nom de plume. I note that you accompanied the American consul up the river, etc., in fact there are several very interesting incidents mentioned in this clipping, and in all probability it will be necessary for you to appear before the committee later on to substantiate your statements; therefore will suggest that you assemble your evidence, in order that you can substantiate your statements in this before-mentioned article.

Of the date you will be called to appear, will be decided by the committee at their El Paso sessions beginning there in a few days, and I will let you know, so as not to inconvenience you. In all probability the committee will call you upon their return from its western trip, which will be probably the latter part of February, or they may call you sooner. I will thank you to advise me by return mail, if you wrote this article, and have proof to establish your statements. Your connection with the plan of San Diego will also be gone into, as evidence was produced that you had knowledge of it and this article seems to prove that you did.

I trust this will not inconvenience you, and that you will not fail to assemble all your proofs, for we do not wish to only give one side of this matter, and want all sides represented, and if our soldiers or citizens were to blame we want to know it. This investigation is being made on the square and we want all the information we can procure of a reliable nature, and want facts based on positive proof.

Sincerely yours,

W. M. HANSON,
Post Office Box 448, San Antonio, Tex.

Senator FALL. In conclusion, the chairman desires to state the committee has no doubt whatever of their authority to enforce the presence of any witness before this committee, and to have such witness punished in event of refusing to so appear, whether such witness be a Mexican citizen or an American citizen. Col. Chapa was in San Antonio in attendance upon some of the hearings of this committee, and was met by a representative of this committee, stating he could testify if he wanted to, but could exercise his own judgment. No subpoena was ever issued for him, the committee was fairly well informed as to Col. Chapa and his activities from other sources.

The committee would not dignify, ordinarily, any newspaper story of this kind, but in this case, as one of the greatest, if not the greatest news-gathering agencies of the United States has seen fit to send this statement out, it was thought best to set at rest, once for all, such rumors as are coming out of Mexico. If the Associated Press desires any information from the committee at any time in reference to the truth or falsity of any such statement, all it has to do is to apply to the committee for such information.

TESTIMONY OF MR. O. C. DOWE.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. DOWE. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. A native of what State?

Mr. DOWE. Texas.

Senator FALL. Where do you live?

Mr. DOWE. Why, at the present I am in Presidio County, about 12 miles from the Rio Grande.

Senator FALL. The Rio Grande is the international boundary between Mexico and this country at that point?

Mr. DOWE. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What is your business?

Mr. DOWE. Why, I am in the Government service. Customs Service, mounted inspector of customs, and I have a little ranch down in that country.

Senator FALL. Your business carries you in what is known as the Big Bend district?

Mr. DOWE. I am right about at the heart of the Big Bend district.

Senator FALL. In the State of Texas?

Mr. DOWE. Yes, sir; and been in the Customs Service between 12 and 13 years.

Senator FALL. Do you know anything about the theft of certain cattle known as the Nunez cattle from this side of the river?

Mr. DOWE. Yes, sir; the Nunez ranch adjoins me on the south, he is just below me, and I was there at the time, and with the posse that followed the cattle.

Senator FALL. About what time was that, Mr. Dowe?

Mr. DOWE. It was along in the last year some time.

Senator FALL. Well, approximately?

Mr. DOWE. Well, about April, I think, I am not right sure, somewhere along there, 1919.

Senator FALL. You say you were with the posse which followed these cattle thieves?

Mr. DOWE. Yes, sir; I did not go across the river, I got there too late, got there about dark; I went down to the river, and was there when the cattle was brought back. I was in Marfa at the time I got the wire, and did not get to the river in time.

Senator FALL. By whom were they brought back?

Mr. DOWE. Troop of the Eighth Cavalry; Capt. Kloetfer was in command.

Senator FALL. Did you ever hear of one Celso Telles?

Mr. DOWE. Yes, sir; I know him, but I took papers off of him that showed me he was a lieutenant colonel in the Carranza army.

Senator FALL. Where did you take these papers?

Mr. DOWE. Why, he was killed in Brewster County, right about the mouth of the Miravillas. We ran into him with a bunch of stolen cattle from the other side; he had smuggled them to this side, about 148 head. I had a bunch of Texas rangers and customs inspectors and a captain; they put up a fight; these two men were killed.

Senator FALL. About when was that?

Mr. DOWE. Seventh day of May, 1915, I believe; 1914 or 1915.

Senator FALL. You say you took some papers from the body of Telles?

Mr. DOWE. Yes, sir; he had receipts in his pocket showing he was Celso Telles, and that he was a lieutenant colonel in the Carranza army. Sheriff Walton, of Alpine—

Senator FALL. He was a lieutenant colonel in the Carranza army?

Mr. DOWE. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Who took the papers?

Mr. DOWE. Sheriff Walton, of Brewster County.

Senator FALL. Do you know where those papers are now?

Mr. DOWE. No, sir; I do not.

Senator FALL. They were in the sheriff's possession?

Mr. DOWE. Yes, sir; I saw the papers.

Senator FALL. You say the other man who was killed was a captain?

Mr. DOWE. He had no papers on him, but we learned from Mexico relatives of his he was a captain with this fellow.

Senator FALL. Do you know who signed the commission of Telles?

Mr. DOWE. No, sir; I don't know who did.

Senator FALL. You don't recall who issued the commission?

Mr. DOWE. No, sir.

Senator FALL. What has been the conditions along the border as you know them through your official duties and otherwise?

Mr. DOWE. I have worked from Eagle Pass to El Paso as a mounted inspector along the river, and the conditions have been bad and gradually getting worse all along. The bandits have crossed and stolen horses and cattle all along and raided ranches, and a good many times we have been fired on by Carranza soldiers on the other side—fired across the river. I had two inspectors, Joe Sitters and Jack Howard, both killed in the Big Bend country. I have lost horses and mules from my ranch. My ranch is only 12 miles from the border. I was at Brite ranch right after the raid; I was with the troop of Cavalry that followed them across the river, and at the Glenn Springs raid.

Senator FALL. In your judgment, what would happen in the Big Bend district to settlers and their property in the event United States troops were removed from that district?

Mr. DOWE. If the United States troops were removed and the ranchmen and rangers and the river guards did not have authority to follow them, we would have to move out.

Senator FALL. And you have no authority to follow them?

Mr. DOWE. No, sir; only to go with the troops.

Senator FALL. If the ranchers and rangers, or officers of the State of Texas and United States Government inspectors, had authority to follow these raiders what, in your judgment, would be the result?

Mr. DOWE. Why, I believe we could put it down. We would stop these little raids along there. Chico Cano has got about 35 bandits over there now, right across from my little ranch, and I understand he has been made what they call Juez de la Acordada, and he has authority to stand a man up and shoot him. He is one of the bandits that crossed on this side and killed Inspectors Hulett and Sitters. He has been a noted bandit there for the last 8 or 10 years.

Senator FALL. You say he has that authority; from whom has he that authority?

Mr. DOWE. He is working for the Carranza Government. He has a commission from the Carranza Government.

Senator FALL. Your judgment is, should the troops be removed and permission given to the citizens and rangers and customs inspectors to go across they could put an end to this violence?

Mr. DOWE. They could stop these little raids by these bandits; of course, if they sent a lot of those Carranza troops in there we might not be able to stop them.

Senator FALL. Then, if Mr. Carranza himself, with the troops he has there now, is not able to protect you, even if he left a certain number of troops there, you could protect yourselves if you had authority to go across?

Mr. DOWE. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. If he is not able or not willing to do it—

Mr. DOWE. He is not willing.

Senator FALL. You people could do it?

Mr. DOWE. Yes, sir.

TESTIMONY OF MR. P. F. DYCHES.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Mr. Dyches, give us your full name, please, sir.

Mr. DYCHES. P. F. Dyches.

Senator FALL. Mr. Dyches, where do you live?

Mr. DYCHES. I am now stationed at Indio, Tex., on the Rio Grande River, in Presidio County.

Senator FALL. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. DYCHES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Native of what State?

Mr. DYCHES. Texas.

Senator FALL. What is your business?

Mr. DYCHES. I am a State Ranger of Texas

Senator FALL. How long have you been in the ranger service?

Mr. DYCHES. Since the 15th day of December, 1919.

Senator FALL. What was your business prior to that time?

Mr. DYCHES. Stockman.

Senator FALL. Where did you live?

Mr. DYCHES. Well, I ran the Tigner ranch in Presidio County, known as the old El Tenados ranch, for a year, and also worked for a year in Presidio County at what is known as the Botella ranch, owned by Mr. W. T. Davis.

Senator FALL. Then you have lived and resided on or near the international boundary for some time?

Mr. DYCHES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Both as an officer and stockman?

Mr. DYCHES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where were you on or about January 21 of this year?

Mr. DYCHES. I was at the D. T. Baldwin farm on the Rio Grande.

Senator FALL. What occurred if anything, at that farm at that time, or about that time?

Mr. DYCHES. On the 12th we captured Francisco Cacho, a Mexican that had come over and robbed with others the commissary of D. T. Baldwin.

Senator FALL. That was on the 12th?

Mr. DYCHES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What date was the—what was the date of the robbery, was that on the 12th?

Mr. DYCHES. On New Year's night.

Senator FALL. Where did you capture Cacho?

Mr. DYCHES. Right near Mr. Baldwin's residence, or commissary.

Senator FALL. He was identified as one of the robbers?

Mr. DYCHES. Yes, sir; he was trying to get Mr. Baldwin out.

Senator FALL. You say he was trying to get Mr. Baldwin out; how do you mean; what was he doing?

Mr. DYCHES. He was trying to get him out to talk to him, he says; but a few days before that he had sent him a note stating if he did not send some stuff over; if he did not send it he would come back after it.

Senator FALL. What kind of stuff?

Mr. DYCHES. Stuff out of the commissary; tobacco and groceries.

Senator FALL. That is, he had sent word from Mexico to this side to send him some stuff out of the store?

Mr. DYCHES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. If he did not, he was coming after him?

Mr. DYCHES. If he did not, he was coming after him.

Senator FALL. Now, you say he did come, and was trying to get Mr. Baldwin out?

Mr. DYCHES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What did he want to do?

Mr. DYCHES. He told me he wanted to talk to him, but he had a partner hid out below there in a ditch or hills with a rifle or six-shooter, also, and had a six-shooter himself, and he had his hand on his six-shooter when we captured him, trying to get Mr. Baldwin out; he told Mr. Baldwin he was not armed.

Senator FALL. He told Mr. Baldwin he was not armed?

Mr. DYCHES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. But he had his hand on his six-shooter?

Mr. DYCHES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And there was another one down in the ditch somewhere with a six-shooter or rifle?

Mr. DYCHES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What did you do with him when you captured him?

Mr. DYCHES. We disarmed him, handcuffed him, and started to Indio camp with him, and were overtaken by his partners; and after some little battle he escaped, and they did too. We turned them back after a fight.

Senator FALL. What date was that?

Mr. DYCHES. That was on the 12th.

Senator FALL. Twelfth of January?

Mr. DYCHES. Fifteen or twenty minutes after we captured Cacho—

Senator FALL. You started down the river with him?

Mr. DYCHES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Were you headed off or followed?

Mr. DYCHES. Followed.

Senator FALL. By about how many men; do you know?

Mr. DYCHES. Six men.

Senator FALL. What happened?

Mr. DYCHES. They opened fire on us, and we returned the fire.

Senator FALL. From what distance did they open fire?

Mr. DYCHES. I judge, between four and five hundred yards.

Senator FALL. The prisoner, you say, was handcuffed?

Mr. DYCHES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Was he on a horse?

Mr. DYCHES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What happened to him?

Mr. DYCHES. Well, he dismounted and took to the river.

Senator FALL. While you were engaged in a fight with these would-be rescuers?

Mr. DYCHES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. How long did the fight last?

Mr. DYCHES. About 50 or 60 shots were fired by them.

Senator FALL. Where did the men that fired on you go, if you know?

Mr. DYCHES. They went back across the river.

Senator FALL. You stopped them, did you?

Mr. DYCHES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. They retreated and went across the river?

Mr. DYCHES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where are they now?

Mr. DYCHES. About a mile from Mr. D. T. Baldwin's place.

Senator FALL. On the opposite side of the river?

Mr. DYCHES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Have the Mexican authorities made any attempt to secure them?

Mr. DYCHES. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Or turned them over to you?

Mr. DYCHES. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Where is your escaped prisoner; do you know?

Mr. DYCHES. He is now in Ojinaga with the Carranza soldiers.

Senator FALL. In Ojinaga now?

Mr. DYCHES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. With the Carranza army?

Mr. DYCHES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Has there ever been assistance offered you or tendered you by the Carranza officials on the Mexican side of the river to prevent turbulence and violence and disorder on this side?

Mr. DYCHES. Nothing, only firing at us.

Senator FALL. They have fired at you more than once?

Mr. DYCHES. They have fired three or four times at us.

Senator FALL. From across the river?

Mr. DYCHES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. That is the only assistance you have received from the Carranza government?

Mr. DYCHES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Mr. Baldwin also received some notes from them?

Mr. DYCHES. He received a couple of notes three or four or five days back from them; I did not read those notes. I intended to bring them along with me, but forgot them.

Senator FALL. He told you what the contents were?

Mr. DYCHES. Yes, sir; but I don't remember what they contained now; but two of them are still over there with Carranza outpost now, living there, running with them, and the others are right near by in the same band.

Senator FALL. What was the general purport of these notes; what was their purpose in writing to Mr. Baldwin?

Mr. DYCHES. They wanted to get him across the river over there; and in one of the notes they wanted some more groceries and dry goods sent across to them.

Senator FALL. Is he running a delivery wagon across the international boundary?

Mr. DYCHES. No, sir; he has a commissary there for his laborers. (Witness excused.)

TESTIMONY OF GEORGE TURNER (COLORED).

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. What is your full name?

Mr. TURNER. George Turner.

Senator FALL. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Of what State are you a native; where were you born?

Mr. TURNER. Kentucky.

Senator FALL. George, what was your business in the year—what were you doing in the year 1916?

Mr. TURNER. Soldier.

Senator FALL. Soldier?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. In what Army?

Mr. TURNER. United States Army.

Senator FALL. Were you in the Cavalry or Infantry?

Mr. TURNER. Tenth Cavalry.

Senator FALL. Tenth Cavalry?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Were you ever at the town or settlement of Carizal?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Were you there as a soldier?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. How many Cavalry were there about; was there more than one troop?

Mr. TURNER. Two troops, but they were not close together.

Senator FALL. Two troops?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. But they were not close together?

Mr. TURNER. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Both of the Tenth Cavalry?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Who was the commanding officer of your troop?

Mr. TURNER. At that time?

Senator FALL. Yes.

Mr. TURNER. Capt. Boyd; sir.

Senator FALL. Who was the commanding officer, if you know, of the other troop?

Mr. TURNER. Of C Troop?

Senator FALL. Yes.

Mr. TURNER. I don't know, sir; I don't know his name.

Senator FALL. Capt. Morey?

Mr. TURNER. I think Capt. Morey at that time—but he was with us.

Senator FALL. Did you know Lieut. Adair?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Who was your first sergeant?

Mr. TURNER. Of my troop?

Senator FALL. Of your troop.

Mr. TURNER. Sergt. Page.

Senator FALL. Was he there?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What became of him?

Mr. TURNER. I don't know, sir; where is at now. I think he went overseas with the rest of those fellows.

Senator FALL. What happened there then—do you remember the exact date?

Mr. TURNER. No, sir; I don't remember just exactly the date. I did not put it down.

Senator FALL. Did you have a civilian guide?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Who was he, do you remember?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir; he was a Mormon fellow, his name was—

Senator FALL. Lem Spillsbury?

Mr. TURNER. Lem Spillsbury, a tall fellow.

Senator FALL. Now, what were you doing there at this little settlement at this time? What occurred there, George, just tell us in your own language; go right ahead.

Mr. TURNER. We came in from Casas Grandes there and went into camp.

Senator FALL. How long did it take you to cross from Casas Grandes?

Mr. TURNER. Four days and nights to come from Casas Grandes.

Senator FALL. Where did you go into camp the last night?

Mr. TURNER. The last night?

Senator FALL. Yes.

Mr. TURNER. Well, I judge about a mile.

Senator FALL. About a mile from this little town of Carrizal?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And stayed there all night?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir; and came that next morning about 9 o'clock, when we halted, dismounted, and camped there for lunch, and this Lem Spillsbury was called by Capt. Boyd; they had a conversation there and they sent him up in the little town of Carrizal for information, and when he came back, why he goes to Capt. Boyd there and they were talking again; I don't know what passed between the two, but he goes back up into this town of Carrizal and comes back again. That is the first time; on the second time when he came back he came back with a Mexican general, came back with him; and then when he came back again why the troop was called up by the captain; he gave us a lecture; he lectured to us.

Senator FALL. What was the lecture; what did he tell you?

Mr. TURNER. What he said to us I will explain it to you. He says, "What I want this morning, boys, to give you—in lecturing the Tenth Cavalry, because I know the Tenth Cavalry always had a good recommendation—what I want you to do this morning to stay with me; I will stay with you boys because I don't think there is one in the troop that will go back on me; stick with me because I will always stick with you," and then—

Senator FALL. Did he give you any instructions about any possible fighting or firing?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir; the next thing what he told us is: "What I want is this: This morning I don't want a man to fire a shot not until I give the order; then the first sergeant will carry it out through the troop." Then he asked us how many rounds of ammunition we had, did each man have, and we told him. He said he wanted the horse holders to go to the rear of the troop about 200 yards.

Senator FALL. About how many horse holders in every troop, approximately.

Mr. TURNER. Of the troop?

Senator FALL. Yes; how many do you usually have?

Mr. TURNER. Have a hundred and something, but not that many in the troop, but about 67 in the troop at this time.

Senator FALL. About how many of those would you say were horse holders?

Mr. TURNER. I judge about 30.

Senator FALL. About one-half of them?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. That went to the rear to hold horses?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Well, tell us what you did?

Mr. TURNER. Went into skirmish line.

Senator FALL. You fell into skirmish line under order of your commanding officer?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir; right there.

Senator FALL. At this time could you see any Mexicans?

Mr. TURNER. No, sir; I did not see one. This Mormon came back, he and this Mexican general again, he came back, then the captain walked up to them, then Capt. Boyd was standing there talking, this Mormon goes to the extreme right of us, I was on the extreme right myself, then this Mexican general, he leaves us and goes to the front—goes back to the rear toward this little town, when he got back there a piece he wheels facing us, and drew his sabre and started back toward us. When he started back why they raised from the right and commence firing again.

Senator FALL. The Mexicans?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You had not seen them up to that time?

Mr. TURNER. No, sir. They raised from the right, and came rushing across to us—we were lying on the ground.

Senator FALL. About how many of them were there?

Mr. TURNER. It looked to me like about two platoons of them.

Senator FALL. About how many would that be—you are talking like a soldier, a good many of these newspaper men don't know how many that is; two platoons, about how many Mexicans would you say in numbers?

Mr. TURNER. I guess they had about 35, or a little more than that.

Senator FALL. What did you all do?

Mr. TURNER. Laid down to the ground as ordered. They commenced firing, then we got orders from Capt. Boyd to fire upon this general because he had started back facing us, when they raised off the ground he charged, you know, and came back hollering, so we raised and commenced shooting.

Senator FALL. Then what did you do, if anything? Did you get up?

Mr. TURNER. We did not get up any until we got the command, we got the command and rushed forward again and laid back down again, they ran in the extreme right of us again, it looked like, I guess, 500 or 600 of them came up. You could not see in front of us then for the dust, the shots were hitting in front of us. I seen Capt. Boyd had got shot, he grabbed himself right around the shoulders this way, I said, "There is Capt. Boyd got shot on the extreme left of us"; when we started across again why they opened fire on us again. Opened fire then again, that bunch of them, and those what was in front of us, they broke back, we got an order again, Capt. Boyd said, "Raise, go forward," we did. We raised the second time, then they commenced to cut us down, the machine guns opened up on us.

Senator FALL. They had machine guns?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir; on the left.

Senator FALL. Did you have a machine gun with your troop?

Mr. TURNER. No, sir; nothing but rifles.

Senator FALL. So after this second charge you made, or advance, they opened on you with machine guns?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir; it was the second. We got orders then to fire upon that infernal machine gun, about 200 yards, which we did, then it ceased firing, and they opened up in the rear of us.

Senator FALL. You stopped the machine gun, did you?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir. They opened fire on us then in the rear, came down that irrigation ditch right in behind us.

Senator FALL. Surrounded you?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Got in behind you?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And fired at you from behind?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir. And those soldiers, what was in the extreme front of us, they broke back—retreated.

Senator FALL. The Mexicans?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir; they went back.

Senator FALL. How far did you advance altogether, you troops? Did you continue to advance?

Mr. TURNER. We went about 300 yards in their direction, their firing line.

Senator FALL. They were shooting at you all the time?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir; then opened up again to the right of us, we could not do anything because they all together made a charge right in behind us.

Senator FALL. How many of you were doing the firing, just half of your troops?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir; just one-half then, but those fellows that were holding the horses, it got so hot for them behind them they had to come up to our firing line, they could not stay back there with the horses because all those soldiers came down that irrigation ditch, they kept shooting at them; they kept taking up their firing line; at the time they came up there they just surrounded us. What men were on the ground when they came up there they just shot, some lying down, they did not get up.

Senator FALL. Wounded men?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You mean they killed the wounded men?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir; some of those that were wounded could not get up; those that were not wounded lay down there when those Mexicans made the charge in the rear.

Senator FALL. What became of you, what happened to you personally?

Mr. TURNER. To me? During the time I was on the extreme right Capt. Boyd then had come up from the right, had gone back over to the other side and sat down; I went back over to where he was, caught him up in my arms and carried him back; he said, "You had better lay down," he said to me, "You had better get down," he says "They are raising hell with us," so I took him on back a piece, went on back up to the line, because they were shooting so right there at me I left him and went back to the firing line. So there was a horse up there, I did not know he was shot.

Senator FALL. Did not know the horse was shot?

Mr. TURNER. No, sir; he was shot up between the forehead, and my sergeant he was over there, he kept hollering, so I says, "I am going to get on this horse's back to make my get-away from here if I can." It was getting then too hot for me, he kept hollering "Get down off of him, get down off of him," so I did not pay any attention to what he was saying; he hollered, I think, two or three or four times; I got on him again, he stood right back, he kept turning around and around, and there was a Mexican woman, I think seven or eight Mexican women scattered around in there, had these little old short rifles, I think she had a clip of ammunition coming out of some of our rifles, some of our ammunition we had dropped in the skirmish, so she tried to get it in her rifle; he kept hollering to me, "Look out, why, don't you see that Mexican woman there fixing to shoot you;" so I grabbed for my six-shooter, still had hold of this horse, he kept lunging, sat right back down again, so I shot her, made her bite the grass. At that time I mounted my horse again, so I got it, I was shot through and through. So Page hollered, "I told you to stay off that horse, you would get shot." I let him go.

Senator FALL. Shot through and through. Where do you mean?

Mr. TURNER. Shot through this side; it came out on this side. I had a pair of these wrapped leggins, and I had blood running all out; I taken these wrapped leggins off and wrapped them around, bandaged it.

Senator FALL. You took your leggins off and bandaged yourself?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir. I walked over, I did not see Capt. Boyd any more. I did not see him, only this Mormon, I saw him, the bunch had him. That was after I got dressed, and the Mexicans then came charging again, after Page had got me up from there and got me started, you know, on our way over there, they came on us charging again after Page had got me up, about to shoot us, you know; so we threw up our hands; they taken us on over to the railroad and stripped us.

Senator FALL. How do you mean stripped you, took your clothes off of you?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. How many of them with you, do you remember?

Mr. TURNER. Seventeen.

Senator FALL. Were any of them wounded except yourself?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir; some of them shot through the hands, some through the arms.

Senator FALL. What did they do with you after they stripped you?

Mr. TURNER. Carried us over there, stripped us, we waited there about a half hour, well we walked, I think, about 200 yards down the track and the train came, we started to walk, did not have on a thing. We got into Chihuahua that evening, I think, about 4 o'clock, put us on the train there, we did not have a thing on, and put us in that jail down there.

Senator FALL. How long did you stay in the jail?

Mr. TURNER. About nine days, I think, little over nine.

Senator FALL. Did they furnish you with any clothes?

Mr. TURNER. No, sir.

Senator FALL. How were you treated while you were in the jail?

Mr. TURNER. Treated pretty rough, I don't want to go there any more. Every morning after they put us in there, every morning they came back and told us: "Pretty soon we are going to stand you against that wall up there and bomb, bomb you." So this Mormon came and told us. He says: "Boys, you don't want to stand nothing from these Mexicans, if they come and talk to you just tell them to talk to me." There was nothing to do but to make ready. Page, the sergeant there, says: "Boys, I tell you what we do, when they come in here, and march down in front of you they will either be at carry arms or port arms, and the first one that gets hold of a rifle shoot right down this hall, shoot right down this hall, and if any of us can get hold of a rifle commence shooting, they ain't going to all come out there until we get out on the street, and some of us can get away, and get back," that is what we intended to do, so every morning they came in there and told us what they were going to do to us.

Senator FALL. Well, what did they do to you, you say they treated you pretty rough?

Mr. TURNER. Why, meal time they came down by us, they got a big dish pan about that size, the spoon was about a yard long.

Senator FALL. The spoon was about a yard long?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir. Came back by us, they would kick us, and take a spoon and dish out the beans, about a dozen beans, pour them out on the ground to us, each one; that meat they gave us, you could bounce it from here to the Mills Building. It was not meat.

Senator FALL. You mean to say they fed you on the ground?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Poured your beans out on the ground?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You had to pick them up from the ground?

Mr. TURNER. We never picked any of them up, we were thinking about getting out of there.

Senator FALL. Afterwards they took you out, did they?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And put you on the train?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir; when they came down to take us out we thought then our time had come, they came and told us to prepare to leave, "get out of here, prepare to leave." We did not feel good until we got down here to this bridge, at least, I did not.

Senator FALL. Well, did they give you clothes before they put you off the train up here?

Mr. TURNER. Did not have anything but overalls until we got here.

Senator FALL. All the time you were in Chihuahua you did not have any clothes?

Mr. TURNER. No, sir.

Senator FALL. When they put you on the train they did not give you any clothes?

Mr. TURNER. Not until we got pretty near here, they gave us some overalls.

Senator FALL. Then you were delivered on this side?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What is your employment now, George?

Mr. TURNER. I work at the Quartermaster Department down here.

Senator FALL. You are still in the employ of the United States?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. One of our witnesses is ill, and won't be here this morning, and the committee desires to have a conference with some other witnesses, and will be in recess until 3 o'clock, when we will again meet in this room.

(The committee then, at 11.50 o'clock a. m., took a recess until 3 o'clock p. m., the same day.)

AFTER RECESS.

The committee met pursuant to adjournment.

TESTIMONY OF MAJ. GEN. ROBERT LEE HOWZE.

Senator FALL. General, we will not go through the formality of requesting you to take the oath which we are administering to witnesses, as you appear in your official capacity. Please give your full name to the reporter.

Gen. HOWZE. Robert Lee Howze, major general of the United States Army.

Senator FALL. Where are you stationed now, General?

Gen. HOWZE. At El Paso, in command of the district of El Paso.

Senator FALL. What is the district of El Paso, shortly speaking; what does it comprise?

Gen. HOWZE. It starts on the west at the New Mexico-Arizona State line, passes to the Rio Grande; thence down the Rio Grande to what is known as the Big Bend, a distance of some 450 to 500 miles.

Senator FALL. General, of what State are you a native?

Gen. HOWZE. Texas.

Senator FALL. How long have you been in the United States Army?

Gen. HOWZE. Since June, 1883, nearly 37 years.

Senator FALL. Will you as rapidly as possible sketch your military experience, your experience in the Army?

Gen. HOWZE. My experience as an officer began in New Mexico, where I served for nearly 3 years; was then transferred to the Sioux Indian country in the Dakotas; remained there 4 years; thence to the Chicago Pullman strike and riot, and then to Fort Leavenworth, Kans., and next to West Point Military Academy as instructor, then to the Cuban campaign against Spain; duty back to West Point, then to the Philippines, commanding a volunteer regiment. And next duty took me to Porto Rico, where I served 3 years; then again to West Point as commandant of cadets for 4 years; the next 4 years in command of the Porto Rico Regiment and the district of Porto Rico; my next service was a field officer of the Eleventh Cavalry; then to the Army War College in Washington, from which duty to Mexico with the punitive expedition, and from there to El Paso, and later to Boston as chief of staff of the department; from Boston to El Paso in command of the Second Cavalry Brigade, and later in command of the El Paso district, and from El Paso overseas for 11 months, on duty with the American Expeditionary Forces; at the conclusion of overseas service, back to El Paso in command of the El Paso district, and to date.

Senator FALL. General, in connection with the punitive expedition, commonly known as the Pershing expedition to Mexico, what were your duties, and how far did you yourself go into Mexico?

Gen. HOWZE. Gen. Pershing assigned me to the command of a selected squadron of Cavalry, and as such commander I preceded his main forces through Chihuahua, and on into the northern edge of the State of Durango.

Senator FALL. Did you reach as far south as Parral?

Gen. HOWZE. I did; somewhat farther south, perhaps 70 miles.

Senator FALL. Where were you when the Battle of Carrizal was fought?

Gen. HOWZE. I was at Colonia Dublan, near Casas Grandes.

Senator FALL. Where did you go from there, immediately following the Battle of Carrizal?

Gen. HOWZE. I was ordered by Gen. Pershing to proceed in the direction of Carrizal for the purpose of investigating the reported fight there, and also to pick up any of the colored troopers whom I might encounter.

Senator FALL. How far did you proceed in the direction of Carrizal in the performance of your duties?

Gen. HOWZE. Within 8 or 10 miles of Carrizal, in the vicinity of the ranch known as Santo Domingo ranch.

Senator FALL. Did you there ascertain any of the occurrences at the Battle of Carrizal? If so, from whom.

Gen. HOWZE. During the whole trip from Colonia Dublan I was able, through the colored troopers picked up, packers, and finally from Capt. Morey, to quite thoroughly and carefully investigate the whole situation.

Senator FALL. Where did you encounter Capt. Morey?

Gen. HOWZE. About 25 miles short of Santo Domingo ranch.

Senator FALL. What was his physical condition?

Gen. HOWZE. At the time I got him he was practically normal, except for a severe state of nervousness and concern.

Senator FALL. Did you obtain from him a statement concerning the occurrences at Carrizal, as he knew them?

Gen. HOWZE. I did, and submitted it to the authorized inspector, who followed up my investigation.

Senator FALL. Now, you say that you reached the Santo Domingo ranch about 9 miles from Carrizal; did you proceed any farther in the direction of Carrizal?

Gen. HOWZE. I did not.

Senator FALL. Was there any particular reason why you did not proceed farther in the direction of Carrizal?

Gen. HOWZE. All the troops received instructions not to go beyond Santo Domingo ranch.

Senator FALL. Your instructions came, of course, from your commanding officer?

Gen. HOWZE. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. How many soldiers did you have with you on this expedition to the vicinity of the Santo Domingo ranch?

Gen. HOWZE. About 300 mounted troops.

Senator FALL. Did you feel competent to deal with the situation as it existed, or might exist, around Carrizal, with the troops whom you had?

Gen. HOWZE. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where did you go from the vicinity of the Santo Domingo ranch?

Gen. HOWZE. We returned to Casas Grandes.

Senator FALL. Under orders?

Gen. HOWZE. Under orders, after we had rescued the colored troopers, and as many animals as we believe possible to recover.

Senator FALL. General, have you made any inquiry from your official record, and other satisfactory sources of information, as to death and injuries to persons within your present district occurring within the last two years, or, say, since February, 1917?

Gen. HOWZE. I have done so under competent orders received by me from high authority.

Senator FALL. Have you prepared a paper or list of such casualties or injuries?

Gen. HOWZE. I have.

Senator FALL. Will you offer that list for the use of the committee, to be printed in its record, without testifying as to the details of it?

Gen. HOWZE. I will be very glad to do so.

(Said statement is as follows:)

1. February 14, 1917, three Mormons, Andy Peterson, Bert Jenson, and a brother-in-law of Peterson's by the name of Hugh Acord, were taken from the Corner ranch and carried into Mexico and killed. Bodies found one-half mile south of monument 54, each man having been shot in the head.
2. April 5, 1917, unknown Mexican working at corner of Central and Piedras Streets, El Paso, Tex., killed by stray bullets fired by Carrancista soldiers at an American patrol near the island in the city of El Paso. Death resulted from firing across the border at El Paso, Tex.
3. January 21, 1918, a patrol from Troop I, Seventh Cavalry, stationed at Fabens, Tex., fired on by Carranza soldiers, the trooper being hit on tip of finger, wound very slight, and name of soldier can not be ascertained.

19. June 16, 1919, Sergt. Peter Chigas, Troop I, Seventh Cavalry, severely wounded while pursuing Villa forces in Mexico. Wound was not result of firing across the border.

20. June 16, 1919, Arthur A. Linburg, private, Troop E, Fifth Cavalry, slightly wounded while pursuing Villa forces in Mexico. Wound was not result of firing across the border.

21. June 16, 1919, Alforsia Flore, private, Troop M, Fifth Cavalry, slightly wounded while pursuing Villa forces in Mexico. Wound was not result of firing across the border.

22. June 16, 1919, Louis E. Armstrong, corporal, Machine Gun Troop, Fifth Cavalry, slightly wounded while pursuing Villa forces in Mexico. Wound was not result of firing across the border.

23. June 15, 1919, Floyd Hinton, killed while watching the Battle of Juarez from top of building at Ninth and El Paso Streets. Responsibility for his death has not been definitely determined.

24. June 15, 1919, Mrs. Ed. Dominguez, a Mexican woman, killed while sitting on her doorstep at 309 East Eighth Street by a bullet fired from the Mexican side across the border at El Paso.

25. June 15, 1919, A. Madrid, a Mexican, slightly wounded in the head by a bullet fired from the Mexican side of the border at El Paso. It is not known whether this bullet was from Villa or Carranza forces.

26. June 15, 1919, A. Ochoa, a Mexican woman, shot in the thigh while in her home located at Park Street, El Paso, Tex. This shot was fired from across the border at El Paso, Tex., by Carranza or Villa forces.

27. Francisco Aguilar, a Mexican, shot by bullets fired across the border of El Paso, Tex. He was shot near 433 East Sixth Street, El Paso, Tex., on June 15, 1919; shot fired either by Carranza or Villa forces.

28. June 15, 1919, Enma Parker, a negress, shot in left hand by a bullet fired across the border at El Paso while in doorway of her home, 464 Tays Street, El Paso, Tex.

Senator FALL. General, I note, under date of June 15, 1919, casualties occurring among various soldiers, privates, and others upon this side of the boundary line, as well as some upon the Mexican side under dates of June 15 and 16—this is merely a preliminary question. No. 11, for instance, or No. 12, upon this list—June 15, 1919, Pvt. Sam Tusco, Headquarters Company, Eighty-second Field Artillery, killed by shots fired from the Mexican side of the river. Shots thought to be fired by Villistas, death due to firing across border at El Paso, Tex. One of the members of your staff, Col. Glover, I believe is here, and he was present during these days—the 15th and 16th of June?

Gen. HOWZE. Yes, sir; as chief of staff.

Senator FALL. So that any details as to who fired shots from the other side, in so far as they could be discovered, would be more within the personal knowledge of Col. Glover than yourself, as you were not here at that time?

Gen. HOWZE. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Now, General, we do not want to take a great deal of your time, but from your vast and varied experience in different portions of the world, particularly your experience along the Mexican border and in Mexico, have you any statement with reference to conditions existing in Mexico and along the border which you will make to the committee?

Gen. HOWZE. I have come to certain conclusions, based upon what I believe to be facts given me because of the position that I have held during the last several years, and if it would interest the committee I would be very glad to give these conclusions.

Senator FALL. The committee will be very grateful, sir, if you will let us have the benefit of your conclusions.

Gen. HOWZE. Off and on during the last four years I have had peculiar advantages in being able to see and to know the things so far as concerns Americans and foreign-owned property, which have happened on this side of the Rio Grande and in Mexico. I will not undertake to describe them in detail; they have been too numerous and are already too well known. My conclusions ought to be sufficient. The intolerable conditions, which have covered a period of nearly 10 years, have continually grown worse and I am convinced that the apex of shamefulness and horror as viewed from an American conception of justice and decency was reached last fall; a condition which, in my opinion, still exists. The Mexican Government during this 10 years of critical times has never, as far as I can determine, done one genuinely friendly thing toward our Government. On the other hand, the Mexican Government has done no end of discourtesies—I would like to add either the Mexican Government and its people have done no end of discourteous, contemptuous, and offensive things of large importance to our Government and our people. The result has been increased estrangements and of increased hatred against the people of the United States.

It is well known that Americans are being murdered or captured and released on payment of ransom. Foreign-owned properties are being confiscated or practically destroyed. Mexican bands are committing most horrible crimes and in isolated places continue to make raids upon the persons and property of the American citizens located on our side of the border. Everywhere in Mexico, so far as can be observed, there would appear to be a lack of progress. No end of reports showing that murder, rapine, and destruction prevail—no end of reports are received that murder, rapine and destruction prevail—and from our point of view there is no evidence of improvement. We who closely observe believe that the future of Mexico, so far as it affects us, is hopeless if left wholly to the control of Mexicans. That concludes my opinion of the situation.

Senator FALL. General, you speak of Mexican bands raiding on this side; is there any distinctive mark in so far as you know to enable you to determine who are bandits and who are not?

Gen. HOWZE. That has been a very difficult problem for us, and I think I speak the opinion of all officers when I say that I believe that it is impossible for us to make any distinction.

Senator SMITH. It would follow, General, would it not, that a description of those who come on this side and go across as bandits would be very misleading? Ought not it to apply to anybody that comes across and goes back after committing depredations?

Gen. HOWZE. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. If anyone comes across and commits depredations from the other side, without a question whether they are bandits or not, the mere fact of their invasion and return to the other side, it would be better that the word bandit be excluded from any consideration in that particular, would it not?

Gen. HOWZE. My answer to that is best made by stating that officially we do not use the term "bandits."

Senator SMITH. That is what I am driving at.

Senator FALL. You mean to say, officially, they all look alike to you?

Gen. HOWZE. Officially we treat them all as Mexicans; Mexican nationals, if you please to so term it.

Senator FALL. General, may I ask you if you feel that the forces, military forces, along the border under yourself and your superior officers, are thoroughly competent to handle any situation which may arise on this border?

Gen. HOWZE. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. That is all, sir; we thank you very much.

(Witness excused.)

TESTIMONY OF COL. FRANCIS W. GLOVER.

Senator FALL. Will you kindly give your full name and rank to the reporter?

Col. GLOVER. Col. Francis W. Glover, United States Army, now on duty as chief of staff to Maj. Gen. Robert L. Howze, commanding the El Paso district.

Senator FALL. Colonel, how long have you been stationed in the El Paso district?

Col. GLOVER. Since April 9, 1917, with the exception during that year when I was in command of Fort Yellowstone, Wyo.

Senator FALL. Were you in El Paso on June 15 and 16, of the year 1919?

Col. GLOVER. I was.

Senator FALL. On duty here at that time?

Col. GLOVER. On duty here as chief of staff to Brig. James B. Erwin, United States Army.

Senator FALL. Did you have opportunity during these days to observe any occurrences upon this side of the river, and later upon the other side, with reference between two Mexican factions upon the other side?

Col. GLOVER. I did, sir. I was in direct charge of military operations of the United States Army. Of the troops of the El Paso district.

Senator FALL. Colonel, do you know whether there were any notes received by the commanding officer, or other military officers, either prior to or subsequent to this battle, from General or so-called Gen. Felipe Angeles?

Col. GLOVER. Yes, sir; I do.

Senator FALL. When was such note received; was it after or prior?

Col. GLOVER. It was after the battle; the afternoon of June 17, if I remember correctly, about 4.30 p. m.

Senator FALL. Did you read that note?

Col. GLOVER. I did, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you recall substantially the contents of this?

Col. GLOVER. I do, substantially. Gen. Angeles appeals to Gen. Erwin, as a comrade in arms, and asks him for certain information, which, as he stated, he considered it for the revolutionary forces in Mexico at that time, with which he was at that time connected, to know. He stated that it was a matter of personal knowledge to him that Gen. Villa had assembled all of his officers prior to the attack on Juarez and gave them strict instructions that there would be no firing into the United States territory, and that so far as he had observed, those orders had been carried out. He further stated that he felt sure that the killing and wounding of Americans on the American side of the border was the result of firing of Carrancistas, and that this firing was done for the purpose of causing the United States troops to interfere.

Senator FALL. Did you know anything of the military record or standing of Gen. Angeles?

Col. GLOVER. I did; I knew that Gen. Angeles was a very distinguished artillery officer, and that he had military training in Europe, and at one time was in command of about 60 pieces of artillery when Villa's power was at its height.

Senator FALL. What was his reputation generally as a gentleman and a sincere and straightforward soldier, if you know?

Col. GLOVER. Personally, I thought that he was one of the foremost soldiers of the Mexican race, and one of the most honorable, upright men of that race that was alive at the time.

Senator FALL. Colonel, you had already, prior to the receipt of this note, of course, investigated the shooting across to El Paso?

Col. GLOVER. I had, sir; personally.

Senator FALL. I judge from the list of the casualties presented to the committee by Gen. Howze, that the conclusions reached by yourself, were at variance, at least to some extent, with those set forth in the Angeles letter?

Col. GLOVER. They were, although I would like to qualify that remark by saying that I believe that Gen. Angeles was sincere and truthful in all of his statements, but that he was not correctly informed.

Senator FALL. In other words, you were convinced from your examination, that at least some of the shots fired into El Paso were fired by the attacking forces of Villa?

Col. GLOVER. I am, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you convince yourself that none of the shots fired into El Paso were coming from Carranza troops?

Col. GLOVER. I did not, as a matter of fact, I listened to quite a few of them whistle by my ears and saw the Carrancistas firing them.

Senator FALL. Where were you, Colonel, during the fighting?

Col. GLOVER. I was most of the time at district headquarters, but occasionally things would come up which made it appear necessary for me to be present in person. For example, Col. Merrill of the Eighty-second Field Artillery reported to me by telephone about 10.30, the night of June 15, that the Mexicans were sniping his headquarters, located at that time at Peyton's packing plant, and that they had killed one of his men, and severely wounded another. I asked Col. Merrill to determine by whom these shots were fired, whether by Villistas or Carrancistas, and he stated he was unable to determine that fact. Knowing, or rather, having a better knowledge of the location of all troops, both Carrancistas and Villistas than Col. Merrill could possibly have from his limited view of the action, I went to Peyton's packing plant at once, and asked him if this sniping was still continuing, and that if so I wanted to witness it. We went on top of Peyton's packing plant building, the moon was shining fairly bright, Col. Merrill, Capt. Hutchinson, and one soldier, under my instructions exposed themselves with instructions that as soon as they saw the flash of the guns to drop, in about a minute after we exposed ourselves we saw a flash of a gun directly opposite the river in an adobe building, which I knew, at that time, was occupied by Villa soldiers. We dropped very quickly and the bullet took a chip off of the mortar of the chimney, right close to Col. Merrill; no, I believe it was Capt. Hutchinson—it is immaterial—I remained there until I was convinced that these men belonged to Villa's command, and that they were deliberately sniping the headquarters of the Eighty-second Field Artillery.

Senator FALL. Now, you stated that you had evidence convincing to you that the Carrancistas were also shooting into El Paso. How did you ascertain that?

Col. GLOVER. About 4.30 a. m., June 16, I could see from my office in the Mills Building, and heard the sound of very heavy rifle and machine-gun fire direct from the vicinity of Fort Hidalgo. I telephoned to headquarters of the Twenty-fourth Infantry, at the customhouse, and asked if there was any firing into El Paso, and was told by the officer, am not sure who he was, that a rain of bullets was striking the customhouse, and that it was as much as a man's life was worth—to use his own words—to poke his head out of the window.

Senator FALL. That was the American customhouse.

Col. GLOVER. Yes, sir. I reported this to Gen. Erwin, and he directed me to go at once, and stand on the Santa Fe Street Bridge until I could be assured as to the identity of the troops that were doing the firing. It only took me a few minutes to ascertain by a personal observation that those shots were coming from Carranza troops, who were making an attack against the Villistas in such a manner that it would be impossible for a great majority of those shots not to strike in El Paso.

Senator FALL. Did you cross the river at any time, Colonel, during the fighting?

Col. GLOVER. The plans were for the Cavalry brigade, composed of the Seventh and Eighth Cavalry, and a battalion of the Eighty-second Field Artillery, with some special troops, to cross the Rio Grande in the vicinity of Rock Ford, Rock or San Lorenzo Ford, to cut off the retreat of the hostile forces down the river valley, and then to cross at the Santa Fe Street Bridge with the Twenty-fourth Infantry, supported by two batteries of the Eighty-second Field Artillery. After issuing the order to the commander of the Cavalry brigade, I went to the customs house building, and directed him to report to me when he had effected his crossing. In the meantime I gave Gen. Erwin's orders to Col. Hadsell to prepare to attack the Villa forces in Juarez, and also notified the Mexican Carranza commander, Gen. Gonzales, to get his forces out of our way, if he did not want them to get hurt. At 11.20 p. m., the Cavalry commander reported that he had completed his crossing, and orders were given to Col. Hadsell to attack. At the Santa Fe Street Bridge, I saw two or three Carranza officers with about 15 men directly in the path of the troops on the other side, and went to these officers and told them that we were going to attack the Villista forces, and advised them to get their men out of the way. These Carranza officers seemed very much gratified at the time to see American troops crossing. I questioned them as to how we could distinguish between the Villa men and the Carranza troops, and was told that the uniform of the Carranza troops, during the fighting, was to have the left pants leg rolled up over the knee, and the right; no, both sleeves rolled up over the elbow. We made every effort to distinguish between the forces, but I think in the heat of the fighting, some of the breeches legs dropped down.

Senator FALL. Did all go in the same direction?

Col. GLOVER. All of them I saw, sir, except this one detachment; they seemed to think that they had obtained immunity, were going in the direction of Fort Hidalgo, or in the direction of the bosque down the river.

Senator FALL. You could fairly well distinguish then between the Carrancistas and Villistas when they started?

Col. GLOVER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. It is necessary to have some conferences with other witnesses, and the committee will be in recess until half past 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

(The committee then, at 3 o'clock p. m., February 6, 1920, adjourned to meet at 10.30 o'clock, Saturday, February 7, 1920.)

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
*El Paso, Tex.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to the call of the chairman, at 10.30 o'clock a. m., in the county court room, courthouse, El Paso, Tex., Senator A. B. Fall presiding.

Present: Senator A. B. Fall and Senator Marcus A. Smith, and Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee.

TESTIMONY OF MR. W. S. MURPHY.

(Was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Mr. Murphy, are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What State are you a native of?

Mr. MURPHY. Mississippi.

Senator FALL. What is your business?

Mr. MURPHY. Telegraph operator and manager.

Senator FALL. Where are you stationed?

Mr. MURPHY. Columbus, N. Mex.

Senator FALL. How long have you been in Columbus?

Mr. MURPHY. A little better than four years.

Senator FALL. Were you in Columbus, N. Mex., on or about the 9th of March, 1916?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What were you doing at that time?

Mr. MURPHY. At that time I was telegraph operator for the El Paso & Southwestern; I did the railroad telegraphing and that of the Western Union Telegraph Co.

Senator FALL. Where were you living, with reference to your office?

Mr. MURPHY. I was living at the Columbus Hotel, about two blocks north of the depot.

Senator FALL. Just prior to March 9 were there any messages received by you, or through you, from any point with reference to a prospective attack upon the town of Columbus?

Mr. MURPHY. Why, Senator, there was, to the best of my remembrance, a telegram was received from military headquarters at Douglas.

Senator FALL. Douglas, Ariz.?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir; Douglas, Ariz., to the commanding officer of the Thirteenth Cavalry to the effect that Villa and a number of men, I don't recollect the number, were down about Boca Grande. That was a day or two before the raid; I can not recollect the date.

Senator FALL. Boca Grande?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You don't know exactly how long before the raid it was?

Mr. MURPHY. No, sir; I can not recollect, Senator; but a day or two.

Senator FALL. More than one day?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir; at least two.

Senator FALL. And it was addressed to the military commander?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Who was the commander?

Mr. MURPHY. Col. Slocum—H. J. Slocum.

Senator FALL. Was that telegram, to your knowledge, delivered?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir; by me.

Senator FALL. By yourself, and it notified the commander that there were a number of Mexicans?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Over at Boca Grande. Do you know, or have you ever had pointed out to you, what the Boca Grande is; do you know what it is?

Mr. MURPHY. I understand it is a river down there, the Boca Grande River.

Senator FALL. About how far was that from Columbus, or from the Gibson ranch, if you know?

Mr. MURPHY. I don't know about the Gibson ranch, Senator, but my understanding is that it is about approximately 30 miles from Columbus.

Senator FALL. You know where the Gibson ranch is?

Mr. MURPHY. By direction only; I have never been there.

Senator FALL. You know approximately the distance from Columbus?

Mr. MURPHY. I think about 14 miles.

Senator FALL. In a southwesterly direction?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Columbus is how far from the international boundary line?

Mr. MURPHY. My understanding is about two miles and a half.

Senator FALL. In the United States?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. In the State of New Mexico?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir; north of the boundary.

Senator FALL. And in the State of New Mexico?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. The Gibson ranch is on the international boundary line?

Mr. MURPHY. I am not sure.

Senator FALL. Did this telegram state who this army of men were, who they are supposed to be—Villistas or Carrancistas?

Mr. MURPHY. I don't recollect, Senator.

Senator FALL. Now, did this matter seem to be one of common knowledge, or within the knowledge of any other person whom you know—that is, that there was a proposed attack upon Columbus?

Mr. MURPHY. Why, I don't know about the proposed attack, Senator, but it is my belief that it was generally known that this bunch of Villistas were in that neighborhood and some were of the opinion that they might attack Columbus, and others were of the opinion they would be afraid to attack Columbus with the Thirteenth Cavalry there.

Senator FALL. Do you know Mr. George Sees?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you see him in or around Columbus at that time?

Mr. MURPHY. He came to Columbus at least three days prior to the raid.

Senator FALL. Who was he?

Mr. MURPHY. He was an Associated Press correspondent.

Senator FALL. Did you have a conversation with him?

Mr. MURPHY. Why, I don't recollect any particular conversation.

Senator FALL. Did you learn what his business was there?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What was his business there?

Mr. MURPHY. He knew that the Villistas were down in that section, and he thought, I guess, there would be something startling take place down there and wanted to be on the ground to cover the story for the press association.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether he attempted to make any arrangements to cover the story?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What arrangements did he make?

Mr. MURPHY. On the evening of the raid; that is, on the afternoon late, he sent a telegram to an operator of the Associated Press, who was said to be an expert in the telegraph business.

Senator FALL. What was his name?

Mr. MURPHY. Van Camp.

Senator FALL. He was said to be very expert?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And Sees, the Associated Press correspondent, wired Van Camp?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir; and later wired him not to come.

Senator FALL. Why did he wire him not to come?

Mr. MURPHY. He wired him because he found out I could handle the matter there.

Senator FALL. After experience he found that you were qualified to handle the matter?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And he wired Van Camp not to come?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did Van Camp come?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did he assist in handling the news story?

Mr. MURPHY. Very materially; yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did Sees, as Associated Press correspondent, send out any stories before the raid?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What story did he handle?

Mr. MURPHY. Why; one I can recollect, Senator, was telling of the hanging of Mr. Corbett and Mr. McKinney down on one of the Palomas Land & Cattle Co. ranches in the Boca Grande district. That is one that I recollect.

Senator FALL. What time did Van Camp arrive, or when did he arrive?

Mr. MURPHY. The train at that time, I believe, got to Columbus at 11.45, or approximately 11.45; he came on that train.

Senator FALL. How long was that prior to the raid?

Mr. MURPHY. Well, the best estimate we have of the time of the raid was about between 4 and 4.30.

Senator FALL. In the morning?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. He arrived at 11?

Mr. MURPHY. That would make it approximately five hours before the attack.

Senator FALL. When did you first see Van Camp?

Mr. MURPHY. Between 6 and 7 in my office.

Senator FALL. After the raid.

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir; he had gotten to the office before I had.

Senator FALL. He was inside?

Mr. MURPHY. Inside; yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What was he doing?

Mr. MURPHY. He was in the office looking the instruments over: there were several wires, some we used exclusively for the purpose of the railroad company in the transaction of their business, and the other wires were devoted to the transaction of the Western Union Telegraph Co.'s business, handling public messages, and he was there trying to find out which one of those wires was the commercial wire. He had never been in the office before and was not familiar with the switchboard location of the wires or instruments and had to feel his way to find out which one of the wires he could use.

Senator FALL. You showed him, did you?

Mr. MURPHY. Why, he had it located when I got there.

Senator FALL. What was he doing with the wires?

Mr. MURPHY. Why, he was sending some stuff, or started shortly after I got there, some dispatch.

Senator FALL. Concerning the raid?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where was Sees at this time?

Mr. MURPHY. Sees, I expect, was out gathering facts.

Senator FALL. And Van Camp sending it over the wire?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir; and Van Camp also later in the day went out and gathered story-matter himself.

Senator FALL. Did you notice anything unusual in the way of a fire, in or near Columbus prior to the raid, the evening before?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What was that?

Mr. MURPHY. I stopped there—had a room at the Columbus Hotel, and my room faced the east, or rather there was a window to the east. I don't recollect now why I went to my room about 7 o'clock, but I went up there approximately 7, maybe 8; I went up and looked out the window and I saw what appeared to me to be a fire, possibly a railroad trestle or bridge. I hurried down to the station and on the way down there I met young McCullough, the son of the section foreman of the El Paso and Southwestern Railroad Co., and I told him to go and tell his father to come to the office, that I thought there was a bridge on fire, and I knew that he would like to know it. After that I went into the office, and the Drummers' Special was leaving El Paso, or rather getting ready to leave El Paso, and as customary when a train leaves a terminal, they have to have what is called a clearance before they can leave a station, and just as I got in the office I heard the El Paso operator at the Union Depot ask the dispatcher at Douglas, Ariz., if it was all right to clear No. 7, and when I heard that I broke in and told him no, and I told him why, and in the meantime I stated to Mr. McCullough, the section foreman, I told the dispatcher I thought there was a bridge on fire, and he said there were no bridges there and I was mistaken.

Senator FALL. You were not familiar with the line there?

Mr. MURPHY. No, sir; I wanted to play safe in order to prevent a collision, or a wreck, if I could prevent it. Anyway, Mr. McCullough, the section foreman, thought it best to go down there and see what the fire was, what caused it; so he went down there and he discovered it was the grass on fire, apparently caught from some unknown source, and he came back and reported it was the grass on fire, and at that time the train dispatcher had released the Drummers' Special No. 7, telling them the track was all right; they could proceed.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether at that time there was a barb-wire fence along the international boundary, along the boundary line?

Mr. MURPHY. I understand there has been.

Senator FALL. Was there any along the right of way?

Mr. MURPHY. There is one along there, and there was two fences along the right of way of the El Paso and Southwestern Railway at that time.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether that fence was intact about the scene of the fire?

Mr. MURPHY. I can not really tell you.

Senator FALL. You don't know yourself?

Mr. MURPHY. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you know, or did you know any Mexican telegraph operator at that time in that vicinity?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What operator?

Mr. MURPHY. Why, I don't recall the man's name; he was introduced to me by somebody, I don't recollect now by whom, as being a telegraph operator for the Carranza Government stationed at Palomas Station, a little station in Chihuahua, just south of Columbus, Luna County, N. Mex.

Senator FALL. Did he come to the office the evening before the raid?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir; between, I think, 8 and 9 o'clock he came to my office and the man having been pointed out to me as a telegrapher, even though a different nationality, etc., I guess he felt like we were sort of brothers in misery, being both telegraph operators, he came in my office I suppose in the spirit of friendliness trying to get me out of trouble. I knew no Spanish whatever and from what I could gather from him he knew Villa was around in the neighborhood and was trying to get me out of the way.

Senator FALL. You think he did that in the spirit of friendliness to warn you to get out the way?

Mr. MURPHY. I understood it that way; yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Trying to tell you of Villa's prospective raid?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether any of the citizens there at Columbus received any messages concerning the proposed raid about that time before the raid occurred?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Who?

Mr. MURPHY. I remember one distinctly, Mr. S. H. Birchfield, commonly known as Uncle Steve, who lives in El Paso, rather, his family lives here; he spent part of his time here and part of it on the ranch east of Columbus.

Senator FALL. What was the purport of the telegram that he received?

Mr. MURPHY. To the best of my knowledge, Senator, the message was to the effect his relatives here—whoever had sent the message seemed to have some knowledge of this pending raid and they were very much uneasy about him and they wanted to know how he was and they suggested that he come to El Paso; that they thought it was very much safer.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether there were any military telegrams received from headquarters at El Paso by Col. Slocum?

Mr. MURPHY. I don't recollect, Senator; from the El Paso headquarters?

Senator FALL. The only military telegram you recall was one from Douglas, Ariz., about two days before the attack?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir; at that time I will say the Columbus military was under the jurisdiction of the commanding officer at Douglas.

Senator FALL. And not at El Paso?

Mr. MURPHY. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Where were you about 4 o'clock in the morning?

Mr. MURPHY. I was in the Columbus Hotel.

Senator FALL. Did anything unusual occur there?

Mr. MURPHY. Well, sir, I woke up and was startled, of course.

Senator FALL. What startled you?

Mr. MURPHY. Why, guns firing; it sounded just a little bit like thunder; that is, when the volleys were fired it sounded a little bit like thunder and worse, too.

Senator FALL. It woke you up?

Mr. MURPHY. Absolutely.

Senator FALL. Did you remain in the hotel, or get out?

Mr. MURPHY. I stuck around there a little while, Senator, but I thought the Villistas were coming up there, and knew naturally, being a place where they would look for a number of people in one place and could make a good killing at one time, I decided I had better take my chances in the open, and I went out in a north-westerly direction, thinking possibly I could get over to a friend's house that I was satisfied had some arms, that was one thing, and then another thing there was a large draw, or arroyo, drain that would place me below the level of the ground and be safer.

Senator FALL. Well, what did you see, if anything, when you got out?

Mr. MURPHY. When I got out, when I first got out of the house; it was a two-story-affair; I went down the steps as noiselessly as possible, thinking there might be some of them sticking around to pot some of us; I went out the front, it faced north, went to the east side, looked around the house and at that point, I don't know whether it was intended for me or not, but there was a bullet whistled by me pretty close, and I decided I had business a little further on, and then is when I went to this place just mentioned.

Senator FALL. You made your way to your friend's house finally?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes; rapidly, and on the way over there I got pretty confused, it was dark, you know, and I ran into three or four mesquite bushes and upset myself several times; I got approximately a block and a half from this hotel, or I guess 25 or 30, maybe 50, shots came; afterwards in discussing them with military people they told me Villa's machine guns had been trained right down there in my direction, and I stayed there a while and thought maybe there would be more of it and I would be safer on the ground, I stayed there a little while and then went a little further, then got down again and then went on again.

Senator FALL. You advanced in rushes?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir; to the rear. When I was lying there I saw a fire; they had set fire to a store at that time that went under the name of Lemon & Payne. They ran a store there, and just a little after that I heard some voices and I recognized one as the young man that worked in the depot with me, and he in company with Mr. R. W. Elliott. I did not know what they were doing over there, I was glad to see them and they took me over to Mr. Elliott's house. Mr. Elliott has an adobe and semirock house building; we all went over there; quite a few people in there besides those I just mentioned; a couple of families were in there, and we watched the show from there.

Senator FALL. Could you see what was going on?

Mr. MURPHY. Why, we could see the men moving out there, but it was a little too far to distinguish faces or anything. We could see the people moving about.

Senator FALL. You remained there until about 6 or 7 o'clock in the morning when you went to your office and found Van Camp trying to work the wires?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you know a telephone operator, a lady?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir; a Mrs. Parks.

Senator FALL. Yes; Mrs. Parks.

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. There was a telephone line from Columbus to Deming, N. Mex.?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you know where Mrs. Parks is now?

Mr. MURPHY. Why, Mr. Parks is somewhere up in Washington; I don't know whether she is with him or not, and I don't recollect the name of the place, but if it is valuable to you to have that information, I can find out.

TESTIMONY OF MR. S. H. McCULLOUGH.

(The witness was duly sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., secretary of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. I am.

Senator FALL. Where do you live?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Columbus, N. Mex.

Senator FALL. Of what State are you a native?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Louisiana.

Senator FALL. Where were you on about March 9, 1916?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Columbus, N. Mex.

Senator FALL. What was your business at that time?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Section foreman of the El Paso & Southwestern.

Senator FALL. Were you called, or consulted on the afternoon of March 8 by the telegraph operator, Mr. Murphy at that place?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. I was.

Senator FALL. Concerning a fire along the right of way?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you make any investigation as to that fire?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. I did.

Senator FALL. What was the result of your investigation?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. As soon as I was notified, Senator, I went down to the tool house and got my motor car out and got three Mexicans and taken my son with me, and there was a couple of soldiers happened to be there at the tool house, they suggested they would go with me and I went out about two miles and a half east of Columbus, maybe a little bit more, a mile and two-thirds, and we found it to be grass. The grass was kinder high and rank on the right of way. The grass was burning on the north side of the track, and I fought the fire out, put it out, and turned back to Columbus and reported to the dispatcher in Douglas what the fire was and that I had put it out.

Senator FALL. Was there a fence along the right of way?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir; a fence on each side.

Senator FALL. Did you notice the condition of the fence?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Not that night, because it was dark and we were busy fighting the fire and paid no attention to it.

Senator FALL. Did you have your attention called to the condition of the fence at any time soon thereafter?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. The next day.

Senator FALL. What was the condition of the fence at about the location of the fire?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Well, there was a small bridge about a mile east of Columbus, a little bit more than a mile east of the depot and at the west end of this bridge the fence was cut the next day.

Senator FALL. You saw it the next day?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You don't know when it was cut?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. No, sir; but I can say it was not cut on the night of the 9th, because I came along there—I mean the day of the 8th—because in returning from work I would have seen it.

Senator FALL. Then it must have been cut that night?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir; and then there is another bridge about 1 mile farther on east and the fence was cut there, and the fence was cut between the first bridge and Columbus—cut in three places.

Senator FALL. The right of way fence?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir; on both sides.

Senator FALL. Within a distance of 3 miles from Columbus?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. In 3 miles, about every mile and a half.

Senator FALL. Was the fence cut on both sides of the right of way?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you notice any tracks there?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Horse tracks; they turned right across the tracks.

Senator FALL. Through the gap in the fence?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes; from one side to the other.

Senator FALL. Where were you on the night of the 8th and morning of the 9th?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. I was at home in the section house at Columbus.

Senator FALL. How far is the section house from the railroad station?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Just east of the depot, a rock's throw from the depot.

Senator FALL. Just east?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes; on the south side of the tracks.

Senator FALL. The railway in Columbus?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Just south of the railroad and east of the depot.

Senator FALL. Your house was almost within the military encampment?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir; the hospital was just back of our house, the Thirteenth Cavalry hospital.

Senator FALL. Now, was there any military encampment on the north side of the tracks?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. No, sir; some officers lived on the north side of the track.

Senator FALL. The principal portion of the town of Columbus lies on the north side of the tracks?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. The encampment is on the south side of the track?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes.

Senator FALL. What occurred, if anything, during that night, out of the ordinary?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. There was a whole lot occurred, Senator. I was up quite late that night, went out to the fire and put the fire out, and when I got back from the fire I was a little bit hungry and went over to a restaurant, my son and I, and got a little lunch.

Senator FALL. A restaurant in town on the north side of the tracks?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir; and came back and before I went to bed—I had not had a chance to read the paper—I read the paper, and it was nearly 12 o'clock before I went to bed. I noticed when I went over in town it looked to me like the town was full of strange Mexicans and I woke my wife up—I did not wake the children—I woke her and told her that things did not look good to me, and of course it was common knowledge; we had all heard about these people being killed or harmed over around Boca Grande; it was rumored quite frequently that Villa was down south of Columbus and I told her that things did not look good and she kinder laughed at me for being uneasy; she stated that Villa would not attack this town and I dismissed it that way and went to sleep.

Senator FALL. You were practically within the military encampment?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where your house was?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You were awake until about 12 o'clock?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Was there any activity out of the ordinary in the military encampment?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. I did not notice any; none at all.

Senator FALL. They usually had sentinels around the camp?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. They always had sentinels; I understood they always had sentinels.

Senator FALL. You noticed no extra forces?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. I did not notice any extraordinary precautions.

Senator FALL. When you went over to the restaurant did you notice any soldiers on duty in the town itself?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. No, sir.

Senator FALL. You noticed a large number of Mexicans?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. I noticed a good many strange Mexicans in town all day on the 8th and going out to work that morning I met two bunches, one four and one three, going to Columbus on foot, and the bunch of three men stopped me, waved their hands; I did not know what they wanted; I stopped and they wanted water; I gave them water out of my keg; and then I did not hear these first shots as I was up late and my wife woke me up and says, called me by my given name, she says, "Sam, what in the world does all this mean?" It took me a little while to get thoroughly awake and when I did get awake I heard Mexicans hollering, "Viva Mexico, viva Villa," and the shooting. I said it simply means Villa is attacking the town; get up and get the children up; and we got off the bed and I put the mattress down on the floor; I got my wife and children down on the mattresses, and there was seven shots hit my house and passed through the house while we were in there.

Senator FALL. Seven shots?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. None of them injured you; you escaped unhurt?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir; we escaped unhurt; none of us injured; we stayed there until a building was set on fire and that lit up the town; then I crawled on my hands and knees in the house trying to find some way to get out; I would have gone out if it had not been for my wife; she would not go; she said she thought it would be safer to stay in the house; after these buildings were fired I crept to the back door and ventured to open the door a little bit and stuck my head out; I seen some soldiers going through my yard; they were American soldiers; I hollered to them and asked if it was safe for me to leave and get my wife and children out and they said it was not safe, but it was not safe to stay in the house, as the Mexicans were in the ditch just west of the house, shooting down town, and they said go fast and go to the camp; I did not know where we were going; we left the house; I got right to the corner of the hospital and some one, I think it was the agent, Mr. Jiggers, he hollered at me to come in the hospital, and I taken my wife and went in the hospital and stayed there.

Senator FALL. That was the military hospital?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir; the Thirteenth Cavalry.

Senator FALL. That was on the south side of the tracks?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir; just directly south of my house.

Senator FALL. These first shots that awakened you; were they in town or in the military encampment?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. In the military camp; she said she heard the first shots fired somewhere about headquarters, southwest of my house about a block.

Senator FALL. Now, the general course of the railroad there is east and west, is it not?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir; east and west.

Senator FALL. And you have referred to this ditch on the west; there was an old railroad right of way embankment there?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir; this ditch runs north and south.

Senator FALL. That embankment or grade extended practically from Deming south and across to the line; does it not?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And on the west side of that embankment the water eroded quite an arroyo or ditch?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir; it is a deep ditch, about 4 or 5 feet deep, 6 feet.

Senator FALL. So parties could travel, several men abreast, that ditch?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Then they had the military encampment and town immediately to their east?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. They could travel north and south any way they pleased?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And rake the streets of Columbus from the security of that ditch?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. When did you leave the hospital where you had taken refuge with your family?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Oh, I went the next morning. We began to get out of there a little after sunup, about sunup, a little bit after sunup; I can not say what time it was; we thought it was safe to venture out.

Senator FALL. That was the morning of the raid?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir; and nosed around to see what had happened?

Senator FALL. What did you see?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. You mean, Senator, what did I see in town?

Senator FALL. Did you see any dead people?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Yes, sir; seen a good many dead people, seen quite a lot of property destroyed, stores looted and burned.

TESTIMONY OF MR. LEE RIGGS.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., secretary of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What State are you a native of?

Mr. RIGGS. Texas.

Senator FALL. Where do you live?

Mr. RIGGS. Columbus, N. Mex.

Senator FALL. How long have you resided at Columbus?

Mr. RIGGS. Six years.

Senator FALL. What is your business?

Mr. RIGGS. Deputy collector of customs.

Senator FALL. How long have you been deputy collector of customs?

Mr. RIGGS. Six years.

Senator FALL. Have you a family.

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where were you on or about March 9, 1916?

Mr. RIGGS. In Columbus, N. Mex.

Senator FALL. Is your office in your residence?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. At Columbus. Just where is your residence situated.

Mr. RIGGS. My residence is situated west of the depot, about a couple of hundred feet, a little west of the depot, southwest.

Senator FALL. Where is it situated with reference to the old railroad grade that runs north and south there?

Mr. RIGGS. The railroad grade is about 40 feet east of it; it faces on the grade.

Senator FALL. Is there an arroyo there between your house and the grade?

Mr. RIGGS. There is.

Senator FALL. How do you cross that arroyo?

Mr. RIGGS. Have a foot bridge.

Senator FALL. How far is it from your house to the military hospital, at that time; as it existed at that time?

Mr. RIGGS. About 150 or 200 yards.

Senator FALL. And your house is almost immediately west; in a westerly direction, I mean.

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir; northwest.

Senator FALL. Your house is how far south of the railroad tracks?

Mr. RIGGS. Probably 75 feet.

Senator FALL. So that your house is approximately within the corner made by this arroyo on the east of the old railroad grade and the present line of the railroad running east and west?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Mr. Riggs, I suppose that you retired as usual on the night of the 8th of March, 1916?

Mr. RIGGS. I can not say that I did.

Senator FALL. Well, why did you not retire with the same feeling of security that usually you would have?

Mr. RIGGS. That day Col. Slocum had sent a messenger down to the Boca Grande, he went to the Gibson ranch and was instructed to get in behind these Villistas and follow them and see where they went to. This messenger returned and he made his report to Col. Slocum about 8 o'clock that evening.

Senator FALL. Now, who was this messenger?

Mr. RIGGS. He was a Mexican.

Senator FALL. Do you recall his name?

Mr. RIGGS. I do not recall his name.

Senator FALL. Favela.

Mr. RIGGS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Gomez?

Mr. RIGGS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. You know the Favela brothers?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir; they had made a report two or three days before.

Senator FALL. Juan Favela?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir; that was two or three days before he made his report.

Senator FALL. Were you present when he made his report?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you know what the purport of this report was?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You speak Spanish, don't you?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Col. Slocum was not familiar with the Spanish language, was he?

Mr. RIGGS. No, sir; I don't believe he was.

Senator FALL. Did you do any interpreting at any time for Col. Slocum, or did you take any notes of any report made to him?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You write shorthand?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you take any shorthand notes of any report made to him?

Mr. RIGGS. I took shorthand notes of the report.

Senator FALL. The last report or the first?

Mr. RIGGS. The last one.

Senator FALL. You did not of the first report made by Juan Favela?

Mr. RIGGS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. But you know something of the purport of that report, do you?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What was it?

Mr. RIGGS. He stated to the colonel that there was a body of Villistas had passed down by the Boca Grande and then south of Palomas and the main body had turned toward Guzman.

Senator FALL. This is Favela, now?

Mr. RIGGS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Go ahead with this report. That was the report on this afternoon?

Mr. RIGGS. Made the evening before the raid.

Senator FALL. Made by a Mexican whose name you don't recollect?

Mr. RIGGS. And there was a party gone in the direction of Palomas. This Mexican did not know how many, but he estimated probably 30 or 40.

Senator FALL. The Villa party; he was following them, was he not?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir; he said he followed them.

Senator FALL. He had been sent down there to follow them and ascertain their movements?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. His report was to the effect that they had separated?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And a portion of the band had gone down toward Guzman?

Mr. RIGGS. The main body.

Senator FALL. And the others were approaching Palomas?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Were there any soldiers at Palomas?

Mr. RIGGS. No, sir; there were, as well as I remember, some customs men over there; a small number.

Senator FALL. Where was the nearest Carranza garrison?

Mr. RIGGS. I don't know of any nearer than Casas Grande at that time.

Senator FALL. But there were Mexican customs officials at Columbus?

Mr. RIGGS. I think there were customs officials there; yes.

Senator FALL. Now, you know the location of the Gibson ranch?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where is the Gibson ranch located with reference to Columbus?

Mr. RIGGS. Almost west of Columbus.

Senator FALL. How is it located with reference to the international boundary?

Mr. RIGGS. The ranch building is right on the boundary; within a few feet.

Senator FALL. How far is the Gibson ranch from Columbus?

Mr. RIGGS. About 14 miles.

Senator FALL. Almost due west?

Mr. RIGGS. Almost due west.

Senator FALL. How far is Columbus from the international boundary?

Mr. RIGGS. Three miles from the line.

Senator FALL. Is the international boundary fenced?

Mr. RIGGS. There is a fence along there.

Senator FALL. There was at that time?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. There is a gate in that fence south of Columbus?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir; a gate south of Columbus.

Senator FALL. Where is that gate with reference to the old railroad grade?

Mr. RIGGS. The railroad grade passes through the gate.

Senator FALL. Do you know who had sent this Mexican down there to follow the Villistas and make a report?

Mr. RIGGS. Col. Slocum.

Senator FALL. Col. Slocum. When did he send him?

Mr. RIGGS. It was on March 8.

Senator FALL. Who furnished the Mexican to Col. Slocum; he wasn't a soldier, was he?

Mr. RIGGS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Where did he live, if you know, this Mexican?

Mr. RIGGS. I don't know where he lived.

Senator FALL. Now, as to this Favela report that was made two or three days before, what was the purport of that report?

Mr. RIGGS. Favela had seen these Mexicans, these Villistas, down on the Boca Grande. He was down there rounding up cattle with these men that were killed.

Senator FALL. Corbett and McKinney?

Mr. RIGGS. Corbett and McKinney and the other man.

Senator FALL. He made his escape?

Mr. RIGGS. He made his escape and came direct to Columbus.

Senator FALL. Where is the Boca Grande; what is it; what do you mean by Boca Grande?

Mr. RIGGS. It is the Casas Grande River; it comes out from down about Casas Grande and flows north and then turns east and finally turns south back into Lake Guzman.

Senator FALL. And flows north through a gap in the mountain?

Mr. RIGGS. I don't know about that.

Senator FALL. Where it flows north is what you call the Boca Grande?

Mr. RIGGS. I think so.

Senator FALL. Then it turns east through the mountains?

Mr. RIGGS. I think it does.

Senator FALL. Then flows south from the mountains and flows into Lake Guzman?

Mr. RIGGS. I believe it does, according to the map. I have never been down there.

Senator FALL. Where is the Boca Grande as it passes through the mountains south from the Gibson Ranch?

Mr. RIGGS. I am not positive about that.

Senator FALL. You know where it is; you can see it from Columbus?

Mr. RIGGS. It must be about 35 miles.

Senator FALL. In what direction?

Mr. RIGGS. It must be a little south of the Gibson Ranch, or southwest.

Senator FALL. And in a general southwesterly direction from Columbus?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. It is much nearer to the Gibson ranch than the town of Columbus?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir; at that point.

Senator FALL. Now, Mr. Riggs, you said you had heard these reports; were you not satisfied when you heard that the main body of these Villistas was going toward Guzman, which was away from Columbus?

Mr. RIGGS. I thought this small body might attack Palomas.

Senator FALL. But Palomas is across into Mexico?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. How far from the line?

Mr. RIGGS. About 4 miles south of the line.

Senator FALL. Then it is about 7 miles from Columbus?

Mr. RIGGS. It is about 7 miles from Columbus.

Senator FALL. You did not feel any danger to yourself or family in Columbus from an attack on Palomas, did you?

Mr. RIGGS. I can not say that I did; still, at the same time I was a little nervous.

Senator FALL. Now, what, if anything, occurred to alarm you that night, and about when?

Mr. RIGGS. The first we knew of any trouble about 4.30 I heard a shot directly south of the customhouse.

Senator FALL. Four-thirty in the morning?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir; that was the morning of the 9th.

Senator FALL. Now, the customhouse was where you were sleeping?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. That is, your office and residence were in the same building?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You heard the shooting where?

Mr. RIGGS. It must have been right south of us.

Senator FALL. That would be on the south side of the tracks from town?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And on the same side of the tracks as the military encampment?

Mr. RIGGS. The same side.

Senator FALL. How far did it appear to be from the customhouse?

Mr. RIGGS. It could not have been very far; I should not think over a couple hundred feet, maybe 100 yards.

Senator FALL. Well, what followed the firing of this first shot?

Mr. RIGGS. A few seconds afterward, the firing opened up all over town and then the Villistas began to rush by the customhouse, they were yelling "Viva Villa" and "Viva Mexico" and "Mata los gringos."

Senator FALL. That is, hollered for Villa and hollered for Mexico, and to kill the Americans?

Mr. RIGGS. Our baby got to crying, we had a baby six months old, we were busy with her for some time, could not find the milk, or alcohol to warm it, and did not dare to strike a light.

Senator FALL. Why not?

Mr. RIGGS. These Villistas were all around the house and I just took it for granted that they might not suspect anyone lived there, they all knew it was an office.

Senator FALL. You thought if you made no noise in the house they might think it was unoccupied?

Mr. RIGGS. Might get by.

Senator FALL. You say they were all around the house; where were they in reference to the arroyo between your house and the railroad grade?

Mr. RIGGS. Some were in the arroyo and some back of the house.

Senator FALL. What did you find around the house, if anything?

Mr. RIGGS. We found shells lying up on a bedroom window the next morning and also found a couple of Mexican hats in the back yard. After we quieted the baby we probably stayed in there some 35 or 40 minutes; firing was going on all around us.

Senator FALL. All of the time?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir; and my wife was begging every minute to get out; it must have been a half hour afterwards that the Mexicans began to come back and our boys were running them back from camp. I heard a machine gun out between our place and the depot and I looked out and saw the machine gun was being operated by our soldiers.

Senator FALL. Where was this machine gun in reference to your house when you saw it?

Mr. RIGGS. Let me see, it was a little north of east, it was trained on the railroad to fire west.

Senator FALL. It was south of the railroad?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And it was trained west?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And your house was to the west?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. All right?

Mr. RIGGS. So I let the soldiers know we were in there and we hurriedly dressed and went over to the hospital, so we stayed in the hospital for a little while and while we were in there they brought in a machine gun or two that had jammed and worked on it.

Senator FALL. American machine guns that had jammed?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Who was in command at the hospital?

Mr. RIGGS. I don't remember.

Senator FALL. Was it an officer or noncommissioned officer, or who?

Mr. RIGGS. I believe it was when we first arrived there.

Senator FALL. Believe it was what?

Mr. RIGGS. A noncommissioned officer. I don't believe there was a commissioned officer there.

Senator FALL. Sergeant. was it not?

Mr. RIGGS. I believe a sergeant, not positive, whether sergeant or private. I don't think there was a commissioned officer there. My wife and I worked with the wounded around there.

Senator FALL. When you were there—pardon me for interrupting you—when you first went in the hospital was there a commissioned officer there?

Mr. RIGGS. I don't remember seeing one.

Senator FALL. Did you see one during the time you were in the hospital?

Mr. RIGGS. A doctor came afterwards, a commissioned officer.

Senator FALL. Now, go ahead, pardon me for interrupting you, you say you and your wife worked with the wounded?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes; a little while, then just as soon as it got daylight outside, I began to look around and somebody brought Bunk Spencer in, a colored man.

Senator FALL. From the Ojitos ranch?

Mr. RIGGS. From the Ojitos ranch.

Senator FALL. In old Mexico?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What was his condition?

Mr. RIGGS. Bunk had been held a prisoner for several days.

Senator FALL. By whom was he being held prisoner?

Mr. RIGGS. By Villa.

Senator FALL. He made his escape from them after they opened fire?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir; so I secured a statement from Bunk.

Senator FALL. You say you secured a statement, in what form?

Mr. RIGGS. Why, I just took it verbally.

Senator FALL. Did you ever make any notes of that statement?

Mr. RIGGS. Made some notes of it; yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Then, it impressed itself on your mind?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What was the general tenor of that statement?

Mr. RIGGS. Bunk said he had been with Villa several days and he had escaped that morning; I believe he said there were some 500 Villistas; Villa was with them; and he also said that Villa had made a speech the night before to his men, telling them that the next day they would be in Columbus and would have plenty to drink and there would be American women for the men. That was about the substance.

Senator FALL. He had not been harmed, had he, personally?

Mr. RIGGS. No, sir. Then I went down to see the buildings that had been burned; and saw the men that had been killed, some of them very badly burned.

Senator FALL. Bodies of the Americans which had been burned, where were they?

Mr. RIGGS. Well, Mr. Ritchie's body was lying out in front of the hotel ruined.

Senator FALL. What hotel?

Mr. RIGGS. The Commercial Hotel, the one that had been burnt. His body was badly scorched, and Mr. Miller and Dr. Hart were burned beyond recognition. The body of Dr. Hart, there was nothing but part of his skull left.

Senator FALL. Did you know Dr. Hart?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where did he reside, do you know?

Mr. RIGGS. At that time he was residing in El Paso.

Senator FALL. Do you know what his business was?

Mr. RIGGS. He was United States inspector for the Bureau of Animal Industry.

Senator FALL. His official duties called him—

Mr. RIGGS. Called him to Columbus.

Senator FALL. Did you know Mr. Miller?

Mr. RIGGS. No, sir; I did not.

Senator FALL. What time was it when you went in town?

Mr. RIGGS. Probably about 8 o'clock, maybe a little before.

Senator FALL. Did you see any persons from Deming, N. Mex., about that time, or thereafter?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. About when did you first see them?

Mr. RIGGS. It must have been about that time?

Senator FALL. Do you know how they came from Deming?

Mr. RIGGS. Came down in machines.

Senator FALL. Do you know why?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What was the occasion of their coming?

Mr. RIGGS. They came down to help us out. We had telephoned over there that the town was being attacked.

Senator FALL. How far is Deming from Columbus?

Mr. RIGGS. About 25 miles.

Senator FALL. There is no railroad from Columbus to Deming, is there?

Mr. RIGGS. Not direct; no.

Senator FALL. So, these people had come in an automobile?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir; several automobiles.

Senator FALL. The telephone operator, Mrs. Parks is her name?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Had telephoned that night during the attack?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. To alarm Deming, and ask assistance?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. About the time you went into town there were Deming people that had come in with automobiles?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir; about that time, they might have come a very little afterwards or a little before.

Senator FALL. Did you notice any papers, memoranda, notebook, or anything of that kind taken from the bodies of any of the Villistas, who were killed there?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What memoranda did you see?

Mr. RIGGS. I saw a notebook that was taken off a dead Villista that was a diary of their movements for some two months prior to the raid on Columbus.

Senator FALL. Was there anything connected with that notebook or with any other papers taken from the body of the same man which would identify the Mexican who had the notebook? Do you recollect his name?

Mr. RIGGS. I don't recollect it, but if I heard it I would probably remember it.

Senator FALL. Was his name Francisco Prado?

Mr. RIGGS. That's his name; yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Written on the flyleaf of this diary?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you remember the notes in this diary?

Mr. RIGGS. I remember two very distinctly.

Senator FALL. These notes were written in Spanish?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Of course, you could translate it?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What were the two happenings that particularly struck you?

Mr. RIGGS. The one, I believe, of January 10, and this stated that "we assaulted the train at Santa Isabel and killed 17 gringos," and the other was something like, I believe, it stated they had attacked a party of Carrancistas at Santa Ana.

Senator FALL. May I just call your attention to a memoranda and see if you recognize it as the notes in this book: "10th—To-day at about 11 a. m. we attacked two trains in Santa Isabel, killing 17 'gringos'; we left afterwards, sleeping in Lago." Is that the note?

Mr. RIGGS. That is the note.

Senator FALL. Eleventh, "11—We left for La Cienega; 12—We left for La Joya; Feb. 15—Hacienda Santa Ana"—that is one of the Hearst properties, an American property—"We defeated the enemy, taking 114 prisoners; more than 80 were killed; they left their horses and arms." That is their note you referred to?

Mr. RIGGS. That is their notes.

Senator FALL. These notes, "March 2, arrived at Colonia Pacheco"; that is one of the colonies?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. An American colony. "3. Left Colonia Pacheco to-day without provisions. 4. Went some 10 leagues to-day, where we found cattle. 5. Left to-day, going 6 leagues, killing enough head (cattle) for provisions. 6. We left the canyon in the afternoon. 7. Arrived to-day at dawn, having traveled all last night and part of to-day without incident of any kind." That was the last note?

Mr. RIGGS. That sounds like the notebook.

Senator FALL. And this notebook was taken from the dead body of a Mexican?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir; taken and turned over to me and I turned it over to a special agent of the Department of Justice.

Senator FALL. Did you see any other papers there in a bag or case of any kind?

Mr. RIGGS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you have your attention called to any paper or correspondence of Francisco Villa with anyone since that taken or found there at Columbus?

Mr. RIGGS. I can not say that I remember anything of that.

Senator FALL. You did not see it?

Mr. RIGGS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you see there later a book? Did you see a bill-book with the name of Tom Evans on it?

Mr. RIGGS. No, sir; I don't believe I saw that; I heard of it; I did not see it.

Senator FALL. Tom Evans was one of the men killed at Santa Isabel?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. When you went in town after the raid was over did you see any Mexican prisoners or did you thereafter see any prisoners?

Mr. RIGGS. I saw some prisoners afterward.

Senator FALL. Who were captured in the town or during the raid?

Mr. RIGGS. I don't know where they were captured.

Senator FALL. They were captured either in retreating or during the firing in town?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. About how many do you recollect?

Mr. RIGGS. I believe I saw six.

Senator FALL. Was there a trial thereafter held of those Mexicans?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Were you a witness in that trial?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where was the trial held?

Mr. RIGGS. Deming, N. Mex.

Senator FALL. And you were a witness?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you know what the result of the trial was?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What was it?

Mr. RIGGS. Convicted and hung.

Senator FALL. Did you have any interview with these men prior to their trial?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where?

Mr. RIGGS. At the Army hospital in Columbus.

Senator FALL. Did you take down any statements that were made by them, or did they make any statements?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes; they made a statement; they stated, five of them stated, well, they all stated they were with Villa on the raid of Columbus and took part in it; one of them claimed, however, that he had been captured at Santa Ana; however, he was the one that was not hung; only five of them were hung, and there was another one hung I did not see.

Senator FALL. One of them stated he was there under duress?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Compelled by Villa, and he was one of the original six, five of whom were sentenced to death and hung?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir; he was, I believe, sentenced for a life term; I don't know but what he was sentenced to be hung and his sentence was commuted by the governor.

Senator FALL. What was his name, do you remember?

Mr. RIGGS. I can refer to a notebook and tell you?

Senator FALL. Were these men in good bodily condition, able to move around when you interviewed them?

Mr. Riggs. They were all wounded.

Senator FALL. All wounded?

Mr. Riggs. Yes, sir; they were on cots.

Senator FALL. They were not able possibly to keep up with the retreat, so that was the reason for their capture?

Mr. Riggs. Yes, sir. Jose Rodriguez, I believe, was the name of the man that was not hung.

Senator FALL. Do you know where the Moody ranch is?

Mr. Riggs. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where?

Mr. Riggs. About 4 or 5 miles west of Columbus on the boundary line.

Senator FALL. Do you know anything about a raid on that ranch prior to the raid on Columbus?

Mr. Riggs. Yes, sir; the ranch building was burned along in the summer prior to the raiding of Columbus, supposed to have been done by Villistas from Palomas, tracks led across there.

Senator FALL. Were there any casualties during this raid?

Mr. Riggs. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Nobody hurt?

Mr. Riggs. There was a man sleeping out on the prairie; he did not stay in the house; he was afraid to stay in the house.

Senator FALL. Did you know Tom Kingsbury?

Mr. Riggs. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where is he?

Mr. Riggs. Tom Kingsbury disappeared along in July, 1918, from down on the Palomas Land & Cattle Co. ranch and has never been seen since.

Senator FALL. He was a foreman for the Palomas Land & Cattle Co.?

Mr. Riggs. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. That is an American company?

Mr. Riggs. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Tom Kingsbury was an American?

Mr. Riggs. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Texan, wasn't he?

Mr. Riggs. Yes, sir; I think so, he looked like one.

Senator FALL. You say he looked like one. Do you know anything about the raid on what is known as the "Corner" ranch?

Mr. Riggs. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where is the "Corner" ranch?

Mr. Riggs. The Corner ranch is in the south corner of the jog.

Senator FALL. That is where the American international boundary line runs south and then turns west?

Mr. Riggs. Yes, sir; in that southeast corner. Three Americans were killed there, Andy Peterson, and one named Jensen and Hugh Akara.

Senator FALL. They were killed?

Mr. Riggs. Their bodies were found; all had been shot.

Senator FALL. When was this?

Mr. Riggs. That was after the raid; that must have been January, 1917. January, or February, I don't remember.

Senator FALL. Where were the bodies found, in the United States or Mexico?

Mr. RIGGS. From reports, they were found about a half a mile south of the line; it seems that they had been captured at the Corner ranch and taken over there.

Senator FALL. They had been captured in the United States at the Corner ranch and taken across the line and their bodies were found there?

Mr. RIGGS. That is what I got from the reports.

Senator FALL. Who is the owner of the Corner ranch?

Mr. RIGGS. I believe the Warren Bros.

Senator FALL. Warren Bros. of Three Oaks, Mich.?

Mr. RIGGS. Not positive. I think that is part of their property.

Senator FALL. The committee will be in recess until 2 o'clock, but in the meantime witnesses who are here—some are not here from Columbus—will please be in conference with Judge Jackson at his office at 1 o'clock so we can best determine as to the taking of this evidence as rapidly as possible.

AFTER RECESS.

The committee met at 2.45 p. m. pursuant to adjournment, all present as in the morning session.

TESTIMONY OF MRS. LAURA RITCHIE.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, esq., secretary of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Mrs. Ritchie, are you a citizen of the United States?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Was your husband a citizen?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where is he?

Mrs. RITCHIE. He was murdered by the bandits.

Senator FALL. When did this occur, Mrs. Ritchie?

Mrs. RITCHIE. March 9, 1916.

Senator FALL. Where?

Mrs. RITCHIE. In Columbus, N. Mex.

Senator FALL. Were you there at the time?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Living with your husband?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir; and my family.

Senator FALL. What were you doing at that time?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Proprietors of the Commercial Hotel.

Senator FALL. Of whom did your family consist?

Mrs. RITCHIE. My husband and three daughters.

Senator FALL. What were the ages of your daughters?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Eight, fifteen, and twenty.

Senator FALL. At that time?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Will you just kindly state for the benefit of the committee, just what occurred on the 9th of March, 1916, at Columbus, N. Mex?

Mrs. RITCHIE. You mean at night?

Senator FALL. Just start in. After supper, say about bedtime on March 8, what occurred that night?

Mrs. RITCHIE. My husband had been sick about three weeks and we had taken turns in taking care of the hotel, so that night he took care of the guests until about half past 10, then I went on and I got a man up that had a call to get a guest up for the morning train, I got up and called him, he had left and I had gone to bed again, had not gone to sleep, when all of a sudden we heard a tremendous shouting, and hollering, and screaming, and the bullets began to strike the hotel and my husband got up and dressed and the children got up and they began to cry, wondering what was the matter, and about the same time the guests appeared in the hall, first one and then another, and Mr. Ritchie tried to quiet them, telling them what he thought it was of course, they were all strangers at the hotel, he tried to tell them the best he could, he thought it was an attack on the town, all this time this shooting was going on, I can not tell you how it sounded, I can not explain the noise, then after that they called "Viva Mexico" and we all ran out to the front of the hotel, the lobby, to see what we could see was going on, and the men all came through with their six-shooters and guns and Mr. Ritchie told the men "We can not shoot, if we do they will perhaps fire the building and kill the women," Mr. Ritchie went downstairs and locked the door, put the bolt across the door that we used at night on the door, he came back upstairs; everybody was in an uproar running all over the hotel, men were running in one part of the hotel and they would run all around to see what they could see, then they were still hollering and then all of a sudden they broke the door down.

Senator FALL. That is the front door downstairs?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir; they came running upstairs, I suppose about 50, and they just scattered all over the house, one in one room and one in another; just all over; and Mr. Burchfield, he appeared at the door—

Senator FALL. That was Uncle Steve?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Uncle Steven Burchfield appeared at the door. He told them in Spanish to be quiet; that he would give them his purse and what money that he had and he would give them his bank book, or would give them all the money they wanted; and while they were quarreling over this money—

Senator FALL. Were they quarreling over the money; the blank checks or the bank book?

Mrs. RITCHIE. I don't know what they were quarreling over; they were talking about this money, and he made his escape. He went out the back door—the back fire escape. Some way he got out, but they would go in one room and another; and so they found Mr. Walker in one room, and they took him out in the hall. She pleaded with them and they all pleaded with them not to take him. He said, "Be quiet, darling; I will be back again." They just took him downstairs and shot him on the steps before us; and by that time everybody was running still all over the hotel, and we went in rooms Nos. 4 and 5. Dr. Hart had one room and Mr. Miller had the other.

Senator FALL. Pardon me, who was Dr. Hart, Mrs. Ritchie?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Dr. Hart was a guest, the one that lost his life.

Senator FALL. He had been there and stopped with you before?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes.

Senator FALL. He was United States sanitary inspector?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir; he had stopped a number of times with us.

Senator FALL. Who was Mr. Miller?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Mr. Miller was from Las Cruces; he came over in his car.

Senator FALL. Mr. Miller had been the State engineer?

Mrs. RITCHIE. I believe he had. Of course, he had been at the hotel before, but I did not know who Mr. Miller was; but when he came in that night at 5 o'clock he registered, and my daughter was playing the piano; and he says, "That sounds like home. I have been away from home quite a while." He went in the parlor, and my daughter sang, and he sang two or three pieces, and he said the next morning he would have to go, and that night they took him out and shot him on the pavement, right out where his car was.

Senator FALL. Did they take him out in front on the upper porch or downstairs?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Right downstairs.

Senator FALL. Then, after killing Mr. Miller, then they took Dr. Hart down?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir; they took Dr. Hart down at the same time. There was a crowd of them around my husband telling him that there was a captain downstairs that wanted to see him. He said, "I can not go down and leave the women and children to protect themselves," and they put their hands on him and forced him down there; they told him he would have to go, and he found out he had to go, and they took him down, and my daughter put her hand out and says, "Don't go, daddy; don't go." He says, "I will be back in a minute."

Senator FALL. Which daughter was that?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Myrtle. Just as soon as they took him down one of them grabbed my daughter by the hand and took all of her rings off of her and asked her for a peso, and she asked me if I had a dollar and I said no, and at that time they had taken the rings off of me and one of them kicked me in the side, and I said, "No; they have taken all; I have got nothing; they have taken all I have"; then just threw her hand down and pushed her up against the wall and then he told me to go and find Sam Ravel's room, and I took him to Sam Ravel's room; so I took him in there.

Senator FALL. He spoke the name of Sam Ravel?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir; when I came on back he had taken Arthur Ravel, the brother of Sam, down with my husband.

Senator FALL. When was the last time you saw Dr. Hart?

Mrs. RITCHIE. On March 8.

Senator FALL. When they were taking him down?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir; he went down, the last time I saw him; he was going down with his hands raised up over his head; in his shirt sleeves.

Senator FALL. That was the last time you saw him alive?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes.

Senator FALL. When did you last see your husband alive?

Mrs. RITCHIE. At the same time; it all happened right together; we hardly knew what was happening, and this Mrs. Walker was screaming and hollering and my children were carrying on and then we went to the front and we saw them putting oil on the Lemon & Payne store, and then we could see, I guess, thousands of Mexicans out there by the light of the fire, and our hotel caught fire, and I do not think they set fire to it, but it caught fire; we stayed there; we could not get out; could not get down to the front because they were all there; the hotel was afire, and they had taken all we had and ransacked all the dresser drawers, shot through all the dressers and mirrors, I suppose to see if anybody was behind the dressers, tore all the beds apart, ransacked everything; the hotel was afire; at that time my daughter, Edna, appeared at the back door; she darted back again and she said, "Oh, mamma, there is Juan Favela at the bottom of the stairs"; she recognized Juan Favela's voice, and he says, "Edna, come to me, I will take care of you"; so we all went down and he took us over to a building that had been raided, at the back of the hotel.

Senator FALL. Juan Favela lived at Columbus?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir; right back of the hotel.

Senator FALL. This was his son?

Mrs. RITCHIE. No, sir; this was Juan Favela, himself.

Senator FALL. Now, what nationality is Juan Favela?

Mrs. RITCHIE. He is a Mexican; his mother is an American, I believe.

Senator FALL. Is he a Yaqui Indian, or what you know ordinarily a Mexican?

Mrs. RITCHIE. I don't know; I know he is a very nice man. We have known him a long time. I know we would have all been murdered if it had not been for Juan Favela or perhaps been burned up in the hotel. He broke down the fence and took us over. The way we escaped was by the light of the fire from Lemon & Payne building; they were ransacking all of the other buildings, that is, when they took the guard from the back of the house, and that is how we escaped.

Senator FALL. How many guests were in the hotel that night?

Mrs. RITCHIE. There was four that escaped with their lives and five murdered.

Senator FALL. That five included your husband?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you remain in the house where Juan Favela took you all night, or until the next morning?

Mrs. RITCHIE. We remained there until the soldiers came and took us over to camp in the morning.

Senator FALL. Was it daylight or dark?

Mrs. RITCHIE. I presume about 6 o'clock, 7 perhaps.

Senator FALL. And this attack, the original attack, occurred about 3?

Mrs. RITCHIE. About 3 or 4; I had not gone to sleep again after I had gotten up to wake the guest.

Senator FALL. The soldiers were immediately on the south of the railroad?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And the town was just immediately north of the railroad?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir; it was just north of the railroad.

Senator FALL. How far was your hotel from the railroad?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Oh, it was not half a block.

Senator FALL. How long after the attack commenced and the Mexicans entered your hotel, scattered through your house, was it before you went out under the care of Juan Favela; about how long, more or less?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Well, from the time they came upstairs I would judge it would be perhaps—it seemed like a week to me—I don't know just exactly how long, but I presume it may be half an hour; maybe not that long.

Senator FALL. When did you first see any soldiers—American soldiers?

Mrs. RITCHIE. After they fired the building. I wondered why—the soldiers had always been good to us—I wondered why they had not come to us; I wondered why somebody did not come to our assistance after our building had caught on fire. I could see the soldiers in town skirmishing, and under the water tank by the depot, and, of course, I realized then that there were not many there and they were doing their duty.

Senator FALL. Did you see any officers—commissioned officers of the United States Army—when you went out of the building?

Mrs. RITCHIE. They took us over to the camp and I saw some sergeants; I did not see any captain; I walked right in the blood of the soldiers—five of them lying on the ground there. I did not see any officers.

Senator FALL. Do you know Col. Slocum?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you see him at all on that morning, or later in the day?

Mrs. RITCHIE. I saw him about 10 o'clock, I think; his wife came over to camp and took myself and family over to her house and I stayed there until I got some clothes on.

Senator FALL. When Juan Favela took you out of the house you walked through the blood of the private soldiers?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Oh, yes, sir; over to camp.

Senator FALL. You saw a noncommissioned officer there and the soldiers lying down firing?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you recognize any commissioned officers?

Mrs. RITCHIE. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Were there any soldiers in your hotel or around your hotel, or stopping there that night?

Mrs. RITCHIE. There was one Mr. Ritchie had taken in; he registered; any more than that I do not know. I know he was burned up in the fire, and after I buried my husband here in El Paso and the undertaker was talking to me about it, he asked me to compose myself the best I could; he knew it was trying, but he would like to know about this soldier; he said they buried him and just found the bones and the buttons off of his body and, of course, I could not tell anything about him because my husband was gone.

Senator FALL. When you went across in charge of Juan Favela out of your house, did your children go with you?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes; my three children. He took us over to this house where he had his wife, and Edna, the little one next to the baby; she knew where her daddy was lying. I did not know, but she knew and she says, "Mamma, my daddy is lying out there on the ground and our building is burning and he will burn up, and I want to go to him and get him," and Juan said, "Edna, you will commit your own suicide out of this house," and she just fought him, and he held on to her and she got away and got to the corner of the building, where she saw her daddy lying and they shot at her and the bullet struck her coat; she just had a coat on over her nightdress; they tore her coat full of holes, but it did not strike her.

Senator FALL. You say the Mexicans robbed you of your jewelry and rings before they robbed your daughter?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Just about the same time. They had gone and was knocking the telephone off the wall with a gun, and I went over trying to—I don't know for what purpose, I just kind of walked over that way and he raised his gun over my head; I raised my hands up like that and when he came down he hit me on the hand and knocked the knuckles out of joint and I carried that six weeks in a sling, and then is when he took my rings off.

Senator FALL. Mrs. Ritchie, did you and your husband own that property, the Commercial Hotel?

Mrs. RITCHIE. No, sir; my husband built the hotel for Sam Ravel, then we rented it and the furniture and everything was mine.

Senator FALL. Did you have any other property than the furnishings of the hotel?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir; the building back of the hotel, just a little small building.

Senator FALL. That was your property?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Were you dependent upon your husband for support?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir; we ran the hotel.

Senator FALL. You and he ran the hotel?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Were you dependent upon your joint labors for the support of yourself and family?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir; at present I am employed by the Government.

Senator FALL. You are working now for a living?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What has become of your children?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Two of them married; one of them married Lieut. Le Croix and one married Charlie Garner, Senator Garner's brother, and I have now one child.

Senator FALL. With you?

Mrs. RITCHIE. With me.

Senator FALL. Have you ever received any remuneration or recompense from any source whatsoever for your losses at Columbus?

Mrs. RITCHIE. No, sir; not even any insurance.

Senator FALL. Did you have the building or furniture insured?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And you have received no insurance for its destruction?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Not a penny.

Senator FALL. What was the reason, do you know?

Mrs. RITCHIE. They called it an invasion.

Senator FALL. An invasion?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes.

Senator FALL. An act of war?

Mrs. RITCHIE. And they say there was a clause in the policy; they just simply turned me down.

Senator FALL. On account of the clause in the policy to the effect that if the property was destroyed by an enemy?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir; an invasion into the United States.

Senator FALL. That they would not be responsible?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. So the company refused to pay?

Mrs. RITCHIE. Yes, sir; I have been trying to get it in various ways; I tried to get just a little insurance for what I had lost, but I have not been able. We got out in our night clothes, without anything but our nightdress. I was glad and thanked God my children were not molested in any other way, because they were saying all the time they were coming back and kill us and were going to take the women prisoners.

Senator FALL. What was the name of the company in which your property was insured?

Mrs. RITCHIE. I haven't the papers with me, but I have all the papers and all the letters that I have received from them.

Senator FALL. Kindly furnish the committee with the name of that company and the amount of insurance.

Mrs. RITCHIE. How, please?

Senator FALL. Just write to me.

TESTIMONY OF L. L. BURKHEAD.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., secretary of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. BURKHEAD. I am, sir.

Senator FALL. Of what State are you a native?

Mr. BURKHEAD. North Carolina.

Senator FALL. Where do you live?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Columbus, N. Mex.

Senator FALL. Where were you living on or about March 9, 1916?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Columbus, N. Mex.

Senator FALL. What was your business?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Postmaster.

Senator FALL. Postmaster at Columbus, N. Mex., in the State of New Mexico?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you remember the occasion of the raid by the Villistas, or some Mexicans, on the night of March 8 and morning of March 9, 1916?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Very distinctly.

Senator FALL. You were there during that raid? Where were you at the time?

Mr. BURKHEAD. I was at home with my family.

Senator FALL. About what time did the raid occur?

Mr. BURKHEAD. It must have been between 4.20 and 5 o'clock—nearly 4.30, I expect.

Senator FALL. Did you have a school building in Columbus?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Yes, sir; we had a very fine school building for a small town.

Senator FALL. Who were the children who attended that school?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Why, all of the Americans and a great many Mexicans.

Senator FALL. About how many children—Mexican children—attended school?

Mr. BURKHEAD. I think about 30 or 35.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether they were in attendance—was school open on the 8th day of March?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether the Mexican children were in attendance at school that day?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Why, I have understood from one of the teachers in charge of the Mexican work that there were 28 of the 30 or 35 Mexicans were absent without excuse on the 8th of March.

Senator FALL. Did you know Col. Slocum?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. He was in command of the United States troops at that time?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Colonel of the Thirteenth Cavalry?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Colonel of the Thirteenth Cavalry.

Senator FALL. Do you know what disposition, if any out of the ordinary, Col. Slocum made of any of the troops under his command on the 8th, or prior to the raid on the morning of the 9th of March?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Some time during the day of the 8th "G" Troop was sent to the gate, that is the crossing into Mexico over the old grade.

Senator FALL. About two miles and a half or three miles south of Columbus?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. On the old railroad grade?

Mr. BURKHEAD. On the old railroad grade, and two troops were sent to Gibson's line ranch, about 14 miles southwest from Columbus.

Senator FALL. And on the international border?

Mr. BURKHEAD. On the international border.

Senator FALL. Were there any pickets thrown out, that you know of?

Mr. BURKHEAD. None that I know of.

Senator FALL. Any troops placed in the town of Columbus?

Mr. BURKHEAD. No, sir.

Senator FALL. No sentinels or pickets were in the town of Columbus?

Mr. BURKHEAD. No, sir; not on the north side of the road.

Senator FALL. The only pickets who were out were around the encampment on the south side?

Mr. BURKHEAD. I understand that the only pickets that were out were at the guard tent.

Senator FALL. And hospital?

Mr. BURKHEAD. I don't know about that.

Senator FALL. Any way, the pickets who were out were not in town or around town, which was on the north side of the railroad, but were on the south side entirely around the military encampment?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. There were no extra pickets or sentinels that you know of?

Mr. BURKHEAD. None that I ever heard of.

Senator FALL. Do you know where Col. Slocum was during this raid?

Mr. BURKHEAD. I know where he lived.

Senator FALL. Where did he live?

Mr. BURKHEAD. He lived four blocks north of the railroad on Boundary Street.

Senator FALL. That would be in the northwestern part of the town?

Mr. BURKHEAD. No; that is the northeastern part.

Senator FALL. The northeastern part of the street?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Boundary Street is the section line.

Senator FALL. What did you do during this raid; where did you remain during the raid?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Why, as soon as we found out from the hollering and breaking of windows over in the corner drug store, which is just a block from me, I took my wife and boy and another lady, who was staying with us at that time, and we went out over the back fence and got down in a ditch by the railroad embankment and followed that until we got up to a freight train which had entered town and saw something had happened or something going on, and the engineer put out his headlight and backed out.

Senator FALL. Now, this ditch you speak of was the ditch on the west side of the old railroad right of way or embankment running north and south with the present railroad?

Mr. BURKHEAD. No; I speak of the railroad and not of the old grade.

Senator FALL. What was the conductor of that freight train doing at that time, if you know?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Why, when we arrived at the train, of course, we had to creep out; we did not know what had occurred at the time, and we found that the conductor and engineer were waiting to find out what had happened. The first news of what they knew exactly what happened was when we told them, but when we arrived Conductor Lundy, I think his name is, had coupled up his train telephone and was telephoning in then to Fort Bliss, trying to get connection with Fort Bliss, and telling them what the trouble was.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether he succeeded in getting connection?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Yes, sir; he had succeeded in getting connection when we got there, and we were able to tell him what was going on—what happened.

Senator FALL. Where did you remain then, during the balance of the time?

Mr. BURKHEAD. We remained in the caboose of the train until morning, and then cut off the engine and ran into town to see if everything was all right to come in, and they came back and pulled us into town.

Senator FALL. About what time was that?

Mr. BURKHEAD. About 7 o'clock; probably a little after.

Senator FALL. Where were the soldiers at that time, do you know?

Mr. BURKHEAD. At that time, before we came in, we could see in the dim light—the sun had gotten up—we could see the dust of the soldiers chasing the bandits down into Mexico.

Senator FALL. South and into Mexico?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Had any people arrived from Deming at that time, do you know?

Mr. BURKHEAD. I can not say.

Senator FALL. Did you see any Deming people later?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Why, quite a few later on in the day.

Senator FALL. Did you see any of the officers of the post when you got into town?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Why, Capt. Bowie, whom, I think, was officer of the day, came out on the engine when the engine came back to get the train; came back with them to send a telephone message into Fort Bliss over the train telephone.

Senator FALL. When you got into town did you see any of the other officers?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Yes; saw quite a few.

Senator FALL. Did you know Col. Slocum personally?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. When did you first see him that day?

Mr. BURKHEAD. After we pulled in with the train and went down to see if anything was molested in our house, and found everything was O. K., then walked across to the post office to see what had happened there, in going over across from the post office—it must have been 10 or 15 minutes past 7—I passed Col. Slocum and his wife going down toward camp; that was the first I saw of Col. Slocum that morning.

Senator FALL. Did you know where Col. Slocum had been up to that time?

Mr. BURKHEAD. No, sir; I do not, I can not swear where he had been.

Senator FALL. Did you know Mr. White?

Mr. BURKHEAD. J. F. White?

Senator FALL. Where is Mr. White?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Mr. White is in Columbus.

Senator FALL. Still in Columbus?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Still in Columbus.

Senator FALL. Did you have any conversation with him that day, or immediately thereafter?

Mr. BURKHEAD. I don't know that I can say as to that day, but after that I had a conversation with him frequently.

Senator FALL. Did Mr. White give you any information as to the whereabouts of Col. Slocum that night?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. He did?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. From that information which you obtained from Mr. White was Col. Slocum in the camp or with the soldiers during the fight and attack on Columbus?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Not until late in the fight, if he was at all.

Senator FALL. As a matter of fact the attack of the Villistas commenced on the Army camp on the south of the road, did it not?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And then extended into town?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Extended into the town.

Senator FALL. And from where Col. Slocum was living he was cut off, if he desired to join his command?

Mr. BURKHEAD. No, sir.

Senator FALL. He was not, he could have joined his command?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Yes, sir; at certain parts of the raid. Later when the raid was at its height of course he could not.

Senator FALL. Because Villa would have been between him and his soldiers?

Mr. BURKHEAD. And his soldiers.

Senator FALL. When the raid on the town was at its height?

Mr. BURKHEAD. Yes, sir.

TESTIMONY OF DR. T. H. DABNEY.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., secretary of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Dr. DABNEY. Yes sir.

Senator FALL. Of what State are you a native?

Dr. DABNEY. Iowa.

Senator FALL. Where do you live?

Dr. DABNEY. Well, I guess I live in California, now.

Senator FALL. Where were you living on March 9, 1916?

Dr. DABNEY. Columbus, N. Mex.

Senator FALL. What was your business at that time?

Dr. DABNEY. I was practicing medicine, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you remember the raid on Columbus?

Dr. DABNEY. Yes, sir; very distinctly.

Senator FALL. Where were you during the raid?

Dr. DABNEY. I was at my house, about a half block north of the main street that runs east and west through the town, rather in the northeastern part of the business section.

Senator FALL. Where did you remain during the raid and attack on the town?

Dr. DABNEY. Right in my house.

Senator FALL. Were you alarmed about the first of the raid on the town?

Dr. DABNEY. Yes, sir; I was sure alarmed; I had my wife and daughter there and no way to get them out.

Senator FALL. How long did the firing there in town and around town continue?

Dr. DABNEY. Well, I presume I would judge an hour and a half, it continued about half an hour at my house.

Senator FALL. In the town about an hour and a half?

Dr. DABNEY. I expect about an hour and a half.

Senator FALL. About what time did it open; commence?

Dr. DABNEY. Well, about 4.20 to 4.30.

Senator FALL. In the morning?

Dr. DABNEY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And continued for?

Dr. DABNEY. We calculated that by the clock in the depot; it had a hole shot through it; it stopped at 4.20; that was the report; I saw the clock after it was shot.

Senator FALL. When did you leave your house?

Dr. DABNEY. I left my house about 15 minutes to 6; there were three soldiers wounded near my house, and Lieut. Castleman came to the door and asked me if I could care for them; the firing was over around the depot, and they were still fighting between my house and the hospital.

Senator FALL. Between the military hospital and your house?

Dr. DABNEY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. They were still firing at 6?

Dr. DABNEY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Lieut. Castleman asked you if you could take care of them?

Dr. DABNEY. He just asked me if I could take care of them, and I told him to bring them in.

Senator FALL. He brought in two?

Dr. DABNEY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You gave them treatment?

Dr. DABNEY. Yes, sir. One of them, Pvt. Jesse Taylor, died the next day at Fort Bliss. He was shot pretty bad, through the body and arm.

Senator FALL. The other?

Dr. DABNEY. The other—I never learned the other fellow's name; he was just grazed on top of the shoulder, so I undressed him and told him he was not hurt; he made the remark then to let him go, and he put his clothes on and went back to camp to his command.

Senator FALL. From that wound you saw in the body, the man who afterwards died, was it a clean wound, inflicted by a metal-jacket bullet?

Dr. DABNEY. I think so, but probably exploded when it struck; but here it was a very small wound, and came out here, and the arm was almost torn off.

Senator FALL. Did you ever have your attention called to any of the cartridges taken from the belts of the dead Mexicans there?

Dr. DABNEY. No, sir; I saw some of them.

Senator FALL. Did you notice anything peculiar about any of those bullets; whether they were filed through the metal jacket to make them dum-dum bullets or not?

Dr. DABNEY. I never noticed.

Senator FALL. I know they were. I have got them.

Dr. DABNEY. I have got some soft-nose bullets, filed across the end here, for a .45.

Senator FALL. Doctor, how long did you continue to live in and around Columbus after this raid?

Dr. DABNEY. Up until about the—well, I made one trip to California and stayed two or three weeks; then I came back and was there up until about the 4th of April, last year.

Senator FALL. Have you a daughter?

Dr. DABNEY. Step-daughter, Senator.

Senator FALL. What is her name?

Dr. DABNEY. Frances Stewart; her name is Connett now.

Senator FALL. She has married since that time?

Dr. DABNEY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did your daughter have a homestead entry near Columbus, N. Mex.?

Dr. DABNEY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Was she able to prove up on that entry and get her title for it?

Dr. DABNEY. Yes; in fact, she never lived on it; she built her house and did all her work, but never moved in the house on account of the border situation.

Senator FALL. How was she allowed, then, to prove up and obtain her title, if she never lived on the entry?

Dr. DABNEY. By a special act of Congress granting her title.

Senator FALL. Upon what grounds was that title granted?

Dr. DABNEY. Upon the ground that she was unable to live on it; it was not safe for her to live on the—

Senator FALL. On the entry?

Dr. DABNEY. On the homestead, which is about three miles and a half due east of Columbus.

Senator FALL. In the United States?

Dr. DABNEY. Yes, sir; and about 2 miles from the border.

Senator FALL. And that title was granted her by a special act of Congress upon the approval of the Secretary of the Interior?

Dr. DABNEY. Recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, Secretary Lane.

Senator FALL. Upon the ground that she should not be required to comply with the resident requirement of the homestead act?

Dr. DABNEY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. As that vicinity was not safe?

Dr. DABNEY. I think there was one other, a Miss Harris, got her patent on the same grounds.

Senator FALL. When, about, was it that your daughter obtained her patent?

Dr. DABNEY. Well, she obtained her patent since August; she got her certificate, I think, about last March.

Senator FALL. Of last year?

Dr. DABNEY. Of last year.

Senator FALL. So that in last March of last year the Department of Interior did not consider that she should be required to live upon that homestead to secure a patent because of the danger existing there?

Dr. DABNEY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. At that time?

Dr. DABNEY. At that time.

Senator FALL. Do you know Elmer Harris?

Dr. DABNEY. I know her; yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You say she obtained a patent under similar circumstances?

Dr. DABNEY. I saw in the paper where she had obtained her patent.

Senator FALL. Do you know Katheryn Walker?

Dr. DABNEY. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you know what the condition of her homestead entry is?

Dr. DABNEY. Not that I could tell exactly; I think that her's was about the same as my daughter's, but I understood from Mr. Walker that she had relinquished and he had filed on it; I understand since then there has been a favorable report.

Senator FALL. From the committee?

Dr. DABNEY. From the Committee on Public Lands to give her a patent.

Senator FALL. To the Secretary of Interior that she should have a patent for the same reason?

Dr. DABNEY. Yes, sir.

TESTIMONY OF MR. EDWIN G. DEAN.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., secretary of the subcommittee duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What State are you a native of?

Mr. DEAN. Iowa.

Senator FALL. Where do you reside?

Mr. DEAN. Columbus, N. Mex.

Senator FALL. Where were you residing on or about March 9, 1916?

Mr. DEAN. In Columbus, N. Mex.

Senator FALL. Have you a family?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Had you a family at that time?

Mr. DEAN. No, sir.

Senator FALL. With whom were you living at the time of the Columbus raid?

Mr. DEAN. I was living with my mother and father.

Senator FALL. Where?

Mr. DEAN. In the northern part of the town, just south of the schoolhouse.

Senator FALL. In the northern part of the town of Columbus?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. State of New Mexico?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What happened, if anything, that night?

Mr. DEAN. A whole lot happened; the first I knew they were shooting all around, and I got up and dressed and went out, and there seemed to be a big fire down town and shooting. I did not know what it was, but I went back in the house, and a neighbor came over there—Mr. Elliott—and he said Villa was attacking Columbus; so I got the gun and took it in my father's room and set it up by his bed, and told him there was a gun, it was all loaded, and I was going out to see what was doing, and I was intending to go to town. I started over to a neighbor's house; I again saw the fire, so I went down the street a little way. About that time Mr. Murphy came across a big ditch—

Senator FALL. Mr. Murphy was the telegraph operator?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, sir. They made such a racket over there; I heard some one say there was a fence there, that he could not get over. I was kind of afraid to go back up to that house—afraid they would shoot me—so I decided I had better go down town, down to the store, so I made for down there; so I got up to the alley back of the store. There were some Mexicans came around the store next to us, so I went down the alley and ran into all of the soldiers there at the end of the block; Lieut. Castleman and a detachment of our soldiers were crossing the street there.

Senator FALL. In the town proper?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you see any other officers there—commissioned officers?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, sir; I saw the colonel a little later on, Col. Slocum, and the lieutenant came in—there was an adobe house setting out right next to the corner; some of the men were in behind that, but he was out in the street when I first came down there; he came in and wanted to know how I came to get down there; I told him I just happened there some way; and he said one boy was wounded out there and he had his gun, but he said they were pretty nearly out of ammunition, he did not think they had any to spare; then he called me and asked me to carry in one of the soldiers that was wounded, and we carried him in behind the adobe house; and then in a little bit, why a soldier came up there and wanted to borrow a knife, he was trying to get his belt open, cut his belt, the rusty clip; he could not find a knife; I do not think he ever did get his belt off of him. He just had a few rounds of ammunition. Just then there was a bugle call, and the lieutenant says, "Look out, they are coming in from the east," and some Mexicans crossed the railroad tracks right south of there, came across on the north side and went west; I judge about 50 of them; they had been down to get the horses.

Senator FALL. What horses?

Mr. DEAN. Government horses.

Senator FALL. Cavalry horses?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, sir; and one of the soldiers shouted at him. He says, "Don't shoot down that way, our men are down there," and then I saw a light in the doctor's house, just right across the alley, and I called the lieutenant's attention to it and told him they might be able to take these wounded soldiers in there.

Senator FALL. That was Dr. Dabney's house?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, sir. He called the doctor, then another soldier and myself carried the men in there. I was not out again until just before daylight; it was just getting day and I was outside just a few minutes and the colonel came walking down the street from the north.

Senator FALL. Col. Slocum?

Mr. DEAN. Col. Slocum, yes, sir; he spoke to the lieutenant, and the lieutenant said, "Everything is all right, Colonel, you had better go back, you can not do anything here. He stood around and talked a little bit, and then went on back north.

Senator FALL. He came from the north?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did your family escape without trouble?

Mr. DEAN. My father was killed.

Senator FALL. Where was he killed?

Mr. DEAN. He was killed right down in the main street, right in the middle of the street.

Senator FALL. How was he killed?

Mr. DEAN. There was a—I did not get a chance to see him; that is, after his death; only when I picked him up, and there was a big hole right here in or about his stomach.

Senator FALL. A bullet wound?

Mr. DEAN. Something pretty nearly the size of my hand; he had evidently been shot in the back. I tried to get in to see him afterwards, but they would not let me.

TESTIMONY OF MR. ARCHIBALD B. FROST.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., secretary of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Give your full name, please, to the reporter.

Mr. FROST. Archibald B. Frost.

Senator FALL. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. FROST. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where were you born?

Mr. FROST. Richmond, Tex.

Senator FALL. Where do you reside?

Mr. FROST. At Columbus, N. Mex.

Senator FALL. What are you doing; what is your business?

Mr. FROST. I am in the hardware and furniture business.

Senator FALL. Where were you on or about March 9, 1916?

Mr. FROST. I was at home with my wife and baby.

Senator FALL. Where?

Mr. FROST. At Columbus, N. Mex.

Senator FALL. In what business were you engaged at that time.

Mr. FROST. The same business.

Senator FALL. What occurred there on March 8 and the morning of March 9?

Mr. FROST. We were awakened by a lot of shots that sounded very much like machine-gun shots. I got up and dressed and my wife dressed and I went to the door of my house, just a small house back of my store, and there was a lot of bullets flying around in the air, and I heard a bugle blowing some piece, and I realized by the bullets flying around it was an attack of some kind, and I thought possibly if we had time to get in the store and get in the cellar—get my family in there away from the bullets—I thought there would be a lot of soldiers around there and there would really be no danger, outside of a little skirmish, and we went out in the dark, going north, and got to the store, and finally reached the store and opened the front door; I put my wife and my baby inside and then I turned around to sort of see what was going on and walked back on the porch and I saw quite a glare over in the southeast; quite a long line of firing, looked like a hundred yards or so, and you could hear all these shots, an awful lot of shots; just about that time I was shot myself.

Senator FALL. Where were you shot?

Mr. FROST. Shot on the front porch of my business.

Senator FALL. Whereabouts in the body were you shot?

Mr. FROST. I was shot in the shoulder, the shot knocked me down, I heard my wife scream, but I had presence of mind enough to crawl into the store and I just crawled right on in and got up again, straightened up after getting into the store, then they commenced shooting all of the glass out from the store, all the panes, were flying back of us, I realized then the danger was too imminent to think about going in the cellar, and the thought of fire occurred to me, it being a frame building and we would probably be burned up, we would be roasted in the cellar, I thought of the automobile we had bought two or three months before which was in the garage back of the store and I whispered to my wife that I thought we had better get into the car there, and get started and beat it; she did not know I was even wounded at that time, so we walked out the back door and I managed somehow to unlock the garage in the night, she held the door for me, we started the machine and backed out of the garage and we were again discovered by the bandits at that time and they shot me again in the car just as we backed out, I was shot through the arm that time.

Senator FALL. That is through the other arm?

Mr. FROST. Yes, sir; one shot was through here.

Senator FALL. One shot was through the right shoulder?

Mr. FROST. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. The other through the left arm?

Mr. FROST. Yes, sir; above the elbow.

Senator FALL. Were there any bullet holes in the car?

Mr. FROST. Yes, sir; there were three in the seat right back of where I was sitting, the driver's side, and one on the right side extending through the car and through the wind shield, but I did not know of course that those bullet holes were in the car until they told me about it after I reached Deming.

Senator FALL. You made your escape?

Mr. FROST. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where did you go?

Mr. FROST. Went to Deming.

Senator FALL. Did you meet anybody on the way into Deming?

Mr. FROST. Well, no, sir; we did not meet anybody until we got there, only met one or two teams coming out, it was quite early in the morning and did not meet anybody.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether any citizens went from Deming down to Columbus that morning?

Mr. FROST. Well, yes, sir; after I got in there and told them what was going on there was several automobiles filled with men and guns and doctors and they went down; I learned that afterwards.

Senator FALL. Did you ever see anything of a captured machine gun there?

Mr. Frost. No, sir; I did not, I was in the hospital for my wounds for about a week and when I returned to Columbus, why they had pretty nearly all of the signs of the—except the burnt buildings were gone. The dead Mexicans had been removed and burned.

Senator Fall. You were the only member of your family injured that night?

Mr. Frost. Yes, sir; I was the only one that was shot.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JESUS PAIZ.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., secretary of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator Fall. You speak English?

Mr. Paiz. A little.

Senator Fall. You understand it well, do you?

Mr. Paiz. Yes, sir; I do.

Senator Fall. Jesus, where were you born?

Mr. Paiz. I was born down in Mexico, in Durango—I was raised there, but born in Tampico, about 25 miles from the seashore.

Senator Fall. You were raised in the State of Durango?

Mr. Paiz. Yes, sir.

Senator Fall. When did you first come to the United States?

Mr. Paiz. The 9th of March, 1916.

Senator Fall. How did you happen to come here at that time?

Mr. Paiz. Came with a bunch of bandits—with Villa.

Senator Fall. How old are you now?

Mr. Paiz. I will be 17 the 22d of June.

Senator Fall. Then you were about 14 years old when you came on the 9th of March?

Mr. Paiz. I was about 12 years and 6 months old.

Senator Fall. Where did you join the bunch of Villa bandits?

Mr. Paiz. I was not the only one; my family—my father was there and we joined in Chihuahua.

Senator Fall. What place in Chihuahua?

Mr. Paiz. In Quintas Carolinas, about 3 miles from Terrazas's home ranch.

Senator Fall. How did you happen to join—you and your father happen to join the Villa bandits?

Mr. Paiz. Well, my father was what you might call the boss on that ranch, you know, on that home ranch there, and Mr. Terrazas was not there any more and left him in charge of that ranch and so he stayed there for about a year and then the Carrancista soldiers carried us to Chihuahua and they went up there and started to steal the cows and corn, all of that for horses and would not tell us anything about it; did not say anything, but just took it. So one time a bunch of Carranza soldiers went up there; they wanted to get some money of my father; my father refused. He says he did not have any money so he gave them time to come in two days and in those two days my father went away, see! He escaped. He left me and my mother in the house; my three brothers had been killed; they ran away on account of money, too; they wanted money and they killed them.

Senator Fall. Who killed them?

Mr. PAIZ. Carranza men. So my father made his escape in the hills and the next morning they came again, and they looked all around for my father; they turned everything over—beds and everything there—and they could not find him, and they took me down to Chihuahua and threatened to kill me because I did not know where my father was; because I would not say where my father was. I asked them to give me a little time, you know, I was afraid; I told them I did not know where he was, I did not know a thing about it. Well, they trusted me a little too much, you know, and I escaped. So I escaped and went back to Quintas Carolinas and told my mother all about it; I had been sentenced to be shot because I would not tell where my father was; she told me she did not want me to be killed like my brothers were, so I saddled up a horse and went away that night.

Senator FALL. By yourself?

Mr. PAIZ. By myself; and got a bottle of coffee and some tortillas, so about three days I found my father in San Geronimo.

Senator FALL. And found your father?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. At San Geronimo?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes; so from there we started a new life with the Villa bunch.

Senator FALL. Why did you join Villa?

Mr. PAIZ. Because it was the only way we could be safe.

Senator FALL. From the Carrancistas?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir; from the Carranza soldiers.

Senator FALL. Your only chance for safety, as your father and yourself thought, was to join Villa?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir; and my father was well known around there, you know, and he was very likely to be discovered by somebody and they would shoot him.

Senator FALL. What position, if any, of an official character did your father hold under Villa's command?

Mr. PAIZ. He was a captain.

Senator FALL. And paymaster?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir; sometimes.

Senator FALL. Where did you go from San Geronimo, Jesus?

Mr. PAIZ. We went all over those mountains, you know, and all those towns around there.

Senator FALL. Did you carry a rifle?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Six-shooter?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Plenty of arms and ammunition?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes; everybody was well armed you know.

Senator FALL. You were 12 years old?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where did you finally go after traveling around in the mountains?

Mr. PAIZ. Well, after we got to Santa Clara, from there Villa planned to go to Nogales and raid Nogales, but about 40 men go away and squealed on us, so he got kinder mad and determined not to tell anybody what he was going to do next, and so when we got to Columbus, none of us did not know. There were so many men innocent they did not know they were going to fight Americans; they thought they were going to fight Carranza soldiers on Mexican ground.

Senator FALL. You know now, since you have been living here, you know where the international boundary is, do you?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you know at that time when you came across?

Mr. PAIZ. I knew it was, I thought it was a wall or something; I did not know when I crossed it.

Senator FALL. You thought at the time the international boundary would be marked by a wall and you would recognize it when you got to it?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You did not find any wall, so you did not know where you were?

Mr. PAIZ. No, sir.

Senator FALL. When you got to Columbus that night, did you know you were in the United States?

Mr. PAIZ. No; I did not know it any more until I heard some of the Americans speaking English; I could not understand what they were saying.

Senator FALL. Now, where did you go, were you following Villa all the time, was Mr. Villa present?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir; he stayed around town outside.

Senator FALL. Did you come up from the Boca Grande?

Mr. PAIZ. Well, it is a ranch; I don't recollect its name, but I remember—

Senator FALL. You came down the river, did you?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Out on the plains?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where did you make your camp after you got out of the mountains?

Mr. PAIZ. Some place, I don't remember very well; it was south of the river.

Senator FALL. Where did you go from that camp?

Mr. PAIZ. Well, we turned and came to Columbus.

Senator FALL. Was that after dark?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir; in the night, after dark.

Senator FALL. You only traveled at night?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Laid up during the day, generally?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. So, from your last camp you started after night?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. When did you reach Columbus, about what hour?

Mr. PAIZ. About 4 o'clock we started to dismount.

Senator FALL. Where were you when you started to dismount?

Mr. PAIZ. About three miles from Columbus, or two miles on the west side.

Senator FALL. On the west side?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Down the railroad west?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where did you go from there?

Mr. PAIZ. Well, I was quite sleepy, you know; I was sleeping on my horse a little. A fellow came along and hit me on the leg and woke me up and I seen everybody cocking their guns; and I went and looked for my father and asked him what was Villa about to do, so he told me there was to be a fight; and so I was going to go with him, and he told me to stay there and hold his horse so he could get away.

Senator FALL. Where was that, now, where he told you to stay?

Mr. PAIZ. Right there on the other side of the trench, you know; west of the town.

Senator FALL. West of the customs house. How close was it to the customs house?

Mr. PAIZ. Quite far.

Senator FALL. Some little distance?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You know that little hill back of the customs-house?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. How far from that hill?

Mr. PAIZ. About half way from the town to the hill, I believe.

Senator FALL. Your father told you to stay there and hold his horse?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You stayed?

Mr. PAIZ. I stayed.

Senator FALL. How long did you stay?

Mr. PAIZ. I stayed until they started running back through those hills, you know; retreating from town.

Senator FALL. Until the Villistas started back?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir; and then a fellow told me my father was shot by the stockyards, the other side of the railroad tracks.

Senator FALL. Somebody told you that your father had been shot?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir; Emilio was his name. I started in town instead of going out. I went in when everybody was running out.

Senator FALL. The men were all retreating—Villistas—and you started into town hunting for your father?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. How far did you go?

Mr. PAIZ. I went right in town, see.

Senator FALL. Yes.

Mr. PAIZ. I tried to go across the tracks, I saw a black figure and thought it was my father, so then I could not get across there because there was some shooting down around there and I came back on the hills and I seen—there were two men, Mexicans, came out with two horses, I thought it was Mexicans, I did not say anything, so I started back to town and then there was somebody shot at me, recognized me, they were my own men, see, and some Villista men were shooting at me. I hollered at them not to shoot at me, I was a Mexican, they would not listen to me, so I hollered there until I could get my get-away out of there. Somehow I beat it. So I started by that hotel, you know, that was burned, they could see me real good, you know, so they shot me, shot the leg off here, not quite off, you know, the dum-dum bullets—

Senator FALL. Who shot you?

Mr. PAIZ. Well, I believe it was the same men. I don't think the American soldiers used dum-dum bullets, did they?

Senator FALL. I never heard of it.

Mr. PAIZ. I was shot with dum-dum bullets, and I know my own men used them.

Senator FALL. You knew your own men were using dum-dum bullets?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. How did they make dum-dum bullets?

Mr. PAIZ. They called them dum-dum bullets because they were soft lead.

Senator FALL. Did you do any shooting there yourself?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir; I had to get out of that alley where I was.

Senator FALL. Whom did you shoot at?

Mr. PAIZ. Well, there were three Mexicans shooting at me, I believe, because there were no Americans shooting then, and there was two Mexicans on one of the corners and another Mexican on the other side of the house. I was there at one corner; he was at the other corner. I had the six-shooter, and he had a gun, and I would not give him time to shoot. He would not let me get out. I started to peep; he shot at me. I could not shoot until I left there; they thought I was dead, you know. They started to come out; I saw them and took another shot at him.

Senator FALL. You took another shot at him?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you hit him?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir; I did not see him any more, so I ran across the street, and I tried to get, you know, out from where I came from, see; and they started to shoot at me from that way, so I turned back around the other way, see; I was around east of town. I don't know where I wanted to get out, so I turned on the other side, and they seen me through that light—flames from the hotel—and shot at me.

Senator FALL. That is when you got shot in the leg with a dum-dum bullet?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And these three Mexicans had been shooting at you?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And when you got a chance, you shot one of them and then started to run?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And then they shot you in the leg?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. When were you captured; how long after you were shot?

Mr. PAIZ. I was picked up and captured about 2 o'clock in the afternoon—1 or 2; I don't remember.

Senator FALL. Do you know Francisco Villa—well, Gen. Villa?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You knew him well?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Personally, you had been down with him about San Geronimo?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir. I was around him most of the time; my father was his chief of staff; they called him one of the Dorados.

Senator FALL. Was Villa himself at Columbus?

Mr. PAIZ. He was not in town; not inside of the town, but he was outside.

Senator FALL. He did not come into the town?

Mr. PAIZ. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you know Martin Lopez?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you know Pablo Lopez?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you see Pablo Lopez on that trip you were making into Columbus?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where did you see him?

Mr. PAIZ. Well, we united at San Geronimo, you know, after they held up the train at Santa Isabel.

Senator FALL. How did you know about that train at Santa Isabel?

Mr. PAIZ. I heard the men talking about it.

Senator FALL. What men?

Mr. PAIZ. The men among the soldiers.

Senator FALL. Did Pablo Lopez join you there at San Geronimo?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Was it some of his men talking about it?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir; you know different bands around in the mountains; we all scattered.

Senator FALL. But it was some of Pablo Lopez band talking about the train at Santa Isabel?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Who made that attack on the train at Santa Isabel?

Mr. PAIZ. Pablo Lopez.

Senator FALL. That was when the Americans were killed there?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir; about 17 or 18.

Senator FALL. Since the raid at Columbus, where have you been living?

Mr. PAIZ. I was sent to the hospital, and after I got well I went to Albuquerque to school; I was there about two years and they sent me away, after I was 15 years old; you know, after a boy gets to be 15 they send you where you come from; you see, I told him to send me to Gallup. I wanted to go to work, so they sent me to Gallup.

Senator FALL. Gallup, N. Mex.?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes; I worked there in the hospital after I quit school, you know; then I came to Deming.

Senator FALL. Came to Deming?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir. Then I started to school again until the term went out, so I waited until the next year and this year, and did not go to school then; I quit.

Senator FALL. Where are you living now?

Mr. PAIZ. I am working at Columbus.

Senator FALL. What are you doing?

Mr. PAIZ. Pressing, in a tailor shop.

Senator FALL. You have learned English since you have been in this country?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You did not understand it before you came here?

Mr. PAIZ. Not a word.

Senator FALL. So, when you heard Americans at Columbus talking you did not understand what they were saying?

Mr. PAIZ. Did not understand what they were saying.

Senator FALL. That was the first time you realized you were in the United States?

Mr. PAIZ. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Have you heard of your father since that fighting at Columbus?

Mr. PAIZ. No, sir; I believe he was killed.

TESTIMONY OF MR. GUS T. JONES.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., secretary of the subcommittee duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Where do you live?

Mr. JONES. El Paso.

Senator FALL. What is your business?

Mr. JONES. Special agent of the Department of Justice?

Senator FALL. How long have you been such special agent?

Mr. JONES. I have been special agent four years.

Senator FALL. In your official capacity, have you at present with you an official list which you regard as correct of the United States soldiers who were killed at Columbus in the raid?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Will you kindly examine this list and read off the names and state whether that is official?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Read the names off, please?

Mr. JONES. Sergt. John G. Nievergelt, band, Thirteenth Cavalry; Corpl. Paul Simon, band of the Thirteenth Cavalry; Sergt. Mark A. Dobbs, Machine Gun Troop, Thirteenth Cavalry; Corpl. Harry A. Wiswall, Troop G, Thirteenth Cavalry; horseshoer Frank T. Kindvall, Troop K, Thirteenth Cavalry, Pvt. Frank A. Griffin, Troop E, Thirteenth Cavalry; Pvt. Thomas Butler, Troop F, Thirteenth Cavalry; Pvt. Jesse P. Taylor, Troop F, Thirteenth Cavalry.

Senator FALL. Those were killed?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You haven't a list there of the wounded?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Read the list.

Mr. JONES. Capt. G. Williams, Thirteenth Cavalry; Lieut. C. C. Benson, Thirteenth Cavalry; Corpl. Michael Barmazel—do you want their organization?

Senator FALL. If there is any difference, are they all of the Thirteenth Cavalry?

Mr. JONES. All of the Thirteenth Cavalry. Pvt. James Venner; Pvt. John C. Yarbrough and Pvt. Theodore Katzorke. Those are the soldiers killed and wounded.

TESTIMONY OF MR. LEE RIGGS—Recalled.

(The witness was duly reminded by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., secretary of the subcommittee, that he was previously sworn.)

Senator FALL. Mr. Riggs, did you have any means of ascertaining the number and the names of the civilians killed at Columbus during this raid of which you testified this morning?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Have you those names there?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Will you kindly give them to us for the record?

Mr. RIGGS. N. T. Ritchie, H. H. Walker, Charles De Witt Miller, Dr. H. M. Hart, James T. Dean, J. J. Moore, Mrs. M. James, C. C. Miller, and Harry Davis.

Senator FALL. You read the name of Mrs. James. Do you know who Mrs. James was? Did you know her before her death?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Who was she?

Mr. RIGGS. She was the wife of Mr. James, pumper.

Senator FALL. Railroad pumper at that place

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you know Charles De Witt Miller?

Mr. RIGGS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you know C. C. Miller?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What was his business?

Mr. RIGGS. Druggist.

Senator FALL. Did you know Ritchie?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What was his business?

Mr. RIGGS. Hotel proprietor.

Senator FALL. Proprietor of the Commercial Hotel?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What was Mr. Dean's business?

Mr. RIGGS. Merchant.

Senator FALL. You learned later who Charles De Witt Miller was?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Who was he?

Mr. RIGGS. He was an engineer.

Senator FALL. He had been State engineer of the Territory of New Mexico, had he not?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Have you a list of the civilians wounded?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Who?

Mr. RIGGS. Mr. James.

Senator FALL. Husband of Mrs. James?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir. Mrs. J. J. Moore, A. D. Frost, M. Puchi.

TESTIMONY OF JUDGE E. L. MEDLER.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., secretary of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Where do you reside, Judge?

Judge MEDLER. At present in El Paso, Tex., for the last year.

Senator FALL. Where have you resided before coming to Texas?

Judge MEDLER. Previous to that time, for about 34 years, in New Mexico.

Senator FALL. What official positions, if any, have you held in New Mexico?

Judge MEDLER. Well, I have held various official positions, but in later years, from January, 1912, until January 1, 1919, judge of the third judicial district of New Mexico.

Senator FALL. Prior to that time you had been assistant United States attorney in New Mexico?

Judge MEDLER. Yes; for a number of years.

Senator FALL. Was the county of Luna within your judicial district?

Judge MEDLER. No; it was not; my district comprised the counties of Dona Ana, Otero, Lincoln, and Torrence; Luna County was within the district presided over by the present United States judge, Colin Neblett.

Senator FALL. Did you at any time during the year 1916, or thereafter, hold court in Luna County?

Judge MEDLER. Under an order of the supreme court of New Mexico, made some months previous to March—some months previous to April, 1916, I believe it was—I believe it was the year of the Columbus raid—I was designated by the supreme court to hold the April term of the district court of Luna County at Deming.

Senator FALL. Did you hold that term?

Judge MEDLER. I did; yes sir.

Senator FALL. Did the hearings concerning the Columbus raid come before you in your official capacity at that time?

Judge MEDLER. They did. I presume you have reference to the trial of the Columbus raiders.

Senator FALL. I have.

Judge MEDLER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Were those Columbus raiders tried before you?

Judge MEDLER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. That was in April, 1916?

Judge MEDLER. As I now remember.

Senator FALL. How many were on trial?

Judge MEDLER. There were seven and a little boy who was ostensibly on trial, but we never tried him, but arranged he should be taken care of by the civil authority institutions.

Senator FALL. Have you seen that boy here?

Judge MEDLER. I have not seen him; he had his leg cut off.

Senator FALL. Jesus, come up here. [Here Jesus Paiz stood up.] Is that the boy over there?

Judge MEDLER. He was about 12 years old at that time; he was known to us as the son of Villa's orderly.

Senator FALL. There were six or seven others?

Judge MEDLER. Seven others. There were two trials; six of them tried under one indictment, and one and this boy tried under another indictment.

Senator FALL. What was the result of the trial in the case of the six jointly indicted?

Judge MEDLER. The six jointly indicted were convicted of murder in the first degree and sentenced to be hung.

Senator FALL. By whom was that sentence imposed?

Judge MEDLER. By myself.

Senator FALL. Was that sentence carried out?

Judge MEDLER. As to those six I can not say. Six were tried on one day, and, as I say, another one on the following day, and of the seven convicted and sentenced to be hung six were subsequently executed and one of them had his sentence commuted to life imprisonment by Gov. McDonald.

Senator FALL. They were indicted, convicted, and sentenced for murder in connection with the Villa raid at Columbus?

Judge MEDLER. If my recollection serves me right at this time, they were jointly indicted, together with Francisco Villa, for the murder of Charles DeWitt Miller, who had formerly been the State engineer of the State of New Mexico. That was the formal charge.

Senator FALL. And they were convicted and sentenced under that charge?

Judge MEDLER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Six of them were hung?

Judge MEDLER. Five of those six that were tried on that day and one convicted on the succeeding day; there was one of the six, any way; six of them were executed.

Senator FALL. Previous to their execution were they granted a reprieve for the purpose of allowing the Government to examine into the justice of their conviction?

Judge MEDLER. After the trial, no appeal having been taken in their behalf, certain persons at their own instance caused an investigation to be made, on the grounds that the trial was not regular. Several articles were written in the newspapers to that effect and representations made to President Wilson, and my information is that through request of himself, executions were held up and reprieves granted until a full investigation of the record of the trial could be sent on to Washington.

Senator FALL. After such investigation, however, they were finally hung?

Judge MEDLER. Except as to one of them, who I was informed by Gov. McDonald the evidence did not actually show he fired a shot, but was present during the raid in the town of Columbus.

Senator FALL. In the trial of those cases did either of the defendants testify, make a statement?

Judge MEDLER. My recollection is that all of them took the stand and based their defense upon, as they were in the military service, they were following orders.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether later in the investigation pursued by the Government confessions were obtained from these men?

Judge MEDLER. My information is that there was, but their evidence was practically a confession, evidence given by themselves there were confessions that they were present and engaged in the raid, but claimed immunity on the ground that they were in the military service of Francisco Villa and acting under military orders.

Senator FALL. Now, you have stated that subsequent to the sentence of these men that certain parties, at their own instance caused investigations to be held and that resulted in reprieve and final examination of the evidence, etc., in the case by the President, or his—

Judge MEDLER. His legal advisers.

Senator FALL. His legal advisers?

Judge MEDLER. That is the information I obtained from public officials and also newspaper reports.

Senator FALL. Prior to the conviction of these men and their sentence by yourself, was there any interference of the trial or any attempted interference of the trial?

Judge MEDLER. I don't know whether any interference; there was a protest made against their trial.

Senator FALL. By whom?

Judge MEDLER. My recollection is that upon Saturday night of the first week of the term of the court, the grand jury reported these indictments and warrants were immediately issued and the defendants were taken into charge by Sheriff Simpson, of Luna County, he took them to the jail at Deming. During the next week, or the following week, their cases were set for trial, and we had a statute in New Mexico that requires that a list of the jury in capital cases be served upon the defendant 24 hours in advance of the trial. My recollection is the jury lists were served upon these defendants Wednesday morning and their cases set for the following Thursday morning at 9 o'clock. The court was in recess during the afternoon of Wednesday and I had gone to my hotel where I was stopping. About 4 o'clock in the afternoon Maj. Waddel, the then district attorney, called me over the telephone and advised me that a man by the name of Stone, special agent of the Department of Justice, was in Deming and desired to confer with me, or make some communication to me regarding the trial of these raiders. I advised the district attorney I would hold no consultations with anyone concerning a case in court, except in open court, and if Mr. Stone had any communication or anything to say to me, as judge of the court, I would hear him at 8 o'clock that evening in the courtroom.

At 8 o'clock that evening, in the court room, Mr. Stone was introduced to the court by Waddel upon the statement that he had some statement to make to the court from his superior officers, I understood the Attorney General. I told him I would hear any statement that he had to make concerning any matter in court. He then stated he was instructed to come to Deming and protest against the trial of the Villa raiders at that time; that is to say, on the following morning. He produced a telegram from the Attorney General.

Senator FALL. Attorney General of the United States?

Judge MEDLER. The Attorney General of the United States; containing these instructions, which I read. He also produced a telegram from Gen. Funston, who was then in charge of the Southern Department, in San Antonio, and also produced a telegram from the Secretary of War, or the Secretary of State—I can not remember which—it is my present recollection it was from the Secretary of State, but I would not be positive as to this. The substance of these telegrams was that these various departments protested against the trial of the Villa raiders, or Columbus raiders, as we called them, on the ground that it would involve the United States in international complications with Mexico.

Senator FALL. These telegrams were submitted to you?

Judge MEDLER. They were submitted to me in open court.

Senator FALL. What was your decision?

Judge MEDLER. I told Mr. Stone that these defendants were regularly indicted by a properly impaneled grand jury of Luna County; that they were in charge of the sheriff of Luna County; that the grand jury had previously reported that the jail of Luna County was insanitary and not a proper place to confine prisoners; and that to continue the trial of this case would involve their being held in jail for six months, and I saw no reason why the court could not proceed to try this case on the following morning; that Gen. Pershing was in Mexico with his expedition trying to arrest Francisco Villa, a co-defendant named in this indictment; and that if the trial of these raiders would involve the United States in international complications, to my mind it would seem that the United States was already involved. In other words, I practically told him there would be no "watchful waiting" around my court or any of my courts. I think that was the substance of the language I used.

Senator FALL. You then proceeded with the trial?

Judge MEDLER. He then asked me if I had any objections to talking over the telephone with Summers Burkhart, the United States attorney at Albuquerque. I told him I would if he had Mr. Burkhart on the telephone. He stated that he had Mr. Burkhart on the long-distance telephone. I had known Mr. Burkhart for quite a number of years and easily recognized his voice. Mr. Burkhart, when he found I was on the telephone, advised me he had received instructions from the Attorney General to go to Deming and protest against the trial of these Villistas; and I said, "Upon what grounds?" and he says "Upon the ground you will not give them a fair trial." I told Mr. Burkhart if that was the ground upon which he based his protest, until to-morrow at 10 o'clock, the time of the arrival of the Sante Fe train, to make that statement in open court. He then apologized, stating he did not intend to make any reflections upon the court, but stated that the public feeling was such that he did not feel the defendants would get a fair trial. I assured him that as far as I had anything to do with it as judge of the court that they would have a fair trial, and the trial was proceeded with the next morning.

Senator FALL. With the result you have already testified to?

Judge MEDLER. Yes, sir.

(The committee then, at 4.30 o'clock p. m. Feb. 7, 1920, adjourned until 10.30 o'clock Monday morning, Feb. 9, 1920.)

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
*El Paso, Tex.

The subcommittee met pursuant to the call of the chairman at 10.30 o'clock a. m. in the county court room, courthouse, El Paso, Tex., Senator A. B. Fall presiding.

Present: Senators A. B. Fall and Marcus A. Smith, and Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee.

TESTIMONY OF COL. GEO. T. LANGHORNE.

Senator FALL. Colonel, will you state your name and rank to the reporter, please?

Col. LANGHORNE. George T. Langhorne, colonel of Cavalry, commanding Eighth Cavalry.

Senator FALL. Where are you stationed now, Colonel?

Col. LANGHORNE. At Fort Bliss.

Senator FALL. How long have you been at Fort Bliss on duty?

Col. LANGHORNE. This last time since about October 10.

Senator FALL. Prior to October 10 where were you stationed?

Col. LANGHORNE. Commanding the Big Bend district, and prior to that time for two years I was here and on the border.

Senator FALL. Colonel, we hear a great deal about the Big Bend district, and the people, of course, of the United States generally don't know what it means, what it is ordinarily; of course, in speaking of a bend of a river the average layman might have an idea that it might be a farm of a thousand acres for a big bend, or it might be more. Now, as a matter of fact, what is the Big Bend?

Col. LANGHORNE. The Rio Grande southeast of El Paso runs south and southwest, and then it runs north again and comes back to the railroad below Sanderson; it comes to the railroad at Del Rio. Taking the railroad as a tangent, the river is about 110 miles from the railroad; thus there is a large bend jutting into Mexico. This is called the Big Bend country; it is about 14,000 square miles, larger than Massachusetts and Connecticut put together. About 53 per cent of it is mountains and canyons, a very peculiar country; it has peculiar formation called the rim rock, which runs for about 100 miles; there is a big plateau on which is Marfa, Valentine, Alpine, and Marathon. and it drops down about 2,500 feet to the valley of the Rio Grande, and on account of the fact that this is so far away from the railroad—that is, the river—there has been much opportunity there for an unsettled country and disorder rather than order.

Senator FALL. So you have been guarding a territory approximately as large as two of the New England States?

Col. LANGHORNE. Yes; with a front of about 420 miles of river.

Senator FALL. And that front is the international boundary between the United States and Mexico?

Col. LANGHORNE. Yes, sir. The headquarters of this district as it is called, is at Marfa. That makes the outlying stations 50 to 100 miles away from headquarters with very difficult roads and trails.

Senator FALL. Colonel, what has been the conditions in this district during the time you have been guarding it, and up to the present time, if you know, with reference to violence?

Col. LANGHORNE. When we went there there was a great deal of violence and disorder, especially on account of what is called raids, stealing parties that came over from the other side to steal cattle on this side and take them across; and they had been smuggling cattle and mules and horses from the other side to this side, but most of the cattle in Mexico had been killed off, and there is very little of that smuggling from that side to this side now. And people were a little bit upset for fear of loss of life, as well as of property, from these raiders.

Senator FALL. Has there been loss of life along the Big Bend district during the last two years or more from raiders?

Colonel LANGHORNE. Yes, sir; in a number of instances.

Senator FALL. Now, who were these raiders, if you know?

Col. LANGHORNE. I suppose I take it chronologically?

Senator FALL. Very well, if you will.

Col. LANGHORNE. This is just from memory: The first that I heard of was the killing of Sitters, who was a river guard, and Hulen, a ranger, and that was at the hand—probably by some bandits who lived around Pilares, using the Mexican term. About 100 miles of that river front—and these were smugglers and bandit bands there who had been there for a number of years operating on both sides of the river. The next that I had anything to do with, was the Glenn Springs raid, and that from the best evidence we could obtain was done principally by some men that came from the Laguna district; they called themselves Carrancistas. There was about 20 of those came up and then added to them were others that lived right on the border on both sides.

Senator FALL. Were any of these men identified after the Glenn Springs raid, that is, did you discover the identity of any of them through any evidence you had?

Col. LANGHORNE. There were a number of them captured and tried and put in the penitentiary and they claimed to be—

Senator FALL. Carrancistas?

Col. LANGHORNE. Carrancistas; and then there were a lot of bandits and smugglers with them that had no standing, except being Mexicans. I will refer to a report I have, chronologically, as to the others: As we were marching down to the Big Bend in the early part of October, 1917, we heard on the Mexican side there was a Mexican force marching down, and when we were at Fort Hancock they were reported nearly opposite us. One of the first patrols I sent out was under Lieut. Ferguson. That patrol of about five men and the lieutenant reached Nevill's ranch, and according to the report to me, which was carefully investigated, they saw about 150 Mexican troops on the other side. These were reported afterwards to be the escort of Gen. Jose Murguia. About 50 of that bunch crossed to this side and came toward the soldiers and Mr. Nevill and his son Glenn. Mr. Nevill acted as interpreter. About 20 of these men that came across began to round up Mr. Nevill's cows, and 30 of them came toward this small patrol and took a position on a hill.

The report goes on to say that the lieutenant halted them and demanded that the commander come forward. It is reported that this commander stated he thought these American soldiers were Villistas. The lieutenant and Mr. Nevill held this commander under the guns of the party and ordered those Mexicans that were rounding up the cattle to cease that and then all of them to go back across the river, which they did. And then they permitted the commander to go back. That was the first instance that we had. You can readily see there that that lieutenant was up against 150 to his 5 men that he had and Mr. Nevill and the boy, so he could not have very well taken them prisoners, even if he had instructions to do so. That was his first time there. The next instance of importance was the taking of Ojinaga by Villa on November 14, 1917. He made two attacks, one in the morning, which failed, and one in the afternoon—made one at night, just at nightfall. He drove the Carrancistas to this side, and then he held Ojinaga for several days and left himself, and his command stayed there for probably a month.

Senator FALL. What became of the Carranza garrison at Ojinaga?

Col. LANGHORNE. They came to this side and I put them in wagons, or, rather, trucks, and brought them up to Marfa. Those that were on horses I had them march up to Marfa, and I had the Mexican consul here put to my credit in the Marfa National Bank enough money to cover all of their expenses at one time; rather, to the credit of my quartermaster. We drew on this fund for expenses of these Carrancistas, and then ordered a train and put them all on the train and the train was held until the Mexican consul here paid, or guaranteed payment, of the whole force to Juarez and the return of my guard; that did not cost the United States a cent.

Senator FALL. Did these Mexican soldiers of the Carranza garrison have their arms with them?

Col. LANGHORNE. We disarmed them when they came over and sent their arms along with them, such arms as they had not thrown away.

Senator FALL. After they got here to El Paso, do you know what became of them?

Col. LANGHORNE. They were sent right across the river to Juarez.

Senator FALL. Juarez was in charge of the Carrancistas at that time?

Col. LANGHORNE. At that time.

Senator FALL. They were allowed to take their guns with them?

Col. LANGHORNE. They were shipped right across; I suppose in bond. My guard immediately turned them over to the Mexican authorities on the other side, everything they had, which was not very much. The Villistas, as I said, remained there under the command of a man named Sanchez, for quite a while. The United States would not recognize an open port there with the Villistas there. Villa gave us no opportunity to get him at that time and they committed no depredations as long as they were there.

Senator FALL. Villa committed no depredations as long as he or his garrison was there?

Col. LANGHORNE. No. We could not work with them because they were not de facto Government troops.

Senator FALL. But you had no reason to work against them?

Col. LANGHORNE. No; we did not have any excuse. Now, the next of importance was on November 30, 1917. Mr. Tigner had a ranch near the river; it was reported to me by telephone that some of his cattle had been stolen by some Mexicans—Mexican raiders. I ordered Lieut. Matlack, who was at Indio, to follow this trail, and in the meantime sent some troops to reinforce that sector. He reported that the trail led across the river and went into Mexico, and the next day I had him follow the trail, which he did, with 20 men—21 men.

Senator FALL. Into Mexico?

Col. LANGHORNE. Into Mexico, he followed them down below the place we call Indio and ran into about 250 of them and they had arranged an ambush to capture him and his men, but he ran around the ambush and charged in the midst of them and had a fight in which he killed a number and lost one man and five of his horses. He returned to this side and reported to me with this man's body, and Mr. Tigner did not get back. I directed troops to cross and get the body—get Mr. Tigner—which they did. They got Mr. Tigner the next day by Capt. Matlack going back after him. A large number of bandits were killed by Capt. Matlack's party, and the guide with Lieut. Matlack at that time was also killed by these Mexicans and the next day these Mexicans fired on one of our patrols and wounded one of these men named Pvt. Kleist of Troop I, Eighth Cavalry. I ordered the troops to cross, which they did and drove off these Mexicans, killing about 12 of them. That was just a few miles below the other place. The first locality was Buena Vista and the second one was called Mimbres. And the next instance of importance I have here was on Christmas day, 1917. It was reported to me at Marfa by Mr. Brite about 11 a. m. that his ranch was being raided. Mr. Brite has a wonderful ranch and extremely fine cattle, as all you gentlemen know.

Senator SMITH. How far from the river?

Col. LANGHORNE. As the crow flies about 16 miles; it is on the top of this rim rock that I have described to you. It is very difficult country below the rim rock. You have heard a description of the fight there. Let's go back a little. On my first arrival in Marfa I tried to organize all of the people so they would assist the troops and give us information, and they were organized. They responded very well and we organized automobile services, you might call them; that is, almost every ranchman offered his automobile and gave himself as a driver at $1 per trip on expeditions, and we called upon them whenever we needed them. On this occasion we called on the automobiles, and in 18 minutes after Mr. Brite reported to me the soldiers were going out by automobile to his ranch. Some men, civilians, had gone on ahead of them, and their dust warned the bandits, and the bandits made for the rim rock; the soldiers got there in time to follow them to the rim rock and have some shots at them. Those soldiers took along their saddles, but the bandits had taken off about 25 of Mr. Brite's horses and there were no horses to put the saddles on. At the same time I ordered troops from Ruidosa and Indio to march up the river and try to cut off these bandits who were making for the river; of course they left their Christmas dinner; it was just before dinner-time. They started up; they had to make a march, some of them 50 miles and some of them 60 miles—Capt. Fiske and Capt. Anderson making 50 miles and Lieut. Matlack about 60. It was a very cold, hard march that night over this very rough country. The bandits themselves got lost, as we found later by their tracks, and they attempted to cross the river at one or two places, where they lost a lot of horses in the quicksand, and finally they crossed at a place called Los Fresnos. The troops picked up the trail about a day late and followed them in, striking them about 5 miles inside, and then followed them until there were no more bandits to follow—up toward the canyon or spring called Siete Alamos.

Senator FALL. Why were there no more bandits to follow, Colonel?

Col. LANGHORNE. The troops thought they had killed them all, or they had gotten away; they began to fall out. There were 29 bandits who took part in this; one was killed at the house, probably by the Neills; they dug his body up, which was in Carranza uniform, which we had photographed, but nobody would recognize him as a Carrancista. Then in this time a number of them probably fell out, and there were a number that were killed on the other side. Showing the difficulty that young officers have to contend against: There was a Mexican packer with this outfit; of course the pack trains had to go along with these troops and take supplies, and as he knew that country, he was asked where there was water, and he replied, there was no water nearer than the river, which compelled this outfit to turn back; but if they had gone on 600 yards they would have come to this spring and found water—this was afterward verified by another patrol, who operated in that expedition and recognized the place where the soldiers, where they came, it was within 600 yards of this water hole. Mr. Brite lost probably four to seven thousand dollars' worth of property there. While the troops picked up a large number of these horses, they were run down, they were in the quicksand and found by the troops in Mexico, some of them shot by the troops, so he got back only two or three of these horses, and he got back practically none of the property taken from his store. This was the instance where the mail driver, Mickey Welsh, was killed, and two Mexican passengers were in his mail coach, and where a very gallant fight was put up by the two Neills. I take it you merely want me to check up on these various occurrences?

Senator FALL. Yes, sir.

Col. LANGHORNE. There were a great many instances during this time when Mexicans came across and stole property, and by that time the Carrancista forces had gone back to Ojinaga and were in control on the other side, and just to give you an example of how they handle things: It was reported that near San Jose some Mexicans had come across and taken three animals belonging to an old Mexican living on this side by the name of Francisco Estricero. The Mexican authorities promised to return these animals, or have them returned, by 12 o'clock the next day. Twelve o'clock the next day came but the animals were not returned. These Carrancista troops were trying to get food from this side, Presidio, and other places there, and sent a great many wagons on this side of the river, and while I could not close the port, I ordered nobody would be allowed to cross the river until these animals were returned. At 4 o'clock the report came that they had found out the cost of the animals and had given a check dated six days ahead, made out in favor of the Mexican who owned the animals, for the amount he said they were worth. Then we permitted crossing of the river to continue and we cashed the check after six days.

Senator FALL. You could not close the port, but you could prevent stuff going out of the port across the border.

Col. LANGHORNE. We had to regulate traffic.

Senator FALL. In that way you forced payment for the animals?

Col. LANGHORNE. Forced payment for the animals. Same kinds of things happened at various times. Another time was during the food control. The Carrancistas wanted a lot of corn, about 600,000 pounds of corn, I forget exactly, and a party of them had stolen 10 head of cattle and horses from a man named Davis on this side, and through the collector of customs here, he had to give the order for the passing of this corn, I arranged that it should not be passed until he satisfied the conditions we imposed about these stolen animals, and that was, they were to pay $50 a piece for these stolen animals, and if they returned the animals they got back the $50 and the man was to get the money for the others; well, that cooperation worked very well. When they put up the money the corn was allowed to pass.

Senator SMITH. About the only cooperation you got, wasn't it?

Col. LANGHORNE. We got pretty fair cooperation from the officials on this side. The next one I have here was a raid on the Nevill ranch on March 26. We had word of this raid before it occurred from Lieut. or Capt. Matlock, who was then at Candelaria. Just to explain why forces and troops were stationed at different places: You know this was the time of war and we wanted to go to France and we wanted to train the troops; having them scattered out in small detachments the training could not go on very well, so the smallest detachment we wanted to make at any time was a troop, like an organization of a company, or battery, for that reason at Candelaria there was a troop. At what we call Evett's ranch, about 34 miles above Candelaria, was another troop, Capt. Anderson, that was so difficult a place we could not supply it by wagons and we had to supply it by pack trains, which was quite 12 miles from the railroad south of Valentine, and a place called Holland's ranch, we supplied it with pack trains that had to go over the rim rock with supplies. The report we had about these Mexicans was that they were going to Bosque Bonito, which is about 30 miles above Nevill's—no, more than that, about 40 miles above Evett's ranch, we will say; Evett's ranch is near Pilares, so there was a Lieut. Gaines sent out from Evett's ranch; he patrolled up a piece as far as Bosque Bonito and warned the people at the Nevill ranch about this intended raid; Mr. Nevill was not there at the time; then he came on back to Bosque Bonito, and came on back to Nevill's upper ranch, because there is a telephone there.

About half past 12 at night I got word by telephone that Nevill's lower ranch had been raided. This lieutenant had gotten this word; he went there at once and found that Nevill's boy had been killed and a woman living there had been killed, and they found—Neville came in himself later and the husband of this woman had escaped and got a pony and gone up to Lieut. Gaines, who was only 6 miles away, and gave him this message. Then I sent Capt. Anderson with his troop from Evetts, directed him to go up there and then sent the pack train down. Sent Capt. Anderson with another troop to him on a freight train that night and had him go 100 miles or 115 miles by rail to march over the mountain so he could get the Nevill's ranch that night. Lieut. Patterson from Hester's ranch marched 25 miles between half past 12 at night and 4 o'clock in the afternoon and also arrived at Nevill's ranch with his troops. I sent a force then consisting of Capt. Anderson and his Troop G, Capt. Tate and his Troop A, which had come from Marfa, and a pack train on the trail of these bandits. The bandits split several times, but they kept on and they followed them over these mountains which were extremely difficult for about 70 miles; the Mexicans doubled back and came in near the river near Pilares. There they laid in ambush for the troops, but the troops went on and fought them for about 11 miles.

These bandits were reinforced by the people by the outlaw place, Pilares, Mexico, and also probably by some Carrancista soldiers, under Lieut. Enrique Montova, who was professing to aid us, but came up from across Candelaria and boasted he had fought against us and drove us out. Our soldiers found about 10 dead and found the horses of Nevill and equipment belonging to Nevill's ranch and the boy that had been killed, and probably they killed a great many more than that. There were 29 in the raid, and the report as we checked it up showed there were about 33 killed. We lost Private Albert of A Troop in that fight. During April it was reported continually from here through the intelligence corps and from San Antonio that large numbers of Mexican troops were coming north to the border, when they got down to us it was that they were going to raid along the border. On April 23, about that time, they arrived opposite Fort Hancock, which was then in the Big Bend district. Some of them crossed the river and stole some things on this side; then they proceeded that night to shoot up one of our patrols and the patrol was reinforced and the next morning the officer reported that they were fired at again and they fired back and killed quite a number of Mexicans, but I had sent some troops down from Marfa and went down myself by automobile and there was a mine run by some Americans just opposite this place which is called San Juan.

Senator FALL. That is in Mexico?

Col. LANGHORNE. In Mexico, in San Juan, the Carrancistas crossed this port about six miles from Fort Hancock, and after crossing they seized three Americans working at the mines. I telephoned to Andres Garcia, the inspector general, the Mexican consul. I asked him to come right out there, which he did by automobile, and arrange for the release of these three Americans. I had the Mexican officers, all of them, come over and see us, and we had some very nice troops. They did not show their troops very much. Then this colonel, Col. E. Martinez Ruiz, said his orders were to march this force down on the Mexican side to Ojinaga. I pointed out to him and to that Mexican consul to do that certainly involved difficulties; they had nothing to eat, and there were about 2,000 of them. It was at the time of the food control, and I tried to get them some food or arrange for some food to be passed to them at Fort Hancock, but they bought only a very small amount. They started down the river, and our troops marched with them on this side, but a part of our troops, the first part of our troops, would pass and then the next would come along and find where the Mexicans came over and raided, killed cattle, or robbed houses, and that kept up all the way down to Candelaria, and only in one case were our troops able to catch one of these parties, which was near Evett's ranch, and Corpl. Kline of B troop, he had about four or five men, he ran into a bunch of them just at nightfall, and Corpl. Kline's party was fired on; he returned this fire, and the next morning they went down there and found three dead horses and three wounded horses, and these wounded horses had swords on them, which showed they were officers' horses of these Carrancista officers. That force drove off about 11 head of cattle. So we demanded of Mr. E. Martinez Ruiz a receipt for all of these things that had been stolen, amounting to several thousand dollars, and had Garcia down here; the Mexican consul general paid this money to me, which I then distributed to these various ranchers; because these were Carrancista troops. This particular measure was taken instead of other means of handling it. I had my troops assembled at various points along the river. We would see the officers; Col. Ruiz, he sent me several very funny letters; one was, "Please tell my soldiers not to be upset if they heard any firing on the other side," because it was only his soldiers who were firing at rabbits and hares, not at us, as they had nothing to eat. And then I had to—at Candelaria—to go over and return the visit of Col. Ruiz and his officers, and a very pathetic thing happened; he sent over to see if he could not borrow some sugar and coffee in order to extend hospitality to our officers, who were visiting him. They were actually down; they ate their burros; they had nothing to eat at all, and it was disgraceful to march the forces, and could only result in complications; it was only on account of the fact our troops were very well disciplined and the people were very well disciplined, or there would have been other untoward results of such a move as that. Due to some change in orders, for a time there were a number of robbers that would come over and get things on this side and we could not follow them.

Senator FALL. There had been a change of orders?

Col. LANGHORNE. And there had been a change of orders and they soon found out, and they would send over and steal, then they would be insulting to our officers, sending them all sorts of messages. However, that was again changed, but it was during that period an instance took place of making them pay for some horses and cattle through the cooperation of our collector of customs here. The department commanders were changed, then, right after that incident of the Mexican troops marching down, and Maj. Gen. Holbrook, who is now the department commander, came to Marfa and was staying with me at my house, and at 4 o'clock in the morning came a report from down at Miravillas canyon, 140 miles from Marfa, that the Mexicans had crossed to this side and stolen a lot of cattle. I sent troops from Glenn Springs, which had to make a tremendously long and difficult march in that locality and I reported the matter to Gen. Holbrook, and he sent a telegram to Washington and obtained authority to follow these Mexicans. The country there is very difficult, the trail runs along the river and across the river.

Now, they could not follow that trail; the troops would get 5 miles down the river and have to come back 15 miles to come up another canyon, so the troops, to keep up with this cattle, they would lose something like two or three days; then they took the trail and followed it, and a terrible rain storm and hail storm came up and obliterated everything in the way of a trail. That was the only failure we ever had in sending troops across. Those cattle were taken off a man who had a reputation as a bandit, but he was also supposed to be an officer of the Carrancista Government, and it was in Coahuila. Coahuila had given us very little trouble; that was the only case of trouble during my stay in the Big Bend. We never got those cattle back, unless they got them back through Del Rio, and we tried to have it done there by amicable arrangements. To show you another instance, about the early part of March, 1919, the commanding officer at Indio reported that five head of Mr. Tigner's cattle had been stolen, that was in the afternoon, so I told him to follow the trail and to get ready to follow these cattle the next morning at daylight and go to the place of crossing, and also notified the Mexican consul, and I demanded payment for these cattle because we thought they had been taken by Carrancista soldiers or for them.

So the next morning he was at this place of crossing, and there were some Mexican officers, one was a major and had a telephone put in, and necessitated, if we had crossed it would have been going right after the Mexican troops, de facto Government troops, because they had taken the cattle, so I permitted this officer, who was Capt. Minard, to accept a receipt for these cattle at $60 a head, which was the price Mr. Tigner put on them. It took me about six months to get that money back from Consul General Garcia here, which I finally gave to Mr. Tigner on March 22, and in the afternoon Capt. Klepfer, who was at Ruidosa, reported that a number of cattle had been taken off belonging to a Mexican named Nunez, who had a ranch in the Ruidosa Mountains, so I directed him to have his troop ready and follow them down to the place of crossing and for him to investigate and have his pack train and all. And he reported about 4 o'clock in the afternoon that the trail was perfectly plain, and I directed him to follow across and get them back. He followed them and he struck the bandits and the cattle about nightfall and had a little skirmish, and he got back 24 of the 25 cattle; one of these had been butchered and was on the fire, so he brought back the meat, accounting for all of the cattle.

Then he started back that night with the cattle and with the pack mules, and a terrible storm came up, rain and hail, lasting about two hours; but he held all of the bunch of cattle and got back across the river about 1.15 the next morning, after having covered about 50 miles. The next was about April 1. A party of Mexicans came across the river between Ruidosa and Candelaria and stole some more cattle and horses. Capt. Matlack reported it to me, I think, about 11 or half past 11 at night, and I directed him to follow them. In all of these movements, you can understand, it was necessary to move the troops around. If you are going to release a troop at one place, you have got to get other troops to take their place to properly patrol the river, to make the necessary protection. Capt. Matlack followed these cattle before daybreak and ran into the bandits and cattle on this side, coming up with them, and he followed the trail of the bandits down to the river and saw where they had crossed with their horses, and I directed him to follow. In the meantime I had ordered another troop up to this place of crossing, so we would have two. I also called on the Mexican consul in every case. We always reported to the military Mexican commander to get cooperation of the Mexican troops. They always protested against our crossing, begging us not to cross; they would handle the matter. Of course they could not be believed. In this case he stated there was no necessity of our crossing, because he said Capt. Chico Cano would give us every assistance to capture the bandits. Capt. Matlack, with two troops, he followed them. He divided. He sent one troop up the river and followed them toward the mountains and came across them about 1.30 that afternoon; and all of the bandits were killed, except Chico Cano, who got away with two holes through him; also recovered the horses that had been stolen.

Senator FALL. Capt. Chico Cano was helping you?

Col. LANGHORNE. Helping us. In this report I have it a little different. Capt. Matlack reported Capt. Chico Cano was in charge of a raiding party and received two wounds in the fighting, and the stolen stock was recovered. I have only recited a few of these instances. In many cases reports would come in, and we would investigate and find they did not justify our crossing, and we did not cross the river, and it would probably be handled some other way. To show you the alertness of the troops, I received from the commanding officer at Candelaria the following telegram: "Big Bend District, Marfa, Tex., January 22. Luis Munoz entered the United States two miles and a half south of Candelaria; stole two pigs." "February 10, Luis Munoz was hung by Romero Madrid." Signed, "Matlack." There were a large number of instances. I sent a band to these troops to Candelaria that were so isolated; the band stopped at different places down the river and the troops would gather at these little places. They got to Indio and were having a concert, and all of the troops had come up from the various places mentioned, and some one came up and reported that six horses had been carried away. The troops went out and followed the trail, only to find it was three Americans prospecting and had not given word they were passing through.

Now, the next instance of any importance was the seizure of those two aviators. They went down in Mexico and thought they were in the United States, and they were seized by some Mexicans and held for ransom. We were continually looking for those aviators by planes and the Mexicans were promising to look for them. On Sunday, which was a week after they had been lost—no, I think it was Saturday, Capt. Matlack telephoned up that he had intercepted a letter, which was from this Mexican bandit, saying he had these aviators and demanded $15,000 for them. I reported this matter, and my recommendation was to the department commander that we get the aviators alive, if we could, but did not want to risk their being killed; that we would make the best arrangement that we could and would I be authorized to pay this money, and then immediately to follow the men that were holding these men for ransom, these aviators for ransom. That was approved.

Senator FALL. You would pay the entire $15,000, if necessary?

Col. LANGHORNE. We were authorized to pay up to that. We did not hear from it, they had to go to Washington, but that night I sent out, rather they were holding an important camp meeting, an annual camp meeting up near Marfa, quite an event in the Big Bend country, and the word got to them that these aviators were being held for $15,000; in five minutes ranchers had instructed the bank there to pay over to me the money—$15,000—and they would take chances on getting it back from the Government, so the next morning I sent this money by the banker, Mr. Fennel, down to Candelaria where Capt. Matlack was handling the situation. He that night, after working on plans for 24 hours, 36 hours, at his personal risk got back the aviators and there was no opportunity for us to seize them before that and I directed that the troops follow, and had arranged—made all arrangements—sent a troop from Marfa and placed them along the river and they went in after these men. Of course you gentlemen realize that country is extremely difficult and the troops did some remarkable marching, had to go over several ranges of mountains, had to find water, the trail could easily be lost of a single man on those rocks. The aviators cooperated and shot down the horse of the principal Mexican, he then escaped over the rocks, leaving no trail. That was—

Senator FALL. Ruiz Renteria?

Col. LANGHORNE. Ruiz Renteria. However, the troops got some others—got four of them—of that same band and killed them, and they made a very credible performance, and were brought out so as to avoid any complication with Carranza troops, because as these Mexicans had gone behind the Carranza lines, then you have, as you can readily see the risk of a clash with the de facto government troops, if you go through after them. But to show you cooperation: The Mexican general objected to our going in because they said they were going to look for those aviators, and I said you are seven days late in starting, eight days late, and the aviators had been picked up by some Mexican and being held for ransom; that we had paid what we had to and obtained back the aviators, and now that we were chasing the men that picked them up. They said they were going to start immediately; the next was, they objected to our crossing. I said we had a right to cross, had to cross; their troops tried to stop ours, but we had the most troops and in better position and they did not stop us. They fired, we found afterwards, at the aeroplanes, but on the second day a telegram came from Gen. Dieguez, which Mexican Consul General Garcia here sent to me, and asked me to forward to Gen. Pineda, it was directing him not to interfere with our troops at all and let us pass. I sent the telegram by aeroplane to Gen. Pineda, and also to our troops.

Senator FALL. This was after you had met them, however, and they did not interfere with you when you had more troops than they had?

Col. LANGHORNE. When we had more troops than they did, and it is not very wise to have fewer troops. Those, I think, cover the instances you gentlemen want brought out. I would like to bring out one thing to show cooperation of the citizens of the Big Bend district with the troops. This occurred at the time Villa made his raid, and it was necessary for us, from a military standpoint, to have absolute control, which we did, especially the lines of communication there, you know—75 to 100 miles. And this necessitated some new soldiers stopping ranchmen, but they never objected at all at any mistake the soldiers made, and it was very surprising, because some recruits, armed with six-shooters, seemed to me a remarkable thing that Texans submit to it and not have any difficulty, but recognized, however, that the recruit may have been over zealous; but the citizens sent me a paper—several papers, signed by various persons, practically all of the citizens of that county, and evidently they had started out with some paper and changed it; but one got to me in its original form, which was something like this: "We want to show you we thoroughly approve of all measures you have taken at this time and especially in practically declaring martial law in certain portions of this county, and if you wish to extend that to any portion of the county we are with you and assure you it is all right to do so." With the cooperation of those automobiles, a man that might at any moment furnish his automobile for three or four days, and they did it within 5 or 10 minutes—

Senator FALL. Of course, you appreciated it not only showed their loyalty but also the fact they had confidence in you?

Col. LANGHORNE. Oh, yes. At one time I told them we wanted to take troops to the river, a hundred and ten men, and we wanted to start in three-quarters of an hour. In three-quarters of an hour the troops began to go to the river, and were down there in four hours without an accident, something we could not have done with our limited transportation facilities at that time.

Senator FALL. What was the morale of the Mexican troops on the other side, just generally speaking?

Col. LANGHORNE. They haven't any.

Senator FALL. What was the morale of the American troops under your command? You say that you kept them in troop formation, as I understand, prepared to and hoping to go to France?

Col. LANGHORNE. Well, due to this hard work, tremendously hard work, and the fact that every man and horse out there had to be kept in careful condition to do 50 miles a day for four days—that was the standard—and the fact they never knew what moment they were going to be called on to run a risk, and on account of various inspections and drills and competitive competitions, the troops kept in a very high state of morale and also fitness. We made—the troops made marches that were extraordinary without any loss of man or animal.

Senator FALL. I suppose your regiment, of course, had been inspected by regular inspectors?

Col. LANGHORNE. By regular inspectors and by department commanders and special inspectors, and they have all been very complimentary.

Senator FALL. Colonel, is that a report of an inspection of your command?

Col. LANGHORNE. Yes, sir; this is a summary sent out by the War Department by order of the Secretary of War, in which is contained, it states, a report made to the War Department by Col. Roberts, of the Cavalry, who made a special report on the regiment. He was an inspector in France and inspector of all this country.

Senator FALL. The date of this is July 9, you have no objections to that being made a part of the record?

Col. LANGHORNE. None whatever.

(Said circular is as follows:)

WAR DEPARTMENT, THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
July 9, 1919.

From: The Adjutant General of the Army.

To: The Commanding General Southern Department, Fort Sam Houston, Tex.

Subject: Special report on Eighth Cavalry.

Under date of June 24, 1919, the following special report on the Eighth Cavalry was made by Col. T. A. Roberts, Cavalry, to the chief of the morale branch, General Staff:

1. The appearance and general morale of the Eighth Cavalry in this, the largest and most isolated of all border districts, is so remarkably good that special report thereon is made.

2. I have seen considerably more than half of the regiment. On the 21st inst. I saw the entire garrison at Marfa on review—a weekly occurrence and nothing special on this occasion. I have never seen such a perfectly appointed command before in my service, the condition and appearance of horses, equipment, and men of the Cavalry, of mules, harness, wagons, and carts of the trains and of the pack train was such as to make a profound impression. Every buckle and strap was cleaned and oiled and in place. The gaiting of the horses, was remarkable. The entire command, with the exception of rolling kitchens, passed in review at a walk, trot, gallop, and extended gallop in nearly perfect formation—it was so nearly perfect that when one mule of the pack train, who happened to be a very fast trotter, passed at a trot while the command was at the extended gallop, it was easily noticed.

3. The spirit of the officers and men is splendid, as would be expected from a command in which so much attention is given to detail.

4. Not only was the command at Marfa in an exceedingly high state of efficiency, but the appearance of the troops at the outlying stations showed that this condition is general throughout the regiment. I saw a troop at Ruidosa charge down a hill with a slope of at least 60 degrees. The same troop, without any prior preparation, put over an exceedingly interesting fancy drill. Horses and mules at the outposts are as well cared for as those at headquarters.

5. In conversation with the commanding officer, Col. George T. Langhorne, concerning morale matters and methods, it was found that during the whole time he has been in command methods along the lines recommended by the morale branch have been in vogue, with most gratifying results. Needless to say, the ideas brought by me met with a cordial reception, and it can be confidently expected that anything new that might have been suggested will receive a thorough tryout.

6. Conditions at some of the outlying stations are exceedingly trying. The heat is great, but a few conveniences are available, but the spirit of the men is exceedingly good, and that of the officers generally is also very good, although one or two cases have been observed in which it is believed that officers have been too long alone. These cases are receiving the careful attention of the commanding officer.

The War Department considers this an excellent example of what can be accomplished by troops under trying conditions in maintaining a high state of training and discipline.

By order of the Secretary of War.

ALBERT GILMOR,
Adjutant General.

Senator FALL. Speaking of the morale of the Mexican troops over on the other side, did any of them ever come over on this side?

Col. LANGHORNE. They were always doing that, Mr. Senator, they would come across at all sorts of times and we would generally gather them in and turn them back. We kept them from getting bad health by letting them work on adobe piles, making brick, and one time practically the whole garrison of Presidio deserted, rather Ojinaga deserted and came across the river at Presidio, we kept them there and had to take them prisoners, and kept them there for several days and they did not want to go back.

Senator FALL. What were they doing?

Col. LANGHORNE. They were making adobes for us and of course we had to feed them, but did not pay them, but one of their officers who paid his head tax to get over we paid him as overseer of these prisoners. They would not go back until one of our officers, Capt. Ochs, in whom they had a great deal of trust and confidence, he persuaded them to go back to the other side at the request of the Mexican military authorities, who could not persuade them himself to go back; and these Carrancistas would constantly run over to this side to escape the Villistas and then we would have to take care of them.

We always took care of those men. There were four or five of my men down at a little place called Polvo. They, one night, went off on a spree and went across into Mexico, went into town and went into a pool hall and played pool, in coming back they were set upon by some Mexican troops and one of them was killed and the others got away. They did not have their rifles. We punished the men that were not killed for violating our orders in crossing into Mexico and they were sent to the penitentiary, I think, by the court, which seemed a little hard that our soldiers should be punished so severely, the others, of course, are never punished.

Senator FALL. But taken care of?

Col. LANGHORNE. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And fattened up?

Col. LANGHORNE. Yes, sir; quite a contrast.

Senator FALL. You have spoken, of course, in referring to these different instances of lack of cooperation or assistance, did you ever receive any assistance from the Mexican authorities on the other side?

Col. LANGHORNE. I can not recollect any. We received many promises, which were never kept. That little Martinez Ruiz, he could not handle his troops; they did not do anything especially against us, the most friendly relations generally existed, but beyond pleasant words nothing was done.

Senator FALL. During the month or more that Villa occupied Ojinaga through the command of Sanchez you had no reason to cross the river?

Col. LANGHORNE. We crossed at the Mimbres, but that was away from them; at Mimbres and Buena Vista.

Senator FALL. Not in the territory over which he had control?

Col. LANGHORNE. He was supposed to have control, but he was down at Ojinaga, and this was a great many miles away. He had given up control because when the Carrancista troops returned, these Villistas immediately marched out and did not put up any resistance. There was not force enough left for that.

Senator FALL. And you asked, of course, no cooperation from Villa?

Col. LANGHORNE. No, sir; we merely prevented them from having communication with this side.

Senator FALL. I think that is all, unless you care to make a further statement; it is possible we may want to ask you some few questions in executive session later.

(Then at 12.05 p. m. the committee recessed until 2.30 o'clock p. m., February 9, 1920.)

AFTER RECESS.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. WILLIAM V. OCHS.

Senator FALL. How long have you been in the military service, Capt. Ochs?

Capt. OCHS. Since 1916.

Senator FALL. Had you entered the military service as a captain?

Capt. OCHS. Why, I enlisted, sir, as a private.

Senator FALL. In the Eighth Cavalry?

Capt. OCHS. In the National Guard of Tennessee, sir.

Senator FALL. When did you enter the regular service?

Capt. OCHS. I entered the regular service October 7, 1917.

Senator FALL. In what capacity?

Capt. OCHS. As a second lieutenant of Cavalry.

Senator FALL. And you are now a captain?

Capt. OCHS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Were you in the Eighth Cavalry during the time the Eighth Cavalry was stationed in the Big Bend district?

Capt. OCHS. Yes, sir; I joined the Eighth Cavalry approximately a week after they arrived and remained with them until they left, with them two years there.

Senator FALL. What troop were you in command of?

Capt. OCHS. In command temporarily of L troop, afterwards I troop, Eighth Cavalry.

Senator FALL. Where were you stationed?

Capt. OCHS. Stationed at Ruidosa first, Indio and Presidio, most of the time being spent at Presidio, Tex.

Senator FALL. What was your experience along the border in performance of your duties in the Big Bend district? Just go ahead, Captain, and tell shortly and distinctly what occurred there.

Capt. OCHS. My duties were to maintain, in my particular sector, law and order.

Senator FALL. In the performance of your duties did you receive assistance from the Carrancista authorities, either the civil or military, on the Mexican side of the line?

Capt. OCHS. Absolutely none from the military authorities and very little from the civil authorities. I was stationed at Presidio while the Mexican consul was stationed there and had occasion to be in close touch with him, and I received very little cooperation from him.

Senator FALL. Do you know anything about any raids, thefts, or robberies, or acts of violence on the American side committed by Mexicans from the other side of the river?

Capt. OCHS. They were too numerous to enumerate, Senator.

Senator FALL. What were the soldiers and officers of the Eighth Cavalry accustomed to do when a raid occurred from the other side of the river? What action, if any, did you take?

Capt. OCHS. If I could catch them on this side of the river, I used my own judgment; if it involved crossing the river, I wanted orders from higher authorities.

Senator FALL. Col. Langhorne, generally?

Capt. OCHS. Yes; generally.

Senator FALL. Do you know of any of the raids which took place during the time you were there?

Capt. OCHS. I do, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you know anything about the Glenn Springs raid?

Capt. OCHS. I was not present at that time.

Senator FALL. What raids do you personally know of?

Capt. OCHS. I know of the raid on Mr. Tigner's ranch, in which Capt. Matlack was in command of the troops. I took part in pursuit. I know of many other raids, similar raids that did not involve the crossing of the river at Presidio, due to the fact that strong Carranza forces were stationed at Ojinaga, which was directly opposite that sector, and crossing of American troops in that section would undoubtedly have meant conflict with the Carranza troops.

Senator FALL. Do you know of any of the Mexicans who were killed on this side of the river during any of these raids?

Capt. OCHS. Yes, sir; I know of some.

Senator FALL. Have you any record of any kind?

Capt. OCHS. I have a record of several soldiers being killed and presumably an officer by the name of Ricardo Flores; I will give you the date, for stealing corn and resisting arrest.

Senator FALL. That was on this side of the river?

Capt. OCHS. Yes, sir; in the vicinity of Haciendita, Tex., on Tuesday, December 17, 1918.

Senator FALL. Was he identified as a Carranza soldier?

Capt. OCHS. By some officers of the Carranza garrison and the consul.

Senator FALL. Both the consul and the—

Capt. OCHS. As a soldier, but not as an officer; this was denied.

Senator FALL. What raised the presumption that he might be an officer?

Capt. OCHS. That was the consensus of opinion among the Mexicans on this side of the river that he was a Carranza officer, and from what our scout could find out led me to believe he was an officer.

Senator FALL. Do you know about the identification of any other dead on this side of the river, from official record or otherwise?

Capt. OCHS. I do from record, sir; not from personal observation.

Senator FALL. Do you know of the discipline maintained by the Carranza military on the other side of the line?

Capt. OCHS. Why, I visited the Carranza garrison January 18, maintained by the Carranza officers, and from my observation there was absolutely no discipline. On several occasions while at Presidio petty thefts took place, smuggling of sotol and little crimes that did not involve the necessity of going over; and then I talked to the consul relative to this business, and he said he was not able to cope with the conditions over there due to the fact that he was not in sympathy with that particular military administration in Ojinaga.

Senator FALL. This was the Carranza consul, was it?

Capt. OCHS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And the military contingent there were under Carranza officers?

Capt. OCHS. Yes, sir; Col. Cevallos was commanding officer practically all the time, and I believe he is now under indictment for embezzlement.

Senator FALL. The Mexican consul, upon your report of thefts, etc., could not help you out because, he said, he was not in sympathy with the military contingent over there?

Capt. OCHS. That he was unable to do anything with them.

Senator FALL. Do you know anything about the desertions from the military ranks?

Capt. OCHS. Yes, sir; there were 57 desertions in March that came over at Presidio, Tex. We held them there as prisoners.

Senator FALL. Did they come over in a body, or how did they come?

Capt. OCHS. Came over in one body; all deserted in one day. They came over with their families, and I investigated their cause of desertion, and also questioned them in reference to conditions over there, and practically everyone that was investigated stated that they could not and would not under any circumstances remain as soldiers under the Carrancista régime in Ojinaga. They were ill fed and poorly clothed, the morale was low, had no sympathy with their officers, and were very adverse to being sent back.

Senator FALL. When did you first come in contact with them; when they came over here did they report to you, or how did you happen to meet them?

Capt. OCHS. Why, our patrols cooperated with the customs authorities and immigration authorities were picking them up all the time and bringing them in.

Senator FALL. Did you put them under arrest?

Capt. OCHS. I held them in the guardhouse.

Senator FALL. Did you turn them out of the guardhouse?

Capt. OCHS. Yes, sir; to deport them.

Senator FALL. What were they doing while you were in charge of them?

Capt. OCHS. Well, for exercise, we worked them on adobe brick. They could not remain in the guardhouse without some sort of exercise.

Senator FALL. Were they satisfied making brick?

Capt. OCHS. They seemed perfectly delighted and wanted to remain on the job without pay.

Senator FALL. Do you know of any attempt by the Carranza officers to get them to return to the other side?

Capt. OCHS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you have any communication with the Carranza officers with reference to this subject?

Capt. OCHS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What was the effect of it, purport?

Capt. OCHS. Col. Cevallos, the commanding officer at that time, came over and made a speech, begging them to go back, saying that he would waive the law relative to desertion in the Mexican Army if they would return; they would, of course, have to be punished, but the punishment would really be nominal and they would get good treatment if they would only come back.

Senator FALL. Did they agree to go?

Capt. OCHS. No, sir; they did not. Under no circumstances would they go.

Senator FALL. How did they happen to go back, if they did return to Mexico?

Capt. OCHS. Why, they were ordered back by—ordered turned over to the immigration authorities by telegraph, and when I told them that they were to be returned to Mexico they were taken down to the river; the military authorities had nothing whatsoever to do with their deportation. I was a witness at the time when they were sent back across the river by the immigration authorities, acting unofficially I assisted in the deportation.

Senator FALL. How did you assist?

Capt. OCHS. By persuasion.

Senator FALL. These Mexicans had confidence in you?

Capt. OCHS. Yes, sir; they had a good deal of confidence in me.

Senator FALL. You persuaded them to go back, did you?

Capt. OCHS. They said they would not go back unless I went back with them.

Senator FALL. Did you go back with them?

Capt. OCHS. I took them back over; yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you know what happened to them, if anything?

Capt. OCHS. I kept close in touch with what was going to happen to them and nothing resulted.

Senator FALL. They were not punished?

Capt. OCHS. No, sir; to my knowledge none of them were punished, because I was over there afterwards and checked up on them.

Senator FALL. You persuaded them that, if they would go back they would not be punished?

Capt. OCHS. I personally guaranteed that they would not be punished.

Senator FALL. Under that guaranty they agreed to return if you would go with them?

Capt. OCHS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you ever get an acknowledgment, any expression of gratitude, from any Carrancista officials for your services in this matter?

Capt. OCHS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Now, during the time you were stationed there did you receive any cooperation—you have stated you did not from the military authorities in your attempt to preserve law and order, but that you were in touch with the consul at Presidio; what cooperation was he able to render you, if at all?

Capt. OCHS. By promises only, none of which, to my knowledge, were ever fulfilled.

Senator FALL. What was the condition, generally, during your entire term of service in the Big Bend district in reference to violence or fear of continuous violence; were they good or bad?

Capt. OCHS. Carrancistas?

Senator FALL. The conditions, I mean, that existed in the Big Bend district.

Capt. OCHS. Well, the conditions were very bad at times.

Senator FALL. What, in your opinion, would have been the condition at all time had the Eighth Cavalry been removed from the Big Bend district and no other United States troops placed there?

Capt. OCHS. It would have been a veritable hell.

Senator FALL. Could American citizens have remained in that district, in your judgment?

Capt. OCHS. Impossible.

Senator FALL. How about the natives—that is, the Mexicans who were American citizens or who were residing on this side—could they have remained there in safety?

Capt. OCHS. They could not, sir.

Senator FALL. If the military were removed from that Big Bend district to-day, as you know of it, what would be the result; the same as if they had been removed at any time in the last two years?

Capt. OCHS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Then, in your judgment, it is absolutely necessary, for the protection of the American border from raids from Mexico countenanced by or unopposed by the Carranza government, to maintain a military force in the Big Bend district for protection?

Capt. OCHS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Have you any further statements you desire to make, anything you can think of, of interest to the investigation?

Capt. OCHS. I have nothing further to say; but I would like to state I think the story has been brought out that there was hardly a week during my service along the Rio Grande that there was not some depredations or petty thefts, all of which were reported immediately to the Mexican consul, but he was unable to act because he was in sympathy with such crimes. I think that was brought out.

Senator FALL. You neither had his assistance, effective assistance, nor that of the military authorities in checking such depredations?

Capt. OCHS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Well, we thank you, sir.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. LEONARD L. MATLACK.

Senator FALL. Captain, of what State are you a native?

Capt. MATLACK. Kentucky, sir.

Senator FALL. How long have you been in the military service?

Capt. MATLACK. I started in the military service in 1898.

Senator FALL. How old were you at that time?

Capt. MATLACK. About 18 years, sir.

Senator FALL. In what capacity did you enter the service?

Capt. MATLACK. As a private, sir.

Senator FALL. Where did you see your first service?

Capt. MATLACK. In Porto Rico, sir.

Senator FALL. Then, where?

Capt. MATLACK. In the Philippine Islands.

Senator FALL. And then?

Capt. MATLACK. In Fort Russell, Wyo.; Fort Apache, Ariz.; Fort Yellowstone, Wyo.; Fort Wingate, N. Mex.; Petanza, Philippine Islands; Jolo Mindanao, Philippine Islands; Camp Stutzenburg, Luzon Island in the Philippines; Fort McKinley, Philippine Islands; Fort Bliss, Tex., and the Big Bend district and back to Fort Bliss.

Senator FALL. When did you receive your first commission?

Capt. MATLACK. I was commissioned in June, 1917.

Senator FALL. Prior to that time had you been made a noncommissioned officer?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir; I had worked from private to the highest rank I could hold, first sergeant.

Senator FALL. You were made a commissioned officers in 1917?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What commission, what rank?

Capt. MATLACK. Second lieutenant of Cavalry.

Senator FALL. When did you receive your commission as captain?

Capt. MATLACK. August 28, 1918.

Senator FALL. That was while you was on service in the Big Bend district?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you speak Spanish before you entered the Army?

Capt. MATLACK. No, sir.

Senator FALL. You are familiar with the Spanish language now?

Capt. MATLACK. Slightly, sir.

Senator FALL. You learned it during your service in the Army in the Philippines and Porto Rico?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Your name has been mentioned. Captain, on one or two occasions with reference to the investigation which the committee is conducting with regard to occurrences in the Big Bend district. Just state where you were stationed in the Big Bend, what your duties were, and what occurred generally. Go ahead.

Capt. MATLACK. When I first went to the Big Bend district I was stationed in Ruidosa; from there I went to Indio, and from Indio to Pilares, and from Pilares to Candelaria. My first experience in the Big Bend district with conditions in Mexico was at Ruidosa; there was a band of Mexicans opposite there at Barrancas, which is the Mexican town opposite Ruidosa. That night, as near as I remember, there were 17 women that came into the United States that had been raped. Fled to our side for protection and treatment. The next thing was Lieut. Col. Jorge Meranga being whipped in San Antonio, Mexico, by Alfonso Sanchez, a Villa general; he, with his entire garrison, deserted and came to the United States to Candelaria, Tex. They were fed and quartered, and then they thought the situation was safe enough for them to go back into Mexico. We let them go back. The next thing that happened was on December 1, 1917, when Mr. Tigner's ranch was raided and cattle driven into Mexico. I took my troop, a detachment of my troop of 21 men, and followed a fresh trail into Buena Vista. We were ambushed at this place and five horses shot from under my men, one soldier killed and one wounded.

We whipped the Mexicans out of the town, and later found the carcasses of Mr. Tigner's cattle, and they were identified by their hides; and Mr. Tigner became lost during this engagement and we had to go back and get him out.

Senator FALL. When did you go back after Mr. Tigner?

Capt. MATLACK. The next morning before daylight and tried to find him; we went back three times that day and tried to find Mr. Tigner, but he was so frightened he stayed in the brush and would not come out. The next morning I crossed the river before daylight and found him and brought him home.

Senator FALL. You say you found the carcasses of Mr. Tigner's cattle there?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir. Mr. Tigner's foreman had been killed, a man named Justo Gonzalez; his hands were tied and his head had been crushed with a rock, and we found the rock close to him. There was a man by the side of him named Ruiz, who had been shot during the engagement, and he was the only one they had apparently tried to take care of. I think the evidence was that in view of that he had been carried in there badly wounded, as he was the only dead Mexican that had been taken inside.

Senator FALL. Were there any outside?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. How many?

Capt. MATLACK. I saw 18, but the reports from the Mexicans themselves were to the effect that 35 had been killed and 9 wounded.

Senator FALL. But you only saw yourself 18?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Go ahead.

Capt. MATLACK. On December 3, 1917, the Mexicans at Las Mimbres fired across the river and shot a private of the Eighth Cavalry through the leg and fired on the patrol. We crossed the river and had a fight with these men and destroyed the town of Los Mimbres and the town of Buena Vista.

Senator FALL. Burned the towns down?

Capt. MATLACK. Burned the towns; yes, sir. These towns had been reported to us by Texas rangers and river guards or immigration authorities and soldiers who occupied this district before we had that it was a bandit hang out and we found it that way shortly after we arrived in the Big Bend district.

Senator FALL. Were there any casualties during your operations on the other side?

Capt. MATLACK. At that time—

Senator FALL. Any among our men?

Capt. MATLACK. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Any among the Mexicans?

Capt. MATLACK. Twelve, the best we could find out. On December 13, 1917, Carranza soldiers commanded by Gen. Jose Murguia crossed into the United States at San Jose, Tex., and stole two horses and a mule. The Mexicans denied to me at the river bank that the animals were in their column, at the same time the man that owned the horses and mule was with me and identified them. They promised they would return them the next day at 12 o'clock. I remained in the vicinity of San Jose until 12 o'clock the next day and they did not return the horses or the mule. I reported the matter to Col. Langhorne who stopped them from taking provisions across the river at Presidio and the Mexicans immediately paid by check for the stolen animals.

Senator FALL. That was the Carrancistas?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. They had been identified? They were identified as the stolen animals?

Capt. MATLACK. They were seen in their possession by the owner and they, the next day, paid for them. On December 17, 1917, a Mexican whom, I believed to be a Carrancista soldier—he fired at me across the river between Indio and San Jose. I shot the Mexican from his horse and the horse crossed the river into the United States and was identified as the property of Justo Gonzalez, the foreman on Mr. Tigner's ranch who was killed in Buena Vista on December 2.

Senator FALL. You stayed on this side and shot him?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir. On March 29, 1918, I received a telegram from Col. George T. Langhorne to endeavor to have the Carrancista garrison stationed in San Antonio, Mexico, cooperate with us in running down the raiders of the Nevill ranch. I sent for the commanding officer, Maj. Vicente Sanchez, to have a conference with him and he sent his secretary, Lieut. Jose Maldonado, to my camp at Candelaria to talk with me relative to these raiders. I asked them to cooperate with us, sending a body of Carrancista soldiers to run the raiders down who had crossed into Mexico. He stated that their horses were in a worn-out condition and could not make the trip.

I told him if he would send 20 men over into my camp I would furnish them with American horses; that we wanted the raiders caught. He stated he would deliver that message to his commanding officer. Maj. Sanchez telephoned to Ojinaga and asked Gen. Jose Murguia's permission to accompany us on the American horses after the raiders, Gen. Murguia refused to give them permission. I knew that Capt. Enrique Montoya was in the vicinity of Comodoro, Mexico. I took my troop, went up the river on the Texas side, and sent a messenger over into Mexico and had Capt. Montoya come over to my camp. When he came across the river his clothing was covered with blood. I told him what I wanted and he said the soldiers were worn out, that they had been in Pilares, where the American troops had a fight with the Nevill raiders, and that he could not go back, but informed me that Maj. Ignacio Castro would pass through Pilares the following day, driving cattle and sheep to Juarez. He gave me a note to Maj. Castro, which I delivered the next day to Maj. Castro in Pilares, Mexico. Maj. Castro told me that his orders were from Gen. Murguia not to aid the Americans and not to allow them to cross the river into Mexico and not to try to capture the bandits that had raided the Nevill ranch.

While I was in Pilares I saw a soldier of Maj. Castro's command raiding the horses of the Mexicans who had been put out of the town. This act I later learned was attributed to the American soldiers. On December 25, 1917, I left Indio, Tex., to support the troops who had crossed into Mexico in pursuit of the bandits who had raided the Brite ranch. When my troop reached El Comodoro, Mex., I found a recruit out of Troop M, Eighth Cavalry, who had been shot by a Mexican. The man was wounded in the calf of the left leg with a 30-30 soft-nose bullet. I sent a guard with him back to Candelaria, Tex., where he was given medical treatment. My troop went on from there to Pilares, carrying ammunition to support the troops that had crossed into Mexico. At the river we met the troops returning from Mexico with two or three pack animals loaded with articles of clothing, hardware, shoes, and trinkets that had been stolen from the Brite ranch. I saw three of the horses that belonged to Mr. Brite in the river, one dead and two stuck in the quicksand. They were so utterly worn out that we made no effort to save them. I saw another one on the American side of the river with his left front hoof torn completely off.

About May, 1, 1918, Ramon Karam, an Assyrian peddler, and his 14-year-old son with a wagonload of merchandise were held up by bandits in the United States between San Jose and Ruidosa, Tex., and taken into Mexico. Karam and his son were murdered, the wagon demolished, the team and contents of wagon stolen. I have in my possession an affidavit from the brother of Ramon Karam, who was with him on the occasion at which time I asked him to identify the clothing stolen from his brother when he was murdered. In this affidavit he says: "I saw the clothing on the person of Chico Cano and two of his men, whom I do not know; that I am positive that they were wearing shoes and clothing taken from my brother." The two men whom Karam did not know on this occasion were Andres Rodriguez and Ramon Segura. Both of these bandits were killed in El Comodoro on April 2, 1919. About May 8, 1918, Mexicans from Mexico tapped the telegraph line into the United States and were obtaining all information from messages sent and received to the various stations in the Big Bend district. I have two affidavits in my possession from ex-members of the Texas Rangers who were sent with a detachment of soldiers to the vicinity of El Comodoro, where we set up a wireless station that operated with one in Candelaria, Tex. We attached a wire to the line in Mexico to prove this, for we had had suspicions for several months and we found that buzzer messages were going over the Mexican line, although the Americans had no buzzers on this line. These affidavits are from two men who speak the Mexican language very well and who heard conversations go over that line and also heard the telegraph instruments working.

Senator FALL. Let me see if I understand you correctly: You suspected that the Mexicans had your wires on this side tapped?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir; for every message that we received from Col. Langhorne in Marfa with reference to our troops having trouble, would effect the Mexicans and when the Brite-Nevill ranch was raided that Mexican garrison left San Antonio, Mexico, 20 minutes before I received the message.

Senator FALL. Then to convince yourself of that suspicion, that it was correct, you in turn tapped the Mexican wire?

Capt. MATLACK. I sent for two wireless biceps and tapped the Mexican line to prove it.

Senator FALL. And you obtained convincing proof?

Capt. MATLACK. I obtained convincing evidence from United States telegraph operators who were non-commissioned officers and members of the signal corps and also from these two extangers.

Senator FALL. File these two affidavits that you have, if you have copies of them, and they will be copied into the record.

STATE OF TEXAS,

County of Presidio, Camp of Candelaria, ss:

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned authority for administering oaths, one William P. Garlick, a resident of Brite, Tex., who being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

That between the 1st and 10th of May, 1918, while connected with the Texas State Ranger Force I was with a detachment of soldiers from Troop K, Eighth Cavalry, stationed at Candelaria, Tex., in the vicinity of El Comodoro, where there was a wireless pack set which operated with another wireless pack set in Candelaria; that the Mexican telephone line had been tapped for the purpose of ascertaining the class of messages sent over their line; that I heard a telegraph instrument on the Mexican line which was sending messages in English to and from various stations along the Mexican frontier line; that there were no telegraph instruments on the Mexican line and that the instruments we heard were not intended to be used on the Mexican line; that to make connection the American line would have had to be tapped; that I also heard conversation on the Mexican line that came from the United States and was not intended to pass over the Mexican line; that Miles J. Scannell, a ranger of the same company as myself, 3 Signal Corps men and 10 members of Troop K, Eighth Cavalry, were present.

And further the deponent sayeth not.

WILLIAM T. GARLICK.

Summary Court.

STATE OF TEXAS,

County of Presidio, camp of Candelaria, ss:

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned authority for administering oaths, one Miles J. Scannell, a corporal, of Troop K, Eighth United States Cavalry, who, being duly sworn according to law deposes and says:

That between the 1st and 10th of May, 1918, while a member of the Texas State Ranger force, I was in the vicinity of El Comodoro, Tex., with a detachment of soldiers from Troop K, Eighth Cavalry, stationed at Candelaria, Tex.; that a wireless pack set was installed at this place which was operated in connection with another wireless pack set at Candelaria, Tex.; that the Mexican telephone line had been tapped for the purpose of finding out the kind of messages that were being transmitted over their line; that while listening over the Mexican line I heard a telegraph instrument sending messages in English to and from various stations in the United States along the border; that there were no telegraph instruments on the Mexican line, and in order for me to have heard these messages on the Mexican line the American line would have to be tapped; that William F. Garlick, a ranger, of the same company as myself, 3 Signal Corps men, and 10 members of Troop K, Eighth Cavalry, were present.

And further the deponent sayeth not.

MILES J. SCANNELL.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this the 6th day of August, 1919.

LEONARD F. MATLACK,
Captain, Cavalry, U. S. A.

Capt. MATLACK. The names of the Signal Corps men who caught the buzzer messages, which were proven to be messages sent from headquarters at Marfa, Tex., were Sergt. Perch and Corpl. Rush.

Senator FALL. Captain, right here I want to ask you a question: Did you have sources of information which you had arranged for, the nature of which, something in the nature of a secret service?

Capt. MATLACK. I did, sir: I had a secret service organized both in Texas and in Mexico of Mexicans.

Senator FALL. And through your agents you were able to obtain information that was not public?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. All right; go ahead.

Capt. MATLACK. On June 8, 1918, I arrested a Mexican by the name of Jesus Acosta, who had murdered an American citizen at Balmorhea, Tex., and fled into Mexico; he crossed back into the United States on a visit when he was arrested.

Senator FALL. How do you know he was the man that was wanted?

Capt. MATLACK. He had changed his name and was going under the name of Jose Rivera. Passing a little Mexican house 2 miles south of Candelaria I saw a sheet of letter paper on the ground, and I picked it up, and it was headed from Balmorhea, Tex., to Senor Jesus Acosta. Several months previous to this the captain of the ranger force had given me the name of Jesus Acosta as being wanted for murder. I made inquiry at this house, and they told me that Jose Rivera lived there. I wired off for a description of Jesus Acosta, and when it came back it gave me sufficient evidence to connect Jesus Acosta and Jose Rivera as being the same man. I arrested him and sent for the ranger captain to come and take him away. In my presence he confessed to the ranger captain that he had killed the American. Between October 1 and 16, 1918, when the American troops were prohibited from crossing into Mexico in pursuit of bandits, Cecilio Estrella, who was a fugitive from the United States, who helped organize the raid at Nevill's ranch at which time Glenn Nevill and Clara Castillo were killed, was sent from San Antonio, Mexico, as a captain of the band of Sociales.

Senator FALL. They were supposed to be rurales guard?

Capt. MATLACK. Border patrols, rurales guard, scouts, sent by Jose Murguia. This man and his men crossed into the United States a great number of times, stealing horses and mules. I asked the presidente of San Antonio, Mexico, to organize his men in his town and stop this practice. He got together some members of San Antonio, Mexico, and arrested Estrella; he at once told them he was a Carranza captain of the Sociales. The presidente came to Candelaria, Tex., and told me of his experience. I telephoned to Presidio, Tex., to Maj. Henry Anderson, and asked him to make inquiries at Ojinaga to the Consul Bengachila and learn whether or not Cecilio Estrella was a Carrancista officer. The telephone message came back inside of 30 minutes that the commanding officer at Ojinaga positively denied that Cecilio Estrella was an official. I so informed the presidente of San Antonio, Mexico, who again arrested Cecilio Estrella, upon which occasion Cecilio Estrella produced his commission as a captain of the Sociales, signed by Gen. Jose Murguia.

Senator FALL. Acting under Carranza?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir. About October 15, 1918, a petition was circulated by the presidente of San Antonio, Mexico, among the inhabitants of that place, which was addressed to President Carranza, requesting the removal from that portion of the country of the officers responsible for such acts as Cecilio Estrella and his men had committed in the United States. In this petition they stated they had seen animals stolen by Cecilio Estrella and his men; that these animals belonged to citizens of the United States, and that they were taken to Ojinaga, Mexico. They sent this petition to Candelaria, Tex., requesting that I deliver it, or send it to Carranza, because they knew that if they sent it through Ojinaga, Carranza would never get it. I brought that petition to El Paso, Tex., and in the presence of Mr. Gus T. Jones, of the Department of Justice; Mr. Robertson, United States District Attorney; Mr. Berkshire, of the Immigration Department; and Mr. Carpenter, of the Customs Service, presented it to the Inspector General of Mexican Consulates, Andres Garcia, explaining the entire situation to him at the time. About seven nights after this the same Cecilio Estrella and the same band of men came to San Antonio, Mexico, and endeavored to murder the presidente, Eduardo Garcia, for sending in the petition. The presidente, Eduardo Garcia, fled to the United States to save his life, and when I left the Big Bend district, was still living in the United States. On October 17 Cecilio Estrella, accompanied by several Sociales, came into San Antonio, Mexico, and went to the house of Jose Pallanes and took his wife from the house to another house on the outskirts of the town, where they fastened her to the floor with barb wire.

The same afternoon they crossed into the United States and rode through a cornfield to within 300 yards of the town of Candelaria, held up a man who was plowing in his field, unhitched his two horses, and took them into Mexico. That night a party of Mexicans from the United States joined a party of Mexicans from San Antonio, Mexico, and killed Cecilio Estrella and took the wife of Jose Pallanes from the house where she had been wired down.

Senator FALL. You are positive nobody but Mexicans went from this side?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir. On October 18, 1918, one member of Cecilio Estrella's band, who had been wounded the previous night, was found hiding in the brush near the river on the American side. He had been wounded through the left hand. He was picked up by one of my patrols and brought to camp, where he was given medical attention. This bandit, Francisco Nieto, could write Spanish, and in his own handwriting wrote out a confession that he was a member of the Sociales, under Cecilio Estrella, and that they had been sent to that portion of the country to obtain mounts for the Carrancistas at Ojinaga, Mexico. A few days before this the Mexicans had crossed into the United States and stolen approximately 18 saddle horses from the United States customs officials on the Cleveland ranch.

Francisco Nieto told me that he knew who stole the horses and where they were. I sent a telegram to the customs officials at Ruidosa, Tex., that I would bring Francisco Nieto to Ruidosa and turn him over to them. While en route from Candelaria to Ruidosa while near the river Francisco Nieto jumped from the wagon and started to running to Mexico, as he was getting out of the river on the Mexican side I shot him. On April 2, 1919, while in pursuit of bandits who had raided the United States and stolen cattle and horses we caught Esmeraldo Dominguez in Boquillas, Mexico. Esmeraldo Dominguez when delivered to the authorities was positively identified by Mr. Nevill as one of the raiding band which murdered his son and the Mexican woman on his ranch. When Dominguez was captured he attempted to escape and was shot by a member of Troop K, Eighth Cavalry, at which time he was badly wounded, he was taken to the Army camp at Candelaria, Tex., and given medical treatment. While in the guard house at Candelaria, Tex., Dominguez confessed to me that he was a member of a band of Mexicans who raided the Nevill ranch, that there were 29 Mexicans in the raid; that this party was organized by Jesus Urillas, Cecilio Estrella, and Juan Rodriguez. That Col. Pecolla, of the Carrancista force, was in Pilares, Mexico, with 42 Carrancista soldiers when this band was organized at that place, and when it left that place to raid the Nevill ranch.

On April 2, 1919, Guillermo Estrada, with two other sociales under Chico Cano crossed into the United States about 2 miles south of Candelaria, Tex., and stole saddles and horses. The trail of the bandits was fresh and was followed into Mexico south of lower San Antonio, the trail turned up the river, and passed through lower San Antonio, upper San Antonio, and Boquillas, where the trail split. Some of the bandits went on up the Rio Grande River, and others turned back into the mountains. Capt. Broadhead, Eighth Cavalry, in command of Troop M, followed the river trail, and I followed the trail that led back toward the mountains. After following the trail for approximately 52 miles we came upon this band of bandits in a thick brush near the river. As we entered the brush they fired on us at a distance of about 35 yards; during the fight which followed five of the bandits were killed and three wounded. The five bandits killed were Andres Rodriguez, Pedro Salas, Placido Zapata, Ramon Segura, Carlos Rodriguez, Chico Cano was wounded in the left leg and left side. Julian de la O was wounded in the left hand, one unknown bandit was wounded in the right side.

Senator FALL. How did it happen you could not recognize that one?

Capt. MATLACK. The Mexicans that lived in San Antonio, Mexico, gave us the names, and they did not know him themselves. Only three or four saw him the next night going with Chico Cano down the river toward Ojinaga. On June 1, 1919, Reyes Pallanes, and Feliciano Hernandez were killed by two members of Troop K, Eighth Cavalry, on the American side of the river while attempting to smuggle sotol into the United States. There were three Mexicans in the party armed with Mauser rifles. When the American soldiers attempted to arrest the Mexican smugglers they were fired upon, the two American soldiers killed Reyes Pallanes and Feliciano Hernandez on the American bank. On August 17, 1919, a Mexican crossed into the United States with a note and inclosed in the same envelop were telegrams from the two American aviators, Davis and Peterson. These telegrams were to the Secretary of War, commanding general Southern Department, commanding officer Big Bend district, Maj. Walton. El Paso, Tex., and the fathers of Davis and Peterson. They were to the effect that they had been captured by Mexican bandits and were being held for $15,000 ransom, which must be paid by midnight August 19 or they would be killed. These telegrams were forwarded and every effort was made to get into communication with the bandit, Jesus Renteria, who held the American aviators for ransom. Shortly after the message was received in Marfa, Tex., Maj. C. C. Smith, Eighth Cavalry, and Mr. Fennell, vice president of the Marfa National Bank, came to Candelaria, Tex., with $15,000 and delivered it to me to pay the ransom. With the money, I received this letter:

Capt. LEONARD F. MATLACK,
Eighth Cavalry, United States Army,
Candelaria, Tex.

MY DEAR CAPT. MATLACK: Maj. C. C. Smith, Eighth Cavalry, and Mr. Fennell, vice president of the Marfa National Bank, bearer of this letter, takes to you $15,000 ransom money demanded for the return of the aviators, Lieuts. Peterson and Davl. This money has been advanced through the Marfa National Bank by the prominent ranchmen and citizens of this and surrounding counties, subscribed yesterday afternoon within five minutes after the news of the demands of the bandits were announced at a camp meeting.

Yours, very truly,

GEORGE T. LANGHORNE,
Colonel, Cavalry.

I proposed through messengers 11 different plans by which I could secure the safe relief of the aviators and deliver the ransom money, all of which were rejected by Jesus Renteria, who demanded that the money must be placed in his hands before he would release the aviators. I would not consent to this plan, for I well knew the character of Jesus Renteria, who is known among his own people as a beast and fiend. I have been told by three Mexicans who were parts of the Brite ranch raid that Jesus Rentera sat on the body of Mike Welsh, the American mail carrier, and cut his throat with a pocket knife.

I had no reason to know that he would not do the same thing to the aviators after he received the money and if I left an opportunity for him to do such a thing. All the afternoon of August 17, the 18th the entire day, were consumed by these propositions, which took some time owing to the distance the messengers had to travel. At midnight on the 18th, at which time he said he would kill the aviators if we had not reached a satisfactory agreement at this time, I sent word to Renteria that the time was up that he had set; that if any harm befell the Americans that I would hold the lives of every Mexican in the three towns, lower San Antonio, upper San Antonio, and Boquillas, responsible for his acts, and that if he did not agree to one of my arrangements within an hour that I would enter Mexico in pursuit of him and his band, and the aviators would be taken from him. He sent word back immediately that he could find no one that would trust him, and that if I would bring one-half of the money on the old San Antonio trail, that he would send the aviators with one of his men to meet me; the signal for us to start would be a flashlight made by him on the mountains back of San Antonio, Mexico.

I waited some time and saw no signal and came to the conclusion that possibly he had made it with matches and we had failed to see it. I started into Mexico, traveling the old trail designated by Renteria, and went only a mile in Mexico, met an armed bandit with

Lieut. Peterson. I could only see the outlines of these men, it was so dark. I asked who it was, and Peterson replied that "it is Lieut. Peterson, United States Aviation," I delivered one-half of the money to the man that brought Peterson to me, took him on back of my horse, and recrossed the river into the United States, taking Peterson to my camp at Candelaria. Mr. Fennell turned over the other one-half of the money to me and I went back into Mexico for Lieut. Davis, traveling the same trail. When I reached the point where I secured Lieut. Peterson I stopped; no one was there. I waited about 15 or 20 minutes, and I heard two horses coming down through a cornfield left of the trail; as they passed very near me, I heard one Mexican whisper to the other one, "Mata dos gringos"; the other one answered, "seguro."

Senator FALL. Translate those Spanish expressions, if you please.

Capt. MATLACK. "Kill both gringos—both Americans"; the other one said "sure," and then said something about bosque—that is, the thick brush—and "rio," that is river.

After they passed out of hearing I moved about 100 yards to my right into an open field; shortly after this I saw a cigarette light coming through the trail. The man with the cigarette stopped where I had picked up Lieut. Peterson. My horse snorted and he came over toward me, and stopped within about 12 yards of where I was in the edge of some brush. About the time he took this position I heard a horse coming on the trail, and the Mexican with the cigarette made circles with the light in the air, and the horseman turned toward me. Lieut. Davis was walking on the ground in front of the mounted bandit. I told him to come to where I was and mount behind me on my horse. I had two automatics, and I told Lieut. Davis to take one, that we in all probability would have to fight, and for him if a shot was fired to lay down on the ground and to shoot at everything that moved. I told him that we were to be held up and killed while trying to get out, and that I was not going to pay the other money for him.

Senator FALL. You had come to this conclusion from the conversation which you had overheard of the two men?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir; I thought that if I had to fight to save the aviator I had just as well fight to save the money. When Lieut. Davis was on behind my horse and had the pistol in his hand I endeavored to see who the bandit was; he was mounted. I rode close to him and took the money from my shirt and let him see it, trying at the same time to see him. I then told him that I was not going to pay another cent for the aviators; that if he moved I would kill him. I rode still closer and shook hands with him at which time he put his head down so I could not see his face; I told Lieut. Davis to shake hands with him, which he did, and still we could not see who the bandit was. I then told him to go back and tell Renteria to go to hell, that he had gotten the last cent of American money, and we rode out of Mexico following a different trail and crossing the river higher up than I crossed with Lieut. Peterson. I found out later from the Mexicans that the two bandits, from the Mexicans in San Antonio, Mexico, that the two bandits who endeavored to get between Lieut. Davis and myself and the river were Dolores Nafarrate and Benigno Olivas, who were both members of Renteria band who had held the American aviators for ransom.

The next morning, August the 19th, we crossed the international boundary line into Mexico in pursuit of the bandits. After following their trail for about 9 miles, the trail split, some of the bandits going north and some south into the high, rough mountain range. The aviators both accompanied me and told me they had heard Renteria speak of taking some money to his family in Coyame. After the trail split we worked through the mountain range endeavoring to get out on the large flat country known as the T O ranch and intercept the bandits when they came out of the mountains. They crossed the mountains further south than we thought they would and the next track we had of them was at the Paradero ranch, which is about 12 miles from Coyame, the owner of this ranch, a man by the name of Tarango, told us that Nafarrate and Olivas had passed through there en route for Coyame. That night I took 10 picked men and started for Coyame and tried to capture these two men; about 11 o'clock the same night we came in contact with a large Carranza patrol which was located in a deep canyon and guarding the trail to Coyame; our instructions had been to avoid a clash with the Carrancista troops, and we returned back and reported the matter and were ordered from Mexico.

Senator FALL. Now, Captain, there has been some criticism from uninformed quarters in reference to your failure to pay over to these bandits the entire $15,000. Why did you not pay the entire amount? Did you understand that the United States Government had agreed with the bandits to pay the money?

Capt. MATLACK. No, sir; to this minute I have never received any official information that the United States would pay the ransom.

Senator FALL. What was your information as to who was paying it and what was your idea as to what was to be done with it?

Capt. MATLACK. The only information that I had was the letter that I received from the district commander when the money was sent to me, to the effect that it had been raised by the prominent ranchmen and the citizens of the country, and their money and not Government money.

Senator FALL. And you considered it your duty to your own citizens to save as much of their money as you possibly could as well as save the lives of the aviators?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. So that in so far as you were concerned you did not understand that under the circumstances, with these men trying to get between you and the river with the declared intention to kill you, and the money in your possession, being that of the citizens of the United States, you did not consider there was any breach of faith with your returning with half of the money?

Capt. MATLACK. I did not, sir. I could not reconcile myself to the fact that I should have honor in dealing with men who would try to murder one of these aviators and me after they received all the money.

Senator FALL. Captain, you say that a letter was sent over containing these telegrams?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. I do not care to know to whom that letter was addressed, but how did you get hold of it?

Capt. MATLACK. A Mexican was crossing the river with it. I saw him crossing and searched him and found it.

Senator FALL. Did you yourself see that the telegrams were sent?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir; they were sent from my telegraph office in my station at Candelaria, Tex.

Senator FALL. Captain, what was the feeling between yourself and the Mexicans on the American side of the river, Mexican citizens or American citizens on the American side of the river with whom you had to deal; was it antagonistic or one of confidence?

Capt. MATLACK. It was extreme confidence. I have a petition addressed to Gen. Dickman, signed by the Mexicans of the United States side of the river, and also one signed by the Mexicans on the Mexican side of the river, requesting that we be not removed from that locality for fear of the consequences if we left.

Senator FALL. How many signatures are there to those petitions, have you counted them?

Capt. MATLACK. No, sir. Those petitions were delivered to Gen. Dickman who answered them by letters.

Senator FALL. These are copies in Spanish?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Now, we will take these copies for the purpose of ascertaining the number of the names, and the secretary when he has ascertained the number will put them in the record, both those on the American side, and those on the Mexican side.

The SECRETARY. There were 27 names to the petition from colony of San Antonio of the municipality of Ojinaga, district of Iturbide, State of Chihuahua, and 46 names to the petition from Candelaria, Tex.

Senator FALL. Were there officers of the law to administer justice; that is, justice of the peace and other officials in the little communities on this side of the river along the border?

Capt. MATLACK. No, sir; not a ranger, there wasn't a customs man, an immigration official, or a justice of the peace until very recently at that point.

Senator FALL. Which point?

Capt. MATLACK. Candelaria, Tex. The American soldier was the only form of the law represented at that place.

Senator FALL. To whom were the disputes as to property or its disposition, or difficulties among Mexicans themselves submitted for arbitration or decision?

Capt. MATLACK. For approximately the two years that I was there they brought their troubles to me.

Senator FALL. Did you render decisions in administering justice?

Capt. MATLACK. I was compelled to do it, sir.

Senator FALL. Were your decisions carried out?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. It was not necessary for you to enforce them by military force?

Capt. MATLACK. Not in one single case; no, sir.

Senator FALL. So that practically, except as under instructions from Col. Langhorne or superior officers in your immediate vicinity, you were the law high and low?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir. I found that most of the smuggling on a small scale was done by women and children, the men were afraid to smuggle for fear they would be shot, or if arrested tried and severely dealt with.

If my patrol picked up a child that was smuggling I investigated and found out its parents, who the parents were; if they lived in Mexico I investigated and found out who the child was visiting in the United States. As soon as I learned who the parents were or who the child was visiting I caused them as a punishment to bring their child to my camp three times a day, at 9, 12, and 5 o'clock, to report to me, so I could see the child was not violating the law any longer. In the case of women violating the law and crossing the river they would be arrested and placed in the small jail in the town of Candelaria, which was not connected with the Army camp; I would put a 35-cent lock on the door and place no guard over the jail; the next morning I would find that the friends of the women had broken the jail and sent them into Mexico, but, of course, they never came back because they thought we had a good case for jail-breaking, and never bothered us only once. Of the Mexicans who had family troubles or sickness—

Senator FALL. Did you try any divorce cases?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Captain, the committee is impressed with the conviction that even with the Mexicans residing on the other side of the river in the little towns you have mentioned, that many of them, that though they were in sympathy with you, and you received from these private citizens assistance in your investigation—for instance, in the case you have detailed in reference to the presidente of this municipality who is now residing for protection in the United States—that is a fact, is it not—that is a fact, is it not, that from the private citizens over there you received aid and assistance in your investigation?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you ever receive any aid or assistance from the Carranza officials or military forces of Carranza?

Capt. MATLACK. Never.

Senator FALL. Were obstacles thrown in your way by such officials and soldiers?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Upon more than one occasion, or repeatedly?

Capt. MATLACK. In every occasion that I ever went to them with. On October 16, complying with our orders to report to the nearest Carranza officials any theft or violation of our law, I did so, to Capt. Cecilio Estrella. I sent a messenger to him to come to the river bank to consult with me over the theft that day of two horses from the United States; he struck the messenger across the face with a quirt and said, "Go and tell that gringo son-of-a-bitch to go to hell!"

Senator SMITH. That was the assistance you got?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir. I reported that in a letter to the commanding officer of the Big Bend district, as this record will show; at that same time I asked for authority to go into Mexico for bandits that not only stole property but grossly insulted an American Army officer when he tried to carry out his orders and communicate with them about the theft.

Senator FALL. Captain, there is another question I want to ask you: Did you know of any raid or act of violence originating upon this side of the river and perpetrated upon the other side of the United States, or by any official, except by the soldiers and such civilians as might be under the command of the soldiers in following Mexicans across the river? In other words, was there any stealing or looting or violence along the border, or anywhere that you know of, or ever heard of, from this side of the river committed on the other side?

Capt. MATLACK. The only violence I ever knew of being committed in Mexico by citizens of the United States was on the occasion that Cecilio Estrella was killed. The citizens were compelled to take that action, because the United States Army was prohibited by existing orders from going over themselves.

Senator FALL. That is the occasion to which you referred where the Mexican citizens on this side joined certain Mexican citizens on the other side and executed Estrella.

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. But there were no acts of looting, stealing, theft, or violence from this side committed on the other?

Capt. MATLACK. Not one.

Senator FALL. Then, in so far as protecting the Mexicans or Mexican citizens upon the Mexican side of the river, the presence of the United States forces along the border is and has been entirely unnecessary?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. But its presence has been absolutely necessary to protect American citizens on this side from violence perpetrated from Mexicans coming from the other side?

Capt. MATLACK. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Thank you, sir.

Capt. MATLACK. There is one other case, Senator. I have communicated with the Mexican consul at Presidio, Tex., through the commanding officer of the Big Bend district, warning him that if he did not endeavor in some way to control the lawless element in the vicinity of San Antonio and Boquillas that we would be compelled to take drastic action, and I offered to pay him or any members of the—or any inhabitants of the town opposite Candelaris $25 reward from my own personal funds for the arrest of any person who crossed into Mexico, even to get one bottle of sotol or for any other purpose.

Senator FALL. Was that reward ever claimed?

Capt. MATLACK. The reward was never claimed because no one ever went from the United States into Mexico, but the Mexicans came from Mexico armed, and two were killed by my soldiers one night when over on our side one night smuggling sotol and put up a fight. Now, here is a copy of a report I made to the commanding officer of the Big Bend district. It is very short, and I will read it.

SEPTEMBER 18, 1919.

Capt. Mariano Flores Lara, now stationed at San Antonio, Tex., and of the Carranza army, told me in the presence of two witnesses that during the last punitive expedition into Mexico that soldiers under Gen. Pinedo fired at American aeroplanes near San Juan, Mexico. They also seemed to consider this quite a joke, as they laughed heartily while telling of it.

Senator FALL. Captain, your testimony is not only interesting but very instructive. We thank you very much for what you have given us.

TESTIMONY OF MR. W. B. SIMONS.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., secretary of the subcommittee duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Of what State are you a native?

Mr. SIMONS. Montana.

Senator FALL. Where do you reside?

Mr. SIMONS. I have been here with the Denver Rock Drill Co., 301 San Francisco Street.

Senator FALL. Where have you been recently?

Mr. SIMONS. Mexico, Mexico City. And all through that country. I have an office in Mexico City.

Senator FALL. What are the general conditions in Mexico City now with reference to treatment of Americans?

Mr. SIMONS. Not very good. About as bad as they could be.

Senator FALL. Were you ever in the military service of the United States.

Mr. SIMONS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. In what capacity?

Mr. SIMONS. Three hundred and fortieth Field Artillery.

Senator FALL. Do you belong to any organization now?

Mr. SIMONS. I do not.

Senator FALL. Of the ex-military men of the United States?

Mr. SIMONS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Any order?

Mr. SIMONS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. You are not a member of the American Legion.

Mr. SIMONS. No, sir; I have an American Legion button, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you wear that while you were in Mexico?

Mr. SIMONS. I attempted to, but was told to take it off.

Senator FALL. By whom were you told to take it off?

Mr. SIMONS. I was told by a friend that I would get along better, he was in France himself and he took his off. I was told by another ex-soldier there that he could not wear one part of his uniform without being insulted.

Senator FALL. While you were in Mexico City, at what hotel did you stop?

Mr. SIMONS. Regis.

Senator FALL. Did you move to any other house or any other quarters?

Mr. SIMONS. I did not.

Senator FALL. Did any of the other guests at the Regis, while you were in Mexico City, move for any reason?

Mr. SIMONS. I know quite a few moved for a reason.

Senator FALL. For any particular reason?

Mr. SIMONS. Because they would be insulted and had no accommodations whatever and were ignored at the hotel.

Senator FALL. Do you know anything about naval officers of a foreign country being in Mexico City while you were there?

Mr. SIMONS. I do.

Senator FALL. Where did they stop?

Mr. SIMONS. They stopped at the Regis.

Senator FALL. Was that one of the reasons for the removal of the Americans from the Regis?

Mr. SIMONS. That is why they got out and they said they had orders from the Government, but we found out the next day they did not have orders from the Government.

Senator FALL. That is for the purpose of giving accommodations to these naval officers of a foreign country?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You made a statement, I think for publication in one of the local papers in this city in the last day or two?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Some days ago?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You made a statement to some reporter?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. I have here what purports to be a copy of that statement. I notice that you state that there is certain evidence that the Government there and the so-called bandits are cooperating to some extent?

Mr. SIMONS. Absolutely; I don't think there is any doubt about it at all?

Senator FALL. Is that the general impression in Mexico from the Americans there?

Mr. SIMONS. It is.

Senator FALL. Have you ever read the book of, or any of the articles of the ex-consul general of the United States to the City of Mexico, Mr. Chamberlain?

Mr. SIMONS. No.

Senator FALL. You have not had your attention called to it?

Mr. SIMONS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. I ask the question, because he makes the same statement. What, among others are the specific facts which lead you to the impression that governmental authorities and bandits are cooperating, or have an understanding?

Mr. SIMONS. Well, I can not recollect the fellow's name—I know it, too—but they had killed those two fellows from San Antonio—Bowles and another fellow. I was talking to another fellow that they thought they were killing at the same time; he was paymaster for an oil company; he was going out with these fellows; they went out about an hour before he did, and he comes along and finds them; he was telling me that when he left the town he had to give an account of how much gold and how much paper and how much silver money was taking out for these pay rolls.

Senator FALL. He had to report to the authorities as to how much of each he was taking?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes, sir. They thought they were killing him when they were killing the other fellows; he also went ahead and told me. Now, of course, I am positive it is the truth—I am satisfied it is—that when they hold up a man, a paymaster, there they know just exactly what he has got. He has told me of a few cases where they tried to give the bandits a part of it, and about one case where a fellow was in a launch there and he did not give them all he had and they jumped right in and tore up everything there and got it.

Senator SMITH. I understand from your information they not only knew the amount, but the character of the money?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes; they knew it. This was the paymaster that was telling me this. The fellow they thought they were killing at the time they killed Bowles and the other fellow.

Senator FALL. While you were in the City of Mexico did you learn anything concerning the case of American Consular Agent Jenkins?

Mr. SIMONS. I did.

Senator FALL. What has been the treatment of Mr. Jenkins, if you know, by the authorities during the time?

Mr. SIMONS. It has been very bad. I had a friend who was a newspaper man; his name is Mr. Brandt; he worked on the case there and taken pictures of him—judges and everything—and he showed me the pictures, and this news he sent out by a representative of the William Fox Film Co.; he could not send it by mail; he told me all about it. He stated there might have been some statement of this man, but it was for his own good; he got up there and told anything that he thought would get him by. He said he had been badly mistreated. I know the fellow very well, because I came with him on the train; he was going down and I was going down, and we were together all the time, and we went to the Regis Hotel together; he kept a room there and I kept a room all the time I was out.

Senator FALL. Were you in Mexico when the recent earthquake occurred there?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Was any protection extended to those who sought to relieve the necessities of the sufferers from the earthquake, do you know?

Mr. SIMONS. Well, there was not, absolutely none. Mr. Brandt told me he went down there, and went to one place, it was covered up by earth for 10 days by the earthquake and he was the first man gave first aid there, 10 days afterward.

Senator FALL. Did you ever meet a man by the name of J. Salter Hanson?

Mr. SIMONS. No, sir; I don't recollect it. You see I was not at that town; I got my information from this man at Mexico City.

Senator FALL. You were not in Puebla?

Mr. SIMONS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. I notice you seem to be under the impression that the chairman of this committee is not in good favor in Mexico at this time. I notice you say this in this article here?

Mr. SIMONS. I know about the talk, that question came up quite frequently in the hotel, I heard it quite frequently talked about down there.

Senator FALL. How is the travel on the railroads now, how did you get out of Mexico, by what road?

Mr. SIMONS. By Laredo on the National.

Senator FALL. Did you have any trouble getting transportation?

Mr. SIMONS. I did not have any trouble getting back, I had trouble getting a berth, could not get one for a week.

Senator FALL. You finally succeeded in getting a berth?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes; by giving the man 11 pesos.

Senator FALL. Eleven pesos bonus?

Mr. SIMONS. The price was $20 and it cost me $31.

Senator FALL. A bonus of $11?

Mr. SIMONS. I had offered him $5 for about a week, I was going to give him $5; then I come down and told him I would give him six more pesos and he got it.

Senator FALL. Then you don't regard, from your knowledge as to Mexican conditions there and all, you don't regard conditions there as settled?

Mr. SIMONS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Business is secure and going on in the regular way?

Mr. SIMONS. No, sir. Lots of those mines are working just in order to keep them open. I know at El Oro, those mines there—they told me that—I was in all those mining towns, all of them.

Senator FALL. Did you see any military movements while you were there?

Mr. SIMONS. At Saltillo I did; I was told by three different fellows there they were drilling every day to fight us fellows. That is the time they had Jenkins up, and they were figuring on—that is when I was told to take off my legion button.

TESTIMONY OF MRS. ETHEL PETERSON.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., secretary of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Where do you live, Mrs. Peterson?

Mrs. PETERSON. Here in El Paso.

Senator FALL. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mrs. PETERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Is your husband living?

Mrs. PETERSON. No, sir.

Senator FALL. When did he die, if you know?

Mrs. PETERSON. On the 12th day of February, 1917.

Senator FALL. Where was he about that time before he died?

Mrs. PETERSON. He was at the Corner ranch, in New Mexico.

Senator FALL. The Corner ranch bordered on Old Mexico?

Mrs. PETERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What were the circumstances of his death, from the information that you have?

Mrs. PETERSON. Well, he was shot just above the heart.

Senator FALL. Were other parties with him at the time of his death—I mean others than those that shot him?

Mrs. PETERSON. There were three killed at the same time.

Senator FALL. Who were they, Mrs. Peterson?

Mrs. PETERSON. Mr. Peterson, and my own brother, Mr. Akard, and a Mr. Jensen.

Senator FALL. Were they citizens of the United States?

Mrs. PETERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And they were residing, had business at the Corner ranch?

Mrs. PETERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Were living there?

Mrs. PETERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Have you lived there at any time yourself?

Mrs. PETERSON. I have lived just about 12 miles from there.

Senator FALL. Where were you living when your husband was killed?

Mrs. PETERSON. I was living at Hachita.

Senator FALL. What were the conditions in that particular part of the country, that is about the Corner ranch in reference to peace and order, or violence prior to the killing of your husband, if you know?

Mrs. PETERSON. No, sir; I don't know.

Senator FALL. Was there any particular reason for your leaving and going to Hachita, then?

Mrs. PETERSON. No, sir; only to put my children in school.

Senator FALL. Did you have an investigation made, or do you know whether an investigation was made with reference to the circumstances of the killing of your husband?

Mrs. PETERSON. Yes, sir; there was.

Senator FALL. What was the result of that investigation? What did it disclose, do you know?

Mrs. PETERSON. No, sir; I do not. I was ill at the time.

Senator FALL. Do you know from such information as you have gathered since, whether he was killed on the American side at the ranch, or not?

Mrs. PETERSON. I think not, that I can not say for sure.

Senator FALL. Where was his body discovered, if it was found?

Mrs. PETERSON. About 7 miles they told me from the ranch on the Mexican side.

Senator FALL. And on the Mexican side?

Mrs. PETERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. The murderers of your husband and his companions have never been apprehended and punished in so far as you know?

Mrs. PETERSON. Not that I ever heard of.

Senator FALL. You have never heard from any source as to any efforts being made to apprehend or punish the murders by the officials in Mexico?

Mrs. PETERSON. No, sir.

Senator FALL. You never heard of it?

Mrs. PETERSON. No, sir; I have not.

(At 4.50 o'clock p. m. the committee adjourned to meet in executive session at 10.30 o'clock a. m., Tuesday, February 10, 1920.)

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., February 10, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

TESTIMONY OF MR. HERBERT S. GILKEY.

(The witness was duly sworn.)

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you please state your name?

Mr. GILKEY. Herbert S. Gilkey.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your address?

Mr. GILKEY. Minneapolis; 916 Kenwood Parkway.

Mr. KEARFUL. What interests have you in Mexico?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, we have an agricultural enterprise of about 50,000 acres at the mouth of the Rio Verde, in the State of Oaxaca, and we have interests in Guerrero.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the name of the company?

Mr. GILKEY. The company in Oaxaca is the Rio Verde Agricultural Co.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of agricultural enterprise is this in Oaxaca?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, it is corn and cotton land, principally.

Mr. KEARFUL. How much money was invested in this enterprise?

Mr. GILKEY. We have about $250,000 in it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you get titles to the real estate?

Mr. GILKEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what did you do with reference to equipping the place with animals, machinery, etc.?

Mr. GILKEY. After we bought the place in 1910, we bought about 60 mules, up in Durango, and sent them down there, and when we bought the place there were seven or eight horses on the place, and some oxen—I think three or four yoke, and we bought a great deal of farm machinery, Moline plows and one thing and another. We shipped down there a carload of wire fencing, and when we bought the place there were all kinds of tools on the place, every conceivable kind of tool you would need in that part of the country except agricultural implements, and we bought a cotton gin and shipped it down there, and then there was a little sawmill on the place when we bought it, just a portable affair; not an extensive outfit.

Mr. KEARFUL. How many acres in cultivation?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, about 4,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you find to be the methods of agriculture?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, up to the time we bought the place they had never had any agricultural implements of any kind on the place. Their method of farming had been their way of sticking a stick in the ground and planting their corn and cotton, and that was all that was ever done. There was no cultivation whatever.

Mr. KEARFUL. What happened when the weeds grew up?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, what they do down there, it is not very hard land to clear; just a few palms to cut down, and they can cut those down with their machetes, and they will farm that land for about three years, and then the weeds get started on them and then they leave that and go and clear up another place.

Mr. KEARFUL. What effect was produced on the agricultural habits of the natives by the introduction of farm machinery and other methods by Americans?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, it was hard to get them to use any modern methods of farming, because they had been fairly successful raising crops the way they had done, and this meant more work on their part, and then they are of a suspicious nature, and they can not see any need or use or sense in using agricultural implements when they can get along without them. The fact that they raised more by cultivation does not particularly interest them, because they can raise enough to get along with, and they are usually satisfied if they raise enough to live on.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, is that absolutely universal? Are there not some who learned to use improved methods?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, you can, by keeping at them and being patient with them, and by paying them a little more—we got them so they were using plows and cultivators and one thing and another we sent down there, but we just about got started with the experiment when we had trouble down there and we had to abandon it. I think we would have gotten them to use them all right. They are people you can get along with if you take the right method.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any difficulties in the way of labor or trouble with the workmen during the time of Diaz?

Mr. GILKEY. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of people are the workmen as to being decent and peaceful?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, on our place they were peaceful and all right, and I think they are to-day.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are they good workmen?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, just fair. You have to exercise a whole lot of patience with them. After they have earned enough to exist on they are not particular about working any more or earning any more than that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think they are capable of learning?

Mr. GILKEY. Oh, yes; there is no question about that. I believe you can get a lot of work out of those people if they are handled properly.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the conditions as to the protection of life and property and travel throughout Mexico during the time of Diaz?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, you were perfectly safe to go anywhere, and always had protection in property, just the same as you would have in this country.

Mr. KEARFUL. What change has taken place since then, as you have observed?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, they have been unable, I guess, to give protection down there. They have tried in some instances to give us protection, but it did not amount to anything.

Mr. KEARFUL. What particular authorities tried to give you protection? State authorities in Oaxaca or the Federal authorities?

Mr. GILKEY. State authorities in Oaxaca. They had about 100 soldiers at Tututepec, about 15 miles from our place, and when the place was raided, several times—and in one or two instances they arrested some of them and in two or three instances executed some of them on our place there.

Mr. KEARFUL. The State of Oaxaca did not recognize the Federal Government, did it?

Mr. GILKEY. No; they do not now.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you get any protection from the Federal authorities?

Mr. GILKEY. We have not been able to; no, sir. Madero tried to give us some protection, but he did not succeed very well. Since then there has been no effort to give us any.

Mr. KEARFUL. Just state, please, when your troubles began, and what they were.

Mr. GILKEY. Well, we began to have some trouble in 1911. Local bands—we thought they were bandits; we called them bandits down there—from Guerrero came over on the place, and we had about 15,000 bushels of corn there, and they took that, and took some of the horses and mules, and took some of the belting of the gin mill and cut it, I presume to make bridles or repair their saddles, or something like that, and then it would run along for about six or eight months and make another raid, and they would take whatever they could; we had 300 cattle, and if they could get hold of them they would take half a dozen or maybe one or two. The fellows on our place would run the cattle and mules and everything down in the brush and try to hide them. They would not make very diligent search for them. They would take whatever was handy, whatever they could use; they would grab a mule or a horse or saddles or bridles or things of that kind. They did not touch the agricultural machinery.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they pay for this stuff?

Mr. GILKEY. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they give any receipts for it?

Mr. GILKEY. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did conditions get so you could work the place?

Mr. GILKEY. We kept on working, yes. Thought it would pass over and conditions would get better, for several years, and we sent money down there to pay the help, but we finally quit it a couple of years ago. I wrote down there and told the man who was managing the place to let the natives use the land and raise what they could and make no charge; but I would not send any more money down there, and they would have to get along without it, and if he was not willing to stay on the place to get what he could out of it, he would have to leave the place. Almost everything was taken away from there, and there was not much to do anything with.

Mr. KEARFUL. This was your Mexican overseer?

Mr. GILKEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he leave?

Mr. GILKEY. He stayed quite a while, until about six months ago I got a letter from him saying it was unsafe for him to stay. He had been driven off two or three times and he was afraid to go back; he could get no further protection from Tututepec; they said they could not do anything more for him, and he was afraid to go back; he did not think he would try to go back. Since then I have not heard from him. It is hard to get mail in there and hard to get mail out.

Mr. KEARFUL. And the only thing that has been done has been done by the natives without any return to you?

Mr. GILKEY. Yes. I expect there are about 300 natives on the place, and I expect they are raising corn and one thing and another, and getting along the best way they can.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have a farm manager there, not a Mexican?

Mr. GILKEY. Yes; I had a man named Taylor managing the place for a while.

Mr. KEARFUL. What happened to him?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, they raided the place while he was there, and he barely escaped with his life. There were about 25 bandits surrounded the hacienda and the house one night, and he managed to break away and get down in the brush, he and his wife, and they got over to Jamiltepec, and they got some protection there.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was his nationality?

Mr. GILKEY. I think Taylor is a Canadian, although he has lived in this country for 20 years or more. He worked for us for that length of time, but I do not believe he was ever naturalized.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he attempt to get any protection from the American authorities, and did he succeed?

Mr. GILKEY. Yes; he sent a wire to Mexico City. I do not know what result he got from there, and then there is a telephone station about five hours' ride from our place, at Jamiltepec, and he got a wire through to me from Jamiltepec that the place had been raided, and he was afraid to stay in Jamiltepec, and to see if I could not arrange some way to get him out and get him away from there, so I took the matter up with the State Department here when Mr. Bryan was Secretary of State. I sent him a blue print of the property, and where Taylor and his wife were located, and asked if he could not do something to rescue them. I did not get very much satisfaction from him. He said that Americans had been warned to leave the country, and that it was in an isolated place, and they would be glad to do anything they could but they did not know anything they could do. So, it occurred to me then that I might get some relief from the British Government, on account of Taylor being a Canadian. I could not say at that time whether he was a Canadian or not, but I wrote to the British consul here in Washington and sent him a blueprint of the place, and I told him I was quite sure Mr. Taylor was a British subject, and where he was, and the trouble he was having, and that our State Department seemed to be unable to do anything, and asked him if there was anything he could do. Now, whether it was the result of that correspondence that I had with the British Embassy here, or whether it was through Taylor's correspondence with the British Embassy in Mexico City I do not know, but in any event they sent a gunboat down from Manzanillo to our property and landed some jackies and rescued them and transferred them to a passenger boat and sent them to New York City.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of any reason why the Americans could not have done the same thing?

Mr. GILKEY. Why, they were really in better shape to do it than the British, because the only gunboat the British had was the one at Manzanillo, and it is a long trip from Manzanillo down to the property. It must have been four or five hundred miles to that property.

Mr. KEARFUL. You know John Lind, who was sent to Mexico to eliminate Huerta from Mexico?

Mr. GILKEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever take this matter up with Mr. Lind?

Mr. GILKEY. Yes, sir; I had it up with him several times.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did he have to say about it?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, we did not seem to get much satisfaction. He thought conditions were not as bad down there as I imagined they were, but I told him exactly what we had done, and he practically took the same stand, that when conditions were as they were in that country we should not expect to be able to try to operate our property, or to go down there and take the chances of getting into trouble and then expect the Government to get us out.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he tell you to come out and stay out until things were settled?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, he said that was the only sensible thing to do; that it would be but a short time until conditions would be all right, so it would be safe to go in there.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did he think they would become all right?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, in the natural course of events, he said, under the Carranza Government; he said Carranza was doing everything he could to get the country in a normal condition, and that it was just a question of our exercising patience and it would be brought about.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he tell you about his theory of the good people of the north of Mexico conquering the bad people of the south of Mexico, and as soon as that was accomplished the country would be all right?

Mr. GILKEY. I do not think he stated that to me.

Mr. KEARFUL. He stated that in a book that he published afterwards. I wondered if he said anything like that to you?

Mr. GILKEY. No. I had several talks with him. Every once in a while now I meet him, and he asks how conditions are down there. Of course, I tell him just about the same. There is no use to argue it with him, because he loses his patience the minute you get into an argument with him.

Mr. KEARFUL. He still thinks Carranza is a success, does he?

Mr. GILKEY. Absolutely. He said with the proper support or sentiment in this country that it would be on a normal basis.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you know about the conditions in the locality of your property in Oaxaca with respect to other plantations?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, there are no other Americans very near us. There was a Spaniard there by the name of Gomez, who lived across the river from us. He had about 4,000 acres over at Jamiltepec, and he kept a crowd of about a hundred soldiers there all the time, but after I left they raided his place and murdered him, and I do not think they murdered his wife, but some of his relatives, and the employees around there. His wife, I understand, they let go, and she went to Oaxaca.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did they do with his property?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, they practically confiscated it, and it is being rented and controlled now by some of these bandits or natives that do not live a great ways from there, as I understand it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is the condition that you describe the general condition in that locality?

Mr. GILKEY. Yes, sir; it is all around there. They have not any more use for a Spaniard down there than they have for an American. I don't know as they have as much. I noticed in visiting Gomez several times, and when I was down there he was afraid; he kept his band of soldiers there, that he paid himself, to guard the place. I thought at the time he was unduly alarmed about the place being raided, but it proved afterwards that he was right, because they raided it all right.

Mr. KEARFUL. When were you last in Mexico?

Mr. GILKEY. I was there last April—that is, not down near the place; I was in Mexico City.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were down there with a delegation of visitors from Chicago?

Mr. GILKEY. The Carranza Government invited a delegation to come down and look over conditions there. An invitation was sent to the Chicago Association of Commerce and they wrote up to our civic and commerce association and wanted to know if we did not want to send a delegate down, and so they asked me if I did not want to go, and I told them yes, so I accompanied them down there.

Mr. KEARFUL. The idea was that Carranza wanted you to see the improved conditions?

Mr. GILKEY. Yes; and the idea was to have this delegation look over the situation, and they would show to them that the country was in a condition so they could do business down there commercially—ship our products in and buy their products, and so on.

Mr. KEARFUL. When you were there, did you make any inquiries about whether you could go on to your property and do business?

Mr. GILKEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did they tell you?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, they said it was not safe to go down there. They said it would be suicide to try to get into that country at the present time, but they thought that conditions were gradually improving and it would not be but a short time until we could go down there, but it would be taking too much risk to go down there at this time.

Mr. KEARFUL. What points did the delegation visit?

Mr. GILKEY. They went to Mexico City; that is all. On the way back, three or four of the gentlemen went over to Tampico, but the delegation did not go. We intended to go to Vera Cruz and also Tampico, and we wanted to go over to Guadalajara, but when we got there it was decided best to call that off.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did the Mexican officials advise you about going to Vera Cruz and Tampico?

Mr. GILKEY. They said it was not safe to make the trip. They said they would not run a night train over there at Vera Cruz; that if we insisted on going to Vera Cruz they would run a day train, but they advised against it. They said just at that particular time there was quite a little trouble; it was about the time that Blanquet was operating, and it was not a safe trip, and they urged us not to attempt to make the trip, and then some of the minor officers were around among our delegates, and, of course, they had more to say about it. They said: "Now, the president has said nothing about this, but it ought to be warning enough not to go. Of course, they will furnish you the train, but he does not want you to go."

Mr. KEARFUL. What happened to those parties who did go to Tampico?

Mr. GILKEY. They got up to Tampico. They just simply went over on the regular train on their own car. The train was held up.

Mr. KEARFUL. They went over from what point? San Luis Potosi?

Mr. GILKEY. Yes. I have not seen any of the fellows since the trip, but they told me in Chicago they were held up and had quite a little scrap, but there was not any of them hurt or killed or robbed. They just stood off in the brush aways and shot at the train.

Mr. KEARFUL. On this excursion to Mexico City, how did you find conditions there in Mexico City?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, conditions looked pretty bad to me there. Mexico City is not the city it was in 1914 and 1915. The city is not kept up as well; the stores are not as well stocked, and the people looked more poverty stricken than in normal times.

Mr. KEARFUL. How about the prevalence of beggars?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, there are more than there used to be. Of course, all over the republic of Mexico, even when conditions were normal, there were always a lot of beggars, professional beggars.

Mr. KEARFUL. In the time of Diaz?

Mr. GILKEY. Yes; but they are worse now. Take the line from Laredo to Mexico City, trains stopping at those towns there, the conditions are much worse than they were in the Diaz administration.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know of policemen begging on the street in the time of Diaz?

Mr. GILKEY. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you notice anything of that kind while you were there?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, one of them stopped me on San Francisco Street there and asked me for a peso. He told me he had not had any pay for three months. I do not know whether he was telling the truth or not, but that is what he said. So I gave him a peso. And it was general talk around there that none of the officials except the Army officers had had any pay for a long time. But I mean by a long time, for two or three months, and they had not had their pay, but the Army officials got their pay regularly. Now, that was just what I heard down there. Whether it is true or not I don't know.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you see certain signs of prosperity among any particular class?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, the generals seemed to be quite prosperous, and the colonels. The officers are all generals or colonels down there, or most of them. I was out there to the restaurants where they go out evenings and dance, and so on, and cafes, and they seemed to be quite a few of them around there enjoying themselves. They are well dressed, well groomed, and the report is around there they are getting well paid, and their pay comes across promptly, but that I do not know, of course; it is just common talk around there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you learn anything about the conditions of the school teachers, about their pay, while you were there?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, now, I think I remember of hearing that they had let out a good many school teachers, that they did not have any funds to pay them, but I do not know that of my own knowledge. That is just talk that I have heard.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the conditions of travel along the railroad?

Mr. GILKEY. Why, all right. I was agreeably surprised to see that their roadbed was in as good shape as it was. Now, we had a Pullman car from the States that took us there. They said it was the first Pullman that had been across there in five years. Whether that is true or not I don't know. We were taken care of.

Mr. KEARFUL. The Pullman car in which you went to Mexico City went from the States?

Mr. GILKEY. Yes, sir; from Chicago. We had a carload of about 30 soldiers attached to our train, as a guard, and they ran an armored train ahead of us. Part of the time we did not run nights. They said that we were taking a little risk running nights, and they did not want anything to happen to that particular party going down there, so they laid up some nights. Not every night.

Mr. KEARFUL. You did not use any sleeping cars that are commonly used in Mexico on this trip, did you?

Mr. GILKEY. No, sir; I don't remember seeing any. All along the route there you could see flat cars and box cars upset, that had been burned and destroyed, and locomotives, too; not all of them, but a lot of them in all of those towns, Monterrey and San Luis Potosi.

Mr. KEARFUL. You did not go on the Mexican Central up to Durango?

Mr. GILKEY. No; we just went to Mexico City and back.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you talk with any Americans down there about the prospect of improved conditions in Mexico?

Mr. GILKEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did they think about it?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, they said conditions were not any better, and they did not think they would improve under Carranza.

Mr. KEARFUL. They think they will improve under Carranza?

Mr. GILKEY. No; that they will not improve.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do they hope for?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, they hope for intervention by this country. That is what they hope for. They do not expect improvement from the Mexicans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you mean by intervention they hope this Government will take possession of Mexico, or that this Government will support the better element of Mexicans?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, that they will go in there and give them the protection themselves by policing it, I suppose.

Mr. KEARFUL. From your observation and experience, what is your opinion as to what ought to be done to put Mexico in order?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, I think there is only one way, and that is for this country to go in there and police it and give not only protection to Americans, but protection to the Mexicans themselves.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, you do not mean that this country should go in there and police the country permanently, do you?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, until conditions get all right.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, how would you expect conditions to become settled?

Mr. GILKEY. Why, I think if we went in there we could restore order in the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you suppose would happen when we came out?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, I don't know. I really believe that if they had a man like Diaz in there he would be able to sustain order in the country, if he got it back to a normal condition.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have heard about the better class of Mexicans being exiled from the country, have you not?

Mr. GILKEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you not think if those Mexicans were permitted to return under the assurance of protection, and given an opportunity, that they could govern Mexico satisfactorily?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, it would certainly help. Of course, it is a hard proposition down there to tell just what would be the best thing to do, but there is absolutely no hope of order or peace being restored in that country unless they get some help from somewhere, whether it is the United States or some other country.

Mr. KEARFUL. You think it must have help from the outside?

Mr. GILKEY. Yes, sir; and yet, I think the Mexicans, the large proportion of them, want it just as bad as the Americans that are living there. They are not able to cultivate their lands and develop their properties down there any more than Americans are.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you heard that sentiment expressed by Mexicans?

Mr. GILKEY. Yes, sir. Of course, they are pretty careful what they say about our intervening, but I am satisfied in my own mind that many of them down there feel that way, from private talks I have had with them. In fact, I know they do.

Mr. KEARFUL. They feel that otherwise the situation is hopeless?

Mr. GILKEY. Well, yes; it is hopeless. One point I want to make, when we went down on this trip last April, the Chicago newspapermen and this moving-picture man from New York took a lot of pictures down there, and when we were coming out those were censored; in fact, before they let us cross the border, and they must have had word from Mexico City. They confiscated all of the photographs that they could get hold of, and also a number of the films that they took, because they had taken a lot of pictures of the bad conditions down there, showing the poverty-stricken people, and so on, and they did not propose to let those pictures go out of the country if they could help it.

Now, I think it is possible, if you wanted to get a lot of those pictures, to get them, because they were not all confiscated. The boys gave them blank films, and they were pretty foxy about it, and there is no question at all but what the Chicago Tribune and the Hearst papers, the American and the Examiner, and the Daily News, have some very good pictures showing the actual conditions, so far as poverty is concerned, in that country. I know they have a lot of good photographs that can be obtained. If you could see those, and then this moving picture man got away with two reels of films, and those reels would certainly show just what the conditions are. Those will be available to you if you want them, and they would be the best evidence that I know of of what the actual conditions are. I will be glad, when I get back to Chicago, to try to arrange, if you care for them, to send them to you. I think I can get those reels, so you can put them into a machine and see for yourself.

Mr. KEARFUL. We would like very much to have you attempt to get them for us.

Mr. GILKEY. All right.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there any further statement that you think of?

Mr. GILKEY. Do you care anything about the banking conditions down there?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes; if you will state about that, please.

Mr. GILKEY. In 1914, when I left Mexico, I had 45,275 pesos in the bank there. I do not remember just the date, but when the trouble broke out there I had that money placed in the American embassy to be taken care of for us, and when we severed diplomatic relations with Mexico it was transferred to one of the other embassies. Anyway, before we got through it was turned back to our embassy, and when I went down there in April I went up to see the consul there, and I asked him if he had this money. He said he had and wanted to know if I wanted it, and I told him yes. He gave it to me. The package was all sealed; was not opened, and the money was all there, and so I went down to the Bank of Montreal to deposit the money, and they refused to take it. They said they were not taking deposits, and so I went over to the Canadian Bank of Commerce and met the manager there, and he said they could not take money on deposit; that they could not tell what time their banks might be raided, and they did not want to be responsible for it. Then I said, "Rent me a safety deposit box and I will put it in that." He said, "No; I would not do that." He and I got pretty well acquainted; and in the next three or four days I carried this money around with me.

I got kind of tired of that, because I was around on the streets there until 11 or 12 o'clock at night, so I went back to the American embassy and said, "You have got to do something with this money; I am tired of carrying it around. I do not want to take it up to the States; we are liable to be held up, and I do not want to take it any way," and he finally took the money by giving a release if it was stolen it would be at my risk. He said, "We will not take any responsibility at all. We will take it and put it over in that vault, and if anything happens you lose it."

I could have exchanged it for United States currency, but there were about 25,000 pesos of the Bank of Londres bills, and they said they were about 31.5 cents on the dollar, and the balance of it was Oriental bills, and they said they were worth about 15 cents. And they told me there in Mexico City that they actually went right into the Bank of Londres there and took out all of the gold and silver in the bank. They told me down there it was $22,000,000. Now, that would be 22,000,000 pesos. Whether that is true or not, I don't know.

Mr. KEARFUL. We have evidence in the record about the looting of the Bank of Londres.

Mr. GILKEY. Well, I did not want to change this into United States currency, because it would only be about, I think, $6,000, and we would have to take quite a little loss, so I left it down there, and it is down there now. I think sometime, if conditions get back to a normal stage, and they have a permanent government there, they will have to settle with those banks, and the money should be worth par sometime.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that all, Mr. Gilkey?

Mr. GILKEY. That is all I can think of.

Mr. KEARFUL. Very well; very much obliged to you.

(Whereupon, at 12 o'clock noon, a recess was taken until 1.30 o'clock p. m.)

AFTER RECESS.

The hearing was resumed at the expiration of the recess.

TESTIMONY OF DR. C. OSCAR FORD.

(The witness was duly sworn.)

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you please state your name and present address?

Dr. FORD. C. Oscar Ford, 4 Howard Street, Springfield, Mass.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your profession?

Dr. FORD. I am a clergyman.

Mr. KEARFUL. What denomination?

Dr. FORD. Methodist Episcopal.

Mr. KEARFUL. In your capacity as a clergyman, are you interested in religious enterprises in Mexico?

Dr. FORD. Why, from the standpoint of our church, of course, and kindred churches.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you had occasion to go to Mexico in connection with that interest during the past year?

Dr. FORD. Yes; I went to Mexico the middle of September and remained until the latter part of October.

Mr. KEARFUL. In 1919?

Dr. FORD. 1919.

Mr. KEARFUL. To what points in Mexico did you go?

Dr. FORD. I went from Laredo right down the National Railroad to Mexico City, and stopped at the usual points.

Mr. KEARFUL. What points did you visit in Mexico outside of the stations between Laredo and Mexico City?

Dr. FORD. Pachuca and Puebla.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the condition of travel on the railroad?

Dr. FORD. You mean in general?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Dr. FORD. Personally I did not experience any difficulties. I was at some inconvenience.

Mr. KEARFUL. You traveled in a sleeping car?

Dr. FORD. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there any difficulty in arranging yourself with comfort in your berth?

Dr. FORD. Why, I prepared somewhat against the Mexican flea, and other insects. I turned into my berth at 11 o'clock and I turned out 10 minutes after 11.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the cause?

Dr. FORD. I was on the Mexican railroad in the sleeper four nights, going and coming, and that was the only time I spent in bed, those 10 minutes. I do not recognize the name. They said they were chinchas.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you travel under military escort and protection?

Dr. FORD. Well, not being in bed, as the morning broke after stopping at Saltillo overnight, as we traveled the next day I was up and noticed as our train went around the curve that we had an armored car and a guard of soldiers, and all the trains that I traveled on in Mexico after this I noticed the same condition.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were there any unusual incidents occurred on the trip you made to Mexico City?

Dr. FORD. We stopped at Saltillo the first night, and we were told we would lay over there until 4 o'clock the next morning, because of the danger of the country through which we were about to pass. The next night, as dusk was coming on, we were told our train would lay over for a couple hours to allow a train from the south to pass us which would have on it Mr. Carranza, and in due time the train came along without any lights at all, passed by, and then later another train came, illuminated, and we learned afterwards that Mr. Carranza had gone north some days before, and that his secretary was supposed to be traveling to meet him. We did not get to see Mr. Carranza or his secretary.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you observe anything unusual at San Luis Potosi?

Dr. FORD. Before I left Laredo I was informed that there had been some trouble the day before. The train that arrived every day had not arrived in Laredo coming north. What the trouble was it was impossible to find out. The train had been held up for some reason, and when we reached San Luis Potosi we got this information: That there were two men claiming the governorship of the State there, and that one was supposed to be traveling toward the city with his followers and a band of music to celebrate his victory, and the other pretender to the throne got out the soldiers in San Luis Potosi and was going to greet him. Evidently the man who was traveling toward the city learned of the condition and got off the train before it reached the city, and his band of music was in the station there surrounded by the soldiers when we arrived. They were not molested and were taken on our train and carried on into Mexico City.

Mr. KEARFUL. The visiting governor-elect took occasion to avoid the military reception that was awaiting him?

Dr. FORD. That is what I understood; yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you find the situation to be as to the safety of people working there in the outlying districts?

Dr. FORD. Well, I visited a little town outside of Puebla, and was shown very great courtesy by the officials of the town, but learned from a number of sources that the bandits were out in the mountains near by, and that they came in any time; that the farmers worked their farms during the day, but they would not stay outside of the town at night, and they had a regular volunteer guard that could be called out in case the bandits should come to attack the town or do any harm of any kind.

Mr. KEARFUL. This volunteer guard was made up of citizens of the locality?

Dr. FORD. Citizens of the town.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you find any conditions of poverty existing in the towns you visited?

Dr. FORD. I found a general condition of poverty everywhere that I went.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did you find it in Mexico City?

Dr. FORD. Why, I was approached by beggars in Mexico City just the same as I was invited to contribute to beggars along the way from Laredo to Mexico City. And the crowded condition of the city has brought about a housing condition and poverty that is really pitiable.

Mr. KEARFUL. To what is this crowded condition due?

Dr. FORD. People coming in from the outlying sections.

Mr. KEARFUL. For what reason?

Dr. FORD. I presume because of the danger in the communities where they live and the conditions of work, etc. They are not able to get a living because of the conditions, so they come into the city. This is not only true of Mexican peons but it is true of the high-class Mexicans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have a personal demonstration of the ravenous hunger of people along the line of road?

Dr. FORD. Well, on our way down to Mexico City we ran out of food, and we had to pick up whatever we could get along the way from that time on. I had been accustomed to saving from the table any food that was left over and giving it to the beggars at stations, and after we ran out of food we had to buy what we could. I bought a piece of chicken between two tortillas from a poor woman; there is not very much water in Mexico anyhow, and the Mexican has an aversion for water, and so I discarded the covering of my chicken without thought of the poor beggar as I threw it on the ground, not following my former custom of handing it to those who were in need. It was very thoughtless on my part, and immediately half a dozen people in rage rushed up and picked these corn cakes up and tore them to pieces and devoured them like hungry wolves.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you find to be the condition as to safety in Mexico City at nights of the inhabitants on the streets?

Dr. FORD. I had to travel alone most of the time; the passports were help up, and a number of my party had gone on ahead, so if I were going to get around I had to go alone. I did not understand the language and some people who could talk English very kindly advised me about the conditions. They told me I should be very careful about going out in Mexico City after dark; you really were not safe in the city after dark. In fact, one of the men volunteered the statement that it was not safe outside of the city any time alone.

Mr. KEARFUL. Outside of the city?

Dr. FORD. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you learn of an occurrence which illustrated the unsafe condition while you were there?

Dr. FORD. I met a gentleman in the hotel who rather scouted the idea, and he ventured out one night a short distance from the hotel on the main thoroughfare, very near a public building, illuminated, within a stone's throw of a policeman, and he was held up and relieved of everything he possessed. He went to make known his difficulties to the policeman, and he talked only English while the policeman talked only Spanish, so the policeman arrested him and took him in and kept him all night.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did that cause him to change his opinion about the city?

Dr. FORD. He was a sadder and wiser man, I am sure.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any conversations with Mexicans there in regard to what you should do to keep out of danger?

Dr. FORD. I did not just get the import of your question.

Mr. KEARFUL. With respect to traveling about the city.

Dr. FORD. Yes. I was entertained by a very fine Mexican, and went to his home early in the evening to take dinner. During the meal he said to me, "How did you get over here?" I said, "I had a taxi bring me over." He said, "How many men were in the taxi as drivers?" I said, "Two." He said, "Never ride in a taxi with two men. They know you do not speak Spanish and they will take you outside of the city in the machine and rob you." So, I had him arrange my return trip with somebody he knew.

Mr. KEARFUL. What instructions did you have from our State Department with respect to making inquiries in advance of travel?

Dr. FORD. Attached to my passport were instructions that if I intended to travel in Mexico I should inquire from the American consul's office as to the safety of the route over which I intended to travel.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you follow those instructions?

Dr. FORD. Not fully. I went to a number of places without inquiring. When I was about to return to the United States I went in to have my passport signed, and I inquired of the clerk there concerning the railroad that ran from Mexico City to Laredo, the condition of it, and she did not answer my question. She said the American Government does not protect any of its citizens in Mexico. I resented the statement and she turned on me like a flash and said, "The American Government does not guarantee the life of any of its citizens in Mexico." Whereupon I was very indignant and created quite a furore in the consul's office by saying that I resented the statement against my Government. A gentlemen, evidently higher up in the office, came over and told me not to pay any attention to what the woman said, and then he asked me to his desk and very courteously gave me the information that I desired, and told me that the very safest way out of Mexico was by the National Railway that ran from Mexico City to Laredo.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you desire to go out by any other route?

Dr. FORD. I had hoped to go to Vera Cruz and take a steamer, but everybody advised me not to do that.

Mr. KEARFUL. This lady who made the statement about the American Government not protecting its citizens in Mexico, was she an employee of the consul's office, apparently?

Dr. FORD. She must have been; she signed my passport.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say you resented that statement. Why did you resent it?

Dr. FORD. Well, I thought, in the first place, I did not go in there to ask for that information. I took it for granted that the American Government would protect its citizens in any country.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, did you believe that the American Government was protecting its citizens in Mexico to any extent whatever?

Dr. FORD. I must confess that I did not have a very firm foundation upon which to stand in my statement.

Mr. KEARFUL. Your resentment was more sentimental than logical?

Dr. FORD. Oh, yes; I did not have any particular cases in mind.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you make any inquiries of the Mexican authorities in regard to traveling to Tampico or other places?

Dr. FORD. No, sir; I did not make inquiries, but when I was about to leave the United States I had to sign a statement that I would go to Tampico and that region if I visited it on my own responsibility.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is, you had to waive your right to redress if anything happened to you?

Dr. FORD. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you acquire information in regard to a wreck near Saltillo on your trip, a railroad wreck?

Dr. FORD. About the time that I received information concerning the safety of the road from Mexico City to Laredo, the train left Laredo for Mexico City and stopped at Saltillo overnight and left Saltillo at 4 o'clock in the morning, Sunday morning. Fifteen bandits outside of the city of Saltillo caught a section gang of the railroad and commanded them to take up the rails. It should be said, to the credit of these railroad officials, that at first they refused, but that the threat of stringing them up to the telephone poles or shooting them finally persuaded them to obey the bandits, to take up the rails and replace them without spiking them, and this train left Saltillo at 4 o'clock in the morning, going down an incline and around a curve at 60 miles an hour and struck those loose rails, and the report was that there were about 20 killed and 35 injured. The Pullman car just came to the break in the track and was not damaged. It happened that the armored car with the soldiers on it was in the rear, so the bandits did not come out from the mountains to attack the passengers, but that was over the railroad which just the day before I had gotten information from the American consul's office was the safest way out of Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you a picture of that wreck?

Dr. FORD. Yes; I saw that. There was a gentleman from Corpus Christi who was on this train going to Mexico City, and I think he took that picture.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember his name? Was he C. C. Harris?

Dr. FORD. Yes; Harris. He is in the photographic business in Mexico City. Yes, sir; I met the gentleman that took that and some other pictures. He came north with us on our train as we were leaving Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ascertain the opinions of Mexicans in regard to the prospect for improved conditions in Mexico?

Dr. FORD. Well, now, I interviewed what we might call the high class in Mexico principally, and that class did not seem to have very great hopes for a permanent change in conditions.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they express any opinion about what they hoped for?

Dr. FORD. Yes; I had some say that—Mr. Carranza has stated that he is not a candidate, and if at the next election someone who would work toward the establishment of a suitable government and receive legitimate help from the outside, that there might be some hope of a change.

Mr. KEARFUL. They believe there must be help from the outside in order to effect a change for the better?

Dr. FORD. They seemed to be of that opinion. Now, I interviewed another class, and while this class realized the seriousness of the situation, I rather gleaned that any interference from the outside would be resented.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they make any distinction between voluntary interference and the assistance that might be invited?

Dr. FORD. I do not recall any conversation along that line.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you find to be the opinion of Americans living in Mexico about the prospects?

Dr. FORD. I met a gentleman at San Luis Potosi who is mining somewhere between San Luis Potosi and Tampico, and his mine has been in the hands of the bandits since 1914. He has not been able to work it, and he got on our train at San Luis Potosi, and he had just come from the vicinity of his mine. His train had been held up and all the passengers had been robbed, and he was in somewhat of a highly excited state of mind, and I questioned him very thoroughly about the treatment of Americans in that particular hold-up, and he said, while the Americans were treated very nicely—in fact, he said it was his opinion that Americans, as a whole, are treated a little better than other nationalities, and even the Mexicans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Other than the Germans?

Dr. FORD. Well, he did not mention the Germans at all. I think he had in mind other nationalities than the Germans.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the feeling, as you understand it, toward Germans by the Mexicans?

Dr. FORD. I did not find any German propaganda there. I was going to say that this American, to personify his statement, related this instance: That right alongside of him as they were lined up outside of the train to be robbed, there stood a Polish boy, and he had some kind of leggins on; that the soldiers interpreted that as evidence that he was a soldier, and without any hesitancy whatsoever, they shot him dead.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are interested in missionary work in Mexico?

Dr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your opinion as to the necessity for material welfare of the natives of Mexico as a necessary condition to their spiritual and intellectual advancement?

Dr. FORD. That is quite a complicated question.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think it is possible to advance the uninformed, ignorant natives of the country without first providing them with work and food and teaching them how to live?

Dr. FORD. It is my opinion, from the information that I gather from a variety of sources, that the great need of the Mexican is for his educational and moral uplift, and that before any permanent change can take place in Mexico that will be absolutely necessary. I was told that the Mexican Government has more money than it has ever had. While I was in Mexico City, the schools were closed, because they said they did not have money enough to pay the teachers. I was informed, in the light of that situation, that a general of the Army purchased a home for himself in Mexico City and paid $80,000 in gold, and a Mexican general's pay, I understand, is $10 a day.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say that you think the first essential for the progress of the Mexican people is educational and moral advancement?

Dr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe that any progress can be made in educational and moral uplift with ignorant people without first giving them the opportunity to work and earn food and clothes?

Dr. FORD. I think that is very essential, that they must have a chance to work, but even if the Mexican had a chance to work, he does not know how to work, he does not know how to live, and the sanitary conditions are such and the labor conditions are such that he could not make much progress.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is a very good point, Doctor, and I want to ask you what the effect upon that condition would be of foreign enterprise and development of foreign capital in Mexico?

Dr. FORD. I did not investigate personally specific cases, but in a general way I got my information that wherever our Americans went in there was a change for the better.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you not believe that it is essential to the educational progress of that people that there shall first be economic development made possible by foreign enterprises?

Dr. FORD. I do not believe a Mexican alone is able to develop the resources of his country, and help bring about a change in this condition. He needs a friendly help from the outside.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that the missionaries in Mexico will be able to make any progress without the influence of foreign enterprise?

Dr. FORD. Well, under the present conditions, the missionaries are making progress. Our schools are filled now, and our churches are well attended, and there is an advance along all lines, and the Protestant church has a program that, if carried out, will work toward the general uplift of the people. I must confess that if conditions were better we would make more rapid progress.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that the progress would be more or less rapid if foreign enterprise were excluded from Mexico?

Dr. FORD. Well, I should say all Mexico would suffer if the foreign enterprises were excluded.

Mr. KEARFUL. Would not that be particularly so in reference to missionary work?

Dr. FORD. Not any more so than other work. I think it would affect the whole situation.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there any other statement you care to make, Doctor?

Dr. FORD. Why, I should like to make this statement: That after very carefully weighing the situation, I think Mr. Carranza had a hard job coming in on the tide of the revolution, and that it ought to be stated to his credit that there have been some changes which have brought a degree of order out of the chaos. While the country is not without trouble, it is the opinion of people who live there that there has been a change for the better.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that Carranza is personally responsible for the condition you mentioned of a general's prosperity while the school teachers are allowed to go without pay?

Dr. FORD. My opinion would be that Mr. Carranza would like to right some of these wrong conditions, but the conditions are such that he is helpless in many respects to do it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there anything further?

Dr. FORD. I meant to say also that if conditions can be brought to a state in Mexico where this development can take place in a friendly way, help the people to build hospitals and schools and sanitoriums, take care of the homeless children and the poor old men and women, look after the sick, and have a great moral and social uplift program for Mexico, and if this can be brought about in a peaceful way, it is my opinion we will save billions of dollars and get a condition that we could not get if we go in there with an armed force.

Mr. KEARFUL. Of what benefit would it be to establish hospitals and schools and other philanthropic institutions if the generals in control of the situation loot the country and steal the money?

Dr. FORD. Well, I am saying if it can be brought about in this way it is my opinion it would be a good deal better to do it that way.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you have any faith in the prospect of it being brought about peacefully?

Dr. FORD. Why, I talked with quite a number of people who hope that at the next election a man can be elected who will work with the United States and other countries towards this end.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that all?

Dr. FORD. Yes; I think so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Thank you.

(Whereupon at 2.20 o'clock p. m. the committee adjourned.)

FEBRUARY 16, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., February 16, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

TESTIMONY OF MISS LUCILLE WETHERELL.

(The witness was duly sworn.)

Mr. KEARFUL. Please state your name.

Miss WETHERELL. Lucille Wetherell.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where do you live at the present time?

Miss WETHERELL. I have no permanent home at the present time.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your business address?

Miss WETHERELL. My business address at the present time is care of Congressman Thomas D. Schall. Until I came North a few weeks ago it was Tibbee, Miss.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your occupation?

Miss WETHERELL. I write, and speak from platforms.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are an American citizen?

Miss WETHERELL. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what parts of Mexico have you been?

Miss WETHERELL. I have been on the central road down as far as Oaxaca. I have never been south of Oaxaca, and I have been in parts of Vera Cruz, and all of that section of the country from Mexico City through to Vera Cruz, and in Oaxaca, and that comprises about all I have seen; I have seen very little of Mexico, comparatively speaking.

Mr. KEARFUL. What interests have you in Mexico?

Miss WETHERELL. At the present time I am not sure that I have any. I may have. They may have been disposed of just at present. If not, I have an interest in a plantation, Vista Hermosa, in the State of Oaxaca.

Mr. KEARFUL. How large is that plantation?

Miss WETHERELL. I do not know how many acres it is. It is some thousand acres.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that an American company which owns that plantation?

Miss WETHERELL. Yes; it is an American company; it is incorporated in Maine.

Mr. KEARFUL. Its stockholders are Americans?

Miss WETHERELL. Yes; there were formerly about 1,800, all Americans and small owners. At the present time the company is held by the bondholders.

Mr. KEARFUL. Under a mortgage?

Miss WETHERELL. Under a mortgage.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are these stockholders widely distributed?

Miss WETHERELL. Very widely, throughout the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. When was this plantation acquired?

Miss WETHERELL. I do not know the exact year, but I knew it first in about 1900. It had been organized perhaps three or four years before that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you in Mexico during the time of Porfirio Diaz?

Miss WETHERELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the conditions at that time with reference to security for life and property and travel?

Miss WETHERELL. When I went there they were very excellent. When the company first went there there was a band of robbers which was made up mostly of mule thieves; they had committed some very grave depredations, and Porfirio Diaz and the company and the citizens in the adjoining towns together cleared up the situation, and those leaders were taken away and imprisoned, and then the country was very safe for some years.

Mr. KEARFUL. At what point in the history of Mexico did it become unsafe?

Miss WETHERELL. Pretty soon after the beginning of the Madero revolution, the bandits began to increase very materially, conditions began to grow very much worse. It was very difficult to get money. Transportation was very difficult.

Mr. KEARFUL. At what point was the company unable to continue operations?

Miss WETHERELL. For a short time the operations were totally suspended following the second day after the landing at Vera Cruz of the American forces?

After that under Huerta quiet was restored and the company was permitted to operate. The Americans were not there, and the sugar mill was not operated, but the distillery was carried on for some time by our people; and we were able to dispose of some of the goods, so as to support the plantation, and were also able to keep the fields clean. They promised at that time we could go back again.

Mr. KEARFUL. When was it necessary to discontinue operations?

Miss WETHERELL. I should say that the last of the responsible men were obliged to go away in the last of 1916 or early in 1917. I do not know just which is was—1917, I should think.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the extent of the operations of this plantation company? First, about how many acres were in the plantation?

Miss WETHERELL. I do not know one part from the other. There were some thousand acres in cultivation, I should think; I do not know. I should say it ranked among the second in size in operation.

Mr. KEARFUL. What character of operations were they?

Miss WETHERELL. Sugar and alcohol; and also it was a distributing station of trade between the Indians in the mountains and the merchants in Vera Cruz.

Mr. KEARFUL. About how many employees were there during the busy season?

Miss WETHERELL. In our busiest seasons I should think there were about 800.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you down there personally?

Miss WETHERELL. Yes; I was there all the time; I was in charge of the store.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you do?

Miss WETHERELL. The first time I went down there I went, I should say, in 1903, and I stayed for about nine months, and then I came back, and—what year was the panic here?

Mr. KEARFUL. 1907.

Miss WETHERELL. 1907. Then, I must have gone down first in 1905 instead of 1903. In 1907 I went back again, and was there until April, 1914. I had charge of the store, and had charge of the debts of the contracting people.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the extent of your interest in the company?

Miss WETHERELL. At the time I came away, it was some thing—it was very small; something like $7,000, I think; but I was employed to take charge of this store.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say it was very small. Was it practically all you had?

Miss WETHERELL. Yes; it was all I had.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, while you were there, did you get a notice coming from the American Government to get out of the country?

Miss WETHERELL. So far as I know, we had none until just before we did leave; until immediately before we left.

Mr. KEARFUL. When was that?

Miss WETHERELL. That was in 1914.

Mr. KEARFUL. The time of the taking of Vera Cruz?

Miss WETHERELL. I think we had a notice that it might be unsafe to stay, before the landing in Vera Cruz.

Mr. KEARFUL. From whom did that notice come?

Miss WETHERELL. I think our notices always came from Consul Canada.

Mr. KEARFUL. At Vera Cruz?

Miss WETHERELL. Yes. I do not remember that we had any special notice from him personally that we should get out until just before we did leave.

Mr. KEARFUL. There were general notices?

Miss WETHERELL. There were general notices sent out.

Mr. KEARFUL. To all Americans?

Miss WETHERELL. To all Americans; and I think we received some of those. I do not know; I did not pay any attention to that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please state in your own way just what occurred at the time of the landing of the American forces at Vera Cruz—what occurred on your plantation.

Miss WETHERELL. The night before two telegrams came, saying, practically, "Get out as soon as God will let you." One was from a banker in Mexico City and one was from the consul at Vera Cruz. There were four Americans left. It was finally decided that two would remain—the assistant manager and the sugar boiler—to finish a consignment of sugar we had for London. The rest of us started for Vera Cruz on the morning of the 23d, I think.

Mr. KEARFUL. Vera Cruz was taken on April 21st?

Miss WETHERELL. Well, then, the morning of the 22d we started for Vera Cruz, and when we were about half way there, on the bank of a river, a neighbor from an adjoining town came riding up to say there was no use of our going; that the Americans had landed in Vera Cruz, the railroad was cut at Tejeria and we could go down to Cuernavaca, or we might go up to the City of Mexico, but we could go no farther and they gave the women a chance to decide, and they decided to go back home. We were not even afraid at that time. When we got back to the house our Mexican secretary met us and in his face was such consternation that we knew for the first time what danger we were in.

Mr. KEARFUL. What then occurred?

Miss WETHERELL. That night we were concentrating whatever arms we had in one house, and there was a commotion out in the corridor. I went out to see what it was about and there were about 12 officers in the corridor, Huerta officers; in the patio were 100 men, armed and mounted. They were demanding that the manager go with them to Tierra Blanca. He was ill at the time and everybody remonstrated with the colonel. The American secretary came down and remonstrated with the colonel, and he was told if the manager did not go he would bind him as he would a peon. They searched the house, took all of the arms, took the horses of the plantation, and during the search Don Blanco escaped.

Mr. KEARFUL. The American?

Miss WETHERELL. No; the Mexican. We had this one high-class Mexican, and because he was friendly to the Americans at this time they were hunting for him as much as they were for us. I went over to the store, where a young man from Chicago was dispensing the cabrilla, and I asked him to let me take his place and he go over and see what he could do for the manager. He responded, "Not in a thousand years," and then I saw there were several guns and revolvers aimed at his head.

I called the clerk and we went out together. They surrounded us and cut me out. They kept the American from going into the house at all, but they would let me go because there was no other way for them to get mounts for their prisoners. They did not want to take the women at all, but the manager's wife had a little baby less than a year old, and some of the neighbors told her that the Americans were to be shot in the next village, and she decided to go with her husband and take her chance; but she had not the heart to kill her baby, and they threw it out to me and said, "You take it; the doctor's wife will help you take care of it," and her husband heard her, and he said, "No; you can do as you like; I do not know which is the safest for you; but if you go, you must keep the baby," and she took it with her. There was no chance to get any clothes for any of them, but I got what I could—a few wraps—and she took her baby away wrapped in a blanket.

They had the sugar boiler by this time, and there were no horses for him; all we had the Mexicans had hidden, and there was a discussion between the Americans whether I should go or stay. The only reason why I should stay was I could get into communication with Martinez, who was friendly at that time and in good standing with Huerta, but during the Madero revolution had been abandoned. It was finally decided we had no choice; there was no saddle for the sugar boiler, and he either had to have mine or walk, so I gave it to him, but the Americans thought I stayed behind by choice.

They led off, our people in the midst. They stopped at the Mexican's house and searched for him. I drew down the curtains and the Chinaman came in to help me shut up the house. We had alcohol lamps in the house at that time, and they cast very sharp shadows from above. As the Mexicans passed by, some of them saw the shadow of the Chinaman on the curtain and thought it was the Mexican, and 12 men returned to search for him.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was the night after the Americans left, and you were there alone?

Miss WETHERELL. They had not yet gone. They were up at one house above where I was—the main house. The colonel was not with them. They came into the house, and one of them put a pistol at my neck and forced me to go with him through the rooms to search. They did find a little double-barreled arm, but there was no ammunition, and then they came out and shook it in my face and said, "See how she lied; let's bind all of them." The leader responded, "Take it away, you dog. We are not here to molest American women," and the men grumbled, "Nobody takes care of our women and children."

Finally they went off, and I shut up the house as fast as I could and opened the trunk and took out a little bag of securities and a small sum of money, and, shutting the house up, I went out and then I heard for the first time a great shout at the store. As I went down the steps some one came up to me, and it was the brother of the manager, whose name was Carmas. I remembered a pistol which had been thrown into the grass, and we went back to get it. I did not notice—we did not go by the road; we went through the cane, and I remember Carmas saying: "I will go before and hold back the cane so it will not strike you in the face, and to look out for snakes." Suddenly I was aware of a great commotion in the road. There were several men reeling and drunk; they were all singing in their fashion, stating how glorious their deeds had been, and in their midst was a tall Indian woman with her arms interlaced with the men, and a little white boy was clinging to her skirts. It was Maraseta Peres, who had been on the place for some time and had been my servant. I started to go to her, and Carmas said: "Senorita, you can not go out." Maraseta was singing, "I am Maraseta, the Indian, the wife of Don Juan, of Morelos"—you ought to put "woman" there, not wife—"the woman of Don Juan, of Morelos; I have four sons; my sons and the sons of Don Juan; they go to school in the United States and in Paris, and nobody knows they are the sons of Maraseta, the Indian. Maraseta who has many lovers and loves many men," and then they all reeled again and came over toward where I was.

Finally we got through the cane and went to the house of the field manager where we were met by his wife, who said, "Oh, it is very terrible," and she pointed toward the store where the contratista men were holding a riot. I asked where the Mexican was, and she said he was out in the garden. I went out to find him. It was dark. At the last moment, we had found the electricity out, and I felt him coming slowly toward me, and when he saw who it was he threw up his hands and he said: "Madre de Dios! Vd. a qui!" Then I knew what I had done. I had not only done myself no good, but I had endangered every person's life among the gente. He led me to a secluded corner in the garden where I could look over toward the store. He said: "Look at that. I have known them all of my life. I went through a war, but I have never seen anything like that to-night. Look at that."

I did look. They looked like large, huge, hungry insects in the distance. They held kerosene lamps and candles in their hands like torches. The store, like all other stores on plantations, was well stocked with all sorts of drinkables, and they had an unlimited amount of alcohol to draw upon, and they had evidently used them all; everybody was mad; perfectly mad. They were like a lot of people with the delirium tremens.

Mr. KEARFUL. Alcohol is one of the main products of a sugar plantation?

Miss WETHERELL. I do not think you could run a sugar plantation, in those parts at least, without using those by-products. I understand that in the United States there are other ways of using those by-products, but I also understand that the ruin of the Louisiana sugar industry was very largely because they did not and could not manufacture alcohol. I am not sure that is true, but I have always been told that.

We had very large quantities on hand at this time; I think 80,000 gallons, because we were in a country where we could not get oil very well for fuel, and wood had become almost impossible, so we had been conferring with Germany for some time as to machinery for using alcohol for fuel, and we had an immense amount of alcohol on hand, and hoped to use it for fuel the next year.

All of the gente knew this was true, and their first desire was to get at the distillery and let the alcohol out and make a river of fire and burn up the whole place. That was done in Mexico at one time, I think it was in northern Mexico; I do not know exactly where it was. A few months before the bandits had burned 10,000 gallons at the station for us.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did you get away from the place at that time?

Miss WETHERELL. They rioted all night long—you mean, the next morning?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Miss WETHERELL. I got away on mule back, with the frame of a saddle to ride on, and ropes for stirrups. I had no clothes except those I had on. None of us had.

Mr. KEARFUL. The other Americans had preceded you?

Miss WETHERELL. They rode them 11 miles that night through rivers and mud, the woman carrying her baby in her arms, sleeping on a stone floor with wet garments and no covering. And in the morning had the choice of walking 25 miles down the road to the military camp or paying a thousand pesos for a train to take them to Cordova. They chose to go to Cordova, and Spanish merchants supplied the money.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did you finally get to Cordova?

Miss WETHERELL. I got to Cordova on the train, but at Tierra Blanca there was a mob of about 500 people gathered on the train. I was supposed to be the last American to go through, and the mob was clamoring to take me out and hold me for ransom. There was a Spaniard on board the train; he took out his revolver and flourished it in the face of the crowd and sat down behind me, and an Englishman, a university man, came and sat down with me, and two or three Mexicans stood up and showed that they would take my part, too, and the Spanish merchant, or someone who had furnished the money, stood down behind the crowd and told me I need not be very much afraid, and they finally controlled the mob and we went off.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you join the other Americans at Cordova?

Miss WETHERELL. Yes; I joined the women at the hotel. The wives of the other Americans at the plantation had been left behind, and to find their way just as I had found mine. They were in the Cevallos Hotel at that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where were the men of the party?

Miss WETHERELL. The men of the party, with those from the other plantations, 41 at this time, with the woman and the baby from our plantation, were in the large outer office of the mayor, in the palace, the municipal palace at Cordova, prisoners.

Mr. KEARFUL. What occurred there at that time?

Miss WETHERELL. That night after I got there—no; it must have been the next night, there was a mob of several hundred gathered before the palace, crying, "Give us the forty and one, the Americans, the cowards and rattlesnakes; we will kill them, and then we will go down to Vera Cruz and kill all of the rest."

The mayor was haranguing them to have them stop. The colonel, several priests, and several Spanish merchants; they did not seem to have any control over them. The soldiers in the barracks across the way simply stood still and laughed. Finally a band of mounted men, whom they called the citizens' guards, mostly Spanish merchants, came riding out, armed, and charged the mob, and it dispersed, but that night, down in the lower part of town, two miles away, another mob gathered and broke open shops and armed themselves with machetes and came marching up the streets again to murder our friends. Again the citizens' guard rode out, the mayor was at the head at that time, and they brought the leaders back. The mob, before the citizens' guard had got there, had torn three peons, limb from limb, literally, and had trampled them in the streets. The two leaders were shot. They said the mayor did it; I do not know who did it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were there any Americans in business at Cordova then?

Miss WETHERELL. There were several American businesses, the largest, I think, was the Arbuckle Coffee Co. All of those business offices had been confiscated and made into barracks.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did the Americans finally get out of Cordova?

Miss WETHERELL. There was another almost uprising. Soldiers who were brought into the town—there were 3,000 soldiers there when we got there, and before we left they said there were 10,000; they were constantly going by the palace, and after a little it became customary for them to stop before the palace and offer some demonstration or other, and one night about 3 o'clock in the morning a very large number of soldiers went by and stopped out in front of the palace and the guards came out on the little balconies and shouted down to them their vivas, became so demonstrative that it waked us in the hotel, and I went out and sat behind the railing and watched them. What they said was, "The Americans are all cowards; they are rattlesnakes; they shoot straight, but they are afraid of the Mexicans' knives; there is no use of being afraid of them. We will kill this little bunch up here and then we will go down to Vera Cruz."

There was sniping going on everywhere, and everybody got scared despite the fact that Americans could not by any possibility have gotten up there, believing the Americans did it. Somebody was putting up a job. When the guards went back at that time they became very, very insolent. They knocked a boy over, and many other things, and all of the Americans, notwithstanding they were fearfully afraid at that time, sprang up saying, "Look out; we will report you in the morning," and one lurched toward them and said, "No hay mañana, señor."

Mr. KEARFUL. There is no to-morrow.

Miss WETHERELL. Yes; there is no to-morrow. The colonel was out of town at that time, and the real matter was that everybody was afraid of a revolt of the military; there was a threatened uprising of the soldiers.

That was Saturday. The colonel came back Sunday night, and there was no light in the palace, and all of the women were fearfully afraid; they thought something had been done to their husbands, and they were there alone with their babies. What had really happened was the colonel had returned, found out what had happened, and had had the dungeons beneath the palace cleared out of the regular prisoners, and the Americans were there.

Mr. KEARFUL. What number of Americans were there at that time?

Miss WETHERELL. At that time there were over 200, including women and children in the hotel. The number had been very greatly swelled by people from a colony a little down the road from Tierra Blanca, I think about four or five stations.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did the party finally get out of Cordova?

Miss WETHERELL. They got out on street cars. It seemed as if all Cordova was down at the station, and we were rushed between lines of soldiers through these mobs, some of whom jeered, and some of the prominent people had come down to say their kindly good-bye. We were locked in the station for about two hours, and then were passed through lines of soldiers again into a guarded train and started out under the English and French flags.

We reached Paso del Macho in the middle of the night some time, and the guards locked us in and went to get lunch. Another mob gathered, broke several windows; we tucked the children away as best we could and piled the luggage up as best we could to protect our heads. One of the Mexican women who was along was hurt, and they seemed to resent the fact that the Mexican woman was with us. The guards came up and fired into the mob and we went on. We reached Soledad at 5 o'clock in the morning. It was very hot, and the men piled out with their blankets and slept on the platform, leaving the car to the women and children.

At daylight the soldiers came and ordered us all out, and when we were out they got off the train and started off, saying they had been ordered back to Cordova, and we were free and might do exactly as we chose.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of country is there surrounding Soledad?

Miss WETHERELL. Soledad is on the desert, many miles from anywhere. There is no place to get anything to eat, there is nothing to drink. We probably should have died there if an unforeseen event had not happened. A woman came around and brought a little coffee and we each had a little sip, perhaps half a cup. She brought enough milk so that each of the children had a little bit. There was a good sized stream that looked clear, but nobody dared drink of it, and we thought we were done for, but about 1 o'clock a train whistled, and some of the railroad men went back and put up a flag, hoping it would be a freight train. There was no train due until the next morning. It proved to be an engine and private car of Capt. Tweeby, from the flagship Essex of Admiral Sir Christopher Craddock, commanding the British Navy. He had been sent up to Huerta. At the time we thought he had been sent up at the instance of the United States to ask for Huerta's resignation. That was not true. When O'Shaughnessy was chargé d'affaires at Vera Cruz he had told there were 800 Americans stranded in Mexico City and Huerta would not allow them to come out, so Sir Christopher Craddock said to Tweeby to get a train to Mexico City if you can get there. "If you can not get there by train, go on horseback, and if you can not get there on horseback, you hoof it, but you get there somehow and say to Huerta in the name of England, send those 800 Americans out on a guarded train." Before Tweeby got up there, Mr. O'Shaughnessy had been recalled at the instance of the United States, and anything he did after that was not just exactly legal, but the announcement of his resignation was held up until the 800 Americans were on board a guarded train and were off, and then Tweeby could come back.

At the same time, on the way up, he had had a drink with Gen. Maas, the general commanding the district about Soledad, and so they were friends, and so he immediately went in and telephoned to Gen. Maas, not that he had found 200 Americans stranded up there, but that he had found 200 British subjects, and that it was absolutely imperative that he take them out, and Gen. Maas agreed and he came back and very hurriedly put us in the car, women and children in his own car, and the men hauled up cattle cars and went out in those.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where did you finally arrive?

Miss WETHERELL. We finally arrived at Tejeria. When we arrived at Tejeria we took up our bundles and the women their babies and trudged off.

Mr. KEARFUL. The track was torn up at that point?

Miss WETHERELL. The track was torn up at that point.

Mr. KEARFUL. Between there and Vera Cruz?

Miss WETHERELL. Between there and Vera Cruz. I have always thought it was 9 miles, but you thought it was not quite so much as that.

Mr. KEARFUL. I do not remember the exact distance. At any rate, you had to walk for several miles.

Miss WETHERELL. We tramped for several miles. It was very hot, and sometimes you tramped on the rails, and the ground was practically shale, and you would slip and slide, but the English flag went before us all the way.

Mr. KEARFUL. Until you came to the American forces

Miss WETHERELL. Until we came to the American forces. I do not think anybody who has not been through anything like that understands exactly how one feels about the Stars and Stripes. Back from Vera Cruz the sands are in little hills, just like they are back of San Francisco, and way back over those hills we finally could observe little bits of fluttering things that looked like rags, but we knew those were Uncle Sam's flags. There was where Uncle Sam sat down. Everybody was so grateful to get out we all tried not to say anything, but there came a time when somebody said, "There it is," and nobody had to ask what "it" was. It was the Stars and Stripes, and again the very fine courtesy of this fine English captain, who lies at the bottom of the sea himself now, was shown. He hauled down the Union Jack, so the Yankees could pay tribute to the Stars and Stripes.

I heard somebody say, "We are human beings now; we are Americans." Then, we went on until a little farther when the jackies came down from the hills and Tweeby turned us over to them and went back to his own car.

Mr. KEARFUL. Of course, you understood that the bringing of the Stars and Stripes into Vera Cruz was the cause of all of your troubles?

Miss WETHERELL. Oh, yes; yes. And I want to make a point there. What the Americans up here do not seem to understand at all is that when the Stars and Stripes did not protect us, we became, to the Mexicans, a disgrace, and one in disgrace can never receive any consideration whatever among the Mexican masses. There is a sort of instinct to desert the thing that is done with.

Mr. KEARFUL. You arrived at Vera Cruz, and where did you go from there?

Miss WETHERELL. We went immediately to the consulate, and there were a great many consuls there at the time, many prominent ones, and when we went in they all sprang forward, and I heard one man say as he greeted a personal friend, "Thank God, old man, we have been sweating blood hunting for you people, we and the English," and that was true; all the English and American forces in that part of the country and in Mexico had been exerting themselves to find this body of 200 people. They had friends, the cities were full of friends of the different ones, and they had been lost for five days between Cordova and Vera Cruz, and nobody had been able to hear from them.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did you get out of Vera Cruz?

Miss WETHERELL. We came out on the refugee ship Esperanza.

Mr. KEARFUL. What accommodations were there for the refugees on that ship?

Miss WETHERELL. Very much overcrowded. I do not know just how many it holds. I have an impression it holds about 3,000, when it is crowded, and there were over 200 more than could possibly be there. People slept out on the decks; many, many of them slept on the decks; sometimes they would change off, one sleep on the deck one night and another another night, and there was very little to eat. It was not that it was so little—the potatoes were very good; we had oleomargarine, and that is not so bad, but in that altitude it was melted. The children paid $1 for an orange, 25 cents for an apple.

Mr. KEARFUL. At what port of the United States did you arrive?

Miss WETHERELL. New Orleans.

Mr. KEARFUL. How were you treated when you arrived there?

Miss WETHERELL. Before we arrived at New Orleans we stopped for three days at the quarantine station, which is magnificently handled. The ship was cleaned out and put in order, and well provisioned. We were allowed to go on shore, and the women could sleep in the hospital if they chose; the families could have a tent, and we were magnificently treated. Twice a day we were allowed to stand in line, served by the officers themselves, to excellent coffee and sandwiches.

When we arrived in New Orleans we met the utmost discourtesy that could be served out to such a body of people anywhere.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the details of these discourtesies?

Miss WETHERELL. To start in with, we were each one obliged to declare ourselves paupers. We were that, at the instance of our own country, and while I was——

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the reason for you having to declare yourselves paupers?

Miss WETHERELL. Because we could not go any further. We had not a cent of money.

Mr. KEARFUL. You had to in order to get passage money to come home?

Miss WETHERELL. In order to get passage money to come home. There was a very curious incident as I was declaring myself a pauper; there came up to me a man I had not seen coming up until he was there; a fine looking man, and in his hand he had a bank book in which he showed me $1,000,000, and he said, "I have this and as much more——" oh, he said to me in the beginning, "do not be modest; I have this and as much more, and I am going to spend it all to clear up this awful disgrace that has been put upon us. In order that I may be one of you I will declare myself a pauper, too, at this time and accept my passage money exactly as you do."

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know when Carranza came into control of the region where your plantation was?

Miss WETHERELL. He never has been in control of that region.

Mr. KEARFUL. Under whose control has it been?

Miss WETHERELL. I don't know what to call them.

Mr. KEARFUL. The government of Oaxaca?

Miss WETHERELL. Oaxaca has never been in the revolution. Anyhow it was not with Madero. It was with Huerta, in a way, but it has never been in the revolution; they have not been able to get Oaxaca—it is the great Indian State, you know, and is Diaz's State.

Mr. KEARFUL. It is the State from which Porfirio Diaz and Benito Juarez came?

Miss WETHERELL. Yes; and the Oaxaca Indians have never, never been in the revolution.

Mr. KEARFUL. During all of the recent revolutions, Oaxaca has maintained its independence?

Miss WETHERELL. Absolutely. It is one of the States, anyhow, upon which Mexico has the backbone of her future, in her splendid Indians.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you have on the plantation by way of supplies, implements, and machinery?

Miss WETHERELL. Well, I can not go into detail about the machinery. I think we had the best distillery on the isthmus. We did not have the best mill. I think we had two mills, with facilities for easily adding two more the next year. We had a large store; we had buildings for the people made of brick and stucco; we had buildings for the officers made of brick, tile roofed; we had schools and blacksmith shops and cabinetmakers' shops and carpenter shops and machinists.

Mr. KEARFUL. What became of all these supplies? I suppose you also had animals?

Miss WETHERELL. Oh, yes; a good many. They were all stolen. They all went time after time after time, and I think there is nothing of that kind left; there can not be anything of that kind now, because nobody is there. You can not get within 11 miles of the place. We were told last year when a sale was on to Spaniards, that the copper and brass had been taken out of the mills and the distillery, and then the Spaniards would not buy, because there was not any use; we were told that the copper and brass had been sold to the Government. I have no means of knowing whether that was true or not.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the attitude of the Mexican workmen toward the Americans in that locality?

Miss WETHERELL. Well, I should say perfect. I do not know how you can have any better class of working people. I do not know how you could have any more accord. It is not true they do not like the Americans. They trusted them. When they finished their contracts they came always, almost invariably, to leave their money with the Americans. We never took it, but we did see it was put in the hands of some Mexican whom we could trust, and some one of the Americans would see how much of it there was so there would be two or three witnesses, because they always got drunk when their contract was over, and they would not know how much money they had at the end, whereas if they took their money off with them they would come back with none, and probably would be in jail and then have to spend all of their money with a contratista in order to get any work again. Frequently these poor, contracted peons, when they were going to give up their contracts and wanted to have a drunk, would go to the doctor and promise that when they had had all that was safe for them to have, or had drunk as long as he thought was right, they would voluntarily go to jail and sober up, and then they would contract again to work. The doctor always was around looking after them that way.

It seems rather a brutish thing to say, but nevertheless it is a very kind thing to them, because otherwise they would lie in the gutter and people will rob them, perhaps they will be killed, and it is the best thing that can be done for them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you make any appeal to the American Government for protection or redress?

Miss WETHERELL. Yes. The claims were filed at Vera Cruz before we came out. We have since written a good many times to the Government, and I think in 1916 we received a communication in regard to something from the Government—in regard to taxes, I think it was.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever get any satisfaction at all?

Miss WETHERELL. No; there was—I think it is true, as I have talked with those out of Mexico—it is absolutely true that anything out of Mexico could not be heard. It could not matter what you had to say, you could not get any hearing; it was an absolutely closed subject.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean on the part of the administration?

Miss WETHERELL. On the part of the American Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever hear the justification of the officials of the American Government for that attitude?

Miss WETHERELL. None whatever.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, I will inform you that they attempt to justify their attitude on the ground that Americans who went into Mexico did so under special concessions for the purpose of exploiting the Mexican peons, and were therefore not entitled to any consideration. What can you say about the truth of that statement?

Miss WETHERELL. It is an absolute lie.

Mr. KEARFUL. What special concessions did your company have?

Miss WETHERELL. None whatever. They paid $11 an acre for their land.

Mr. KEARFUL. And how about exploiting the Mexican peons?

Miss WETHERELL. They were not exploited. I think it is only just to say—and what I say for our plantation can apply to the other plantations, both larger and smaller—there is no plantation, American plantation, on the isthmus of Tehuantepec that misuses its labor.

They supply hospitals—we did not supply a hospital because we were not able—they supply doctors, they furnish American medicines, absolutely for these people, they take care of them in a way that such classes of people are not taken care of anywhere else.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was their condition bettered by the operation there?

Miss WETHERELL. Absolutely.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what way?

Miss WETHERELL. They can not have medical aid, to start in with; they are too poor to get it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Their living conditions?

Miss WETHERELL. They can not even get food when they are sick; they are too poor to get it. Until the Americans went there they did not have any markets; they could raise cane and boil it in open kettles into a perfectly black comb, and peddle it among themselves, but they have not the understanding that will allow them to form their markets; there can not be any exchange among them. They must have capital, and they must have somebody who understands about making exchange for them, and they are very clever at adapting themselves to it. There was an absolute good feeling between the Americans and the people among whom they lived.

There is one instance I would like to tell you. When I got down there, in 1907, there was a man by the name of Juan Hernandez, who needed money, and he had a very beautiful piece of jungle land, uncleared land, that he wanted to sell. The manager of our place came to me and said, "You have a little money free now, and you will never get another piece of land like this. Won't you take it?" I did not want to take it, and then he thought it would be too bad to pay such an amount to Juan Hernandez, who had a large family, to sell that land when it was all he had, so he advised Juan not to sell, but to clear that land and put his sons, of whom he had five, to tilling it, and we would buy the cane and we would loan him stump pullers to clear with, and we sent our director over to help him upon a certain occasion. Money was arranged, a loan was arranged so that he could buy tools from the United States to cultivate with, and long before we came away Juan was selling cane throughout the whole season to us, and with his carts was hauling our sugar back again to the station.

The villages when we went there were very sparsely settled. They grew very prosperous; much more prosperous, accordingly, than we did. It was all dependent upon the industry furnished by the plantation.

Mr. KEARFUL. What about the scale of wages that was received by the laborers before your operations and afterwards?

Miss WETHERELL. They were larger after we went there than they were before, but they were not on the plantations increased as much as they were in the oil fields, for instance.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please describe the system of contract labor that was customary in that region and how it operated with you.

Miss WETHERELL. Yes. May I make a statement before stating that?

Mr. KEARFUL. Very well.

Miss WETHERELL. I think it is very generally supposed that Mexico is unique in having contract labor. That is not true. In all out places, especially in sugar—I say especially in sugar, because I do not know about the other things—contract gangs are used throughout. They are usually sent out under what is known as the British system. This is a system whereby labor is contracted for five years. There are special courts provided to which the laborers may appeal and employers as well. I do not know further about the details.

These contracted gangs are mostly Chinese and Japanese and the East Indian coolies.

I wish to make one other statement there: Since I have been in the United States, the last year, I think it was, there has been very great feeling expressed against Americans for using this contract labor, saying they were responsible, together with the half-savage Diaz, for the most notorious and cruel system of slavery ever known. That is not true.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have reference to the sentiment created by some articles that were published by John Kenneth Turner entitled "Barbarous Mexico"?

Miss WETHERELL. Yes; but that statement I have just given you was made—I am not sure, but I think it was made—in a New York paper.

Mr. KEARFUL. What have you to say in regard to the truth of it?

Miss WETHERELL. It is not true. They were not responsible for any system. They went to a certain place and they used the system of employing labor that was customary to use there. They were no more responsible than Queen Wilhelmina is responsible for the contract system that is used in Surinam, in Dutch Guiana. She is said to own the largest share in the largest plantation in Dutch Guiana. It is under control of the severest, the most sought-after of all of the field managers in the vicinity, a Jamaica negro. She employs her labor under this British system that I have spoken of.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the system in Mexico?

Miss WETHERELL. Among the Americans the contracts were made out on legal papers before jefes politicos and witnessed by Mexicans, for six months. There was usually $50 advanced to a man. Sometimes there was more and sometimes less.

Mr. KEARFUL. For what purpose?

Miss WETHERELL. The purpose was to cover their expenses to the contratista and to supply them with a certain amount of clothing and give them a little money when they began their work. They were supposed to work this out. They received 50 cents a day and their rations and lodging.

Mr. KEARFUL. How were they treated by the American operators?

Miss WETHERELL. I should say they were treated perfectly fair. They could always have 25 cents extra twice a week to buy their cigars; if they were trustworthy, and most of them were, they could add to their debts, as was necessary for them; there was a system worked out whereby they could absolutely prove whether they had had things or not, and it would not have been possible for us to cheat them if we wanted to, because they are not very easily cheated.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were they contented under the operation of the Americans?

Miss WETHERELL. Very contented; we had men return year after year.

Mr. KEARFUL. Voluntarily?

Miss WETHERELL. Voluntarily, to contract themselves. Frequently they came back and contracted themselves. Nearly all of them did, if they did not get so drunk in some village that they fell into the hands of the contratistas, and I do not think the contratistas in our vicinity mistreated them very badly. They allowed them to do what they wanted to do, which, as a rule, means that they will get brutally drunk.

Mr. KEARFUL. You spoke of falling into the hands of the contratistas. What do you mean by that?

Miss WETHERELL. There are these men who pick up men to contract, and they are said to get them just drunk enough so they do not know what they are doing and then take from them more than they ought to take, and to get them into some sort of trouble. I think probably that is true.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think the Americans treated these contract laborers any worse than the Mexicans did?

Miss WETHERELL. No; the Americans had very little to do with labor anyhow. They employed high-class Mexicans, and they usually established a policy, if the managers were wise. I do not at all consider that our policy on our plantation was American. We all of us felt it was very largely due to a very wonderful Mexican, especially our policy with the Indians, which he worked out in a marvelous way, and if it had been carried on would have been a very wonderful thing in the development of the Indians.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who do you think is principally to blame for the bad conditions of Mexico?

Miss WETHERELL. Well, I suppose—well, it is Francisco Madero.

Mr. KEARFUL. For what reason?

Miss WETHERELL. Because he undertook something that he did not know at all how to do; that he had no conception of whatever.

Mr. KEARFUL. Just what do you refer to?

Miss WETHERELL. He had no plan at all—well, he may have had a plan, but if he did I could not find it out. I went to see him once soon after he came in and conditions had become so bad it was not safe for any responsible man to leave the bank for any length of time so they sent me up to interview Madero to see what we might do, and what we might not do, in regard to contracted labor. I happened to get there the day that the first great delegation of Indians came down. I believe there were 700 of them. There may have been more; there may have been less. It was a very wonderful thing to encounter, the things that these people stood for, and that they thought Madero stood for. Everybody had to wait for this delegation, myself among the others.

When I went in to see Madero some hours afterwards, he was still under the influence of them, what I call the spell of them. I talked with him for about two hours, and when I went out I knew that Mexico was in for exactly what she has come to now. There was no other way to look at it.

I came across the other day a stained paper that was the end of a letter that I had written to a Minneapolis paper in which one paragraph said, "I feel as if I had been in the presence of a 9-year old boy who had dressed himself up as an Indian and gone out to scalp."

Mr. KEARFUL. Referring to Madero?

Miss WETHERELL. Referring to Madero. He had no more responsibility than that. He could be so very, very—he told me, to start in with, that we need not make any change in our habits; he understood perfectly what we thought about it, admitted he had spies among our people at that time, and had always had, which was a thing we had always known, and he thought there were three that particular day, at that time, on our place. He kept saying we could not contract these people for more than a year and at the end of that time we must settle up with them. Well, that had nothing to do with the Americans. They had always done that. There never was a time when the time was finished that their settlement was not made and their pay was not forthcoming.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the principle upon which Madero proceeded?

Miss WETHERELL. I think absolutely none, so far as I could find out.

There is one thing I would like to say there for the benefit of the United States, if I may.

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes; proceed.

Miss WETHERELL. It is usually said that Gustavo Madero was a rascal.

Mr. KEARFUL. He was a brother of the president?

Miss WETHERELL. Yes; a brother of the president. He was the politician of the family, and that Francisco Madero was a saint. The truth is Gustavo Madero was the elder brother and very able, and Francisco Madero was the little brother, and Gustavo had always taken care of him. To me Gustavo was the great tragedy—the tragedy of the big brother protecting the little brother. Francisco Madero need not have been murdered if he had listened to Gustavo. The money that was furnished to Francisco, Gustavo is said to have stolen from funds to finance the road across Zacatecas. Personally, I can not see why it was a sin for Gustavo to take this money, and the money was very unholy, and a saintly act for Francisco to spend it. Yet such is the case.

The Madero revolution was simply one link in a great attempt to put the world into internationalism.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you observed any evidences of sympathy with this scheme of internationalism on the part of this Government?

Miss WETHERELL. Absolutely; its policy in Mexico has been absolutely founded on an attempt to do away with the American nation—make it a pawn in the game of internationalism.

Mr. KEARFUL. What part in that has been played by a man named Lincoln Steffens, so far as you know?

Miss WETHERELL. So far as I absolutely know it is this: In 1916 I was here in Washington and I heard Mr. Lincoln Steffens lecture. It was a marvelous lecture, so adroitly framed that I, who knew Mexico and its conditions well, had to pinch myself to know that the whole thing was an absolute untruth, although there was not one item by itself that could be said to be false. It was the grouping that made the thing wrong. The facts that belonged in the far past were presented as if they were strictly up to date.

I said to Mr. Steffens after the lecture was over, "Why don't you give Diaz some credit for doing something for Mexico?" and he said, "Oh, yes; Diaz should have great credit. He did a great deal for Mexico. Nobody could do the particular things that he did quite in the same way," and I said, "Then, why don't you speak of it?" He said, "Oh, yes; some other time. There is not time to say all of the things."

A few days afterwards, after I had thought it over, I saw Mr. Steffens on the streets in Washington and I stopped him and I said, "Mr. Steffens, will you tell me why, if you believe that all of this regulation in regard to land and to the poor people is necessary why don't you start it up here instead of starting it in Mexico?" and he said, "Well, yes, of course; it is just as necessary up here as it is down there, but it has seemed easier to start it down there; the conditions were such." And I said, "Sure; and when it is started down there you hope it will sweep back up here and then over the world," and he said, "We hope so." Absolutely that is the only thing I could swear to, but I have some surmises of other things.

It seems to me to have very little in it, but to illustrate their sophistry particularly well, he said, a Boston merchant said to him that he advised his people not to buy their houses, because it placed them under obligation; they would not move about as freely as they might want to move. For instance, if he did not treat them right they could not go to Philadelphia.

It seemed to me a very shilly-shally argument, but Mr. Steffens advanced it.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you know about the character of the Mexican people as to furnishing material for establishing a government?

Miss WETHERELL. I think with the 500,000 that I understand are now refugees returned, and good enough understanding so that the financiers of the world could be on their side, they could establish a good government.

Mr. KEARFUL. What about the lower classes, the working people?

Miss WETHERELL. They can not rule themselves yet; absolutely not.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is their character with reference to being a good element in the country?

Miss WETHERELL. The lower classes, do you mean?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes; the lower classes.

Miss WETHERELL. Well, we considered them a very good element. We liked them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do they possess the potentialities of improvement and progress?

Miss WETHERELL. Oh, yes; absolutely, with good guidance.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are they peaceful and industrious?

Miss WETHERELL. Well, they are both. They are easily excited. They have little fear of physical death. They have little grasp—what I call little tenacity or grasp of life, but they are very faithful.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are they honest, as a rule, where they have not been perverted?

Miss WETHERELL. I think they are.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are they good workmen?

Miss WETHERELL. Very.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are they inclined to quarreling and fighting, or are they peacefully inclined, as a rule?

Miss WETHERELL. The majority of them are peaceful.

Mr. KEARFUL. According to your observation and experience, what is the worst thing that has happened to Mexico?

Miss WETHERELL. The revolution.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you regard as the crime of Mexico?

Miss WETHERELL. Stoppage of production.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe that the material progress of the country depends upon the resumption of activities?

Miss WETHERELL. Absolutely.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that can be brought about under the present régime?

Miss WETHERELL. No; I think it can not be brought about under the present régime, because the money that they get is not put into the right channels, and they can not get the money. I do not think Mexico is being ruled at the present time for Mexico anyhow.

Mr. KEARFUL. For whom do you think it is being ruled?

Miss WETHERELL. I think it is the propagating ground for bolshevism against the United States, directly against the thing called the Monroe doctrine, to get it out of the way of their grasp of the western continent.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you observed any disposition on the part of officials in this Government to sympathize with that movement?

Miss WETHERELL. I think their sympathy has been altogether with it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe President Wilson has any sympathy with it?

Miss WETHERELL. I think so. I think he is—I may be wrong, but it seems to me that he has never intended to serve the United States as the United States. It has rested in his mind that the United States is the instrument for service to the world, which to him leads to internationalism, and internationalism means setting up a world dynasty. I think he sacrificed the 40,000 Americans in Mexico to that point, absolutely. The reason nothing has been heard about the Americans out of Mexico in the United States is that it would interfere with internationalism if the people of the United States knew what was being done. They had to be led by ways they did not know, else they would not have done it.

Mr. KEARFUL. The committee has been very much hampered by reluctance of people who have interests in Mexico refusing to testify, or evading the obligation to testify. What is the reason for that?

Miss WETHERELL. Well, I can understand that very well. There are several reasons. One is that they may be very much abused up here, in very slight ways, and the other is they may be equally abused in Mexico. They may be even refused admittance there, and their interests may be hampered.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is, reprisals will be visited upon them for telling the truth?

Miss WETHERELL. Exactly. In regard to my saying frankly what I do, it is because I have no ties, absolutely no ties. Had I ties, children, or anybody who could be harmed through what I say, I should not dare to say it.

Mr. KEARFUL. And as to yourself, having lost everything, you could not be harmed any more?

Miss WETHERELL. I have lost everything and it does not matter, and besides this one point must be made for the United States, because what has happened, or may happen, to Americans in Mexico should not be considered as a thing apart. How the United States decides that question will be the decision as to how she can conduct her commerce and trade in other parts of the world, because the world is going to judge her as she decides now.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think it is possible for any nation to extend its foreign trade without its citizens going into foreign countries?

Miss WETHERELL. Absolutely not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think it is possible for the citizens to go into foreign countries and conduct operations without being sure of protection of their country in case they are persecuted?

Miss WETHERELL. No, for two reasons; people are not going to be trusted if they have not got people back of them; they can not do anything.

Mr. KEARFUL. They will not be trusted?

Miss WETHERELL. They will not be trusted. The people of any country are going to trade with those who have the best standing, and if you have no country you have no standing.

Mr. KEARFUL. As a consequence of the policy that has been adopted toward Mexico, what is the standing of Americans down there?

Miss WETHERELL. The standing of the Americans there is still a pretty good standing, but the standing of America is not good. Now, do I make myself clear?

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean that individual Americans who have shown their good qualities are respected?

Miss WETHERELL. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. But America as a whole is not?

Miss WETHERELL. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. What about the British and the Germans? How are they regarded in Mexico, as nations?

Miss WETHERELL. The British had absolutely good standing, so far as I know, and at the present time I understand they are suffering about as much as the Americans are.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, you stated an instance of Americans being protected under the British flag, and by British officers.

Miss WETHERELL. At that time the British had splendid standing. At that time the British could say—in Huerta's day the British had absolute standing. In Diaz's time the Americans and British both had good standing—had absolute trust. In Madero's time it was true, too, and in Huerta's time it was true. There was just that specially few days when the Americans landed in Vera Cruz that Huerta failed.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have not heard any announcement made by the British Government that the British should get out of Mexico, and they were not entitled to the protection of their Government because they have been engaged in exploiting the Mexican people, have you?

Miss WETHERELL. No; I have not; and I wish to make a point there, and to do this best I am going to speak about oil. I am going to typify English oil by the use of the word "Cowdray," and I am going to typify American oil by using the word "Doheny."

Mr. KEARFUL. Those are the names of the two largest operators?

Miss WETHERELL. Those are the names of the two largest operators of that. And I want to say to the American people that when they fight their own interests abroad they fight for somebody else who is doing exactly the same thing that their people are doing, and neither one of them is doing at any particular time any more than the morality of the time admits. They are all acting pretty honestly; in fighting American oil they are advancing English oil, and if it were only English it would not matter so much, but it is not; it is everything else except Americans. They are slighting their own people, and they are not advancing the people of any country; they are only advancing other foreign interests.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean they are not advancing the Mexican people?

Miss WETHERELL. The Mexican people—it has nothing to do with the Mexican people one way or the other.

Mr. KEARFUL. In other words, the policy of nonprotection to Americans in Mexico merely benefits some other foreigners who are operating along the same lines?

Miss WETHERELL. Exactly. It is not a question of what it will do for the Mexican people at all; if it were, it would be quite another thing.

Mr. KEARFUL. You spoke of some forty thousand Americans having been sacrificed in Mexico to this policy. What do you believe has been the effect upon the Mexicans? What sacrifices have they suffered as a consequence?

Miss WETHERELL. Oh, they are practically exterminated. They are dying by thousands. An Englishman wrote to an American company—I do not know, about a year ago. He was managing things for an American company: "I will try again, but it is not likely that such an amount of money will be found in Mexico soon. You will pardon me for saying that you have your own Government to thank. Had they left Huerta alone"—not recognizing that was the American's own idea of efficiency—"and had they not hounded him out, your manager would have found some way to stay here and hold things together under any and all administrations."

Mr. KEARFUL. I believe that is all I care to ask. Is there any statement you wish to make?

Miss WETHERELL. I do not know that there is. I particularly would like if some way could be found to reach the people who, if they understood that the question is no longer, "What will we do for the Americans out of Mexico," or even the Mexicans themselves—the question is now, "What are we going to do to save our own Nation as a nation?" We must settle Mexico in order to do it. It can be done in no other way.

Mr. KEARFUL. You think that the condition in Mexico represents a real and immediate menace to our own security?

Miss WETHERELL. I do, and I was told last week that there were 10,000 Japanese colonists coming into Mexico every week—I do not swear that this is true—that they were all young, vigorous men. I know that the Germans are planning their next move against the United States through Mexico, and I know that was their primary object in the late war; if they could have grasped this continent, they would not have cared for anything else at present.

Mr. KEARFUL. And they expected to do that through Mexico?

Miss WETHERELL. They did. They expected it from the time the Madero revolution began.

Mr. KEARFUL. What reasons have you for thinking that?

Miss WETHERELL. I can not give the name of the person who told me, but I will give the instance.

Mr. KEARFUL. Very well.

Miss WETHERELL. I had a friend in Mexico, a very remarkable woman; I think she had some German in her own blood. She at least was Spanish, very largely, and her relatives, two cousins, three brothers and her father had been killed in that terrible time in Vera Cruz some years before I went into Mexico. She always spoke of Diaz as the old tyrant Diaz. She used to come, and very frequently on her way to her plantation she stayed over at our place, and always occupied my rooms, and in the small hours of the night she used to tell me many things.

Before the Madero revolution began she told me all about what was going to occur, and what was to come about, and that eventually the Germans would take, through Mexico, the Southern States that border on Mexico, and that they would set up a neutral kingdom between Mexico and the United States. I do not remember the details of it, but she told me over and over and over those same things for several years.

At the time we came out of Mexico in 1914, there was a large fort, practically impregnable, in the mountains above us, and it was generally reported by those who were where they could see, that several of the officers were blond-headed.

Mr. KEARFUL. They were Germans?

Miss WETHERELL. It was so supposed. I think that was very generally believed.

I was once on a train traveling in company with several Mexicans, and there was a priest with us. He came back into the car and said to us all, "Oh, I have the best news for you." We all said, "Well, what is it?" He said, "Why the plan is all finished; they are going to make Matamoros a station, and they will take Brownsville, and then they are going straight on through up to Washington; the whole thing is to be done right away."

Of course, this was very foolish.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what year did he say that?

Miss WETHERELL. It must have been in 1911. I said, "Well, Father Bruno, do you think that is good news for me?" and he looked at me and he said, "Oh, I beg your pardon; I forgot. I never think of you in those matters."

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there anything further you wish to say?

Miss WETHERELL. I think there is nothing more.

Mr. KEARFUL. Thank you very much.

(Whereupon, at 12.30 o'clock p. m. the committee adjourned.)

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., February 20, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the Subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

TESTIMONY OF MR. WILLIAM A. HORTON.

(The witness was duly sworn by Mr. Kearful.)

Mr. KEARFUL. State your full name.

Mr. HORTON. William A. Horton.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your present post-office address?

Mr. HORTON. Durant, Okla. Tampico, Mexico, if I go back there. I aim to.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did you leave Tampico?

Mr. HORTON. The 6th of February.

Mr. KEARFUL. Of this year?

Mr. HORTON. This year; yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you anticipate any difficulty getting back to Tampico?

Mr. HORTON. Yes; I feel that the Mexican authorities have been—that is, the consulates on the border have been notified not to pass any American coming out to give testimony in this hearing before this committee. That is published all over Mexico, the Mexican papers and also the San Antonio papers.

Mr. KEARFUL. And unless that attitude changes, or some action is taken to change it, you will probably be prevented from returning to Mexico for having appeared before the committee to testify to the truth?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What interests have you in Mexico?

Mr. HORTON. Why, I have a farm in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did you first go to Mexico?

Mr. HORTON. I went to Mexico early in January, 1907.

Mr. KEARFUL. For what purpose?

Mr. HORTON. Well, the real purpose then was in regard to my health. I had broken down in health, and was obliged to go south, so I went into Mexico for that purpose then.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you go there at any time for the purpose of making a home for yourself?

Mr. HORTON. It was my intention to have a winter home in Mexico and make my home in Oklahoma in the summer.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did you find conditions in Mexico with respect to security for life and property and travel when you went there?

Mr. HORTON. It appeared to be good; everything was nice and lovely, and Mexicans were agreeable and friendly; extremely so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Before you went to Mexico did you have any knowledge of inducements that were held out by the Mexican Government to American citizens to go there and invest their money and seek employment and establish themselves?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please describe that as near as you can remember it.

Mr. HORTON. Some time, three or four years before I went to Mexico, I received a communication or propaganda—

Mr. KEARFUL. You refer to a pamphlet?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; a pamphlet mailed at Washington. It was calling my attention to the possibilities of Mexico. It was an illustrated book, with pictures of products of Mexico, and everything pertaining to Mexico was illustrated, and it wound up, the last two or three pages were occupied with an appeal from the Mexican Government to the American people to come to Mexico with their money and their energy and thrift and intelligence, and so on, and develop the great resources of Mexico, signed by Porfirio Diaz, and his cabinet, and in that pamphlet was a small circular, I suppose 4 by 6 or 5 by 6 inches or something like that, purporting to be from the United States Government, Interior Department, asking the Americans to go to Mexico and investigate.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please state the substance, if you remember it.

Mr. HORTON. Well, the United States being desirous of extending the commerce of the country, was asking the American citizens to go to Mexico and investigate President Diaz's proposition to the American people. That is about the substance of it.

Mr. KEARFUL. By whom was that circular signed?

Mr. HORTON. By the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. KEARFUL. What became of the circular?

Mr. HORTON. Why, my office was burned, and I lost that with it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you been able to locate a copy of it since?

Mr. HORTON. No, sir; I have seen 16 of our neighbors who received the same correspondence, but they had not preserved it. I saw one of them the other day in Durant when I came through.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what sort of an envelope was this circular received?

Mr. HORTON. It was in something like that [indicating].

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it in a Government-franked envelope?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of other propaganda issued about the same time and subsequently on the part of the Mexican Government, and of statements made by American officials advising citizens to go to Mexico and invest there?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; that was very common in those days, propaganda from individuals and from companies, and all that I saw was indorsed by the Mexican authorities.

Mr. KEARFUL. The Mexican authorities or American authorities?

Mr. HORTON. American; the literature was always backed up by the Mexican authorities; that is, indorsed by them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember Mr. William Jennings Bryan making one or two trips to Mexico and returning to this country and giving glowing accounts of opportunities there for American citizens?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; I remember that. That was his opinion, that it was a good place for Americans to go for investments.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember subsequently, when Mr. Bryan was Secretary of State, that he took the position that American citizens who had been persecuted in Mexico were not entitled to any consideration because they were a lot of speculators who had gone there for the purpose of exploiting the peons?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; I remember that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember also what difficulties arose by reason of the action that was taken by the American Government while he was Secretary of State when he notified Americans to get out of Mexico?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you there at that time?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; I was there at that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where was your farm located?

Mr. HORTON. Twenty-five miles northwest of Tampico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please describe it.

Mr. HORTON. My farm is 3 miles out from the railroad on a mountain overlooking the Gulf of Mexico, 10 or 12 miles from the Gulf. My building place was on the mountain, and my land lies facing toward the Gulf in the valley. It is very rich, fertile land.

Mr. KEARFUL. How many acres?

Mr. HORTON. I have two hundred and some acres. Also 50 or 60 acres at another place, but this place is the one I am improving.

Mr. KEARFUL. What improvements did you place on it?

Mr. HORTON. Well, I cleared up 40 acres and put in 10 acres of orange grove, and later I developed until I have 100 acres in cultivation.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you buy this place?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Received full title to it?

Mr. HORTON. Said to be good title. I had the title examined and everybody that passed on it said it was perfectly good.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you pay a fair value for it?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you get any concession from the Mexican Government that gave you an advantage over anybody else?

Mr. HORTON. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were there any other Americans similarly located in the vicinity of your farm?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; there were about a hundred heads of families there.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of people were they?

Mr. HORTON. They were American citizens and all owned their homes and paid for them, and were developing their farms, getting along well.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were they classed as speculators, operating under concessions?

Mr. HORTON. No, sir; I never heard that until we had been there quite a while.

Mr. KEARFUL. From what source did you hear that was the class of Americans operating in Mexico?

Mr. HORTON. Well, it seems to have originated in the minds of our Government officials.

Mr. KEARFUL. How does that class of Americans who were your neighbors compare with American citizens in your home town of Durant, Okla., and other places in the United States?

Mr. HORTON. Well, I regarded the citizenship of that colony as over an average citizenship from the fact they were all home owners; there was not a renter in the colony; all owned their lands and lived at home.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do they do in reference to exploiting the Mexican peon?

Mr. HORTON. Well, their first effort to exploit the Mexican peon was to raise his wages from 25 or 30 cents up to one peso, Mexican dollar.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did they treat the Mexican people?

Mr. HORTON. They treated the Mexicans well and the Mexicans reciprocated; they treated us well.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there ever any feeling of antagonism or quarrelsomeness between them?

Mr. HORTON. None whatever.

Mr. KEARFUL. These Americans that were in that locality, were they law-abiding in every respect?

Mr. HORTON. Seemed to be; never heard of any trouble.

Mr. KEARFUL. Paid their taxes?

Mr. HORTON. Paid their taxes, and I supposed their debts; never heard any complaint of their citizenship.

Mr. KEARFUL. What has become of the colony now?

Mr. HORTON. Why, they are scattered out over the world; some one place and some another; some working for wages and some dead.

Mr. KEARFUL. Any of them still living there?

Mr. HORTON. No, sir; not a single member of the colony there now.

Mr. KEARFUL. Any of them there when you left?

Mr. HORTON. There was one man there when I left. I left the 10th of June and he left the 14th; came into Tampico.

Mr. KEARFUL. You and he were the last of the colony to leave?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What became of the farms and the improvements on them?

Mr. HORTON. Well, they were left in the hands of Mexican attendants. We had to leave them with somebody that was going to be on the place, and everybody who left left a Mexican on their place.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the conditions of the houses and other improvements?

Mr. HORTON. Well, the improvements were going down badly, and it is necessary to have somebody on the farms, so they all had a Mexican that they could sort of depend on to look after it. The man on my place had been there for 10 years. I left him and told him I was going away and I did not know when I would be back, and he would have to make his own living; I had been helping him and he was helping me; and I was going to leave until such time as I could come back without being molested on account of the bandits. He understood that I could not stay there on account of the operations of the bandits.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the reason for the colony breaking up and leaving?

Mr. HORTON. Well, one reason was it was visited by the bandits and robbed so often that they felt they would be killed next, when they got everything they had, and then Mr. Carranza put out a notice to the people in the country, on ranches, and so on, that they would have to move into the populous cities in order to get protection; they could not protect them where they were, so that was another cause.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did your first troubles begin?

Mr. HORTON. Our first troubles began shortly after the taking of Vera Cruz.

Mr. KEARFUL. By the American forces?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was April, 1914?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please describe what happened then.

Mr. HORTON. Well, up until then—we heard of trouble in the northern part of the Republic, but never had any trouble in Tamaulipas. We were getting along well, but immediately upon the arrival of the Carranza forces in the community we began to suffer indignities, and suffered robberies, our horses were stolen and taken, and they would come to the farmhouse and ask if we had certain things, and they would take them and ride off and not pay for them, and I asked them once if they were not going to pay for them. "No." I said, "Well, are you going to give a receipt for it?" "No," they said; "we are Mexicans, working for Mexico—fighting for Mexico"—that is it—"and you ought to be willing to contribute something to our support," or something to that effect.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were there any outrages committed by the Carrancista forces on the persons of the colonists?

Mr. HORTON. No, sir; not that year; not at that time. Only as I tell you, this robbery and stealing. In 1914 we were notified to come into Tampico and get out. We arrived in Tampico three days after the general exodus. They had to come through by the San Luis Potosi route and across into Chimal Colony and down the railroad to get to those colonies in there, and they told me there had been three or four different efforts made to get word to our colony from Tampico, and they had to come back.

Mr. KEARFUL. The name of this colony was Chimal.

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir. We made our way to Tampico.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was when you were notified by Mr. Bryan to get out of the country?

Mr. HORTON. To get out of the country, yes, sir; and we got to Tampico and made our boat. It was a stock boat that left there, so we left Tampico and landed at Galveston.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of a reception did you receive from the American authorities at Galveston?

Mr. HORTON. Well, we did not have any reception there. We were quarantined seven days out in the bay.

Mr. KEARFUL. What arrangement was made for sending the people to their homes?

Mr. HORTON. I think they were given tickets to continue their journey home. That is my recollection of it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that on condition they would declare themselves to be paupers, not able to buy their own tickets?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; I think that was the obligation they had to sign.

Mr. KEARFUL. What about the accommodations on the boat that brought the refugees out?

Mr. HORTON. Well, I could not say—it was a very filthy boat; it was a little boat and had been carrying stock; it was a very filthy boat, and we had the choice of lying down on the deck where we could.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it overcrowded?

Mr. HORTON. No, sir; it was not overcrowded. This was the last bunch that came out. There had been several thousand come out three or four days prior to that, but they could not get out. I did not know anything about it until three or four days after this trouble at Tampico. The Mexicans in Tampico, though, were very angry at the Americans then. When we got into Tampico, going down the street to the boat, I had gotten behind my bunch a few steps, and there was a Mexican who jumped out in the street before me; and I do not know where he got it, but he had an American flag in his hands; and he made one of the most vicious screams I ever heard and tore that flag to pieces and threw it down on the street and stamped on it, just like a wild animal, and turned and looked at me. Of course, I did not have any conversation with him. I turned and went on with my bunch. I was satisfied he had a knife with him.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was all due, was it not, to the action of the American Government in landing at Vera Cruz.

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; that was the cause of it.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are not familiar with the reasons for landing at Vera Cruz, are you?

Mr. HORTON. Well, nothing but what I read in the papers.

Mr. KEARFUL. Having been ordered out of Mexico, what induced you to go back there?

Mr. HORTON. Well, I got out home and stayed two or three months and returned in September from the fact that a great many returned, and they said there was no danger, everything was quiet and all right; so a great many of us went back and remained there for quite a while, for several months.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was while Huerta was still in power?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know whether Huerta took measures to protect Americans?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; I know that to be a fact. Huerta had a garrison at Columbus and other places out from Tampico 30 or 35 miles, or something like that; and Huerta soldiers and Huerta officials visited my place often, and some of those Huerta officials spoke English all right, and they told me that they had strict orders from Mr. Huerta to protect and respect all American people.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did any of the Huerta forces commit any depredations or robberies?

Mr. HORTON. No, sir. Anything they wanted from me they came and asked me for it and asked me what it was worth and paid for it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did the Carranza officials ever do anything of that kind?

Mr. MORTON. No, sir; they just came and took possession of whatever they wanted.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, then, proceed to describe your subsequent experiences after you returned.

Mr. HORTON. Let me see. After my return. That brings us up to 1914. I returned in September, 1914. Well, I remained there under the Huerta rule until the Carrancistas came in, but in the meantime I had started to making another crop, and conditions got bad and we were ordered out again in 1915, in June.

Mr. KEARFUL. Ordered by whom?

Mr. HORTON. By the United States Government, and we went out again in 1915. That time we went out on the Cyclops, the collier, and I had made arrangements before going out to put in an onion crop, so it developed, and I went back in August and had that onion crop planted and several of my neighbors had onion crops. That is quite an enterprise in our colony. We developed this onion crop and in April following it was ready for shipment. We began shipping, or trying to ship, onions to Tampico, and that was cut off, the railroad was torn up, so we could not ship.

Then, our next recourse was to go to the Tamezi River, 10 miles, and ship it down in barges to Tampico, and some few of my neighbors got shipments out that way, so the colony hauled their onions 10 miles to the Tamezi River and stacked them up there waiting for barges to come up and get them, and there got to be 100,000 crates on the bank of the river, 10 miles away from the colony. The road had been torn up and the Carranza authorities then placed an embargo on the barges coming up the river, so our onions lay there on the bank of the river, over 100,000 crates, after having been hauled 10 miles.

That was an act of the Carranza authorities, tearing up the railroads first. They said they did not want this stuff shipped out of the country. That was the excuse.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it possible to get shipments made by paying money to the officials?

Mr. HORTON. No, sir. We tried every way. It seemed to be a retaliation, or an effort to prevent the Americans from making anything in Mexico. That has been the rule of that Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. An attitude of antagonism toward Americans?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; absolutely.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did you get out the second time under orders from the State Department?

Mr. HORTON. The second time was in 1915. This time I am speaking about, we came out, and I went back in the winter—I spent my winters down there at my own risk—I went back and had this crop developed and tried to market it, so after that I abandoned trying to raise anything in that line that necessitated shipping, and afterwards I just ran the stuff in corn and beans, that were staple articles, and were in demand all the time. I have an orange grove and grapefruit. I suppose there are several carloads of grapefruit lying on the ground now rotting because I can not get them to market.

Mr. KEARFUL. After having come out the second time under orders, you went back again?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What time was that?

Mr. HORTON. Well, that was after we had notice that conditions were all right, Carranza had been recognized, and we went back there with the understanding that everything would be all right and Americans would be protected; that was the cause of our return that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was about October, 1915?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; as I remember it; we had assurance of this Government and also the assurance of the Mexican Government, that we would be protected and respected, so we went back, a great many of us.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that assurance fulfilled?

Mr. HORTON. No, sir; we have been suffering ever since. There have been more or less depredations going on all the time. The first effort they have made in order to turn the banditry loose was to deprive the Americans of their guns. The Carranza officials, they would take the guns from the Americans, and the Mexicans, of course, they claimed to deprive the Mexicans of their guns, but they did not, of course; the Mexicans could secrete their guns, but the Americans that had guns, the Mexican authorities knew it, and they would make a demand for a gun and they had a description of it, and they took it from you.

Mr. KEARFUL. Leaving you at the mercy of the Mexican bandits?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then what happened to the colony?

Mr. HORTON. Well, the colony began to drop off, members of the colony began to drop off, and in 1916 there were only a few there.

Mr. KEARFUL. How were they treated?

Mr. HORTON. They were treated rough by the Mexicans, and in 1916 we had another order to get out, and I was on my way down to the station to see when there would be a train along and I met one of my neighbors coming up, and he told me they had killed Stovall, and I said, "Who killed Stovall?" And he said, "The Mexicans."

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was Stovall?

Mr. HORTON. A. J. Stovall, the man murdered on the 20th of April, 1916, by Mexican robbers.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was he a member of your colony?

Mr. HORTON. I went on down and I went to Stovall's house, going on down I met a bunch of men going up that way, and I went on with them and went to Stovall's house, and he was dead. We went on up then, to look at the house where Mrs. Stovall was, and I felt that I should go on up to see her, and they stopped at Mrs. Stovall's, so I got up there and found Mrs. Stovall there sitting in a chair something like this, clothes bloody, and the little baby a couple of months old, and its clothes were bloody, and she looked up at me and she says, "Doctor, what on earth am I going to do"? Of course I was shocked, and I studied a little while, and then I took the matter up with her and talked with her about it, and she showed me his books—she told me all about the robbers coming in; she was washing dishes and Mr. Stovall had gone down to the post office to get the mail, and they came in and asked for a drink of water, got the drink of water and one of them caught her by the hand and said, "We came after money," and he had a machetta in the other hand, and told her if she did not give them the money they were going to kill her. She told them where all of the money was, and presently Mr. Stovall came in and he tried to release her, and they got after him and hit him in the face with their machetes and they asked him then—told him to tell them where his money was and he refused to do it; she went around and threw her arms around him and begged him to tell them where the money was and save his life, but he refused to do it, and so she held the little baby here in one arm, and had this other arm around Stovall, and they shot Stovall under her arm there.

They had cut him on the face—that is where the blood came from on her and the baby—and after they had fatally wounded him, they told him, "Now, if you do not tell us where the money is we are going to kill your wife and child"; so he decided to tell them, and, by her assistance, he went out into the yard and showed where he had some money buried and went back to go to the bed, and on the way he sank down and called his wife to get his ledger, his book, and he was trying when he died to show her about his affairs. There were bloody finger prints on the paper and leaves of the book. He was trying to show her before he got too far gone about his affairs and how his affairs were. She thought he had some money buried and was trying to show her that, but he failed before he could do it.

Then, on the 22d I went to Tampico and came out in 1916.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did you go back to Mexico again?

Mr. HORTON. I went back in August, 1917. I was out 12 or 14 months that time. I spent the winter at Laredo.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know a man named Correll, who was murdered in that locality?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; that was after I went back in 1917.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did Correll come to the colony?

Mr. HORTON. He came to the colony in May.

Mr. KEARFUL. What year?

Mr. HORTON. May or June of 1919, and he was out in the colony looking around with a view to purchasing, and he heard of me and remembered me. He and I had been neighbors in the Choctaw Nation 25 or 30 years ago, so he came over to see me, came to my place and told me that he had heard of me and he knew me and wanted me to advise him—knew I would advise him right, and I said I would. He told me what he wanted; he wanted to buy land; told me what he wanted, and I told him there were just such lands as that in the country, but I said: "Mr. Correll, I am going to advise you not to buy anything." He said: "Why?" I said, "Well, now, you know that the country is full of robbers and bandits, and you are not acquainted with the conditions and customs in this country, and if I did not have my investment here I would not be here. I am thinking seriously now of going into Tampico"—as I did—"and abandoning my place. There is nothing else for me to do," and I asked him if he had not seen the note that I wrote out to my friends and neighbors in Oklahoma? He said he had not, but he had heard of it, and he said, "I went up to consult my Congressman at Ada"—he was living at Ada at that time—"and my Congressman told me that conditions in Mexico were all right, that Americans were respected and protected on account of the report that Mr. Fletcher made when he came out in January"—I think it was January, 1919.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember the substance of what Mr. Fletcher reported at that time?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; I remember in substance about what he reported, that Mexico was progressing nicely, law and order were being established, and the railroads were being improved, and that the Americans were respected and protected, their rights and interests, and their lives were safe in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have reason to believe that Mr. Fletcher was not telling the truth when he made those statements?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; I know he was not telling the truth. He might have told the truth about the part where he was, in Mexico City, but it was not the case in the interior, anywhere that you could hear from.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think Mr. Fletcher knew the actual conditions in the interior?

Mr. HORTON. I reckon he certainly did not or he would not have made that report.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think it possible for an American ambassador, having connections with all of the American consuls throughout Mexico, not to know the conditions in the interior?

Mr. HORTON. It does not look like it would be possible.

Mr. KEARFUL. So that Mr. Correll took the advice of his Congressman, who got his information from Mr. Fletcher?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; he asked Congressman McGowan, he said, "What about this Horton note that came out here some time ago?" He said, "Well, now, Horton is just sore about something down there." That is what Mr. Correll told me. He said, "Mr. Fletcher would not have made a false report on the conditions down there." I said, "If you are going to take their advice after coming to me for advice, you have my permission." Well, in less than 30 days I had to bury Mr. Correll.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he reject your advice and go on and locate?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; he purchased in another settlement.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please describe what you know about the murder of Correll and the treatment of his family.

Mr. HORTON. As I remember, it was the seventh day of June. The papers got it the sixth.

Mr. KEARFUL. 1919?

Mr. HORTON. 1919. As I remember it, it was the seventh. Anyway, my Mexican went to the station that morning and came back about 9 or 10 o'clock and told me he heard guns firing down in that direction, and Mr. Smith's boy came along about that time, and my automobile was down at Mr. Smith's at that time. I told him to go back and get it and we would go down to Colonia. I was uneasy about Colonia, so on arriving at Colonia, Mr. Smith's place, Mrs. Correll was sitting here on the porch and Mr. Smith here and Mrs. Correll over here, and I walked in and shook hands with Mrs. Smith, and I said, "Scared you out, have they?" kind of joking. She said, "Yes." I shook hands with Mrs. Smith and Mr. Smith. Mr. Smith said, "You knew they killed the old man?" I said, "What old man?" He said, "Mr. Correll." I said, "Why, no." Of course, I did not know it.

Well, he said they killed him and outraged Mrs. Correll, several of the men had. She told me all about it, and I was shocked to have come in jollying them, like a person does, you know. So we waited a while for some word, and we got word before we could get Mr. Smith up there, so we started out for the Correll home, which was about 2 miles away, and we got down there and avoided the scene in the house where Mr. Correll had been killed. They had shot him from the outside. He had knocked one of them backwards and afterwards they shot him through the breast, and then they came in and shot him through the head, gave him a mercy shot. There was where he died.

While this was going on Mrs. Correll ran out and hid herself in the closet, and they went out and committed those outrages on her after they had killed Correll.

Joe Correll ran out and they shot at him and very near got him, but just glanced on the neck, and another fellow that was there got out and got away to the jungles.

Well, we went down and made a search for Mrs. Correll and found her out in the jungles, so we went down to get Mr. Correll's body and take it out, and there were two Germans that helped to put the box on the truck, and they rode up the road about a quarter of a mile and came back alone, going off to the west. They dropped off and went home. They would not go and help bury the old man. Those Germans in there had never been disturbed.

Mr. KEARFUL. The Germans were well treated and not disturbed at all, you say?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; that was my information. There were three or four German families that have never been molested in any way.

Mr. KEARFUL. And they are still there?

Mr. HORTON. Still there.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you know about other colonies of Americans in that portion of the country?

Mr. HORTON. Well, I was in the colony above, the Atascadora Colony before Christmas, and there were no Americans in there, but the family that we visited there met us at their home, and we stayed there three or four days, around Christmas, and hunted and fished and so on, and went back and the people all left the place; when he left they left too. There were four or five of us went out from Tampico. They claim there are no Americans living in the Atascadora now; I am told there are none there.

At the Chimal, there may be some Americans there. I do not know. I have heard there were three or four young men there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Generally speaking, are the Americans in the other colonies not treated pretty much the same as they were in your colony?

Mr. HORTON. That has been my information; yes, sir. There have been no exceptions to the rule; they have all been robbed and murdered and driven out and insulted and treated badly.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know whether many of these Americans had all that they had in the world in those places?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; I know of that. There were several in 1910, four or five men from Colonia Colony, had their crops started and were counting on leaving, and when I went into Tampico they asked me to make an effort to get passes for them out, and I went to the consul there and advised him about it, and he said they had no business coming back there. I said, "Well, they are there and they need assistance to get out." Well, he repeated it, that they had no business coming back there. He said, "I will write up to Washington about it." I said, "No; you telegraph about it. This is an emergency and they are there subject to be murdered any time." It was bad, then; worse than ever.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was the time of the Pershing expedition?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; and I went in two or three times before I got away. I had to wait three or four days for the boat I was going out on, so I visited the consul there every day and he kept telling me he had not heard anything yet, but after I got out I heard they had made some deal with some Mexicans up there; that they got money enough to get up to the border.

Mr. KEARFUL. They did not go by reason of any assistance from the American Government?

Mr. HORTON. No, sir; they happened to find some Mexican that would buy their prospective crop, and they got money enough to get out on; four or five of them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did any of them ever make any application to the American Government for protection?

Mr. HORTON. For protection?

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever apply to the American Government for protection for yourself in Mexico?

Mr. HORTON. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Why did you not?

Mr. HORTON. Well, I was advised that you need not ask the American Government for protection; that Americans remaining in Mexico or returning there need not look to the American Government for protection. That was Mr. Bryan, I believe.

Mr. KEARFUL. You had been invited to go there, and after the recognition of Carranza had been invited to return?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; we saw that in the newspaper; that was the notice to people remaining in Mexico, or returning there; that they need not look to the United States Government for protection, whatever disaster happened to them.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you observe to be the effect upon the Mexican people of American enterprise in Mexico?

Mr. HORTON. The immediate effect of the invasion of Vera Cruz was to change the nature of the Mexican—his attitude toward the American.

Mr. KEARFUL. I did not mean the invasion; I mean the effect of the American business enterprise and the American farmers going in there.

Mr. HORTON. Oh, it was healthy; it was to the advantage of the Mexican.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what respect? What was the custom of the Mexicans in farming and working the lands?

Mr. HORTON. Well, when we went to Mexico the most of the Mexicans wore sandals or went barefooted, and had the commonest kind of clothes, and they knew very little about farming, except their primitive tools, such as the wooden plow and the machete, and they were working for a pittance—25 or 30 centavos a day—and the advance in the price of wages was a stimulus to the Mexican, and they tried to imitate American ways, and a great many of them undertook to farm, and did farm, and they got to using the improved implements, wearing pretty good clothes—American-made clothes and shoes.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were about to describe the effect of the American invasion and interference in Mexican affairs.

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir. The conditions changed immediately. The Mexicans were stubborn, and seemed to be insulting, and they would not work, did not want to work for Americans after that, and insulted them.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the natural characteristic of the Mexican lower classes? Are they naturally quarrelsome and bloodthirsty?

Mr. HORTON. No, sir; they were not. They were very gentle and nice and agreeable up until the last two or three years. If they work for you they will insult you, they are independent and contrary, and they are not afraid to insult you, or not afraid to take issue with you, or dispute your word, or anything of that kind. They used to, when we first went there and up until this condition came about, if a Mexican came to your house he would take off his hat and come up and ask you for whatever he wanted. If he wanted work he would ask you if you had any work for him, and show that he respected you, but now a Mexican will come to your house and he will walk right in and sit down.

Mr. KEARFUL. And if he wants anything he takes it?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. From your observation and experience in Mexico, what do you think is the basis of the Carranza revolution and the Carranza Government?

Mr. HORTON. I think the basis of the whole thing is robbery and depriving the citizens of their possessions. That seems to be the intention of it. Now, you have got me up to 1918, where I can begin to tell you how I have been treated in the last two or three years.

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes; proceed.

Mr. HORTON. In June, 1918, the Carranza authorities came to the station of Columbus and sent an order out to me to send my guns into them, and I did so. They knew I had two guns, so I sent those guns. I had another, however, that they did not know about. They sent an order for the two they knew I had. I sent them in. The order was accompanied with the threat that if I did not send them they would send men out there after them, so I might just as well send them.

Well, later on—they had me disarmed, and in August they returned again. They heard I had another gun, and they returned again, two big six-foot tall Mexicans came running up to me with their guns presented and they said, "You have another gun here." I said, "Well, you ought to know." "You get that gun." They described the gun, and had their guns on me. I said, "Who are you, anyhow?" They said, "We are Carrancistas." I said, "If there is a gun about that house you are welcome to it."

I was sitting down on the steps, and I said, "If there is a gun about that house you are welcome to it. You just make your search," but they would not go in the house to make the search, but they walked in past me; one walked in this way and one in this way, up on the porch. I was sitting down on the porch, and one up on this side and the other over here, and they threw the cartridges out of their 30-30's and inspected them very carefully and stuck them back in the guns, inspected them very carefully. I looked up. I was a little scared, too. But, anyway, they got their ammunition inspected and turned their guns toward me and said, "Now, you get that gun."

I said, "Well, I told you I had no gun in this house." I was careful not to turn around, because I was a little afraid they were going to kill me. They would throw their guns down, and they said, "You have a gun here, and we have got to have it." I said, "Well, you ought to know; I do not."

So, after a little the captain came up and said, "Doctor, have you got a gun here?" I said, "Captain, I have told these men if there is a gun about that house they are perfectly welcome to it. There is the house and the door is open," and he told them to come on, let's go; and he returned in a few minutes, 5 or 10 minutes, and they still had their guns on me, and asked me again. I told them the same thing, and he returned to the gate.

In the meantime the old man that was working my place came up and he asked him what about it, if I had a gun, and he said, "He has not; no, sir." He said, "I have known him for 10 years, and I have never known him to tell a lie."

He came back then and told them to come on. They said, "No, sir; he has got a gun, and we are going to have it before we leave here," and he got out and ordered the balance of the men to march. They got on their horses, and these two fellows went down and went off. So that proved I had no gun.

Then, on the 18th of September the bandits came to my house. Then I had a real experience of 16 to 1. There were 16 of them to 1 of me, and I looked up—I was in the corral, and I heard a noise and looked up and saw a bunch of men at the gate. They were hurrying to get the gate open. They were on horses, and one came riding up to me and said, "Come here." I said, "All right, in a minute." He said, "No; come now." I said, "Well, I want to finish this." He said, "No; come right on now."

I said, "All right," and laid my hammer and staples upon a post and walked up to him. He said, "What time is it?" I pulled out my watch and told him what time it was, and he said, "Give me that watch." I said, "You are not going to take my watch?" He said, "Yes; I am going to take your watch." I said, "Who are you?" He said, "We are Villistas." I told him I was not afraid of Villistas; I had been told they were fine people. He threw his gun down on me and told me to give up that watch. I said I guessed I wouldn't give him the watch; I did not think he was going to take it, but he did. About that time it sounded like a bunch of horses in my house, and so I went around there and looked in, and the whole bunch was in there; they had my papers and everything, searching the trunks, and they took everything I had or everything that was of any use to them and a great many things that could not possibly be of any use to them. They had the little surgical instrument case and the medicine case, and they took them, a pocket emergency medicine case, needles and thread, and razors, and, in fact, everything, soap and everything of that kind.

Then they got my gun that I had refused to give to the Carrancistas before. That was in the house under the mattress, and they took all of my clothes. I did not even have a change of clothes. So I went to Tampico then with what clothes I had on and made a report to the consul there. They had taken my hat and shoes and everything, and I just went down there in my old working clothes; had to.

The consul told me to go back home and write a report—that is, the clerk told me to go back home and write a report to the consul stating all of the facts in the case; so I did that, and on the 7th of January, then, the bandits returned again. I had got some cotton checks and had made some pants and a change of suits, so when they came back in January I had on one of those suits, and they took the other, and everything else I had, everything I had in the house, provisions and everything, cleaned me up that time, so I went to Mr. Smith and told him, and then at last this Correll matter came up, and I went into Tampico and have been there ever since, but after I went into Tampico I went and consulted Gen. Gonzales, and he could not do anything for me.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was he?

Mr. HORTON. He was the general in command there. A few days after I went into Tampico I saw the bandits had come in and surrendered, and then I saw Gen. Gonzales and he told me, "Now, you can go back to the farm; no more danger up there; Aguilera came in and surrendered and all of his men, so you need not be afraid to go back."

I said, "Well, if Aguilera is going to be good, he has on him my watch. Could you get him to give it back to me? I would like to have my watch." He said, "No; I could not do that." He said, "We have promised amnesty, they would not be bothered for anything they have already done."

The next time I saw Gen. Gonzales he told me about having the Correll murderers in custody, and that they had confessed to the crime and to the outrages on Mrs. Correll. There were five of them, he said, and the only excuse was that the other one committed it first, each one accused the other of committing this crime first, and he said they were going to be executed for it, and I told the general, "I would like, not that I care to see anyone executed, but I would like to see those men executed, so I can tell my people when I go back home—" I was acquainted with the family—"that those men were executed for that crime." He shrugged his shoulders and said he could not do that. He offered to give me their pictures, but he never did that, and I never heard of them being executed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you get any satisfaction from the American authorities with respect to the statement that you wrote out at the instigation of the consul?

Mr. HORTON. They acknowledged receipt of that, and then in January I made another report. He always told me to find out who it was in those raids, and so I came back the second time and made out a report and told him I could not tell who it was. I insisted on them telling me and they would not tell me. I supposed they were part of that 15,000,000 men fighting for their liberty. He answered that by saying he supposed that I was aware, like the other Americans, there was very little hope of relief.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who told you that?

Mr. HORTON. His letter in answer to my report to the consul.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you observe any indications of cooperation between the Carrancistas and the so-called bandits in that region?

Mr. HORTON. Now, what I formed my conclusions from is the fact that these bandits came in and surrendered, they brought in this stock, the horses and cattle that they had taken from the settlements; they brought that in and surrendered that also, and I was told that there was as pretty a bunch of horses coming into Tampico as ever came in there, and the general said, "If you have any stock in that bunch you go out there and look at them as soon as they can get so you can see them." I could do that in about a day or two, and about the third day he told me I could go out and examine them and he told me if there was anything there I could identify he would see that I got it.

I went out to the corral and there were 30 or 40-old crippled mules and sore backs, and such as that; there was not a mule that an ordinary man would lead home for him.

So, this fine bunch of horses they shipped to Mexico City or San Luis Potosi, or down in there.

The same way with several hundred head of cattle that were in a pasture there at the same time. They selected the shipping stuff, the cattle that was fit to ship, and then they sent word in to the ranchers to come in and identify the stuff. One man told me there he could identify some of the cattle, but he said, "I was not going to go out; they had guards all along the line, and I was not going to try to drive any cattle around there." He said the brands were burned so you could not tell the brands, but he knew the marks on a great many of the animals that were in there, but he said he was not going to undertake it, and this several hundred were shipped to Mexico City from a place out 10 miles west of Tampico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did the actions of the Carrancista leaders indicate to you that they really desired to form a government?

Mr. HORTON. They have aimed and talked like they were very anxious to have these bandits come in and surrender and get matters quieted, but after they surrendered they were soldiers, and these peons have ranches now; these fellows I am telling you about have all been peons, but they all have ranches now.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where did they get the ranches?

Mr. HORTON. Why, they are able to buy anything. There was Luis Salis, shipped 700 head of this stock to Mexico City I was telling you about.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are speaking of Carranza generals and other officers of the army?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; and the main officials in the army. This fellow, Aguilera, who was wearing my watch, they made him a colonel for that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Because they had granted him amnesty, they thought it would not be proper to make him return the watch that he had stolen?

Mr. HORTON. Yes. I felt if he were going to be good he certainly would return my watch.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think those leaders who are making money in that way really want to establish order?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. They went to establish order and security and protection to the people there?

Mr. HORTON. Oh, no; they do not want order. They want it to just get by; that is all. That kind of condition just satisfies that bandit element.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is what they thrive on?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; that is what they thrive on. I noticed some time ago where a Mexican had bought a $75,000 property in San Antonio. That was a peon down there in our settlement years ago.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where did he get the money?

Mr. HORTON. He got it from the people that had been robbed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Had you had any conversations with Mexicans indicating their present attitude toward Americans?

Mr. HORTON. No, sir; not for quite a while. In 1915 I was waiting for the train to come along and an old man who had been on my place came to me and asked what I was going to do. I told him I was just going out because conditions were bad. He said he did not blame us, and he said, "We can kill you and you have not any Government to protect you. We can kill you and there will be nothing done about it." That was an expression from a peon.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that is the general sentiment among them?

Mr. HORTON. Yes; that seems to be the general sentiment now, that they are not afraid to kill Americans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think they have the same attitude toward the British and the Germans?

Mr. HORTON. It does not seem so; no, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did you last come out of Mexico?

Mr. HORTON. The sixth day of this month. I got out the eighth, crossed the line.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any difficulty in getting out?

Mr. HORTON. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please describe your experiences with the American officials down there.

Mr. HORTON. I had quite a little trouble getting started, but I did not have any trouble getting out. I went to our consul there and presented my old passports.

Mr. KEARFUL. At Tampico?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; at Tampico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is his name?

Mr. HORTON. Claude I. Dawson. I went in and handed my passport to the clerk there and he looked over it and asked me some questions about when I wanted to go out, and so on. He got up and went in to where Mr. Dawson was and handed it to him and they had a consultation over it, and Mr. Dawson come in to where I was and I got up and met him, and he said, "What is it you want to do?" I said, "I want an emergency passport to go out." He said, "Well, when did you want to go?" I said, "I want to go in a day or two."

He said, "Why have you not been here and registered?" I told him I had been there to register and he would not let me because I did not have my passport with me, and I told him I had been registered for years, anyhow. He said, "You are not registered here under this new system." I said, "I don't know anything about any new system, but I tried to register and you would not let me."

Mr. KEARFUL. There was no question about your being an American citizen?

Mr. HORTON. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. You had your old passport?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir; I had an old passport that had expired, and I thought that was sufficient to show I was an American citizen and wanted to go out.

He said, "What has got you in such a hurry to go out?" I said, "Well, I was requested to come up to testify before the Fall Committee." He said, "Where are you going? To El Paso?" I said, "No; they want me to come up to Washington." He said, "Well, I have decided that I will not issue any more emergency passports." I said, "You have decided it?" He said, "Yes; I have decided." I said, "You turn me down?" He said, "Yes, sir; I turn you down."

Mr. KEARFUL. Was his manner or method of speaking such as to indicate that he had received instructions from the Government in regard to that?

Mr. HORTON. Well, he seemed to be—he was not in a good humor, you see, naturally, the way he talked to me, so I left him that way. Then he stated, or said, "I have decided to not issue any more passports."

Mr. KEARFUL. You know, of course, it is not a matter for him to decide about issuing passports?

Mr. HORTON. I did think so, and I repeated, and I said, "You have decided?" He said, "Yes."

So, we came on to Monterrey. I told the gentleman that came out with me, a service man—and he said, "I will go up and see if I can arrange it," and he went up there in his officer's uniform. He was going out in the morning so he said, "I will go on up and look the matter up on the border." I said, "No, I will go right on with you; I am not going to stay here now, when my Government treats me like that; I am going to the border whether I go across or not," so we went on up to Monterrey the next day, and we went before the consul at Monterrey, Mr. Fitzsimmons, and he gave me about such a lecture as Mr. Dawson did, only he qualified it by saying he was sorry he could not be of any service to me. He said, "I have my instructions and I have to follow them," and he said, "You should have registered at the nearest consulate." He said, "I can not do anything for you."

This gentleman that was with me, then, said, "Now, I want to ask you, Mr. Fitzsimmons, how is this: Here is an American citizen who shows you his passport and you say it has expired, but he is afraid to live on his farm and you refuse to permit him to go out into his own country. Now, I want to ask you why it is that you issue emergency passports to these Mexicans here in Monterrey in time of trouble, when there is danger for them in Monterrey, you give them passports to go to the border, to Texas." He said, "Well, gentlemen, I will admit that is a just criticism, but I have my orders and I am sorry I can not do anything for you." So we left him just that way.

Well, we went to Nuevo Laredo that night, got there about 4 o'clock, got a bed and in the morning this army fellow told me he would go up there and get our baggage and bring it down and cross the river, and I would go back down and see what I could do about getting across the river. I went down a couple of blocks from the bridge and I noticed a nice little new town sprung up there, and I sauntered around in that a little bit and got my breakfast and lit my pipe and sauntered off down toward the bridge, and I got out about the middle of the bridge—I paid my fare, however, on the other side, the Mexican side, 5 cents, to go across—so I walked on across, and about the middle of the bridge I discovered the Stars and Stripes floating there on the other side and I stopped and looked at that a little while, and I saw a yellow flag alongside of it, indicating that was the quarantine station, and when I got up and was just passing the quarantine office there was a Mexican, a young fellow, nice-looking fellow, says, "Come in here," I walked in, and he says, "I want to see your vaccination mark." Well, I showed it to him and he said, "You are all right; you can pass," so I just walked out and walked across the sidewalk and stood there smoking a little while, and walked on up to the immigration office and stood there and looked in and then walked around and just fooled around there for 5 or 10 minutes and nobody paid any attention to me, so I just walked on up toward town and then came on to San Antonio.

Well, I found there were no restrictions on the border, but they are very severe at Tampico and Monterrey.

Mr. KEARFUL. Perhaps on the border they had not heard that American citizens, who had been outraged in Mexico, were coming here to testify before the Fall committee.

Mr. HORTON. I reckon not; I suppose that had something to do with it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you any opinion that you care to give to the committee in regard to what ought to be done for the protection of American citizens in Mexico, and to put Mexico on a firm basis?

Mr. HORTON. Well, I had always, up until a certain time, been of the opinion that meddling in Mexico was wrong for the American Government. I always thought it was wrong, and believed when they did meddle that they ought to have carried it out. That meddling in Mexico is what has created so much of this discontent, this animosity toward the American people and caused so many murders there, this meddling, coming in and getting out, and meddling in Mexican affairs. The proper thing to have done, if they were going to meddle at all, would have been to meddle in a decided way, because every time we meddle with their affairs, that aggravates them that much more. Up until the Carranza forces took charge of Mexico, I was against intervention in any way, because we were being protected and prospering and getting along well, but after that occurred and Carranza was recognized, under the policy of Mexico for Mexicans, known to us and known to everybody, that was his slogan, Mexico for Mexicans, that was his policy, and he was determined to carry it out, and he has been carrying it out all the way through.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, this slogan "Mexico for Mexicans"—does it mean that the property of foreigners in Mexico is for the Mexicans?

Mr. HORTON. Certainly; get the foreigners out. Their every calculation is to get all of the property for the Mexicans and after that time came and conditions were such as they were everybody felt there was only one thing to do.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is that?

Mr. HORTON. That is intervention.

Mr. KEARFUL. What form do you think that ought to take?

Mr. HORTON. A form necessary to establish Government in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is there in Mexico to build on by way of establishing a Government of Mexicans?

Mr. HORTON. There is nothing. There is no hope of establishing any Government in Mexico by Mexicans.

Mr. KEARFUL. I mean that with outside assistance, what element is there that can be depended on?

Mr. HORTON. According to the past three or four years there would not be any hope of that, even with assistance from the outside. They have not got the force; they have not got the men to do it. They only have one thing in view, and that is getting what the other fellow has got.

Mr. KEARFUL. You spoke about effective interference for protection of Americans. Do you have in mind any incident with respect to President Roosevelt?

Mr. HORTON. Now, we would have saved a great deal of trouble in Mexico with a policy of that kind. When I first went to Mexico and walked out on the plaza with a friend down there, before I could speak Spanish, and he was showing me around, there were little circulars around on the seats in the plaza, and I picked up one of them and I asked, "What is this?" He said, "That is a decree from President Diaz to the Mexican people in Mexico." He said, "This is about the substance of it: I can not read all of it, but I will tell you the meaning of it—'Any Mexican found guilty of raising a disturbance with Americans after this certain date of a certain month, the penalty will be death,' and that is signed Porfirio Diaz."

Now, this was a result of a little telegram that Mr. Roosevelt sent to President Diaz, growing out of the Cananea massacre and other incidents. The Cananea massacre was submitted to Secretary Root and he reported that he saw no way to interfere except in a diplomatic way. That was his report to Mr. Roosevelt, so later there were some murders going on in Mexico City, and Mr. Roosevelt was appealed to again, and Mr. Roosevelt just stepped over to the telegraph office and wrote out a little telegram to President Diaz, "If you do not take care of my people down there I will," and signed it and sent it to him, and this decree now was the result of that little telegram—so this gentleman explained it to me on the plaza.

Mr. KEARFUL. How do you think the Mexicans now would treat such a telegram from our President?

Mr. HORTON. They would think he meant it.

Mr. KEARFUL. From President Wilson?

Mr. HORTON. No; they would not believe it from him, because they say we would not do so; he is just a bluff, but had he done that in the beginning of his administration I believe everything would have been all right in Mexico, property and conditions all right.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you anything to say about the policy of eliminating Huerta and imposing Carranza upon Mexico?

Mr. HORTON. Yes; I think that was the greatest calamity—it was just the ending of Mexico, eliminating Huerta, having known the conditions during his reign; he was respecting and protecting the people, and in towns or cities that you would go into under the control of Huerta—you could go to Monterrey and law and order existed there, go into Tampico and it was the same way, and you take Monterrey after Villa and Carranza took charge of it; they made corrals and stables out of the best hotels in the city. There is the Royal Hotel across the street from where I stopped when I was in Monterrey, boarded up now; they told me they would not return until conditions were so they could; a fine building just boarded up about 8 feet high all around with planks. Villa had used the bottom part of it for his horses and used the upper stories for his officers and men, and they have not repaired it since.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was Villa at that time Carranza's principal general?

Mr. HORTON. Yes, sir. The same way I was advised at Victoria, the best building in the city was taken by the Villistas and Carrancistas—all the same—and the best buildings in the city were made stables for the horses, and quarters for the soldiers, and the occupants were run out. No law and order.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you observe to be the general aspect of the country recently as compared with what it was during the time of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. HORTON. In passing over the country regions that used to be covered with stock of all kinds—horses, cattle, sheep, goats, and hogs—you do not see any cattle or horses now; they are all gone, and there is no farming going on.

Now, it was reported from the Mexican Government that they have farming going on as a rule and improvements. There is no farming going on at all; the farmers are all in the cities. There are very few Mexicans along the railroad, just a few at each little station.

Mr. KEARFUL. How do the people in the country live?

Mr. HORTON. I do not have any idea how they do live. They are not farming. Of course, they hunt, some of them, and they gather wild vegetables of different kinds, but I do not have any idea how they are living. The whole area from Tampico up, there is no farming going on at all, not the least bit.

Mr. KEARFUL. In the region north and west of Tampico, is that a good agricultural country?

Mr. HORTON. A good agricultural country; yes, sir, and of course we have established the fact there is no farming in any of these American colonies.

Mr. KEARFUL. Under favorable conditions how would that region compare with good farming districts in the United States?

Mr. HORTON. You mean the production?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. HORTON. The production, on an average, is better than the farms in the United States, from the fact that you can farm all times of the year.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there any further statement you would like to make about any matter that has not been already covered?

Mr. HORTON. I do not think of anything.

Mr. KEARFUL. Very well, you are excused, and we thank you very much.

(Whereupon, at 1 o'clock p. m. the committee adjourned.)

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., on Friday, February 27, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

STATEMENT OF MR. SIDNEY S. CONGER.

(The witness was duly sworn by Mr. Kearful.)

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you please state your full name?

Mr. CONGER. Sidney S. Conger.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your present place of residence?

Mr. CONGER. 430 West One hundred and nineteenth Street, New York.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your profession?

Mr. CONGER. I am a Presbyterian minister.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you been engaged in the exercise of your profession in Mexico?

Mr. CONGER. Yes. I was pastor of the Union Evangelical Church of the City of Mexico from early in April, 1911, until late in September or very early October, I am not sure of the exact date, in 1915. I left the City of Mexico, or ceased to reside there, about a week before the recognition of the Carranza government by the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you had in mind to return to Mexico?

Mr. CONGER. I have never ceased to be attracted by Mexico. I have had it in mind to return to Mexico. I have once been there since I ceased to reside there. I spent the month of September, 1917, in the City of Mexico and I know of no place where I should prefer to reside so far as climate and some other characteristics are concerned if the conditions were thoroughly safe and communication likely to be opened.

Mr. KEARFUL. And an opportunity for usefulness in your profession?

Mr. CONGER. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have heard of notices issued by the Carranza Government to the effect that any Mexicans who might testify before this committee would be considered as traitors and any Americans who might so testify would not be permitted to return to Mexico?

Mr. CONGER. I learned of that yesterday as to Americans. I had not heard the statement as to Mexicans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Having in mind a return to Mexico, you are still willing to give your testimony in open session?

Mr. CONGER. I am.

Mr. KEARFUL. The committee has been very much embarrassed by reason of the reluctance of witnesses who have interests in Mexico to testify openly, and very much appreciate the sentiment on your part as one of real Americanism. Are you acquainted with a missionary or minister of the gospel named Samuel Guy Inman?

Mr. CONGER. Yes; I know him quite well.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you read a book that he published entitled "Intervention in Mexico"?

Mr. CONGER. No; I have not read it. I had some talk with Dr. Inman on the Panama Canal Zone with regard to Mexican affairs sometime, I think, early in the winter—January or February, of 1918; or perhaps it was before that. At any rate, it was when we were down there and it was later than September, 1917. I concluded that there was not anything in his book about Mexico that would do any good. I have also read with very close attention and very great interest the published notes of Dr. Inman's testimony before this committee.

Mr. KEARFUL. Dr. Inman in his book makes a statement, in substance, that one cause of difficulty with Americans in Mexico is that there have been so many Americans there who could not explain why they were out of their own country. Did you come in contact with Americans in Mexico City to a considerable extent?

Mr. CONGER. I did. I knew a good many Americans in the City of Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What class of people did you find them to be?

Mr. CONGER. Most of the people I knew in the City of Mexico were distinctly above the average; I mean even above the average American. I do not mean merely of high character, but they were good straight folks and their initiative and energy and average intelligence were very high. That is the impression I have had, and we have often said so in the family, that we never had as many definite personalities in comparison with the number of our parishioners and acquaintances as we had in the City of Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you regard the Americans in the American colony as a distinctly high class of people?

Mr. CONGER. As to the ones that I met, I should say that.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do not agree with Mr. Inman that Americans as a class in Mexico were such that they could not explain their presence out of their own country?

Mr. CONGER. No. Of course, I dare say there were some such. I saw one man that I knew had left the United States under a cloud. He was the only one that I saw. I happened to have personal knowledge of him. I made some inquiries as to his line of activity in Mexico and found that he was apparently trying to make good. I know that he did not alter his name. I think the offense that he had committed was extraditable. I know that he was regarded with personal favor by the people who had reason to prosecute him and consequently when I found that he was behaving himself I did not say anything about it. He was the only instance of that kind I know anything about. His conduct in Mexico was not such as to bring any discredit of any kind upon the United States or the inhabitants or to cause any trouble with Mexicans in any way.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know anything about the number of Americans residing in Mexico City?

Mr. CONGER. I was told when I went down there that there were about 8,000. That is only hearsay. I know no more than that. I know the colony was very large.

Mr. KEARFUL. Dr. Inman also states that another trouble was that Americans and other foreigners were engaged in exploiting Mexican people for their own benefit and to the detriment of those people. Is there any truth in that?

Mr. CONGER. I do not believe that. I noticed in Dr. Inman's testimony, upon my examination of it, that he stated—I think he states this—that the Americans paid the highest wages for the class of labor they employed which has ever been paid in Mexico, and that the neighborhood raised the prices of labor wherever they were. I know personally that there was complaint in the City of Mexico that the Americans paid Mexican employees too much and injured the labor for Mexican employers. I know that of my own knowledge. I have always felt that the term "exploit" is used by the adverse critics of any industrial or commercial activity where the word "development" would be used by the friends of the same parties, sometimes one being true and sometimes the other. With regard to Mexico, I feel distinctly that American activities in Mexico have been the particular cause of the development of the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. As a minister of the gospel do you believe that it is possible to satisfactorily conduct enterprises of benevolence and religion and education without material advancement by way of developing the country?

Mr. CONGER. Yes; I think that can be done—I mean that without other efforts alongside to develop the material resources of the country, but such efforts have usually resulted in or have been accompanied by development of the material resources of the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you not think it is a distinct advantage to the spiritual and intellectual development of the untutored natives of the country that they should have the benefits of material advantages?

Mr. CONGER. I think that is true to some extent. I would not want to go far on that line. I think it is far more important that they should have illustrations of order, decency, morality, and truthfulness on the part, for instance, of the government under which they live, persons prominent in authority, than it is that material development of the country should be highly advanced.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe an ignorant, uncultivated person can be inspired to intellectual and spiritual advancement unless he has food and clothing?

Mr. CONGER. I think some people have done pretty well without those things, spiritually. I think it takes a very high type of man to do it, a very rare type of man, but I think a very much smaller percentage can be spiritually advanced under those conditions than can be under the other, although that small percentage when they do make the advance in spite of those conditions are generally spiritually and in the matter of character very fine, naturally.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are Mexicans of that class?

Mr. CONGER. I would say only a few—and only a few, if any, would be. A mighty good Mexican that I know, and whom I think you know, Judge Kearful, said this to me. He is a very patriotic Mexican also and tried to enlist to be sent against Americans at Vera Cruz at the time of the taking of Vera Cruz, but discovered that they were only enlisting ostensibly for that purpose, and those who were enlisting for that purpose were being sent north to fight Villa. He said to me in a very despairing tone—I do not remember whether this was in 1916 or when I visited the city in September, 1917, but whenever it was he said to me that “the trouble in Mexico is that we can not get on our feet because we have not enough gente decente.” I do not think there is any exact English translation of that as the Mexicans use it—decent people. That is what he said. You know the man and he still lives in Mexico, I believe.

Mr. KEARFUL. Therefore you would not want to give his name?

Mr. CONGER. I should prefer not to do so. He is one of the men who were arrested by Gen. Obregon during his reign in the city for having taken part in the council of business men trying to form the Mexican Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were, of course, acquainted with our ambassador in Mexico, Mr. Henry Lane Wilson?

Mr. CONGER. Yes; also with Mrs. Wilson.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were in Mexico at the time of the 10 days' fight?

Mr. CONGER. I was.

Mr. KEARFUL. Which resulted in the fall of Madero?

Mr. CONGER. I was there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you familiar with the conduct of affairs there by Mr. Wilson?

Mr. CONGER. As an outsider I saw what happened. I am not one of those people who have any special knowledge as to what secret communications were made between anybody and anybody else.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Inman charges in his book that Henry Lane Wilson was engaged in a conspiracy to overthrow Madero and had something to do with the murder of Madero. Do you believe there is any truth in that statement?

Mr. CONGER. Absolutely none whatever. I have never seen any occasion to believe anything of that kind. My only difference in that matter with regard to Henry Lane Wilson is that he told me once that he did not think that Huerta was a party, even in the sense of being aware of the coming of the death of Madero. I think he did, but as to Henry—

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean Huerta did?

Mr. CONGER. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do not think Henry Lane Wilson did?

Mr. CONGER. Absolutely not. Mrs. Wilson told me, before there was any question of this kind arising at all, before anybody ever said that Henry Lane Wilson was suggested at all—within a day or so of the killing of Madero Mrs. Wilson told me that they had been promised that Madero's life would be spared. My recollection of the conversation is, of course, vague; I had no idea I should ever be called upon to testify about it. However, I remember that part of it very distinctly, but my impression is that the person who assured Mrs. Wilson that Madero was to be well taken care of was De la Barra.

Mr. KEARFUL. Minister of foreign affairs?

Mr. CONGER. Yes. He came out afterwards and disclaimed any knowledge of his own regarding the death of Madero, all of which, I believe, on the part of De la Barra. I should be rather glad if it should be regarded as germane to this evidence to relate what could be seen externally of the American embassy at that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please proceed.

Mr. CONGER. With the exception of a few Mexicans, one of whom was the man I just spoke of, there were not enough "gente decente" to accomplish anything. As far as I know the only coordinated, definite effort to preserve life, to take care of wounded people, to feed people who were in locations where it was difficult for them to be fed, to supply milk or to protect others in supplying milk for babies and invalids, which was carried on at all in the City of Mexico during those 10 days, was carried on under the direction of the American embassy.

The embassy had, as a part of its activities before the end of those 10 days, a bureau for the discovery of refugees who had been driven from their homes by shell fire or from other causes; also a milk distributing center, and an emergency hospital, the officers of a volunteer patrol of the foreign quarters who walked about at night to put a check upon the soldiers out of other organizations and out of discipline who were traveling about; an office for the cable company from which cable messages were sent by messenger down through the opposing armies to the cable office; a bank, and a branch business which was conducted in the same way.

Mr. KEARFUL. All of those were at the embassy building?

Mr. CONGER. Yes; they were all at the embassy building. I know personally that members of the British colony found a great deal of fault with the British Minister, Mr. Strong, for pusillanimity in the face of the circumstances which then surrounded us and made unpleasant comparisons between his activities and those of Mr. Wilson.

An Englishman, a very good friend of mine, one of the most prominent young men of the British colony, said this in my presence when some Englishmen were finding fault with Minister Strong, that "Mr. Wilson has done more than Mr. Strong, but so far as I know all the Britishers went around to Strong and said, 'What are you going to do about this?' whereas all the Americans I know went around to Henry Lane Wilson and said, 'What can we do about this?'"

The position of the American colony in the City of Mexico at the end of the affair was one of great prestige. In addition to the activities which I have mentioned, there was an automobile service conducted through automobiles loaned by American owners or in many cases driven by the owners themselves, which were used to transport people from the regions that were being shelled to safer districts. There was also a bureau to find residences for such people, either in the homes of other Americans or any building that could be used for that purpose.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the sentiment of the foreign ministers of the Gospel with reference to the work done under the direction of Henry Lane Wilson at that time?

Mr. CONGER. I do not happen to remember an expression of opinion from any other minister at that time until after the death of Madero.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they not all join in a resolution of some sort?

Mr. CONGER. I think it is quite probable that they did, although I do not recall it at this moment.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the sentiment of foreigners other than Americans in regard to that work?

Mr. CONGER. I think it was very much commended. I know it was very much commended by the British. I did not hear much expression of opinion from other foreign colonies just at that time. I talked with a great many English just after that and later on. The British were very much ashamed that they had not done more and they were very complimentary with reference to Henry Lane Wilson.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you hear anybody in Mexico City at that time deprecate the work Henry Lane Wilson had done?

Mr. CONGER. Not one person. There was none of that until there had been started, I think, the rumor that he had something to do with the death of Madero. Months and months afterwards there was some of that sort of loose talk about his having been in some way connected with his death. I might add that when I first met Henry Lane Wilson I did not particularly admire him, but I greatly admired his conduct of affairs during this trouble.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever hear of an American in distress going to Henry Lane Wilson without getting help?

Mr. CONGER. Never. I never heard of an American in distress in any part of Mexico whose word got to Henry Lane Wilson without it being taken up with a great deal of vigor.

Mr. KEARFUL. Dr. Inman also states in his book that at the time of the taking of Vera Cruz and thereafter Huerta issued a general order for the imprisonment of Americans, and that Americans were generally taken and imprisoned, and subsequently released upon the capture of the cities by the Constitutionalists. Is there any truth in that?

Mr. CONGER. Of course I can not say as to what may have happened outside of the City of Mexico. I do not know positively that any such order was issued by Gen. Huerta; but I was in Vera Cruz, arriving there about three hours before the American marines arrived there, and was not in the City of Mexico at that time; but before our vessel sailed from Vera Cruz, a few days later we had received some Americans who had left the City of Mexico with the permission of Gen. Huerta, after the news of the taking of the city had reached the City of Mexico. A number of my friends remained in the City of Mexico during the entire continuance of Gen. Huerta's authority, from the time of the taking of Vera Cruz until his own abandonment of power, and were not subjected to arrest, although some of them were subjected to some other discomforts. If there was such an order, it was not carried out in the City of Mexico.

I may add that a good many of those people came by roundabout routes down to Vera Cruz, and the order was not carried out elsewhere. We also received people, especially from Puerto Mexico, on a special steamer which came up and brought them alongside of the ship in which we came north; and they had not been interfered with, although the consul told them he was afraid they might be.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were in Vera Cruz at the time of the landing of the American forces there?

Mr. CONGER. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. You saw the sailors and marines land on the dock?

Mr. CONGER. I did. I was about as far from the first marine that came up the dock as I am from the corner of this room now—25 or 30 feet.

Mr. KEARFUL. Before giving your testimony a while ago you mentioned to me privately a tragic occurrence at that time. Would you mind repeating that for the record?

Mr. CONGER. Whether it will seem so tragic on the record I do not know, but there were three moving-picture operators operating their machines as the marines climbed out of the launches and up on the dock, and one of them suddenly straightened up and said, "Wouldn't that make you tired? What do you think of that? Here are the American marines landing in Vera Cruz, and here I am with my machine, and my film 'busts' on me." It struck me as very tragic at the time. It probably should not have struck me as quite so tragic if it had happened a few hours later, after I had seen some of our boys killed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you on the ship with the American refugees who came out of Vera Cruz?

Mr. CONGER. Yes. There were very few from Vera Cruz itself. A full train came down from the City of Mexico. They did not come all the way by train, because of the condition of the railroad track, but walked across the broken spots. I am not sure whether they came all the way down by the Mexican line or walked part of the way. At any rate, we received some people who lived in the City of Mexico after the American forces had landed in Vera Cruz, and we also received a group of persons who had come out of the neighborhood of Puerto Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of conditions did you have on the ship?

Mr. CONGER. There were bunks for the women and children and about half the men. I slept in a bunk just exactly half the nights I was on board. The food was very simple, but we had enough to eat.

Mr. KEARFUL. At what port did you arrive in the United States?

Mr. CONGER. At New Orleans.

Mr. KEARFUL. How were you treated there?

Mr. CONGER. Very enthusiastically. A reporter asked me a question over the telephone and I answered him in about 10 words, and I found in the morning that I was the author of a column article that was very enthusiastic. He asked me about a man who had pretended to be found in front of Henry Lane Wilson's house, who had been found shooting the American officers from the room of his house, and was shot by the marines who had been sent up to watch the roofs for that purpose. I simply verified those facts, and then this long article was builded up on that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you in Mexico City when the Carrancista troops came?

Mr. CONGER. I was not. I arrived at the City of Mexico about two weeks afterwards.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you remain there from that time on?

Mr. CONGER. I remained there until the month of October, 1915. I was not out of the suburbs of the city during that time. I did make an effort to get down to the barracks, but the railroad had been cut in one place there, and we got down to that place and stayed there practically a day and returned. That is the only time I was that far out of the City of Mexico until I left finally in very late September or early October, 1915.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you meet John Lind when he was down there?

Mr. CONGER. I did.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember that he was sent down there to eliminate Huerta?

Mr. CONGER. So we were told.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was published in the papers.

Mr. CONGER. I did not know that of my own knowledge.

Mr. KEARFUL. After Mr. Lind's return from Mexico he wrote some articles which were published in a booklet and among other things he stated that the restraint shown by the victorious constitutional armies on entering cities they captured was most creditable and encouraging. From your observation of what occurred when the Carrancista army entered Mexico City and afterwards while you were there, did you regard their conduct as creditable and encouraging?

Mr. CONGER. If it was—when they came in I was not there—they loosened up afterwards.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were there two weeks after they came?

Mr. CONGER. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you observe the conduct of the officers with reference to houses or residences and the contents thereof?

Mr. CONGER. I did.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was that?

Mr. CONGER. They occupied the houses and a great many of the most valuable contents were sold or carried away, and others were destroyed. The sort that could not be carried away, for instance, the library in the de la Torre house. I think it was the de la Torre house in front of the Iron Horse there. This I did not see, but I was told by men interested in books that they were peddled by the volume. It was a very valuable library, enormously valuable, containing many old Spanish works that could not be duplicated. Sets were broken, and they were peddled by the volume by the guard who stayed in front of the house when the officers were occupying it, and a good many of them bore indications that leaves had been torn out and used for toilet purposes. That was done, of course, through sheer ignorance of the value of the articles.

Americans did exploit Mexico to a certain extent at that time. A great many Americans bought for very low prices from the shops articles which I took to have been the spoil of the houses of well-to-do Mexicans—not just at that time, but for many months afterwards. An ordinary soldier would frequently be peddling silk altar cloths and ecclesiastical draperies about the streets.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you notice the condition with respect to automobiles on the streets?

Mr. CONGER. Many were confiscated. I do not know so much about confiscations in the streets as I do of confiscations from garages where they were in the grounds of the owners. I know more about this by personal contact with the owners who lost their cars. I know one American owner who three different times succeeded in recovering his car after it had been carried off from the place where it was left on the curb.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was the taking of cars a common thing?

Mr. CONGER. A very usual thing. They were said to be requisitioned for purposes of the campaign. Attention was called to the fact that the cars were being requisitioned and used for the same purpose at the same time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Those cars were not paid for, were they, but were just taken?

Mr. CONGER. That is true.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you notice whether the same thing occurred in regard to horses?

Mr. CONGER. Comparatively few horses were taken. Some undoubtedly were taken, but the day which was known as the great horse stealing day for some time afterwards was when the Villa army was reported to be approaching the city. It was in November of that year. There were a tremendous lot of horses stolen at that time—I mean requisitioned—of course.

Mr. KEARFUL. I was there at that time and personally saw the Carrancista soldiers take horses from the coaches in the streets. Did you see anything of that kind?

Mr. CONGER. Yes; I did. On the afternoon of that day I was trying to get home in a coach, and a gendarme, who must have been sent over to that place, warned us not to come down in a certain direction because the Carrancista soldiers were taking the horses out of all coaches coming down that way; so we went around another way.

You spoke of the houses. I should rather like to testify that nearly all of the houses occupied by Mexicans which had been occupied by Mexicans of prominence who had handsome houses, were occupied by officers of the Carrancista army after their entrance. Mr. Carranza himself occupied one of them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember the general who was in command of the advance forces that entered at that time?

Mr. CONGER. I did not know that he was in command of the advance forces at that time because I was not there. Mr. Carranza himself had arrived when I reached the City of Mexico. I believe, however, it was Gen. Obregon.

Mr. KEARFUL. Gen. Alvaro Obregon?

Mr. CONGER. Yes; Gen. Alvaro Obregon. I had the interesting experience of living under his administration in the reoccupying of the city after the retirement of the Villistas.

Mr. KEARFUL. What kind of people were his forces?

Mr. CONGER. The forces we saw of Gen. Obregon were Yaqui Indians, whom I consider the best soldiers of Infantry I have seen in Mexico. They seem to have a great many excellent soldierly qualities. There was an escort of Yaquis on the train at the time we were held up, at the time we were trying to get to Vera Cruz in October. A man in the smoking car told me that a Mexican officer came in and asked for a civilian suit of clothes when we were told that the Villistas were approaching, while the Yaquis showed absolutely no signs except a perfectly steady intention to do their duty.

My impression is that the discipline of the troops occupying the city under Obregon was most definite and the best maintained of any period after the fall of Diaz. At no other time did it seem to me that the troops occupying the city were under such definite discipline as under Gen. Obregon, with the possible exception of the time under Gen. Huerta. Still, I am inclined to think, all things considered, Obregon's system was even stiffer. I suffered absolutely nothing from troops, except a few insults, during the occupation of Obregon and had no fear that any disorganized troops would commit any outrages. There was always a fear that troops might under orders commit some outrage, but nothing of the kind happened to me. I saw it happen to others.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you there when Carranza and Obregon were driven out by Villa?

Mr. CONGER. Yes; I was.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did the occupation of Mexico City by Villa and Zapata compare with that of Carranza and Obregon with reference to the protection of property and houses?

Mr. CONGER. The houses and property were better protected under Villa and Zapata—the houses and large immovable property. When Villa was there there was comparatively little stealing of automobiles—I mean requisitioning of automobiles.

Mr. KEARFUL. When you speak of requisitioning, you do not mean in the military sense of taking property and paying for it, but you mean stealing, do you not?

Mr. CONGER. The automobiles were taken by the military and used for the purposes of joy riding; that is, visibly used for the purposes of joy riding but theoretically for military purposes, but many of the military purposes involve the transportation, through the most conspicuous parts of the city, of very evident "women of the town." The Villistas did lots of that and almost nothing in the matter of seizing houses. When, after Obregon's occupation, the Zapatistas occupied the city—

Mr. KEARFUL. After the Villa forces had left?

Mr. CONGER. Yes; and after we had been occupied again for a time by the Carrancistas, Zapata returned at the time when they came back, and killed John McManus, and after that we had more danger from disorderly soldiers and that was increasingly true to the end of the Zapata occupation. When Gonzales Garza was president we were taken pretty good care of. There were outrages by persons apparently soldiers, and, of course, they were soldiers. The discipline was not as good after Villa had withdrawn; that is, the soldiers' discipline was very manifestly not so good. Little disorders of that kind were very frequent, but the seizure of large properties and the control of some of the foodstuffs and that sort of thing was very much greater under the Carrancistas.

Mr. KEARFUL. When the Zapatistas were driven out by Obregon in 1916?

Mr. CONGER. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were there at that time?

Mr. CONGER. I was there. It was at the time of his reoccupation that I speak of the discipline of his troops. I felt at that time that nothing was done by troops except what they were ordered to do. It was said in the outskirts, where their skirmish line was, that the Yaquis were not quite so well in hand, but I have no personal knowledge of that. In the city the Yaquis did exactly what they were told to do and did not allow anybody to interfere with them at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. It was reported at that time that Obregon undertook to humble the people of the City of Mexico. What do you know about that, if anything?

Mr. CONGER. He did it. I do not know whether he undertook to or not, but he did it.

Mr. KEARFUL. What announcement did he make publicly with reference to that?

Mr. CONGER. I have not the exact language, although I remember quoting it in an article that the American colony was planning to send up to the Secretary of State. It was to this effect—I am willing to swear that it was to this effect—that, owing to the conduct of the merchants—some others were mentioned, but I do not know just how many outside of the merchants—of the City of Mexico and the pinch of necessity which the people were feeling, that he would not use the forces of his command to restrain or suppress any efforts that the people might make to secure for themselves the food which merchants and others were refusing to sell to them at reasonable rates.

Mr. KEARFUL. How was that declaration construed?

Mr. CONGER. It was construed as meaning that they could go ahead and loot. One Spaniard who defended his grocery store and killed a man was arrested. He was the only person, so far as I know, who was arrested in connection with the somewhat general looting which took place in certain parts of the city, of which I was a witness.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did that indicate that the soldiers of Obregon were protecting the looters?

Mr. CONGER. There was an instance far more definite than that. When the Church of Santa Brigida and the adjoining convent school were looted, which was down in the very center of the city, a number of people beat off the looters at first. Obregon sent a detachment of Yaquis who beat off the beaters and protected the looters. I did not see the beginning of that, but I was on the scene while the Yaquis were on guard and the looting was being carried on. I saw the articles being brought out from the school and afterwards visited the school and church. The church was very badly wrecked in the interior and the school was stripped; even the molding was taken away and the woodwork from the stairs.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any connection with the operations of the Red Cross at that time in Mexico City?

Mr. CONGER. When the Red Cross people arrived in Mexico City they asked our church—

Mr. KEARFUL. Arrived from where?

Mr. CONGER. From the United States. They asked our church to undertake the administration of one of the centers of food distribution, which we did. It afterwards turned out to be very much the largest of the centers of food distribution and it was the most concentrated. It was on the Calle de Ayuntamiento in the block nearest to the Calle Bucareli. It was very much nearer the center of the city. We had a very successful distribution there. We distributed rations which were supposed to be allotted to 10,000 people before we were through there at the rate of one liter of soup containing meat and vegetables to every person in the family. Our line for food used to consist of as many as 2,000 people a day.

The representatives of the United States—I think it was Mr. Brown who was in charge of our legation at that time—had also been asked by the Red Cross people to take charge of and supervise a distribution center. They sent a man down to look at ours and he asked us to let him stand inside. He asked the man acting as head man inside whether he knew what we were doing. He said no, he did not. That was Mr. Christy. This man from the embassy said, "You are handling 20 people a minute." So the legation asked us to take over the administration of their place. They would send the people down and provide the necessary money for people to handle the distribution, so we opened up another window in the wall. We were operating through a window in the wall at the back of a garage. They sent down some American railway Negro porters and others who had been stranded down there and were all Americans, and they were under the supervision of a Scotchman and handled that food, and we worked just as fast at the other window, so that probably for the latter part of the distribution we were handling about 40 people per minute.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were those foreigners whom you were serving?

Mr. CONGER. Oh, no; those were entirely Mexican. I do not think we had one single foreigner that came in the line. They were most all of the poorer class and some of the few who had been wronged or robbed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there a necessity for the distribution of food in this way?

Mr. CONGER. The Carranza Government stepped in and expelled the Red Cross on the ground that there was no necessity for it.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was your observation?

Mr. CONGER. For the whole remainder of the time that I resided in the City of Mexico I was beset by people who had been aided by the Red Cross. When I was on the street the question would be, "Senor, are you going to let us die because our Government has driven away the Red Cross?" In some cases they were women with babies at the breast who were shriveled until they looked like little monkeys, because they were not nourished.

I was in the American hospital at the time the Red Cross ceased, recovering from an operation for hernia, and while I was in the hospital a considerable number of babies who had been left there by their mothers after persuasion by the nurses of the American hospital were being cared for. When the mothers had been in the distribution line at the American hospital, which was another one of the Red Cross distributing stations, they said they had had great difficulty in persuading the mothers to leave their children because they were afraid something would be done with them that was wrong, but they finally got one mother to leave her baby there. They assured her that the baby was dying and that they had the means perhaps to save its life. In two or three days the baby looked so much better that this mother was very much pleased about it, and after that quite a number of mothers left their babies to be treated at the American hospital. Of course, the line of poor women was done away with after the food distribution of the Red Cross was suspended.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did Obregon do anything to cause an increase of poverty and suffering among those people?

Mr. CONGER. We believed that he did, although that Red Cross distribution was being made while the city was in charge of Carranza and that was later than Obregon's time. The Red Cross activities began, I think, in July, 1915, possibly June, but June or July.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever hear of any action taken by Obregon in connection with his other activities in humbling the city to starve the people of the city?

Mr. CONGER. It was commonly so reported. That was denied officially by Carranza in a letter to our State Department, but some months afterwards a decree was passed allowing food to enter the city.

Mr. KEARFUL. Indicating that it had been previously kept out?

Mr. CONGER. It indicated that they would not allow them to go in. I never had any doubt about it. My own gardener who had relatives outside of the city, and the sexton of the church who had relatives outside of the city, told me that they could not get in with food, that their connections outside always had the food taken away from them at the entrance to the city by soldiers when they endeavored to bring anything in. The sexton was very much upset and disturbed by it, because he was a real good Carrancista and he could not understand why that happened. The gardener was like most Mexicans of that class—he was absolutely without politics.

Mr. KEARFUL. How do you account for the state of mind of Samuel Guy Inman in making the statements which have been referred to?

Mr. CONGER. I do not entirely account for Inman's state of mind. I know that he formed his conclusions with a great lack of information about some things in Mexico and an apparent failure to perceive the importance of some of the things that he did know and many of the things that he had not previously known.

For instance, in conversation with Inman in Panama, some time late in 1917 or early in 1918, he spoke of the resumption of specie payments by the Government of Mexico as having been a great triumph. I asked him if he knew that that had followed or accompanied the repudiation of the paper money issued as very solemn obligations on the part of the Government. He said, "Oh, the issues made by some one without authority," and I said, "Not at all. The Vera Cruz bills which, by the authority of the Carranza government were for a long time the only currency that would be accepted, and afterwards the infalsificables, which had been issued with the most tremendous protestations that they could not be counterfeited and therefore would not be withdrawn as others had been on account of the tremendous counterfeiting.

I would like to say something in this connection with reference to one of those little incidents that come in to help one to form a strong opinion in these matters. I had as cook a woman who had been cooking for an American. She was a loyal woman. She had been saving her money against the time when she would not be able to work any more. It came to her nearly all toward the end in the current bills. She, of course, has been entirely ruined by the demonetization of the paper currency, and I suppose she is one of many thousands of the poorer class in Mexico in the same fix.

Mr. KEARFUL. You know, of course, that those bills finally became worthless?

Mr. CONGER. I know that they are worthless; yes. I read recently that there was a law contemplated to place a special tax, a surtax, above all other taxes, which should be paid only in the infalsificables, because a good many were supposed to be retained against the time when they might perhaps be money once more.

But Mr. Inman's ignorance of that and his apparent indifference to it seemed to me to indicate the lack of sense of proportion of some of those things. He also did not know that the Red Cross had been expelled from Mexico. In conversation with me he began apparently with the idea that they simply had terminated their operations because of a cessation of necessity and had left. Of course, after that, during the winter following the expulsion of the Red Cross, there was the greatest ravaging of people in the City of Mexico that has probably ever taken place there, and the destructiveness was said by many to be due to the undernourished condition of the population.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are charitable enough to attribute the misstatements on the part of Inman to his ignorance?

Mr. CONGER. I think, so; yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know that he has been conducting some operations in a missionary line in Mexico?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, as far as I know his experiences have mostly been in northern Mexico. Until that missionary conference that was conducted in Mexico comparatively later I do not think he knew much about the center of the Republic.

Mr. KEARFUL. You perhaps may remember that in his testimony he stated that he had an arrangement with Carranza whereby his organization might operate contrary to the provisions of the new constitution.

Mr. CONGER. I have been told that personally by Mr. Inman and also by others supervising missionary enterprises in Mexico?

Mr. KEARFUL. Does that indicate to your mind that perhaps he was actuated in making the statements in his book by the prospect of advancing those enterprises?

Mr. CONGER. I have very little doubt that the men who are managing the Protestant missionary enterprises in Mexico, most of whom are my personal friends, feel that the Carranza regime is peculiarly favorable to the conduct of their enterprises.

Mr. KEARFUL. In that state of mind of course they would not openly make any statements derogatory to Carranza or his régime, I take it?

Mr. CONGER. I would not go so far as to say that. Most of them are men of very, very great conscientiousness and extremely good judgment; in fact, with regard to some of them—not so much Mr. Inman, because I do not know him as well as I do some others—practically the only point in which my judgment seems to be different from theirs is with regard to the question of how things ought to be handled in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think they would be willing to come before this committee and testify openly, in view of their operations in Mexico at present?

Mr. CONGER. That I do not know. I should say, in view of the attitude which you have described as the attitude of the Mexican Government toward this committee, possibly not. They are, however, men of courage and judgment, those I have in mind at this time, of broad experience and altogether a different grasp of matters from some of the witnesses who have been before you.

Mr. KEARFUL. How would you account for the state of mind of Mr. John Lind in making the statement that the conduct of the Carrancistas was creditable and encouraging?

Mr. CONGER. I do not think the witness now before the committee has any conclusion about Mr. Lind's state of mind. I would not like to be responsible for any statement about that. When I met Mr. Lind I thought he was after the facts. Later on I sort of got the impression that the facts were after him and that he was not anxious to meet them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever meet Mr. Lind after that in Washington and have a conversation with him?

Mr. CONGER. Yes. I met Mr. Lind some time later; it could not have been more than four days after we landed at New Orleans coming away from Vera Cruz, right in front of the White House. We greeted each other and at that time he asked if I would like to go and see Mr. Bryan. I said I did not see any use in it, that I did not believe I had any facts that he either did not know or did not want to know.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the reason for that attitude on your part?

Mr. CONGER. I had been told that when members of the American colony appeared before Mr. Bryan, he had stated to them that as they had interests in Mexico their testimony was valueless; I did not have any material interests in Mexico except some furniture, but I did not want to be told anything like that.

Mr. KEARFUL. It is a fact, is it not, that correct information about Mexico can only be secured from men who have lived there and who necessarily have interests there?

Mr. CONGER. I regard it as just as foolish to say that a man's interests in Mexico would discredit him as a witness with regard to Mexico as it would be to say to a man who had lived in Lincoln, Nebr., telling Mr. Bryan about Nebraska, that he did not know anything about it. I was afraid I would meet something like that, and that is the reason I did not go to see him.

Mr. KEARFUL. You know about Mr. Bryan having made some visits to Mexico some time before?

Mr. CONGER. Oh, yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know about his having made lectures and printed articles extolling the opportunities in Mexico and inviting American citizens to go down with their enterprise and capital to invest and develop the country?

Mr. CONGER. No; I never knew anything about that. The only invitation Americans had from Mr. Bryan that I knew anything about was one to get out, which came along later. It caused a good deal of excitement in the city where I was. I remember that quite well.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know Candido Aguilar?

Mr. CONGER. Yes; I have seen him.

Mr. KEARFUL. He was a relative of Carranza?

Mr. CONGER. I think by marriage.

Mr. KEARFUL. A son-in-law?

Mr. CONGER. Yes. He was pointed out to me I think with his wife at the opera in Mexico City in September, 1917.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember that he was the ruler of Vera Cruz at the time the Red Cross was operating in Mexico City?

Mr. CONGER. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know anything about his operations in reference to exporting food from Mexico, corn and beans, for instance, at the time they were being brought in by the Red Cross?

Mr. CONGER. Only by hearsay; that is, I have no personal knowledge of that. I have no doubt of it, but I have no personal knowledge of it. It was, of course, universally stated and universally believed in the city of Mexico at that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. It was a matter of common knowledge and notoriety?

Mr. CONGER. It was stated at that time in my hearing repeatedly, though I can not swear to the truth of the statement, that one of the reasons that the operation of the Red Cross in the City of Mexico was prohibited was that the Red Cross was securing foodstuffs which otherwise would have been exported at great profit by generals. That was common talk, too.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know anything about an organization of foreigners in Mexico City at that time known as the International Committee?

Mr. CONGER. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have anything to do with that committee?

Mr. CONGER. No. I was a director of the Society of the American Colony and helped elect the members of the International Committee, but I was not on the International Committee.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember who were the American delegates on that committee?

Mr. CONGER. I should have thought that I could repeat half a dozen of those names straight off, but they do not come to my mind readily at this moment. I am not positive, but I think Mr. Beck was one, I think George Cook was one, and I think Burton Wilson was one.

Mr. KEARFUL. I was going to refresh your recollection by asking whether you remember that Burton Wilson and W. F. Buckley were the two members elected by the American colony?

Mr. CONGER. Yes; I recall that perfectly. The other men I knew personally, and I think that is the reason they were in my mind more than Mr. Buckley.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember anything about the fact that that committee was active in preparing evidence by way of affidavits with reference to what occurred at that time?

Mr. CONGER. Yes; I do. I know that positively of my own knowledge.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know anything about those documents having been sent to the American State Department and not given out?

Mr. CONGER. I signed several documents that were sent to the American State Department myself. I never heard of their being given out.

Mr. KEARFUL. You did hear about their refusal to give them out, did you not?

Mr. CONGER. No; I do not think I have any knowledge of that.

Mr. KEARFUL. You never heard of anything being done by the State Department with reference to correcting the conditions described in those documents?

Mr. CONGER. No. In reply to one document which went up about that time, which went up at the time we were in the hands of Zapata, and the line between the Carrancistas and the Zapatistas was out a comparatively short distance, less than 100 kilometers from us, in reply to a document of that kind which was forwarded, we had an inquiry from Mr. Bryan as to why we did not go out on a train which had been provided for us to pass through the lines, and get down to Vera Cruz, where we could have communication with the United States. No such train had been provided. We had once suggested that such a train be provided and the authorities had broken down in providing it. It gave us a feeling that our affairs were not being watched with any particular closeness.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the nature of the advices and recommendations which were received by Americans from the State Department with reference to what they should do? Were they of any particular tenor?

Mr. CONGER. I should say that the tenor usually suggested getting out. That is the impression that lies on my mind about it. I remember two or three pretty distinct ones. I remember the first "get-out" message that we had, which was some little time, if I recall correctly—quite a considerable time—before the Vera Cruz matter. It is difficult for me to place dates correctly because there were so many different things, but as nearly as I recollect, I do recall that very distinctly because a good many people actually went.

Then there was another one which followed it, I think, some weeks later—these were both while Mr. Bryan was Secretary of State—which suggested that we need not hurry so. A great many people got down to the ports and had no means of getting away, and some of them were in really quite serious condition. People had gone down to Vera Cruz and the town was overpopulated and could not take care of themselves and could not sleep properly. Missionaries spoke to me about the condition of Americans that came down at the time of that first proclamation and the second suggestion that they need not rush out, that there was no immediate danger. Then I recall they went to the train, and before that—I can not place the exact time—at the time Mr. Carranza suggested we should leave the City of Mexico and put ourselves in that part of the country where he could protect us. I remember there was a document drawn up by the American colony in the city at that time stating why they did not do that.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the reason they did not do it?

Mr. CONGER. Because of the absolute unsafety for themselves and property during the first occupation by Carrancistas, though it is to be said that during that first occupation by the Carrancistas it was chiefly property that was damaged. The only personal injuries I know of were comparatively small ones connected with the seizure of property, insults, or slight injuries connected with the objections of residents to the seizure of property.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever hear of any recommendations coming to Americans from our State Department other than orders or notices to get out of the country or recommendations in connection with the method of getting out of the country?

Mr. CONGER. I do not remember any other kind, except that we were very much delighted at one which did not say much about us, but did say in view of Obregon's statement that rioting in the city would not be suppressed by his forces, that the United States would hold Obregon and Carranza personally responsible for any injury to Americans that might take place. That was the only bright gleam that fell upon our horizon down there.

Mr. KEARFUL. That gleam was quickly extinguished, was it not?

Mr. CONGER. It was not followed up by anything else, but it made a mighty difference in the way that we were treated for a little while. A man whom I know very well, who knew Obregon and had known him in the north before he was a revolutionary general, told me that Obregon told him that he did not like that at all; that while he did not expect to emigrate to the United States, conditions might arise under which he would want to go there, and he should not like to have something like that waiting for him. That was only two steps off from Obregon, so I imagine it is true.

Mr. KEARFUL. You never heard of Carranza or Obregon being held to any accountability whatever, did you, for subsequent conduct?

Mr. CONGER. Not up to this time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you hear about Obregon coming to this country on a tour, in which he was feted and dined and taken around to see the cities by certain citizens who were interested with him in business enterprises?

Mr. CONGER. Yes; I heard about it in a general way, but it is to be observed that there was no more talk about rioters not being resisted after that message came out. Things were distinctly better after that message came out. You could pretty nearly smell it. It did not last very long, but things were distinctly better up until the night Obregon abandoned the city.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have been in Mexico City since then, have you not?

Mr. CONGER. Yes; I was there in September, 1917, the whole month of September.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you find conditions improved with reference to security and stability of the Government?

Mr. CONGER. I think they were distinctly better than they were during the last year I lived there. That year, of course, was the year from August, 1914, to October, 1915, and we had eight distinct changes of government during that time, and several other times there were changes which did not come off. All the changes were accompanied by fighting, and some of the attempts were, too, and that was a bad year. Conditions were distinctly better when I was there in 1917, so far as travel and safety were concerned, than they were in 1914-15.

I had no difficulty coming from Vera Cruz. It took longer than previously. We came up and nothing happened to us. We had a military escort in front of the train, and a large part of the road had—perhaps I ought not to say a large part, but a considerable part of the road had, especially on the high slopes going up, was being pulled by flat cars, with machine guns and light artillery mounted on them, which I thought was an extremely wise and efficient precaution. Several events had taken place along that part of the road.

We had no difficulty in getting out. I came from the City of Mexico up to Laredo. We were preceded by an armed train, and were warned that if we did not get to a certain point before dark, we would be held there all night, but we got there before dark and went on.

Conditions in the city were distinctly better, I think, than they were the last previous time I was there. There was a good deal of begging; a good deal of poverty, but not so much at the time the Red Cross was active there. The conditions in some rural parts of the country were serious then, but in some others were very much better. The conditions around Orizaba and in the cotton-factory districts were not very good. The conditions in the north and some places we passed through—this was merely observation from the train—seemed to be very bad; worse than I had ever seen at any previous time in Mexico. The apparent degradation and poverty of the people around the stations as we came north was bad. It was the worst I have seen at any time while I was in the City of Mexico, but in the city things were better than they had previously been.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you any opinion that you care to express in regard to the policy this Government has pursued in dealing with Mexico?

Mr. CONGER. I think it is very mistaken; I think it has produced very bad results.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do not agree with the statement made by Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior, when he said that President Wilson's Mexican policy was one of the things of which he was most proud?

Mr. CONGER. I do not know that I disagree with the statement that he was proud of it; he may be proud if he wants to, but I am not. I think it has been a tremendous mistake. I think it about two Mexican occurrences. I think he was right when he occupied it with our troops, and I think he was right when he sent men over the border after Villa.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where do you think he was wrong?

Mr. CONGER. In taking them out, and pretty nearly all the rest of the time. Of course, never having a responsible position in this matter I can have lots of fine theories about what ought to be done, and I do not know that it is worth while to say anything about it.

Mr. KEARFUL. The thing that ought to have been done is the thing that is most likely to be troublesome to the committee in making its recommendations. We should like to have your views.

Mr. CONGER. I do not think we ought to have a settled policy of intervention. This is just plain personal opinion. I think our policy has encouraged theft and murder. I think we are the only people in the world that can do anything to make theft and murder unpopular in Mexico, and we have not done it. I think that an accountability to somebody for murder and theft, enforced by the Government of the United States in those cases where it is interested or should be interested, in which its citizens are involved, would have forced a regard for honesty and the protection of life and property with regard to even Mexican citizens.

Nobody has exercised any effort, as far as I can see, toward holding definitely accountable the Mexican Government for confiscation of property, for bad behavior toward either life or property or the virtue of women by its officials or its soldiers. I feel that we have been the only people in a position to hold the Mexican Government accountable save as some Mexicans hold it accountable by starting a new revolution. The Monroe doctrine prevents other nations from doing it. The Mexican people themselves are practically helpless under it save in so far as they revolt. We have not done it, and I believe that we have dealt a very severe blow to the possibilities of civic and moral development in the Republic of Mexico by countenancing and declaring that we will continue to countenance that sort of thing.

In my opinion, the effect on the morals and the morale of the ordinary Mexican, as a result of the fact that their Government has done anything it wanted, that the generals have done anything they wanted, to the people who were big enough to attract their attention, and that ordinary soldiers have done anything they wanted to the people who were small enough to be under their authority has been incalculable.

In the market in the time when we were occupying Vera Cruz, while Carranza was in the City of Mexico, a market woman said to the wife of an American whom I know very well, indeed, who had been there a very long time, "Señora, they tell me your people in Vera Cruz are paying for everything they take, that the soldiers do not take anything from anybody without paying for it, and that the soldiers are not allowed to do anything to the people. I hope they will come up here." A cab driver turned to me one day and said, "Señor, when are your people coming up here?" He said "All this day officers have been making me drive around the city and refusing to pay me." I do not attach very great weight to either of those statements. I think the man was perfectly serious. I think he stated the truth, but I think he told me that partly to make me pay him more, because he told me he had had a perfectly fruitless day, and I do not think you can bank on any statement of that kind as having any very great significance. But the fact is that that class of Mexicans have suffered terribly, and absolutely nobody has done anything to exert any pressure at all in the direction of protection. We can not, of course, do anything about it, but if it were necessary to consider the ordinary laws of right as to property and person in connection with foreigners, it seems to me that the Government would have to do the same thing to a certain extent with regard to its own people in order to save its face.

I have felt that that has been a very, very serious result of our attitude and one which, of course, was not contemplated in the attitude at all.

For instance, Mr. Inman spoke of very admirable Mexican young men who had been connected with the revolution at various times, men drawn from the Protestant schools in Mexico or in the United States, of whom there are a considerable number, and I think they are among the fine Mexicans referred to—and there are some very fine Mexicans still living.

Mr. KEARFUL. They are living outside of the country, are they not?

Mr. CONGER. Some. Many of those are what I regard as the best element in the revolution. He spoke of some of them occupying, I think, positions in Congress, and very occasionally an executive position for a little while. He spoke of Moises Saenz as a man of ability; that he approved of him; that he was a strong man.

We talked about Huerta, and discussed some of his doings. I maintained that in shooting political prisoners Huerta was doing what all Mexicans have always done and what Carranza has done just as much, but he would not stand for that at all. I have conversed with men who knew these men well, and they have always been very glad when one of these men was put in, especially in an executive position.

Mr. Inman spoke of Prof. Osuna being for a short time governor of Tamaulipas. The governor of Tamaulipas would be in a position to greatly interfere with the flow of graft. That is all I have to say about that.

Another missionary spoke to me about another Mexican of that type being for a time chief of police in Vera Cruz. I said: "I do not believe he will hold his job." He told me what he was doing. I have had the impression that certain types of things that were going on in Vera Cruz were more or less winked at. He did not hold the position very long, as I had prophesied.

Mr. KEARFUL. These young men who join the revolution from motives of high principle, according to your observation, are soon disillusioned?

Mr. CONGER. Some are, and they are distinctly a type of older men. The younger men are not, so far as I know of. I have not had much to do with them lately, but they have not been put in positions where the administration of affairs and especially of finances could be definitely directed by them, and they will not be. They are in educational positions and legislative positions.

Mr. KEARFUL. You stated a while ago that the American policy toward Mexico has operated to encourage murder and robbery. How is that?

Mr. CONGER. Nobody is punished for those things, unless he robs the wrong people or kills the wrong man or woman. When Gonzalez was governor of Mexico in the summer of 1915, a young man said to be a nephew of his—it was common talk and I never heard it denied—shot dead in his automobile in Chapultepec Park a young Mexican woman of a good family. So far as I know, nothing was ever done about it at all except to transfer the man to another garrison.

Mr. KEARFUL. You never heard of anything being done to avenge outrages against Americans?

Mr. CONGER. Only promises. There were promises to pay $20,000 for the killing of John McManus.

Mr. KEARFUL. We have evidence of several hundred Americans having been murdered in Mexico during the time you have been talking about. How do the sufferings and killing of Mexicans compare with the sufferings and killing of Americans?

Mr. CONGER. I do not believe there has been one American killed to a thousand Mexicans killed. Spilling the blood of an ordinary Mexican was absolutely without sin, so far as I could see. Hundreds of civilians were shot down; not men with arms in their hands but just murdered in cold blood.

Mr. KEARFUL. The hardships in connection with the poverty and lack of food are apparent upon the Mexicans in what respect as compared with foreigners?

Mr. CONGER. It is not apparent upon the foreigner at all as compared with the Mexicans. We had few cases of poverty in the American colony during the worst times we had there, those cases occurring in the outskirts of the colony. There was not anybody that suffered for food. The Mexicans are dying. There is nothing I have ever seen that looks as awful as to see a baby dying at its mother's breast because there is no milk, and a Mexican baby, brown, shriveled up and looking like a monkey, is a terrible thing.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that that condition largely has been brought about by the operation of the policy of the American Government?

Mr. CONGER. No; I would not say that. It would have taken tremendous effort. It came about through condonations of other offenses and utter indifference. I do not think our policy was very largely responsible for that, except indirectly to prolong it. I think Mexico would have been a good deal more prosperous if we had insisted on protecting Americans and American interests in certain lines and in certain ways, which I think we could have done. Of course, I am no international lawyer and am giving expression to opinions which may be perhaps outside of any range of definite knowledge, but it seems to me in connection with the confiscation of the property of an American citizen and the sending to jail of American citizens, we could have done things which would have brought about or at least would have held up to a certain standard a respect for life and property, which nobody has held up at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. As an American citizen do you think that on account of what we have done or omitted to do we owe a duty to do something now?

Mr. CONGER. I feel that utterly aside from what we have or have not done in the past, we should make a definite effort, not terminating in protests, to protect the lives and property of Americans now.

Mr. KEARFUL. How do you think that ought to be done?

Mr. CONGER. I would not go so far as to suggest the methods, because I think the methods would differ with the conditions under which the world might find itself at the time the particular case arose. But I would not stop short of force if force were necessary.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say that you found conditions in Mexico City in 1917 somewhat better than they were in 1914 and 1915. Did you have occasion to observe the feeling in reference to the continued betterment of conditions?

Mr. CONGER. The feeling was very despondent, that was the characteristic feeling; and I had one conversation with a young Mexican—in no sense a political person at all, and in no sense antagonistic to the Government—he came all the way up from Vera Cruz with me in the train and talked a great deal about things, and he was despondent, very despondent, about conditions. I noticed on the platform of the train at Vera Cruz—there were soldiers on the car and on the platform, at intervals of possibly the length of this room, and I noticed that the four men that were in sight from my car window had three different types of rifles, and I called his attention to that, and he said that there are 17 different types of small arms in the garrison.

And then he started off and talked to me in general, and he was despondent, and he did not see the possibility of emergence from the conditions. He said the business was pretty good, and he said the taxes were not unbearable; I asked him if everything was not being taxed out of existence, and he said no; but he was very despondent about the future. I did not see why; but afterwards I had a general conversation with Americans and some Mexicans. I ought to say in approaching Mexico at that time I came by a Spanish steamer from Habana, and there were some Mexicans returning to Mexico on board, one of whom was arrested as soon as he got ashore; I believe he was afterwards released; and another one was a man who had been a minister in the cabinet of Madero, whose name for the moment I have forgotten, but he lived over there near the Roma apartments. He was not exactly hopeful, but felt that it would be safe for him to return. Of course, I had no idea that being a member of the cabinet of Madero was anything offensive to the Carranza government, but we felt so.

Mr. KEARFUL. You remember that the Carranza government took the Madero property and expelled the Madero family from Mexico?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, I do; and I remember that Pedro Lascurain, who was pretty nearly the legitimate president of Mexico, he was the successor, and at the death of Madero was the only one living of the three in that succession; they all resigned under compulsion, the President and the Vice President having been assassinated, and it left him from my point of view the legitimate survivor, if there is any such thing. I have always judged that to be the reason why he was persona non grata to the present Government down there. Those men were not hopeful; but both wanted to do the best they could for Mexico. The men who were on this steamer, I am talking about now. Then, up in the city I found that where conditions looked much better to me, and I am confident they were from a material point of view much better, in the city, anyway, there was a great deal of unrest and no expectation of any great improvement. At that time the topics of conversation were such as those which were developed by Alvarado of Yucatan. The two measures which were being discussed in the Camara chamber of deputies at that time were the expropriation of the cotton factories around Orizaba and Puebla, and the enforced turning over to the Government of all mortgages to be paid for in the issue of new paper, which was then to be secured, upon the mortgages, of course, the effort being to find some sort of a security upon which a paper currency could be issued, because everybody agreed that the currency of Mexico was insufficient.

Those were the two principal topics of discussion. The expropriation of the factories was under discussion for this reason, that a gentleman whose name I forget had been granted a concession to import several hundred thousand dollars worth of cheap cotton goods without paying the usual duty, which, of course, enabled him to greatly undersell the market; and the cotton factory people, who were foreigners, said that under those circumstances they would be obliged to close down the factories until the consequent depression in price had been passed through the exhaustion of this concession; and the Government said that would put a lot of people out of work, and they said they would take over the factories and run them until that was over. The enforced surrender of mortgages to the Government as against a new paper currency issued on the basis of mortgages, and paid to the mortgagors; those were the two great topics of discussion. I do not know whether either of those things were done. The mortgage matter certainly was not carried through: There was an important question in the chamber whether or not that was a seizure of the factories under the law. Confiscation, of course, is prohibited by the Constitution.

Mr. KEARFUL. It was about that time that the Government took over the metallic reserves of the banks?

Mr. CONGER. That was previous to that. The gold and silver currency was in circulation when I was there in 1917. That was perhaps the most conspicuous difference in the country. In fact, there was no question at all about money. There was one time during—well, I think this was in the spring of 1915; I can not recall exactly the date, because it was not the sort of thing you would fix a date about—there was one time when I sent our cook to the market with money that the Villistas considered good, and the money that the Carrancistas considered good generally, and bank bills, and they would not take any of it at the market.

Mr. KEARFUL. Bank bills had been issued under the law of country which provided that they should be secured by the metallic reserve?

Mr. CONGER. Yes; and they were at that time at a premium. And I sent those three kinds of money down to make the market purchases in the morning, because she said she had a great deal of difficulty getting them to accept the money, and the woman she generally bought from said she would rather trust me than take any money now, and I could pay her with the currency when it became a little more settled, which illustrates exactly what the ordinary Mexican believes about American credit—better than even governments or banks at that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. If you had not had credit, you would not have been able to buy anything with the money you had?

Mr. CONGER. No; if she had any fears about the credit, but she preferred the credit at that time rather than take the money.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there any further statement, Mr. Conger, that you would like to make about something that has not been covered?

Mr. CONGER. I do not think of anything. No; I do not think of anything else.

Mr. KEARFUL. Very well, we are very much obliged to you.

Mr. CONGER. There is one statement I would like to make. I believe that the chief obstacle to an emergence from present conditions on the part of Mexico is the absorption of all revenues not absolutely needed for the prime necessities of the Government by the army; and I believe that this will continue indefinitely, as there seems to be no possibility of loosening the grasp of the army upon the revenues of the state. I do not consider the civil government of Mexico strong enough to defy successfully any two of the principal generals in combination, and so long as this condition continues, I regard the civic progress of Mexico as impossible.

(Whereupon, at 12 o'clock noon the committee adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, February 28, 1920, at 10 o'clock a. m.)

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., on Saturday, February 28, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the Subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

STATEMENT OF MR. GEORGE C. CAROTHERS.

(The witness was duly sworn by Mr. Kearful.)

Mr. KEARFUL. Please state your full name.

Mr. CAROTHERS. George C. Carothers.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where do you live?

Mr. CAROTHERS. My present home is Rochester, N. Y.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long have you lived in Mexico?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Since 1889—from 1889 to 1920. I maintained my home there up to two months ago, but I have not been there personally since 1915.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what business were you engaged?

Mr. CAROTHERS. In mining and real estate.

Mr. KEARFUL. What official position did you hold in Mexico?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I was American consular agent from 1900 until 1913. After that I was representing the State Department as special representative.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are familiar with conditions in Mexico during the time of Diaz, Madero, Huerta, and Carranza?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the conditions under Diaz as to security for life and property?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I considered them as equally safe as in the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did law and order prevail?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Absolutely; law and order prevailed everywhere I traveled. I might add that I traveled in the mountain regions on horseback for several years all through the northern part of Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What are the conditions now as contrasted with those you have mentioned?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I consider them to be the opposite.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you mean there is no security anywhere?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Outside of the city of Mexico, and possibly one or two of the larger cities, I would not feel secure, with the exception of places where there are large rebel groups that do maintain order and where I know that Americans can travel.

Mr. KEARFUL. To what groups do you refer?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I refer to groups in southern Mexico under various commands. They claim to be under the command of Felix Diaz, but there are half a dozen down there in charge of those forces.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you refer to Gen. Meixueiro?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes; Gen. Meixueiro and Higinio Aguilar. I have been told several times that he was dead, but I believe that he is alive.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where did he operate?

Mr. CAROTHERS. He operated in between Vera Cruz and Tabasco, partially, and in the north. I believe an American is safe in almost any part of the north outside of possibly some very tough characters that operate in the mountains west of Chihuahua.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you mean Americans are safe in most places outside of the territory controlled by the Carranza forces?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; I do.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you familiar with the nature of reports made by consuls throughout Mexico to the American Government during the latter years of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Reports from the consuls?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes. Do you know the nature of those reports?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Do you mean as to commercial development or as to revolutionary conditions?

Mr. KEARFUL. Generally, as to the reports made during the time of Porfirio Diaz. I understand there was no revolution until the outbreak of the Madero revolution.

Mr. CAROTHERS. During the time of Porfirio Diaz, up until I left the consulate, we were instructed to report on all commercial possibilities and commercial developments in our district, and to give information as to new industries that might be opened up. Those reports were published in a book issued by the State Department, and were disseminated throughout the country, both in the United States and Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did those reports show with reference to opportunities for investment in Mexico and invitation to American citizens to take advantage of those opportunities?

Mr. CAROTHERS. They showed as nearly as possible the conditions existing in the districts from which they emanated, and gave as much detail as they could as to the amount of capital necessary. In many of them they had a number opposite them which indicated that further information could be gotten from the consular bureau in Washington.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have had occasion to examine some of those reports for the purpose of ascertaining their character, have you?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir. I received them in my office and kept files of them in my office.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were the business opportunities for investment as shown in those reports promising or otherwise?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I never saw any that were not promising. The only ones that were published were the promising ones, which appeared to be an invitation to Americans to investigate them and showing them a field where they might migrate.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know whether American citizens generally took advantage of the opportunities set forth in those reports and accepted invitations to go into Mexico and invest their capital and otherwise?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I believe they did. I know that in my consular agency we received numbers of letters regarding different opportunities that developed in the district where I was located. This was done even to the extent of the Mexican Government removing the duty on household goods and machinery and things necessary for the development.

Mr. KEARFUL. Those facts were reported by the consular agents and disseminated throughout the country?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. The evident purpose being to facilitate the movement of citizens of this country to Mexico?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; as an inviting field for American capital.

Mr. KEARFUL. According to your own observation, did American capital take hold of it and go in there?

Mr. CAROTHERS. It did; yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. To a very large extent?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir. In my district there were a great many applications for free importation of furniture and household goods for immigrants coming to the Laguna district.

Mr. KEARFUL. You knew about Mr. William Jennings Bryan having made one or two trips to Mexico, did you not?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I knew of one of them that he made when I was in Torreon, but he did not come through Torreon. I heard of him passing through the other sections.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you seen an article written by him and published in the Commoner, his newspaper, with reference to the opportunities for American citizens in Mexico and inviting them to go there?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; I have read the article.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are, of course, familiar with the attitude taken by Mr. Bryan with respect to American citizens who have gone to Mexico after he became Secretary of State?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir. I have had numberless people tell me of interviews that they have had with him and statements that he had made to different committees that had gone to see him.

Mr. KEARFUL. How does that attitude compare with the one which was published in the Commoner?

Mr. CAROTHERS. It was entirely different.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was his attitude, so far as you know, with respect to American citizens who had gone there upon invitation of this Government supported by his article in the Commoner?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I always considered that he paid no attention to them at all, that he did not care for their advice or information with regard to conditions there, considering that they had interests in Mexico and would naturally be prejudiced.

Mr. KEARFUL. Because they had interests they were not to be depended upon to tell the truth?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was his attitude toward protecting American interests in Mexico as soon as the first trouble began? What did he advise them to do?

Mr. CAROTHERS. When the first trouble began he was not Secretary of State.

Mr. KEARFUL. After he became Secretary of State, when the real serious troubles began?

Mr. CAROTHERS. His attitude seemed to be a desire to have them get out of Mexico rather than to remain and be a cause of constant worry to the State Department; that he would prefer to have them leave the country and leave what they had there.

Mr. KEARFUL. He ordered them to leave the country?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; he ordered them several times to leave the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. The first orders that were given for Americans to leave the country were given by Mr. Bryan, were they not?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I believe so. I sent out all of the Americans from my district who cared to go, under one of his instructions.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you ever heard of the position taken by the administration of which Bryan was Secretary of State that Americans operating in Mexico were not entitled to consideration, because they were a group of speculators operating under iniquitous concessions obtained by fraud or bribery from Mexican officials?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Nothing but hearsay with regard to that. I have heard a great deal about that version, and it was generally accepted among the Americans in my district that that was the opinion at Washington.

Mr. KEARFUL. That involves two propositions, the character of Americans operating in Mexico and the nature of the concessions referred to. Will you please state what you observed with reference to the character of the Americans operating in Mexico?

Mr. CAROTHERS. With very few exceptions, the Americans in Mexico were men of very good character. They were industrious, paid their bills, and, with one exception, I never knew of anyone that could not come back to the United States very freely.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do not believe the statements disseminated by Carrancista propagandists in this country that a great many of the Americans were in Mexico because they could not live in the United States?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was not true with respect to those Americans in your district?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Absolutely not. The Americans that made money in Mexico that I knew made it by hard work and honorable work.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the nature of the concessions that were granted to foreigners?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I consider that word "concession" is a very much misconstrued word in this country and has led Americans to believe that it is getting something for nothing. I have had considerable to do with the getting of concessions in Mexico, and I always found that while the Mexican Government gave something in return, the concessionaire is always called upon to perform value received. The usual exemptions in a concession were the free importation of machinery and materials where industries were concerned, and an exemption from taxation for a certain period of years, usually 10 years.

Mr. KEARFUL. A period corresponding somewhat to the prospect of the industry becoming permanently established, is that the idea?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was the concessionaire under obligation to expend certain amounts of money and do certain things in a specified time?

Mr. CAROTHERS. He was called upon to invest a certain amount of money within a specified time and also to guarantee the performance of his obligations by the deposit of Government bonds which were subject to forfeiture.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have some knowledge of similar concessions granted by Government authority in this country, have you not, by way of licenses to street railroad companies and gas companies and railroad companies, etc.?

Mr. CAROTHERS. My knowledge is only the common knowledge of reading the newspapers with reference to the franchises that are granted. I would consider a franchise a concession more than a concession is considered in Mexico as being something of value for nothing.

Mr. KEARFUL. According to your knowledge of the franchises or concessions granted for the purpose of inaugurating new enterprises beneficial to the people in this country, how do they compare with those granted in Mexico with reference to liberality?

Mr. CAROTHERS. They are far more liberal in this country. I can cite one instance of one large agricultural company in Mexico that got a concession. The first act that their concession required was the digging of a canal 78 kilometers long, which cost them over a million pesos. It opened up land that was at that time worth practically nothing, while that same land to-day is worth 200 pesos an acre. The only concession that I recollect that they got from the Mexican Government was the water rights from the river—that they would be permitted to take out a certain amount of water from the river.

Mr. KEARFUL. That water was to be used in irrigating large tracts of land?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes; for cotton purposes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And the cultivation of that land would furnish employment to Mexicans?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes. It was originally to furnish employment to foreigners and a large negro colony was taken down there, but afterwards they got out from that part of the concession and were allowed to colonize with Mexicans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have the operations of the Americans and other foreigners in Mexico tended to an improvement of the condition of the Mexican people, or otherwise?

Mr. CAROTHERS. They have tended to the improvement of them far more than any other nationality. They furnish their employees better houses, pay them better wages, give them better schools, and, you may say, doctors and hospitals. I know it to be a fact that the Mexican laborer prefers to work for an American enterprise rather than any other.

Mr. KEARFUL. Even a Mexican?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes; even a Mexican.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the relation that existed between the Mexican people and the American operators with reference to cordiality and good feeling, before the recent revolution?

Mr. CAROTHERS. They regarded us as warm friends individually, almost without exception. We were cordially received and treated with every hospitality. I personally have traveled through the country and found people to give me a warm welcome everywhere, furnishing me fresh horses and food and taking no pay for it, and such things as that.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have not been able to do that in this country, have you?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you in Mexico at the time of the inception of the Madero revolution?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir. I was consular agent in Torreon at the time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you personally acquainted with Madero?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What character of man was he with reference to strength and ability?

Mr. CAROTHERS. He was regarded as a joke when he got into the revolution, but the people of Torreon and vicinity held him in very high esteem personally as a planter. They considered him a vegetarian and dreamer, but an honorable man.

Mr. KEARFUL. How was he esteemed by the members of his own family, his brothers, his father, and his grandfather?

Mr. CAROTHERS. All that I could see of the family before the revolution caused me to think that they seemed to be cordial, but after the revolution the whole family repudiated him even to the extent of issuing public statements, some of which I read at the time, in which they characterized him as being crazy.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know Gustavo Madero, his brother?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I did; yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. After the success of the Madero revolution, what did you learn with reference to the activities of Gustavo in support of the revolution?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I learned that Gustavo had been supporting it for some time, that he had taken money that he had secured for a mining or industrial enterprise and had financed the revolution with it, and that his first act upon Madero's assumption of the Government was to collect this amount.

Mr. KEARFUL. From the Government?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes; from the Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know from whom the money was obtained by Gustavo in the first instance?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir; but I understood it was from foreign investors. I would rather not express an opinion of Gustavo, because he is dead now, but my opinion is not very favorable.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the general understanding in Mexico with reference to the operations of Gustavo after Francisco became president?

Mr. CAROTHERS. He was recognized as the head of the "Porra," as they call them in Mexico. I could not give a description of what that is except that possibly it means the head of the inside political group of Madero politicians.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was generally considered to be the operation of that group?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Practically the dominating of the president himself in all public matters, forcing him to obey them rather than to follow his leadership.

Mr. KEARFUL. For what purpose, for private or public purpose?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Private purpose, private graft, and I might add power—graft and power.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you in Torreon at the time of the taking of that city by the Madero forces?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir. I can not recall the date, but after the rebels came in Emilio Madero assumed charge.

Mr. KEARFUL. The brother of Francisco?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have occasion to learn about the massacre of Chinese in Torreon at that time?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; I had a great deal to do with the stopping of that massacre.

Mr. KEARFUL. By whom were the Chinese massacred?

Mr. CAROTHERS. By the rebels. Nearly all of the Chinamen who were killed were killed in the suburb before the rebels got into the middle of the town.

Mr. KEARFUL. By "rebels" you mean the Madero forces?

Mr. CAROTHERS. The Madero rebels; yes, sir; under the leadership of Benjamin Argumedo, Sixto Ugalde, and Machrino Martinez, and many others.

Mr. KEARFUL. How many Chinese were killed?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Three hundred and three was the official count so far as we could determine it at the time.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the purpose or pretext for killing those Chinese?

Mr. CAROTHERS. The Maderistas thought the Chinamen had been armed by the Federal commander and had assisted in the defense of the city.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there any evidence of that so far as you could find?

Mr. CAROTHERS. There was evidence that they tried to show me that might be convincing to some people, but it was never convincing to me. They tried to prove that a group of some 30 or 35 Chinamen had fought from one of the Chinese gardens, and that after being run out they had thrown their weapons into a well. I was present when these rifles were taken from the well, and the fact that they were in the well on Chinese property was offered to me as convincing evidence that the Chinamen had used them. I refuted their statement by asking them if the volunteers of Nuevo Leon, who were fighting under the Federal authorities, had not been stationed behind a railroad embankment very close to this Chinese garden, and that it was very possible that the rifles found in that well had belonged to those volunteers. I reported all this fully to the State Department at the time.

Mr. KEARFUL. There was not any pretense, was there, that the Chinese had actually attacked the Madero forces?

Mr. CAROTHERS. They tried to convince me that they had actually attacked them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Simply by showing you some rifles that had afterwards been found in a well?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; and by a hole in a wall which they claimed could not have been made except from a bullet fired from a Chinese laundry which was in front of this wall.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that convincing?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Why not?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Because I figured that that bullet fired through an adobe wall might make a hole large enough to have been fired from any other direction. It came from the direction of the laundry—yes—but I could not see, as they claimed, that it could only have been fired from that place.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the character of the Chinese there? Was it any different from the well-known pacific character of Chinese generally?

Mr. CAROTHERS. None whatever. You might consider them a model colony. It was under the direct supervision of Sin Chück, one of the most prominent Chinamen in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Had any Chinamen ever been known to take part in any politics of the country?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir; not that I know of.

Mr. KEARFUL. Or to have done anything in any of the revolutionary movements?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Not that I know of.

Mr. KEARFUL. They did not cite you to any, did they?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you make any effort to prevent the continued massacre of Chinese at that place at that time?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir. I heard that those Chinamen were being massacred at 7 o'clock in the morning, and I sent a friend of mine in his automobile to find Emilio Madero in order to enter a vigorous protest. Mader came to my house, and I told him that the world would consider this massacre as an outrage, and that it must be stopped. Even he tried to convince me that the rebels had been fired upon by the Chinamen.

Mr. KEARFUL. Emilio Madero himself at first did not want to take steps to stop the killing?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir. He finally agreed to it after some half hour's argument with him and gave orders to concentrate all of the Chinamen in a Chinese bank building that was on the opposite corner from my office. By 8 o'clock that night some 800 Chinamen had been assembled there under a heavy guard. Even after his order had been issued, however, quite a number were killed. I recall one instance where there were 19 assembled in one building on the edge of town, and while they were being driven through the streets toward the bank they were made to run. It had been raining the day before, and the streets were very slippery; and if a Chinaman fell down, they would kill him and tramp on him with their horses. I think 9 out of the 19 arrived at the bank.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did the Chinese offer any resistance at all?

Mr. CAROTHERS. None whatever.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you have any knowledge of the real reason for killing them?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I think it started with the idea that they had been firing on them, but ended up in the looting of the Chinese bodies because the Chinamen all had their money in their shoes, and when they were buried none of the Chinamen had any shoes on. I was told by many people that when a Chinaman was killed they would take his shoes off and search them for money.

Mr. KEARFUL. If the charge that the Chinese were resisting Madistas were a mere pretext, then the actual reason for killing them was to rob them?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir. Another reason I believe is that it could be attributed to their desire for blood. They had had no real fighting in taking the city, and when they found they could freely kill the Chinamen, they used that as a sport to satisfy their desire to kill.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they seem to regard it as sport?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was the principal military commander under Madero who achieved the first military successes?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Do you mean in Torreon?

Mr. KEARFUL. In the revolution.

Mr. CAROTHERS. Pascual Orozco.

Mr. KEARFUL. What character of man was Pascual?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I always considered him as a very good man and good leader. He was a man of very mediocre intelligence and education, but he was a good man.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was he friendly to the Americans?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he commit depredations, or did he protect the people and their property?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I think he tried to protect them, as far as he could personally. All the leaders that tried to protect property down there were handicapped by the fact that a lot of their subordinates would do things that they were given credit for later on. I think Orozco was one of the best of the leaders with regard to protecting property.

Mr. KEARFUL. After Madero's accession to the presidency, do you remember that Orozco revolted?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know the reason for that?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I think the reason originated in Juarez over the situation when he evacuated. I think there was some serious difficulty between Orozco and Madero, in which Villa interfered at the time. I never knew the details of it.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was before Madero became president?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes; that was before he became president.

Mr. KEARFUL. That difference was patched up, was it not?

Mr. CAROTHERS. It was patched up, but there was always a rankling between them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think Orozco had any real grievance against Madero which would justify that revolt?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I do not know enough about that to express an opinion.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was Orozco successful in his revolt?

Mr. CAROTHERS. For a time; yes, sir. Up to the time that Gen. Gonzalez Salas, the Federal commander, met him at this battle field and they both thought they were whipped, Orozco thought he was whipped and Gen. Salas thought he was whipped, and one committed suicide and the other returned, leaving the battle field vacant.

Mr. KEARFUL. Gonzalez Salas committed suicide and Orozco retreated?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir. That was practically the end of the revolution then. Huerta then went back to Madero, and he reorganized the Federal army at that time and made a clean sweep from Torreon to Juarez.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you in Mexico at the time of the downfall of Madero?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; I was in Torreon.

Mr. KEARFUL. Prior to that time, what was the sentiment of the people in the region with reference to Madero?

Mr. CAROTHERS. At first they were very enthusiastic, but within a very short time after they realized that Madero's family had really gotten in control of the Government, they became dissatisfied and convinced that there was more trouble in sight—that is, that Madero could not rule.

Mr. KEARFUL. How was the downfall of Madero received by the Mexicans in that region?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Torreon went to Huerta right away.

Mr. KEARFUL. They were satisfied with the change from Madero to Huerta?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; everybody felt a great relief. They seemed to think that by that change in Mexico City, it would really bring a settlement of the entire situation.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it the idea that Huerta could reestablish the system of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And they had confidence in that?

Mr. CAROTHERS. They had confidence in that. What I mean by the system of Gen. Diaz was up to the time Gen. Diaz himself controlled the Government, because for several years prior to his downfall he had very little to do with the Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. But they had lost confidence in Madero and wished to revert to the system established by Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that the general sentiment in the country?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. They believed Huerta was the man to do that?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the condition of business and property interests under the rule of Huerta? Was property and life secure under Huerta?

Mr. CAROTHERS. We felt so; yes, sir. We felt an antagonism a very short time after Huerta took control when he did not get recognition at once; we felt a tightening up against Americans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did that go to the extent of hostility toward Americans, active hostility?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir; it did not go that far.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did the first hostility toward Americans manifest itself?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I should say when Mr. Lind was sent to Mexico it became the most manifest.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did that hostility manifest itself in any acts prior to the landing of the forces at Vera Cruz?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I do not think so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Even after the landing at Vera Cruz in the territory controlled by Huerta did Americans receive protection?

Mr. CAROTHERS. As far as I know, they did; yes, sir. I am referring to hostility in territory occupied and controlled by Huerta at that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were in Mexico at the time of the outbreak of the Carranza revolution against Huerta?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was the principal military man who contributed to the early success of the Carranza revolution?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I would consider that the Carranza revolution had never had any successes to amount to anything until Villa took charge and gained several very important victories over the federals. Carranza had operated in the northern part of the State of Coahuila and had been run out from there and gone overland to Sonora. The Huerta forces were coming north and they had met with material success.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think the success of the Carranza revolution was due to Villa?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; I do.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the first principal victory obtained by Villa?

Mr. CAROTHERS. The first big victory was the attack on Torreon.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you there at that time?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was Carranza there?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir. Carranza was in Sonora.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he go to Torreon shortly afterwards?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Very much later; many months later.

Mr. KEARFUL. How was Carranza regarded by the military men under Villa at that time?

Mr. CAROTHERS. They regarded him as chief of the revolution, but he was so far away that his influence was not felt. They relied entirely on Villa.

Mr. KEARFUL. How was he treated when he came to Torreon?

Mr. CAROTHERS. He went to Juarez first on his way to Torreon, and when he got to Torreon the effect of his coming over was not felt so much. The treatment that he received was more noticeable in Chihuahua and Juarez than in Torreon. There was considerable antagonism against him by the time he arrived in Torreon. He stopped there only a day, I think.

Mr. KEARFUL. What occurred with reference to the property interests of people in Torreon when it was taken by Villa?

Mr. CAROTHERS. The city of Torreon had regarded Villa's acts in Parral as indicating that he would do the same thing when he reached Torreon, and everyone feared that he would loot the city. His attack commenced about 5 o'clock in the afternoon. The federals evacuated at 8 o'clock, and by 11 o'clock Villa was in full possession of the city and had a guard on every street corner.

The only rioting that occurred in Torreon was on the first two streets, in which some 10 or 15 stores were looted principally for the purpose of getting hats and shoes. None of the Villistas had any hats, as one of the signals they had decided on among themselves was that they would wear no hats so they could recognize each other, and so they left their hats out in the hills.

Mr. KEARFUL. What occurred with reference to looting?

Mr. CAROTHERS. They looted some 10 or 15 stores, but this was stopped within a very short time and several of the looters were killed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Executed for looting?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir. By 11 o'clock at night the city was very quiet and guards stationed on every street corner. The next morning at daylight I sent a communication to Gen. Villa asking protection for Americans and their property, and within an hour a squad of 25 men and an officer appeared with a letter from Villa stating that he sent these men to guard American property and that they would take orders from me as to where to be stationed. At 11 o'clock in the morning I went to his headquarters and saw him for the first time. I had never seen him before.

Mr. KEARFUL. In Villa's subsequent operations did he manifest respect for property rights or not?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; he did.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was his attitude toward Americans?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I always considered him to be a real friend of the Americans. He did everything possible in issuing orders stopping any outrages against American property.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the secret of the power of Villa over his men?

Mr. CAROTHERS. He possessed both the fear and the love of his men.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was his attitude in regard to Federal prisoners at places taken by him?

Mr. CAROTHERS. During his first battles he killed all his prisoners; but after he had a conference with Gen. Scott on the border, at which time Gen. Scott gave him a little book on the rules of war, he changed, and at the taking of Torreon the Federals left their hospitals full of wounded under the care of the British vice consul to be turned over to Villa when he took the city.

Mr. KEARFUL. What happened to the prisoners?

Mr. CAROTHERS. They were treated with the same care as the Villa wounded.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you attribute that to the influence of Gen. Scott and the rules of war that he gave Villa?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the custom previously about the killing of prisoners among Mexicans generally?

Mr. CAROTHERS. It was on the basis of an eye for an eye. The Federals killed all of their prisoners, and it was a matter of reprisal.

Mr. KEARFUL. It was not an uncommon thing for either side to kill prisoners?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did the attitude of Carranza toward Americans compare with that of Villa?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Carranza was a stickler always for great formality, and he would never act immediately and openly with us. He would receive a representation and take it under consideration and insist on telegraphing for information, and seemed always to hesitate and think that he would be criticized by his officers for catering to the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. Can you illustrate the difference between the attitude of Villa and Carranza by reference to the positions they took at the time of the Vera Cruz landing?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir. I have some copies of some reports I made at that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. I notice that in the answer of Gen. Carranza, transmitted through you to Mr. Bryan, that he stated that he considered acts committed at Vera Cruz as acts highly offensive to the dignity and independence of Mexico and contrary to our reiterated declarations of not desiring to sever the state of peace and friendship with the Mexican nation, and that the reply of Carranza was generally antagonistic and truculent, whereas the answer of Villa as reported by you to President Wilson was conciliatory and friendly in its tone.

Mr. CAROTHERS. That is true.

Mr. KEARFUL. Does that illustrate the difference in character between the two men?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes. It would be difficult for me to go into detail of the merits of those two reports, but I felt constantly an antagonism in my dealings with Carranza and I never felt anything of that kind with Villa. Those two incidents strengthen that conviction that I had at that time. Villa came to the border after Carranza sent his note. I understand that Villa had some words with Carranza in Chihuahua and that he took the train and came up to the border and the people of El Paso had heard that Villa was coming up with nine trains of soldiers to attack El Paso. The military made great preparations and trained their guns on Juarez and were ready to fight. When I heard Villa was over across the river I went over to see him immediately, and found him there with a very small guard around his house within 200 yards of the border. I had dinner with him that night. When I went back at 11 o'clock I telegraphed the State Department what he had told me.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did Villa say and what was his attitude about the incident? Just state it in your own words, if you remember what he said.

Mr. CAROTHERS. He said that no act of Huerta's would change his feeling of freindship toward the United States and embroil him in a fight with us; that Carranza had replied in a telegram that he had not approved of at all; that he had deemed it best to come to the border and see that the relations were kept cordial.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember that the day following the landing at Vera Cruz Mr. Bryan sent an explanation of that operation to Carranza and Villa?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. In that telegram instructions were given to make known the President's position, and the President's position was stated in these words:

The President does not hold any resolution that could be construed as authorizing him to engage in war. All he asks and all that would be given is a resolution declaring that he is justified in using the armed forces to compel redress of a specific indemnity.

'Then I omit some and read further:

The taking of the customhouse at Vera Cruz was made necessary by Huerta's refusal to make proper reparation for the arrest of the American sailors.

Do you remember the incident referred to by the statement "arrest of the American sailors?"

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; I only know about that by hearsay, though, of what happened in Tampico.

Mr. KEARFUL. It is a matter of common knowledge that some American sailors were arrested there and that a salute was demanded to the American flag, and as that salute was refused, the taking of Vera Cruz followed?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. You understand the explanation given by Bryan to be that the taking of the customhouse at Vera Cruz was a measure made necessary by the Tampico flag incident?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I understood that was his reason for it; yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. He states that it was made necessary by Huerta's refusal to make proper reparation for the arrest of American sailors?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And that the arrest of American sailors referred to the Tampico incident?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. In that connection I will refer to statements made in the Democratic campaign textbook in 1916. On page 56 it was said:

We took Vera Cruz to show Mexico that Huerta, the despot and murderer in temporary authority at Mexico City, must go.

On page 68 it was said:

The American forces were not sent in to Vera Cruz to compel the salute to the American flag. When Huerta refused the President's ultimatum, he created a need that more complete reparation be given for his offenses. That was the sort of reparation which the President was intent upon procuring. In a word, it was to break the waning power of the dictator and to bring his bloody reign to an end, since in no other way could normal international relations be restored. A stoppage of the delivery of a shipment of arms on board the German steamship Yperanga, consigned to Huerta, which was due at Vera Cruz the morning of the seizure, was but an incidental consideration in the order for the capture of that port. The fact that arms later reached the Mexicans through another port is irrelevant to the weighing of the Vera Cruz incident, for it did not alter the certainty that the President's main purpose would be realized.

Is it not apparent to you that the explanation given by Mr. Bryan on the day following the landing at Vera Cruz was not the truth, if the statements subsequently written in the Democratic campaign textbook for 1916 were true?

Mr. CAROTHERS. That is very apparent. I think that Carranza's reply indicates that they did not consider that those were the motives at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. You think Carranza attempted to make it plain that he did not believe what Bryan said in explanation?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. According to the Democratic textbook, Carranza was right?

Mr. CAROTHERS. It seems to.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you receive any instructions from Mr. Bryan with reference to negotiating for peace between Carranza and Villa?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were those instructions?

Mr. CAROTHERS. He impressed on me in two letters that I received the necessity of keeping them together.

Mr. KEARFUL. In one letter which you have, dated June 24, 1914, addressed to you and signed by Mr. Bryan, he states in the last paragraph as follows:

Do not overlook any opportunity to advise Carranza and Villa against any falling out. It is essential to the case of the constitutionalists that they work harmoniously together.

You received that letter, did you?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I did. I considered those as instructions to continue along those lines, and I used every effort that I could to keep them together and to prevent any breach.

Mr. KEARFUL. You also have a letter signed by Mr. Bryan addressed to you dated August 11, 1914, and with that letter was a statement dated July 23, which appeared to be prepared by President Wilson. Is that correct?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. In the statement of July 23 is this language:

We have been forced by circumstances into a position in which we must practically speak for the rest of the world. It is evident that the United States is the only first-class power that can be expected to take the initiative in recognizing the new Government. It will in effect act as the representative of the other powers of the world in this matter and will unquestionably be held responsible for the consequences.

In Mr. Bryan's letter of August 11, 1914, is this statement:

If, in July, it appeared that we spoke for the rest of the world, you will recognize the increased seriousness of our position to-day. Consul Silliman has been instructed to use his good offices with Gen. Carranza and you are to do the same with Gen. Villa to the end that their differences may be adjusted and their progress may be harmonious from this time forward.

The statement that the administration of this Government was speaking for the rest of the world and was acting as the representative of the other powers of the world and would be held responsible by them for the consequences, indicates some agreement between this Government and the other powers of the world with respect to Mexico. Do you know anything about such agreement?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir. I heard from several sources, that I can not now remember, that some agreement had been reached to that effect, but I had no definite knowledge of it.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do not know that this Government agreed with foreign powers to be responsible to them and their nationals for what might occur in Mexico, in consideration that this country being given a free hand in Mexico?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir; but from the sources of information that I had at that time, it was my impression that such an agreement had been reached and that we were responsible, and that one of the reasons other countries were not taking active steps to protect their people and their property was that we were looking after them. That belief was strengthened by the insistence of the department that Carranza, during the time he was in Sonora and in Chihuahua, should receive representations through us for other nationalities which he always opposed, and he demanded that representatives of the other nations be sent directly to him. In all my representations with Carranza this was always one of the stumbling blocks that I had with him to get him to listen to me with regard to other foreigners than Americans.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was Villia's estimate of Carranza?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I do not know that Carranza and Villa ever met until they met in Chihuahua, and I think that his estimate was formed entirely by hearsay until he met him. He always declared to me that he recognized Carranza as the head of the revolution, and up to the time of the Torreon split he insisted that he was true to Carranza, but I always considered that he had formed an antagonism toward Carranza because he was convinced that Carranza was trying to belittle him, that Carranza was always making little of his victories and trying to surround him with obstacles; to always place obstacles in his path, and in reports that were made about matters in territory controlled by Villa he did not want to mix in with them and did not want to assume the responsibility. Villa was antagonistic to him almost from the day they met in Chihuahua on that account, although he claimed that he was true to him and loyal.

Mr. KEARFUL. I notice in a letter which you wrote to Secretary Bryan, dated July 5, 1914, in speaking of Villa's attitude toward Carranza, you said:

He considers that Carranza is surrounded by politicians who are feathering their nests and laying the foundation for a far more despotic government than ever before.

Was that a correct statement of Villa's attitude at that time?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; that is part of his attitude.

Mr. KEARFUL. What have subsequent developments shown with reference to the correctness of that estimate?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I think the subsequent developments have fully justified the estimate.

Mr. KEARFUL. In your efforts toward carrying out the mission of protecting American rights and negotiating for the removal of differences between Carranza and Villa, did you have the cordial support of the Washington authorities?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir. I never felt that I had any support. I felt that I was being left alone on my own initiative. I felt it was like pulling teeth to get any expression out of them. The only expressions that I ever got from them were the two to which I have just referred. I felt that they were not paying attention to the Mexican situation.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you come to Washington at various times for conference with Mr. Bryan?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir. I came here twice after I was made special representative and I had hoped to be able to see the President.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever get to see the President?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir. He expressed a desire to see me on the day that Mrs. Wilson died, but owing to her severe illness he had to postpone it and I left without seeing him.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were your conferences with Mr. Bryan satisfactory?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir. Mr. Bryan seemed always to wish that I would end the interview. I wanted to talk to him and get some light on the situation, but he never would open up and tell me anything that I wanted to know. After he left the secretaryship, Mr. Lansing took it over and I never did get to see Mr. Lansing. I saw Mr. Polk for five minutes when he was acting secretary. I felt that I was alone in my efforts there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please state briefly, what were the circumstances of the first break between Villa and Carranza?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Villa had received orders to reinforce Gen. Natera, who was attacking the city of Zacatecas. Villa protested against such an order as he considered that Natera had already been repulsed, and that if he went down with 3,000 men, that he would also be repulsed; and Carranza told him he was commander in chief, and that he must obey orders, and Villa refused to go. That led to other recriminations on both sides, and brought about the split. I was in Torreon at the time, and I felt the split coming, and I went to Villa and requested that he hold off several days. I think that my interview with him was on Tuesday, and he promised to wait until Saturday. I took a train and went to Saltillo and arrived there on Wednesday, and tried to get an interview with Carranza through his minister of foreign relations. But I was and am convinced that Carranza purposely held me off until after the split would come. I did not get to see him until Saturday afternoon, when he informed me that he had just finished a telephonic conference with Villa, in which he, Villa, had resigned his command and that the following day his successor would be chosen by a meeting of generals in Torreon. I urged upon him the necessity of patching up the break, but he appeared to be overjoyed that the breach had come, and he would not listen to my reasoning. I reported the conditions to Washington that night and returned to Torreon the following morning.

Do you want me to describe the patching up of that break afterwards?

Mr. KEARFUL. Presently. What attitude did the generals of the division of the north under the command of Villa take with reference to Villa's resignation?

Mr. CAROTHERS. They refused to permit Villa to resign and defied Carranza, and said that they would desert from his standard and follow Villa.

Mr. KEARFUL. And Villa was not permitted by them to resign?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What, then, was done with reference to reconciliation between Villa and Carranza?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Villa took the whole army and went to Zacatecas, and whipped Huerta, and telegraphed his victory to Carranza, as he had done before. In the meantime the Carranza generals in command of the other divisions had approached Carranza and secured his permission to go to Torreon and try to patch up the difference between them. This commission was sent over under—do you want the names of the men that went?

Mr. KEARFUL. It is not necessary.

Mr. CAROTHERS. And they came to an agreement, which I forwarded to Washington at the time. This agreement apparently patched up their differences.

Mr. KEARFUL. Leaving Villa in command of the division of the north?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Leaving Villa in command of the division of the north. But, as I informed Washington, the agreement did not seem to me to settle the difference.

Mr. KEARFUL. To what do you attribute the difficulty or the impossibility of removing the differences? Was it the attitude of Villa or Carranza?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Carranza was intensely jealous of Villa or Villa victories, and the confidence that Villa had gained at the time. He seemed to be overshadowing Carranza in Carranza's estimation.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you observed that attitude on the part of Carranza with reference to any other generals subsequently?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; and all through the revolution, and several others besides, and when he went to Sonora. His first arrival was in Sinaloa, and Gen. Rivera, the constitutional governor, helped him in every way possible, and placed himself under his command. He went to Sonora, and Mr. Maytorena, in Sonora, also received him with open arms. He was not there two weeks before the Pesqueira faction brought about difficulties between him and Maytorena and Rivera, and he tried to oust both of them. The same thing happened with Gen. Angeles, almost identical.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the Angeles incident?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I attributed it to his jealousy. He sent Angeles to join Villa. I do not recall any special incident except that Angeles abandoned him when the split came and joined Villa's side.

Mr. KEARFUL. Subsequently when Villa was defeated by Obregon, and driven to the North, after he had been in Mexico City, what was the attitude of Carranza toward Obregon?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Also one of jealousy toward Obregon.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you know of the operation of that attitude of Carranza toward Obregon? How did it manifest itself?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I do not know the particulars, but I know that it forced Obregon to either fight him or get out. I know Obregon chose to get out of the cabinet and to go back to Sonora into the garbanzo business as a private citizen.

Mr. KEARFUL. You observed then that Carranza has always taken the position actuated by jealousy which necessitated his successful military leaders either to fight him or to leave the army.

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And in the case of Villa he determined to fight him?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. With what success?

Mr. CAROTHERS. He succeeded up to the time of this Silao battle, and it seemed as though Villa was going to win out.

Mr. KEARFUL. I want you to state what he did, and how he did it?

Mr. CAROTHERS. What Villa did?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. CAROTHERS. Well, he organized a very large army and equipped it, better than an army has ever been equipped in Mexico; that is, as to discipline, and he went under the advice of Gen. Angeles to a very great extent. Wherever he would go he installed a very satisfactory government to the people that were there. He even took possession of Mexico City and made peace with Zapata, and held a convention in Aguascalientes, where he endeavored to have Carranza and his faction participate.

Mr. KEARFUL. The first entry of the Carranza forces into Mexico City occurred at the time when Carranza and Villa were operating together, did it not, when they were reconciled?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. In August, 1914?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir. The split took place very shortly afterwards.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the occasion of the break that occurred after that?

Mr. CAROTHERS. It was over the convention that Carranza tried to hold in Mexico City, and Villa refused to attend it, because he claimed that Carranza would have a packed convention and would have himself proclaimed as president.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the original plan under which they were all fighting?

Mr. CAROTHERS. The plan of Guadalupe, in which a convention would be held—I do not recollect all of the conditions. There were very few in the Guadalupe convention, or that Guadalupe plan, but Villa did not consider that the Mexico City convention would follow out the promises that had been made.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the promises?

Mr. CAROTHERS. That an election would be called at once.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was it in reference to the convention?

Mr. CAROTHERS. That this convention would not be a representative convention.

Mr. KEARFUL. But what was the promise in reference to a convention, and what the convention would do? As I understand it, it was that a convention would be called immediately upon the entrance into Mexico City for the purpose of selecting a provisional president.

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who would rule until the election should be called?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; that was the promise.

Mr. KEARFUL. And Villa refused to attend the convention called by Carranza in Mexico City because of his conviction that Carranza would pack the convention and instead of having a provisional president appointed would have himself appointed and would not hold elections.

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; that was Villa's conviction.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then, what was done with reference to holding a convention?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Gen. Obregon and a party of Carranza's officers held several conferences with Villa on the Plan of Guadalupe in Zacatecas and they finally agreed upon holding a convention in Aguascalientes, which would be neutralized, and this convention was held. It was held up to the time that Carranza refused to recognize it, when the Carranza delegates realized that Carranza was not going to sanction the provisional President that was named at that convention, and the Carranza delegates stole the flag that they had all kissed and signed, and deserted the convention.

Mr. KEARFUL. You refer to the flag that they had all signed and kissed. Was that supposed to be a very solemn ceremony at the opening of the convention at which they all pledged their honor to abide by the decisions of the convention?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; it was a very solemn occasion. Some of them even cried, wept, when they signed it and kissed it.

Mr. KEARFUL. And afterwards when the Carranza delegates bolted they stole the flag?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was Villa's attitude toward the convention held at Aguascalientes?

Mr. CAROTHERS. He agreed to abide by its decisions.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he have military control of that region, such as to coerce the convention?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir; he was up at Guadalupe Station, which is, I should judge, 100 miles or more away, and the forces that were in control at Aguascalientes were a combination of the two forces, and there were very few in the city. It do not believe there were over 500 men in the whole city.

Mr. KEARFUL. Of what was this convention composed?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Supposed to be composed of delegates from Sonora, from the Zapata government, and the Villa elements, and the Carranza delegates, who had come up authorized to represent Carranza, presumably.

Mr. KEARFUL. How were those delegates selected?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I could not tell you.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were they selected by the different armies, one man to each thousand under arms?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I think they were sent by the controlling leaders in those sections.

Mr. KEARFUL. They were all generals, were they not?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No; there were a lot of civilians—lawyers, doctors.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think it was a representative convention, really representing the people of Mexico?

Mr. CAROTHERS. It was the most representative convention that ever was held in Mexico, and they had more freedom of speech than ever had been witnessed in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. At what time was that convention at Aguascalientes operating?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Mr. Canova, who had been sent down to work with me, was reporting on the convention. I find among my papers a copy of a document handed me by him showing that Gutierrez was the President elected by the convention November 12, 1914.

Mr. KEARFUL. The convention was functioning during October, 1914?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; October and November; part of October and part of November, 1914.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the result of the convention?

Mr. CAROTHERS. The election of Eulalio Gutierrez as a provisional President and the naming of Villa as commander in chief of the army and the declaration of Carranza as a rebel.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did the convention forces of Villa do then?

Mr. CAROTHERS. They proceeded south immediately to Mexico City, where they arrived on the 1st of December, without any fighting.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you in Mexico City at that time?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I was with Villa.

Mr. KEARFUL. At the time of his entrance into Mexico City?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes; I had my car attached to his train.

Mr. KEARFUL. What occurred between Villa and Emiliano Zapata, who was operating in the State of Morelos?

Mr. CAROTHERS. They held a meeting at Xochimilco, a suburb of Mexico City, in which they came to a definite understanding, and they made a triumphal entry into Mexico City the next day, with both their armies, their combined armies.

Mr. KEARFUL. Those Zapatistas had previously driven the Carrancistas out of Mexico City?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; and the Zapatistas were in charge of the City of Mexico and in control of it.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did the people of Mexico City receive the Zapatistas?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I was told that they first feared them, but after they took possession of the city they were very much pleased to see that the soldiery was humble and respectful, and that they had done no looting at all. I remember of no instance of their looting places.

Mr. KEARFUL. They protected the property of the inhabitants?

Mr. CAROTHERS. They protected the property of the inhabitants.

Mr. KEARFUL. They feared them because of the stories they heard about the savagery of the followers of Zapata?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And they found that they were not that sort of people?

Mr. CAROTHERS. That they were just humble peasants with guns in their hands.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say that you were told that? That was the sentiment of the people of the city?

Mr. CAROTHERS. That was the sentiment; I was told that by the people of the city as well as the foreign representatives of the Diplomatic Corps. I was invited to attend an afternoon tea at the Brazilian Minister's home where I met all the Diplomatic Corps, and they all commented on the conduct of the Zapatistas; and the principal thing that they wanted to impress upon me was the hope that Villa would continue along the same lines.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say that Villa and Zapata had met and agreed to cooperate?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they do so?

Mr. CAROTHERS. They did so. One of the terms of this agreement was that Villa would go north and take over the coal fields and the oil fields, and Zapata would stay in the city and clean up from Mexico City to Vera Cruz.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where was Carranza then?

Mr. CAROTHERS. At Vera Cruz. Zapata only got as far as Puebla and his Indian troops wanted to go home to Morelos to their farms. His army practically disintegrated at Puebla, which permitted Carranza to reorganize an army in Vera Cruz under Gen. Obregon.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what did Villa do?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Villa went north to see Gen. Scott at the border. His immediate purpose was to see Scott.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you present at the meeting between Scott and Villa?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of any promise having been made by Scott to Villa by way of recognition of him in case he would comply with certain conditions?

Mr. CAROTHERS. None whatever.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the purpose of the meeting?

Mr. CAROTHERS. The trouble arising at the New Mexico border in which one of the Villa adherents, Gen. Maytorena was attacking Naco and several Americans had been killed on the American side, and the object was to have Villa order Maytorena to withdraw. Villa applied to Scott for eight hours in which to attack the town, if the Americans would withdraw for eight hours, that he would attack the town, and Scott very patiently denied it, and finally told him—

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean, if the Americans would withdraw from the proximity of the battle?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes; if the Americans would withdraw from the proximity of the battle, and Gen. Scott finally told him that he would crack him if he did not withdraw. Those are the words that Gen. Scott used, and I translated them very carefully to Villa in the same terms exactly, but there were no promises made of any kind.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of any other meeting between Villa and Scott at which you were not present?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you meet a man named M. L. Hall at the time of the taking of Mexico City by the Zapatistas, or shortly after that?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was he doing there?

Mr. CAROTHERS. He was posing as the personal representative of Mr. Wilson, the President.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did he have to show for that assumption of authority?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I requested Zapata's private secretary Palafox to show me the credentials that Mr. Hall had presented to them, and he showed me a letter signed by Mr. Davis, the Secretary of the State Department, in which he asked for any courtesies that they could extend to Mr. Hall in pursuit of information for the Smithsonian Institute, I think. I am not sure about that, or it might have mentioned for agricultural purposes. I think he was getting information for the agricultural section of the Smithsonian Institute. That letter referred to him in that sense, and not in any manner as a diplomatic agent.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any conversation with Hall at that time?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Oh, yes; yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what was he doing there?

Mr. CAROTHERS. He seemed to be gathering information for the Government more than anything else.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of information, about agriculture?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No; political information. He seemed to be pleading the Zapata cause.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he tell you about any operation that he had had in connection with John Lind, the President's personal representative, who was sent down to eliminate Huerta?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Did Hall tell me?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. CAROTHERS. Not that I recollect.

Mr. KEARFUL. He did not tell you about any arrangement he had with Lind at the time that Huerta was in power for Zapata to come in and take Mexico City?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir; I do not remember anything to that effect.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did it not occur to you as peculiar that a man should be sent down there with credentials to gather information about agriculture, and then be exerting himself to get political information and become an advocate of one of the factions?

Mr. CAROTHERS. It appeared so strange to me that I called the attention of the Secretary of State to his presence and asked him to tell Mr. Hall to cease claiming to be a personal representative of the President.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what was done then?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Nothing that I know of.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you get any information while you were operating in Mexico with reference to the machinations of the Japanese?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; I sent in a report once, reporting an interview that I had with Gen. Villa, in which he told me in Mexico City that a Japanese officer, a naval officer, had called on him. I reported to the Secretary of State the result of that meeting. I have it here.

Mr. KEARFUL. Your report is dated February 5, 1915, and contains the following:

Gen. Villa told me that when he was in Mexico City in December there was a Japanese warship in Mexican waters, and the commander of the vessel went to Mexico City to see him. He wanted to meet Villa and presumably wanted to sound Villa as to his feelings toward the United States. As a feeler he told Gen. Villa that his country was greatly grieved against us and that they were preparing for war with us; that it would take them two years more in their preparation, as they had been preparing for three years. Gen. Villa told me that he replied to him that the people of the United States were his friends, and that in case of a war with any other country excepting Mexico the resources of Mexico would be at the disposal of the United States if he (Villa) had anything to do with the Government at the time. Villa says that the man seemed deeply disappointed and did not broach the real object of his visit. When Gen. Scott was in El Paso Villa hinted at this to him, but there were too many people at the conference for him to speak plainly.

Gen. Villa was deeply impressed with what he was told, and his sincerity in saying that the resources of his country would be at the disposal of the United States is unquestionable. I have had several long conversations with him, travelling along in his car, and I am absolutely convinced that he had a very warm affection for all good Americans, and he is doing his very best to give protection to our people's lives and property.

Is that a correct statement of the information that you received from Villa at that time?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any reason to believe that Villa was telling you about something that had not occurred, or wanted to deceive you in any way?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir. His whole demeanor at that time when he told me seemed as though he had some very important information to give me.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know how the State Department regarded it, whether as important or otherwise?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir; I do not know.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you receive any instructions to follow the matter up and make any further investigations about it?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you subsequently obtain any further information from any other Mexicans in reference to the operations of the Japanese in Mexico?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; I discovered a circular printed in Japanese and Spanish in El Paso, which I followed up with all the information I could obtain regarding the senders of it, who were San Francisco Japanese, but I never heard any more about it. I afterwards heard that that circular had been freely distributed throughout the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you a copy of the circular?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir; I have not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember the substance of what it contained?

Mr. CAROTHERS. As I remember, the substance was telling the Mexicans to continue their fight against the United States, and they would have the support of the Japanese. The men in San Francisco who signed this, I afterwards heard, were merchants, but they were not officials of Japan.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you obtain any other information from the Mexicans about the Japanese, from the Mexican soldiers?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I had a conversation once with a Mexican general in San Antonio. He told me that he had been an officer—I think I have a memorandum of that notice—

Mr. KEARFUL. You made a report, dated February 7, 1916, on that matter. In that report you stated the following:

I attach some importance to one point mentioned to me by a Mexican general in my interview yesterday. He was a military commander at Mazatlan under the Diaz régime, and he intimated to me that he knew of a secret agreement made between the Diaz Government and Japan as to a naval base on Mexican soil, and that there is more truth than is generally believed in the present agitation in California; that the Japs are gaining a foothold in Lower California, and that when the time comes they will exhibit the agreement that they made in order to justify their present action. It will not surprise me to hear that the Japs have landed and cached large quantities of arms and ammunition along the west coast of Mexico for the purpose of supplying the revolutionists with the understanding that their former agreement be upheld.

Is that a correct statement of the interview that you had with that Mexican general?

Mr. CAROTHERS. It is; yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know an official of the American Government named Frank Rabb?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I do not know him personally. I know of him.

Mr. KEARFUL. What official position did he hold?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Collector of the port at Brownsville, Tex.

Mr. KEARFUL. On March 25, 1915, you transmitted to the department a communication received by you from Gen. Villa, which reads as follows:

We have intercepted the following correspondence, which I send to you for your information and with the object that you please forward it to Mr. West. A letter addressed as follows:

LICENCIADO ELISEO ARREDONDO,
Embajada Mexicana:

I have an intimate personal friend who has been lending me his valuable assistance in his capacity of a high employe of the American Government, for the good of our cause, and who at the same time is intimately connected with several Senators and Congressmen in Washington, especially those from the State of Texas, and who is also intimately connected with the members of the cabinet in the State of Texas. Inasmuch as he is a decided partisan of ours now that there are many dangers surrounding the definite triumph of our cause, he offers me his most valuable assistance to go and work at your side making use of his great influence with the following Senators and Congressmen, who for many reasons are under great obligations to him: Senators Sheppard and Culberson, Congressmen from Iowa, Attorney General Gregory, and Postmaster General Burleson. These men have great influence in the politics of Texas, and they will all take special interest in what my friend will recommend. I believe that in the present circumstances my friend can be of inestimable value to you in securing from the American Government recognition of our constitutional government in Mexico. Please telegraph me if you accept his generous offer which is without expectation of remuneration more than the expenses occasioned by his trip. Authorize me to defray the necessary expense for me to accompany him personally and present him to you. My friend has great faith in his ability to obtain recognition for our cause. If you accept his services, please keep the matter strictly confidential.

JOSÉ L. GARZA.

The person mentioned by Garza is Mr. Rabb, collector of customs of Brownsville, Tex., and an intimate friend of Lucio Blanco and Villareal.

FRANCISCO VILLA.

Mr. CAROTHERS. I understand that Mr. Rabb had been living with Gen. Blanco in Mexico City, and that he and Blanco had formed a scheme for acquiring some large tracts of ranch property in the States of Jalisco and Zacatecas.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say that Mr. Rabb was living with Gen. Blanco in Mexico City? Did you have any information about the place where Gen. Blanco was living?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; he was living in Mr. Casusus's house that Blanco had seized.

Mr. KEARFUL. It was the residence of Casusus, a lawyer in Mexico City, who had been prominent in the régime of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes; and he had been an ambassador to Washington. I afterwards visited Blanco in the same house.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it customary for the Carrancista officers to take possession of the houses at the places where they entered?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; everywhere.

Mr. KEARFUL. They did not do that in Mexico City?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what became of the contents of those houses, according to your observation?

Mr. CAROTHERS. They were looted, and I understand that a great deal of the loot was shipped to the United States and sold in the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. And Frank Rabb, an official of the United States, reputed to be a close friend of the members of the cabinet, was living in this house with Gen. Blanco?

Mr. CAROTHERS. So I understood.

Mr. KEARFUL. I can tell you that your understanding was correct, because I personally visited him while he was there. You say that Villa's attitude toward Americans while you were engaged in negotiating with him as the representative of this Government was friendly?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did that attitude change, if at all?

Mr. CAROTHERS. After the permit was given by the United States to transport troops through American territory to Douglas, Ariz., for the purpose of defending the city of Agua Prieta against Villa, who had made a long trip across the mountains with his whole army to try and get a new start in Sonora.

Mr. KEARFUL. This permit was given to the Carrancistas by the United States?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; by the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what was the result of the transportation of the Carrancista troops through the United States?

Mr. CAROTHERS. The defeat of Villa in Sonora.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then, what was Villa's attitude?

Mr. CAROTHERS. He seemed to lose control of himself. He was hostile against the Americans for quite a while. He killed quite a number of Americans out in Sonora, and he maltreated Dr. Thigpen of Cananea, who had gone out to volunteer to help his wounded.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know about the massacre of 19 Americans at Santa Isabel?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mining men who were going to their mines?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I knew nearly all of them personally. I was in New York at the time of the massacre and was shown the telegram. Before coming East I had personally advised Mr. Watson not to go there. Watson was in charge of the Cusi mines, and Watson asked my opinion as to what he should do, and I told him not to go, but he went anyhow. He went with the American passport, and with the promise of safe conduct of the Carrancista garrison in Chihuahua.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did Villa have anything to do with the massacre according to your information?

Mr. CAROTHERS. To my information he did not, but Pablo Lopez was the man, and the reason I believe Villa did not have anything to do with it is that when he left Chihuahua, when he disbanded his army in Chihuahua, he made a speech from the window of his palace, when he had his army, that he was no longer in command, that he was a common soldier like the rest of them, and that from then on they were free to do as they pleased.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was before the Santa Isabel affair?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; prior to it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Shortly following that came the raid of Columbus.

Mr. CAROTHERS. I do not recollect the dates, how much time did elapse.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you in that section of the country at that time?

Mr. CAROTHERS. In Columbus?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; I was in El Paso.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you immediately go to Columbus?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I had been investigating and trying to find out where Villa was, and on the morning of the 8th of March—the Columbus raid occurred on the 9th of March, and on the morning of the 8th I put in a long distance call for Gen. Slocum, who was the commander, intending to go out that afternoon on the 2 o'clock train. But I wanted to get some information from Slocum, if I could, but I did not receive any word from him until after the train had left, so I decided to wait until the next day, and at 6 o'clock he rang me up. I told him that I knew Villa was very close to Columbus; that I did not know what he was doing there, but my information was very positive, and he ridiculed the idea. He said that his information was that Villa was 65 or 70 miles away, and I told him that I knew different, and that I was coming out the next day, and at daylight the raid occurred and I went out the next day on the afternoon train and got to Columbus about 4 o'clock in the afternoon. I examined Mrs. Wright, who claimed that she had been made a prisoner at Casas Grandes, and had been carried off and remained with him for nine days. I examined the prisoners, some six or eight, if I recollect it, and examined the wounded men that we had with the idea of satisfying myself whether Villa had been there or not, if he had led the raid. I also examined two large portfolios of documents that we found, that I recognized as being those of the secretary of Villa, and they contained a great many documents of different kinds, and blank stationery, which were afterwards forwarded to Washington.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you satisfy yourself as to whether or not Villa led that raid?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I satisfied myself that he had gotten as far as the gate, which was only a short distance from the town; but I never satisfied myself that he was actually in the village, but I was positive that he had gotten as far as the gate.

Mr. KEARFUL. You did satisfy yourself that the raid was carried out by a force under Villa's command?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; and that if he did not go into the town, he was at the gate and had directed them to go in.

Mr. KEARFUL. And that he is entirely responsible for what occurred?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I would consider it so; yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever hear of any justification that Villa had to give for that?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I have heard that he was urged on by Martin Lopez and Nicolas Fernandez, who were the ruffian generals who had remained with him.

Mr. KEARFUL. Martin Lopez was the man who was in charge of the forces that perpetrated the Santa Isabel massacre?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No; that was his brother, Pablo Lopez, at Santa Isabel.

Mr. KEARFUL. Has Villa ever undertaken to attempt to justify that raid?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Never to me, and never to anyone. I have heard the reference that he had attempted to deny it, but nothing that I could ever—

Mr. KEARFUL. That he had attempted to deny it?

Mr. CAROTHERS. That he had attempted to deny that he was there; but I also heard from another source that he had said that he was there, that he had taken the credit, and that he would stand before the world and be justified in it. He made a statement to the French consul in Torreon, who is now dead. But he told me at one of the times that Villa captured Torreon.

Mr. KEARFUL. On what grounds did he justify the raid?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Bernardino did not attempt to tell me grounds, except the fact that he resented the troops having been permitted to go through the United States?

Mr. KEARFUL. The Carranza troops?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know anything about the operation of Gen. Cantu in Lower California?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. It has been reported that Cantu practically operates independently of Carranza, whilst Carranza maintains that Cantu is entirely loyal to him. Do you know the truth of that situation?

Mr. CAROTHERS. My impression has always been since Carranza was recognized that Cantu usually recognized him, and that as long as he was let alone in Lower California he would be loyal to him and permit no intervention in his affairs over there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you have any knowledge of the graft operations of Cantu in Lower California?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir; nothing definite that I would testify to.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you generally kept in touch with the conditions in Mexico since you were there?

Mr. CAROTHERS. As far as possible, yes, sir, I have. Particularly from information coming out from friends who have gone down there, who have told me conditions, and from correspondence with them along the border that has kept me posted.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your opinion as to whether conditions have been improving or not?

Mr. CAROTHERS. My opinion is that they have not improved, except in some well-defined sections, and that could hardly be an improvement, except in the nature of personal safety.

Mr. KEARFUL. What appears to be the prospects for improvement and the establishment of law and order?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I see no prospects of it now under the present régime.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have been in Mexico a long time and are acquainted with the people, their political and business methods; what do you think should be done to establish a government of law and order there?

Mr. CAROTHERS. That is a hard question to answer. I would like to be excused from answering and giving my ideas as to the settlement of the question.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, if you think that they are not definite and could not be of value to the committee, you may be excused from giving your opinion as to the remedy, but if you have a definite opinion that you think would be of some value we would like to have it. Do you believe that the Mexicans themselves without assistance from the outside, can establish a permanent and stable Government?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you have a definite opinion as to what should be done by way of assistance from the outside, and who should do it?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I have very definite opinions on that; yes, sir, I have; and they are against armed intervention. I have never advocated armed intervention in Mexico, but I believe that the Mexicans could work out their own salvation if they were to receive the right kind of help from the outside. At the same time, I do advocate a policy of firmness even to the extent of applying some vigorous lesson to them in order to regain the respect that we have lost in Mexico. We did have their respect at one time prior to 1910, but we lost it during this revolution owing to our looseness in defending our people and their properties. I think that could be done even without fighting. I believe if the Mexican people could be brought to realize that the United States was going to demand and get their rights for its citizens, and that they were really brought to feel that, they would change and give it to us. The greatest mistake we ever made was in recognizing Carranza unconditionally and not tying him down when we recognized him to an absolute settlement of the questions that were pending between us. Why, I would recognize no Government in Mexico that did not firmly agree to the settlement of these problems that we have.

Mr. KEARFUL. You think that any government that might be set up should be recognized only on condition that it should follow a certain line prescribed?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And if it failed to comply with that condition, then, of course, the necessary steps would have to be taken to enforce the conditions.

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir; I do. I believe that if that was put to them properly it would be acceptable to them, because those conditions would necessarily be what we internationally expect as one nation having a right to demand from another.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there any further statement, Mr. Carothers, that you care to make?

Mr. CAROTHERS. I would like to insert in the record one letter that I wrote to Mr. Bryan which shows the spirit in which I undertook my duties down there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Very well.

Mr. CAROTHERS. This letter is dated February 23, 1914, addressed to the Hon. William Jennings Bryan, Washington, D. C. The letter is as follows:

Before leaving for Chihuahua it is my desire to write you a personal letter regarding the work that I have been doing, and that which is mapped out for me in the future.

I wish you to know that my desire to do this work was prompted by my sincere affection for the Mexican people, acquired during 25 years' residence amongst them, and I expect to live the balance of my life in Mexico. I have realized that there is still hope for them to settle their differences without intervention, and it has been my desire to contribute my efforts to further that end.

Such incidents as the Benton execution are most lamentable, and do far-reaching harm to them, but we may expect others to happen before the end of the struggle, where no human help can prevent them. The people are aroused, and it is extremely hard to convince them that they use humanitarian measures with their enemies, especially considering that their enemies treat them only as if they were savages. Villa is absolutely convinced that he did right in executing Benton.

I try and view such instances in as broad a light as possible, knowing the people as I do, although many acts are committed in Mexico to-day by both contending sides that are repulsive in the extreme to civilized people.

My efforts with Villa will be to hold him within bounds as far as possible. I have the honor to be, sir,

Yours obedient servant,

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you endeavor to follow out the course which you stated in that letter?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir,

Mr. KEARFUL. Consistently?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. There is one other incident that I forgot to ask you about, and that is the killing of William Benton. Will you please relate what you know about that incident?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir. I can not recall the date from memory, but one afternoon I was requested by the British residents of El Paso to go to Juarez and find out what had happened to William Benton, who had gone across the river the day before to see Villa and had not returned. Benton's cousin, also named William Benton, told me that his cousin had gone over with the declared purpose of telling Villa what he thought of him. I went to Villa's office and asked him what had happened to Benton. He asked me if I asked him officially, and I told him no, that I was there at the request of the British colony of El Paso. Villa refused to discuss the matter with me, other than to say that Benton was all right, that nothing had happened to him. On my return to El Paso I met Consul Edwards, who handed me a telegram from the Secretary of State, instructing me to investigate Benton's disappearance. Mr. Edwards exhibited a similar telegram that he had also received from the Secretary, giving him practically the same instruction as mine.

Edwards and I decided that, inasmuch as I had just come from Villa on the same subject, it would be well for him to go alone and see what Villa would tell him, and we would compare notes afterwards. Upon his return from interviewing Villa he told me that Villa had told him the whole story in absolute confidence, and that he was unable to tell it to me, but that he was wiring it to Washington that night. I do not know what Villa told him. A few days later I was handed a copy of the alleged court-martial proceedings under which Benton had been executed, which I also forwarded to Washington. Some months later Gen. Villa was in my car and told me his version of the Benton affair.

He said that Benton had appeared in his office and made threats to him, and used very abusive language; that one word led to another, and finally Benton had reached for his six shooter, but had been overpowered by Ing. Andres Farias and Maj. Bonds; that he was detained in the back room of his office, and that during the afternoon Benton had called him in and had asked him to grant a last request, that he knew that he was going to be shot, but that he wanted Villa's promise to see that his ranch, which was owned by his cousin and himself, was not taken away from Benton's wife, who was a Mexican woman. Villa said that he had promised this, and that he had been paying Benton's widow 300 pesos a month ever since Benton's death. Shall I tell what I was afterwards told by one of the men who was at the execution?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. CAROTHERS. Later on I was told by one of the men who was present that Benton was killed; that they had taken him to Samalayuca, the first station south of Juarez; and that some of the soldiers had dug a very shallow grave; that Benton protested against the shallowness of the grave, saying that the coyotes would come and dig him out; and that Fierro, who was known as one of the principal killers in the Villa army, had drawn his gun and shot Benton through the head, using a vile expression, but meaning what wonderful courage of this Gringo. The body was buried in this shallow grave. The next part of that is the commission that was formed. There was a commission formed at the request of the American Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. Just proceed to relate that.

Mr. CAROTHERS. Later on the commission of American physicians was selected at the instance of the American Government to view the body of Benton to see if he had been executed, as claimed in the court-martial proceedings. The Mexicans delayed this investigation as long as possible, while they removed the body from the grave, stood it in as upright a position as possible, and fired a volley into it, believing that this would be sufficient proof that his wounds were caused at the time of death. Dr. Andrea Villareal, who was Villa's chief medical officer, told them that any physician would easily recognize the fact that these shots had been fired into a corpse, so he undertook in the city of Chihuahua to prepare the body for its exhibition to the American physicians. This commission arranged to leave Juarez one morning and got as far as the railroad station, when they were met by an officer and told that Carranza had prohibited their trip, and they returned to El Paso.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was at the time when Villa was subordinate to Carranza?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. No examination of the body by these physicians was ever made?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Benton was an English subject?

Mr. CAROTHERS. He claimed to be an English subject; yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Married to a Mexican woman?

Mr. CAROTHERS. Married to a Mexican woman.

Mr. KEARFUL. I believe that is all I care to ask. Have you anything further that you would like to tell us about before we adjourn?

Mr. CAROTHERS. No, sir; I think not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Very well. The committee is much obliged to you.
(Thereupon the committee adjourned at 12.15 o'clock p. m., to meet on Monday, March 1, 1920, at 10 o'clock a. m.)

THURSDAY, MARCH 4, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
New York, N. Y.

Testimony taken at New York City, N. Y., March 4, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the Subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

STATEMENT OF MR. EDWARD N. BROWN.

(The witness was duly sworn by Mr. Kearful.)

Mr. KEARFUL. Please state your name.

Mr. BROWN. Edward N. Brown.

Mr. KEARFUL. And your post-office address?

Mr. BROWN. 120 Broadway, New York.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Brown, you have been subpoenaed by the subcommittee to give the committee the benefit of your knowledge of railway conditions in Mexico. What has been your opportunity to know about the railway interests in Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. I was, of course, quite well informed up to the time I left there, Judge, but that is six years ago. Since that time I have been brought into direct contact but very little with the railway operations. All I know since that is from information that I have received through various and sundry people coming from Mexico, with whom I was acquainted or intimate with, and so on.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you retained an interest in ascertaining the conditions since you left there?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir. In fact, it is rather a keen interest, because I consider that the railways—what is known as the National Railways and their subsidiaries—as largely my work in Mexico for some 26 or 27 years.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you please relate the positions that you held and the work that you did in connection with the railways of Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. I went to Mexico in the spring of 1887, with an arrangement to build the line south from Saltillo to a connection with San Miguel, 252 miles, which was a gap remaining to complete the line from Laredo, Tex., to the City of Mexico. I was first assistant chief engineer of that. Very shortly afterwards I was made superintendent of construction, and had charge of the construction of that piece of line. I lived in Saltillo for some 15 months, until the line was nearly completed, and then moved to San Luis Potosi. When the line was connected I was, in addition to my other duties as superintendent of construction, made superintendent of the operation of that piece of that road. I remained there for some 18 months in that capacity. I was then transferred to Mexico City as superintendent of the whole road out of Mexico City, and remained in that position for some three years. I was then put in charge of the physical operation of the entire road, known as the National Railroad at that time, embracing about 1,400 miles of road.

Mr. KEARFUL. Between what points?

Mr. BROWN. The main line between Laredo, Tex., and the City of Mexico, with several branches, and a Texas line from Laredo to Corpus Christi, Tex. I remained in charge of the physical operation of that road until 1900, when I was made third vice president and general manager. In 1901 I was made second vice president and general manager, and began the work of standard gauging the system. About that time, and partly at my suggestion, the Mexican Government acquired a 47 per cent interest in the stock of that company and very shortly after that we acquired control of the Mexican International Railway, the line between Eagle Pass and Durango. At the end of 1902 I was made president of the company, and just at that time they acquired a controlling interest in the Interoceanic Railway, and took that under the operation of the National Railways.

Mr. KEARFUL. Between what points did the Interoceanic run?

Mr. BROWN. Mexico City, via Puebla, to Vera Cruz, with some short branches.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was a narrow-gauge road?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir. I remained in that capacity until 1907, when they undertook to merge all those properties with the Mexican Central, which was accomplished during the first part of 1908, and just about that time we acquired the stock which gave control of the Vera Cruz and Pacific Railroad, from Vera Cruz, via Cordova, to Santa Lucrecia, on the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. Very shortly afterwards, by the same method of acquiring the stock, we acquired control of the Pan-American Railway.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where does the Pan-American run?

Mr. BROWN. I can not just now think of the name of the town. It is from that town on the Tehuantepec National Railway, skirting the Pacific coast, to Mariscal, on the Guatemala frontier.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you describe what is called the Mexican Central?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir; I did not. The Mexican Central had for its main line the railroad from El Paso to Mexico City, and across the continent from Tampico, via San Luis Potosi and Guadalajara, to Manzanillo, on the Pacific coast; also the important line from Tampico, via Monterrey, to Torreon, and several branches. The reasons leading up to the merger of those properties was that all the railways had exhausted their right to issue bonds to secure additional capital under their mortgages, and most of the mileage was in bad physical condition, with a shortage of rolling stock.

Mr. KEARFUL. That condition did not apply to the National Railways, did it?

Mr. BROWN. In part only. In organizing the National Railways of Mexico, in 1907, the Mexican Government undertook to guarantee, both as to principal and interest, all of the general mortgage bonds of the first preferred and second preferred stock issued by the new company. It also gave a reasonable margin, with the Government approval, for new bond issues to secure new capital for improving the existing lines and furnishing additional rolling stock, as well as building new lines. In lieu of that Government guarantee, $75,000,000 United States money, of common stock was issued to the Mexican Government to give them voting control, the different issues of stock ranking on a parity in the votes, and with this common stock the Government secured about 50½ per cent of the total voting power.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that stock paid for by the Mexican Government?

Mr. BROWN. No. The Mexican Government paid nothing for that common stock. They did, however, own some stock in the old Central and National Railroads, for which they paid approximately $9,000,000, United States money, or, in other words, a total investment, not counting subsidies, given to the various railroads, of the Mexican Government in these railways of approximately $9,000,000 United States money.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have not yet completed the statement as to the positions that you held.

Mr. BROWN. Let us go back. At the end of 1902 I was made president of the National Railroad, which position I retained until the merger in the beginning of 1908, when I was made president of the merged systems, representing about 7,500 miles of main line. This position I continued to occupy until October, 1914, when I severed my connection with all the companies. I think that covers it, does it not?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes. Under what circumstances did you sever your connection, after giving practically your life to that work?

Mr. BROWN. I left Mexico City during the first days of March, 1914, in answer to a telegram from the bankers, asking me to join them here to consider renewing and financing certain notes that were falling due, some $27,000,000, expecting to be away some three or four weeks, coming via Vera Cruz and boat directly to New York. I had engaged my passage for the return trip by boat when, on April 22, 1914, the troops were landed at Vera Cruz, and Gen. Huerta, who was then exercising the powers of President, issued a proclamation removing all of the foreigners from any connection with the railway work in Mexico. At the instance of the bankers, however, I continued to exercise the functions of president from the New York office until the next annual meeting of the shareholders, which was during the first days of October, 1914, when they did not reelect me as the president or a director of the company.

Mr. KEARFUL. At that time Mexico City, the seat of government, was in the hands of the Carrancistas?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir. I failed to be elected as a director and president in October, 1914.

Mr. KEARFUL. You remember that Huerta left the country in July, 1914, and the forces of Carranza entered Mexico City in August, 1914?

Mr. BROWN. That is right.

Mr. KEARFUL. So that the stockholders' meeting, of which the Mexican Government had the controlling votes, was held under the auspices of the Carrancistas in October?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir. In July, 1913, seeing conditions so bad that the properties were apparently demoralized and disorganized, due to Government control, I resigned as president; but on telegrams received from New York and Europe I went to London and Paris to see committees of bankers and bondholders, who persuaded me to withdraw my resignation, which I stated I would do if I could satisfactorily arrange with the Mexican authorities. That was afterwards done, and I withdrew my resignation.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are an American citizen, born in the United States, are you not?

Mr. BROWN. I am an American citizen, born in Alabama.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what business are you now engaged?

Mr. BROWN. I am chairman of the board of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railway Co. and also of the Pere Marquette Railway Co.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the reason for the demoralization of the railroad business in 1913?

Mr. BROWN. With the Government control recognized by practically all of the citizens of the Republic, they had the erroneous impression that the Government owned the railway properties, and they should be operated by Mexican citizens only. In fact, they seemed to think that their political friends should have preference, and the officials were flooded with requests from mayors, governors, and other officials to give positions to their friends, many of whom had had no railroad experience.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it possible for you and those under your direction to comply with those requests and operate the roads efficiently?

Mr. BROWN. In a large majority of instances we had to decline to entertain the requests at all, for the reason that the applicants had no experience. Naturally, that was not pleasing to the different officials who had made the requests, and in a large number of instances they would go over the heads of the railroad officials in an effort to get the Cabinet or even the President to intercede and order their friends given positions.

Mr. KEARFUL. In order to maintain friendly relations with the officials did you find it expedient at times to comply with their requests?

Mr. BROWN. Only in a few instances. We felt that the service was such and the safety of the public was such that we were justified in ignoring many of those requests.

Mr. KEARFUL. What railroads are there in Mexico that are not included in this merger?

Mr. BROWN. The merger represented about 8,000 miles when I left there of actual main line under operation and some 500 miles under construction, which was approximately one-half of the total. The principal lines not included in the so-called merger, known as the National Railways of Mexico, was, first, the Southern Pacific of Mexico—

Mr. KEARFUL. Running down the west coast?

Mr. BROWN. Running down the west coast from Nogales via Guaymas to Manzanillo and Tepic; the Mexico Northwestern, between El Paso and Chihuahua; the Kansas City, Mexico & Orient, two pieces of lines, disconnected, but running both ways out of Chihuahua, and a piece of road on the Pacific coast from Topolobampo; the Mexican Railway, from Mexico City to Vera Cruz, with several branches; the Isthmus & Tehuantepec Railway; and various short lines, industrial lines, etc.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there also a road in Yucatan?

Mr. BROWN. Yes; that is right. The United Railways of Yucatan. That is another.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who built the railways of Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. Practically all of them were built under concessions from the Mexican Government, with some subsidies or help in their construction. This subsidy amounted usually to six to ten thousand pesos per kilometer, equal to three to five thousand dollars United States money. With the exception of the subsidies the money was practically all furnished by foreign investors, principally from the United States, Great Britain, France, and Germany.

Mr. KEARFUL. What class of people did the actual construction work of these roads?

Mr. BROWN. All of the construction of which I have had any knowledge or anything to do with was done by foreigners, principally Americans, except the laboring people, who were mostly or very nearly all native peons. During the latter days of construction, however, there were some Mexican engineers and trainmen, with a few train masters and superintendents, used in connection with the construction and operation.

Mr. KEARFUL. Had these men been educated in that work by the Americans previously in operation?

Mr. BROWN. Practically all of them. In fact, we established schools for that purpose and would take in any of the young men who could read and write and who looked physically fit and put them under apprentice contracts on most of the work.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were those contracts oppressive on those young people or otherwise?

Mr. BROWN. We started them out in the different shop crafts, as a rule, boys of 14 or 15 years old, under a four-year contract at 62½ cents per day for the first year, increasing it gradually up to the end of four years when they received 3½ pesos per day. We retained from them 25 cents per day as a guaranty of faithful performance of the contract. At the end of the four-year period they drew from the treasury about 176 pesos in cash, and were given a certificate of service, constituting them what is known as journeymen. They were also allowed to continue in the service, if they so elected, at the standard rates of pay for work performed by the different crafts of which they were members.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did those wages compare with wages that the Mexicans were accustomed to receive before the railroads were projected?

Mr. BROWN. They were very much higher. In fact, they compared favorably with pay on the United States railways for similar service.

Mr. KEARFUL. Can you give the number of such Mexican boys or young men who were educated in that manner annually from the time of the institution of that school?

Mr. BROWN. I put the apprentice contract into service in 1890, on the old National Railroad. At that time they had some 1,400 miles of road, and I should say at the end of the first year we probably had 800 of those contracts in existence. As the mileage increased, and the number of men employed increased—and naturally the number increased very materially—until about the year 1912 it was estimated there were some 2,000 of these contracts in existence. I think it is safe to say that practically all of the skilled mechanics and other craftsmen on the railways in Mexico had been trained by the railways.

Mr. KEARFUL. Can you give an estimate of the entire number of men who were trained in this way during the time that you were making a survey of railways?

Mr. BROWN. From 1890 until 1912, covering a period of 22 years, I would estimate that under my jurisdiction there were trained fifteen to eighteen thousand.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was a somewhat similar system employed by the other railways?

Mr. BROWN. Not so far as I know.

Mr. KEARFUL. What, if anything, did the effect of the training of these men have upon other industries of the country, as to being beneficial or not?

Mr. BROWN. Many of these boys and men—and such number is not included in the above estimate—after becoming rather proficient in certain crafts, especially the boiler work and machine work, would be taken by mining industries, smelting industries, factories, and other people requiring such help, as stationary engineers, machinists, etc., and at the end of probably two or three years they would leave the service, abandon their contract, and go with these other industries at a much increased wage.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you endeavor to prevent them going when they pleased?

Mr. BROWN. Never. We always encouraged it.

Mr. KEARFUL. They simply forfeited the 25 cents per day?

Mr. BROWN. Whatever had been retained under that 25 cents per day.

Mr. KEARFUL. You made no opposition to their going when they could better their condition?

Mr. BROWN. When they could get better wages.

Mr. KEARFUL. So that the training school that you maintained was the source of supply to various industries of the country of trained mechanics and engineers?

Mr. BROWN. All the different crafts. Some were boiler makers and some were machinists. Even many of the clerks that worked in the railroad offices were taken away to keep books in different plantations and stores, and so on.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you find these young men apt to learn?

Mr. BROWN. Yes; as a rule those that were educated were quite apt to learn.

Mr. KEARFUL. To become capable mechanics and proficient in the various crafts?

Mr. BROWN. I should say quite the average. We had very satisfactory results from our efforts.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were any complaints ever made of unfair treatment of these people on the part of your company?

Mr. BROWN. You mean the contract?

Mr. KEARFUL. By the people or the Government or by the men themselves?

Mr. BROWN. Never; except in some individual cases, and those were very few, and were always carefully investigated and righted if they had been injured or done a wrong. During the last five years of my service, or between 1907 and 1912, we established 15 schools to educate the different men and train them in the operating service, so as to make them proficient on train rules, air signals, air brakes, and other mechanical appliances, and they had lectures given periodically, for which the company paid, by experts in these lines, principally Americans. There was also apparatus installed in these schools to demonstrate the appliances.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did the Mexican Government contribute anything to the maintenance of these schools?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir. They gave their approval to it, and were quite favorable to it, looked favorably upon it, but the railways company maintained it.

Mr. KEARFUL. The men themselves were not assessed?

Mr. BROWN. Not at all. It was free.

Mr. KEARFUL. According to the figures about subsidies in construction that you gave a while ago, how did those figures compare with the actual cost of construction?

Mr. BROWN. I should say normally it was probably 15 to 18 per cent of the total cost of construction, but most of these subsidies were paid in partial payments and extended over a period of time. It was not all cash, but it was ultimately collected.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were there any other special privileges or grants made to the railroads to aid construction?

Mr. BROWN. The importation of construction material was, as a rule, free of duty.

Mr. KEARFUL. And was privilege given upon certain conditions to be performed, which conditions had to be secured?

Mr. BROWN. Well, it was in compliance with concessions, which provided that the company had to construct certain mileage and furnish certain equipment and other things, and that the material which was to be imported for that purpose would come in free of duty, for construction only.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are familiar with the history of railroad building in the United States, are you?

Mr. BROWN. To a certain extent.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know something about the grants of public land that have been made by Congress for building railroads across the western country?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir; I know something of it in a general way.

Mr. KEARFUL. The policy was to grant 20 odd numbered sections on each side of each mile of construction through Territories, and 10 sections through States, there being at that time very few States, and in the case of some of the roads their obligations were guaranteed by the Government. How did those privileges and grants made to aid in the construction of railroads in the western part of the United States compare with the concessions and subsidies you have spoken of that were granted to aid in construction of railroads in Mexico, as to liberality?

Mr. BROWN. We had on this line in Texas, belonging to the merger, the very same condition of land grants, and from my knowledge of the situation it is not easy to draw a comparison. At the time those land grants were made the land was not supposed to be very valuable, but as the construction of these roads progressed, they brought in immigrants and settled those lands, and in some instances, before the railways disposed of the balance of the lands they had, they brought fancy figures. But taking the thing as a whole, and comparing it in a general way, the only way I can make a comparison, my impression is that the subsidies given in Mexico, which was a money consideration, were on the whole less than was ultimately secured by these railroads in the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. So that the statement which is frequently made that foreign capital has been engaged in exploiting the Mexican people and Mexican resources under iniquitous concessions obtained by fraud and bribery of Mexican officials, if it is true in any respect, has no truth in reference to railroads?

Mr. BROWN. That is my belief. In fact, I think it is perfectly safe to say that for many years after the first construction of these railways they did not pay interest on the capital invested, after having deducted the subsidies by the Mexican Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there any over capitalization for the purpose of stock operations or fraudulent practices?

Mr. BROWN. That is not easy to answer, but so far as my knowledge goes the stock issued represented only the cash put into those properties, except the stock issued to the Mexican Government without payment for voting purposes in the merger in 1907, and in a few minor instances where rights of way or some other grants were given, and the value of that right of way supposed to have been capitalized, but on the whole I think it is of negligible quantity.

Mr. KEARFUL. You think if there was any overcapitalization it was practically negligible?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mentioned the amount of money, in addition to the subsidies, that was put into the roads by the Mexican Government. About what percentage would you say that would be of the actual investment?

Mr. BROWN. 15 to 18 per cent would be my estimate.

Mr. KEARFUL. How was it possible for the Mexican Government, with that small investment, to obtain actual voting control of the road?

Mr. BROWN. Through the guarantee of principal and interest on the general mortgage bonds, and first preferred and second preferred stock of the company.

Mr. KEARFUL. Which was necessary in order to raise money?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir; in order to get a bond issue that would enable us to do that financing.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did the roads, of which you have knowledge, first begin to make profits on their actual investment?

Mr. BROWN. The amount of dividends paid or profits made were negligible until 1908. At that time the merged roads began to pay interest on their first preferred shares, and continued until 1918 to pay 4 per cent on $30,000,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. Has any interest been paid since that time?

Mr. BROWN. Not since the beginning of 1914. In fact, Mr. Carranza commandeered the railways known as the National Railways of Mexico in August, 1914, and since that time there has been nothing paid, either as dividends or interest, and, if my information be correct, the companies have had no earnings since that date—not a cent.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your information as to condition of the roads since they were taken over by the Carranza Government?

Mr. BROWN. The first three years or so after they took them over there seemed to be very little repair work done on the physical part of the roads or rolling stock. Most of the important bridge structures on the northern half of the National Railways, for some 4,000 miles, were greatly damaged or destroyed by the different revolutionary forces, and most of those structures have only been repaired temporarily, using, as a rule, trestles for the purpose. Ties and rails are very seriously needed, and no rail repairs made. Probably one-half of the rolling stock is not serviceable, either having been damaged or worn out to such an extent as to need repairs. During the last two years or so there have been some repairs made to rolling stock, and a good many ties renewed. The track between Laredo, Tex., and the City of Mexico, is said to be in very fair condition, with the exception of needing a small percentage of the ties renewed. Very few of the station buildings remain between San Luis Potosi and Laredo, and the same applies to the line between Zacatecas and Mexico City, and between Manzanillo and Irapuato. Most of the branch lines are said to be seriously in need of repairs. It is estimated that some 15,000,000 ties are necessary to be replaced in order to bring the track up to normal condition as regards ties.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your information as to the condition of the rolling stock?

Mr. BROWN. Generally speaking, in very bad shape, with only about one-half of it available for service. In 1913 the National Railways and the subsidiary lines had some 22,000 freight cars in service, and 729 locomotives. I am told that about half of that are in service to-day, many of those, however, needing repairs.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know anything about cars or locomotives from railroads of this country being in Mexico at the time they were taken over and not returned?

Mr. BROWN. Yes; there were quite a few, but I have no definite information as to the number. I should say, as a guess, probably 1,000 freight cars, no locomotives.

Mr. KEARFUL. Can you give an estimate of the amount of money that would be required to place the railways in the condition they were in normal times?

Mr. BROWN. Including repairs to rolling stock, bridges, stations, and other destroyed property, together with making good arrears of repairs, I should estimate sixty-five or seventy million dollars United States money would be required.

Mr. KEARFUL. That would not include overdue interest on bonds?

Mr. BROWN. No, indeed. On the merged lines the interest charges in 1918 were approximately one and a quarter million dollars per month, and if seven years' interest is due, with interest on interest, it would probably be a total of something in excess of ninety million dollars United States money, including that interest.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you have the figures of the amount of the outstanding bonds?

Mr. BROWN. I have not those figures before me now.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know what has become of the money that has been received from the operation of the lines by Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. No; I do not; but I understand, from what I consider competent authority, that for the last year and a half or two years the Mexican Government has required the railway operating officials to deliver to the treasurer of the nation a million and a half pesos per month, allowing the use of the balance in repairs and upkeep of the property.

Mr. KEARFUL. The condition of the roads and rolling stock which you have mentioned, does that indicate that a sufficient amount has been left to the railroad officials by the Government for the purpose of upkeep?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir; my impression is that they have not had sufficient.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of any legal right of the Mexican Government to require the railroads to pay to the Government a certain amount, leaving their interest charges and operating expenses unpaid?

Mr. BROWN. If I understand correctly, Mr. Carranza issued a decree when he commandeered the railways, saying it was for war purposes. Under the concessions of practically all the railroads the Government has the right to commandeer the railways when public necessity or enemy operations require it.

Mr. KEARFUL. But is it your understanding that the Government can do that, without any responsibility to pay damages?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir. If I remember correctly the law specifically provides that they shall indemnify the railway companies by allowing them the same rate of earnings that they were making for a certain period prior to the time they were taken over. That is clearly stated in the law as the basis of responsibility assumed by the Government in taking over the roads, commandeering them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then, in addition to the amount of about $90,000,000 due for interest, and some $75,000,000 necessary for reconstruction, the Government is under legal obligations to reimburse the railroads in accordance with their earnings of previous years? Is that your understanding?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir. But, of course, you will have to take into account the interest charges there as a part of their previous condition, because their previous net earnings would probably have been applied in part to interest payments.

Mr. KEARFUL. At any rate, there is an additional obligation on the part of the Government to compensate the railroads for their use since they have been taken over, in addition to the damage that has been suffered, represented, by the amount necessary to reconstruct them, and the interest charges?

Mr. BROWN. That is my understanding.

Mr. KEARFUL. Can you give an estimate of about what that would be?

Mr. BROWN. No; but it would be quite a little in excess of the damages and interest charges.

Mr. KEARFUL. Combined?

Mr. BROWN. Combined, and, of course, the upkeep must also be taken into consideration. In other words, when the Government uses those properties they are supposed to maintain them and return them in as good condition as when taken over.

Mr. KEARFUL. That would be accounted for in the item for reconstruction?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you consider the necessity of the railroad systems in Mexico to the general development of the country?

Mr. BROWN. That country has about 750,000 square miles of territory, and two-thirds of it is on an elevated table-land, leaving only the fringe around the Pacific and Gulf coasts subject to water transportation. Most of the industries, farming, mining, and so on, are on that table-land, where water transportation is lacking. I know of no country where railway transportation is so essential to the proper work and development of mines and smelters and farms and timberlands and other things as in Mexico. It is, from my point of view, the first and most important feature, to reestablish their transportation before they can reestablish their industries in proper shape.

Mr. KEARFUL. Most of these railroads were projected and completed during the time of Porfirio Diaz, were they not?

Mr. BROWN. Practically all of them.

Mr. KEARFUL. And were in accordance with his constant policy toward the development of the country?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was his attitude toward foreign investors and capital?

Mr. BROWN. I think very liberal and favorable, so far as I know. I think he gave protection in every practical way to foreigners and their investments.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he exact tribute from them by way of graft for himself or his favorites?

Mr. BROWN. In the early days of railroad construction there were rumors that something of that kind was done by the authorities. I never heard anything applied to Gen. Diaz himself personally, but during the latter 10 years of his régime I think it is safe to say that whatever might have been the case in the early part of his régime had disappeared, and things were going along in a proper way during the last 10 years of his incumbency. That is my impression and information.

Mr. KEARFUL. During the latter part of the rule of Porfirio Diaz what was the condition throughout Mexico as to security for life and property and safety of travel by individuals?

Mr. BROWN. Until the last years of his régime it was considered more than satisfactory. In fact, I have heard many, including the ambassador from this country, say they considered life and property as safe in Mexico as any place they knew of, not excepting the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are more or less familiar with the history of Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Has there ever been any period in Mexico's history in which there has been substantial progress, except during the rule of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. BROWN. No; I believe it is safe to say that its progress came with his assuming power.

Mr. KEARFUL. And what happened when he fell?

Mr. BROWN. The Madero revolution overthrew him in 1911. Things then were fairly quiet during the six months or so that De la Barra occupied the presidency, prior to the May election. During the first year of Madero's régime they were satisfactory. It then began to be noticeable that he was losing control, and these revolutionary factions began to be active again. Prior to that time there were none of them that I know of that were serious at all, except in that country south of Mexico that Zapata was operating in. Immediately after Madero's overthrow in February, 1913, the revolutionary troubles began to be more serious, culminating in Gen. Huerta leaving the country, and finally in Mr. Carranza assuming power. Since Mr. Carranza assumed power there has been more or less trouble in various sections of the country, and still is. He probably controls 60 per cent of the country, but possibly 80 per cent of its income.

Mr. KEARFUL. When you speak of the control of 60 per cent, do you mean such control that the territory can not be entered by rebel forces?

Mr. BROWN. No. There are various gangs at work in some of those, but he is recognized as having more or less authority over 60 per cent of the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. And you would say that in about 40 per cent he has no authority?

Mr. BROWN. I would say that in about 40 per cent he has no authority. I believe that is approximately correct.

Mr. KEARFUL. What would you say as to the tendency of the progress of Mexico, even since the time of the fall of Diaz, as to being upward or downward?

Mr. BROWN. Taking the country as a whole?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWN. Well, since that time their finances have been wrecked; they have paid no interest on the Government debt, many of the districts have been depopulated, many of the cattle ranches and farms and sugar plantations have been damaged or abandoned, and I believe it is safe to say that the present production of the country is probably not more than two-thirds of what it was in 1913.

Mr. KEARFUL. According to your information, have the conditions since the time of Diaz been growing steadily worse?

Mr. BROWN. Up to a year or so ago, yes. I think that during the last year or possibly 18 months that it has been more or less at a standstill. In a few localities, like the city of Mexico, Tampico, the coal mining district, and a few of the mining districts, there have been some improvements. As against that there have been gradually worse conditions elsewhere.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know about some trips that Mr. William Jennings Bryan made to Mexico while you were there?

Mr. BROWN. Shortly after his defeat in the first presidential race I knew of his coming there; in fact, met him there.

Mr. KEARFUL. And then again, shortly after his second defeat, he made another trip. Do you remember that?

Mr. BROWN. I do not recall that.

Mr. KEARFUL. After he returned from the second trip he prepared a lecture, which is in the form of an article and was printed in the Commoner, a paper owned and published by him, in the issue of January 30, 1903. In that article he speaks of Porfirio Diaz in these terms:

The third great man produced by the Mexican Republic is the present President. With the exception of one term he has been President since 1876, during which time he has shown wonderful ability, and it is doubtful if there is in the world to-day a chief executive of greater capacity or devotion to his people. Certainly no people have made greater relative progress than the Mexican people have made under the administration of Porfirio Diaz. Education has been promoted, law and order established, agriculture developed, commerce stimulated, and nearly every section of the country connected by railroad with the capital.

Would you regard that as a fair statement with reference to the character and policies and success of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. BROWN. I would. I do not think it is overdrawn.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that anything like that could be said of the present incumbent of the presidency of Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. No; I do not think he has succeeded in firmly establishing himself, certainly not throughout the whole country.

Mr. KEARFUL. If Mr. Bryan had anything to do with the success of the present incumbent, as against the régime of Porfirio Diaz, do you think he made a mistake or not, according to his own description of Diaz?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir; I would think so. There is this to be said, however, that Gen. Diaz, while a very successful administrator of the affairs of that country, had grown to be a very elderly man and was gradually losing contact with the people, and about the time of his overthrow it was pretty generally thought that his age had practically destroyed his ability to fulfill properly the administrative functions of president.

Mr. KEARFUL. Without regard to the personality of Diaz, what would you say in reference to the policies of the present system as compared with the policies of his system?

Mr. BROWN. For any country like Mexico I doubt if the present policies, as I understand them to be, are such as will succeed in establishing justice, law, and order there.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you understand to be the present policies of the administration?

Mr. BROWN. If my information be correct, they are more or less socialistic; and with so small a percentage of education in the country, it is doubtful if they are as yet capable of conducting a purely democratic form of government, as we understand it here.

Mr. KEARFUL. There is a class which has been designated as the "submerged 80 per cent." What is that class?

Mr. BROWN. I think it is safe to say that those represent entirely Indians who could neither read nor write, who are indifferent as to what the form of government is or who is at the head of it; and all they want is to be left alone in peace and quiet to till their little pieces of land and pursue the customs and traditions as originally brought down by their forefathers.

Mr. KEARFUL. What other classes are there in Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. There is what they call the Mexican class, which is more or less a mixed breed. I should say they represent probably 10 or 12 per cent of the total population—might be called the middle class. Those are the people that are doing things there. They are as a rule aggressive, intelligent, and brave, and when properly directed could be made good citizens in any country.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the difficulty in reference to their direction, as you understand it?

Mr. BROWN. My information is and my experience was that they are more or less sentimental and easily led. They are wonderfully brave, and a leader can influence them to do things that, probably, on mature consideration they would hesitate to do, but do it on the spur of the moment.

Mr. KEARFUL. What effect does the dissemination of socialistic doctrines have upon them?

Mr. BROWN. I think they are temporary, Judge, and I am sure they have some effect. That was not very much in evidence up to the time I left Mexico. I am told that since that, with the German propaganda that has been going on there, that that is very much in evidence during the last two or three years.

Mr. KEARFUL. What third class is there in Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. The owners of the farms and factories and so on. The majority of those are of either Spanish blood or a mixture.

Mr. KEARFUL. They are generally referred to as the "intelligent class"?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. The "intellectual class"?

Mr. BROWN. The "intellectual class." Those are the property owners, as a rule, and I should say represent less than 10 per cent of the total.

Mr. KEARFUL. It has been testified by prominent Mexicans before the committee that approximately 80 per cent of that class have been compelled to live in exile from Mexico and are now living outside the country. Is that in accordance with your information?

Mr. BROWN. I should say that was a fair estimate.

Mr. KEARFUL. What State did you say you were from?

Mr. BROWN. I was born in Alabama.

Mr. KEARFUL. Alabama is largely populated by negroes, is it not?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir; forty-odd per cent are negroes, as I understand.

Mr. KEARFUL. And quite a percentage is known as mulattoes, mixed with the white?

Mr. BROWN. Yes; I guess 10 or 12 per cent of the so-called negroes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you think would be the situation in Alabama if 80 per cent of the intellectual class were excluded from the State and the affairs of the Government were in the hands of the mulattoes?

Mr. BROWN. I certainly would not look for much progress, and I think probably, as is supposed to be the case in Mexico, things would go backward instead of forward.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think such a situation as I have described in Alabama would be somewhat parallel to that in Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir. Certainly it is comparable, but in view of the fact that a large percentage of all the classes are such as can read and write, it might not be quite so extreme.

Mr. KEARFUL. Since you have returned to this country, or while you were living in Mexico, did you ever have any talk with Mr. Bryan when he was Secretary of State, or other officials of the State Department?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir. During the early part of Mr. Bryan's incumbency as Secretary of State I had two or three different talks with him, one of which covered probably an hour and a half, but the others were short.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was his attitude with reference to the protection of Americans and their interests in Mexico, if you could judge of it from your conversation with him?

Mr. BROWN. I questioned him to know what the administration's policy would be, and also what would be the policy about the so-called dollar diplomacy. His answer in each instance was that while that had been discussed some no decision had been reached by the President or the Cabinet, so he made no reply to either of them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever receive any information in regard to Mr. Bryan's attitude toward American citizens operating in Mexico, that correct information could not be obtained from them because they were interested parties?

Mr. BROWN. I have heard that from various sources, Judge, but personally I never received it from Mr. Bryan. That is the impression that practically all those who have lived in Mexico and have spoken to me have of the situation. Some of them say they have been told that. Whether Mr. Bryan told them personally or somebody else, I do not know.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was Mr. Bryan's attitude in reference to getting information from you?

Mr. BROWN. At first he seemed rather listless, indifferent, but at the end of an hour or so when I got up to leave, and that conversation had lasted some considerable time, he seemed to be quite interested, and asked me to stay and give him further information. He further said that the President wanted to see me, and said he was having luncheon with him that day and wanted to know where he could reach me at 2.15 that afternoon. I told him at the Shoreham, and he did call me up over the phone and said he was sorry but it would not be convenient for the President to see me then, but he was going to see him again during the afternoon and wanted to know where he could reach me again at 7.30, I think it was, just after the dinner hour, that he wanted to talk with me further at that time. He called up over the phone again promptly at the time specified, but regretted that the President thought it best not to see me.

Mr. KEARFUL. During the time that you were in Mexico, and during the rule of Porfirio Diaz, did you have any knowledge of invitations extended to American citizens to make investments in Mexico and to go there to develop the country, on the part of the Mexican Government or of this Government, for the extension of trade and friendly relations?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir. I think it is safe to say that I know of many instances. That is evidenced by the fact that most of the railroad companies there were chartered in States of this country. In addition to that, I know in connection with the establishment of the oil industry and smelting and mining industries, certain rubber interests, cattle ranches, factories for the manufacture of various products, including steel and iron and so on, where it was currently reported, and the newspapers published the concessions and the contracts, that American interests were not only solicited, but supposed to have been given some satisfactory concessions.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know about the attitude of this Government and its officials with reference to its citizens going to Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. Not specifically, but so far as I know that was the impression I gathered when I went there, going down to build a railroad in Mexico under concessions from the Mexican Government in the first instance, under a charter from a State in the United States in the second instance, that it was what was wanted and was looked upon favorably and in a friendly way by both this and the Mexican Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you in Mexico at the time of the visit of Secretary Root?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember Mr. Root's attitude with reference to the necessity for the extension of foreign trade and friendly relations with Mexico and South America?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir; I think so. In fact, I read everything that was published about that time, and I gathered the impression that that was the object of his trip there, as well as to other Latin-American countries.

(Thereupon, at 1 o'clock p. m., an adjournment was taken until 2.30 o'clock p. m.)

AFTER RECESS.

The hearing was resumed at the expiration of the recess.

STATEMENT OF MR. EDWARD N. BROWN—Resumed.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you understand to be the position of Secretary Root with reference to citizens of this country going to Mexico and other Latin-American countries in order to extend our foreign trade with those countries?

Mr. BROWN. Well, I do not know that I heard him make any specific declaration, but I am certainly under the impression that that was largely the object of his visit, not only to Mexico but to other Latin-American countries about that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe it possible to extend our foreign trade with Mexico and other countries without our citizens going to those countries, to any large extent?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly it could not be done in a satisfactory or large way. It would be very much curtailed, at any rate.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think it would be feasible for our citizens to go to Mexico for that purpose and accomplish anything unless they could call upon the protection of this Government in case they were persecuted?

Mr. BROWN. It would certainly be very discouraging to them, and most of them would not consider it at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Bryan's article in the Commoner, before referred to, has this to say on the subject:

I am sometimes asked whether I would advise people to invest in Mexico.

Then he goes on to enumerate the various investments, amounting to over $500,000,000, that had been made in Mexico, citing railroad investments, mining investments, agricultural investments, manufacturing investments, and investments in city realty. He cites a large number of instances of Americans who have operated successfully in various lines, including coffee, sugar, railroads, law, plantations, and concludes by saying:

There are many opportunities in Mexico for the man who goes there with capital and with knowledge of an industry to bring out the latent possibilities of soil and climate. There are also opportunities for those who go as skilled laborers to oversee industries in the process of development, although these opportunities lessen with the increase of education among the Mexicans.

Do you consider that a fair statement of the conditions at that time?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir; I would say so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have an opportunity to ascertain the position of Mr. Bryan with reference to the protection of Americans who had gone there subsequent to this article?

Mr. BROWN. He did not give me a definite answer to my question, but the impression which I got from the conversation, coupled with what others told me was his attitude, gave me the idea that no protection was to be expected.

Mr. KEARFUL. No protection was ever given, to your knowledge, was there?

Mr. BROWN. None whatever.

Mr. KEARFUL. The first thing that Bryan did when trouble began down there was to order Americans to leave Mexico, was it not?

Mr. BROWN. It was among the early stages of his incumbency in Washington and was repeated two or three times. I think some of the people I know have left there at least three times under orders from the State Department in Washington to get out.

Mr. KEARFUL. How were those orders considered? What deduction was made as to what was going to be done when those orders were first given?

Mr. BROWN. The first time, I think, it was expected there might be trouble between the United States and Mexico, and that this had some relation with what the United States might do; but the last time or two they were issued I do not think they were given very much consideration, further than carrying out the orders of the representatives of our country. That was the impression I got from those who left there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know whether Americans generally consider that such an order would not be given unless the United States intended to go into Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. Yes; I am sure that impression prevailed. I do not think that some of those who left there were at all sure that anything would be done. At least, that was what some of them told me, that they left under the mandate, but they then doubted that anything would be done. They did not think it was necessary for them to leave there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it generally considered that it was not necessary to give such an order unless the American Government was going in to stabilize the country.

Mr. BROWN. I think you might go further and say that they considered it folly to call them away from there unless something of that kind was anticipated.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever have an opportunity to discover the attitude of President Wilson on the subject of protecting Americans in Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. Personally, no. I never have seen President Wilson.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you a fixed opinion, based upon information you have gathered, as to what his attitude was toward Americans operating in Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. Nothing, except through hearsay and reading in the papers. My personal knowledge is only only through those channels.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you make an effort to see him and impress upon him the necessity of doing something in Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir; I never asked for an interview with the President.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you familiar with the results of requests made by other Americans for interviews?

Mr. BROWN. I know of a committee having been appointed at one time to take the general question up with the authorities in Washington, on which I was appointed without my knowledge and consent. It so happened that I could not go. Several of those committeemen told me they got no encouragement when they saw the President.

Mr. KEARFUL. Can you state what reasons, if any, the President gave in regard to not taking action for the protection of Americans?

Mr. BROWN. I am not positive. I am not sure just what they did say, but as I recall now he personally made the statement that it would not be convenient for them to do anything at that time, without assigning a reason.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Bryan makes another statement in his article which seems to be almost prophetic. He says, in reference to railroads:

The Mexican railroads employ Americans for conductors and engineers almost to the exclusion of the natives. The reason given me by one of the conductors was that there is not so large a middle class to draw from there as in the United States. In Mexico the peons are not competent to fill these positions and the well-to-do Mexicans prefer the professions. With the increase in education, however, it is probable that the Americans will not long be able to monopolize this branch of the service.

What happened under your observation in reference to the elimination of Americans from railroad service?

Mr. BROWN. We gradually trained the natives to fill practically all the positions in agencies and shops and train service, and during the last few years of my connection with it, it was very satisfactory; but it takes time and a great deal of careful attention to bring them up to that point. It was done gradually during these twenty-odd years.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was, of course, a benefit to the Mexicans?

Mr. BROWN. Well, I am sure I considered it so, and I think they did.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the character of the concessions, if you know, granted for the development of other enterprises than railroads?

Mr. BROWN. My knowledge of that is so superficial that I do not think it would be of any service to you.

Mr. KEARFUL. It has been said that Americans operating in Mexico were not entitled to consideration at the hands of the Government, as they were a class of speculators operating under concessions obtained by bribery and graft and thus oppressing the Mexican people. Do you believe that is so?

Mr. BROWN. It certainly is not so in those that I know of. I am surprised at the statement.

Mr. KEARFUL. That statement has emanated at times from persons in high authority. What do you know generally about the character of Americans operating in Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. I think it is safe to say that during the early days of the construction of railroads a great many of them were not all they should have been. Some of them were criminals from this country who went down there and followed the construction of the railroads to get positions. As soon as the construction or the bulk of it was over those objectionable characters gradually migrated further south to Guatemala and other Latin-American countries.

I believe that it is safe to say that from about the year 1890 to the present time the average American who went there to work was an average of this country, without any reason other than seeking profitable employment. I further think that in the representation of many of the industries and companies operating there they selected the highest intelligence they could find, and the representatives of many of the industries and commercial and banking institutions was a superior class.

Mr. KEARFUL. Superior to a similar class in this country?

Mr. BROWN. Well, above the average.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were there in Mexico among the Americans there or in the American colony any of what is called the lower class in this country?

Mr. BROWN. Of the Americans living there?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWN. A few of the laboring class, but very few. About the lowest class were brakemen and firemen on the Mexican International Railroad, which were taken from similar positions in the Middle West of this country down there to occupy those positions, and they did occupy them until 1904. At that time those positions were all filled by Mexicans, and those men were relieved and returned to the States. So far as my knowledge goes, that was the lowest class of American laborers or other people that went there.

Mr. KEARFUL. They would not be considered a low class of people, would they?

Mr. BROWN. I would not say so. They were brakemen and firemen of average intelligence, and as a rule good citizens.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you consider the principal difficulty with Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. To-day?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. BROWN. The different factions there have been brought into a very severe and antagonistic feeling, growing out of these revolutionary troubles, and it has grown largely into personal differences with the chiefs of these factions. They started out, of course, with the idea that they were going to ameliorate the condition of the people, and, I suppose, incidentally, to better their own condition, by taking the chief places in these movements, and they built up around them a certain contingent with promises of bettering their condition, as well as bettering the condition of the country. They have never succeeded in settling the differences among themselves, so there are a number of different factions headed by different people with their satellites and followers. That condition not only exists to-day but it has grown into feuds and personalities, apart from the general political question, and it is difficult from my point of view to see how, without some help, they can compose those differences. I believe that in some of these instances the principles enunciated that caused them to get into revolutionary troubles were very good, and probably the people who took the lead were conscientious in the belief and hope that they could better the country, better the condition of all the people of the country; but I think they were mistaken in seeing just what was necessary and what their ability was to do it, to accomplish it. I think they overlooked the condition of the country as a whole, the illiteracy and other conditions of the people which would affect their success.

Mr. KEARFUL. To what extent do you think they were controlled by the desire to help themselves?

Mr. BROWN. I am sure that many of them had that question foremost in their minds, but I am of the opinion that a few of them started out originally with the idea that they were doing it only through patriotic motives.

Mr. KEARFUL. The condition of factional strife that you mentioned—does that indicate to you that the leaders have been actuated by personal ambitions rather than patriotic motives?

Mr. BROWN. I think originally most of the leaders had patriotic motives, but I fear that having once tasted the full authority of leadership their personal ambitions got the better of them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think the fact that the country has been so devastated that there is perhaps not enough to go around, and they have begun to fight among themselves over what remains, has anything to do with it?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir; I do not think that has had so much to do with it. I think that had a good deal to do with it in the beginning. I think it is the personal feeling between them and the fear or reluctance to acknowledge the authority of the other that is keeping them going to a very great extent to-day.

Mr. KEARFUL. What class of people had control of the Government during the time of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. BROWN. I think it is safe to say that 90 per cent of them were the best people there.

Mr. KEARFUL. They were what you spoke of a while ago as the intellectual class?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir; the intellectual class, who were people of not only native birth, but whose interests were solely and only those of Mexico. The other 10 per cent, I think, were, as in most other countries, people that had been put into positions from the States, or from their own countries.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe there is any hope for Mexico from the inside, except through this intellectual class?

Mr. BROWN. I do not. I think that is the only hope in the immediate future, and when I say "the immediate future" I mean the present generation.

Mr. KEARFUL. With 80 per cent of that class excluded from Mexico do you believe there is any hope at all from the inside?

Mr. BROWN. No; I do not, unless it be a long drawn out procedure, and another generation brought in.

Mr. KEARFUL. I mean for the immediate future?

Mr. BROWN. No; I do not.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your opinion as to what this country ought to do, if anything, in reference to correcting the conditions in Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. I always felt a most friendly interest in Mexico, and still feel it, and what I should like to see done would be this country, either alone or in conjunction with some of the European countries, to offer their assistance, first financially. I suppose in doing that they would have to have, as is usual, some understanding that they were to have a commission to supervise the income and expenses of the country, and see if through that channel they could not work out some satisfactory proposition with reference to rehabilitating the country, not only with reference to finances, but its transportation and industries and educational institutions, and so on. I believe that is the first thing to consider. I am not sure, but I had hoped that Mexico would not look with an unfriendly feeling on such a proposition. It seems to me that through that or some similar channel the effort should first be made.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of any effort having been made by the present Government of Mexico to borrow money with which to rebuild the railroads and establish banks, etc.?

Mr. BROWN. I have been told they made two or three efforts through some of the bankers here, but that their efforts were not successful.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know the reason why bankers would not lend the money?

Mr. BROWN. Well, first, the lack of guaranty; second, I understood the Mexican authorities were not willing to accept the idea of a commission to supervise the expenditures.

Mr. KEARFUL. In case an arrangement should be made with the Mexican Government for the furnishing of sufficient money to finance the country and rehabilitate it, under supervision of a commission named by the financiers, and either the present Government or some other Government that might come into power through a revolution would repudiate that agreement, then what do you think would have to be done?

Mr. BROWN. I think it would be up to this or such Government as might be represented on that commission to protect the property.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe that any banker or group of bankers would undertake to finance Mexico without some assurance that if an arrangement made was not carried out this Government would insist upon carrying it out by force if necessary?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly not, unless the United States Government alone or in conjunction with other Governments would underwrite the issue through which the bankers made the advance.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean by underwriting the issue that it would undertake, not to guarantee the payment of the money, but to enforce conditions of security?

Mr. BROWN. Either one or the other. Certainly one or the other would be necessary. Otherwise, I do not see how the bankers' group could raise money. You see, the Mexican Government; for a loan that had been made some years ago, pledged 62 per cent of the customs duties as guaranty for those loans. Then about 1904 they made additional loans through Speyer & Co. and other bankers, guaranteeing the remaining 38 per cent of the customs duties. Therefore, all the customs duties are pledged to these different loans. Subsequently, and I think during Gen. Huerta's time, there were certain securities issued for which the stamp taxes were pledged, and, if I understand correctly, those are the two things that are usually given by small governments as guaranties for loans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Since the time of Huerta have the customs duties been collected and appropriated, and nothing paid on any of these securities?

Mr. BROWN. It is certainly the case that nothing has been paid on account of either government or railway indebtedness, no interest.

Mr. KEARFUL. A portion of the railway bonds are secured by guaranty of the Government?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mentioned the possibility of an arrangement by means of financial commission. What alternative is there, if such an arrangement can not be carried out?

Mr. BROWN. Well, either to let them go ahead with their internal troubles indefinitely, or else some friendly help to put their house in order.

Mr. KEARFUL. What course do you think that help would necessarily take?

Mr. BROWN. Well, I should say it ought to be offered from a friendly point of view, and only a friendly point of view, but with force of arms sufficient to maintain and keep the authority in power that the Government, by itself or through this representation of the commission, might decide upon.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know the feelings of the Americans who were operating in Mexico during your time and those who are operating there now, with reference to their right to protection of life and property from their own Government, in case they can not get it from Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. They have always felt that was an inherent right to expect from the Government. I think they have been very much discouraged of late, in view of the lack of any tangible evidence that that was being done, and believing that they would not get it. I think they have abandoned all hope of getting it at present.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any knowledge of the operation of privately owned trains by mining companies or other large operators in Mexico, and the system upon which that was conducted?

Mr. BROWN. Only through hearsay. I understood that some of the smelting companies and some few of the mining companies and two or three industrial companies have certain cars and a limited number of locomotives, some of which have been rented from the National Railways upon paying a certain rental charge; that they pay, as a rule, the usual freight charges under the old basis and run the trains, furnish the fuel, and so on for their own account.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know as to whether that is conducted on a very large scale?

Mr. BROWN. I have been told by people recently who thought they knew there were probably 6,000 to 8,000 freight cars and 100 small locomotives operating more or less on that basis.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you know about the attitude of the present Mexican Government toward old railroad employees?

Mr. BROWN. Very little, Judge, but my information is that most of the Mexican employees who were trained and brought up on the railroad are still at work there, but that a few of them who had gotten into political trouble and were persona non grata with the present authorities are not allowed to work.

Mr. KEARFUL. Does that go to this extent: That unless an old employee declares himself as a Carranzista or as being in sympathy with the government and the revolutionary movement he is not retained?

Mr. BROWN. I do not know. I imagine that is the case, but I do not know.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is all that I have any notes upon. Is there any further statement you would like to make that you think will throw any further light upon the matter?

Mr. BROWN. No, Judge; I do not know that there is, except I think it might not be out of place for me to say, in a general way, that having lived in Mexico for some 27 years most of the time and feeling most friendly to the country I should very much like to see some friendly solution of this problem, believing that it is in the interest of not only the foreigners and their investments, but of the natives as well. I am firmly of the belief that a very large percentage of the Mexican people would welcome some friendly help.

Mr. KEARFUL. Even if that friendly help took the course of armed forces for the purpose of suppressing those who might resist it?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir; as an ultimate necessity.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there anything further you wish to state?

Mr. BROWN. No; I think not.

(Whereupon, at 3.15 o'clock p. m., the hearing was adjourned.)
